Justice Richter observed that in Bast v. Rossoff, 91 N.Y.2d 723 (1998) the Court of Appeals addressed how child support awards should be calculated in cases involving shared custody. Contrary to the conclusion reached by the court below, Bast left no other option than to direct payment by the noncustodial parent to the custodial parent. The Court in Bast recognized that there are “practical challenges” in applying the CSSA to shared custodial arrangements. Nevertheless, Bast made clear that even in shared custody cases, courts are required to identify the “primary custodial parent”. Bast explained that “[i]n most instances, the court can determine the custodial parent for purposes of child support by identifying which parent has physical custody of the child for a majority of time”.

Justice Richter, referring to Baraby v Baraby, 250 A.D.2d 201, 681 N.Y.S.2d 826 (3d Dept, 1998), pointed out that only where the parents’ custodial time is truly equal, such that neither parent has physical custody of the child a majority of time, have courts deemed the parent with the higher income to be the noncustodial parent for child support purposes. She noted that Courts have uniformly followed Bast, finding that where parents have unequal residential time with a child, the party with the greater amount of time is the custodial parent for CSSA purposes. The great disparity in overnights here—56% to 44%—stood in marked contrast to the cases cited by the mother where the parents had equal, or essentially equal, custodial time.

Justice Richter found that the Supreme Court ignored its own custody schedule when it stated that the parents here shared “very nearly equal” physical custody of the child. In an attempt to equalize the custodial time, the court focused on how much “waking, non-school time” the child spent with each parent. The Supreme Court suggested that a custodial parent could be identified by calculating the number of waking hours he or she spends with the child. This approach was rejected in Somerville v. Somerville, 5 AD3d 878 (3d Dept 2004). She reached the same result here and rejected the counting of waking hours as a method of determining who is the custodial parent.

Although the Court in Bast did not elaborate on what constitutes a “majority of time,” Justice Richter believed that the number of overnights, not the number of waking hours, is the most practical and workable approach. She found that there are sound policy reasons why calculating the waking hours spent with each parent should not be the method used to determine who is the custodial parent. Allowing a parent to receive child support based on the number of daytime hours spent with the child bears no logical relation to the purpose behind child support awards, i.e., to assist a custodial parent in providing the child with shelter, food and clothing. Furthermore, because a child's activities are subject to constant change, the number of hours spent with each parent becomes a moving target. The use of this type of counting approach could also lead parents to keep their children out of camp or other activities simply to manipulate their time spent with the child so as to ensure that they are designated the "custodial parent". An hour-by-hour analysis of custodial time is just not workable and would run afoul of the "greater uniformity [and] predictability" the CSSA was designed to promote.

Justice Richter wrote that in finding that the father could be considered the noncustodial parent, the motion court improperly focused on the parties' financial circumstances rather than their custodial status. Neither the CSSA, nor Bast v. Rossoff, allows for economic disparity to govern the determination of who is the custodial parent where the custodial time is not equal. Moreover, there was no support for the mother's argument that in shared custody cases, a court has the discretion to determine the custodial parent based on what is "just" and "appropriate."

Child Support- Award - Imputed Income - Court May Impute Income Based upon Value of His Employer-provided Apartment - Support Magistrate Properly Declined to Credit Respondent with "Extraordinary Expenses" in Connection with His Visitation with the Child.

In Matter of Perel v. Gonzalez, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1578227 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied respondent's objection to the Support Magistrate's imputation to him of income based on the full market value of his employer-provided apartment, and an order which denied his objections to the parts of the Support Magistrate's order of support that required him to pay child support in the amount of $476.49 per week, applied the child support percentage to the parties' combined income above the $130,000 statutory cap, and required respondent to pay his pro rata share of the child's private pre-kindergarten tuition. It held that the court correctly determined the parties' income for purposes of calculating their basic child support obligations based on his 2008 annual gross income and the value of his employer-provided apartment and petitioner's income based on her 2008 annual gross income and her previous full-time employment as a concierge.

The Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate properly declined to credit respondent with "extraordinary expenses" in connection with his visitation with the child. The Court of Appeals considered and expressly rejected any use in New York of the proportional offset formula in Bast v. Rossoff (91 N.Y.2d 723, 728-730 [1998]). Thus, it declined to follow Matter of Carlino v. Carlino (277 A.D.2d 897 [4th Dept 2000]), as urged by respondent.

The Appellate Division rejected respondent's arguments that income may not be imputed to him based on the value of his employer-provided apartment because the value of lodging furnished to an employee pursuant to employment is excluded from income under the Internal Revenue Code (26 USC § 119[a]), the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution requires the value to be excluded as income for child support purposes, and it is unconstitutional because it conflicts with the Internal Revenue Code. The Family Court Act provides that "at the discretion of the court, the court may attribute or impute income from[] such other resources as may be available to the parent, including, but not limited to: ... lodging ... or other perquisites that are provided as part of compensation for employment to the extent that such perquisites constitute expenditures for personal use, or which expenditures directly or indirec[t]ly confer personal economic benefits" (Family Court Act § 413[1][b][5][iv][B]). The record showed that respondent had a separate office in the same building, that he was not required to be on the premises after completing his 9 to 5 shift, that he used the apartment for his daily living activities, and that he was not restricted in any way in his use of the apartment.

The record supported the Support Magistrate's finding that respondent consented to the enrollment of the child in a private pre-kindergarten school. He admitted that before enrolling the child in the school he and petitioner had looked at several other private schools. There was no evidence that the parties ever considered enrolling the child in a public pre-kindergarten program. Respondent did not sign the enrollment contract, but he was aware that petitioner had made a non-refundable deposit to reserve the child's place in February 2009. It deferred to the Support Magistrate's finding that respondent's consistent denial that he ever consented to the child's enrollment in private school was "wholly incredible and self serving."

Appellate Division, Second Department

Child Custody - Visitation - Grandparent Visitation - Domestic Relations Law § 72 - Grandparent Visitation Order Reversed Where evidence in the record, and children's apprehension regarding visitation with grandmother, established that visitation was not in the best interests of the children.

In Matter of Pinsky v. Botnick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1442510 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.)
The mother, Estee Botnick married Jason Botnick on August 15, 1999, and there were four children of the marriage. On November 27, 2011, Jason passed away at the age of 35, at which time the children were ages 9, 7, 5, and 3, respectively. According to the mother, immediately prior to Jason's death, "[a]s the ICU team was literally trying to resuscitate Jason," the paternal grandmother, Janet Pinsky (grandmother), said to her, "We are going to have to make a schedule with the kids ."On January 3, 2012, the mother received a letter from the grandmother's attorney, threatening legal action if the mother did not permit the grandmother immediate visitation with the children, and requesting a response by noon the following day. The mother responded by inviting the grandmother over for a visit that evening. In a reply email, the grandmother asserted that her major concern was access to the children going forward, which the mother's email did not address, and requested that the mother respond to the grandmother's attorney as to when the mother or her legal representative could meet before the end of the week. Thereafter, the mother invited the grandmother to her home to visit with the children on January 8, 2012. Nevertheless, three days later, and approximately six weeks after Jason's death, the grandmother caused the mother to be served with the petition for visitation while the mother was at home with the children.

At the hearing on the petition, the grandmother testified that she had a close relationship with the children. The grandmother also acknowledged that the mother was a fit parent. The mother testified that after she was served at home with the petition, the three older children, who were grieving the death of their father, became "hysterical" upon learning that the mother had to go to court. The mother testified that by initiating this proceeding, the grandmother had caused the three older children to become fearful that the grandmother was going to take them away. She testified that the children needed time to get over their fears, and to "deal with the fact that their father has passed away."The attorney for the children informed the Family Court that the children did not wish to see their grandparents. The Family Court accepted into evidence a report prepared by Peter J. Favaro, Ph.D., who was retained by the mother. In the report, Dr. Favaro opined, inter alia, that the children were experiencing symptoms common to "complicated bereavement." According to Dr. Favaro, the three older children had reported having bad dreams about seeing their grandmother and that she would take them away. He concluded that for the sake of the children's future relationship with the grandmother, "it would be unwise to have them pair thoughts of fear of seeing [her] with their father's passing," and that forcing an interaction would only strengthen their fears.

In an order dated March 22, 2012, the Family Court, inter alia, granted the petition for visitation to the extent of awarding the grandmother three hours of visitation with the children every other Sunday commencing on June 3, 2012, as well as such other visitation as to which the parties shall agree. The court also directed the grandmother and the children to communicate daily via email until visitation commenced. On March 23, 2012, the same day the grandmother received a copy of the March 22, 2012, order, she sent an email to the mother informing her that she would be emailing the children daily starting that day, requesting that the mother direct the two older children to respond to the emails, and directing that either the mother or the two older children respond on behalf of the two younger children.

In May 2012, the mother moved to modify the order dated March 22, 2012, so as to delay the commencement of visitation until October 14, 2012. In her supporting affidavit, the mother averred that prior to the date visitation was scheduled to commence, the grandmother, without authorization, began attending the children's after-school and extracurricular activities. The mother stated that on one occasion, the grandmother showed up at one of the children's after-school activities and watched her through the windows of the gymnasium. The mother indicated that the child did not go to the bathroom because the grandmother was staring at her through the window next to the bathroom, and that the child had reported feeling "stalk[ed]." In addition, the mother asserted that the grandmother had contacted school officials and the children's coaches, and demanded inclusion on mailing lists relating to the children's schedules and activities. The mother maintained that the grandmother's conduct had caused the children distress, and had led to two of the children refusing to attend their little league baseball games. In a reply affidavit, the mother averred that on June 18, 2012, the grandmother and her husband showed up at the kindergarten graduation ceremony of one of the children, and, after the ceremony, each stood at opposite corners of the "party room" by the exit doors. The mother asserted that a security guard noticed what was happening, and escorted the mother and the child to a classroom where they remained during the party. In an order dated July 25, 2012, the Family Court denied the mother's motion.

The Appellate Division observed that a court determining a petition for grandparent visitation under Domestic Relations Law § 72(1), must undertake a two-part inquiry. First, it must determine whether the grandparent has standing to petition for visitation rights based on the death of a parent or equitable circumstances (see Matter of E.S. v. P.D., 8 NY3d 150, 157). If the court concludes that the grandparent has established the right to be heard, then it must determine if visitation is in the best interests of the child (see Matter of E.S. v. P.D., 8 NY3d at 157; Matter of Wilson v. McGlinchey, 2 NY3d 375, 380). The courts should not lightly intrude on the family relationship against a fit parent's wishes. It is strongly presumed that a fit parent's decisions are in the child's best interests. It held that the Family Court should have denied the grandmother's petition for visitation. The death of the children's father provided the grandmother with automatic standing to seek visitation (Domestic Relations Law § 72 [1]). Nevertheless, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in granting the petition. The evidence in the record, including, inter alia, the mother's testimony, the report of Dr. Favaro, and the children's apprehension regarding visitation with the grandmother, established that visitation was not in the best interests of the children at the time the Family Court granted the petition.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(b)(5-a) - Better for the Court to Proceed Sequentially in Accordance with the Statutory Procedure

In Goncalves v Goncalves, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1632072 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that Domestic Relations Law § 236B (5-a) sets forth the substantive and procedural requirements for an award of temporary maintenance, addressing both the amount and the duration of the temporary award. Here, the Supreme Court performed the required calculations, but it did not proceed sequentially through the statutory procedure. Instead, upon its consideration of all the relevant statutory factors, which it explained at length, the court awarded temporary maintenance to the wife that was significantly in excess of the amount that would have been yielded solely by application of the statutory formula. It held that although it would have been better for the court to proceed sequentially in accordance with the statutory procedure (see e.g. H.K. v. J.K., 32 Misc.3d 1226[A]), the court's award of temporary maintenance was "appropriately supported and explained" (Khaira v. Khaira, 93 AD3d 194, 201), and it declined to disturb it (cf. Woodford v. Woodford, 100 AD3d 875, 877).

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Proper to Award Wife Sole Ownership of Marital Residence Where, Inter Alia,, Supreme Court Noted That it Was Directing Plaintiff to Convey His Interest in the Property in Lieu Of, Inter Alia, Maintenance and an Attorney's Fee.

In Henery v Henery, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1632079 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the Supreme Court did not abdicate its responsibility by adopting the defendant's proposed findings of fact, particularly since the court edited them by deleting some of the proposed findings, which necessitated the court's revision of the proposed judgment submitted by the defendant. In awarding the defendant sole ownership of the parties' marital residence, Supreme Court noted that it was directing the plaintiff to convey his interest in the property in lieu of, inter alia, maintenance and an attorney's fee. The court also noted that the mortgage on the marital residence had been satisfied by the defendant's parents, and that the expenses paid by the defendant, her financial sacrifices, her waiver of an attorney's fee, and the loss of retirement benefits resulting from the plaintiff's discharge for cause from a school administrative position, exceeded the plaintiff's share in the equity of the marital residence. It held that under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding sole ownership of the marital residence to the defendant (citing Ropiecki v. Ropiecki, 94 AD3d 734, 735; Mahon v. Mahon, 129 A.D.2d 684, 684; Teabout v. Teabout, 269 A.D.2d 719, 721).

Child Support - Modification - UIFSA - Family Ct Act § 580-611[a] [1] - Family Court Had Jurisdiction to Modify Pennsylvania Support Order, upon Registration

In Matter of Gowda v Reddy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1632549 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division noted that the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), codified in article 5-B of the Family Court Act, provides, in pertinent part, that a party seeking to modify and/or enforce a child support order issued in another state "shall register that order in this state" (Family Ct Act § 580-609). The support order governing the father's child support obligations, which was issued by the Court of Common Pleas of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, and was effective beginning on June 3, 2004 was registered in the Family Court, Suffolk County, pursuant to UIFSA, on May 26, 2009. The Family Court had jurisdiction to modify the Pennsylvania support order, upon registration thereof, since none of the parties resided in Pennsylvania, the petitioner mother did not reside in New York, and the respondent father, at all relevant times, was subject to personal jurisdiction in Suffolk County (Family Ct Act § 580-611[a] [1]). It held that the Family Court erred in calculating the father's child support arrears to include the period prior to August 6, 2008, the date the mother's petition filed in Pennsylvania to modify the father's child support obligation set forth in the Pennsylvania support order was dismissed, upon the parties' stipulation, with prejudice. A stipulation of discontinuance with prejudice without reservation of right or limitation of the claims disposed of is entitled to preclusive effect under the doctrine of res judicata. Thus, to the extent this proceeding sought recovery of the same child support arrears that were sought in the Pennsylvania proceeding which was dismissed upon the parties' stipulation, with prejudice, it was barred by the doctrine of res judicata.

Arbitration - Stipulation Which Provides for Arbitration of " All Disputes Related to Matters Addressed in the Stipulation" Is Enforceable Subject to Vacatur on Public Policy Grounds

In Wieder v Wieder, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1632809 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the plaintiff's motion, in effect, to compel arbitration before a rabbinical court and to stay all proceedings in the action and in a related action entitled Wieder v. Wieder, while the arbitration was pending, and denied her cross motion to stay arbitration. The parties' stipulation of settlement dated January 11, 2011, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce dated January 24, 2011, provided that all disputes related to matters addressed in the stipulation would be subject to arbitration before a rabbinical court. Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly granted the plaintiff's motion, inter alia, in effect, to compel arbitration before a rabbinical court of the financial disputes between the parties and properly denied the defendant's cross motion to stay arbitration. It observed that all financial issues, including the amount of child support, may be determined by an arbitration subject to vacatur on public policy grounds such as failure to comply with the Child Support Standards Act and not being in the best interests of the parties' children (see Berg v. Berg, 85 AD3d 952, 953; Frieden v. Frieden, 22 AD3d 634, 635; Matter of Hirsch v. Hirsch, 4 AD3d 451, 452-453). Contrary to the defendant's contention, the determination as to whether the stipulation of settlement is unconscionable as a whole is for the arbitrator or arbitrators to decide (see Tsadilas v. Providian Natl. Bank, 13 AD3d 190).

Maintenance - Modification - DRL § 236(B)(9)(b) -Surviving Agreement - Downward - Extreme Hardship - Extreme Hardship Is Not Merely the Medical Consequence of a Maturing Life but its Plain Meaning Calls for a Substantial Dislocation of the Financial Circumstances So That the Litigant Is Nearly Without Resources or Shelter

In Long v Long, 2011 WL 10618898 (N.Y.Sup.), 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 52549 (U) the retired plaintiff sought to modify his non-durational maintenance obligations to his now infirm and Medicaid-supported former spouse. He argued that he was enduring an "extreme hardship" from the continued enforcement of this longstanding obligation, and that circumstances have changed to justify a modification. The parties' divorce decree was entered on July 9, 1987. In December 1985, the parties signed a separation agreement, which was subsequently incorporated but not merged into the decree. The husband agreed to pay non-durational maintenance payments of $160.00 per week until the wife remarried, and provide medical insurance for a five-year period following the divorce. He paid for more than 20 years. The husband retired from full-time employment with New York State in October 1998, but continued to work part-time installing carpets. Recently, the husband has suspended his part-time employment because of health issues. A retirement pension and social security are now the husband's only sources of income. As the husband's second job income declined because of his own infirmities, his maintenance payments became sporadic. As of the filing of this application, $10,183 of unpaid maintenance obligations have accrued.

The wife, 72, was permanently disabled and resided at Monroe Community Hospital, where Medicaid would cover the costs of her care for the foreseeable future. Because the wife was disabled and publicly-supported, the husband sought to modify his non-durational maintenance and either discontinue the payments or significantly reduce them. In a statement of net worth, prepared by his accountant, the husband contended that "there has been a significant change in my financial circumstances and my financial ability to provide the support as ordered."The statement showed that the husband owns a $135,000 house encumbered by a $126,448 mortgage. He had monthly income from his pension and social security totaling $5,470. In his monthly expenses, he listed the mortgage payment at $1,140. In addition, he has what appeared to be credit card charges and associated consumer debt totaling more than $1,500 monthly. There was no explanation in the statement as to how the personal consumer-related debt accrued, but if this amount is deducted from his expenses, his monthly usual expenses were substantially less than his $5,470 income, and could easily accommodate the estimated $640 per month in maintenance payments to his wife.

Supreme Court observed that modification of a maintenance obligation is permissible only when compliance with the order creates an "extreme hardship" for the obligated spouse. DRL § 236(B)(6)(a); Pintus v. Pintus 104 A.D.2d 866, 867-868 (2d Dept 1984). The party seeking modification bears the burden of proving extreme hardship. Pintus at 868. DRL § 236(B)(6)(a). Soba v. Soba, 213 A.D.2d 472, 473 (2d Dept 1995). When assessing the merits for maintenance modification, the court must assess the cause of the hardship. Fendsack v. Fendsack, 290 A.D.2d 682, 684 (2d Dept 2002). Anticipated retirement alone, however, cannot be a catalyst for downward modification. Id. at 684; Di Novo v. Robinson, 250 A.D.2d 898, 899 (3d Dept 1998) (voluntary actions resulting in a diminished income does not warrant downward modification of a maintenance obligation). The husband voluntarily retired from full-time employment in late 1998, but continued to work part-time until a back ailment forced a second retirement. There was no evidence before the Court on the amount of income lost to the husband as a consequence of his retirement from his second job. Nevertheless, in the absence of any data substantiating the loss of income due to his second retirement, modification of maintenance was improper. Due to the age of the husband and the physically demanding nature of installing carpets, eventual retirement from all employment must have been anticipated. Therefore, the Court was not concerned with the loss of income due to cessation of the husband's part-time employment for modification purposes. McKeown v. Woessner, 249 A.D.2d 396, 397-398 (2d Dept 1998). Moreover, the husband continued to enjoy sizable pension distributions, augmented by social security income. The Court also noted that a large portion of the husband's monthly expenditures were related to consumer credit counseling services, suggesting much of the husband's financial woes were self-inflicted. Kaplan v. Kaplan, 23 Misc.3d 1123A (Sup.Ct. Nassau Cty 2009) (self-imposed loss of income or increased debt does not constitute a severe hardship sufficient to justify a modification). Accordingly, it was difficult for this Court to see how the alleged fiscal crisis of the husband was relevant for maintenance modification purposes. Unpaid general creditors should not displace the former spouse in the hierarchy of the husband's payment obligations. It observed that "Extreme hardship is not merely the medical consequence of a maturing life but its plain meaning calls for a substantial dislocation of the financial circumstances so that the litigant is nearly without resources or shelter". For these reasons, the husband's stressed financial condition as contained in his application did not meet the test of an "extreme hardship" sufficient to justify a modification of his agreed maintenance obligation.

Family Court

Child Custody - Award - Standing - Family Court Holds That Domestic Partner, Having Succeeded in Having Petitioner Declared a Parent for Child Support Purposes Was Judicially Estopped From Asserting That Petitioner Was Not a Parent in this Custody-Visitation Proceeding.

In Matter of Estrellita A. v. Jennifer D., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1660674 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) the parties registered as domestic partners in 2007. Thereafter, they decided to have a child and together went to North Shore University Hospital to choose a sperm donor. In February of 2008, respondent became pregnant by artificial insemination and as a result the child, Hannah Elizabeth A.-D., was born on November 23, 2008. Although there were discussions between the parties regarding petitioner adopting Hannah, no adoption was filed. In September of 2012 the parties stopped residing together.

On October 24, 2012 the respondent herein filed a Petition for an Order of Support of the child against Estrellita A. Ms. D. asserted in her petition that she and Ms. A. had a child in common, Hannah Elizabeth A.-D., born November 23, 2008. The biological father of the child was not legally established as the child was donor conceived. The Family Court was asked to rule upon whether Ms. A. should be declared a parent for the purposes of establishing a child support order. After a hearing it was established that Estrellita A. was a parent to Hannah A.-D. and petitioner was charged with support of the child.

On January 10, 2013 the petitioner Estrellita A. filed a Petition for Custody of Hannah. The petition alleged that the respondent Jennifer D. was the biological mother, and that the child Hannah is their child in common. The petitioner further asserted that it would be in the child's best interest that she have custody as she is better suited to foster a relationship between the child and her biological mother. Respondent asserted that the custody petition must be dismissed as the Petitioner was not a "parent" for purposes of custody/ visitation under the Family Court Act Article 6, Domestic Relations Law § 70 and §240, and thus has no standing to bring this action. Ms. D. relied upon the rulings in two Court of Appeals cases, Alison D. v. Virginia M., 77 N.Y.2d 651, 572 N.E.2d 27, 569 N.Y.S.2d 586 (1991) and Debra H. v. Janice R., 14 N.Y.3d 576, 930 N.E.2d 184, 904 N.Y.S.2d 363 (2010), Alison D. holding where, as here, the biological mother is a fit parent, that the court cannot displace her choices as to the child's best interest, including those with whom she allows the child to associate.

The petitioner argued that she sought custody as a person who had already been adjudicated to be a parent of the subject child and was not asking the court to confer such standing by estoppel. The petitioner argued that she has standing per the "uncontroverted" facts that establish her as a parent to Hannah and asserts that the Court must allow the custody matter to proceed to a "best interests" hearing. Family Court found that in her own child support petition Respondent alleged that she and the petitioner had "a child in common". She requested and received an estoppel hearing. At that hearing respondent testified, among other things, that petitioner not only performed as a parent, she was in fact a parent. The court relying on this testimony issued an order adjudicating petitioner to be a parent and referred the matter to a support magistrate for the entry of an appropriate child support order. Now, in a complete reversal, and in an effort to preclude petitioner from having her day in court, respondent now claimed that petitioner has no standing to bring a custody/ visitation proceeding because petitioner was not a parent. This is referred to as "inconsistent positions". The Family Court observed that the doctrine against inconsistent positions, or judicial estoppel precludes a party from assuming a position in a court proceeding contrary to one previously taken simply because his or her interests have changed (Mukuralinda v. Kingombe, 100 A.D.3d 1431, 954 N.Y.S.2d 316 (4th Dept.2012). Respondent asserted in one proceeding that petitioner was a parent in order to secure a child support award. In the later custody proceeding she adopted a wholly contradictory position in an attempt to preclude the person from exercising any right or control with respect to that child. Having petitioned the court to recognize the petitioner as a parent, having testified that petitioner was in fact a parent and having prevailed in that matter, the respondent was judicially estopped in this custody/ visitation proceeding from asserting that petitioner was not a parent, and her motion to dismiss was denied.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Agreements - Construction - Ambiguity - Ambiguities in a Contractual Instrument Will Be Resolved Contra Proferentem, Against the Party Who Prepared or Presented it

In DeAngelis v DeAngelis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1223312 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Arthur DeAngelis (decedent) married Mariann DeAngelis in 1966 and they had two children together, the defendant Anthony DeAngelis, born in 1968, and the defendant Catherine DeAngelis, born in 1971. The decedent and Mariann separated in 1986 and divorced in 1987. Their separation agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, provided that the decedent would maintain a $300,000 life insurance policy on his life for the benefit the defendants. The separation agreement also stipulated that the decedent's failure to maintain a life insurance policy for the defendants' benefit shall result in a charge against the decedent's estate in the sum of $300,000. After both defendants were emancipated in 1993, the decedent changed the beneficiary on his life insurance policy to his current wife, the plaintiff Jeanne DeAngelis (plaintiff). The decedent died in 2007, and the plaintiff filed a claim with the decedent's life insurance company and was paid the sum of $300,000, plus interest. At the time of his death, the decedent did not have a life insurance policy naming the defendants as beneficiaries, and the defendants subsequently filed a claim against the decedent's estate in the sum of $300,000. The plaintiff then commenced an action in the Supreme Court for a judgment declaring that the defendants had no claim against the decedent's estate for his failure to maintain a $300,000 life insurance policy for their benefit. After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court issued a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that the the terms of a separation agreement 'incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce operate as contractual obligations binding on the parties. It has long been the rule that ambiguities in a contractual instrument will be resolved contra proferentem, against the party who prepared or presented it" (151 W. Assoc. v. Printsiples Fabric Corp., 61 N.Y.2d 732, 734). A contract which is internally inconsistent in material respects or that reasonably lends itself to two conflicting interpretations is subject to the rule invoking strict construction of the contract in the light most favorable to the nondrafting party. The separation agreement was ambiguous as to whether the decedent's obligation to maintain a life insurance policy naming the defendants as beneficiaries extended beyond the date of the defendants' emancipation. However, it was undisputed that the decedent's attorney drafted the separation agreement. It held that pursuant to the doctrine of contra proferentem, the Supreme Court should have construed the ambiguity against the decedent's estate (see Graff v. Billet, 64 N.Y.2d 899, 902) .Accordingly, the judgment was reversed and a declaration made that the defendants had a claim against the decedent's estate in the sum of $300,000.

Equitable Distribution - Separate Property - Gifts - Record Supported Directive That Defendant Pay Wife and Children $70,000 Each Representing Return of Money Intended as Gifts to Plaintiff and Children

In Finch-Kaiser v Kaiser, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1223318 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff one-half of the value of Pro K Builders, Inc., based on a commencement date valuation rather than a trial date valuation, (b) directed the defendant to evenly divide a certain Shearson Lehman bond account in the minimum amount of $380,000 and deliver 50% of the proceeds to the plaintiff, (c) awarded the plaintiff $104,500 as her share of certain sums paid to Lanier & Fountain, Attorneys at Law, which were used to purchase real property in North Carolina, (d) directed the defendant to sell certain real properties in Sound Beach and Port Jefferson, and evenly divide the proceeds with the plaintiff, (e) directed the defendant to pay the plaintiff and the parties' two children $70,000 each, representing sums intended as gifts by the defendant's father, but used by the defendant to pay life insurance premiums, (f) awarded the plaintiff the marital residence, (g) awarded the plaintiff counsel fees of $16,225.50, and (h) awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $10,000 per month to continue until her death or remarriage.

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the defendant's contention, the record supported the Supreme Court's directive that he pay the plaintiff and the parties' two children $70,000 each. Those amounts represented a return of money given over a period of years by the defendant's father, and intended as gifts to the plaintiff and the children, but which was instead used by the defendant to pay life insurance premiums. It also held that Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in making the other awards except that Supreme Court should not have directed that 50% of a Shearson Lehman bond account be distributed to the plaintiff. The testimony established that prior to the commencement of this action, the funds in that bond account were transferred into the defendant's Axiom account, which the Supreme Court distributed equally between the parties.

Divorce - Attorneys - Right to Counsel - No Absolute Right to Assignment of Counsel in Matrimonial Action

In Meara v Meara, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1223346 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) an action for a divorce Supreme Court granted the plaintiff's application for an award of an attorney's fee of $15,000, and a judgment of divorce. It held that there is no absolute right to assignment of counsel in a matrimonial action (Matter of Smiley, 36 N.Y.2d 433). After nine attorneys representing the defendant had been either relieved or discharged, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in refusing to appoint another attorney to represent the defendant. Given the defendant's conduct in unnecessarily prolonging the litigation, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in granting the plaintiff's application for an award of an attorney's fee of $15,000.

Child Visitation - Conditions - Court May Not Order That a Parent Undergo Counseling or Treatment as a Condition of Future Visitation

In Matter of Lew v Lew, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1223387 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that a court may not order that a parent undergo counseling or treatment as a condition of future visitation or reapplication for visitation rights, but may only direct a party to submit to counseling or treatment as a component of visitation. Thus, it was also improper for the Family Court to determine that the father could not file further petitions concerning his visitation rights until he completed, inter alia, therapeutic counseling, anger management classes, and parenting skill classes. The matter was remitted to the Family Court or an evidentiary hearing and a new determination of the father's petition.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Unconscionability - No Right to a Hearing Where Party Now Regrets the Bargain That Was Struck

In Bishopp v Bishopp, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1234851 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) pursuant to the terms of their September 2004 stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into their subsequent judgment of divorce, the parties agreed that defendant (husband) would pay plaintiff (wife) spousal maintenance in the amount of $860 per month for five years and, further, that the wife would convey to the husband all right, title and interest in the family trash hauling business in exchange for a distributive award in the amount of $252,000 (payable in monthly installments of $3,000). When the husband fell into arrears, the wife moved to enforce the terms of the agreement, and the husband cross-moved to set aside the stipulation of settlement. Supreme Court partially granted the wife's application by directing that a judgment be entered in her favor in the net sum of $40,163.32.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that a "party who has made a voluntary and informed decision" to enter into a separation agreement or stipulation of settlement-even one that is one-sided-does not enjoy "an absolute entitlement to a judicial hearing" simply because he or she now regrets the bargain that was struck (citing Curtis v. Curtis, 20 A.D.3d at 656, 798 N.Y.S.2d 764). The documentary evidence submitted in support of the husband's cross motion established only that he had second thoughts about the deal he made, without counsel, which was insufficient to trigger a hearing regarding the claimed unconscionability of the settlement agreement.

Equitable Distribution - Judgments - Not an Abuse of Discretion to Direct Wife to Pay Half of Storage Unit Fees , Where Unit Rented to Store the Parties' Possessions While They Worked out Distribution Issues. Abuse of Discretion to Determine Wife Liable for Half of Taxes Where Wife Not Obligated to File Joint Tax Returns, or Split Child-care Deductions.

In Nolan v Nolan--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1234881 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff (husband) and defendant (wife) were married in 1999 and had two children, a daughter (born in 2002) and a son (born in 2004). They separated in 2006 and subsequently agreed to joint custody with the wife having primary physical custody and the husband having visitation. The day after the dismissal of the second of the wife's two unsuccessful divorce actions, the husband commenced an action claiming abandonment and seeking primary physical custody of the children. The wife agreed to the ground of abandonment and sought sole legal custody. After a trial, Supreme Court granted the divorce, continued joint legal custody as well as a slightly reduced schedule of midweek overnight visitation with the husband, and awarded him, among other things, counsel fees of $15,000.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's requirement that the wife pay half the amount of the storage unit fees was not an abuse of discretion. The storage unit was rented to store the parties' possessions while they worked out distribution issues. However, it was an abuse of discretion for Supreme Court to determine that the wife was liable for half of the husband's tax liabilities in 2007 and 2008. The husband presented no evidence that the wife was obligated to file joint tax returns in either year, or to split child-care deductions. Nor did the husband establish the amount by which his taxes were increased or the wife's taxes were decreased by either action. Accordingly, there was insufficient proof that the husband's individual income tax obligation should be treated as marital debt.

The Appellate Division observed that in determining whether to award counsel fees a sufficient evidentiary basis must exist for the court to evaluate the respective financial circumstances of the parties and the value of the services rendered. Here, the disparity in the parties' incomes was not significant and the husband offered no retainer agreements or billing statements. Nor did he establish the nature or value of the services rendered. In the absence of any such evidence, Supreme Court erred in awarding counsel fees to the husband.

Adoption - Consent - Domestic Relations Law § 111[1][d] - Biological Father's Consent to Adopt Child over Six Months Old Born out of Wedlock Is Required Only If the Father "Maintained Substantial and Continuous Contact with the Child as Manifested By" Payment of Reasonable Child Support and Either Monthly Visitation or Regular Communication with the Child or Custodian.

In Matter of John Q. v Erica R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1234941 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which granted petitioner's application to determine that the consent of respondent was not required for the adoption of his child.

John Q. (father) and respondent Erica R. (mother) were the biological parents of one child (born in 2004). A stipulated order entered in 2006 granted sole legal custody to the mother and limited visitation to the father at Phoenix House, a residential drug treatment facility where he was residing. The father left Phoenix House for another treatment facility, then was incarcerated until September 2008. In August 2009, he commenced a proceeding seeking visitation and joint custody. Soon thereafter, petitioner Rick R. (petitioner), who married the mother in 2008 and had been living with her and the child since 2007, commenced a proceeding seeking to adopt the child without the father's consent. Family Court orally granted petitioner's application and dismissed the father's modification petition.

The Appellate Division affirmed holding that the father's consent was not required for the child's adoption. A biological father's consent to adopt a child over six months old who was born out of wedlock is required only if the father "maintained substantial and continuous contact with the child as manifested by" payment of reasonable child support and either monthly visitation or regular communication with the child or custodian (Domestic Relations Law § 111[1][d]). Only after the [biological] father establishes his right of consent to the adoption, by satisfying both the support and communication provisions of the statute, does the court proceed to determine whether he has forfeited that right by evincing 'an intent to forego his ... parental ... rights and obligations' " as outlined in Domestic Relations Law § 111(2)(a). Here, the father did not meet his threshold burden of establishing his right to consent, so the court did not have to proceed to whether he evinced an intent to forgo his parental rights. As to the support provision, the father paid approximately $800 during the child's entire life and had not paid any support since 2005. Although the father was incarcerated or unemployed after that and may not have been financially able to pay much, he did not establish that he was unable to pay anything to support his child. The absence of a court order for child support does not excuse the father's failure to provide any financial support for his child. As to the communication provision, the father did not visit or communicate regularly with the child or the mother, who had custody. He last saw the child in November 2005. His incarceration did not obviate his obligation to maintain regular contact with the child. The father testified that he could not locate the mother and child after his release from prison, but he did not exert even minimal efforts to do so, such as looking in the phone book.

Grandparent Visitation - DRL §72 - Standing - Visitation Granted

In Matter of Laudadio v Laudadio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1234952 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondents, Rocco Laudadio (father) and Stephanie Montalvo (mother), were the unmarried parents of a child (born in 2011), and petitioner was the child's paternal grandmother. Following an incident that occurred when the child was approximately two months old, during the course of which the mother's sister struck petitioner, respondents cut off visitation between petitioner and the child. Petitioner thereafter commenced a proceeding seeking visitation with the child and, following a bifurcated hearing, Family Court granted petitioner's application and awarded petitioner visitation on the first Sunday of each month.

The Appellate Division affirmed. Petitioner testified that she purchased a crib and dresser for the child, was present for the child's birth, visited the child in the hospital, prepared dinner for the family when the child came home from the hospital and thereafter visited the child "at least [10] times" during the first month of the child's life. According to petitioner, each of these visits would last "[a] few hours," during which time she would hold, feed and change the child. Additionally, petitioner attended the child's first doctor's appointment, brought respondents and the child to a local shopping mall for the child's first photos and transported the family to New York City to visit other relatives and retrieve gifts for the child. Although the mother contended that petitioner lost interest in the child in late April 2011, the mother also acknowledged that petitioner curtailed her visitations-at the mother's request-in order to give the mother more time alone with the child. Finally, the father testified that after visitation between petitioner and the child was cut off in May 2011, petitioner contacted him and asked to see the child on approximately four occasions, which he would not permit. Such proof demonstrated a sufficient existing relationship between petitioner and the child to confer standing-particularly given the age of the child and the brief interval of time that elapsed between her birth and the interruption in visitation. It also found that Family Court's decision to award visitation to petitioner had a sound and substantial basis in the record. The mother's stated objections to the requested visitation were conclusory and, although the father raised legitimate concerns in this regard, including the child's alleged exposure to secondhand smoke at petitioner's home, Family Court's order contained sufficient safeguards to address these issues.

Child Custody - Lincoln Hearing - Wishes of the Child - Lincoln Hearing to Ascertain Child's Wishes, Though Often Preferable, Is Not Mandatory, but Due to "Unusual Circumstances" Appellate Division Remitted for a Lincoln Hearing

In Matter of Jessica B v Robert B, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1234967 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner, who lived in Massachusetts, has two younger siblings, Joseph B. (born in 1994) and Melissa B. (born in 1997). Joseph and Melissa resided together in Broome County, in the custody of respondent, their paternal uncle, until September 2010. Joseph then moved to Massachusetts, where he resided with petitioner and in the custody of the Massachusetts Department of Children and Families. In November 2010, petitioner commenced a proceeding on behalf of herself and Joseph, seeking visitation with Melissa. Family Court granted visitation following a hearing, but, citing Joseph's troubled background, limited visitation to occur during daytime hours, on one weekend per month, in Broome County.

The sole issue raised on appeal was a challenge to Family Court's denial of the request by the attorney for Joseph for a Lincoln hearing to ascertain Melissa's wishes (Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d 270 [1969]). The Appellate Division observed that such a hearing, though often preferable, is not mandatory, and the determination is addressed to Family Court's discretion. On the final day of the fact-finding hearing, the attorney representing Joseph made a written application requesting that the court conduct a Lincoln hearing prior to rendering a determination, but the attorney representing Melissa stated that a Lincoln hearing was not necessary, as he would convey her wishes. The appellate attorney for the child representing Melissa offered strong support for Joseph's appeal, alleging that Melissa's wishes were not accurately or adequately conveyed by her trial counsel. In light of this argument, the Appellate Division found its record lacking. It noted that although not determinative, the wishes of this 14-year-old child should be considered, and the insight she may provide will be helpful. In what it termed as "unusual circumstances" it remitted for a Lincoln hearing, affirmed the order appealed from and remitted the matter to the Family Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with its decision.

Child Custody - Hearing - Rule Against Hearsay - Professional Reliability Exception to the Hearsay Rule Enables Expert Witness to Provide Opinion Evidence Based on Otherwise Inadmissible Hearsay, Provided it Is Demonstrated to Be the Type of Material Commonly Relied on in the Profession

In Matter of Greene v Robarge, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1234970 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the unmarried parents of two sons (born in 2001 and 2003). Pursuant to a February 2009 order entered on consent, the parties shared joint legal custody of the children with primary physical custody to the mother and scheduled parenting time to the father. After the mother was found to have violated the order by impeding the father's parenting time, the father commenced proceedings seeking sole legal and physical custody. At the conclusion of the fact-finding hearing and following a Lincoln hearing, Family Court awarded sole custody to the father, established a visitation schedule for the mother and dismissed the remaining pending petitions.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected the argument of the mother and the attorney for the children contend that the opinion testimony of Elizabeth Schockmel, the court-appointed forensic psychologist, should have been stricken because her opinion was based in part upon information she obtained from Department of Social Services caseworkers who were not subject to cross-examination. The professional reliability exception to the hearsay rule ... enables an expert witness to provide opinion evidence based on otherwise inadmissible hearsay, provided it is demonstrated to be the type of material commonly relied on in the profession (Hinlicky v. Dreyfuss, 6 NY3d 636, 648 [2006]; Hamsch v. New York City Tr. Auth., 63 N.Y.2d 723, 725-726 [1984]; O'Brien v. Mbugua, 49 AD3d 937, 938 [2008]). Schockmel testified, without contradiction, that information obtained from collateral sources is commonly relied upon within her profession when conducting a forensic psychological evaluation in the context of a custody proceeding. Moreover, her opinion was principally based upon information she obtained from her extensive interviews with the mother, father and children, with the collateral source information serving as but "a link in the chain of data" that assisted her in forming her opinion. Accordingly, Schockmel's expert opinion testimony was properly admitted.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Judgments - Enforcement - Res Judicata Bars Relitigation of Previously Adjudicated Disputes Even Where Further Investigation of the Law or Facts Indicates That the Controversy Has Been Erroneously Decided

In Lo Maglio v Lo Maglio, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2013 WL 1028245 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) a post-divorce action, defendant wife moved for a determination that plaintiff husband was in contempt for failing to comply with a prior order and for an order directing plaintiff to provide her with continued medical insurance coverage in accordance with the prior order (Lo Maglio v. Lo Maglio, 273 A.D.2d 823). The Appellate Division agreed with defendant that the court erred in terminating plaintiff's obligation to provide her with medical insurance coverage inasmuch as its prior order required plaintiff to provide her with that coverage. It observed that as a general rule, the doctrine of res judicata bars relitigation of previously adjudicated disputes even where further investigation of the law or facts indicates that the controversy has been erroneously decided, whether due to oversight by the parties or error by the courts. As relevant here, "a final judgment of divorce settles the parties' rights pertaining not only to those issues that were actually litigated, but also to those that could have been litigated" (Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 NY3d 94, 100). "[A]bsent unusual circumstances or explicit statutory authorization, the provisions of [such a] judgment are final and binding on the parties, and may be modified only upon direct challenge" (Rainbow v Swisher, 72 N.Y.2d at 110). Plaintiff did not take an appeal from the prior order, seek reargument of that order, or make a proper application to modify it. He was therefore foreclosed from collaterally attacking it in the context of this action. The order was reversed on the law, plaintiff's cross motion seeking an order terminating his obligation to provide defendant with the same level of medical insurance coverage that he provided during the marriage was denied, defendant's motion seeking an order directing plaintiff to provide defendant with that medical insurance coverage was granted, and the matter was remitted for further proceedings.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Continuing Jurisdiction - Domestic Relations Law §76-a - Family Court Had Exclusive, Continuing Jurisdiction to Determine Custody Where the Initial Child Custody Determination Was Rendered in New York, and There Was Ample Evidence of a Significant Connection by the Child with this State

In Matter of Mercado v. Frye, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1173944 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept) Petitioner father, who resided in New York, commenced a proceeding seeking to modify the parties' joint custody arrangement pursuant to which respondent mother had primary physical residence of the parties' children in California. Family Court awarded the father sole custody of the parties' youngest child. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Family Court had exclusive, continuing jurisdiction to determine custody pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-a. It was undisputed that the initial child custody determination was rendered in New York, and there was ample evidence of a significant connection by the child with this state for Family Court to retain jurisdiction. The father's extensive parenting time took place in New York, the child had extended family in this state, and her medical and dental providers were located here. It rejected the mother's contention that the court should have dismissed the modification petition on the ground that New York is an inconvenient forum (Domestic Relations Law § 76-f). There was substantial evidence in this state from which to make a custody determination inasmuch as the father, the child, the child's treating therapist, the child's extended family, and the child's medical and dental providers are located in New York. In addition, the New York courts were more familiar with the parties and the child than the California courts, and the court permitted the mother to appear electronically for all proceedings except the fact-finding hearing.

The Appellate Division concluded that the court properly determined that "the father established the requisite change in circumstances to warrant an inquiry into whether the best interests of the child would be served by modifying the existing custody arrangement and that there was a sound and substantial basis in the record to support the court's determination that it was in the child's best interests to award sole custody to the father. Although the child lived in California with her mother for approximately five years, the quality of the parties' respective home environments, the parties' ability to provide for the child's emotional and intellectual development, the financial status of the parties, and the needs and expressed desires of the child all support the court's custody determination. The child, who was 13 years old at the time of the hearing, expressed her desire to reside with the father and, given her age and relative maturity, her wishes were entitled to substantial weight. To the extent that the mother challenged the court's consideration of her violation of the divorce judgment for non payment of travel expenses in making its custody determination, it concluded that the court had discretion to consider that violation as part of its best interests analysis.

Court of Appeals

The Court of Appeals has adopted the Court-Pass system, which provides the public with free access to the following Court of Appeals materials for appeals, 500.27 certified questions, and judicial conduct matters pending on or filed after January 1, 2013: Motion papers in civil cases where the Court has granted leave to appeal; Briefs; Records or appendices; Videos of oral arguments; Transcripts of oral arguments; and Court decisions. In addition, parties with appeals, certified questions pursuant to section 500.27 of the Court of Appeals Rules of Practice, or judicial conduct matters before the New York State Court of Appeals must use the Court-PASS Upload Service to submit digital copies of records and briefs as required by the Court's Rules, which were amended effective February 1, 2013.

Public Access to Records of Court of Appeals

According to the Court of Appeals website certain briefs and records are sealed and not available for public view because they contain confidential information. Some briefs and records are redacted to protect sensitive information and are available in the redacted form only. Material will not be available on Court-PASS until it is processed by the Clerk's Office.

Search and Download Guidelines

Conducting a Search

You may search case records by party name, decision date, calendar date, authoring Judge, decision number, subject matter classification or citation. You may limit searches to civil or criminal matters.

Viewing or Downloading Documents

The search result screen will display a listing of all cases matching your search terms. Each case name will provide a link to available documents for that case for viewing or downloading.

Browsing Case Listings

As an alternative to searching for an individual case, you may browse through all cases available on Court-PASS. You may sort the cases alphabetically by party name and may also restrict the listing to a particular date or date range.

Court Docket

The Court Docket contains information on all undecided appeals, 500.27 certified questions, and judicial conduct matters. The Docket can be searched by appeal number (APL), certified question number (CTQ) or judicial conduct review number (JCR), or by case name. If available, appeal briefs, records and appendices can be viewed and downloaded. The Docket also provides due dates for filings not yet received and attorney contact information. A case will be removed from the docket when decided.

Frequently Asked Questions

What is the retention period for Court-PASS material?

All material on Court-PASS will be permanently available.

How frequently is Court-PASS updated?

Material will be available on Court-PASS after processing by the Clerk's Office. Court-PASS is updated daily.

Is pre-2013 material available on Court-PASS?

No. The Court of Appeals website provides access to the full text of all Court of Appeals decisions and webcasts for the immediately preceding two years. Transcripts of webcasts are available for cases argued on or after September 1, 2012. The Court's archive of records and briefs since 1847 is maintained at the New York State Archives (518-474-8955). Photocopies are available for a charge. These materials may be obtained on microfiche at the New York State Library (518-474-5355).

Do I need any special software to access Court-PASS?

You should enable javascript in your browser and you need a PDF viewer to read the documents. Court-PASS is best viewed with a screen resolution of at least 1024 x 768.

Information for Attorneys about the Court - Pass Upload Service

About the Upload System

Parties with appeals, certified questions pursuant to section 500.27 of the Court of Appeals Rules of Practice, or judicial conduct matters before the New York State Court of Appeals must use the Court-PASS Upload Service to submit digital copies of records and briefs as required by the Court's Rules (see section 500.2).

Section 500.2: Submission of Briefs and Record Material in Digital Format

(a) The Court requires the submission of briefs and record material in digital format (see sections 500.11[k]; 500.12[h]; 500.14[g]; 500.23[a][1][ii] and 500.27[e] of this Part) as companions to the required number of copies of printed briefs and record material filed and served in accordance with this Part.

(b) The companion briefs and record material in digital format shall comply with the technical specifications and instructions for submission available from the Clerk's Office.

(c) The companion briefs and record material in digital format shall be identical to the original printed briefs and record material, except they need not contain an original signature.

(d) Unless otherwise permitted by the Clerk of the Court, companion briefs and record material in digital format shall be received by the Clerk's Office no later than the filing due date for the printed briefs and record material.

(e) A request to be relieved of the requirements of this Part to submit companion briefs and record material in digital format shall be by letter addressed to the Clerk of the Court, with proof of service of one copy on each other party, and shall specifically state the reasons why submission of companion briefs and record material in digital format would present an undue hardship.

(f) The Clerk of the Court may reject briefs and record material in digital format that do not comply with the requirements of this Part or the technical specifications and instructions for submission available from the Clerk's Office.

Document Preparation Guidelines

Portable Document Format (PDF)

Text Searchable Documents

PDF documents must be text searchable. If the document is created with word processing software and saved as a PDF file, it should automatically be text searchable. If the document is scanned, optical character recognition may be required for the PDF document to be text searchable. You must confirm that your documents are searchable prior to uploading. You can easily confirm whether the document is searchable by using the word search feature of commonly-available, free software designed to view PDF documents.

Sealing and Redaction

Certain documents must be sealed in whole or in part pursuant to one or more statutory provisions or court orders that mandate confidential filing. Documents that are not fully sealed nonetheless may contain sensitive information that should be redacted before the documents are filed. A checklist of common grounds for sealing and redaction has been provided to filers. A copy of the attestation form, which must be completed prior to uploading, has been provided to filers.

To ensure effective redaction, you must identify and conceal sensitive content by using redaction methods that permanently remove sensitive content from all metadata and all document layers. Some PDF editing programs as well as specialized redaction tools can help ensure thorough redaction.

File Size Requirements

No uploaded document may exceed a file size of 100 megabytes. You may upload up to five documents per session.

Appellate Division, First Department

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Home State - Domestic Relations Law §76-a [7] - New York Jurisdiction Continues Where Temporary Absence From New York

In Matter of Ruth L. v. Clemese Theresa J., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1149851 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, inter alia, granted custody of the subject child to petitioner paternal grandmother. It rejected respondent mother's argument that the court did not have jurisdiction over this custody proceeding because New York was not the child's home state. The child lived in New York continuously with his mother, his father and his paternal grandmother from the age of about two weeks until he was almost six months old. His absence from New York, brought about by respondent's desire to prevent the father or petitioner from obtaining custody, was "a temporary absence which did not interrupt the six-month pre-petition residency required by the UCCJEA (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a[7]).

The evidence established extraordinary circumstances that justified the award of custody to petitioner (Matter of Bennett v. Jeffreys, 40 N.Y.2d 543 [1976]). This evidence included respondent's extensive history of neglect and abuse of her nine previous children, which resulted in the death of one child who was left unattended in a bathtub and the termination of her parental rights as to all the others. Respondent also had an extensive history of drug abuse, addiction, and criminal activity, as well as mental illness for which she refused to engage in treatment or take prescribed medication and her living situation continued to be unstable, and she failed to plan for the child's return. The court's determination that awarding custody to petitioner was in the child's best interests is supported by the evidence that petitioner supported the child, given structure to his life, and provided a stable and loving home, where he was thriving. The forensic evaluator concluded that removing the child from his grandmother's care would have disastrous consequences.

Child Support - Award - Imputed Income - Income May Be Imputed Based Upon Lack of Credibility

In Matter of William P. v. Yojacni P., 103 A.D.3d 552, 960 N.Y.S.2d 46 (1 Dept, 2013) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which denied the mother's objections to support magistrate order modifying her child support obligations. The Support Magistrate's finding that respondent failed, despite multiple opportunities in a three-year period, to present credible proof of her income and his finding that she lacked credibility was supported by the record. For example, respondent testified that she worked washing hair at a beauty salon, but her 2009 Schedule C listed her as the sole proprietor of the salon. Respondent filed two financial disclosure affidavits within months of each other, with her expenditures shown as markedly lower on the second than on the first and in any event far in excess of her reported income. Under the circumstances, the Support Magistrate was not bound to determine respondent's income solely from the figures reported on her 2008 and 2009 income tax returns, and appropriately set support based on the children's needs.

Adoption - Extra Judicial Consent - DRL §115-b - Motion to Set Aside - technical noncompliance with Domestic Relations Law § 115-b(4)(a) does not invalidate consent which complied with all substantive requirements of §115-b and there was no showing of injury or prejudice to biological mother.

In re Eliyahu, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 978806 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order that granted the adoptive parents' motion for summary judgment dismissing the mother's petition to set aside her extrajudicial consent to the adoption of the child on technical grounds. It held that although the consent form was not in 18-point type, this technical noncompliance with Domestic Relations Law § 115-b(4)(a) does not invalidate the consent especially since the consent complied with all the substantive requirements of §115-b and there was no showing of injury or prejudice to the biological mother. The record showed that the biological mother consulted with an attorney prior to signing the consent, that the attorney read and reviewed the entirety of the consent, and that the mother understood that she could revoke the consent within 45 days of its execution. "Neither mistake as to the meaning of the form nor failure to read the form before signing it constitutes a valid ground for vitiating the consent" (Matter of Baby Boy B., 163 A.D.2d 673, 674 [3d Dept 1990]). Nor did the prospective adoptive parents' failure to obtain judicial certification of their qualifications before taking custody of the child, in violation of Domestic Relations Law § 115(1)(b), or to file an adoption petition within ten days of taking custody, in violation of § 115-c, invalidate the birth mother's consent or disqualify the prospective adoptive parents from adopting the child. It noted that the statute does not provide a penalty for failure to comply with these provisions. The provisions are designed to ensure prompt court supervision of such placements, and in this case the prospective adoptive parents acted with reasonable promptness to bring themselves in compliance with the statute by obtaining certification and filing an adoption petition.

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Wife Entitled to Distributive Award of Proceeds of Sale of Residence Used to Fund Investments

In Mimran v. Mimran, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1197270 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), Supreme Court, among other things, dissolved the parties' marriage and divided the marital property, awarding plaintiff a distributive award of $3,768,921.50, placed a value of $32,603 on the defendant's interest in certain family-controlled business enterprises; found plaintiff's equitable interest in one of defendant's investments to be $1.25 million; imputed to the defendant annual income of $650,000 per year for purposes of calculating child support; and declined to allocate the parties' liabilities extant on the day that plaintiff commenced the divorce action.

The Appellate Division held that trial court erred when it limited plaintiff's distributive award with respect to the Breeden investments to the sum of $1,250,000, representing one half of the $2,500,000 in liquidation proceeds that defendant retained and invested in Mirman Schur, a start-up movie company. Between May 2006 and June 2007, defendant made a $26,550,000 investment in three Breeden entities: Breeden Capital Management (BCM), Breeden Capital Partners, LLC (BCP), and Breeden Partners (Cayman) Ltd. (Breeden Cayman). To fund the investment, defendant used $8,250,000 from the proceeds of the sale of the parties' marital residence on Central Park West and borrowed the rest. In 2008, defendant effectively liquidated his investment in Breeden Cayman for $18,600,000. Between March 2009 and January 2010, he liquidated his interests in BCP and BCM for $6,675,000 and $2,800,000, respectively. Thus, by January 2010, defendant had received from his Breeden investments a total of $28,075,000. Because $8,250,000 in marital property was used to fund the Breeden investments, plaintiff should have been awarded $4,125,000 from the liquidation proceeds, representing her half-interest, under the parties' post-nuptial agreement, in the proceeds from the sale of the Central Park West apartment. Further, because defendant invested $26,550,000 and received $28,075,000, plaintiff was entitled to an additional $762,500, representing half of the $1,525,000 gain. It increased the distributive award with respect to the Breeden funds to $4,887,500 from $1,250,000, a net increase of $3,637,500. This raised the total distributive award to $7,406,421.50.

Agreements - Child Support - Enforcement - Modification and Waiver - Contractual Rights May Be Waived If They Are Knowingly, Voluntarily and Intentionally Abandoned. Such Abandonment 'May Be Established by Affirmative Conduct or by Failure to Act So as to Evince an Intent Not to Claim a Purported Advantage.

In Hannigan v. Hannigan,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 950793 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties, the parents of twins, John and Jenny, born in 1986, executed a stipulation of settlement, which was subsequently incorporated, but not merged, into a judgment of divorce dated November 18, 1992. It provided that the father's monthly child support obligation shall be adjusted as of January 1 of each calendar year and shall be either 25% of the father's gross income or the sum of $5,000 per month, adjusted by Consumer Price Index for the Greater New York area, "whichever is greater." It further provided that the parties agreed to pay for the undergraduate and postgraduate education of each of the unemancipated children of the marriage "in proportion to their respective incomes at the time such expenses [are] incurred."The stipulation contained a "Modification and Waiver" clause providing: "[N]either this Stipulation, nor any provision hereof, shall be amended or modified, or deemed amended or modified, except by a Stipulation in writing duly subscribed and acknowledged with the same formality as this Stipulation. Any waiver by either party of any provision of this Stipulation or any right or option hereunder shall not be deemed a continuing waiver, and shall not prevent or estop such party from thereafter enforcing such provision, right or option, and the failure of either party to insist in any one or more instances upon the strict performance of any of the terms or provisions of this Stipulation by the other party shall not be construed as a waiver or relinquishment for the future of any such term or provision, but the same shall continue in full force and effect."

In July 2008, the mother moved, inter alia, to direct the father to pay "additional child support" arrears for the years 2004, 2005, and 2007, in effect, to direct the father to pay arrears for college expenses for the 2004/05, 2005/06, and 2006/07 school years, and to direct the father to pay his pro rata share of Jenny's college expenses for the 2008/09 school year. In her supporting affidavit, the mother contended that the Stipulation obligated the defendant to pay "basic child support in the sum of $5,000 monthly based upon his income of $240,000" and that the defendant was obligated to pay as "additional child support," 25% of his income over $240,000. Using the 25% formula, the mother requested that the father be directed to pay $7,368 in additional child support for the year 2004, $4,943 in additional child support for the year 2005, and an amount to be determined by the court in additional child support for the year 2007. The mother stated that the father "appears to owe no additional child support for 2006 as his income, as reflected on his income tax return, did not exceed $240,000." The father paid the mother $13,079 by check after this motion was made and still pending.

In October 2008, the mother made a second motion, in effect, to direct the father to pay child support arrears for the years 2003 through 2008. In the October motion, the mother calculated the father's child support obligation as $5,000 per month, adjusted by Consumer Price Index for the Greater New York area, instead of 25% of the father's income. After a hearing on both motions, the Supreme Court, inter alia, granted those branches of the July motion which were, in effect, to direct the father to pay arrears for college expenses for the 2004/05, 2005/06, and 2006/07 school years, denied that branch of the July motion which was to direct the father to pay his pro rata share of Jenny's college expenses for the 2008/09 school year, granted those branches of the October motion which were to direct the father to pay child support arrears for the years 2003, 2006, and 2008, and, in effect, denied those branches of the October motion which were, in effect, to direct the father to pay child support arrears for the years 2004, 2005, and 2007.

The Appellate Division held, inter alia, that Supreme Court properly denied those branches of the October motion which were to direct the father to pay child support arrears for the years 2004, 2005, and 2007, and, should have also denied those branches of the October motion which were to direct the father to pay child support arrears for the years 2003 and 2006. It observed that contractual rights may be waived if they are knowingly, voluntarily and intentionally abandoned. Such abandonment 'may be established by affirmative conduct or by failure to act so as to evince an intent not to claim a purported advantage. Generally, the existence of an intent to forgo such a right is a question of fact. Here, it was clear from the explicit language of the July motion that the mother was seeking additional child support arrears for the years 2004, 2005, and 2007 using the 25% formula, and that she did not seek additional child support arrears for the years 2003 or 2006 because the father had not earned income over $240,000 for those years. Accordingly, when the father paid the mother $13,079 by check after the first motion was made by the mother, the entire amount originally sought by the mother as accrued additional child support arrears for the years 2003 through 2007, and the mother accepted and cashed the check, as she testified that she did, the mother waived her right to demand additional child support arrears based upon the Consumer Price Index formula. The mother's own testimony that she "never intended to ask for [an increase based on the Consumer Price Index formula]" evidenced a manifestation of intent ... to relinquish that contractual right. Contrary to the mother's suggestion, "[a] waiver, to the extent that it has been executed, cannot be expunged or recalled" (Nassau Trust Co. v. Montrose Concrete Products Corp ., 56 N.Y.2d at 184).

However, the Supreme Court properly determined that the mother was entitled to child support arrears based on the Consumer Price Index formula for 2008, since she had not requested, or received, additional child support for 2008 at the time of the October motion. Based on the clear and unambiguous language of the Stipulation's "Modification and Waiver" provision, the mother's past waiver of her right to adjustments based on the Consumer Price Index formula could not be construed as a waiver of the same for the future, and there is no other basis in the record to conclude that the mother waived her right to adjustments based on the Consumer Price Index formula with regard to 2008.

The Supreme Court also properly granted those branches of the July motion which were, in effect, to direct the father to pay arrears for college expenses for the 2004/05, 2005/06, and 2006/07 school years. The Stipulation required the parties to pay educational expenses on a pro rata basis, "in proportion to their respective incomes at the time such expenses [are] incurred." The father contended that the parties orally modified the Stipulation to split the college expenses 50/50 instead of on a pro rata basis. "Generally, a written agreement which prohibits oral modification can only be changed by an 'executory agreement ... in writing' " (Calica v. Reisman, Peirez & Reisman, 296 A.D.2d 367, 368, quoting General Obligations Law § 15-301[1]). However, an oral modification is enforceable if the party seeking enforcement can demonstrate partial performance of the oral modification, which performance must be unequivocally referable to the modification. In order to be unequivocally referable, conduct must be inconsistent with any other explanation. Here, while the father testified that the parties orally agreed to split the college expenses 50/50, instead of on a pro rata basis, the mother testified that she only agreed to pay 50% of the college expenses up front, with the understanding that the parties would "settle up" later. There was no basis in the record to set aside the hearing court's determination to credit the mother's testimony on this matter. Crediting the mother's testimony, the mother's actions in paying 50% of the college expenses were not unequivocally referable to the modification that the father alleges was made.

Neglect - Family Court Act § 1051(c) - Although Neglect Established Petition Dismissed on the Ground That the Aid of the Court Was Not Required

In Matter of Kayden H, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 950829 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the grandmother of the seven-month-old child left the child in the kitchen sink with the water running, asking the child's mother, who was in the living room about 10 feet away, to watch the child while she went into the next room to retrieve a birth certificate for her other daughter. Moments later, while the mother and grandmother were outside the kitchen, the temperature of the water spiked and the child sustained burns to his body. A neglect petition was filed against the mother and the grandmother, and, following a fact-finding hearing, the Family Court sustained the petition against both of them. The mother and the grandmother separately moved to dismiss the petition insofar as asserted against each of them pursuant to Family Court Act § 1051(c) on the ground that the aid of the court was not required. The court denied those motions.

The Appellate Division held that a preponderance of the evidence presented at the hearing supported the Family Court's finding that they neglected the subject child. Nevertheless, although facts sufficient to sustain the petition were established, a neglect petition may still be dismissed if "the court concludes that its aid is not required on the record before it" (Family Ct Act§ 1051 [c]). Under the circumstances of this case, the Family Court should have granted the separate motions of the mother and the grandmother to dismiss the petition insofar as asserted against each of them pursuant to Family Court Act §1051(c). Following the incident, the mother completed all the services required by the Administration for Children's Services, including therapy sessions and parenting classes, and ACS did not request that the mother complete any additional services. The grandmother, although not required to do so, also attended parenting classes with the mother. In January 2010, 18 months before the fact-finding hearing concluded, the child, upon ACS's consent, was returned to the mother. In the interim, ACS, during home visits, documented that the mother and the grandmother had taken steps to ensure that the child was not left unsupervised, and that he was bathed appropriately. ACS noted in its progress notes that it had no safety concerns. The mother stated that the pipes in her apartment building have been replaced and, as a result, the water temperature no longer fluctuated. The foregoing demonstrated that the incident on which the petition was based was an isolated one, that the mother and the grandmother had been rehabilitated, and that the child was no longer at risk of being neglected. Since the aid of the court was no longer required to protect the child, the petition insofar as asserted against the mother and the grandmother should have been dismissed.

Appeals - Inadequate Record on Appeal - Effect upon Determination - Where Appendix Omitted Evidence Proffered by the Defendant at Trial Relating to Plaintiff's Restaurant Business, Appeal Dismissed Where Omission Inhibited Court's Ability to Render an Informed Decision Merits of the Appeal.

Child Support- Award - Imputed Income - Court May Impute Income Based upon the Parent's past Income or Demonstrated Earning Potential.

In Reale v Reale, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 951011 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), after a non jury trial, Supreme Court directed plaintiff to pay $415 per week in child support; awarded the defendant certain real property located in Franklin, New York, as her separate property; directed him to pay the defendant $6,000, purportedly representing 20% of the increase in the value of certain property located in Somers, New York; directed him to pay the defendant $62,500, representing her share of the plaintiff's restaurant business; and directed the sale of the former marital residence.

The Appellate Division observed that an appellant who perfects an appeal by using the appendix method must file an appendix that contains all the relevant portions of the record in order to enable the court to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal. The appendix shall contain those portions of the record necessary to permit the court to fully consider the issues which will be raised by the appellant and the respondent. Here, the plaintiff omitted from his appendix certain evidence proffered by the defendant at the trial relating to the plaintiff's restaurant business. This omission inhibited the court's ability to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal. Accordingly, the appeal from so much of the judgment as directed the plaintiff to pay the defendant $62,500, representing the defendant's share of the plaintiff's restaurant business, had to be dismissed. Moreover, inasmuch as the former marital residence was foreclosed upon, the appeal from so much of the judgment as directed the sale of the former marital residence had to be dismissed as academic.

The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court properly imputed to the plaintiff an annual income of $127,000, and correctly directed him to pay $415 per week in child support. In determining a parent's child support obligation, a court need not rely upon the parent's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the parent's past income or demonstrated earning potential. Additionally, the Supreme Court properly awarded to the defendant certain property located in Franklin, New York, as her separate property. This property had been acquired by the defendant before the parties' marriage, and improvements were made with the defendant's separate funds. However, the Supreme Court erred in directing the plaintiff to pay the defendant $6,000, which purportedly represented 20% of the increase in the value of certain property located in Somers, New York. There was no evidence to support the court's calculation of the increase in the value of this property. Although the Supreme Court directed the parties to complete an appraisal of that property, no such appraisal was conducted.

Maintenance - Modification - Required papers - 22 NYCRR 202.16 - Statement of Net Worth - Where Party Fails to Include Statement of Net Worth Court May Decline to Hear the Motion or Deny it Without Prejudice to Renewal upon Compliance with the Applicable Requirements.

In Garcia v. Garcia, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1136601 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which denied, without prejudice, defendant's motion for a downward modification or suspension of his maintenance obligation set forth in a stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, and granted the plaintiff's motion for leave to enter a money judgment against him for arrears in maintenance and health insurance payments, and for an award of an attorney's fee. It observed that a party seeking to modify a maintenance award must include, in his or her moving papers, a sworn statement of net worth (22 NYCRR 202.16[k][2]). The proper course where a party fails to include the required statement of net worth is "to decline to hear the motion ... or to deny it without prejudice to renewal upon compliance with the applicable requirements" (Matter of Fischer-Holland v. Walker, 12 AD3d 671, 672). Contrary to the defendant's contention, there was no language in the stipulation of settlement exempting the parties from that requirement. As the defendant failed to provide a statement of net worth in support of his motion for a downward modification of his maintenance obligation pursuant to the stipulation, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying the motion without a hearing (22 NYCRR 202.16[k][2], [5][ii]).

The defendant did not dispute the amount of arrears allegedly owed, but argued that he could not afford to pay that amount or, indeed, any amount. However, instead of seeking to modify the maintenance obligation when his employment was terminated in January 2010, the defendant waited until March 1, 2011, to file his motion for a downward modification. Since, during the period from the termination of the defendant's employment until his filing of the deficient motion, the defendant improperly resorted to the "self-help" measure of unilaterally ceasing payment of maintenance and health insurance costs, the Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was entitled to arrears for the period from March 1, 2009, until the filing of the cross motion. The Supreme Court also properly granted that branch of the plaintiff's cross motion which for an award of an attorney's fee, as the plaintiff was entitled to such an award pursuant to the default provision in the parties' stipulation of settlement. The plaintiff was not required to provide proof regarding the parties' relative financial circumstances, as the stipulation of settlement entitled her to attorney's fees, "without regard to the willfulness of the defaulting party or the means of the nondefaulting party".

Maintenance and Child Support- Award - Imputed Income - Court May Impute Income Where Testimony Proffered By Defendant Lacked Credibility.

In Zloof v. Zloof, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1136892 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), an action for a divorce and ancillary relief, the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which after a nonjury trial, inter alia, directed defendant to pay child support of $3,396 per month and awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $2,250 per month for a period of five years commencing on July 1, 2011. It held that in light of the Supreme Court's finding, which was supported by the record, that the testimony proffered by the defendant and his brother lacked credibility, the court properly imputed income to the defendant.

Child Custody - Attorney for Child - Role - Must Zealously Advocate the Child's Position If Child Is Capable of Knowing, Voluntary and Considered Judgment

In Mason v Mason, 103 A.D.3d 1207, 959 N.Y.S.2d 577 (4th Dept, 2013) the Appellate Division observed that there are only two circumstances in which an attorney for the child (AFC) is authorized to substitute his or her own judgment for that of the child: "[w]hen the [AFC] is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child" (Swinson, 101 A.D.3d at 1687, 956 N.Y.S.2d 765, quoting 22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]). The obligation of the AFC, where the AFC is "convinced" that one of those two circumstances is implicated, is to inform the court of the child's wishes, if the child requests that the AFC do so (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]).

Child Support - CSSA - Income as Reported on Most Recent Income Tax Returns - Parties Use of 2010 Tax Returns Appropriate Where Parties Did Not Provide Court with More Recent Financial Documents to Use in Calculating Defendant's Support Obligation

In Griffin v Griffen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1165363 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Supreme Court granted the Plaintiff mother a modification of certain provisions with respect to the parties' access arrangement set forth in their settlement agreement, which was incorporated in the judgment of divorce; an upward modification of defendant father's child support obligation; and an award of attorney's fees. The Appellate Division agreed with defendant that the court erred in modifying certain access provisions in the settlement agreement. An existing access arrangement may be modified only upon a showing that there has been a subsequent change of circumstances which plaintiff failed to establish. Defendant's contention that the court erred in using his 2010 tax returns to calculate his child support obligation was raised for the first time on appeal and thus not properly before the Appellate Division. In any event, with respect to the court's use of the parties' 2010 tax returns, the Court found that the record did not indicate that the parties provided the court with more recent financial documents to use in calculating defendant's support obligation.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - Although Respondent's Conduct Did Not Take Place in Public, Disorderly Conduct' Includes Disorderly Conduct Not in a Public Place.

In Matter of McLaughlin v. McLaughlin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1172682 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order of protection. It found that petitioner met her burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that respondent committed the family offense of disorderly conduct (Family Ct Act § 832). Although respondent's conduct did not take place in public, section Family Court Act §812(1) specifically states that, "[f]or purposes of this article, 'disorderly conduct' includes disorderly conduct not in a public place." In addition, disorderly conduct may be committed when a person "recklessly creat[es] a risk" of annoyance or alarm through violent or threatening behavior (Penal Law § 240.20[1]). It rejected respondent's contention that the statute "requires more than a 'risk.'" It also rejected respondent's contention that the court erred in admitting in evidence an audio recording of the incident made by the parties' son. While there was no dispute that the parties were not aware that he was recording the incident and did not give consent thereto, the eavesdropping statutes are implicated only when the recording is made "by a person not present thereat" (Penal Law § 250.00[2]; see CPLR 4506[1], [2]). The parties' son, who made the recording from his bedroom, was "present" for the purposes of the statutes (see People v. Kirsh, 176 A.D.2d 652).

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) - Unjust or Inappropriate Child Support - Pendente Lite - CSSA Followed - Unjust or Inappropriate
Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Denied - Inadequate Documentation
Maintenance pendente lite denied based upon, inter alia, existence of a pre-divorce separate household and delay is seeking award.

In Ferguson v Ferguson, 2013 WL 1092900 (N.Y.Sup.), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 50371(U) plaintiff commenced the proceeding with the filing of a Summons with Notice and Verified Complaint on September 15, 2011. On June 28, 2012, Plaintiff moved for pendente lite relief. Plaintiff sought temporary non-taxable maintenance. Defendant argued in opposition that Plaintiff was employed full time and had additional self-employment income in the State of Georgia. Defendant further argues that Plaintiff was attempting to reap a financial windfall by application of the temporary maintenance guidelines of the State of New York since there was no equivalent statute in the State of Georgia where Plaintiff resided with the parties' children. Supreme Court observed that DRL § 236(B)(5-a) provides statutory guidelines to be applied in determining temporary maintenance awards in matrimonial proceedings. Like the Child Support Standards Act, application of the statutory guidelines results in a presumptive award of temporary maintenance. Unless the parties waive the application of the statutory guidelines, the Court must order the presumptive temporary maintenance award unless the court finds that the presumptive award would be unjust or inappropriate. Where the court finds that the presumptive temporary maintenance award would be unjust or inappropriate the court may adjust the presumptive temporary maintenance award upon consideration of the following factors as provided in DRL §236(B)(5-a)(e)(1).

Plaintiff's 2011 W-2, reflected an annual income of $18,216.19. After statutory deductions of $765.08 for Social Security taxes and $264.13 for Medicare taxes, Plaintiff's income was calculated in the sum of $17,186.98. Plaintiff also earned an additional $8,914.70, from a second job, as reported on her 2011 1099 forms. Thus, Plaintiff's annual income was determined in the sum of $25,381.68. Defendant's gross annual income is reported in the sum of $174,166.86, including his income as reported on his 2011 W-2 forms and $6,000.00 of rental income as reported on his Statement of Net Worth. After statutory deductions in the sum of $6,282.03 for Social Security taxes, $2,639.99 for Medicare taxes and $6,000.64, for New York City locality taxes, Defendant's annual income was calculated in the sum of $159,243.34. Thus, Defendant was the payor spouse with an income of $159,243.33 and Plaintiff was the payee spouse with an income of $25,381.68. The presumptive temporary maintenance award was $42,696.67 annually, or $3,558.06 monthly, or $1,642.18 bi-weekly, or $821.09 weekly. Considering the circumstances of this case and of the respective parties, the Court found that the amount of maintenance would be unjust and inappropriate and adjusted the award accordingly, in consideration of the factors as enumerated in DRL § 236(B)(5-a)(e)(1), considering factors: (g) the existence and duration of a premarital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household and (q) any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper.

The statute provides that the Court may consider the existence of a pre-divorce separate household to determine if the presumptive temporary maintenance award is unjust or inappropriate. It was undisputed that Plaintiff and the parties' children relocated to Georgia in 2007, while Defendant continued to reside in New York. Although the parties offered opposite rationales for Plaintiff's relocation to the State of Georgia, there was no dispute that Defendant maintained both properties in the State of New York and State of Georgia from 2007 to present. As indicated in Defendant's Statement of Net Worth, Defendant paid both mortgages, home owner's insurances and real estate taxes of $4,705.00 without any contribution from Plaintiff. However, the utility bills were paid for individually with Plaintiff paying approximately $665.00 monthly for the property in the State of Georgia and Defendant paying approximately $400.00 monthly for the New York State property. From 2007, Plaintiff has been able to meet her monthly expenses without any bill being delinquent or in default. The parties maintained their individual life style in separate states as they have chosen to do since 2007. The statute further provides that the Court may consider any factor which the Court expressly finds to be just and proper. A review of Plaintiff's Statement of Net Worth shows that Plaintiff met monthly expenses without incurring any debt. Significantly, Plaintiff argued that she has little income and was unable to meet her monthly expenses since 2007. However, Plaintiff did not avail herself for approximately five years of the judicial system in Georgia or New York to seek financial assistance from Defendant. There was no explanation provided by Plaintiff for her delay given that she was in need of financial assistance. Now Plaintiff commenced the instant proceeding to seek relief as provided under DRL 236. Upon considering the circumstances of this case, Plaintiff's application seeking temporary maintenance was denied.

Defendant opposed the application for temporary child support. The parties had two children. The youngest was 18 years of age. Defendant argued that Plaintiff commenced this proceeding within New York State to take advantage of the New York State statute which provides for later termination of child support until the age of 21. In the State of Georgia, the child support obligation terminates at the age of 18. Although the children have emancipated under the State of Georgia child support statute, Defendant argued that he continued to provide financial support for the children which continued from 2007 to present although the children reside in the State of Georgia. Although the youngest child was working, Defendant purchased a car for her and paid the monthly car note in the sum of $245.00. He also gave the child a monthly allowance of $120.00. Assuming, arguendo, that the Court applied the applicable child support percentage to the excess income, Defendant's basic child support obligation was $26,992.18 annually or $2,249.35 monthly. The Court found the Defendant's presumptive child support obligation, both on income up to $136,000.00 and on the sum which exceeds $136,000.00 to be unjust and inappropriate. The Court considered the factors enumerated in DRL § 2401-b (f). The child was currently attending college and was employed. The Court observed that "in high income cases, the appropriate determinate under DRL § 240(1-b)(f) for an award of child support where parental income exceeds the sum of $130,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and the amount required for the child to live an appropriate lifestyle, rather than the wealth of one or both parties" (Levesque v. Levesque, 73 AD3d 990, 990 [2010] 0. Although the parties separated in 2007, Defendant continued to contribute to the expenses of Plaintiff and the parties' children. Both the subject child and the parties' emancipated daughter received automobiles as gifts from Defendant. Defendant paid expenses for the child, including her prom expenses and graduation expenses. Furthermore, Plaintiff had not submitted evidence regarding the financial needs of the child. Although Plaintiff alleged that she was unable to pay the children's expenses without Defendant's financial assistance, she did not dispute that Defendant paid certain expenses and failed to submit evidence to substantiate her claim. Notably, despite Plaintiff's current claims, she did not avail herself of the legal system in Georgia or New York seeking child support since her relocation in 2007. Plaintiff's inaction suggested that there was sufficient income to manage her household expenses. Plaintiff's application seeking temporary child support was denied with leave to renew at trial.

It was undisputed that Defendant paid the mortgage expenses, real estate taxes, homeowner's insurance, and home owner's association fees on the parties' residence in Georgia and in New York. Considering the lifestyle of the parties, since their separation in 2007, Defendant was directed to maintain the status quo payments. Plaintiff's application for an Order directing Defendant to pay all the carrying charges and expenses related to the Georgia property was denied. Considering the circumstances of this case and the parties' lifestyle after Plaintiff's relocation to Georgia in 2007, Plaintiff's application seeking an Order directing Defendant to pay all unreimbursed health expenses of Plaintiff and the parties' unemancipated child was denied.

Plaintiff sought an Order directing Defendant to pay interim counsel fees of $10,000.00 to Plaintiff's attorney pursuant to DRL § 237. Defendant opposed the application and argued that the time records supplied by counsel were incomplete. A review of the affidavits and exhibits annexed to the Order to Show Cause included conflicting information regarding funds received and payments made. Although Plaintiff's counsel's affirmation indicated that Plaintiff paid an initial retainer of $3,500.00, he further stated that Plaintiff incurred $4,230.37 for legal fees and expenses, but had not fully exhausted the retainer. Additionally, a review of what appeared to be a "time sheet" used by Plaintiff's counsel's firm for the purposes of billing, indicated that as of May 1, 2012, Plaintiff's counsel billed Plaintiff $4,230.37. However, exhibit "I," which appeared to be an invoice for Plaintiff's legal services and fees, showed a credit balance in favor of Plaintiff of $2,279.63. Although Plaintiff's counsel stated that copy of invoices for legal services from the date counsel was retained until September 2012 were annexed to his reply papers, the invoices were not annexed. Upon Plaintiff's failure to clearly set forth sums paid by Plaintiff toward counsel fees, and legal fees actually incurred by Plaintiff, the application seeking counsel fees was denied.

Property Determination - Separate Property - Lottery Winnings - Supreme Court Vacates Order, Retroactively to June 22, 2011, Which Directed Plaintiff to Pay Interim Maintenance, Where Defendant Conceded She Was No Longer in Need of Temporary Maintenance, but Was in Need of Maintenance until She Received the Winning Proceeds.

In Questel v Questel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1111821 (N.Y.Sup.) Plaintiff moved for an Order declaring that the proceeds of certain lottery winning as a marital asset. Plaintiff argued that Defendant purchased the lottery ticket with marital funds, as Plaintiff continued to support the Defendant and children after the commencement of the action. Defendant opposed the application and argues that the ticket was purchased after the commencement of the action, and therefore, the proceeds were not an asset subject to equitable distribution.

Supreme Court observed that the Appellate Division, Second Department has held, "the proceeds of a winning lottery ticket acquired by a spouse during the marriage constitute marital property" (Damon v. Damon, 34 AD3d 416, 416-417 [2d Dept 2006]). Domestic Relations Law § 236 Part B(1)(c) defines marital property as property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the commencement of a matrimonial action. DRL § (B)(5)(c) provides that marital property shall be distributed equitably between the parties, considering the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties. Plaintiff commenced the proceeding on October 28, 2010. Defendant purchased the lottery ticket after commencement of this proceeding. Thus, the lottery winning proceeds of May 2011 were not a marital asset, as the ticket was purchased after the commencement of the action. Although Plaintiff argued that Defendant purchased the ticket with marital funds because he continued to support the family after commencement of the action Supreme Court held that this argument was unpersuasive. The trend in the Appellate Division, Second Department disfavors the use of marital funds to meet pendente lite obligations and requires that the payor reimburse the other party for their equitable share of marital funds used to satisfy pendente lite obligation. (Many v. Many, 84 AD3d 1036, 1037 [2d Dept 2011]). It is well settled in the Appellate Division, First Department, that pendente lite payments should be paid from the payor's income, not marital funds. (Elkaim v. Elkaim, 176 A.D.2d 116,118 [1st Dept 1991]; McInnis v. McInnis, 23 AD3d 241, 242 [1st Dept 2005]; Azizo v. Azizo, 51 AD3d 438, 440 [1st Dept 2008]). This trend indicates that the funds used to pay maintenance and/or carrying charges pendente lite, after commencement of a matrimonial proceeding, are not marital funds. Rather, the funds, derived from the payor's income, are deemed to be a non-marital asset. Therefore, the funds Defendant used to purchase the lottery ticket were non-marital, and the resulting proceeds were also deemed to be a non-marital asset. Accordingly, Plaintiff's application was denied.

Plaintiff sought, among other things, an Order vacating the portion of the Court's Decision and Order, dated June 22, 2011, retroactively to June 22, 2011, which inter alia directed Plaintiff to pay interim maintenance of $127.39 weekly. Defendant conceded that she was no longer in need of temporary maintenance, but was in need of maintenance until she received the winning proceeds on May 21, 2012. Supreme Court found that a substantial change in circumstances occurred when Defendant became the winner of the lottery that being May 2011. Therefore, a modification of the temporary maintenance order was warranted. However, the statute explicitly provides that arrears of temporary maintenance which accrue prior to an application seeking to modify or annul temporary maintenance, shall not be subject to modification, except for good cause shown. Although the statute does not expressly provide that an application seeking to modify temporary maintenance is retroactive to the date of application, it is implied. Additionally, courts have held that downward modifications of temporary maintenance "may only operate prospectively" (Petek v. Petek, 239 A.D.2d 327, 328 [2d Dept 1997]). The Court noted that Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had constructive knowledge that she possessed a winning ticket and that she was an avid lottery player. Defendant did not dispute that she was unaware she was the winner on the date of the lottery game, May 2011. Therefore, Plaintiff's application seeking to vacate the provision of the Decision and Order, dated June 22, 2011, directing Plaintiff to pay temporary maintenance in the sum of $127.39 weekly, was granted. However, Plaintiff application for credit back to the date of the Order was granted only to the extent of the date of his application.

Divorce - Defenses - Res Judicata - Decision and Order Granting Divorce, Support and Equitably Distributing Marital Property Vacated and Action Dismissed on Ground That at the Time of Commencement of Action Parties Were Already Divorced

In Hester v Hester, 2013 WL 1092889 (N.Y.Sup.), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 50369(U) the parties married on June 19, 1976 and lived separate and apart since 1989. On November 12, 2010, the husband commenced an action seeking a judgment of divorce and equitable distribution of the marital assets. After a hearing the Court awarded the wife maintenance of $350 per month for the rest of her life commencing on July 1, 2012; $4,000 toward debts accumulated by her during the course of the marriage for the support of the parties' children; directed that the husband and wife share in husband's pension; and directed the husband to pay the wife $110 representing the quarterly payment on the wife's life insurance for January 2012 which he failed to make. The husband, who appeared pro se during this litigation moved to set aside this Court's July 18, 2012 decision and order and dismiss the action on the ground that at the time of this action the parties were already divorced pursuant to a 1988 Judgment of Divorce.

A review of the papers in the action of Hester v. Hester Index No. 6315/1988 revealed that in July of 1988 the wife, with the help of the Legal Aid Society of Westchester, commenced a matrimonial action. The husband was personally served with the summons and complaint on July 21, 1988. The husband neither appeared in the action nor answered the complaint. In her complaint the wife sought, inter alia, child support and spousal maintenance as well as equitable distribution of the marital property. On September 6, 1988, the wife moved for a judgment of divorce. The husband was served with the motion as well as all the supporting documents by certified mail return receipt. The return receipt was signed by the husband and placed in the Court file. In her motion, the wife sought an award of child support, maintenance, counsel fees, as well as a direction that the husband pay her life insurance and medical insurance for the children of the marriage. On September 30, 1988, the Court granted the wife a judgment of divorce on default. With respect to the issue of equitable distribution, the judgment states, in relevant part: ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the Family Court shall have concurrent jurisdiction with this Court with respect to all future applications pertaining to support, custody, visitation and maintenance, and it is further ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the parties have heretofore resolved all questions of equitable distribution pursuant to Section 236(B)(5) of the Domestic Relations Law. Both the Finding of Fact and Conclusion of Law and the Judgment of Divorce were silent as to the issues of child support and spousal maintenance. There is no indication in the County Clerk's file that the Judgment of Divorce was received by or served upon any party.

In opposition to the husband's motion the wife noted that she did initiate a legal separation with the help of the Legal Aid Society in 1988. At that time she was seeking child support and spousal support. The wife contended that she did not know that the judgment of divorce had been granted. The wife stated that in 1988 she called the Legal Aid Society to get the status of her action and was told that no papers had been filed on her behalf. The Court noted that a valid Judgment of Divorce was signed and filed with the Clerk of the Court in 1998 and that, the husband could not maintain an action for divorce when he is already divorced. Typically, res judicata, or claim preclusion, requires that "once a claim is brought to a final conclusion, all other claims arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions are barred, even if based upon different theories or if seeking a different remedy" (Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 NY3d 94, 100, 810 N.Y.S.2d 96, 843 N.E.2d 723, quoting O'Brien v. City of Syracuse, 54 N.Y.2d 353, 357, 445 N.Y.S.2d 687, 429 N.E.2d 1158). "In the context of a matrimonial action, [the Court of Appeals] has recognized that a final judgment of divorce settles the parties' rights pertaining not only to those issues that were actually litigated, but also to those that could have been litigated" (Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 NY3d at 100, 810 N.Y.S.2d 96, 843 N.E.2d 723). Thus, this Court's decision dated July 18, 2012 was vacated and the action dismissed.

The Court found that the husband commenced this divorce action when he was already divorced. He had knowledge of the prior action because he was served with the summons and complaint and notice of motion in 1988. Yet, rather than locate the 1988 Judgment of Divorce, he commenced this action. The Court found that the husband's act of commencing this action without first discovering the outcome of the 1988 action was frivolous and resulted in the unnecessary expenditure of time and money. Accordingly, the Court granted the wife's application for attorneys fees and awards her legal fees in the amount of $7,500.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Credit for Payment of Separate Debt with Marital Property - When Marital Funds Used to Pay off Separate Liabilities or to Increase Value of Separate Property, Court Has Authority to Recoup Such Funds and to Distribute Them When Equity Warrants Recoupment.

In Spathis v Spathis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 709570 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Supreme Court granted a judgement of divorce and ordered plaintiff to pay pendente lite maintenance arrears, awarded plaintiff $49,087.05 as a distributive award and denied counsel fee awards to both parties. The Appellate Division modified. It held that the court correctly determined that defendant was responsible for a portion of plaintiff's tax liability incurred during the marriage, and also providently exercised its discretion in finding that plaintiff's payments for his mother's care and for the mortgage on his mother's house were not a waste of marital assets. The court correctly found that plaintiff's interest in his business could not be distributed because the court-appointed forensic accountant found that the business had no value.

The court correctly found that defendant could not be awarded a portion of the appreciation in the value of the marital apartment, which was plaintiff's separate property, because defendant failed to demonstrate that the property in question increased in value. Neither party submitted expert appraisals or testimony regarding the apartment (Burgio v. Burgio, 278 A.D.2d 767, 717 N.Y.S.2d 769 [3rd Dept 2000]). However, defendant should have been awarded half of the mortgage payments made on the apartment with marital funds. When marital funds are used to pay off separate liabilities or to increase the value of separate property, "a court has the authority to effectively recoup [such] marital funds ... and to distribute such funds to the parties in accordance with Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(5)(c) when equity warrants such recoupment.

Plaintiff also failed to provide the court-appointed forensic expert with sufficient information to value his stock options at the time of the marriage or the present value of the shares he purchased, and thus plaintiff could not be credited in the amount of the value as of the date of the marriage of his right to acquire the shares of stock. Nor could the value of the shares be distributed since the same was unknown. In such circumstances, it is necessary and appropriate to resolve the issue by ordering an in-kind distribution of the shares, and it modified the judgment accordingly.

The Appellate Division held that the trial court providently exercised its discretion in denying maintenance. Defendant was awarded pendente lite maintenance for longer than the length of this short marriage. She was also only 44 years old and was capable of becoming gainfully employed. It also held that the court providently exercised its discretion in denying defendant an award of counsel fees. Both parties had engaged in dilatory tactics and had caused the large expenditure of counsel fees.

Child Custody - UCCJEA - Domestic Relations Law §76-f [1] - Supreme Court Properly Weighed All Factors Relevant to a Determination Whether North Carolina Was a More Appropriate Forum and Properly Concluded That it Was Not

In Gottlieb v. Gottlieb, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 709639 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which declared New York the home state of the parties' children and denied defendant's motion to decline jurisdiction pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) and directed defendant to return the children to New York.

Defendant did not dispute that the trial court correctly determined that New York was the home state based It observed that Supreme Court properly weighed all factors relevant to a determination whether North Carolina was a more appropriate forum and properly concluded that it was not (DRL § 76-f[1], [2]). The court weighed defendant's superior financial circumstances and the much shorter length of time the children resided in North Carolina, as well as the fact that the majority of witnesses and documents were located in New York, including evidence relevant to the parents' allegations of misconduct against each other. In addition, defendant himself seemed to acknowledge that New York was a more appropriate forum to look into allegations of abuse and neglect of his daughter, which are relevant to any custody determination, because he reported these allegations to the New York City Administration for Children's Services, although he claimed to have learned of the alleged abuse only after moving to North Carolina. The court also gave proper weight to plaintiff's claims that defendant moved the children to North Carolina without her consent, and thus engaged in "unjustifiable conduct," which, if true, would obligate the North Carolina court to decline jurisdiction (DRL § 76-g). Without making any determination whether defendant engaged in such conduct, the court observed, correctly, that if a determination were made that he did so, North Carolina would have no basis for continuing jurisdiction, whereas there are no such potential hindrances to jurisdiction in New York.

Appeals - Interim Orders - Custody - Right to Appeal Intermediate Order Extinguished with Entry of Final Custody and Visitation Order

In Diaz v Diaz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 709759 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division dismissed an appeal from an interim order which had granted plaintiff mother alternate weekend overnight visitation with the one child and discontinued defendant father's Thursday overnight visits with the other child. It held that the right to appeal from the instant intermediate order was extinguished with the entry of the final custody and visitation order during the pendency of this appeal (see Matter of Aho, 39 N.Y.2d 241, 248 [1976]).

Appellate Division, Second Department

Antenuptial Agreements - Construction - Clear and Unambiguous Agreement Will Be Enforced According to its Terms.

In Bennett v Bennett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 692690 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that plaintiff's contention that the appeal should be dismissed because certain portions of the order were not appealable was without merit, because the defendant's appeal was limited to a portion of the order that was appealable (CPLR 5701[a][2][i], [v]).

It noted that in contemplation of marriage, the parties executed a prenuptial agreement in which they agreed, inter alia, to define "marital property" to be "(a) any property that is jointly owned by the parties, and (b) all household furniture and furnishings owned by either party, whether heretofore or hereafter acquired and regardless of the form in which title is held."The prenuptial agreement defined all other property as "separate property," including real property purchased by either party during the marriage using their own separate property, as well as the appreciation of such property during the marriage "whether caused by the efforts of a party or a third party, or by inflation, or by any other cause or stimulus."The prenuptial agreement also provided that it could only be modified in a writing signed by both parties. Shortly after the parties were married, the plaintiff purchased a house in East Hampton for $295,000. She made a $150,000 down payment using proceeds from the sale of her separate property, and the defendant took out a mortgage, in his name, for the balance. The house, which would become the parties' marital residence, was titled solely in the plaintiff's name. The plaintiff was not employed after the parties were married, and the defendant paid, inter alia, the mortgage and all the carrying costs for the house. After the plaintiff filed for divorce, the defendant moved, inter alia, for a determination that, pursuant to the terms of the prenuptial agreement, the house was marital property subject to equitable distribution, and not the plaintiff's separate property. The Supreme Court denied that branch of the defendant's motion.

The Appellate Division affirmed the order holding that the house was plaintiff's separate property. It found that the prenuptial agreement provisions clearly and unambiguously defined what constituted the parties' marital property and separate property, and under the circumstances of this case, the house was separate property. Contrary to the defendant's contention, the fact that he paid the mortgage and carrying costs on the house was immaterial, and, according to the modification provisions of the prenuptial agreement, could not serve as a basis for its modification.

Child Support - Modification - Downward - Emancipation - Support Magistrate's Findings Based on Credibility Determinations and Supported by Record Should Not Be Disturbed - Reluctance to See a Parent Is Not Abandonment

In Matter of Gansky v. Gansky--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 692782 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate did not improvidently exercise her discretion in declining to rely on the father's account of his finances in determining that he failed to establish a substantial change of circumstances warranting a downward modification. As the Support Magistrate's findings were based on credibility determinations and supported by the record, they should not be disturbed. The credibility determinations of a Family Court support magistrate, who is in the best position to hear and evaluate the credibility of the witnesses, are entitled to deference.

It also held that Family Court properly denied the father's subsequent petition to terminate his child support obligation on the ground of constructive emancipation. Where the parent causes a breakdown in communication with his or her child, or has made no serious effort to contact the child and exercise his or her visitation rights, the child will not be deemed to have abandoned the parent. The burden of proof as to emancipation is on the party asserting it and the father failed to meet his burden. Although there was evidence that the children failed to return the father's telephone calls for several weeks before he filed his termination petition, such an occurrence shows no more than the children's reluctance to contact him. Reluctance to see a parent is not abandonment. Moreover, there was ample support for the court's determination that the father made no serious effort to maintain his relationship with the children during the relevant time period.

Child Support - Modification - Surviving Agreement - Boden - Brescia Rule - Substantial and Unanticipated Change in Circumstances - Change Is Measured by Comparing the Payor's Financial Situation at the Time of the Application for a Downward Modification with That at the Time of the Order or Judgment.

In Matter of Nuesi v Gago, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 692799 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that the terms of a stipulation of settlement that is incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce operate as contractual obligations binding on the parties. However, the court has the power to modify such terms upon a showing of a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances. In determining whether there has been a substantial change in circumstances, the change is measured by comparing the payor's financial situation at the time of the application for a downward modification with that at the time of the order or judgment. The father did not meet his burden. Although he provided the Family Court with information concerning his income and other financial circumstances as of the time the petition for modification was filed, he failed to offer any evidence regarding these matters as of the time of the judgment of divorce.

Child Support - Award - DRL § 240(1-b) - Family Court Act § 413(1) - Court must Articulate Basis for Award Based on Parental Income above $136,000. - Reasons Do Not Have to Be Based upon Needs of the Child; Test Generally Applied Is Whether the Child Is Receiving Enough to Meet His or Her "Actual Needs and the Amount Required ... to Live an Appropriate Lifestyle".

In Matter of Parsick v Rubio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 692802 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), petitioner, David S. Parsick, and the respondent, Thomas P. Rubio, were the parents of two children. Parsick had sole custody of the children pursuant to an agreement between the parties. In 2006, Parsick resumed his work as a public school teacher, and Rubio voluntarily made support payments, most recently of $1,234 per week. In May 2008, Rubio stopped making voluntary support payments. Parsick petitioned for child support in 2010. A pendente lite order dated November 1, 2010, awarded Parsick temporary child support in the sum of $1,000 per week. At a subsequent hearing on child support, Parsick testified that in 2010, his salary as a public school teacher was $91,396 per year, representing a substantial raise from his income in 2008 of $82,274. He and the children occupied a house given to him by Rubio. The children took music lessons and went to summer camp. The parties' son, who had special needs, received occupational therapy covered by Parsick's health insurance. Rubio owned 24.5% of a family business, and earned a weekly gross salary from the family business of $6,500. The Support Magistrate found that combined parental income was $468,259.36, 82% of which was attributable to Rubio. The Support Magistrate declined to award any child support above a combined parental income of $130,000, determining that, upon consideration of the factors specified in Family Court Act § 413(1)(f), Rubio's pro rata share of the basic child support obligation above that amount would be "unjust and/or inappropriate," inter alia, because Parsick failed to submit evidence of the children's standard of living prior to the parties' separation, and Parsick had been supporting the children for two years without help. The Support Magistrate granted Parsick's petition to the extent of directing Rubio to pay child support of $512.50 per week and directed that Rubio be credited for overpayments made pursuant to the November 1, 2010, temporary support order. Family Court denied Parsick's objections on the ground that the facts cited supported the determination that the needs of the children were being met.

The Appellate Division granted the objections and granted the petition to the extent of directing Rubio to pay basic child support of $1,025 per week. It observed that the Family Court must articulate an explanation of the basis for its calculation of child support based on parental income above $130,000. The reasons do not have to be based upon the needs of the child. The test generally applied is whether the child is receiving enough to meet his or her "actual needs and the amount required ... to live an appropriate lifestyle" Levesque v. Levesque, 73 A.D.3d 990, 990, 900 N.Y.S.2d 663; see Matter of Brim v. Combs, 25 A.D.3d 691, 693, 808 N.Y.S.2d 735). The record revealed that the children enjoyed a comfortable lifestyle, participating in music lessons and attending summer camp. On the question of the amount of support necessary to maintain that lifestyle, Rubio's most recent voluntary payments, made in 2008, were over $1,200 per week, and while since then, Parsick received a substantial raise in salary, that raise did not compensate for Rubio's termination of support payments. Although Parsick was able to maintain the children's lifestyle for two years without any financial contributions from Rubio, it held that he should not be expected to do so indefinitely, without Rubio contributing his equitable share. If a child's lifestyle may be maintained by the support provided pendente lite, a similar award may be made, and the "cap" adjusted to meet that level of support (see Lago v. Adrion, 93 A.D.3d 697, 699). The Appellate Division found that the children's needs would be met, and their lifestyle maintained, with an award based upon applying the child support percentage to the first $260,000 of combined parental income, which yielded an award of $1,025 per week.

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Proper to Dismiss Petition where summons not served.

In Matter of Denise W. v. Charles R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 692826 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a child custody proceeding, the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, without a hearing, dismissed, without prejudice, the mother's petition to modify a prior order of custody. It held that Family Court properly dismissed the petition, since she did not serve the father of the child with her petition (Family Ct. Act § 154-a)

Agreements - Prenuptial - Construction - When Agreement Is Clear and Unambiguous on its Face, Intent of Parties Is Gleaned from Four Corners of the Writing as a Whole with a Practical Interpretation of the Language Employed So That the Parties' Reasonable Expectations Are Met.

In Monter v Balong, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 811872 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the defendant's motion to direct the plaintiff to pay her $3 million pursuant to paragraph 30 of the parties' prenuptial agreement dated January 24, 2008, which was incorporated but not merged into the parties' judgment of divorce, for an award of postjudgment interest on that sum retroactive to the date of entry of the judgment of divorce, and for an award of counsel fees pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 238. It observed that when a prenuptial agreement is clear and unambiguous on its face, the intent of the parties is gleaned from the four corners of the writing as a whole with a practical interpretation of the language employed so that the parties' reasonable expectations are met. Paragraph 30 of the parties' prenuptial agreement clearly provided that, upon separation, the plaintiff would be obligated to pay the defendant the sum of $3 million "in $500,000 installments," and that the first installment "shall be paid upon sale of the [marital residence]." Since the sale of the marital residence had not occurred by the time that the defendant made her motion Supreme Court correctly denied her motion since the plaintiff's obligation to make installment payments was not triggered. While paragraph 30 of the prenuptial agreement provided that "any ... balance" of the $3 million would be due upon dissolution of the marriage, which had already occurred, there was no balance due as of the date of dissolution, since the plaintiff's obligation to pay the first installment had not been triggered in the first instance.

Agreements - Construction - Court Construes Phrase "or its equivalent if same is no longer available."

In Matter of Bokor v. Markel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 811880 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties' Stipulation of Settlement, which was incorporated, but not merged, into their judgment of divorce, provided that the father agreed to "furnish at his own expense the Guardian PHS health and major medical insurance (or its equivalent if same is no longer available) for the benefit of the children of the parties until their respective emancipation." It was undisputed that the Guardian PHS health and major medical insurance plan provided out-of-network benefits, whereas the current health and major medical insurance plan the father was providing for the parties' unemancipated children did not include any out-of-network benefits. Thus, it held that the Family Court properly granted the mother's enforcement petition and directed the father to provide Guardian PHS health and major medical insurance, or its equivalent, for the children.

Right to Counsel -Family Ct Act § 262[a] - Deprivation of Party's Right to Counsel Guaranteed by Statute Requires Reversal, Without Regard to the Merits of the Unrepresented Party's Position

In Matter of Savoca v. Bellofatto, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 811966 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that contrary to the statement in the order appealed from to the effect that a hearing had been held, the mother's petition for custody was granted without a hearing. In addition, the Family Court did not conduct an examination of the parties or obtain a forensic report from an expert. Although the Family Court did ask the attorney for the child for an argument on behalf of her two-year-old client, the attorney for the child stated that a social worker from her office would be sent to visit the child, but this had not yet been done when the order was issued. Under these circumstances, it could not be concluded that the court possessed sufficient information to render an informed determination consistent with the child's best interests. Since there was no hearing, the court also failed to make specific findings of fact with respect to the issue of custody, as it is required to do. The order was reversed and the matter remitted for an evidentiary hearing not only for the reasons stated above, but for the additional reason that the father effectively was deprived of his statutory right to counsel (Family Ct Act § 262[a][v]). The deprivation of a party's right to counsel guaranteed by this statute requires reversal, without regard to the merits of the unrepresented party's position. At the start of the proceeding, the Family Court acknowledged that, prior thereto, the father's attorney had requested an adjournment "to at least consider whether she want[ed] to continue representing [the father]." Nonetheless, the court proceeded to determine the custody issue without a hearing. Moreover, the court neither advised the father of his right to an attorney, nor advised him of his right to an adjournment to obtain new counsel, notwithstanding a statement to the contrary contained in the order appealed from. An attorney from the office of the father's counsel was apparently present when the court rendered its determination, but she did not appear to be representing the father. While adjournments are within the discretion of the trial court the range of that discretion is narrowed where a fundamental right such as the right to counsel is involved. Under the circumstances presented here, instead of directing the matter to go forward, the Family Court should have exercised its discretion to grant an adjournment to permit the father to reach an understanding with his counsel, or to obtain new counsel.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Judiciary Law § 475 - Charging Lien - Charging Lien Cannot Be Asserted Against an IRA, Which Is Otherwise Exempt from Creditor's Claims Pursuant to CPLR 5205.

In J.K.C. v. T.W.C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 791299 (N.Y.Sup.) an attorney sought to enforce a charging lien against his former client's IRA, which was funded through a roll-over of her marital share of the husband's IRA. The Supreme Court held that a charging lien under Section 475 of the Judiciary Law can not be asserted against an IRA, which is otherwise exempt from creditor's claims pursuant to CPLR 5205. After a trial of the divorce action, the referee directed that the husband's IRA account was marital property subject to equitable distribution. The wife received 38.6% of the account which was to be distributed according to a qualified domestic relations order (QDRO). Pursuant to the judgment of divorce, the court later signed a QDRO. There was no dispute that the wife's account, created when her marital share was rolled-over by the plan administrator, qualified as an IRA under the Internal Revenue Code. The wife, as the designated beneficiary, had a nonforfeitable right to the balance held in the rolled-over IRA account. The Court declined to read the phrase in the Judiciary Law that permits the charging lien to be pursued into "whatever hands they may come" to contravene the federal taxation treatment, ERISA-protection, and state exemption scheme which inheres in IRAs. As a matter of state law, reading the Judiciary Law to create a lien against the IRA roll-over would elevate the attorney's claims for fees over all other creditors, secured or otherwise, and give him a right unknown to any other creditor under the CPLR. The request for a charging lien was denied. The matter of the amount of fees that were encompassed in the attorney's retaining lien was referred to arbitration consistent with the rules of the court.

Paternity - Acknowledgment of Paternity - Equitable Estoppel - Acknowledgment Not Void Where Mother Married at Time It Was Acknowledged

In Matter of Andre Asim M. v. Madeline N. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 599359 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the petition to vacate an acknowledgment of paternity of the child. It held that the acknowledgment of paternity was not void because the mother was legally married at the time she and petitioner executed it, as nothing in Public Health Law § 4135-b(2)(b) requires the mother to have been unmarried at the time the child was born.

Assuming that petitioner demonstrated that he signed the acknowledgment of paternity under a mistake of fact, the Family Court was required to conduct a hearing on the best interests of the child before ordering a genetic marker test, and properly determined that it was not in the child's best interests on the basis of equitable estoppel to order genetic marker tests (Family Ct Act s 516-[a][b] [ii]). A man who mistakenly represents himself as a child's father may be equitably stopped from denying paternity, and made to pay child support, when the child justifiably relied on the man's representation of paternity, to the child's detriment because it is shown that a parent-child relationship has developed between the two (see Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 NY3d 320, 324, 327 [2006]). After the child was born in 2005, appellant held himself out to be the father of the child to his family and coworkers, permitted the child to call him "daddy," provided the mother with support for the child, and placed the child on his medical insurance until January 2009, when he ceased interacting with the child based on his belief he was not the biological father. At the time appellant sought to vacate the acknowledgment of paternity, the child recognized him as his father and continued to have a relationship with appellant's family even after appellant stopped seeing him.

The court properly excluded email's appellant sought to introduce into evidence, because the mother's belief as to whether maintaining the legal relationship between appellant and the child was in her son's best interest was irrelevant to the court's determination of whether equitable estoppel applied.

Agreements - Child Support - Opting out of Cssa - Remainder of Agreement That Failed to Comply with Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][H] (Cssa) Could Not Be Salvaged by Deeming it Divisible Where Provisions Pertaining to Child Support Constituted the Main Objective of the Agreement,

In David v Cruz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 599368 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that an agreement purporting to opt out of the basic child support obligations set forth in the Child Support Standards Act (CSSA) must "include a provision stating that the parties have been advised of the provisions of [the CSSA]," must specify the amount that the basic child support obligation would have been, and the reason or reasons for the deviation (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][h]). Here, both the settlement agreement and the subject order effectuating it failed to recite that the parties were aware of the CSSA guidelines, failed to set forth the basic child support obligation, and failed to set forth the reasons for deviating from the guidelines. It held that although the invalidity of a child support provision does not necessarily invalidate the agreement in its entirety the agreement at issue could not be salvaged by deeming it divisible for partial illegality and severing and enforcing the provisions that did not pertain to child support. The provisions pertaining to child support constituted the main objective of the agreement, or the bargained-for consideration inducing defendant to agree to the remainder of the agreement, including the injunctive provisions.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Home State - Domestic Relations Law §76 - Family Court Lacks Subject Matter Jurisdiction Where New York Not Child's Home State - under the Uccjea, Home State Jurisdiction Is Paramount and Whether to Accept Jurisdiction Is a Home State Prerogative

In Matter of Agueda v. Rodriguez, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 518360 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were the parents of a daughter who was born in 1999, and who had lived at times with the mother and at times with the father. In July 2010, while the child was residing with the mother, the mother allegedly asked the father if the child could visit with him for several weeks at his home in Texas. The father agreed, and on July 7, 2010, the child arrived in Texas. At some point thereafter, the father informed the mother that the child wished to remain in Texas and that he had enrolled her in school there. The mother agreed to allow the child to complete the school year in Texas, but claimed that she and the father agreed that the child would return to New York after the completion of the 2010-2011 school year. According to the mother, in July 2011 the father told the mother that the child would not be returning to New York, so she filed a petition for custody. The father moved to dismiss the petition on the ground that the Family Court lacked jurisdiction pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), and the Family Court granted the motion.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that under the UCCJEA, home state jurisdiction is paramount and whether to accept jurisdiction is a home state prerogative. A court of this state has jurisdiction to make an initial custody determination if it is the child's home state (Domestic Relations Law §76[1][a]). A home state is defined as "the state in which a child lived with a parent . . . for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding" (Domestic Relations Law §75-a [7]). The definition of a home state also permits a period of temporary absence during that six-month time period. Family Court correctly determined that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction, as the child did not live in New York for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of the child custody proceeding. Therefore, the Family Court properly granted the father's motion to dismiss the mother's custody petition for lack of jurisdiction and properly denied the mother's cross motion for temporary custody of the subject child and to set a visitation schedule.

Child Support - Modification - Imputed Income - Substantial Change in Circumstances - Significant Increase in the Father's Income over the Last Decade, and the Increase in the Child's Expenses since the Original Order of Support Was Entered, Warranted a New Determination of Child Support

In Matter of Braun v Abenti, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 518406 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) an order of support entered February 27, 2001, set the father's child support obligation and directed the father to pay 100% of "future reasonable health care expenses not covered by insurance." The child's orthodontia expenses of $1,329 were not covered by insurance. The mother paid only $20 of that sum, claiming she could not afford to pay more. The mother filed a petition to enforce the order of support. The mother also filed a petition for an upward modification of the father's child support obligation. The Family Court granted the mother's petition to enforce the order of support entered February 27, 2001, only to the extent of directing the father to pay the sum of $20 to her for unreimbursed medical expenses, and denied her petition for an upward modification of the father's child support obligation.

The Appellate Division modified. Since the mother demonstrated that she paid $20 of the child's unreimbursed orthodontia expenses, the Family Court's award of $20 to the mother was properly limited to "those sums for which the mother submitted proof of actual payment to the third-party medical providers" (Matter of Uriante v. Ippolito, 54 AD3d 379, 379). However, Family Court Act § 413(1)(c)(5)(v) authorizes the Family Court to direct the payment of reasonable health care expenses unreimbursed by insurance which remain unpaid directly to the health care provider. It held that to insure that the child received prompt and adequate health care, in addition to awarding the sum of $20 directly to the mother, the Family Court should have directed the father to pay the sum of $1,309 which remained outstanding directly to the child's orthodontist.

The Support Magistrate concluded that mother failed to establish grounds for an upward modification of the father's child support obligation because she did not demonstrate that her income plus the current child support award were not sufficient to meet the child's needs, citing Matter of Michaels v. Michaels (56 N.Y.2d 924) and Matter of Brescia v. Fitts (56 N.Y.2d 132). However, where a party is seeking to modify a prior court order of child support, which is not based on an agreement between the parties, the movant need only demonstrate a substantial change in circumstances, defined as a change of circumstances "sufficient to warrant a modification" Here, the significant increase in the father's income over the last decade, and the increase in the child's expenses since the original order of support was entered, warranted a new determination of child support pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act.

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Family Court Act §167 - Submission to Jurisdiction by Appearance without Objection

In Matter of Jackson v Idlett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 518447 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the mother's voluntary appearance in court with respect to the family offense petition and failure to raise any objection to the manner of service of the petition, as well as her active participation at the fact-finding hearing, defeated her current claim that the Family Court did not obtain personal jurisdiction over her because she was not served with notice of the father's petition (Family Ct Act § 167; Matter of Wood v. Brown, 26 AD3d 390).

Agreements - Construction - Retirement Benefits - Courts Are Required to Equitably Distribute Not Only the Parties' Assets but Their Liabilities as Well

In Adelsberg v Amron, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 673673 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order directing that the parties' retirement assets be distributed without postcommencement earnings and/or losses in value as a result of market forces. It observed that a stipulation is an independent contract which is subject to the principles of contract law. A court should construe a stipulation made in open court in accordance with the intent of the parties and the purpose of the stipulation by examining the record as a whole. The parties' postjudgment stipulation provided that the commencement date of the divorce action would serve as the valuation date for the distribution of their retirement assets, which they had previously agreed to distribute equally. While the stipulation was silent on the issue of whether the transfers of all retirement accounts were with losses and/or earnings, courts are required to equitably distribute not only the parties' assets but their liabilities as well. Nevertheless, the stipulation was clear that the valuation date of the retirement assets would be the commencement date of the action, and therefore the plaintiff was only required to share in the earnings and/or losses as of that date. She did not stipulate that valuation as of the date of the commencement of the action was to also include "post-commencement" value changes attributable to market forces.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Award - Effect of Prenuptial Agreement - Notwithstanding Waiver of Claim to Final Award Maintenance in Prenuptial Agreement, Court Entitled, in its Discretion, to Award Pendente Lite Relief in Absence of Express Agreement to Exclude.

In Lennox v Weberman,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 673777 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified an order which awarded the wife tax-free maintenance pendente lite of $38,000 per month, directed plaintiff to pay, inter alia, defendant's unreimbursed medical expenses up to $2,000 per month, interim counsel fees of $50,000, and expert fees of $35,000.

The Appellate Division found that the court properly applied the formula set forth at Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(5-a)(c)(2)(a) in calculating defendant's temporary spousal maintenance award. The court listed all 19 of the enumerated factors, explained how 7 of them supported an upward deviation to $38,000 per month from the $12,500 a month in guideline support, and found that $38,000 per month was not "unjust or inappropriate." It further found that the court properly imputed an annual income to plaintiff of $2.29 million when it computed maintenance, since this was his income on the most recent tax return. A court need not rely upon the party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential (see Hickland v. Hickland, 39 N.Y.2d 1 [1976]). The court properly took into account plaintiff's income from his investments, voluntarily deferred compensation, and substantial distributions (Domestic Relations Law §§ 236[B][5-a][b][4]; 240[1-b][b][5][i], [iv]), which was $50.5 million the previous year. It rejected the plaintiff's argument that defendant waived temporary maintenance in the parties' prenuptial agreement. Notwithstanding that defendant waived any claim to a final award of alimony or maintenance in the prenuptial agreement, the court was entitled, in its discretion, to award pendente lite relief in the absence of an express agreement to exclude an award of temporary maintenance. Under the circumstances of this case, however, it deemed it appropriate to charge the interim awards against the one-half share of the marital property to which defendant is entitled under the prenuptial agreement. In so doing it found it significant that the parties provided in the agreement that each waived any right to the separate property of the other, that living expenses were to be paid out of the marital property, and, that the marital property would be equally divided in the event of divorce. It also found it significant that, here, the equal division of the marital property to which the parties agreed would leave each of them with substantial wealth.

It also held that the court's award of interim counsel fees of $50,000 and expert fees of $35,000 was warranted under the circumstances where the parties' assets, appeared to be anywhere from $77 million to $90 million. While there were some funds in defendant's possession, plaintiff was in a far better financial position than defendant, and defendant should not have to deplete her assets in order to have legal representation comparable to that of plaintiff.

Child Support - Award - Imputed Income - No Basis to Disturb Court's Credibility Determinations Particularly in Light of Numerous Omissions from Respondent's Tax Returns and Financial Disclosure Affidavit Discrepancies.

In Matter of McElhaney v. Okebiyi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 627231 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate properly imputed income to respondent in calculating the support obligation and there was no basis to disturb the Support Magistrate's credibility determinations particularly in light of the numerous omissions from respondent's tax returns and Financial Disclosure Affidavit discrepancies. The evidence established that respondent, an accountant who worked for an entity where his brother was the director, failed to include as income $110,000 in his bank account which respondent characterized as a loan from his brother but which was not reflected as a loan on his tax return, as well as money in a joint bank account with a board member of the entity where respondent worked, and that his bank account activity was generally inconsistent with respondent's claimed income. The court thus properly imputed income based on the higher amount of wages listed in respondent's 2009 tax return rather than his 2010 tax return. Contrary to respondent's assertions, this did not amount to a deviation from the statutory formula (FCA § 413[1][b][5][iv] and [v]). The Support Magistrate also properly considered respondent's education and the fact that he has an M.B.A. degree in questioning the veracity of his purported limited income in 2010 and onward. She also properly refused to acknowledge child support payments allegedly made for two non-subject children given the evidence in the record that respondent and the mother of the children lived at the same address, the limited evidence that a valid order existed, and respondent's failure to present any evidence that he was making such payments.

Appeal - Arguments Raised First Time in Reply Papers and Not Addressed by Supreme Court Not Before Appellate Division

In Hayes v Hayes, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 616922 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that defendant's argument on appeal was not properly before the Court, as it was raised for the first time in reply papers submitted to the Supreme Court, and that court did not address it.

Equitable Distribution - Distributive Award - Supreme Court May Not Modify Distributive Award

In Wasserman v Wasserman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 617015 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly denied plaintiff's motion to modify the equitable distribution provisions of the parties' judgment of divorce based on a post-judgment change in circumstances. While the law permits modification of child support and maintenance awards there is no comparable provision allowing modification of equitable distribution awards. Thus, a distributive award pursuant to Domestic Relations Law section 236(B)(5)(e), once made, is not subject to change.

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act § 413 - Unreimbursed Health Care Expenses - Health Insurance Premiums Are Not the Equivalent of "Unreimbursed Health Care Expenses" Pursuant to Family Court Act Former § 413(1)(C)(5)

In Matter of Kreiswirth v. Shapiro, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 518485 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) an order dated January 3, 2006, entered on consent directed that the father pay certain child support for the parties' child, that the mother continue to maintain health insurance coverage for the child through her employer, and that each party pay 50% of "uncovered health care expenses incurred on behalf of the subject child." In 2007, the parties entered into a separation agreement providing that the terms of the order dated January 3, 2006, were to continue. In 2008, the parties' judgment of divorce directed the father to pay for "future reasonable health care" pursuant to the order dated January 3, 2006, and provided that the separation agreement was incorporated but not merged into the judgment. The father paid 50% of the child's health insurance premiums until 2010.

In January 2012, the mother filed a petition seeking to direct the father to pay 50% of the health insurance premiums attributable to the child. The Family Court denied the petition. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that Health insurance premiums are not the equivalent of "unreimbursed health care expenses" pursuant to Family Court Act former § 413(1)(c)(5), which was in effect when the parties entered into the separation agreement. However, the circumstances of this case indicated that the parties intended that health insurance premiums were to be included in the father's obligation to pay 50% of "uncovered health care expenses." The father acknowledged that he interpreted the agreement as requiring him to pay 50% of health insurance premiums, and made those payments until 2010. Accordingly, the mother's petition which was to direct the father to pay 50% of the health insurance premiums attributable to the subject child was granted.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Agreement Provision - a Party May Seek Fees under Both the Statute and an Agreement Provision. While Both Parties Noncompliance May Justify Denial of an Application for Fees under the Agreement, a Statutory Award of Counsel Fees Remains Discretionary

In Momberger v. Momberger, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 530867 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed the denial of plaintiff's motion for termination of his maintenance obligation, but directed defendant to provide plaintiff with certain disclosure required by the parties' separation agreement (97 AD3d 945 [2012]). The agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into the parties' judgment of divorce, contained a provision directing that, in the event of a default requiring either party to retain counsel to enforce the agreement, the losing party to the controversy would pay the successful party's reasonable counsel fees. While the prior appeal was pending, defendant sought appellate counsel fees pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 237, rather than under the parties' agreement and prior to the determination of the appeal, Supreme Court awarded interim appellate counsel fees to defendant pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §§ 237 and 238. After the determination reversing the portion of Supreme Court's prior decision relating to disclosure (97 AD3d at 946-947), plaintiff appealed from the order awarding interim appellate counsel fees to defendant.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that generally, where the parties have agreed to provisions in a settlement agreement which govern the award of attorney's fees, the agreement's provisions, rather than statutory provisions, control. However, a party may seek the recovery of fees under both the statute and an agreement, unless the agreement contains an express waiver of the right to apply under the statute and provided that the party may not recover twice for the same fees. While noncompliance with a separation agreement by both parties may justify denial of an application for fees under the statute as well, a statutory award of counsel fees remains discretionary. Moreover, the statute contains a rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse. The separation agreement did not contain an express waiver of counsel fees under the statute and, thus, the discretionary award was permissible. Although both parties failed to abide by the separation agreement to some extent the interim award of appellate counsel fees pursuant to the Domestic Relations Law was not an abuse of discretion under the circumstances of this case-including defendant's status as the less monied spouse and the fact that she was the party who substantially prevailed on the prior appeal.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order of Support Magistrate-

In Matter of Reid v Moodie, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 452156 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Family Court denied the father's objection to an order denying his motion to vacate an order which dismissed with prejudice his petition to terminate the order of child support. The Appellate Division, in affirming held that Family Court erred in its determination that the objection was untimely, because the record before the Court did not establish that the order denying the father's motion to vacate was served with notice of entry (citing Matter of Belolipskaia v. Guerrand, 65 AD3d 932 [1st Dept 2009]).

Family Court - Support - Family Court Act § 412 - in Deciding Application for Child Support Family Court - Support Magistrate Properly Declined to Award Petitioner Child Care Expenses Incurred on Overseas Trips with Her Mother and the Child. Support Magistrate Erred in Directing Respondent to Make a Provision in His Testamentary Estate for the Child If Life Insurance Is "Unavailable" to Respondent. State's Child Health Insurance Plan Should Not Be Used Where, as Here, One of the Parents Has Health Insurance Benefits That May Be Extended to Cover the Child (Family Ct Act § 416[c], [E][2][iii])

In Matter of Vulpone v. Rose, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 425433 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the Support Magistrate properly declined to award petitioner child care expenses incurred on overseas trips with her mother and the child. The Support Magistrate also properly declined to award petitioner prospective private school expenses for the then-toddler. Although the Support Magistrate properly ordered respondent to obtain life insurance for himself naming the subject child as the beneficiary and petitioner as the child's trustee, it erred in directing respondent to make a provision in his testamentary estate for the child if life insurance is "unavailable" to respondent. The respondent has more than two life insurance policies. If respondent was unable to obtain another life insurance policy for the subject child's benefit, he should be able to add the child as a beneficiary of one of his existing policies. Accordingly, the matter was remanded to the Support Magistrate to order respondent to name the child as the beneficiary and petitioner as the trustee on a term life insurance policy in his name, without any exceptions. It also held that Family Court properly required respondent to place the child on his health insurance plan. The State's child health insurance plan should not be used where, as here, one of the parents has health insurance benefits that may be extended to cover the child (Family Ct Act § 416[c], [e][2][iii]). The Family Court properly declined to direct respondent to make child support payments through the Support Collection Unit. From the time of the temporary order of child support until the final order of support, respondent made the required child support payments directly to petitioner on a timely basis. Petitioner did not provide any reason to change the manner of payment.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Although Respondent's Violence Was Directed Toward Petitioner, it Occurred a Number of Times in the Presence of the Child; Thus the Inclusion of the Child in the Order Was Warranted

In Matter of Coumba F. v. Mamdou D., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 362834 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified an order of the Family Court which directed respondent father, for a period of five years, to stay away from petitioner and to refrain from communicating with her except with regard to the child, to refrain from committing any family offenses against petitioner and the child, and to attend anger management and domestic violence counseling, to direct respondent to complete the anger management and counseling courses within six months of the date of entry of this order, and otherwise affirmed it. It found that the finding of aggravating circumstances was supported by a preponderance of the evidence showing that the child was present during a number of violent incidents directed at petitioner (Family Court Act §§ 827[a][vii]; 842). The evidence also showed that petitioner sustained a physical injury, i.e., pain and bruises after respondent struck her, and back pain for a month, for which she sought medical treatment. Although respondent's violence was directed toward petitioner, it occurred a number of times in the presence of the child; thus the inclusion of the child in the order was warranted. In addition, there was evidence that respondent acted violently toward the child. However, the order permitted court-ordered visitation and contact between respondent and the child, enabling respondent to maintain a relationship with the child.

Referees - Referee to Hear and Report - Judicial Hearing Officer's Report Should Be Confirmed When the Findings Are Substantially Supported by the Record

In *Matter of Stewart v. Property Determination - Separate Property - Banking Law § 675[b] - by Depositing the Proceeds of a Personal Injury Lawsuit in Account Titled Jointly with the Plaintiff, Defendant Created Presumption That the Funds Were Marital. This Presumption May Be Overcome by Evidence That Account Was Titled Jointly as a Matter of Convenience, Without Intention of Creating a Beneficial Interest.

In Signorile v Signorile, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 360530 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly concluded that 90% of a certain personal injury award was the defendant's separate property, even though he placed those funds in an account titled jointly with the plaintiff. The proceeds of an action to recover damages for personal injuries are the separate property of the injured spouse). When spouses hold property in a joint account, however, a rebuttable presumption arises that both have an undivided one-half interest in it (Banking Law § 675[b]. By depositing the proceeds of his personal injury lawsuit in an account titled jointly with the plaintiff, the defendant created the presumption that the funds were marital . This presumption may be overcome, however, by evidence that the account was titled jointly as a matter of convenience, without the intention of creating a beneficial interest, and that the funds in the account originated solely as separate property of the spouse who claims the separate interest. Here, the defendant overcame the presumption that he intended to commingle his funds by establishing that he deposited them in the parties' joint account for only a few days, and then removed the funds and placed them into an account in his name only.

The Appellate Division held that considering, among other factors, the distribution of marital property, the duration of the marriage, the health of the parties, the present and future earning capacity of both parties, and the ability of the plaintiff to become self-supporting Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying the plaintiff an award of spousal maintenance. It also held that Supreme Court properly imputed an annual income of $30,000 to the plaintiff based upon the evidence at trial.

Maintenance - Award - Durational - in Calculating Child Support Error for Supreme Court to Deduct from Wives Income for Federal Insurance Contributions Act Where Plaintiff's Sole Source of Income Was Spousal Maintenance to Be Paid to Her by the Defendant. FICA Taxes Should Be Deducted Only from Income upon Which FICA Taxes Are "Actually Paid" Prior to Applying the Provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(C) and FICA Taxes Are Not Paid from Amounts Received for Maintenance.

In Kaufman v Kaufman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 360596 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Supreme Court, after a nonjury trial, awarded the plaintiff maintenance in the sum of $577 per week until she reaches the age of 66, remarries, or dies, whichever occurs first; directed defendant to continue the plaintiff's health insurance coverage during the period he is obligated to pay maintenance, or until the plaintiff becomes entitled to Medicare or is otherwise insured, whichever is sooner; directed the plaintiff to pay child support of $155 per week for the period from December 2, 2010, until February 28, 2013, $133 per week from "February 29, 2013," until July 18, 2015, and $91 per week from July 19, 2015, until July 24, 2017 and directed the defendant to pay the cost of uncovered health care for the parties' three unemancipated children, the cost of the children's college expenses, and payments toward a certain loan debt.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff maintenance. In calculating the plaintiff's share of child support under Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b] the Supreme Court first deducted a certain amount from her income for Federal Insurance Contributions Act (26 USC, subtit C, ch 21; FICA) taxes. However, in this case, the plaintiff's sole source of income was the spousal maintenance to be paid to her by the defendant. Since FICA taxes should be deducted only from income upon which FICA taxes are "actually paid" prior to applying the provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(c) (Domestic Relations Law §240[1-b][b][5][vii][H]), and since FICA taxes are not paid from amounts received for maintenance, the Supreme Court's calculations were erroneous.

Agreements - Construction - Where, as Here, the Parties' Separation Agreement Contains a Provision That Expressly Provides That Modifications must Be in Writing, an Alleged Oral Modification Is Enforceable Only If There Is Part Performance That Is Unequivocally Referable to the Oral Modification.

In Parker v Navarra, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 362070 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a proceeding to enforce the maintenance provisions of the parties separation agreement which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce, required the defendant to pay one half of the plaintiff's medical insurance premiums the defendant opposed the motion, alleging that the parties had orally modified the maintenance provisions of the separation agreement and, alternatively, that the plaintiff should be equitably estopped from enforcing the maintenance provisions of the separation agreement. The defendant requested an evidentiary hearing so that he could present the testimony of witnesses on those issues, but did not file a cross motion to modify the separation agreement. The Supreme Court denied the defendant's request and, granted the plaintiff the relief that she requested. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that where, as here, the parties' separation agreement contains a provision that expressly provides that modifications must be in writing, an alleged oral modification is enforceable only if there is part performance that is unequivocally referable to the oral modification. The defendant did not demonstrate that the plaintiff's acceptance of reduced monthly maintenance payments was unequivocally referable to an alleged oral modification by, for example, demonstrating that consideration was given in exchange for the plaintiff's alleged oral agreement to accept reduced maintenance payments. Thus, he failed to make a showing sufficient to entitle him to a hearing on this issue.

To establish equitable estoppel, the defendant was required to show that the plaintiff's conduct induced his significant and substantial reliance upon an oral modification, and that the conduct relied upon to establish estoppel was not otherwise compatible with the agreement as written" (Rose v. Spa Realty Assoc., 42 N.Y.2d 338, 344.) The plaintiff's acceptance of the reduced maintenance payments was compatible with the agreement as written, which contained a clause providing that any waiver of strict enforcement of a provision of the agreement did not constitute a waiver of the party's right "to strictly enforce the provision waived at a later time."As the defendant failed to allege facts demonstrating that the plaintiff's conduct was incompatible with the written agreement, the Supreme Court properly denied his request for a hearing on the issue of equitable estoppel.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Maintenance - Award - Nondurational -

In Knobe v Knobe, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 474529 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division concluded that the record did not support an award of nondurational maintenance to plaintiff. The record did not support the Referee's finding that defendant signed an Immigration and Nationalization Form I-864 (I-864 affidavit) providing that "he would be completely liable for the plaintiff's support once she had obtained a visa which allowed her to enter the United States."Additionally, the record did not support the Referee's finding that plaintiff was "unable to work to support herself financially," now or at any point in the future. At the hearing, plaintiff testified that she suffered from certain medical conditions that prevented her from being able to work or to seek job training in the United States, including dizziness, depression, stress, constant tinnitus, and a complete loss of hearing in one ear. Although a person seeking maintenance may submit "general testimony" regarding a medical condition where the effect of that condition on the person's "ability to work is readily apparent without the necessity of expert testimony" (Battinelli v. Battinelli, 174 A.D.2d 503, 504), that was not the case here. Thus, plaintiff was required to submit medical records or expert testimony, which she failed to do. Instead, plaintiff offered a letter from the Social Security Administration that referenced another letter allegedly declaring that plaintiff would have been eligible for disability benefits if she was a United States citizen. A decision of the Social Security Administration may serve as some evidence of a disability, but it is not prima facie evidence thereof (Matter of Frenke v. Frenke, 267 A.D.2d 238, 238). Here, there was no decision in the record, and the letter submitted by plaintiff only referenced a decision. That letter did not indicate the nature, extent or permanence of plaintiff's disability, or the basis for the alleged determination by the Social Security Administration that plaintiff was disabled. Further, the Referee's finding that plaintiff's inability to speak English prevented her from seeking employment was belied by plaintiff's testimony, much of which was in English despite the instructions of the Referee that she testify in Russian and use an interpreter. Thus, based on the statutory factors, including the short duration of the marriage and plaintiff's age, education and job skills, it concluded that plaintiff was entitled to maintenance for a period of six years and modified the judgment accordingly.

Judgments - Amendment - CPLR 5019(a) - Mistakes Contemplated for Correction Are Mere Ministerial Ones, Not Those Involving New Exercises of Discretion or a Further Turn of the Fact-finding Wheel

In Meenan v Meenan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 474741 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the wife appealed from an amended judgment that incorporated by reference the terms of a letter decision and modified the judgment of divorce with respect to maintenance and child support arrears in accordance with that decision. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff's motion and applying CPLR 5019(a) to amend the judgment by changing the amount of the husband's maintenance and child support arrears. It observed that CPLR 5019(a) provides that "[a] judgment or order shall not be stayed, impaired or affected by any mistake, defect or irregularity in the papers or procedures in the action not affecting a substantial right of a party. A trial or an appellate court may require the mistake, defect or irregularity to be cured."The court's power to amend orders or judgments under that statute is limited, however, to correcting orders or judgments that contain "a mistake, defect, or irregularity not affecting a substantial right of a party, or [that are] inconsistent with the decision upon which they are based." The kinds of mistakes contemplated for correction pursuant to CPLR 5019 (a) are mere ministerial ones, not those involving new exercises of discretion or a further turn of the fact-finding wheel" (Herpe v. Herpe, 225 N.Y. 323, 327). "The rule has long been settled and inflexibly applied that the trial court has no revisory or appellate jurisdiction to correct by amendment error in substance affecting the judgment. It cannot, by amendment, change the judgment in matter of substance for error committed on the trial or in the decision, or limit the legal effect of it to meet some supposed equity subsequently called to its attention or subsequently arising. It cannot correct judicial errors either of commission or omission. Those errors are, under our system of procedure, to be corrected either by the vacating of the judgment or by an appeal" (Herpe, 225 N.Y. at 327). A court has no power to reduce or increase the amount of a judgment when there is no clerical error. This case did not involve an inconsistency between the judgment and an underlying decision or stipulation of the parties. Rather, the husband sought the correction of "[m]istakes of [f]act," i.e., the court's allegedly erroneous calculation of a credit for maintenance and support payments made by the husband during the pendency of the action in accordance with a temporary order, and the court's failure to credit him for the wife's equitable share of premiums he paid for the children's medical insurance. The court, however, was not empowered to amend the judgment substantively "to meet some supposed equity subsequently called to its attention" (Herpe, 225 N.Y. at 327).

Child Custody - Right to Counsel - FCA § 262 - Respondents in Visitation Proceedings Are Entitled to Assigned Counsel

In Matter of Wright v. Walker, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 387336 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court which granted the mothers petition to modify an order of custody entered upon consent, which inter alia, awarded the grandmother, the mother, and respondent Kevin Noltee, the child's father, joint legal custody of the child and awarded the grandmother primary physical custody of the child. In her petition, the mother did not seek to modify custody but, rather, she sought only visitation with the child in the mother's own home. Family Court granted the petition. The Appellate Division observed that Family Court Act § 262(a)(iii) provides that the court must advise respondents "in any proceeding under part three of article six of this act" of their right to be represented by counsel of their own choosing, their right to an adjournment to confer with counsel, and their right to have counsel assigned by the court in any case where they are financially unable to obtain their own counsel. The Court concurred with the result reach by the Second and Third Departments, which have held that respondents in visitation proceedings are entitled to assigned counsel (see e.g. Matter of Samuel v. Samuel, 33 AD3d 1010, 1010-1011; Matter of Wilson v. Bennett, 282 A.D.2d 933, 934). Although ... the word ' visitation' does not appear anywhere in Family Court Act § 262, a proceeding to modify a prior order of visitation plainly is a proceeding under Family Court Act article 6, part 3 and, hence, falls within the purview of the assigned counsel statute. The grandmother, as a respondent in a proceeding under Family Court Act article six, part three, was entitled to be advised of her right to assigned counsel and to be provided with assigned counsel, if financially eligible. The deprivation of a party's fundamental right to counsel in a custody or visitation proceeding requires reversal, without regard to the merits of the unrepresented party's position. It reversed the order and remitted the matter to Family Court for further proceedings on the petition.

Child Support - Award - DRL § 240(1-b)(c)(7) - Educational Expenses

In Belec v. Belec, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 387872 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Referee did not abuse his discretion in ordering the father to pay 40% of the child's private elementary school tuition. A court may award educational expenses "[w]here [it] determines, having regard for the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties and in the best interests of the child, and as justice requires, that the present or future provision of ... private ... education for the child is appropriate" (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][7]). The evidence established that the parties agreed to send the child to a certain private school rather than the public school where they resided, and at the time of the trial the child had been in that school for three years and was thriving. Although the father testified that he wanted the child to attend the public school in the district where he now lived, there was no evidence that the child could attend that school, that it was in her best interests to attend that school, or that the father was financially unable to provide the necessary funds for the private school.

Child Support - Modification - Family Court Was Empowered to 'Make, with or Without Holding a New Hearing, its Own Findings of Fact

In Matter of Jeffery v. Sprague, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 387999 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of Family Court that granted respondent father's objections to the order of the Support Magistrate and denied the petition for an increase in child support. It rejected the mother's contention that, in determining whether to grant the objections to the Support Magistrate's order, the court was limited to determining whether the Support Magistrate abused his discretion. Family Court "was empowered to 'make, with or without holding a new hearing, its own findings of fact. Thus, the court had broad authority to review the order of the Support Magistrate and to grant a party's objections to the order upon determining that it would impose a hardship on that party.

Surrogates Court

Estates - Disqualification as Surviving Spouse - Standard Used to Determine If a Surviving Spouse Abandoned Decedent Is Same Standard Used to Determine Whether the Party Would Have Been Entitled to Separation or Divorce on Grounds of Abandonment.

In Matter of Estate of Hama, 957 N.Y.S.2d 583, 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 22378 (Surr. Ct, NY County) Decedent's wife, a non-resident alien, petitioned for issuance of letters of administration to herself and her designee. Decedent's parents, also non-resident aliens, cross-petitioned for issuance of letters of administration to their designee, who moved for order consolidating administration proceedings with a declaratory judgment action and summary judgment dismissing the other administration petition, revoking temporary letters issued to surviving spouse's designee, granting letters of administration to him, and declaring that decedent's wife was not a spouse for purposes of his annuity contract. Decedent's wife and her designee filed cross-motion for summary judgment dismissing cross-petition and adjudging her to be the default beneficiary of decedent's annuity contract.

The narrow issue before the court was whether Yuko Machida abandoned her husband, Shoichiro Hama, and therefore has forfeited the rights with respect to his estate that would otherwise accrue to her as his surviving spouse (EPTL 5-1.2[a][5]).

The Surrogate observed that the applicable statute, EPTL 5-1.2, provides as follows: "Disqualification as surviving spouse "(a) A husband or wife is a surviving spouse within the meaning, and for the purposes of 4-1.1, 5-1.1, 5-1.1-A, 5-1.3, 5-3.1 and 5-4.4, unless it is established satisfactorily to the court having jurisdiction of the action or proceeding that: ... (5) The spouse abandoned the deceased spouse, and such abandonment continued until the time of death." The statute contains no definition of "abandonment," but historically, the courts have recognized the requirements of the DRL as implicit in the EPTL. That is, "[t]he standard used to determine if a surviving spouse abandoned the decedent is the same standard used to determine whether the party would have been entitled to a decree of separation [or divorce] on grounds of abandonment". "To constitute abandonment under this statute something more is necessary than a departure from the marital abode or living apart To amount to abandonment the departure of a spouse from the marital home must be unjustified and without the consent of the other spouse ". Matter of Maiden, 284 N.Y. 429, 432, 31 N.E.2d 889 (1940)). That abandonment must include a lack of consent by the spouse who has been left continues as the law to this day (Matter of Morris, 69 A.D.3d 635, 893 N.Y.S.2d 161 [2d Dept.2010] [even if decedent and the surviving spouse have been living separately for decades, without evidence that the spouse's departure was without decedent's consent, there can be no finding of abandonment]). The burden of proof as to abandonment,- including lack of consent - is on the party alleging it (Matter of Rechtschaffen, 278 N.Y. 336, 16 N.E.2d 357 [1938]).

The Surrogate's Court held that decedent's parents failed to show that his wife had abandoned her husband so that she had forfeited rights with respect to his estate that would otherwise accrue to her as his surviving spouse under Estates, Powers and Trusts Law. The Surrogate held that on the facts presented here, decedent's parents could meet that burden. She noted that the abandonment disqualification of EPTL 5-1.2(5) applies to several distinct issues relating to a decedent's estate: the right to serve as administrator (SCPA 1001), the right to an intestate share (EPTL 4-1.1), and the right to elect against a will in which the surviving spouse is left less than one-third of the decedent's estate (EPTL 5-1.1-A). Like so much of the law, the purpose of the disqualification statute in each of these areas is based on assumptions which have, over time, evolved into policy. These assumptions (and the resulting policies) are, in turn, grounded in the conditions and mores of a particular society, at a particular time. (Citing 1 Henry H. Foster Jr., et al., Law and the Family New York, Divorce, Separation and Annulments 6.1 at 348-349 [2nd ed. 1987] ["Foster, Freed & Brandes"]). The Court observed that the importation of strict definition of abandonment in the old fault-based Domestic Relations Law into EPTL for purposes of determining intestate succession or right of spousal election might be due for reappraisal and discussed this issue at length.

Family Court - Paternity - Meritorious Claim - Where there is proof in the record that a man other than the respondent has had intercourse with the petitioner during the critical time period, the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to Support the Petitioners Claim to Paternity.

In Matter of Cecil R v Rachel A,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 221611 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court, which, after a hearing, denied petitioner's motion to vacate an order dismissing his paternity petition on default. While petitioner demonstrated a reasonable excuse for his default in appearing, he failed to show a meritorious claim of paternity. Petitioner testified that, although he knew of the child's birth within the year after she was born, he did not believe he was the father because of the mother's lifestyle. This testimony tended to undermine petitioner's claim, which he was required to prove by clear and convincing evidence. Where there is proof in the record that a man other than the respondent has had intercourse with the petitioner during the critical time period, the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law. The record also supported the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel to preclude petitioner from pursuing his paternity claim. Petitioner waited almost four years after the child's birth before commencing the paternity proceeding, during which time he failed to communicate with her or provide any financial support. The child, who had been removed from her mother's care at the age of five months, lived with Jason A. and his extended family and an order of filiation was issued in 2007 declaring Jason A. her father. It agreed with the court that it was not in the child's best interests to interfere with her relationship with the only father she had ever known.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - Summary Judgment -

In Matter of Angela C v Harris K, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 322635 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which, inter alia, granted petitioner mother's motion for summary judgment on her family offense petition, finding that respondent father committed acts that constituted aggravated harassment in the second degree, and awarded her a five-year order of protection directing respondent to, inter alia, stay away from and cease communication with her and the parties' child. Respondent's conviction on four counts of aggravated harassment in the second degree as to petitioner served as conclusive proof of the underlying facts in the proceeding, since he had a full and fair opportunity to contest the issues raised in the criminal proceeding. The Family Court properly found aggravating circumstances, based on respondent's conduct in sending harassing letters to petitioner from prison in repeated violation of the prior order of protection (FCA § 827[a] [vii]), his criminal conviction of four counts of aggravated harassment with regard to petitioner, and his aggressive threatening conduct in court, which the court observed and determined constituted an immediate and ongoing threat to petitioner. Although respondent's threats were directed at petitioner, they impacted upon the child, and thus the Family Court properly issued a five-year order of protection in favor of both the mother and the child. A full stay-away order was also appropriate, since the father had no relationship with the then six-year-old child due to his incarceration from the time the child was only four months old.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - But Error to Consider Post Petition Events

In Matter of Maria C v Jaime G, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 174082 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which dismissed the family offense petition for an order of protection finding Petitioner failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that respondent committed a family offense (Family Court Act § 832). It held that Petitioner was correct that the court erred in taking judicial notice of post-petition orders of protection issued against her in favor of respondent. However, in light of the court's finding that petitioner's testimony was incredible, the error was harmless.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Child Support - Modification - Downward - Inability to Work - Burden of Proof - Modification Denied for Failure to Prove Loss of Employment Not Father's Fault and He Diligently Sought Re-employment Commensurate With Earning Capacity.

In Anderson v Anderson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 238756 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order which granted defendant downward modification of a child support obligation contained in a stipulation of settlement. It observed that to obtain such relief, the defendant was required to demonstrate "a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances since the entry of the judgment of divorce" (citing Matter of Peterson v. Peterson, 75 AD3d 512, 512; see L.2010, ch 182, §s 13; Matter of Riendeau v. Riendeau, 95 AD3d 891, 892; Matter of Karagiannis v. Karagiannis, 73 AD3d 1064, 1065). Among several factors that may be considered on a motion for downward modification of child support, a court may consider whether "a supporting parent's claimed financial difficulties are the result of that parent's intentional conduct" (Matter of Knights v.. Knights, 71 N.Y.2d 865, 866). The record demonstrated that the defendant's financial difficulties were the result of his intentional criminal conduct and subsequent incarceration. Although the defendant averred that he was forced to shut down his businesses in 2007 due to a federal criminal investigation, and at some point began cooperating with the federal government, he did not aver that the federal authorities prevented him from obtaining any other form of employment or from earning income prior to his incarceration in 2011. Nonetheless, the defendant did not offer any evidence of efforts he made during those years to earn money. The evidence showed that during that time the defendant simply continued to deplete a child support reserve held in escrow without replenishing it, even though he was required by the terms of the parties' stipulation to replenish the account. Accordingly, the defendant failed to show a substantial and unanticipated change of circumstances warranting a reduction of his child support obligation.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Pre-Marital Debt - No Credit for Paying Debts Obligated to Pay by Pendente Lite Order and Personal Debts Incurred after the Commencement Date

In Heyman v Heyman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 238767 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that upon the commencement of this divorce action, the marital partnership ceased for the purposes of equitable distribution of property. Upon the termination of the marital partnership, the plaintiff could use marital property to satisfy joint familial obligations such as educational expenses of the children incurred during the pendency of the action. However, in his trial testimony, the plaintiff admitted that he used the distributions from his deferred compensation account to pay his share of expenses which the parties agreed to split evenly, as well as to pay his obligations pursuant to a pendente lite order which directed him to pay the defendant child support of $3,000 per month, retroactive to December 2009, plus an attorney's fee of $15,000. Since those obligations were the sole obligations of the plaintiff, his use of marital funds to make those payments was improper, and the defendant was entitled to her equitable share of those funds. Accordingly, the defendant was entitled to 50% of all distributions from the deferred compensation account, retroactive to the date of the commencement of this action.

In light of the defendant's earning capacity and the distribution of marital property, the Appellate Division declined to disturb the Supreme Court's determination denying the defendant maintenance. It was undisputed that the parties enjoyed a high standard of living during the marriage, which they could no longer afford after the plaintiff lost his high-paying position. At the time of the trial, the plaintiff was employed again, at a lesser salary. The marital standard of living and the pendente lite child support award of $3,000 per month was relevant to what would constitute a just and appropriate child support award. There was no basis to limit the child support award to the statutory cap of the first $130,000 of combined parental income. In view of the standard of living enjoyed by the children during the marriage, and the earnings and assets of the parties, the Appellate Division deemed it appropriate that the child support award be based upon total combined parental income. It declined to disturb the Supreme Court's determination that the defendant was not entitled to an attorney's fee. In light of the substantial distributive award in her favor, she was capable of paying for her own attorney.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Presumption Rebutted - Not Improvident Exercise its Discretion in Denying Interim Counsel Fees Where No Significant Disparity in the Parties' Financial Circumstances

In Kaminash v. Levi,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 238773 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the wife's motion for an award of interim counsel fees, to direct the plaintiff to pay all fees for services rendered by the attorney for the child and the forensic evaluator, and to direct the plaintiff to pay for certain translation and linguistic services. It observed that an award of interim counsel fees ensures that the nonmonied spouse will be able to litigate the action, and do so on equal footing with the monied spouse. Such an award is generally warranted where there is a significant disparity in the financial circumstances of the parties. Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in denying the defendant's motion for an award of interim counsel fees, since the record demonstrated that there was no significant disparity in the parties' financial circumstances. Similarly, the court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in denying defendant's motion to direct the plaintiff to pay all fees for services rendered by the attorney for the child and the forensic evaluator.

Child Support - Waiver - Child Support Payments May Be Waived Prospectively, Before the Obligation to Make Such Payments Has Accrued. The Party Claiming a Waiver must Come Forward with Evidence of a Voluntary and Intentional Relinquishment of a Known and Otherwise Enforceable Right to Child Support.

In Tafuro v Tafuro, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 238835 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were divorced in 2004 and the mother was awarded residential custody of their three children. The father was directed to pay biweekly child support to the mother of $522. In September 2008, the parties' child H. began living with the father. The parties' two other children, at various times from 2008 until the date of the petition, also lived with the father. In November 2010, the father petitioned for a termination of the child support order on the ground that the children resided with him. The parties thereafter agreed that the child support payments from the father to the mother should cease on the ground that the father had residential custody of the children and Family Court terminated the child support order. The mother subsequently filed a petition to recover child support arrears of $15,314. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate granted the petition. The father objected on the ground that the mother had waived prospective child support payments after the children began living with him. The Supreme Court denied the father's objections.

The Appellate Division modified the order. It observed that child support payments may be waived prospectively, before the obligation to make such payments has accrued. A mere change in custody is insufficient to constitute a waiver of child support. Rather, the party claiming a waiver must come forward with evidence of a voluntary and intentional relinquishment of a known and otherwise enforceable right to child support. The record demonstrated, and the mother did not dispute, that H. lived with the father beginning in September 2008. The father presented a letter dated September 28, 2008, which was signed by the mother, in which the parties agreed that the mother would not seek child support for H. and that the father, in turn, would not seek child support from the mother. The mother's express waiver of her future child support payments for H. was valid and enforceable. However, the evidence adduced at the hearing did not warrant the conclusion that the mother waived her future child support payments as to the parties' other two children. The father's objection to so much of the Support Magistrate's order as awarded child support arrears for H. should have been granted.

Right to Counsel - Family Ct Act §262[a] - County Law § 722 -D - Support Magistrate Property Directed Respondent to Pay the Attorney Assigned to Represent Him the Difference Between the Amount the Attorney Would Charge a Privately Retained Client for the Services Rendered and the Amount the Attorney Claimed from the Assigned Counsel Plan

In Matter of Cherrez v Lazo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 163839 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed Respondent to pay the attorney assigned to represent him the difference between the amount the attorney would charge a privately retained client for the services rendered and the amount the attorney claimed from the assigned counsel plan. It observed that County Law § 722-d provides that, "[w]henver it appears that the defendant is financially able to obtain counsel or to make partial payment for the representation or other services, counsel may report this fact to the court and the court may terminate the assignment of counsel or authorize payment, as the interests of justice may dictate, to the public defender, private legal aid bureau or society, private attorney, or otherwise." The record supported the Support Magistrate's assessment of the father's financial circumstances, including his income and the properties he owned. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the father's objection to the Support Magistrate's determination.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order of Support Magistrate-Party Challenging Support Magistrate's Order must Make Specific Objections to Preserve Such Challenges for Review

In Matter of Cherrez v Lazo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 163840 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court, which, after a hearing, dismissed the petition to modify a prior order of support. It observed that Family Court Act § 439(e) provides, in pertinent part, that "[s]pecific written objections to a final order of a support magistrate may be filed by either party with the [Family Court] within thirty days after receipt of the order in court or by personal service, or, if the objecting party or parties did not receive the order in court or by personal service, thirty-five days after mailing of the order to such party or parties." An order of a Support Magistrate is final, and the Family Court's review of objections to such an order is the equivalent of appellate review. As such, the party challenging the Support Magistrate's order is required to make specific objections in order to preserve such challenges. Since the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order were not specific within the meaning of Family Court Act § 439(e), the Family Court properly denied his objections on that ground.

Child Support - Enforcement - Where Court Fails to Allocate Specific Amounts for Maintenance and Child Support, Judgment for Arrears of Child Support Can't Be Entered until the Award Is Redetermined by the Court That Issued the Order

In Matter of Fixman v Fixman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 163842 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a child support proceeding pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, the petitioner contended on appeal that the Family Court erred in failing to award child support arrears which were allegedly due and owing pursuant to a pendente lite order of the Supreme Court, Nassau County. The Appellate Division rejected her argument holding that where, as here, a court fails to allocate specific amounts for maintenance and child support, the proper action is for the matter to be redetermined by the court that issued the order. Family Court properly declined to allocate the total amount set forth in the pendente lite order or to award arrears at this time, as the pendente lite order was not issued by it.

Child Custody - Relocation - Relocation Not in Child's Best Interests Where No Showing Child Would Benefit from Economic Stability and Security Move Would Bring.

In Williams v Epps, 101 A.D.3d 1695, 956 N.Y.S.2d 773 (4th Dept, 2012) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the mother's petition seeking permission for the parties' child to relocate with her to Atlanta, Georgia. Although the mother testified that she was offered a position as a hair stylist at a salon in Atlanta, there was little evidence adduced concerning the salary, benefits, hours of work, and other incidentals of the employment. In addition, as of the time of the hearing, the child had regular and meaningful access with respondent father, as well as with the child's maternal and paternal extended family. Inasmuch as the mother failed to establish that the lives of the mother and the child would be 'enhanced economically or educationally by the move (Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d 727, 741) and the credible evidence supported the court's determination that the child's relationship with the father and other relatives in the Buffalo area would be adversely affected by the proposed relocation, the mother failed to meet her burden of establishing that relocation is in the child's best interests.

Supreme Court

Family Court - Support - Family Court Act § 412 - in Deciding Application for Spousal Support Family Court May Not Consider Veteran's Disability Benefits but May Consider Social Security Payments

In Alvarado v Alvarado, 2013 WL 196521 (N.Y.Sup.), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 50077(U) the husband sought an order declaring the disability benefits payable to him by Social Security and by the Veterans Administration to be separate property not to be considered for purposes of equitable distribution or maintenance. The husband argued that these benefits were not subject to consideration as the Uniformed Services Former Spouse's Protection Act declares them to be separate property. 10 U.S.C. § 1408 (2009). The Parties were married on June 21, 1980. Prior to the marriage Husband served in the United States Marine Corps from 1965 until 1969. As a result of his military service Husband received monthly veteran's disability benefits.

Supreme Court observed that the Third and Fourth Departments have held that state courts are prohibited from distributing veteran's disability benefits in an action for divorce. (Citing Hoskins v. Skojec, 265 A.D.2d 706 (3d Dept.1999); See also Newman v. Newman, 248 A.D.2d 990 (4th Dept.1998). While disability benefits obtained from other sources may be considered for purposes of maintenance, veteran's disability payments are precluded from consideration. (Citing 10 U.S.C. § 1408; Carl v. Carl, 58 AD3d 1036 (3d Dept.2009). It rejected the wife's argument that Nizolek v. Nizolek, 93 AD3d 934 (3d Dept.2012) was controlling on the issue of veteran's disability benefits. In Nizolek, the Third Department held that the Family Court, deciding an application for spousal support in an ongoing marriage, may consider veteran's disability benefits "under the broad language of Family Court Act § 412". However, the Court expressly distinguished an application for "spousal support" under the Family Court Act from an application for "maintenance" under Domestic Relations Law § 236(B). In an action for divorce the Court may not order the allocation of veteran's disability benefits absent a contractual agreement between the parties. (Citing Mills v. Mills, 22 AD3d 1003 (3d. Dept.2005); Hoskins, Supra at 707). The husband's motion was granted to the extent that his veteran's disability benefits were not to be included in the marital estate at trial for purposes of equitable distribution or maintenance.

The husband also received social security disability benefits. The Court observed that it has been held that Social Security Disability Benefits are separate property and are not subject to equitable distribution. However, it held that Social Security Disability Benefits, unlike veteran's disability benefits, are to be considered by the Court when determining a payor spouses ability to pay maintenance. (Citing Cerabona v. Cerabona, 302 A.D.2d 346 (2d Dept.2003); Carl, Supra at 1037.)

Family Court

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act § 412 - Jurisdiction - Family Court Has No Jurisdiction to Enforce a Child Support Agreement

In Matter of Kristina Lynn B. v. Joseph T.M., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 310247 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) Family Court held that the Support Magistrate correctly determined that the father was responsible for 71% of his son's private school tuition even though the mother agreed that she would pay the full cost of that tuition. These parents had two children, ages 10 and 12. The mother switched her oldest son, then in sixth grade, from a local public school to Christian Brothers Academy (CBA) for reasons related to the child's emotional circumstances, the learning environment and bullying issues at the public school. The mother sought a tuition contribution from the father pursuant to FCA §

413(1)(c)(7). Both parents conceded that they agreed to send their child to private school. The mother also conceded that she agreed to pay the full tuition. The Court observed that FCA § 413(1)(c)(7) reads as follows: “ Where the court determines, having regard for the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties and in the best interests of the child, and as justice requires, that the present or future provision of post-secondary, private, special, or enriched education for the child is appropriate, the court may award educational expenses. The non-custodial parent shall pay educational expenses, as awarded, in a manner determined by the court, including direct payment to the educational provider.” The father consented to his son attending private school.

The court held that the parents' agreement that the mother would pay for CBA was not relevant to the outcome of these objections because Family Court has no authority to enforce contracts (citing Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 397 N.Y.S.2d 701, 366 N.E.2d 791; Brescia v. Fitts, 56 N.Y.2d 132, 451 N.Y.S.2d 68, 436 N.E.2d 518). Because Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction, it has no authority to rule on such issues. Its jurisdiction is limited, in this case, to applying FCA § 413(1)(c)(7) to the evidence. The interpretation of an oral contract between the parties or imposing equitable relief is beyond this Court's authority.

The Family Court found that the Magistrate's finding that the father should be responsible for his proportional share of the son's private school expenses possesses a sound and substantial basis in the record. It was also established that the father's income increased by 41% or $44,600 since the last support order, which was the judgment of divorce issued in 2007. The Court observed that the language of FCA §413(1)(c)(7) does not command any formula with respect to apportionment of private school tuition. However, it no reason to deviate from the proportionate formula set forth in FCA § 413(1)(c)(5)(v) that governs reimbursement for uninsured health costs and day care.

Domestic Relations Law § 234 - Injunctions Pendente Lite - Pursuant to DRL § 234, Supreme Court Can Order Defendant to Pay 50% of the Balances Owed on the Mortgages on the Marital Residence

In Nederlander v. Nederlander, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 28258 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.)the Appellate Division affirmed an order of Supreme Court which ordered defendant to pay 50% of the balances owed on the mortgages on the marital residence in the event that he was unable to refinance the mortgages or obtain extensions of the mortgage notes. It noted that Domestic Relations Law § 234 empowers the court to "make such direction, between the parties, concerning the possession of property, as in the court's discretion justice requires having regard to the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties." Accordingly, pursuant to DRL § 234, the court can not only order that a party turn over marital property, but also that he or she refrain from transferring or disposing of it. The power to issue preliminary injunctions affecting property in divorce actions stems from the recognition that while spouses have no legal or beneficial interest in marital property prior to a judgment of divorce, they nevertheless have an expectancy in that property. Thus, in order to protect that expectancy pending equitable distribution, to maintain the status quo, and to prevent the dissipation of marital property, the court must be able to issue orders to ensure that such marital property is protected should it later become the subject of equitable distribution. The motion court's order, was a proper exercise of its discretion pursuant to DRL §234. The record indicated that the bank was planning to foreclose on the marital residence and that defendant, in failing to submit a requested application and financial information to the bank until after the motion was made, months after the same was requested by the bank, and months after plaintiff submitted her information and application to the bank, was either by design or neglect contributing to the foreclosure. To ensure that the marital home would not be lost to foreclosure, prior to trial and a final judgment of divorce, the court providently exercised its discretion in ordering defendant to cooperate in obtaining an extension of the loans and/or a refinancing of the loans. For the very same reasons, despite defendant's purported inability to pay half of the outstanding mortgages on the marital home, the court properly ordered that he do so if he was unsuccessful in refinancing or obtaining an extension.

The Appellate Division held that the court did not err in implicitly concluding that defendant had the ability to pay half of the outstanding mortgages. While defendant claimed that he lacked the financial resources to comply with the court's order, his deposition testimony evinced that he had access to seemingly unlimited financial resources, which were justifiably imputed to defendant as income and/or assets. At his deposition, defendant testified that while he only earned approximately $700 per week as an employee with his father's company, all of his bills, both personal and business, were, and had been paid by his father. Defendant further testified that all of his bills were mailed directly to his father's company where they were then reviewed by defendant's assistant. Thereafter, defendant's father wired funds to the company's account sufficient to cover defendant's expenses, defendant's assistant then draws company checks, and defendant then executes them. Thus, the record evinced significant distributions to defendant from his family business during the marriage and that defendant received support from his father extending over several years. While defendant characterized his father's aid as loans, totaling $4 million at the time of his deposition, and as per his statement of net worth, over $6.5 million in 2010, he nevertheless testified that he had not paid his father back. Based on the foregoing, the substantial and ongoing financial aid provided to defendant by his father was either a gift, imputable as income or a benefit provided to defendant by his father's company, also imputable as income.

The Court rejected defendant's contention that the motion court's order constituted prejudgment equitable distribution of marital property. The motion court never made any determination as to the parties' interests in the marital residence. Nor did the motion court order the equitable distribution of the marital property pendente lite.

Attorneys - CPLR 321 - Automatic Stay - No Automatic Stay Where Voluntary Withdrawal of Counsel

Parties - Joinder - Proper to Join in Action Third Party Who Controls Spouses Finances, or Possesses Assets That Can Be Imputed to Spouse

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Third Party Can Be Directed, as Agent, to Satisfy Spouses Pendente Lite Obligations.

In Shurka v Shurka, 100 A.D.3d 566, 955 N.Y.S.2d 12 (1 Dept, 2012) Supreme Court granted a motion to join appellant as a party to the matrimonial action and to require appellant to turn over defendant's proportionate share of payments on certain promissory notes, to pay to defendant plaintiff's support and other obligations pursuant to a September 10, 2008 pendente lite order, to provide certain discovery to defendant, and to surrender her passports.

The Appellate Division modified the order, on the law, to the extent of denying that part of the motion seeking to require appellant to surrender her passports and vacated that part of the order directing appellant to pay plaintiff's obligations under the pendente lite order, and remanded the matter for an evidentiary hearing consistent with its decision and otherwise affirmed. It held that appellant was not entitled to an automatic stay of the proceedings pursuant to CPLR 321(c), because counsel withdrew pursuant to a voluntary discharge. It also held that the court properly granted defendant leave to amend her pleadings to assert claims against appellant and to join appellant as a party to the action (CPLR 3025[b]). Defendant presented evidence that plaintiff had fled the country, that appellant was the chief financial officer of the umbrella organization, Signature Investment Group (SIG), which held all of plaintiff's assets, and that appellant has administered and controlled the payment of the promissory notes on which defendant was a payee, thus creating a fiduciary relationship between defendant and appellant (CPLR 1001; 1003; Solomon v. Solomon, 136 A.D.2d 697, 698, 523 N.Y.S.2d 900 [2d Dept.1988]). The court also properly ordered appellant to produce documents related to SIG and the other companies involved, and to pay to defendant her proportionate past and future payments on the promissory notes, which it appears appellant had withheld at plaintiff's direction. The notes directed a substantial portion of the annual payments to defendant; moreover, they were an unconditional promises to pay. It noted that plaintiff has failed to comply with a previous order directing him to turn over these proceeds to defendant.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should have held a hearing on defendant's request to have appellant arrange for the payment of support and other expenses due under the September 10, 2008 pendente lite order. Defendant submitted evidence showing that throughout the parties' marriage, appellant, who was a signatory on the parties' joint personal bank account, deposited funds into, and paid bills from, that account. Defendant also pointed to evidence showing that appellant controlled the finances of the family businesses that held plaintiff's assets. In response, appellant submitted an affidavit stating that she did not pay, either personally or as CFO of the businesses, any of plaintiff's personal expenses. In light of this factual dispute, a hearing was necessary on these issues. It was true that appellant had no obligation to use her own personal funds to make support payments to defendant. However, an issue of fact existed as to whether appellant was acting as plaintiff's agent, or was otherwise in control of plaintiff's finances, including his share of funds or loan payments due from the family businesses. Having been properly joined in this action, to the extent appellant controls plaintiff's finances, or possesses assets that can be imputed to plaintiff, she can be directed, in that capacity, to satisfy plaintiff's pendente lite obligations.

The Appellate Division held that there was no basis for ordering appellant to surrender her passports. While plaintiff had fled the country, there was no evidence that appellant presented a similar flight risk.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Right to Counsel - Family Ct Act §262[a] - Waiver - Court must Determine First That Waiver Made Knowingly, Intelligently, and Voluntarily and must Be a Showing That the Party 'Was Aware of the Dangers and Disadvantages of Proceeding Without Counsel

In re Stephen D.A.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6684732 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a parent in a proceeding pursuant to Social Services Law § 384-b to terminate parental rights has the right to the assistance of counsel (Family Ct Act §262[a][iv]). Although a party to such a proceeding may waive that right and proceed without counsel, the court must first determine that the decision to do so is made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily (People v. Arroyo, 98 N.Y.2d 101, 103). In determining whether the waiver of the right to counsel meets this requirement, the court must conduct a " 'searching inquiry' " of the party (Matter of Stephen D.A. [Sandra M.], 87 AD3d at 736, quoting Matter of Kathleen K. [Steven K.], 17 NY3d 380, 385). "Although there is no 'rigid formula' as to the questions the court needs to ask for counsel waivers, there must be a showing that the party 'was aware of the dangers and disadvantages of proceeding without counsel' " (Matter of Jetter v. Jetter, 43 AD3d at 822, quoting People v. Providence, 2 NY3d 579, 582).

In light of the Court's determination on the prior appeals that the Family Court failed to conduct the requisite "searching inquiry" at the proceeding conducted on June 9, 2009, it reversed the order of fact-finding and disposition and remitted to Family Court, for a new fact-finding hearing and a new determination thereafter.

Child Support - Modification - Downward - Inability to Work - Burden of Proof - Modification Denied for Failure to Prove Loss of Employment Not Father's Fault and He Diligently Sought Re-employment Commensurate With Earning Capacity.

In Matter of DaVolio v. DaVolio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6684758 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that the child support provisions contained in a stipulation of settlement incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce should not be disturbed unless there has been a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances since the entry of the judgment of divorce. A parent's loss of employment may constitute a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances justifying a downward modification of child support where the termination occurred through no fault of the parent and the parent has diligently sought re-employment commensurate with his or her earning capacity. It held that the Family Court properly denied the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's finding that the father was not entitled to a downward modification of his child support obligation. The father did not testify credibly regarding the reasons and circumstances surrounding his departure from his former employment and he failed to adduce sufficient credible evidence to satisfy his burden of establishing that he lost his employment through no fault of his own and that he diligently sought re-employment commensurate with his earning capacity.

Grandparent Visitation - DRL §72 - Merits of Case - Although "Animosity Coupled with Family Dysfunction May Provide Basis for Denying Visitation Rights," the "Existence of Animosity Between the Parties Alone" Cannot Provide Such a Basis.

In Matter of Gray v Varone, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6684763 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), in reversing an order which determined that the grandmother did not have standing to seek visitation with her grandchild, the Appellate Division pointed out that when a grandparent seeks visitation pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 72(1) , the court must make a two-part inquiry. First, it must find that the grandparent has standing, based on, inter alia, equitable considerations. If it concludes that the grandparent has established standing to petition for visitation, then the court must determine if visitation is in the best interests of the child. Here, the petitioner established a prima facie case of standing to seek visitation with the child and demonstrated, prima facie, that the parents' objection to contact between the child and the petitioner was based solely on animosity between the parties. Although "animosity coupled with family dysfunction may provide a basis for denying visitation rights," the "existence of animosity between the parties alone" cannot provide such a basis.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Where Criminal Court Order of Protection Barring Contact Between Parent and a Child Includes Provides Order Is Subject to Subsequent Family Court Orders of Custody and Visitation, Family Court Permitted to Release Child to Custody of That Parent.

In re Brianna L., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6684767 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the mother was arrested and later charged with assault in the second degree for allegedly beating her son Elijah L., who was then six years old. Thereafter, the Administration for Children's Services commenced neglect proceedings against the mother, alleging that she had neglected Elijah by inflicting excessive corporal punishment on him and, as a result, had derivatively neglected her daughter, Brianna L., who was then eight years old. On February 14, 2012, in Criminal Court, Queens County, the mother entered a plea of guilty to endangering the welfare of a child, and was sentenced to a conditional discharge, with the requirement that she complete ACS's service plan, which included completion of a parenting skills course and an anger management program. A final order of protection was issued by the Criminal Court, barring the mother from any contact with Elijah until February 13, 2017. On March 12, 2012, a finding of neglect was entered with respect to the children. At a dispositional hearing ACS provided the Family Court with an Investigation and Report which stated that the mother had cooperated with all services, completed a parenting skills course and an anger management program, and "was capable of caring for the children." The matter was adjourned to allow the parties to seek an amendment of the order of protection. On May 8, 2012, during the continued dispositional hearing, the parties presented the Family Court with an amended order of protection dated May 7, 2012. Although the amended order of protection continued to bar the mother from having any contact with Elijah, it included the words "Subject to Family Court." In response, the Family Court stated that, since the Criminal Court had issued a "full stay away order of protection," it was "the Criminal Court's intention" that the mother could not have unsupervised contact with Elijah until 2017. ACS recommended releasing Elijah to his father, and releasing Brianna to the mother. However, the attorney for the children objected to limiting the mother's contact with Elijah to supervised visitation and advocated against separating the children. In addition, the attorney for the children stated "perhaps we do need the clarification . . . of what exactly . . . the language in the Criminal Court order of protection is saying, [what] subject to Family Court' actually means." In a decision dated May 21, 2012, the Family Court stated that the phrase, " Subject to Family Court' as handwritten onto the [amended order of protection] is shorthand for subject to subsequent Family Court orders of custody and visitation'" (Matter of B.L. [M.A.], 36 Misc 3d 578, 582). However, the Family Court concluded that the language " subject to subsequent Family Court orders of custody and visitation'" did not give the court "jurisdiction to, in essence, overrule the Criminal Court, and return custody of the protected party to the [mother]" . Family Court held that it could only impose additional prohibitions against the mother, not less.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that Criminal Procedure Law provides the Criminal Court with the power to issue orders of protection in family offense matters and to include various conditions in such orders of protection. Included within this power is the authority to permit a parent to visit with a child (CPL 530.12[5][b]). Generally, if a Criminal Court order of protection bars all contact between a parent and a child, the parent may not obtain custody or visitation unless the order of protection is vacated or modified in the Criminal Court (Matter of Secrist v Brown, 83 AD3d 1399, 1400). The Criminal Court also has the authority to modify its orders of protection (People v Nieves, 2 NY3d at 317) and to determine whether its order of protection will be subject to Family Court orders, and can decline to amend an order of protection to so provide (Matter of Marqekah B., 16 Misc 3d 1109[A], 2007 NY Slip Op 51361[U], affd sub nom. Matter of Marqekah Lillias B., 63 AD3d 1057).

Following a determination that a parent has neglected or abused a child, the Family Court Act directs that a dispositional hearing be held as a condition precedent to the entry of a dispositional order such as an order of protection (Matter of Suffolk County Dept. of Social Servs. v James M., 83 NY2d 178, 183). A dispositional hearing is required so as to permit the Family Court to make an informed determination, from amongst the dispositional alternatives, which is consistent with the best interests of the subject child or children. The dispositional alternatives available to the Family Court include, but are not limited to, suspending judgment, releasing a child to the custody of his or her parent or parents, placing a child with a relative or the local commissioner of social services, placing a respondent under supervision, or issuing an order of protection (Family Ct Act §§ 1052, 1053, 1054, 1055, 1055-b, 1056, 1057). As pertinent here, a Family Court order of protection issued against a child's parent shall expire no later than the expiration date of any other orders of the court (Family Ct Act § 1056[1], [4]).

The Appellate Division held that it is the Family Court, not the Criminal Court, which is both empowered and best suited, following a dispositional hearing in a child protective proceeding, to select the dispositional alternative which is most consistent with the best interests of the children before it. The Family Court has the unique resources to effectuate and determine the best interests of the children, and its authority to do so should not be circumscribed by a Criminal Court order of protection which expressly contemplates future amendment of its terms by a subsequent Family Court order pertaining to custody and visitation. Accordingly, it held that where, as here, a Criminal Court order of protection barring contact between a parent and a child includes a provision indicating that the order is subject to subsequent Family Court orders of custody and visitation, the Family Court is permitted to release the child to the custody of that parent.

Child Support - Award - Imputed Income - Court May Impute Income Based on Defendant's Earning History, His Current Employment, and His Other Income from His Associations.

Child Support - Award - DRL § 240(1-b)(c)(7) - College Expenses - Child Support Obligation Should Be Decreased by the Amount of College Room and Board Expenses Incurred While Child Attends College.

Child Support - Award - Life Insurance - Party Should Be Allowed to Secure Child Support Obligations by Maintaining Declining Term Policy of Life Insurance

In Sotnik v. Zavilyansky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6685478 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant appealed from those parts of a judgment of divorce which imputed to him an annual income of $135,000 for the purpose of calculating his child support obligation, awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee of $75,000, awarded the plaintiff exclusive occupancy of the former marital residence until the parties' child attains the age of 21 years, failed to direct that his child support obligation shall be decreased by the amount of any college room and board expenses he incurs while the parties' child attends college, credited the plaintiff $124,876 based on the defendant's wasteful dissipation of marital property, failed to award him a portion of the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity from her medical license, and failed to provide that the life insurance policy which he was required to provide and maintain to secure his obligations to pay the award of child support may be a declining term policy that would permit him to reduce the amount of coverage by the amount of the child support actually paid.

The Appellate Division modified the judgment holding that Supreme Court should have awarded the plaintiff exclusive occupancy of the former marital residence only until the parties' son attained the age of 18 years, rather than until he turns 21 years old. It agreed with defendant that the Supreme Court should have directed that his child support obligation be decreased by the amount of any college room and board expenses he incurs while the parties' child attends college. It also agreed that Supreme Court should have allowed the defendant to secure his child support obligations by maintaining a declining term policy of life insurance rather than requiring him to maintain the existing policy coverage of $1,400,000.

The Appellate Division noted that in making its equitable distribution award, the Supreme Court credited the plaintiff the sum of $124,876 based on what it termed the defendant's "wasteful dissipation" of marital property. This included $50,000 that the defendant used to retain an attorney in connection with his medical license, which license constituted separate property since he obtained it prior to the marriage. Since the $50,000 was marital property, the plaintiff should have been credited only one-half of that sum, or $25,000. The $124,876 credit also included $11,645 representing the amount the defendant had withdrawn from a joint business account, and $1,231 representing marital funds used by the defendant to pay for an application for a Florida medical license. Since these were marital funds, the Supreme Court should have credited the plaintiff with only one-half of these amounts as well

The Court noted that a court need not rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated future potential earnings. The court may impute income to a party based on his or her employment history, future earning capacity, educational background, or money received from friends and relatives. Here, given the defendant's earning history from his private medical corporations, his current employment as a medical doctor, and his other income from his associations with Kingsbrook Medical Center, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in imputing an annual income to the defendant of $135,000 for the purpose of calculating his child support obligation.

The Appellate Division also held that under the circumstances of this case, where the defendant's contribution to the plaintiff's attainment of her medical license was de minimis, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in determining that the defendant was not entitled to any distributive share of the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity from her medical license.

Child Custody - Award - Improper to Alter Custodial Arrangement Automatically upon Happening of Specified Future Event

In Matter of Grant v Grant, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6720739 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Plaintiff mother moved, inter alia, to modify the parties' custody arrangement by permitting her to relocate to Ohio with the parties' three children. Pursuant to their custody arrangement, the parties shared joint custody of the children, but the mother had primary physical custody and defendant father had visitation. Additionally, the parties had agreed that the children would not be removed from Erie County without the father's consent or in the absence of a court order. The father opposed the mother's motion and cross-moved for custody in the event that the mother relocated. Following a hearing regarding only the issue of relocation, Supreme Court denied that part of the mother's motion seeking permission to relocate with the children and further ordered that, "if the [mother] relocates to Ohio, notwithstanding this Court's Decision, the [father] shall be granted custody of the parties' three (3) minor children with an appropriate access schedule to be arranged between the children and the [mother]." The Appellate Division affirmed. However, it modified the order by vacating the provision that custody of the children will be transferred to the father in the event that the mother relocates to Ohio. That provision, while possibly never taking effect, impermissibly purported to alter the parties' custodial arrangement automatically upon the happening of a specified future event without taking into account the children's best interests at that time.

Family Court - Support - Enforcement - Family Ct Act § 454 - Wilful Violation of Order - Respondent Failed to Meet Burden of Proof Inasmuch as He Failed to Introduce "Evidence Establishing That He Made Reasonable Efforts to Obtain Gainful Employment and Did Not Sell His Assets to Enable Him to Make Support Payments.

In Matter of Bushnell v Bushnell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6720871 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order finding that respondent had willfully violated a prior order of child support and sentencing him to six months of weekends in jail. It concluded that Family Court properly found that respondent willfully violated the prior order of support. Respondent claimed that his business failed in the economic downturn, rendering him unable to make the required support payments. After his business deteriorated, however, respondent did not actively pursue other employment options. Thus, respondent failed to meet his burden inasmuch as he failed to introduce "evidence establishing that he made reasonable efforts to obtain gainful employment to meet his support obligations. Additionally, it noted that respondent did not sell his assets to enable him to make support payments.

Maintenance - Award - Durational - Supreme Court Improvidently Exercised its Discretion in Directing Defendant to Pay Maintenance in Sums That, Combined with Plaintiff's Disability Income, Left Her at an Income Level Where She Could Become a Public Charge

In Perry v Perry, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6721007 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded plaintiff maintenance of $500 per month for four years and thereafter $440 per month for four years. On appeal Plaintiff contended that the award of maintenance was unreasonably low and should have been nondurational or, at a minimum, extended beyond eight years. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing defendant to pay maintenance for a period of eight years and in sums that, combined with plaintiff's disability income, left her at an income level where she could become a public charge. Considering all of the evidence presented in this case, including the uncontroverted testimony of plaintiff concerning her disability, her receipt of Social Security disability benefits, the disparity in the parties' incomes, plaintiff's health, her lack of work history during the marriage, the distribution of marital debts and assets, and defendant's waiver of child support from plaintiff, the correct sum which was $300 annually pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act, it concluded that defendant's obligation to pay maintenance should continue for a period of 10 years rather than eight years. It also concluded that an award of $1,000 per month comported with the intended purpose of durational maintenance, i.e., to provide the economically-disadvantaged spouse with an opportunity to achieve independence and modified the judgment accordingly noting that that, at the conclusion of the period of maintenance, plaintiff was not precluded from making an application to modify the judgment to continue maintenance if she has not become self-supporting.

Agreements - Construction - Termination of Maintenance Upon Remarriage of Recipient - Where Agreement Expressly or Impliedly Provides That Spousal Support Is to Continue after the Payee's Remarriage, Such Obligation Will Be Enforced

In Burn v. Burn, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 6199947 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the parties' 2003 separation agreement, which was incorporated by reference but not merged into their 2004 judgment of divorce provided that in exchange for waiving her interest in certain distributable property, including defendant's retirement accounts and his interests in real property worth millions of dollars, plaintiff was to receive maintenance payments from defendant "until the death of the Wife or the death of the Husband." The Plaintiff remarried in July 2011. The Appellate Division observed that a separation agreement that provides for spousal support to be paid for life or some other fixed period manifests the parties' intent that the support obligation is to continue despite the payee's remarriage. Although the separation agreement did not expressly address the effect of remarriage on the maintenance obligation, the language of the maintenance clause, as well as consideration of the entire agreement, including plaintiff's waiver of a share of assets worth millions of dollars, evinced the intent of the parties that the maintenance payments would continue until plaintiff's death or the death of defendant, regardless of plaintiff's marital status. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, spousal support ordered in a judgment of divorce must terminate upon the remarriage of the payee (Domestic Relations Law § 248). However, where, as here, the parties' separation agreement expressly or impliedly provides that spousal support is to continue after the payee's remarriage, such obligation will be enforced. Furthermore, the commencement of a plenary action was not required because the judgment of divorce incorporated the parties' agreement by reference, and plaintiff could enforce the provisions of the separation agreement in this action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 244 .

The Appellate Division also held that defendant should have been found in civil contempt. In a June 2011 order, Supreme Court, having found that defendant willfully disobeyed a prior order, directed defendant to immediately pay his May 2011 maintenance obligation and to pay all future maintenance by automatic transfer. Plaintiff established that defendant was aware of this clear and unequivocal order, and failed to make the maintenance payments as directed, thus prejudicing plaintiff's rights.

Orders - Contempt - Criminal - Criminal Contempt must Be Proven Beyond a Reasonable Doubt.

In Simens v. Darwish, 100 A.D.3d 527, 954 N.Y.S.2d 80 (1 Dept 2012) the Appellate Division held that the fact that a party does not comply with a court order does not, in and of itself, constitute criminal contempt. Where, as here, defendant asserts that he did not wilfully disobey the court order in that he believed, in good faith, that the order did not prohibit him from taking the challenged actions, the court must hold a hearing to determine whether the disobedience was wilful. Moreover, Supreme Court failed to apply the correct standard of proof when it held that criminal contempt had been demonstrated by "clear and convincing evidence." Criminal contempt must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Adequacy of Petition - Petition Adequately Alleged Family Offense

In Matter of Clark v. Ormiston,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6177020 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) petitioner commenced a family offense proceeding alleging, inter alia, that during a court proceeding, the respondent became irate and threw his chair violently while shouting at the judge. The petition further alleged that while being escorted out of the courtroom, the respondent stopped in front of the petitioner while waving his hand and pointing at her and twice shouted "You better watch out, I'm going to get you!" During previous proceedings, the respondent had "muttered things toward [the petitioner] and made motions towards her." The Appellate Division held that the Family Court should have denied respondent's motion pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7) to dismiss the petition for failure to state a cause of action. Liberally construing the petition, and giving it the benefit of every possible favorable inference, the petition adequately alleged that the respondent had committed the family offenses of harassment in the first and second degrees and disorderly conduct.

Evidence - Admissibility - Medical Records - If Any Portion of a Record Is Deemed Illegible, the Medical Record as a Whole Is Not Inadmissible. Only Those Entries That Are Illegible Should Be Deemed Inadmissible

In Matter of Fortunato v. Murray,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6177044 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the father filed a petition seeking a downward modification of his child support obligations based upon an alleged injury which hindered his ability to work. During a hearing of the matter before Support Magistrate Kathleen Walsh, the father sought to admit certain medical documents, which the Support Magistrate declined to admit into evidence on the basis that the documents constituted hearsay. The Support Magistrate dismissed the father's petition, with prejudice. The father filed an objection to the Support Magistrate's order and Family Court denied the objection, determining that the medical documents did not fall under the business records exception to the hearsay rule. The father appealed and the Appellate Division held that a physician's office records consisting of day-to-day business entries, supported by a proper foundation, are admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule, as opposed to medical reports containing a physician's opinion, which are not admissible (see Matter of Fortunato v. Murray, 72 AD3d 817). However, since the father did not reproduce the medical documents in the record on appeal, the Court could not make a determination as to whether the medical documents in dispute were of the type which are admissible as business records. As a result, the Court, inter alia, remitted the matter to the Support Magistrate for a review of the subject medical documents in light of this Court's discussion of admissibility.

In July 2010, the father was notified that the Clerk's Office of the Family Court had destroyed the medical documentation which had been subpoenaed by the father for the first hearing. Consequently, the father subpoenaed the medical documentation again from the same physician and sought to admit it into evidence at a hearing before Support Magistrate Penelope B. Cahn. The Support Magistrate determined that, since it was impossible to review the exact medical documentation which was the subject of the April 2010 order from the Appellate Division because that documentation had been destroyed and she could not discern whether the re-subpoenaed documentation was a duplicate of the documentation originally offered into evidence during the first hearing before the previous Support Magistrate, she could not determine the admissibility of the documentation in accordance with this Court's April 2010 order. The father filed an objection to the order and Family Court granted the father's objection and remitted the matter to Support Magistrate Neil T. Miller for disposition, inter alia, in accordance with the Appellate Divisions' April 2010 order.

Support Magistrate Miller reviewed the medical documentation which had been produced by the father's physician in response to another subpoena. By order dated March 21, 2011, the Support Magistrate determined the medical documentation to be inadmissible, on the basis that the accompanying certification did not make it clear that these documents were the same documents that had been previously produced in response to the first subpoena. In addition, the Support Magistrate determined, inter alia, that the documents received from the father's physician in response to the father's subpoena were inadmissible because certain entries were illegible, some documents post-dated the date of the original hearing, and some documents were from other medical service providers. The Support Magistrate dismissed the petition, without prejudice. The father filed an objection to so much of the Support Magistrate's March 2011 order as, after a hearing, determined the subject medical documentation to be inadmissible and, thereupon, dismissed the petition and Family Court denied the father's objection to the Support Magistrate's March 21, 2011, order.

The Appellate Division held that since the original documents were destroyed by the Family Court through no fault of the father, and since the father subpoenaed the documents from the same physician, there was no basis to exclude the documents on the ground that the attached certification failed to clarify whether the newly subpoenaed documents were exact duplicates of those previously offered into evidence. The issue to be decided by the Support Magistrate was not whether the father could prove that the documents produced by his physician pursuant to the most recent subpoena were exactly the same documents which had initially been subpoenaed for the first hearing, but whether the documents currently before the Family Court were admissible, in whole or in part. There may, however, be other valid bases for excluding or redacting portions of those newly subpoenaed medical documents, such as some of the documents being medical reports and not medical records, certain medical records pre-dating the accident referred to in the petition, or certain medical records post-dating the original hearing. With respect to those documents which are found to be medical records, if any portion of a record is deemed illegible, the medical record as a whole is not inadmissible. Rather, only those entries or notations within the record that are illegible should be deemed inadmissible. It reversed the order dated August 11, 2011, vacated the order dated March 21, 2011, reinstated the petition, granted the father's objection, and remitted the matter to the Family Court for a new determination of the admissibility of the medical documents and, thereafter, a new determination of the petition.

Child Support - Enforcement - UIFSA - Although UIFSA Does Not Expressly Apply to Foreign Country Order, Principles Embodied Therein, as Well as Principles of Comity, Require New York Courts to Enforce a Foreign Child Support Absent Fraud or Where Contrary to Public Policy.

In Matter of Jasen v. Karassik, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6177070 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.)
In an order dated April 24, 2007, the Superior Court of Justice of the Province of Ontario, Canada, awarded the mother child support, and directed that any unpaid child support obligation was to accrue interest at the rate of 6% per annum. The father failed to pay his child support obligation from April 13, 2010, to June 13, 2011, in the sum of $16,642.15, and the mother petitioned the Family Court to enforce the Canadian order. Although the Family Court directed the father to pay that principal sum, it declined to include an award of interest on that sum. The Appellate Division held that the award of child support arrears should have included an award of interest at the rate of 6% per annum.

Under the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), which New York adopted as article 5-B of the Family Court Act a state may not modify an issuing state's order of child support unless the issuing state has lost continuing, exclusive jurisdiction, or the parties consent to a modification. Although the UIFSA does not expressly apply to the Canadian order, since Ontario is not a "state" within the meaning of that statute (Family Ct Act § 580-101 [19]), the equitable principles embodied therein, as well as traditional common-law principles of comity, require New York courts to enforce the terms of a child support order or judgment entered in the courts of a foreign nation, "absent some showing of fraud in the procurement of the judgment or that recognition of the judgment would do violence to some strong public policy of this State" (Matter of Fickling v. Fickling, 210 A.D.2d 223, 223-224).

The Appellate Division held that Family Court, in effect, improperly modified the Canadian order, notwithstanding the facts that the courts of Ontario had not lost continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over the matter, the parties did not consent to the modification, and there was no showing that the Canadian order was procured by fraud or that recognition of that order would do violence to some strong public policy of New York. Since the mother's request for an award of interest at the rate of 6% per annum on these arrears should have been granted, the arrears in the amount of $16,642.15 that were awarded by the Family Court must bear interest at a rate of 6% per annum, as directed in the Canadian order.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Modification - Domestic Relations Law 76-b[1] - New York May Not Exercise Jurisdiction Where Sister State Courts Have Not Relinquished Jurisdiction by Determining That They No Longer Had Continuing, Exclusive Jurisdiction, or That New York Would Be a More Convenient Forum .

In Matter of Ozdemir v. Riley,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6177130 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Family Court properly granted the father's motion to dismiss the mother's petition to modify an out-of-state custody order. The State of Delaware asserted home-state jurisdiction over the custody proceeding commenced there by the father (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a[7]. A New York court may not exercise jurisdiction over a custody proceeding involving the parties' children, since the pending Delaware proceeding had not been terminated or stayed by the Delaware courts (Domestic Relations Law §76-e[1]). Moreover, Delaware courts had not relinquished jurisdiction over the matter by determining that they no longer had continuing, exclusive jurisdiction, or that New York would be a more convenient forum (Domestic Relations Law 76-b[1]). Therefore, the Family Court could not modify the Delaware custody order, which had been registered here. Accordingly, the Family Court properly dismissed the mother's petition to modify the Delaware order.

Disclosure - CPLR 3121 - Psychiatric records - Where Psychiatric Records Might Contain Embarrassing or Potentially Damaging Material Irrelevant to Issue of Fitness as a Parent Court Should Conduct in Camera Inspection to Determine the Portions, If Any, Material and Relevant on Issue of Fitness.

In Matter of Worysz v. Ratel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6177850 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that when a party's mental or physical condition is placed "in controversy" within the meaning of CPLR 3121(a), a notice may be served requiring that the party submit to a medical examination or make available for inspection relevant hospital and medical records (CPLR 3121[a]; Dillenbeck v. Hess, 73 N.Y.2d 278). While parties to a contested custody proceeding place their physical and mental condition at issue, the potential for abuse in matrimonial and custody cases is great, and the court has broad discretionary power to limit disclosure and grant protective orders (Wegman v. Wegman, 37 N.Y.2d 940, 941; Torelli v. Torelli, 50 AD3d at 1125; Garvin v. Garvin, 162 A.D.2d 497, 499). It noted that in this case, the mother's psychiatric records might contain embarrassing or potentially damaging material that was irrelevant to the issue of the mother's fitness as a parent. Under the circumstances of this case, it concluded that, before determining the father's motion to compel disclosure of the mother's psychiatric records from November 2007, the Family Court should have conducted an in camera inspection of the records to determine the portions thereof, if any, that were material and relevant on the issue of the mother's fitness as a parent.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Although in a Marriage of Long Duration, Where Both Parties Have Made Significant Contributions to the Marriage, a Division of Marital Assets Should Be Made as Equal as Possible There Is No Requirement That the Distribution of Each Item of Marital Property Be Made on an Equal Basis.

In Elias v. Elias, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6603660 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff 25% of the value of the defendant's interest in Ben Elias Industries Corp. It stated that although in a marriage of long duration, where both parties have made significant contributions to the marriage, a division of marital assets should be made as equal as possible there is no requirement that the distribution of each item of marital property be made on an equal basis. Here, the 25% share took into account the plaintiff's minimal direct and indirect involvement in the defendant's company, while not ignoring her contributions as the primary caretaker for the parties children, which allowed the defendant to focus on his business". It also that the Supreme Court failed to properly calculate child support pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b]. In determining child support, the Supreme Court failed to set forth the manner in which the defendant's income was calculated. The Court also improperly deducted the distributive award from the defendant's income, a deduction that is not recognized in the CSSA (Domestic Relations Law §240[1-b][b][5][vii][A]-[H]; Holterman v. Holterman, 3 NY3d 1, 10-11). Also, the Supreme Court improperly capped the defendant's income at $125,000, which was below the statutory ceiling of $130,000 that became effective on January 31, 2010. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the defendant's child support obligation.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Denial of Credit for Contribution of Separate Property to Marital Property - While a Credit Is Often Given for the Value of the Former Separate Property, Such Credit Is Not Strictly Mandated since the Property Is No Longer Separate, but Is Part of the Total Marital Property.

Maintenance - Award - Future Increases - inappropriate to provide for future increases or decreases in maintenance except when a judgment provides for an imminent and measurable change.

Child Support - Award - Where Divorce Follows Separation Judgment or Support Order- De Novo Determination Denied

In Murray v Murray, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6199932 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1986 and had four children (born in 1987, 1989, 1992 and 1994). Approximately 15 months before the marriage, plaintiff (husband) purchased a residence in Queens County. Following their marriage and some renovations to this property, the parties lived there together for several years. In 1991, the husband conveyed this property to himself and defendant (wife) jointly. The parties refinanced the Queens County property and used the proceeds to purchase a second residence in the Town of Callicoon, Sullivan County (the marital residence). They resided there together and rented out the Queens County property, until 2003, when the husband left the marital residence. In 2004, a Support Magistrate ordered the husband to pay child support and directed that he pay 75% of any unreimbursed medical expenses.

The husband commenced the divorce action in 2005. Following a trial, Supreme Court granted exclusive possession of the marital residence to the wife until the emancipation of the youngest child, ordered the equitable distribution of a motorcycle and the rental income from the Queens County property, and directed the husband to pay weekly child support and—beginning upon the youngest child's emancipation—monthly maintenance to the wife for 10 years or until she remarries. The court continued the prior order directing the husband to pay 75% of the unreimbursed medical expenses, and also required him to pay the wife a lump sum representing one half of certain wasted marital assets, to maintain life insurance policies and to provide college funds for the unemancipated children.

The Appellate Division found that denying the husband a credit for the premarital value of the Queens County property was within Supreme Court's discretion. While a credit is often given for the value of the former separate property, such credit is not strictly mandated since the property is no longer separate, but is part of the total marital property. "There is no single template that directs how courts are to distribute a marital asset that was acquired, in part or in whole, with separate property funds" (Fields v. Fields, 15 NY3d 158, 167 [2010]). For similar reasons, Supreme Court did not err in ordering the liquidation and equal division of the parties' Verizon stock.

In reviewing the pertinent factors in making the maintenance award Supreme Court placed particular emphasis on the persistent significant disparity in the parties' incomes, the wife's limited prospects for increased earnings, and the lost income, earning capacity and retirement savings that she incurred by remaining out of the paid work force to raise the parties' children for approximately 17 years during the marriage. The husband demanded that she stay at home with the children during this time. Thus, given that the marriage was of long duration, the recipient spouse had been out of the work force for a number of years and has sacrificed her own career development or had made substantial noneconomic contributions to the household or to the career of the payor Supreme Court's decision to render an award of maintenance was well supported by the record. Nonetheless, the structure of the award was inappropriate, as it was wholly deferred until the child support payments ceased. Because the interrelated factors upon which awards of support and maintenance are based may change in unanticipated ways, it is inappropriate to provide for future increases or decreases in maintenance "[e]xcept when a judgment provides for an imminent and measurable change" (Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 494 [1984]). Thus, Supreme Court erred in delaying the commencement of the maintenance obligation until the child support payments terminate, and remittal was required for reconsideration of the appropriate amount and duration of the award, and for recalculation of the child support award if required by any resulting adjustments in the parties' income for this purpose.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in basing the child support on the parties' incomes in 2004, rather than as revealed in the most recent tax returns. The husband bore the burden of establishing a substantial change in circumstances requiring downward modification of the prior order, and emancipation was the only change in circumstances that he alleged. A child support obligation turns on a parent's ability to provide support, rather than the parent's current financial situation". The husband made no showing of "an unexpected and unreasonable change in circumstances" that altered his ability to provide support after 2004 (Matter of Kelly v. Schoonbeck, 34 AD3d 1094, 1096 [2006]). Accordingly, it found no error in Supreme Court's choice to continue the terms of the existing child support order, with limited modifications to reflect the emancipated children. For the same reasons, it rejected the husband's contention that Supreme Court erred in continuing the prior direction relative to unreimbursed medical expenses rather than recalculating his pro rata share based on more recent figures. It agreed with the husband that, as he made substantial child support payments and met a significant portion of the unemancipated children's financial needs, Supreme Court's determination regarding tax exemptions should be modified to permit him to claim one child annually as an exemption on his tax returns.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in deferring the sale of the marital residence until the emancipation of the parties' youngest child. The wife was the custodial parent, the husband did not establish that he was in immediate need of his share of the proceeds of such a sale, and the record revealed that the husband was best able to find an alternate residence and the wife was financially able to manage the costs of the marital residence, having done so without assistance from the husband throughout the pendency of the divorce.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly directed the husband to pay the wife one half of the value of certain wastefully dissipated marital assets. The husband admitted that he cashed some of the parties' United States savings bonds while the divorce was pending, and the issues posed by his inconsistent testimony as to the value of these bonds, as well as his claim that the wife cashed additional bonds by forging his signature, were for Supreme Court to resolve.

The Appellate Division affirmed the Supreme Court's direction that the husband pay $2,500 each semester toward college costs for the unemancipated children. A court may require a parent to make payments toward college costs upon a finding of special circumstances, a determination that is based upon the payor spouse's financial status, the educational background of both parents and the academic ability of the children (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][7]). Here, the Appellate Division found that the requisite special circumstances existed. At the time of trial, one of the parties' emancipated children was enrolled in college, and the older of the two unemancipated children, a high school senior, was planning to attend college after graduation. The parties' long-standing intention to assist their children with college costs was revealed by the husband's testimony that their original purpose in buying the savings bonds, which were purchased over a period of many years, was to establish college funds for the children. The husband's income was substantially greater than the wife's income. Given her limited resources and the parties' mutual commitment to their children's education, there was no abuse of discretion in ordering the husband to contribute to college costs

Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion by ordering the husband to pay one half of the rental income from the Queens County property to the wife until the sale of the property, without deducting therefrom any expenses or carrying charges. The husband's sole responsibility for expenses related to the Queens County property was balanced by the wife's sole responsibility for the expenses of the marital residence, which, unlike the Queens County property, produced no income.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Hearing - Motion to Amend Pleadings to Conform to Proof - Absent surprise or Undue Prejudice, Motion Should be Freely Granted

In Matter of Jeff M. v. Christine N., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6621167 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), in June 2010, petitioner and his wife communicated to respondent, petitioner's mother, that they no longer wanted respondent or respondent's husband to contact them or their three children (born in 2003, 2005 and 2008). Nevertheless, over the course of the next nine months, respondent repeatedly disregarded this request by sending letters, packages and gifts to petitioner and his family. During that same time period, respondent also filed a petition seeking visitation with the children. On March 16, 2011, the parties negotiated an agreement whereby respondent withdrew the petition and agreed to communicate with petitioner's family only through petitioner and his wife. Three days later, on March 19, 2011, petitioner received three cards in the mail from respondent, one addressed to each of his children. Based upon that conduct, petitioner commenced this proceeding alleging that respondent had committed the family offenses of aggravated harassment in the second degree and stalking. After a hearing. Family Court found that respondent committed the offense and issued a two-year order of protection requiring her to stay away from petitioner, his wife and their children.

The Appellate Division found that petitioner proved by a preponderance of the evidence (Family Ct Act § 832) that respondent committed the family offense of aggravated harassment in the second degree. Petitioner testified that in June 2010, as a result of a longstanding strained relationship with respondent, he and his wife sent an email to respondent advising her that, until she sought psychiatric help for "serious mental health issues," they would "no longer accept packages, letters, cards, calls, or any other type of communication" from her or her husband. Petitioner explained that, following this email, respondent nonetheless continued to send packages and letters, culminating in the three cards which formed the basis of the proceeding. He testified that, upon retrieving the cards from the mail, he was offended and "beyond devastated." Petitioner's wife added that petitioner was "very angry" and "had tears in his eyes" upon receipt of the cards. Notably, respondent admitted that on numerous occasions after the June 2010 email she disregarded petitioner and his wife's requests for her to cease communication, including causing the cards to be sent. Her intent to annoy or alarm petitioner could be inferred from the circumstances. While respondent claimed to have sent the cards under the belief that a prior letter from petitioner's wife permitting her to send cards and gifts "[took] precedent" over the subsequent June 2010 email prohibiting contact and based upon the advice of professionals that it was important that she continue to have contact with her grandchildren, Family Court rejected those explanations.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court did not abuse its discretion by permitting petitioner to conform the pleadings to reflect the proof adduced at the hearing to the effect that respondent was aware as early as June 2010 that she was to have no further contact with petitioner or his family. A motion to conform the pleadings to the proof is committed to the sound discretion of the court and, absent surprise or undue prejudice, should be freely granted (Murray v. City of New York, 43 N.Y.2d 400, 404-405 [1977]). The affidavits submitted by petitioner and his counsel in opposition to the motion to dismiss specifically alleged that respondent had been advised long before the March 16, 2011 agreement that she was not to have any contact with petitioner, his wife or their children. Thus, respondent was aware of this proof well before the hearing. Furthermore, respondent's own counsel questioned her at the hearing as to whether she had notice, prior to March 16, 2011, that petitioner did not want her to contact his family, and specifically referenced the June 2010 email. There being no showing that respondent was surprised or prejudiced by this proof, there was no error.

The Appellate Division rejected respondents challenges to the provision in the order of protection barring her from having any contact with petitioner's children. Reasonableness is the guiding consideration in determining what conditions to impose in an order of protection, and the major criterion of the reasonableness of conditions imposed is whether they are likely to be helpful in eradicating the root of family disturbance. Under the particular circumstances of this case, we find that Family Court's decision to include the children in the order of protection was reasonable and necessary to end the source of the family disruption and, therefore, was a proper exercise of its discretion.

Equitable Distribution - Property Determination - Personal Injury Recovery - by Transferring His Unallocated Separate Property Portion of the Settlement into Joint Account, Husband Created Presumption That it Was Marital and Was Thus Required to Rebut this Presumption by Clear and Convincing Evidence That the Transfer Was Solely a Matter of Convenience Equitable Distribution - Factors Considered - (12) the Wasteful Dissipation of Assets by Either Spouse - Though Gambling May Be Considered an Addiction, this Does Not Excuse Gross Economic Misconduct in Wasting the Marital Assets.

In Burnett v Burnett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6621175 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1974 and raised six grown children. During the course of the marriage, plaintiff (wife) worked within the home and defendant (husband) was the primary wage earner, excluding a period during the marriage-described by Supreme Court as "significant" in duration-when the husband left the wife and children dependant upon public assistance benefits and charity from her family. In 2002, in the course of his employment, the husband suffered personal injuries in a fall from a scaffold. In 2006, the parties settled their claims for personal injury and loss of consortium in the combined net sum of $1 million and deposited the funds into a joint investment account managed by their son, with the stated intention of drawing $4,000 monthly from the account for their household expenses and support. In 2007, they jointly obtained a settlement payment upon a legal malpractice action (arising from the underlying personal injury and consortium claims) in the sum of roughly $297,000. The husband deposited this check into his separate account. Thereafter, the husband engaged in extensive and habitual gambling, depleting the accounts. After learning of an adulterous affair in 2009, the wife withdrew the remaining balance of just under $140,000 from the joint investment account. The husband never accounted for the funds from the malpractice settlement and Supreme Court found, based upon this failure and upon his "less than forthcoming testimony," that the possibility remained that he had secreted or transferred assets. Supreme Court awarded the wife title to the marital residence, the remaining balance of the investment account, and the household furnishings and farm equipment. The husband received his checking account, plumbing business and equipment, and a motor boat and trailer.

The Appellate Division rejected the husband's contention that Supreme Court erred in determining that the settlement funds were marital property. Although Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][1][d][2], the governing statute, provides that compensation for personal injury constitutes separate property, Supreme Court noted the complete lack of any evidence upon which the funds might have been allocated as between the husband's personal injury claim and the wife's consortium claim, and the substantial evidence supporting the legal presumption that the parties wished to treat the proceeds as joint assets of the marriage. The parties received the initial settlement funds by joint check and deposited the funds immediately into a joint investment account. Their son testified that he had offered professional advice regarding their holdings and that the account was set up to pay out a monthly sum for deposit into the parties' household account for payment of their living expenses. By transferring his unallocated separate property portion of the settlement into the joint account, the husband created a presumption that it was marital and was thus required to rebut this presumption by clear and convincing evidence that the transfer was solely a matter of convenience. This burden was not met. The husband retained the second settlement check from the malpractice claim separately (including the portion that may have been allocated to the consortium claim) and failed to offer any accounting for these funds. He was awarded any balance of his separate accounts, and could not be heard to complain regarding the distribution of this asset.

The Appellate Division found that the evidence of the husband's wasteful dissipation of marital assets was overwhelming. Records from the investment account and from several casinos were introduced into evidence. The documentation and testimony, including the husband's own admissions, revealed that he engaged in extensive gambling over a period of several years, incurring significant debts and depleting the substantial assets that should otherwise have been sufficient to support the parties at their previous economic level and lifestyle indefinitely. There was no evidence whatsoever supporting the contention that his actions should be in some manner condoned or forgiven as a result of his head injury. Though the husband's gambling may be considered an addiction, this did not excuse his gross economic misconduct in wasting the marital assets.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Parties to a Civil Dispute Are Free to Chart Their Own Litigation Course and May Stipulate Away Statutory, and Constitutional Rights, and Agree to the Circumstances under Which a Counsel Fee Award May Be Made.

In Matter of Kaczor v. Kaczor,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6621286 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (mother) and respondent (father) were the parents of one child. Sole custody of the child was awarded to the father in 2002, with visitation to the mother. In 2006, the mother filed a petition for modification of the prior custody order. Upon consent of the parties at the conclusion of the proceeding, Family Court made multiple specific directives and continued the essential terms of custody and visitation. As relevant here, the order provided that, if the mother filed a petition in Family Court against the father and was "unsuccessful in prosecuting the petition for any reason whatsoever, including a withdrawal of said petition, the mother shall be responsible to reimburse to the father any and all attorney fees he incurs as a result of the petition." In November 2010, the mother commenced a proceeding by filing a modification petition seeking sole custody of the child. Following preliminary appearances, the mother withdrew the petition on the day that trial was scheduled to begin. The father thereafter sought an order directing the mother to reimburse his counsel fees incurred in defending the petition. Family Court directed a hearing relative to the reasonableness of the claim. The mother conceded that the amount claimed was appropriate based upon time expended and the rate charged, but otherwise contested the application. Family Court rendered a fee award.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that counsel fees are generally regarded as incidents of litigation, with each party remaining responsible for his or her own fees, but an award of legal fees may be rendered where such is authorized by statute, court rule or, an agreement made by the parties. The stipulation was formally made in open court, with the assistance of counsel, and incorporated into a court order. No grounds were shown to vacate the parties' clearly expressed agreement. It noted that "parties to a civil dispute are free to chart their own litigation course and, in so doing, they may stipulate away statutory, and even constitutional rights. As the parties may fashion the basis upon which a particular controversy will be resolved it found that by her stipulation the mother effectively waived the requirement that her conduct be found frivolous prior to holding her responsible for the father's counsel fees, as well as any pertinent constitutional protection under both the New York and U.S. Constitutions.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - Not a Violation of Best Evidence Rule to Permit Party to Testify to the Contents of Text Messages Where Established That Messages Were Unavailable as a Result of an Innocent Mishap and Despite Due Diligence in Attempting to Recover Them.

In Matter of Robert AA. v. Colleen BB., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6621293 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of a son (born in 2005). A December 2006 order of Family Court awarded sole custody of the child to the mother and parenting time to the father "at such times and places as the parents shall mutually agree." In June 2010, the father commenced a proceeding seeking to modify the prior order by establishing a visitation schedule. The following month, the mother filed a family offense petition. She subsequently filed a modification petition requesting that any parenting time between the father and the child be supervised due to the father's alleged alcohol and drug abuse. Following a hearing, Family Court dismissed the father's petitions, suspended his visitation rights and ordered that he engage in counseling and submit to a substance abuse evaluation. The court further found that the father had committed the family offense of aggravated harassment in the second degree and issued a one-year order of protection.

The Appellate Division affirmed. There was ample support in the record for Family Court's denial of visitation to the father. The mother's testimony, which Family Court credited in all respects established that the father rarely availed himself of the opportunity to visit the child despite her efforts to encourage a relationship between them and notwithstanding an order allowing essentially open access to the child upon agreement. She explained that the father did not see the child for nearly a year after the 2006 order and that, while arrangements for Thursday visitations were thereafter made at her insistence, these visits were seldom consistent. When the father did visit with the child, the mother observed that the child was swearing and exhibited aggressive behavior. According to the mother, the father again "disappeared from the picture" when the child entered preschool in September 2009, seeing his son only a handful of times thereafter, almost all of which she initiated. Moreover, on at least one occasion he conditioned visitation on having sex with the mother. Family Court was "disturbed" by the testimony regarding the extent of the father's preoccupation with having sexual relations with the mother, and specifically noted his inability to refrain from referencing sexual relations with the mother during his testimony. Family Court credited the mother's testimony regarding the father's alcohol and drug use, and found that his actions placed the child at risk of harm. The mother explained that the father admitted to having resumed drinking and drug use and that, on more than one occasion when dropping off the child, she could smell marijuana in the father's home. During his testimony, the father confirmed that he recently tested positive for cannabis. The mother also detailed incidents where the father drove or attempted to drive the child home from a visit while under the influence of alcohol. She testified further that, in June 2009, the father informed her that he had been convicted of rape. When questioned as to whether he had been convicted of raping a 90-year-old woman, the father invoked the Fifth Amendment. The record was replete with additional conduct by the father that raises serious concerns regarding his ability to care for and supervise the child, including allowing the then-three-year-old child to play violent video games and watch inappropriate television shows, transporting him in the front seat without a seat belt, and an incident, which the father found "funny", during which he lost the child in Wal-Mart, requiring the store to close all of its doors before the child was ultimately found nearly 45 minutes later.

The Appellate Division also found that the evidence was sufficient to establish that the father committed the family offense of aggravated harassment in the second degree. As relevant here, "[a] person is guilty of aggravated harassment in the second degree when, with intent to harass, annoy, threaten or alarm another person, he or she ... communicates with a person ... in a manner likely to cause annoyance or alarm" (Penal Law § 240.30[1]). At the hearing, the mother testified that the father sent her more than 10 text messages over the course of a day in July 2010. In the first set of messages, the father repeatedly requested that the mother have the child call him and accused her of keeping the child from him, in response to which she informed him that she was at work and requested that he cease texting her. The mother explained that the messages became increasingly "disturbing," including repeated statements by the father that he was still in love with her and wanted to be together as a family. She testified further that, despite her requests that he stop, the father continued to send her similar text messages throughout the evening and as late as 2:00 a.m., and stated that she was afraid of the father and feared for her safety. It rejected the father's assertion that Family Court erroneously permitted the mother to testify to the contents of the text messages in violation of the best evidence rule. The mother sufficiently established that the messages were unavailable as a result of an innocent mishap and despite her due diligence in attempting to recover them (Schozer v. William Penn Life Ins. Co. of N.Y., 84 N.Y.2d 639, 644 [1994]). According deference to Family Court's credibility determinations, and mindful that the requisite intent may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances it found that the family offense was proven by a preponderance of the evidence.

Child Custody - Relocation - Relocation in Children's Best Interests Where Children Would Benefit from Economic Stability and Security Move Would Bring.

In Matter of Shirley v. Shirley, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 6621295 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (mother) and respondent (father) were the divorced parents of three boys, two of whom were twins and all of whom were born in 2007. In August 2009, and upon the parties' stipulation, the mother was awarded sole legal and primary physical custody of the children, and the father was granted unspecified periods of supervised visitation. Supreme Court also ordered that the father undergo a substance abuse evaluation and complete both a domestic violence and an anger management program and issued a stay-away order of protection in favor of the mother, which remains in effect until 2014. In November 2010, the mother commenced a proceeding seeking permission to relocate with the children to Yuma, Arizona, where her fiancé was living and working. Following a fact-finding hearing, Supreme Court granted the mother's application

The Appellate Division found that it was apparent from the record that the children would benefit from the economic stability and security that such move would bring. At the time of the hearing, the mother was receiving public assistance and routinely had to turn to her relatives, friends and fiancé for additional funds in order to make ends meet. Although the mother sometimes babysat for additional pocket money, the children's needs and schedules effectively precluded outside employment. The mother's fiancé, on the other hand, was gainfully employed as an airframes mechanic for a well-established civilian contractor on the same military base where he previously was stationed. The fiancé testified that he had the financial wherewithal to support the mother and the children, all of whom would be covered under his health insurance once he and the mother married, and that this arrangement would allow the mother to remain at home and continue to work with the children-at least until all of them were in school full time.

As to the impact upon the father's relationship with the children, there was no question that he would see the children less frequently. However, both the mother and the fiancé had extended family in this state and indicated that they would return to the area in order to facilitate the father's visitations with the children. Although the mother wanted the father's visits to remain supervised, she also recognized that such visits necessarily would need to be for longer periods of time. The mother also expressed a willingness to allow the father to visit the children in Arizona, in addition to regular telephone and/or online contact. While it was true that the children's educational opportunities in Arizona essentially mirrored those available in New York and that the move would distance the children from their grandparents and other members of their extended families, the court was persuaded, having given due consideration to all of the relevant factors, including the feasibility of the father maintaining meaningful contact with the children, that relocation was in the children's best interests.

Fourth Department

Child Custody - Attorney for Child - Role - Must Zealously Advocate the Child's Position If Child Is Capable of Knowing, Voluntary and Considered Judgment

In Matter of Swinson v. Dobson,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6635016 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) a proceeding to modify a prior custody order, the Appellate Division observed the mother contended, inter alia, that the Attorney for the Child (AFC) should have substituted his own judgment for that of the child. Although the mother failed to preserve that contention for review the Court stated that in any event, the mother's contention lacked merit. "An [AFC] must 'zealously advocate the child's position' ... and, if the child is 'capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment,' must follow the child's wishes 'even if the attorney for the child believes that what the child wants is not in the child's best interests' " (Matter of Gloria DD. [Brenda DD.], 99 AD3d 1044, 1046, quoting 22 NYCRR 7.2[d][2]; see Matter of Mark T. v. Joyanna U., 64 AD3d 1092, 1093-1094). There are only two circumstances in which an AFC is authorized to substitute his or her own judgment for that of the child: "[w]hen the [AFC] is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child" (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]; see Mark T., 64 AD3d at 1094). Neither exception was implicated in this matter.

Supreme Court

Disclosure - CPLR 3121 - Mental Examination - Supreme Court Holds Husband Had No Right to Have His Attorney Present During Psychiatric Examination Where Sufficient Justification Exists to Bar the Husband's Attorney from Examination Room.

In M.A.M. v M.R.M., 2012 WL 6554895 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52299(U), Unreported Disposition, the Supreme Court, upon request of the wife, ordered both parties to engage in a psychological evaluation. The court selected the evaluator, and signed an order confirming the evaluation. The Husband's counsel objected to the court's selection and further asserted that he wanted to be present when the evaluator interviewed his client. The husband moved for an order permitting him to have his counsel present during the evaluation. The wife submitted an affidavit from the court-appointed evaluator in which he asserted that he had a telephone conversation with husband's counsel, and that he insisted on being present for any interview portions of the evaluation, but not during the administration of formal psychological tests. He stated that the attorney told him that he wanted to be present to "protect his client from potentially self-incriminatory statements" and that husband's counsel "questioned the relevance of a history of drug use to a custodial evaluation." The evaluator's affidavit also stated that: "The husband's attorney made it clear that he would seek to prevent his client from providing spontaneous responses to open-ended or specific questions asked during the course of the interview, responses and information which are critical to an understanding of the individual. Clinical interviews, including the taking of the social history, are not solely for the purpose of gaining the asked about information, but also an assessment of the manner in which such information is presented, the fluidity and cogency of the thought process, observation of the manifest behavior, and other critical clinical nuances and manifestations which are likely to be significantly influenced by the presence of an attorney or any other third party. There is considerable professional literature in the field to support the practices of this office and which suggest that the presence of attorneys

(or other third parties) has significant potential for undesirable influence on the interactions, behavior, and statements of the individual being evaluated. Discussed is the potentially negative influence and consequences of an attorney's presence during an evaluation, as it changes the manner in which the patient/client interacts with the evaluator." The evaluator stated in a reply affidavit that "the presence of third parties in such evaluations was not permitted by [his] office due to the way in which it would change the interactions between a patient and an evaluator." It was the evaluator's belief that the presence of an attorney (or other third party) during a psychological evaluation had a significant likelihood of skewing the data obtained, and impacting the behavior and test results of the person being evaluated. The evaluator informed the court that he would not allow any attorney to be present during the examination. In his papers and during oral argument, the husband's counsel never suggested that he would ask questions or verbally interrupt the examination. He told the court that he would sit behind his client and say nothing.

Supreme Court denied the motion. It observed that while there is some conflict, New York courts have historically permitted an attorney to be present at a court-ordered psychological evaluation in a contested custody matter. The Court reviewed the case law on attorney access to examinations and its constitutional and statutory underpinnings before reaching any conclusions. It observed that the Court of Appeals considered the presence of counsel in a psychiatric examination in Matter of Alexander L., 60 N.Y.2d 329 (1983). In that case, the court extended the right to counsel in the Family Court Act to require that counsel be present in an examination required as part of a termination of parental rights proceeding. The Court noted that subsequent New York courts took an expansive view of a litigant's request to have counsel present in medical and psychiatric examinations. It noted that a party is entitled to be examined in the presence of his or her attorney or other representative so long as that person does not interfere with the conduct of the examinations unless the defendant makes a positive showing of necessity for the exclusion of such an individual. Supreme Court pointed out that the party opposing the participation of the attorney has the burden of establishing that "the presence of the attorney or other representative will "impair the validity and effectiveness" of the neuropsychological examination. Before reviewing other aspects of this issue, the court noted that the reasoning of all of the cases seemed to rest on a judicial gloss in CPLR 3121. In Jakubowski v. Lengen, 86 A.D.2d 398, 400-401 (4th Dept.1982), a case cited as authority by husband's counsel, the court described the presence of attorneys at evaluations as "explained by the longstanding and seldom challenged practice of attorneys accompanying and being with their clients at physical examinations."The Jakubowski court cited Milam v. Mitchell, 51 Misc.2d 948 (Sup.Ct. Niagara Cty.1966), which referenced the same "practice" of lawyers being permitted to attend examinations. The court in Jakubowski noted that neither CPLR 3121 or the court rules expressly provide for an attorney's presence at medical or psychiatric examinations, but "more importantly, they do not provide for his exclusion." The Fourth Department acknowledged that even though CPLR 3121 says nothing about a client's right to have counsel present during a psychiatric examination, the absence of any express statute or rule prohibiting counsel's attendance apparently condones the prior "practice" of permitting counsel to attend. On this slender reed of a "negative inference," found in the absence of language specifically excluding counsel in CPLR 3121, the Fourth Department held that a client was presumed to have a right to have counsel present at a physical examination. Supreme Court stated that despite this broad-reaching principle, the Fourth Department in Jakubowski v. Lengen acknowledged that the examining room should not be turned into a hearing room and held that, while the objectant failed to meet his burden of proof, the court had the power to prevent the attorney from intruding on the examination. In Jakubowski, the proof that disruption of the examination would occur by counsel's presence was insufficient to curtail the "practice" that the court said was inferred from the CPLR and the Fourth Department rules. However, the Supreme Court read Jakubowski for the proposition that there is no constitutional or statutory right to have counsel present in psychiatric examinations in civil cases in New York. The Fourth Department in Jakubowski described it solely as a "practice." While many of the other recent cases cited Jakubowski and described this "practice" into a "right," See e.g., McNeil v. State, 8 Misc23d 1028A (2005) (claimant has a "right" to have his counsel attend neuropsychological examination) none of them cited any broader authority for the proposition that an attorney may participate in a psychiatric examination. And all of these cases articulated the exception to the rule articulated in Jakubowski: if an objectant produces proof that an attorney's presence will impair the effectiveness and validity of the examination, the court may exclude counsel.

The husband's counsel relied, in significant part, on the Jakubowski v. Lengen holding. Citing only one case the court stated that there appeared to be an emerging body of New York cases which seemed to reject the Jakubowski presumption that the objecting party must demonstrate a valid reason to exclude the attorney from a psychiatric examination. In the alternative, these cases demonstrated what circumstances can justify excluding counsel from these examinations. In Administration of Children Services v. Y.B., 2009 N.Y. Misc. Lexis 2560 (Sup.Ct. New York Cty.2009), the court, on consent, required the mother in a neglect proceeding to undergo a mental health evaluation. The subject demanded that her attorney attend. The court held that the pre-dispositional mental health evaluation was not a "critical stage" of the proceeding, and hence the subject had no right to have counsel present. The court noted that, unlike the circumstances in In re Alexander L., there was no express statutory right to counsel at the proposed psychiatric examination. In searching for a constitutional right to have counsel attend, the court distinguished Matter of Alexander L., noting that the Court of Appeals simply held that counsel's presence was only required at "critical stages" of litigation. The cases suggested New York authority on access to psychiatric examinations runs on several tracks: the In re Alexander L. track, which suggests that if the examination is at a critical stage, then counsel must be present; the Jakubowski track, which judicially codifies a practice that the attorney may be present unless the objecting party presents a sufficient justification to exclude counsel; and, the emerging psychiatric track, established in Administration of Children Services v. Y.B. and its predecessors, which indicate that because of the unique nature of psychiatric examinations, the party seeking access must present a justification to attend.

Given the current state of New York law, the court concluded that the husband had no right to have his attorney present during the examination. It then found that the Jakubowski v. Lengen test was met. The wife's attorney and the evaluator's affidavit provided a sufficient justification for excluding the attorney. In the court's view, the evaluator's objections, backed by the stream of federal court determinations and the guidance of other states, the evaluator's clinical recommendations and other mentioned periodicals, supported the conclusion that the attorney's mere presence alone in the examining room could interfere with the examination. Therefore, under the Jakubowski v. Lengen test, the wife's counsel and the evaluator demonstrated a sufficient justification to bar the husband's attorney from the examination room.

The court also concluded that the attorney may not be present during the testing portion of the examination. To balance his client's interests and as an exercise of the court's discretion to control disclosure under CPLR 3121, Supreme Court held that the attorney may attend the initial interview, where the process is explained and the informed consent obtained. But otherwise the examination would be supervised by the evaluator and the husband may not confer with his counsel during the conduct of the examination.

Divorce - Default Judgment - Affidavits - Judgment Vacated Sua Sponte Where Affidavit Stating There were no children was made to get expeditious judgment, rather than engage in protracted case in contested matrimonial parts

L.C.B.-T. v. T.L.T. 2012 WL 6621724 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52324(U) the plaintiff-former wife moved to amend the Judgment of Divorce to reflect that there was a son of the marriage.

The parties signed a Stipulation of Settlement, dated August 15, 2009, where the defendant-husband gave the plaintiff a lump sum payment of $10,000. In the stipulation, the defendant-husband, who was the custodial parent of two unemancipated children from a prior relationship, together with the plaintiff-wife, L.C. B.-T. stated: "WHEREAS, there are no children of the marriage, and none are expected." This language appeared conspicuously on the first page of the stipulation, filed with the County Clerk. The defendant had his signature notarized on the stipulation, but the plaintiff-wife did not. The Court later learned that the parties to the matrimonial action had an unemancipated child of the marriage, as confirmed by the Court's review of the birth certificate. Nevertheless, in her affidavit in support of the uncontested divorce, the plaintiff-wife swore that there were no children of the marriage. Her proposed findings of fact clearly stated that there were no children of the marriage. The Court, based on the representations of the parties that there were no children of this marriage, granted a judgment of divorce on November 9, 2009, and entered by the Clerk of the Court on December 23, 2009, two years earlier. The plaintiff-wife and her counsel-who did not represent the plaintiff in the actual divorce proceedings or participate in the drafting of the earlier questionable papers supplied to the Court-explained that the paperwork for the divorce was done by a "divorce mill" and plaintiff was negligent in reading the papers before signing. This Court did not accept that explanation. The Court observed that in Queens County, the distribution and assignment of uncontested matrimonial actions is made on the strength of the parties' representation as to whether or not there are any unemancipated children of the marriage. Cases involving unemancipated children are assigned to certain matrimonial parts and are subject to stringent review to protect the rights of the children. In this case it appeared that a false statement regarding no children was made by the plaintiff-wife to get a judgment of divorce by Supreme Court expeditiously, rather than engage in a protracted case with her husband in the contested matrimonial parts. The Court believed that the plaintiff-wife manipulatively hoped to bypass the Supreme Court on the issue of support payments and get the Family Court to order child support. Unfortunately, for the plaintiff-wife, the Clerk in the Family Court directed the plaintiff-wife to return to Supreme Court to amend the Judgment of Divorce.

Supreme Court referred to Mestrovic v. Mestrovic, 133 N.Y.S.2d 112 [Sup Ct Onondaga County 1953] [not officially reported], where the court vacated an annulment where it had been procured by false statements that were made to the Official Referee. In Mestrovic v. Mestrovic, the Court stated: [I]n the case of matrimonial actions ... the withholding of information from the court which, if disclosed, might cause the court to take a different view of the facts, is as much a fraud upon the court as actual misstatements of fact and in matrimonial actions, the People of the State of New York have an interest as a matter of public policy in addition to the rights of the plaintiff and defendant as between themselves.

Supreme Court denied the motion, vacated the Judgment of Divorce and dismissed the action with leave to file new papers, to be completed honestly, under a new index number, which shall disclose the attempt by the plaintiff to obtain a judgment of divorce.

See also the decision of the same court in N.C. v. M.C., Slip Copy, 2012 WL 6621726 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52325(U).

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Fraud - Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Fraud - Party with information which calls into question accuracy of opposing party's representations is charged with responsibility of using ordinary skill and intelligence to investigate such representations and failure to do so will result in dismissal of fraud claim based on such representations on ground he can not establish that he justifiably relied on them

In FC v RB, 2012 WL 6634558 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52342(U) parties entered into in open court stipulation before a Special Referee after both parties were fully allocuted, which pertained, inter alia, to the responsibility for certain expenses incurred during the custody dispute. Pursuant to that portion of the Stipulation, F.C. agreed to waive his right to seek attorney fees incurred with respect to the custody dispute, and waived his right to seek reapportionment of fees charged for the Court-appointed forensic evaluation and for the attorney for the child up to the date of the Stipulation. In March 2009, in the midst of a Hearing, F.C. made the a motion to vacate the Stipulation, claiming that his agreement to it was induced by fraud.

Supreme Court held that in order to prevail on a fraud claim, F. C. Had to prove each of the following elements: that the other party intentionally made a misstatement or omission of a material fact, upon which the moving party justifiably relied, to his detriment. Shultis v. Reichel-Shultis, 1 AD3d 876, 877 (3d Dept.2003) ("As with any fraud claim, the proponent must establish (1) misrepresentation of a material fact, (2) scienter, (3) justifiable reliance and (4) injury or damages.").

F.C. based his claim primarily upon R. B.'s alleged intentional concealment from F.C. of her husband's income and assets at the time. F. C.'s claim of concealment was predicated in turn upon the purported understatement of R. B.s' income and assets in the body of the Net Worth Statement prepared by R.B. in 2004 in the context of the proceeding before the Referee that ultimately resulted in the Stipulation at issue. The Court held, based upon the testimony and documentary evidence adduced at the hearing revealed, that F.C. failed to sustain his burden of proof with respect to two essential elements of the alleged fraud: namely, that R.B. possessed the requisite intent to deceive him, or that under the circumstances that then obtained, F.C. had a right to rely upon any misstatements or omissions that R.B. may have made in the body of the Net Worth Statement with respect to the Bs' 2004 income and assets. F. C.'s fraud claim was belied by the Net Worth Statement itself. The Statement, including its attachments revealed, Mr. B.'s and the Bs' salary income at the time for all to see. F.C. then he had a duty to investigate the accuracy of the income and asset items listed in the body of the Statement, a duty which he either failed or refused to properly discharge. This alone doomed F. C.'s claim of fraud; the law will not protect those who purport to be so blind to facts presented to them that they refuse to see what has been faithfully revealed, or to investigate when so prompted.

Supreme Court found that the law is clear that a party may not permissibly maintain that he or she relied on an allegedly false document when, at once, other information, including, here, another portion of that same document, contradicts or calls into question the purportedly false term, thereby putting that party on notice and placing upon him the burden to investigate and inquire into the discrepancies. Numerous courts have held that a party with information at his disposal which calls into question the accuracy of an opposing party's representations may not sit idly by and then scream fraud. Rather, that party is charged with the responsibility of using his ordinary skill and intelligence to investigate such representations; his failure to do so will relegate to dismissal any fraud claim based on such representations on that ground that he could not establish that he justifiably relied on them. Stuart Silver Associates, Inc. v. Baco Development Corp., 245 A.D.2d 96 (1st Dept.1997); Global Minerals and Metals Corp. v. James W. Holme, 35 AD3d 93 (1st Dept.2006); Rodas v. Manitaras, 159 A.D.2d 341, 343 (1st Dept.1990); New York City School Construction Auth. v. Koren-DiResta Construction Co., Inc. 249 A.D.2d 205 (1st Dept.1998); Travelers Indemity Company v. Flushing National Bank, 90 Misc.2d 964, 973 (Sup.Ct. Queens Co.1977); Cohen v. Colistra, 233 A.D.2d 542, 543 (3d Dept.1996); McGovern v. T.J. Best Building and Remodeling, Inc. 245 A.D.2d 925, 927-928 (3d Dept.1997) (plaintiffs cannot justifiably rely upon representations made with respect to these or any other matters that, through the exercise of ordinary intelligence, they could have ascertained the veracity of on their own); In Monahan v. Monahan, 2 Misc.3d 1011(A), 2004 WL 869592, 2004 N.Y. Slip op. 50296(U) (Sup. Ct ., Nassau Co.2004) the Court held that even if the defendant's attorney made misrepresentations to plaintiff's attorney during the course of courthouse negotiations, concerning the value of the annuity or the amount of the disability benefits, the plaintiff was not justified in relying on the representations. The defendant did not conceal the annuity or his disability income, The plaintiff contended only that their values were misrepresented. If the plaintiff believed the misrepresentations were so material such that she would not have entered into the stipulation but for said representations, she had the option of seeking an adjournment to afford her the opportunity to confirm said values, or she could have required a representation on the record with regard to same.

In light of the Attachment to the Net Worth Statement with which he was admittedly provided by R. B., F.C. clearly failed to establish an essential element of his claim that he was fraudulently induced to enter into the Stipulation, the element of justifiable reliance. Thus, Plaintiff's motion was denied in all respects.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Hearing - No Right to Dispositional Hearing

In Marisela N. v. Lacy M.S. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6013079 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that an order of protection is valid despite the lack of a dispositional hearing. There is no explicit statutory mandate that a dispositional hearing be conducted in proceedings under Family Court Act article 8 (Matter of Hazel P.R. v. Paul J.P., 34 AD3d 307, 308 [1st Dept 2006]).

Juvenile Delinquency - Family Court - Jurisdiction - Family Court Was Not Authorized to Initiate a Motion under FCA § 355.1(1) to Modify a Prior Dispositional Order

In re Rayshawn P., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5950511 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division considered two questions left open by the Court of Appeals' decision in Matter of Jazmin A. (15 NY3d 439, 443 n * [2010]): (1) "whether a properly made motion under Family Court Act § 355.1 to stay, modify or terminate an order of probation based on change of circumstances would provide an alternative means of initiating proceedings to revoke probation, and (2) whether detention would be authorized pending resolution of such a motion", and answered both questions in the negative.

By a final order of disposition entered April 7, 2011, (the 2010 case), Family Court adjudicated appellant Rayshawn P. a juvenile delinquent, placed him on probation for 18 months, and ordered him to perform 50 hours of community service. On June 29, 2011, appellant was arrested for resisting arrest after he was apprehended for allegedly punching someone in the face. On June 30, 2011, upon the application of the detention center holding appellant based on his arrest the previous day, Family Court conducted a pre-petition hearing pursuant to Family Court Act §307.4. The police witness, testified that she placed appellant under arrest after he was brought to the precinct station. The Officer stated that she arrested appellant based on information provided to her by her lieutenant, who told her that he had seen appellant "engaging in an assault," and that as he tried to arrest him, appellant had "started to kick, punch, and throw in the direction of the officers ." The Officer acknowledged that she had no personal knowledge of the events on which the arrest was based. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court determined that it had jurisdiction over the matter arising from the June 29 arrest. However, the court did not grant the pre-petition detention application before it, which, under Family Court Act § 307.4(7), would have entitled appellant to the filing of a petition and a probable-cause hearing within four days. Instead, the court, at its own instance, and over the objection of appellant's counsel, reactivated appellant's 2010 case for which he was already on probation, and stated that it was "remanding the respondent, open remand, pending modification of that disposition." The court then dismissed the pre-petition application, without prejudice to the filing of a petition, and adjourned the matter to July 18, 2011.

The case file contained two written orders of the Family Court bearing the date of June 30, 2011, both under the docket number of the 2010 case, which had already been finally adjudicated. One was an order to show cause, which, "[u]pon the Court's own motion pursuant to Family Court Act § 355.1(1)," directed appellant to show cause, at a hearing to be held on July 18, 2011, "(1) why the Court should not make a determination that there has been a substantial change of circumstances since the entry of the order of disposition, in that respondent's arrest for the commission of one or more acts of juvenile delinquency on 6/30/11, constitutes a violation of the order which placed him under probation supervision in this case; (2) why the Court should not enter an order in accordance with Family Court Act § 355.1(1)(b) vacating, modifying or terminating the order of disposition based upon such substantial change of circumstances; and (3) why the Court should not enter such interim orders as may be necessary to protect the best interests of the respondent and the safety of the community ."

Appellant's counsel objected on the grounds that, under Family Court Act § 307.4, the purpose of the June 30, 2011, pre-petition hearing was only to determine whether the court had jurisdiction, and did not provide a basis for remanding appellant to detention or revoking his probation. Counsel also maintained that no order to show cause had been served on the Legal Aid Society. Counsel argued that the court had unlawfully remanded Rayshawn to detention because no petition alleging a violation of probation (VOP) (Family Court Act § 360.2[1]) had been filed, and that, under Matter of Jazmin A. (15 NY3d 439 [2010]), the court did not have authority to remand a juvenile to detention during the period of probation in the absence of a pending VOP petition. Counsel further asserted that the court could not use § 355.1 to revoke probation, and that, in any event, the court had not complied with that section's procedural requirements. The judge responded, "I did not revoke probation. I remanded your client pending a determination as to whether or not probation was to be revoked, that is, pursuant to the statute [§ 355.1]." The court added that the order to show cause was "to get the parties into court to be heard," and that the parties had an opportunity to be heard at the pre-petition hearing. The June 30 order to show cause was never served either upon appellant's counsel personally or upon the offices of the Legal Aid Society before Family Court issued the remand order.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court was not authorized to initiate a motion under § 355.1(1) to modify a prior dispositional order based on alleged conduct by appellant that, if proven, would constitute a VOP. The modification order, because it was rendered pursuant to such an unauthorized motion, had to be vacated as invalid.

The remand order of June 30, 2011, pursuant to which appellant was placed in detention pending determination of Family Court's §355.1(1) motion was reviewed by the court although moot. In reviewing the modification order, the Court had already determined that Family Court was without authority to address appellant's alleged VOP by initiating a § 355.1(1) motion to modify the preexisting dispositional order. Because the remand order was issued as an adjunct to the § 355.1(1) motion, and the § 355.1(1) motion was itself unauthorized, the remand order would be invalid even if § 355.1 or §

355.2 (which sets forth the procedures to be followed on a § 355.1 motion) provided authority for an order detaining a juvenile pending the determination of a § 355.1 motion. Even if Family Court did have the authority to initiate the § 355.1(1) motion, the remand order would still be unauthorized because nothing in § 355.1 or § 355.2 authorized the court to remand appellant to custody pending determination of a motion under § 355.1.

The Appellate Division pointed out that in Matter of Jazmin A. (15 NY3d 439 [2010]), the Court of Appeals held that a juvenile may be remanded to detention only at "specific junctures in a delinquency proceeding" spelled out in the Family Court Act. Thus, in Jazmin A., Family Court was held to lack authority to order the detention of the respondent probationer when she appeared in court for a monitoring hearing, before any VOP petition had been filed. As the Court of Appeals explained: "Because the Legislature did not ... empower Family Court to order detention of a juvenile probationer before the filing of a VOP petition, we are unwilling to imply such authority in the absence of a statutory peg". The Court of Appeals further noted that Family Court's "continuing jurisdiction [over a juvenile probationer] does not vest [the court] with the power to take actions not authorized by article 3 [of the Family Court Act]". In Jazmin A. the Court noted that the points at which the Family Court Act authorizes detention are the pre-petition hearing (§ 307.4[4][c]), the initial post-petition appearance or an adjournment thereof (§§ 320.1, 320.4[2]), the probable cause hearing (§ 325.3[3]), and "after a VOP petition is filed" (§ 360.3[2][b]). Although the question of "whether detention would be authorized pending resolution of [a § 355.1] motion" was not presented in Jazmin A., the Appellate Division held that implication of the decision for that question was clear. Given that neither § 355.1 nor § 355.2 offers any "statutory peg" on which to hang authority for remanding appellant to detention, the remand order in this case was invalid, even if Family Court's § 355.1 motion were itself authorized. Accordingly, the remand order was vacated.

Appeals - Inadequate Record on Appeal - Effect upon Determination - Appeal Dismissed for Failure to Assemble Proper Record.

In Rubio-Modica v. Modica,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5935928 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that it is an appellant's obligation to assemble a proper record on appeal. The record must contain all of the relevant papers that were before the Supreme Court. Plaintiff sought review, inter alia, of the portion of the Supreme Court's order which denied her motion to vacate a previous order in a separate action. However, the record did not contain the papers constituting the plaintiff's separate motion to vacate that previous order. Where, as here, meaningful appellate review of the Supreme Court's determination is made "virtually impossible" because of the incomplete nature of the record submitted, dismissal of that portion of the appeal is the appropriate disposition. Thus, the plaintiff's appeal from so much of the order as denied her motion to vacate the previous order was dismissed.

With respect to the part of the record that was sufficient to decide the appeal from other parts of the order appealed from, the Appellate Division observed that defendant in this action "is not available or refuses to comply" with a Florida judgment of divorce directing him to transfer, to the plaintiff, title to certain real property situated in Queens County. As such, pursuant to the judgment of divorce, the Supreme Court should have appointed a receiver and directed him to transfer the defendant's interest in the property to the plaintiff. The plaintiff demonstrated the defendant's refusal or unavailability to comply by establishing that he opposed the transfer of title and left the country.

Attorneys - Disqualification of Counsel - Disqualification Denied for Failure to Show That the Prior Representation Was Substantially Related to the Current Representation.

In Gabel v Gabel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6028922 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) defendant moved to disqualify the plaintiff's counsel on the ground that counsel had previously represented the defendant in connection with her formation of a corporation. The Supreme Court granted the motion.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that a party seeking disqualification of its adversary's lawyer must prove: (1) the existence of a prior attorney-client relationship between the moving party and opposing counsel, (2) that the matters involved in both representations are substantially related, and (3) that the interests of the present client and former client are materially adverse" (Tekni-Plex, Inc. v. Meyner & Landis, 89 N.Y.2d 123, 131) Due to the significant competing interests inherent in attorney disqualification cases, the Court of Appeals has advised against "mechanical application of blanket rules," in favor of a "careful appraisal of the interests involved". The defendant failed to show that the prior representation was substantially related to the current representation. Specifically, the defendant did not argue, and there were no facts in the record to support a finding, that the prior representation concerned any confidential information regarding the value of the corporation or that the attorney was provided with any information that is not contained in the corporate filing itself. Further, the defendant refused to provide the plaintiff with discovery concerning the corporation, contending that the corporation was "closed" and that the defendant never realized any profits from it. Under the particular circumstances of this case, there was nothing to suggest an appearance of impropriety concerning the attorney's representation of the plaintiff in the divorce action and, therefore, the defendant's motion for disqualification should have been denied.

Paternity - Defense of Equitable Estoppel - Applied to Deny Biological Father Right to Assert Paternity Claim

In Matter of Rason S.B. v. Alexis H., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6028962 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the issue on appeal was who should be legally recognized as the father of the subject child. Two persons claimed to be the father: the appellant, Marquis B., also known as Marquis H. B., and Rason S.B. Following the birth of the child on January 16, 2005, the mother, Alexis H., and Rason S. B., signed an acknowledgment of paternity. According to the appellant's testimony at the hearing, he and the mother maintained a boyfriend-girlfriend relationship before the child's birth, but that relationship ended shortly after the child was born. The appellant testified that he interacted with the child and introduced the child to his family. In February 2007, the appellant learned that he was the child's biological father. However, the evidence adduced at the hearing demonstrated that the child spent most of her time with Rason S. B., who had assumed the role of father of the child. In February 2009, the appellant and Rason S.B. met for the first time, and learned of their competing claims with respect to the child. Thereafter, the appellant commenced a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 5 to establish his paternity of the child. Family Court, after a hearing, inter alia, denied the paternity petition based upon equitable estoppel, dismissed that proceeding, and dismissed a related visitation proceeding .

The Appellate Division held that the Family Court properly applied the doctrine of equitable estoppel (Family Ct Act § 532[a]) to preclude the appellant from asserting his paternity claim with respect to the child. The paramount concern in applying equitable estoppel in paternity cases is the best interests of the child (see Matter of Juanita A. v. Kenneth Mark N., 15 NY3d 1, 5; Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D ., 7 NY3d 320, 326), not the equities between the adult parties. Although the mother concealed from the appellant the role that Rason S.B. occupied in the child's life, during the period in which the appellant delayed in asserting his paternity claim, the child developed a close relationship with Rason S.B. The Family Court correctly determined that the application of equitable estoppel served the best interests of the child by preserving her close relationship with Rason S. B., whom she identified as her father.

Agreements - Postnuptial - Validity - Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3) - Manifestly Unfair - Post Nuptial Set Aside Where Manifestly Unfair.

In Petracca v. Petracca, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6030894 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were married on December 16, 1995. In March 1996, the parties entered into a postnuptial agreement. The agreement provided that the jointly-owned marital residence, which had been purchased for approximately $3.1 million after the parties were married, and which was subsequently renovated at a cost of between $3 million and $5 million, was the defendant's separate property. It further provided that if the parties divorced, the plaintiff, who had not been employed other than as a homemaker since October 1995, would waive her interest in any business in which the defendant had an interest, including any appreciation in the value of such interests accruing during the marriage. At the time the agreement was entered into, the defendant valued his interests in these business entities at over $10 million. The plaintiff also waived any and all rights she had to the defendant's estate, including her right to an elective share. At the time the agreement was entered into, the defendant valued his net worth at more than $22 million. Finally, the agreement provided that if the parties divorced, the plaintiff would waive any right to maintenance except as provided in schedule "C" of the agreement, which indicated that the plaintiff could receive maintenance of between $24,000 and $36,000 per year, for varying lengths of time, depending on the duration of the marriage. The defendant's obligation to pay the limited maintenance enumerated in the agreement was contingent upon his receipt of certain visitation with any children that the parties might have, and upon certain residency requirements imposed upon the plaintiff.

In 2008, the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce. In his answer, the defendant sought enforcement of the postnuptial agreement. A hearing was held at which both parties testified. The plaintiff testified that the defendant had presented the postnuptial agreement to her for signature days after her 42nd birthday, and shortly after she had suffered a miscarriage. She testified that the defendant had "bullied" her into signing the agreement by threatening that they would not have any children and that the marriage would be over if she did not consent to the postnuptial agreement. The plaintiff testified that she and the defendant had agreed to have children prior to the marriage, and that their agreement to have children had been an important factor in her decision to marry him. She signed the agreement within days of receiving it and, although she reviewed some portions of it, she did not understand its terms and did not consult an attorney. The plaintiff also adduced evidence demonstrating that the statement of the defendant's net worth contained in the agreement was inaccurate at the time it was made in that it was undervalued by at least $11 million.

When the defendant testified, he denied any knowledge of the plaintiff's miscarriage and stated that he had wanted the postnuptial agreement in order to protect his son from a prior marriage. The defendant testified that the parties had discussed the issue of entering into a postnuptial agreement prior to the marriage and that they had negotiated the postnuptial agreement over the course of many weeks. The defendant testified that his attorney had drafted the agreement and that he believed that the plaintiff had consulted with her own attorney, although she had not disclosed her attorney's name to him. The defendant explained that the marital residence had been purchased in both parties' names because the plaintiff said she wanted to have her name on it "for perception purposes, for other people," but that she had been willing to sign the agreement converting it into the defendant's separate property shortly after its purchase.

In a decision made after the hearing, the Supreme Court expressed doubts as to the defendant's veracity and credited the plaintiff's testimony over conflicting portions of the defendant's testimony. The court found that the plaintiff had not been represented by counsel and had been precluded from effectively analyzing the financial impact of the postnuptial agreement due to the inaccuracies contained in the financial disclosures that had been incorporated into the agreement. The court determined that the terms of the agreement were "wholly unfair" and, after examining the totality of the circumstances, concluded that it was unenforceable. In a subsequent order, made upon the decision, the court granted the plaintiff's cross motion to set aside the postnuptial agreement.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that in general, a postnuptial agreement which is regular on its face will be recognized and enforced by the courts in much the same manner as an ordinary contract. Because of the fiduciary relationship between spouses, postnuptial agreements "are closely scrutinized by the courts, and such agreements are more readily set aside in equity under circumstances that would be insufficient to nullify an ordinary contract. To warrant equity's intervention, no actual fraud need be shown, for relief will be granted if the [agreement] is manifestly unfair to a spouse because of the other's overreaching" (Christian v. Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 72-73). In determining whether a postnuptial agreement is invalid, "courts may look at the terms of the agreement to see if there is an inference, or even a negative inference, of overreaching in its execution. A spouse seeking to set aside a postnuptial agreement initially bears the burden to establish a fact-based, particularized inequality. Where this initial burden is satisfied, a proponent of a postnuptial agreement "suffers the shift in burden to disprove fraud or overreaching.

Here, the plaintiff demonstrated that the terms of the postnuptial agreement were manifestly unfair given the nature and magnitude of the rights she waived, particularly the relinquishment of her property rights in the marital residence and her waiver of all of her inheritance rights, in light of the vast disparity in the parties' net worth and earnings. Inasmuch as the terms of the agreement were manifestly unfair to the plaintiff and were unfair when the agreement was executed, they give rise to an inference of overreaching. This inference of overreaching was bolstered by the evidence submitted by the plaintiff, including her testimony, regarding the circumstances which led her to give her assent to the postnuptial agreement. The defendant's testimony which tended to show that he did not engage in overreaching raised an issue of credibility, and it declined to disturb the Supreme Court's determination with respect thereto.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Child Support - Modification - Downward - Inability to Work - Burden of Proof - Modification Denied for Failure to Prove Medical Inability to Work

In Matter of St. Lawrence County Support Collection Unit ex rel. Streetman v. Laneuville, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6049717 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) pursuant to a January 2008 order, respondent was required to pay over $26,000 in child support arrears in monthly payments of $100, with the monthly amount increasing to $160 in August 2008. In August 2011, petitioner commenced a proceeding on behalf of the child's mother, alleging that respondent had not made any payments since June 2009. A Support Magistrate found respondent to be in willful violation of the prior order, and Family Court confirmed that finding, sentencing respondent to a 60-day jail term, suspended on the condition that he pay at least $130 monthly toward the arrears.

The Appellate Division affirmed. The respondent testified that medical issues prohibited him from working. In support, he presented various medical records from 2011 and the testimony of his treating physician. Although the physician testified that respondent was unable to work due to neck discomfort and an inability to perform repetitive motions without fatiguing, she admitted that her opinion was based on respondent's subjective complaints, with no evidence of objective testing. There was no indication in the medical records submitted by respondent that he was unable to work. Accordingly, respondent failed to meet his burden of demonstrating an inability to make his required support payments and, therefore, the finding of a willful violation was warranted.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Home State - Domestic Relations Law §76 - Family Court Lacks Subject Matter Jurisdiction Where New York Not Child's Home State

In Matter of Boivin v. Gonzalez, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6049775 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were the parents of a child born in July 2010 in Puerto Rico. The child and respondent (mother) continued to reside in Puerto Rico until May 2011, when petitioner (father) transported them, together with the mother's child from another relationship, to his home in Schenectady County. In October 2011, following a domestic dispute, the mother and the children sought temporary housing assistance from the Schenectady County Department of Social Services and, three weeks later, they returned to Puerto Rico. After the mother and child left the father's residence, the father commenced this proceeding seeking custody of the child. The mother sought dismissal of the proceeding on the ground that Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction because New York was not the child's home state pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76. Following a hearing, Family Court determined that it did not have jurisdiction over the matter and dismissed the petition.

The father argued on appeal that the mother wrongfully removed the child from New York and, therefore, the period of time that she had spent in Puerto Rico since leaving New York should count toward the six-month period required to establish New York as her home state for jurisdictional purposes. The Appellate Division observed that the father did not raise the issue of wrongful removal before Family Court and, therefore, it was not preserved for appellate review. In any event, the record did not support the contention that the mother's return to Puerto Rico with the child was wrongful, and it was clear from the father's own testimony that the child did not reside in New York for a period of six months at any time prior to the commencement of this proceeding. Therefore, the basic requirements for jurisdiction were not present and the proceeding was properly dismissed.

Supreme Court

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Evidence - Burden of Proof - Failure of Parties to Present Sufficient Evidence Warrants Denial of Relief

In C.M.S. v. W.T.S., 2012 WL 6062535 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52221(U) Unreported Disposition the husband and wife each testified at trial. Neither side introduced any pertinent documents, not even statements of net worth. The wife, as plaintiff, called her husband to testify and the husband called the wife. The wife's counsel called the wife again as a rebuttal witness, but the testimony was short and uncomplicated, consisting of less than a dozen questions.

The facts established that the couple had one unemancipated college-aged daughter. There was no direct testimony that the child was spending time with either parent. There was no evidence of where she spent her time prior to leaving for college or where she resided when home from college. The husband acknowledged having paid child support to his wife, which raised an inference that he conceded that the wife was the primary residential parent. In addition, the husband admitted that he had virtually no communication with his unemancipated daughter. The court concluded, based on these circumstantial facts, that the wife was the primary residential parent for the unemancipated daughter, triggering the husband's obligation to pay child support. The husband was apparently self-employed and testified that he received no benefits. The proof of the husband's income was sparse: no tax returns were produced, no W-2 wage forms, or federal tax Form 1099 for any time during the last five years were offered at trial. The husband testified that he was a contract engineer for an area software design firm and paid $75,000 over an 18-month period from January 2010 to May 2012 (a $50,000 annual salary). There was no evidence that he paid social security taxes or medicare taxes from that amount. Mojdeh M. v. Jamshid A., 36 Misc.3d 1209A (Sup.Ct. Kings Cty 2012) (no reduction of income for payment of FICA unless proof it was paid). The court declined to infer that such taxes were paid. Based on this evidence, the court concluded that the husband had an annual income of $50,000 during most of the past two years and given his experience, his past income, his lengthy history of employment at a local college, his testimony regarding his skills while working for family business during the period of his marriage, and as his possession of two advanced degrees, this court imputed an annual income of $50,000 to the husband. The husband testified that he was currently unemployed and seeking work. He testified that he suffered a heart attack in May 2012, which delayed his active return to seeking employment. He testified that he had sent out "numerous resumes" in the last three months, but had done nothing else to obtain employment. He testified that he was currently living on accrued savings. However, the trial proof failed to substantiate a reduction in the imputed income. The husband failed to produce a copy of his current resume. There was no evidence of any distribution of the resume, no letters from employers acknowledging receipt of the resume, or any other corroborative evidence of the husband's employment search. Consistent with the Child Support Standards Act ("CSSA"), the husband's annual child support for a single child, based on the $50,000 in imputed annual income, was $8,500 or $163.46 per week. Neither party testified to the criteria set forth in the CSSA to establish the appropriate support for the child. Even though this testimony was not before the court, the court found that this amount was consistent with the CSSA. Since neither party objected to this "by-the-book" calculation, the court, mindful of its obligations under the CSSA to provide adequate support for the child, awarded child support in the amount of $163.46 per week.

The court considered contributions to college expenses but there was very little proof on which to make a determination. As a result, this court declined to require either parent to contribute any sums for the college expenses for their daughter. There was no proof of the cost of health insurance for the unemancipated daughter or who provided such insurance currently. In the absence of such proof, the court ordered the wife, who worked as a teacher, to procure health insurance for the unemancipated daughter to the extent permitted by federal or state law. Because there was no substantiated proof of the wife's income to establish respective pro rata contributions by the parents and no documentary evidence of the cost of insuring the child, this court declined to award the wife any proportionate contribution from the husband for the cost of the daughter's health insurance. Neither party introduced any competent evidence to justify any distribution of their assets and retirement accounts other than an award of the assets to the currently titled holder of those assets. The factors set forth in the Domestic Relations Law which the court should consider before awarding equitable distribution to this couple were not seriously referenced during the testimony. While the statute requires the court to consider these factors, and others, there was insufficient proof before the court to accord any weight to any of these factors in resolving equitable distribution of this couple's marital assets. The parties approach in this case appeared to mirror that of the couple in N.H. v. S.H., 28 Misc.3d 1217A (Sup.Ct. Nassau Cty 2010). The same lack of proof in N.H. v. S.H., compelled the same conclusion here: there was insufficient proof to require distribution of any of the couple's assets, and the assets titled in their respective names remained their property, freed from claims of equitable distribution.

Editors Comment: The inference that the wife was the primary residential parent, triggering the husband's obligation to pay child support, is questionable.

Adoption - Access to Adoption Records - Drl § 114(2) - Showing of "Good Cause" - Religion of Birth Parents Is Non-identifying Information Which May Be Provided to Petitioner

In re Application of Alice, L.L.T., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 6097581 (N.Y.Sur.) an adult who was born on March 2, 1953 and adopted on June 2, 1955, applied for access to her adoption records. The record reflected that in 1998 non-identifying information from petitioner's adoption records was furnished to her through the New York State Department of Health Adoption Information Registry. Petitioner now sought to unseal her adoption file in order to ascertain whether her birth mother was of the Jewish faith, as that would be determinative of petitioner's religion under Jewish law. The petition expressed a heartfelt and sincere desire to know the religion of her biological mother, but provided no other reason for unsealing the records.

The Court observed adoption records are sealed pursuant to DRL § 114, to protect and ensure confidentiality which is "vital to the adoption process". As expressed by the Court of Appeals, the purpose is to provide anonymity to the natural parents, enable the adoptive parents to form a close bond with their adopted child, protect the adopted child from possibly disturbing information that might be found in his records, and allow the state to foster an orderly and supervised adoption system (Matter of Linda F.M., 52 N.Y.2d 236, 239 [1981]. At the same time, the courts and the Legislature have recognized that circumstances may exist in which it is vital that an adopted child be provided with information regarding his background (Matter of Peter B., 12 Misc.3d 1184[A] [Sur Ct, Nassau County 2006]). When serious health issues arise, an adopted child or his adoptive parents may seek the medical history of the child's biological family pursuant to DRL § 114(4). This statute permits interested parties seeking medical information to establish a prima facie case of good cause. It is also possible to petition the court for access to adoption records for other reasons pursuant to DRL § 114(2). This section provides that adoption records may be unsealed upon a showing of "good cause." It further directs that there must be "due notice to the adoptive parents and to such additional persons as the court may direct." While it is unusual for adoption records to be unsealed for a non-medical reason, exceptions to the medical requirement are rare but do occur occasionally. In weighing the opposing interests, courts may deny an adoptee's request to unseal her adoption record for lack of good cause.

The Court found that the facts presented did not contain sufficient information on which the court might order the unsealing of petitioner's adoption records on the basis of good cause or dispense with the due notice requirement of DRL § 114(2). At the same time, the information sought by the petitioner was specifically included under the definition of non-identifying information which may be provided to petitioner (Public Health Law 4138-c [3][e]). Thus, the court denied the application to unseal the records for lack of good cause, but advised the petitioner that her biological mother listed her religion as Protestant (Lutheran).

Evidence - Admissibility - Tape Recordings - The Predicate for Admission of Tape Recordings in Evidence Is Clear and Convincing Proof That the Tapes Are Genuine and That They Have Not Been Altered

In Grucci v Grucci, --- N.E.2d ----, 2012 WL 5845008 (N.Y.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 07856 Plaintiff Michael Grucci and defendant Christine Grucci were married in 1988 and had two children. In 1998, Christine sued Michael for divorce. A few months later, Michael was charged with harassing Christine, and the District Court issued an order of protection directing him to stay away from her. In January 2000, Michael was accused of violating the order. The matter was presented to a grand jury, which returned an indictment charging Michael with two counts of first-degree criminal contempt for placing Christine in fear of death or injury by telephone, and harassing her by repeated telephone calls with no purpose of legitimate communication (Penal Law § 215.51[b][iii], [iv], respectively). After a bench trial in August 2001, County Court acquitted Michael. The court concluded that Christine's testimony was not credible because of "discrepanc[ies]" in the way she described Michael's alleged threat to the police, the grand jury and at trial. In March 2002, Michael brought a civil action against Christine to recover damages for malicious prosecution. At trial Michael sought, through the testimony of his brother, Anthony Grucci, to play for the jury an audiotope of a telephone conversation in which Christine purportedly made clear to Anthony, at some point after she went to the police, that she was not afraid of Michael. Christine's attorney successfully objected, inter alia, to admission of the audiotope.

Michael's attorney sought to play the audiotape during Anthony's testimony "as part of [his] presentation of [the telephone] conversation" with Christine that Anthony was recounting. Christine's attorney objected to the audiotape's admission on the grounds it was unreliable, "pieced together from a number of things" and "unintelligible"; that no chain of custody had been established; and generally that "no foundation [had been] laid for it at [that] point." In response, Michael's attorney offered only to have Anthony identify the voices on the tape and state "whether or not the tape recording [was] fair and accurate." When the judge asked if the tape had been authenticated, Michael's attorney responded "Not yet; this witness will authenticate." The judge then sustained the objection, and Michael's attorney stated that he had no further questions for Anthony.

The Court of Appeals affirmed. In an unsigned memorandum, it observed that while a party to a taped conversation can identify the speakers, "identity and authenticity are separate facets of the required foundation, both of which must be established" (People v. Ely, 68 N.Y.2d 520, 528 [1986]). The Court of Appeals stated: "The predicate for admission of tape recordings in evidence is clear and convincing proof that the tapes are genuine and that they have not been altered" (People v Ely, supra, at 522). Here, there was no attempt to offer proof about who recorded the conversation, how it was recorded (e.g., the equipment used) or the chain of custody during the nearly nine years that elapsed between early 2000, when the conversation allegedly took place, and the trial in late 2008. Given the facts and circumstances of this case, the judge did not abuse his discretion by requiring more than Anthony's representation that the tape was "fair and accurate" to establish a sufficient "predicate" before playing the tape for the jury.

Agreements - Construction - Ambiguity - Where Agreement Provision Is Ambiguous, the Construction of the Provision Is for the Trier of Fact.

In Kang v Kim, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 5845666 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the parties entered into an agreement in connection with their divorce, which provided, as relevant here, that the wife shall have exclusive possession of the marital residence,, until the occurrence of specified events upon which the residence would be sold. The agreement also stated that after January 1, 2011, the wife shall have the right to purchase the husband's interest in the apartment. The clause at issue provided: "If the parties are unable to agree as to the terms for such purchase within 30 days of the day that the Wife gave notice to the Husband then the value of the Husband's interest (the 'buy-out price') shall be one half of the value of the apartment as determined by a Real Estate Appraisers [sic] agreed to by the parties less the outstanding amount owed upon the First Mortgage."

The motion court held that this provision was unambiguous and that the buyout price was one half of the value of the apartment less the entire outstanding amount of the mortgage. The husband asserted on appeal that the buyout price was half the value of the apartment less the wife's share of the mortgage, which is one-half of the outstanding amount of the mortgage, i.e., one half of the equity in the apartment.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that upon examination of the settlement agreement in its entirety, and considering the relation of the parties and the circumstances under which it was executed, the agreement was ambiguous because the provision was reasonably susceptible of more than one interpretation. Notably, the agreement also provided that all marital property is to be divided 50/50 and that if the premises is sold to a third party, the "net proceeds of sale" shall be divided equally. In light of the ambiguity, the construction of the provision was for the trier of fact.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Fact-finding Hearing Was Procedurally Flawed and Unfair to Respondent Where the Petitioner Was Allowed to Respond to Respondent's Version of Events.

In Matter of Melissa H. v. Shameer S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5846356 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) after a fact-finding hearing, Family Court determined that respondent father had committed acts constituting the family offenses of aggravated harassment in the second degree and assault in the second degree against petitioner mother, and, after a finding of aggravated circumstances, issued a five-year order of protection against him.

The Appellate Division reversed, on the law, without costs, vacated the orders vacated, and remitted for a new hearing. It held that the fact-finding hearing was procedurally flawed and unfair to respondent. The court failed to conduct a "searching inquiry" to ensure that respondent knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his statutory right to counsel (Family Ct Act § 262[a][ii]). The court concluded, without reviewing any financial documentation, that respondent was ineligible for assigned counsel. The court asked him only if he wished to have the matter adjourned so that he could retain counsel at his own expense. When respondent answered in the negative, the court proceeded to ask him questions relevant to the then-pending competing petitions for custody of the parties' children. There was no indication that respondent understood that from this point on the preliminary hearing would become the fact-finding hearing with respect to the family offense petition. Although respondent had asked to make a statement in response to allegations made by petitioner, there was no indication that he understood that upon doing so, the court would then transform his statements into his testimony for purposes of the fact-finding hearing on the family offense petition. The court had cautioned respondent that what he said could be used against him in the pending criminal case, but assured him that the court would not hold what he said against him in this proceeding. However, the court did just that. In addition, rather than having to first present a prima facie case in support of the allegations in her petition, the petitioner was allowed to respond only to respondent's version of events.

Agreements - Construction - Retirement Benefits - Where Stipulation Did Not Include Survivorship Benefits Provision but Survivorship Benefits Were Incorporated into Judgment of Divorce, Supreme Court Properly Denied the Plaintiff's Motion to Vacate or Modify it since He Never Moved to Resettle the Judgment.

In DeEttore v. DeEttore, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5503574 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which denied the plaintiff former husbands motion to vacate or modify a "Court Order Acceptable for Processing". The plaintiff contended on appeal that stated portions of a "Court Order Acceptable for Processing" dated February 10, 2011, directing the equitable distribution of his benefits under the Federal Civil Service Retirement System, gave the defendant survivorship benefits that were not agreed upon by the parties in their stipulation of settlement made in open court. The term "court order acceptable for processing" is a term used under the Federal Civil Service Retirement System for an order dividing pension assets (5 CFR 838.302). It is similar in effect to a Qualified Domestic Relations Order (see Elwell v. Elwell, 34 AD3d 1337, 1338). The Appellate Division agreed with the plaintiff that the parties' stipulation of settlement was silent as to the contested survivorship benefits, and therefore could not be read to include them (see Kazel v. Kazel, 3 NY3d 331, 334-335; McCoy v. Feinman, 99 N.Y.2d 295, 302-303). However, the contested survivorship benefits were incorporated into the judgment of divorce, and the husband never moved to resettle the judgment. The purpose of a retirement benefits order such as the COAP is to distribute benefits in accordance with the underlying stipulation or judgment of divorce. Since the COAP reflected the terms of the divorce judgment, the Supreme Court properly denied the plaintiff's motion to vacate or modify it.

Agreements - Construction - Definiteness - Stipulation must Be "Definite and Complete. Court Properly Refused to Enforce Stipulation Which Was Not Definite and Complete.

In Feltman v. Feltman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5503640 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the mothers petition to enforce so much of a stipulation between the parties as related to summer camp expenses. It observed that absent the formalities required by statute, a stipulation of settlement is not enforceable (see CPLR 2104). Pursuant to CPLR 2104, "[a]n agreement between parties or their attorneys relating to any matter in an action, other than one made between counsel in open court, is not binding upon a party unless it is in a writing subscribed by him or his attorney or reduced to the form of an order and entered". The stipulation must be "definite and complete" (Town of Warwick v. Black Bear Campgrounds, 95 AD3d 1002, 1003; Matter of Dolgin Eldert Corp., 31 N.Y.2d 1, 8-9), and all material terms must be presented (see Bonnette v. Long Is. Coll. Hosp., 3 NY3d 281, 283). Here, the stipulation contained so many factual errors, ambiguities, cross-outs, and handwritten alterations which were never initialed by the parties, that it could not be said to be definite and complete. The Family Court therefore properly denied the mother's objections.

Child Custody - UCCJEA - Domestic Relations Law §76-f [1] - Second Department Holds That Family Offense Proceeding Did Not Constitute a "Child Custody Proceeding" Within the Meaning of the UCCJEA Where it Did Not Raise an Issue of Legal Custody, Physical Custody, or Visitation with Respect to the Children

In Matter of Hassan v. Silva, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5503641 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father appealed from orders of the Family Court as, upon finding that the Court of Common Pleas, Monroe County, Pennsylvania, was the more appropriate forum for the father to seek custody of the subject children, or obtain any other related relief, declined jurisdiction over the matters and dismissed his child custody and family offense petitions upon the ground that New York is an inconvenient forum.

The Appellate Division pointed out that a court of this state which has jurisdiction under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, may decline to exercise it if it finds that New York is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum (Domestic Relations Law §76-f[1]) The factors to be considered in making this determination include the length of time the child has resided outside the state, the distance between the court in this state and the court in the state or country that would assume jurisdiction, the nature and location of the evidence required to resolve the pending litigation, the ability of the court of each state to decide the issue expeditiously and the procedures necessary to present the evidence, and the familiarity of the court of each state with the facts and issues in the pending litigation (Domestic Relations Law § 76-f[2]). Family Court providently exercised its discretion in adhering to so much of its original determination as declined jurisdiction over the father's custody petitions and dismissed those petitions on the ground that New York is an inconvenient forum. The children, who were now five and three years old, lived in Pennsylvania since August 2010 with the father's permission and, therefore, evidence regarding their care, well-being, and personal relationships was more readily available in Pennsylvania. There was no evidence that the children retained substantial connections with New York or that significant evidence was in this State. The Court of Common Pleas, Monroe County, Pennsylvania, was familiar with the family and the pending issues, having issued a final order of protection against the father in favor of the mother and children and an interim custody order in the mother's custody proceeding. Furthermore, the travel time between the courts was only 2 ½ hours, and the Pennsylvania court is willing to exercise jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Family Court properly determined that the Pennsylvania court was a more appropriate forum to determine the issues of custody and visitation.

However, the father's family offense proceeding did not constitute a "child custody proceeding" within the meaning of the UCCJEA since it did not raise an issue of legal custody, physical custody, or visitation with respect to the children (Domestic Relations Law §75-a[4]). Accordingly, the Family Court erred in dismissing it pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §76-f. All of the acts complained of in the petition occurred in New York (Family Ct Act § 818).

Spousal Support - Family Court Act § 412 - No Basis for the Determination to Direct the Wife to Pay Support to the Husband Where Wife Did Not Possess Sufficient Means to Support the Husband.

In Matter of Jacobi v Jacobi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5503642 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that pursuant to Family Court Act § 412, "[a] married person is chargeable with the support of his or her spouse and, if possessed of sufficient means or able to earn such means, may be required to pay for his or her support a fair and reasonable sum, as the court may determine, having due regard to the circumstances of the respective parties. This requires "a delicate balancing of each party's needs and means. Thus, the determination of a wife's spousal support obligation rests on the particular circumstances of the case, involving a balancing of factors such as her financial means, her need to have money on which to live after payments are made, the duration of the marriage, and the husband's ability to support himself. Under the circumstances presented here, there was no basis for the Support Magistrate's determination to direct the wife to pay support to the husband. The wife did not possess sufficient means to support the husband.

Equitable Distribution - Factors Considered - (13) Any Transfer or Encumbrance Made in Contemplation of a Matrimonial Action Without Fair Consideration - Proper to Equitably Distribute Husbands Interest in a Business Started During Marriage, and Purportedly Transferred to His Partner Before Commencement of Action for No Consideration

In Shah v Shah, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5503849 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court, which, inter alia, awarded the defendant 30% of his interest in Hi-Tech Trading (USA), Inc., and spousal maintenance in the sum of $4,000 per month for a period of four years. It pointed out that in determining the equitable distribution of marital property, the court may consider "any transfer or encumbrance made in contemplation of a matrimonial action without fair consideration" (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5][d] [13]. In equitably distributing the parties' assets, the Supreme Court properly considered the husbands interest in a business, known as Hi-Tech Trading (USA), Inc. which was started by the plaintiff and a partner during the marriage, and was purportedly transferred by the plaintiff to his partner shortly before commencement of the action for no consideration, There was no showing or finding that funds he allegedly invested in High Tech were his separate property, and, thus, his interest in Hi-Tech was properly equitably distributed. Under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court engaged in "double counting" with respect to the award of maintenance was without merit, as the plaintiff's businesses constituted tangible, income-producing assets, rather than intangible assets.

Maintenance - Award - Factors Considered - (1) the Income and Property of the Respective Parties Including Marital Property Distributed Pursuant to Subdivision Five of this Part - Proper to Average Defendants Income over Period of Years to Determine His Income for Purposes of Awarding Maintenance - Child Support Properly Denied During Pendency of Action Where, Plaintiff Did Not Allege, or Establish, That Daughter's Reasonable Needs Were Not Being Met.

In Weinheimer v. Weinheimer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5696371 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Supreme Court's judgment, inter alia, ordered defendant to pay maintenance to plaintiff in the amount of $600 per month. The Appellate Division observed that in determining the income of defendant husband for purposes of awarding maintenance, the court averaged defendant's income over a period of years. Although the court did not abuse its discretion in determining defendant's income for maintenance purposes in that manner it found no basis in the record for the court's finding that defendant's average income was approximately $48,000 per year. The court admitted in evidence defendant's pay stubs showing that his year-to-date earnings in 2010 were $55,068. Defendant's tax records for the four prior years reflected gross incomes of $58,999, $63,580, $53,981, and $63,370. No evidence was admitted concerning defendant's income for any other years. Not including 2010 due to incomplete data, defendant's average income was $59,982. Because the court, in determining defendant's maintenance obligation, understated his income by 20%, it concluded that, based on all of the factors enumerated in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(6)(a), the maintenance award should be increased to $725 per month, and modified accordingly.

The Appellate Division rejected plaintiff's contention that the court erred in denying her request for an award of child support. During the pendency of this action, the parties resided together in the marital residence. The parties' only unemancipated child was a 17-year-old daughter who attended community college and did not live at home. The daughter worked part-time while attending college, and her tuition was paid by student loans. Although the daughter returned home for holidays, she remained in her apartment during the summer and worked full-time. The fact that the parties continue to reside together does not bar an award of child support, where there has been a showing that the award is necessary to maintain the reasonable needs of the child during the litigation (Koerner v. Koerner, 170 A.D.2d 297, 298;see Harari v. Davis, 59 AD3d 182, 182;see also Salerno v. Salerno, 142 A.D.2d 670, 672). Here, however, plaintiff did not allege, much less establish, that the daughter's reasonable needs were not being met. The evidence demonstrated that, with a little financial assistance from both parents, all of the daughter's bills were being paid while she attended college and lived on her own.

The Appellate Division also rejected plaintiff's contention that the court erred in failing to award her attorney's fees at the conclusion of the case . Because plaintiff did not submit documentation identifying the services rendered by her attorney or the fees incurred, the court was precluded from awarding attorney's fees to her. In any event, it would have been within the court's discretion to deny plaintiff's request. Although plaintiff earned only $20,000 annually, she had previously been awarded interim attorney's fees, and the court's award of maintenance reduced the disparity in the parties' incomes.

Supreme Court

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Required Disclosures - Supreme Court Directs Both Counsel to Provide Time Records and Amount of Payments Received on Counsel Fee Application.

In Merrick v Merrick, 2012 WL 5682145 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52132(U) a contested action for divorce, the court heard the testimony and accepted the evidence of the parties. The matter was pending submission of counsels' post-trial memoranda. In addition, defendant's counsel was ordered to submit her time records relative to her client's demand for counsel fees. As of the last date of trial, plaintiff had reserved as to whether defendant's counsel would be required to testify as to her services rendered, or whether plaintiff would accept defendant's counsel's affidavit of services. The court ordered plaintiff's counsel to provide the court and defendant's counsel with his time records and the payments he received, or any balance due. The plaintiff's counsel wrote to the court requesting the court rescind its order for the production of his billing records, citing Match v. Match, 168 A.D.2d 226 (1st Dept.1990). He stated his client would agree that the demand for counsel fees by defendant's counsel may be considered on written papers and requested a briefing schedule. Defendant's counsel opposed the application of plaintiff's counsel to rescind the court's order directing submission of the billing records of plaintiff's counsel.

The court adhered to its prior order that billing records of plaintiff's counsel be produced. It pointed out that DRL § 237(a) now requires "(B)oth parties to the action or proceeding and their respective attorneys file shall an affidavit with the court detailing the financial agreement between the party and the attorney. Such affidavit shall include the amount of any retainer, the amounts paid and still owing thereunder, the hourly amounts charged by the attorney, the amounts paid, or be paid, any experts, and any additional costs, disbursements or expenses." Match v. Match, supra, predated the 2010 statutory amendment. The Court in Match held on those particular facts, it was an abuse of discretion to "shift the burden of proving plaintiff's counsel's fee to the defendant's counsel, by utilizing defendant's counsel's time records to assist in determining the reasonableness of plaintiff's counsel's request for attorney's fees, given what the trial court described as the "deplorable" records of plaintiff's counsel. It was the court's opinion that the amount of attorney's fees that each attorney had billed and received, or was owed from his/her client, was relevant to the prospective award of counsel fees. Such information assists the court in determining the extent and appropriateness of the work claimed to have been done, and provides a measure of the ability of each party to pay for his/her attorney's labor and services. The 2010 Amendment to DRL §237 requires mutual disclosure in such applications.

Maintenance - Award - Imputed Income - Evidence Established Plaintiff Earning More than He Reported.

In Maldonado v Maldonado, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5476102 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which, inter alia, awarded defendant 35% of the appreciation in value of plaintiff's Manhattan apartment, imputing tip income to plaintiff for the purpose of calculating child support, and directing plaintiff to pay defendant $15,000 in counsel fees. It held that defendant was properly awarded a portion of the appreciation of plaintiff's cooperative apartment. The record supported the court's findings that defendant played a role in the upkeep and maintenance of the apartment, contributed financially to the payments of the mortgage and maintenance, and contributed indirectly by acting as homemaker and mother. The court also providently exercised its discretion in imputing tip income to plaintiff since the evidence established that plaintiff was earning more than he reported on his tax returns. Plaintiff had not reported any tip income except in 2007 and the evidence showed that his cash expenditures greatly exceeded the sum of his cash withdrawals. The award of counsel fees to defendant was based upon a proper consideration of the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case. Plaintiff prolonged the trial by providing false and misleading information to his financial expert, with the result being that the expert's testimony had no value.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order - Waiver of Appellate Review by failure to file proof of service of copy of objections

In Matter of Lawrence v Bernier, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5416575 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the issues raised by the father on this appeal from a family court order were not reviewable. The Family Court properly denied the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order on the procedural ground that he failed to file proof of service of a copy of the objections upon the mother. Family Court Act § 439(e) provides, in pertinent part, that "[a] party filing objections shall serve a copy of such objections upon the opposing party," and that "[p]roof of service upon the opposing party shall be filed with the court at the time of filing of objections and any rebuttal." By failing to file proof of service of a copy of his objections upon the mother, the father failed to fulfill a condition precedent to filing timely written objections to the Support Magistrate's order and, thus, failed to exhaust the Family Court procedure for review of his objections. Consequently, the father waived his right to appellate review of the merits of his objections.

Child Custody - Default Order - Review - Habeas Corpus Is Not the Proper Procedure for Seeking Review

In Matter of Palmiotti v. Piscitelli, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5416577 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a writ of habeas corpus is not the proper procedure for seeking review of the Family Court's order of custody and visitation entered upon the mother's default (CPLR 7002[a]; People ex rel. Karen FF. v. Ulster County Dept. of Social Servs., 79 A.D.3d 1187, 911 N.Y.S.2d 679; Matter of Conchita J. v. Scopetta, 273 A.D.2d 238, 709 N.Y.S.2d 834; Matter of Minella v. Amhreim, 131 A.D.2d 578, 579, 516 N.Y.S.2d 494). The proper procedure is to move to vacate the order of custody and visitation, and, if the motion is denied, to appeal from the order denying the motion (see Matter of Johnson v.

Lee, 89 A.D.3d 733, 931 N.Y.S.2d 901; Matter of Lorraine D. v. Widmack C., 79 A.D.3d 745, 912 N.Y.S.2d 633).

Child Custody - Modification - Evidence - Error to Admit into Evidence Mental Health Report Whee
Not Submitted under Oath and Expert Not Present

In Matter of Rodriguez v. Bello, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5416579 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court, which, after a hearing, granted the father's petition to modify a prior order of the same court dated September 8, 2009, awarding the mother primary physical custody of the parties' child, so as to award him primary physical custody of the child. It held that the Family Court erred in admitting into evidence the report of the Mental Health Assessment Team, since the report was not submitted under oath and the expert was not "present and available for cross-examination" (22 NYCRR 202.16 [g][2]; Matter of D'Esposito v. Kepler, 14 A.D.3d 509, 510, 788 N.Y.S.2d 169). Nevertheless, without consideration of the report, a sound and substantial basis existed in the record to support the Family Court's determination to award primary physical custody of the parties' child to the father.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Jurisdiction - Maternal Grandmother and Father Not an "Intimate Relationship"

In Matter of Welch v. Lyman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5416583 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Petitioner sought an order of protection against the maternal grandmother of his newborn son, based on incidents in which the grandmother allegedly assaulted and harassed the petitioner. At the close of the petitioner's evidence the Family Court granted the grandmother's motion to dismiss the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, on the ground that the petitioner had failed to establish that the parties had an "intimate relationship" pursuant to Family Court Act § 812(1)(e).

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that the Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction and cannot exercise powers beyond those granted to it by statute (Matter of Johna M.S. v. Russell E.S., 10 NY3d 364, 366; NY Const., art VI, s 13; Family Ct Act § 115). Pursuant to Family Court Act § 812, the Family Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the criminal courts over proceedings concerning certain criminal acts occurring "between spouses or former spouses, or between parent and child or between members of the same family or household" (Family Ct Act § 812[1][e]). Insofar as relevant ,

"members of the same family or household" includes "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time". Expressly excluded from the definition of "intimate relationship" are a "casual acquaintance" and "ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts". Beyond those exclusions, the Legislature left it to the courts to determine on a case-by-case-basis what qualifies as an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), based upon consideration of factors such as "the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship". The parties had no direct relationship and were connected only through the child. According to the petitioner's testimony at the hearing, contact between the parties prior to the alleged incidents was minimal and, following the alleged incidents, was nonexistent. The petitioner testified that he "didn't believe [they] had any kind of relationship." Accordingly, the Family Court properly concluded that the parties did not have an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of the statute, and properly granted the motion to dismiss the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction proceeding alleging that the appellants, who attended medical school in China before emigrating to the United States in 2003, abused and neglected their second child, born on October 27, 2008. The petition alleged that on or about May 7, 2009, the subject child was presented to Elmhurst Hospital with a "left fronto-parietal subdural hematoma and a few bilateral retinal hemorrhages," and that the mother informed medical personnel at Elmhurst Hospital that the child had sustained these injuries by falling off a bed. The petition further alleged that on July 2, 2009, Dr. Mark M. Souweidane, a pediatric neurosurgeon at Weill Cornell Medical Center, informed the petitioner that the child's injuries were not consistent with the explanation provided by the mother.

Child Abuse or Neglect - Dispositional Order - Family Court Act §1053 - Suspended Judgment Granted

On June 14, 2010, the appellants consented to a finding of abuse as to the mother and neglect as to the father; during a conference the Family Court agreed to consider a suspended judgment pursuant to Family Court Act §1053. The appellants then made separate motions for a suspended judgment. In support of their motions they submitted letters from three doctors who treated the subject child after his alleged fall from his bed, all of whom stated that, based on their examination of the child and their interactions with the appellants, they did not believe that the child's injuries resulted from abuse. The appellants also submitted a letter from Dr. Mark S. Diaz, a Professor of Neurosurgery at the Penn State University School of Medicine and the Director of Pediatric Neurosurgery at the Penn State Milton S. Hershey Medical Center, who reviewed the subject child's medical records and opined that the subject child had a condition called benign external hydrocephalus, which rendered him susceptible to subdural bleeding from minor trauma, such as a fall from a bed. Dr. Diaz opined that there was "absolutely no necessity to conclude in this case that there was evidence of abusive head trauma." The appellants submitted a letter from Dr. Souweidane, who stated that he had reviewed the letter submitted by Dr. Diaz and agreed that the subject child may have suffered from benign external hydrocephalus, though he noted that the condition was impossible to document without image studies from before the accident. The Family Court in effect, denied the appellants' separate motions for a suspended judgment and, pursuant to Family Court Act § 1054, released the child to their custody under the supervision of the petitioner for a period of 12 months.

The Appellate Division modified the order. It observed that a suspended judgment is one of the permissible dispositions in a child protective proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 10. Judgment may be suspended for up to one year, or up to two years under "exceptional circumstances" (Family Ct Act § 1053 [b]), during which time the parents must comply with terms and conditions that relate to the adjudicated acts or omissions of the parents which led to the finding of abuse or neglect (Family Ct Act § 1053[a],[b]; 22 NYCRR 205.83[a]). If the terms and conditions are complied with, the petition is dismissed at the conclusion of the suspended judgment period, despite the fact that a finding of neglect or abuse has been made. The paramount concern in a dispositional hearing is the best interests of the child. The factors to be considered in making the determination include the parent or caretaker's capacity to properly supervise the child, based on current information and the potential threat of future abuse and neglect. The appellants had no prior criminal or child protective history, and that the appellants had complied with all court-ordered services. Under the circumstances, it held that a suspended judgment would be in the child's best interests, and reversed the order of disposition granted the motions for a suspended judgment and remitted the matter to the Family Court for the entry of a suspended judgment, the duration and conditions of which to be determined by the Family Court.

Supreme Court

Evidence - Spoilation of Evidence - CPLR 3126 - Responsibility to Preserve Evidence Extends to Items Not in the Possession of Party - Mother and Witness Precluded From Testifying As to Contents of Destroyed Diary

In S.B. v. U.B. ,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5381232 (N.Y.Sup.) the mother filed an Order to Show Cause modifying the father's visitation to supervised visitation between the father and the children, based on allegations made by mother's sister, S., recently revealed, that in 2002, when she was ten (10) years old, the father sexually abused her and that the abuse continued for a period of three (3) years. The mother proffered that her sister, S., would testify that from 2002, when she was ten (10) years old, through 2005, the father touched her in a sexually inappropriate manner. The father denied the allegations. The sister submitted two affidavits that contain these allegations. In S.'s Affidavit, dated April 11, 2012, she asserted that "for a period of approximately three years beginning when I was ten years old and continuing until I was thirteen years old, my older sister's husband, defendant [U.B.], sexually abused me." S. stated that the defendant initially engaged the ten-year-old in a process by which defendant would ask S. if she wanted to play a game and then "tap [her] at various parts of [her] body and ask [her] to tell him where [she] felt it". The Mother's sister further asserted that the father would try to pick up her shirt and rub her bare back and exposed breasts, despite her attempts to keep her shirt down and prevent the touching. S. also stated in her Affidavit that "on one occasion, I awoke in my bed to Defendant placing his hands in my pants." The mother annexed heavily redacted excerpts of her sister's childhood diary to her Order to Show Cause, which sought supervision for all of the father's contact with the children. In the diary, the mother's sister allegedly memorialized her feelings concerning her interactions with the father during the time that the alleged sexual abuse took place. In her Affidavit, dated September 7, 2012, S. stated that she was asked by mother's counsel to provide him with diary entries relating to the father's abuse. S. stated in the same Affidavit, dated September 7, 2012, that upon reviewing the diary she was embarrassed by the private childhood thoughts that it contained. After reviewing the diary, S. instead provided heavily redacted excerpts of her diary to mother's counsel. S. stated that she did not want the mother's counsel to review her diary in its entirety and that the redacted portions were unrelated to the father's alleged abuse of her. In her Affidavit, dated September 7, 2012, S. stated that since providing the excerpts of her diary to the mother's counsel, she "decided that [she] did not want anyone else to review it", that she "discarded it in the trash," and that she no longer possessed the diary. She stated that she believed that she would not be asked to submit the diary after providing the excerpts to mother's counsel. She also stated that she was not instructed to discard the diary and that she did not tell anyone that she discarded the diary until several months after she threw it away.

The father moved for, inter alia, an order directing witness S. to turn over her complete and un-redacted diary covering the period of time from when she first met the defendant-father through September 30, 2012, including the period of time from January 1, 2002 to December 31, 2007; (2) or, in the alternative, precluding witness S. from testifying in the instant matter if she disposed of her diary. Supreme Court pointed out that it has broad discretion in determining what, if any, sanction should be imposed for spoliation of evidence. When a party negligently loses or intentionally destroys key evidence, depriving the non-responsible party from being able to prove its claim or defense, the court may punish the responsible party by the striking of its pleading" (Baglio v. St. John's Queens Hosp., 303 A.D.2d 341, 342, 755 N.Y.S.2d 427 [2 Dept 2003]). A less severe sanction, such as preclusion of evidence or testimony, is appropriate when the missing evidence does not deprive the moving party of the ability to establish his or her defense, and when the responsible party did not lose evidence intentionally or in bad faith. Under the common-law doctrine of spoliation, when a party negligently loses or intentionally destroys key evidence, the responsible party may be sanctioned under CPLR 3126. The court may, under the appropriate circumstances impose a sanction even if the destruction occurred through negligence rather than wilfulness, and even if the evidence was destroyed before the spoliator became a party, provided it was on notice that the evidence might be needed for future litigation. In situations of negligent destruction of evidence, the Court must consider the prejudice resulting from spoliation in determining what type of sanctions are warranted. If one party loses evidence and the loss leaves the other party prejudicially bereft, then the Court may punish the responsible party by the striking of its pleadings. The mother contended that she should not be punished for the loss of the diary because it was the S. who disposed of the diary. However, a party is responsible for preserving evidence when they are on notice that it may be needed for litigation (see Thornhill v. A.B. Volvo, 304 A.D.2d 651 [2 Dept 2003]). This responsibility to preserve evidence may extend to items that are not in the possession of a party when that party negligently fails to take steps to assure its preservation (Amaris v. Sharp Electronic Corp., 304 A.D.2d 457 [1 Dept 2003]). As she submitted the excerpts of the diary, the mother was the party responsible for preserving it, and should have taken steps to ensure the diary's preservation. The Court found that destruction of the diary severely prejudiced to the father and directed that the plaintiff-mother and the witness S. were precluded from testifying as to the existence, or contents, of the diary at any hearing.

Court of Appeals

Crimes - Burglary - Effect of Order of Protection - Court of Appeals Hold Burglary Conviction May Be Premised on Intent to Engage in Conduct That Would Be Legal If it Was Not Outlawed by an Order of Protection

In People v. Norman Cajigas, --- N.E.2d ----, 2012 WL 5199395 (N.Y.) in 2005, defendant Norman Cajigas moved into the apartment where his paramour, Maria, resided with her teenage daughter. He eventually became physically abusive toward the woman and moved out of the dwelling in October 2006. Defendant soon began to stalk Maria on a virtually daily basis. This behavior escalated to a physical assault in November 2006. After that incident, Maria obtained an order of protection that required defendant to refrain from contacting her in any manner and to stay away from her, her residence and place of work. In April 2007, defendant violated the order by going to Maria's home. He was charged with criminal contempt in the second degree and another order of protection was issued. In July 2007, Maria's daughter was home alone when she heard someone trying to open the front door of the apartment. She saw defendant through the peephole and asked him what he wanted. After defendant backed away, the girl telephoned her mother and the police were summoned. Defendant then tried to put something into the lock to open the door. He fled after the girl spoke to him a second time. Based on this incident, defendant was indicted for attempted burglary in the second degree and several counts of criminal contempt in the first degree.

Defendant was convicted on all counts and adjudicated a second violent felony offender. He was sentenced to 6 ½ years in prison, along with 5 years of post release supervision. The Appellate Division affirmed. (82 AD3d 544, 546 [1st Dept 2011]). The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Graffeo, affirmed. She observed that burglary, in its simplest form, is a trespass into a building coupled with the intent to commit a crime therein (Penal Law 140.20). Trespass occurs when the entry is knowingly unlawful (Penal Law 140.05). An order of protection, which typically requires a person to stay away from a victim's home or place of employment and to refrain from any contact, can be used to establish a knowing and unlawful entry since going to a protected person's home, even by invitation or permission, contravenes the terms of the order of protection. The issue here was whether the intent to do something inside the residence that would be legal in the absence of the order of protection established the requisite criminal state of mind to elevate the trespass to a burglary. Defendant asked the Court to adopt the Fourth Department's rule that the intent element of burglary "cannot be satisfied by intended conduct that would be innocuous if the order of protection did not prohibit it" (People v. VanDeWalle, 46 AD3d 1351, 1352 [4th Dept 2007]. The People, relied on decisions by the First and Third Departments that held that a burglary conviction may be premised on an intent to engage in conduct that would be legal if it was not outlawed by an order of protection (see People v. Carpio, 39 AD3d 433 [1st Dept 2007]; People v. Gilbo, 28 AD3d 945 [3d Dept 2006]). The Court of Appeals concluded that the principle articulated by the First and Third Departments was more consistent with the text of the burglary statutes and the rationale in Lewis. Actions that violate aspects of an order of protection may be prosecuted as criminal contempt in the second degree (Penal Law § 215.50[3] [a class A misdemeanor]), criminal contempt in the first degree (Penal Law § 215.51[b] [a class E felony]) or aggravated criminal contempt (Penal Law § 215.52 [a class D felony]). The precise charge depends on the nature and severity of the violation. But the fact that the defendant's actions would have been legal but for the issuance of the order of protection does not immunize such conduct from prosecution under these statutes.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Default Order Granted based upon Respondents disrespect for the Court

In re Nyree S., Petitioner-Respondent, v. Gregory C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4868209 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division dismissed an appeal from an order of the Family Court which granted the petition seeking a five-year order of protection in favor of petitioner mother and the parties' child upon a determination that respondent father had committed the family offenses of harassment and stalking. The incarcerated respondent appeared telephonically at a hearing and was grossly disrespectful to the court. When the court admonished respondent, he responded in a manner indicating that he had no respect for the court's authority. The Appellate Division held that the court acted properly in excluding respondent from the proceedings by disconnecting his telephone connection, and his conduct constituted a knowing and willful default. Since no appeal lies from an order entered upon the aggrieved party's default, the appeal was dismissed

Appellate Division, Second Department

Declaration of Nullity of Void Marriage - Bigamy - Equitable Distribution - Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman Distinguished - Spouse Entitled to a Credit for Marital Funds Paid to Former Spouse or a Child Pursuant to an Order of Maintenance or Child Support

In Levenstein v. Levenstein, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5233497 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) on June 13, 1995, judgment was entered against the defendant in a criminal action in the United States District Court convicting him of failure to pay legal child support obligations and directing him to pay restitution of $132,718.49, representing arrears in child support for periods between October 1992 and the date of the criminal judgment. The criminal judgment required that the entire amount of restitution be paid to the defendant's first wife by July 13, 1995, one month after the entry of the criminal judgment. The defendant failed to fully satisfy the restitution component of the criminal judgment by the deadline. The defendant thereafter remarried. Despite the defendant's failure to secure a divorce from his second wife, the defendant and the plaintiff purportedly married four years after the criminal judgment was entered. During the purported marriage, the restitution component of the criminal judgment was satisfied. The defendant and the plaintiff also made support payments to the defendant's first wife that became due during the purported marriage. In 2006, the plaintiff sought an annulment of her purported marriage to the defendant, alleging that the defendant committed bigamy because he had never divorced his second wife.

In 2008, the Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff an annulment, and a trial was held to determine the issue of apportionment of the putative marital debt. The Supreme Court explained in its decision that the plaintiff was entitled to a 50% credit for the marital funds used to satisfy certain premarital maintenance and child support obligations that the defendant had paid to his former wife, including the amounts due under the criminal judgment. A judgment of annulment was entered in April 2009. One month later, in May 2009, the Court of Appeals held, in Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman (12 NY3d 415, 421), that a spouse is not entitled to a credit for marital funds paid to a former spouse or a child pursuant to an order of maintenance or child support. Based on Mahoney-Buntzman, and upon motion pursuant to CPLR 4404, Supreme Court set aside the portion of the decision reciting that the plaintiff was entitled to a credit equal to 50% of the payments made during the purported marriage to satisfy the restitution component of the criminal judgment, and it reapportioned the putative marital debt accordingly.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that in Mahoney-Buntzman, the wife sought credit for maintenance payments made to the husband's former spouse that had become due and were paid during the wife's marriage to the husband. In holding that such payments were not subject to recoupment by the wife, the Court of Appeals reasoned that maintenance obligations to a former spouse and to children pursuant to a support order "are obligations that do not enure solely to the benefit of one spouse". Nevertheless, the Court cautioned, "[t]his is not to say that every expenditure of marital funds during the course of the marriage may not be considered in an equitable distribution calculation. Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(d)(13) expressly and broadly authorizes the trial court to take into account 'any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper' in determining an equitable distribution of marital property. There may be circumstances where equity requires a credit to one spouse for marital property used to pay off the separate debt of one spouse or add to the value of one spouse's separate property". The Court concluded that payment of maintenance to a former spouse was not one of those circumstances.

The Appellate Division found that the payments made here were significantly different from those at issue in Mahoney-Buntzman. In that case, as here, the wife sought credit for payments made from putative marital funds during the purported marriage. Here, however, the plaintiff sought credit for amounts that were due and attributable to periods of time that elapsed long before the beginning of the purported marriage. It held that under the circumstances of this action for an annulment, which is based on the defendant's bigamy, it would be inequitable for the plaintiff to be required to bear any part of the financial burden brought about by the defendant's criminal conduct. Consequently, the plaintiff was entitled to a credit of 50% of the payments made during the purported marriage toward satisfaction of the criminal judgment.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - QDRO Cases

In McVeigh v. Curry, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5233499 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties' marriage was terminated in a judgment of divorce dated December 15, 2010. In accordance with a stipulation of the parties and an order dated May 25, 2010, the judgment of divorce provided, in essence, that the plaintiff was entitled to a 50% share of the marital portion of the defendant's pension, and that share had to be distributed pursuant to the equitable distribution formula established in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481). The judgment of divorce, in accordance with the order dated May 25, 2010, also provided that, if the defendant elected a pension option that did not have any survivor benefits, he must obtain appropriate life insurance. The defendant moved in effect, to direct the plaintiff to furnish him with a copy of her birth certificate to enable him to elect the annuity option of his pension fund. Under the annuity option, the defendant would specify the annual amount the plaintiff would receive for the rest of her life upon his death. The plaintiff opposed the defendant's motion and cross-moved, in effect, to direct the defendant to elect the 100% joint and survivor option of his pension or obtain life insurance to cover her 50% share of the marital portion of the defendant's pension. The Supreme Court directed the plaintiff to furnish a copy of her birth certificate only for the purposes of the defendant's electing the 100% joint and survivor option of his pension fund, or his obtaining life insurance. In addition, the Supreme Court determined that the annuity option was not a joint and survivor option.

The Appellate Division modified. It held that under the circumstances of this case, where the parties never discussed the annuity option prior to the judgment of divorce, the Supreme Court properly declined to direct the plaintiff to furnish the defendant with a copy of her birth certificate to enable him to elect the annuity option of his pension fund. However, it agreed with the defendant that the Supreme Court erred in directing the plaintiff to furnish the defendant with a copy of her birth certificate only for the purposes of his electing the 100% joint and survivor option of his pension fund or his obtaining appropriate life insurance, as that option could potentially result in an award to the plaintiff that was more than she was entitled to under the equitable distribution formula enunciated in Majauskas v. Majauskas. The 100% joint and survivor option would, upon the defendant's death, provide the plaintiff with the full monthly retirement allowance of the defendant's pension for the rest of her life. In contrast, Option 3 of the defendant's pension fund, the 50% joint and survivor option, would, upon the defendant's death, provide the plaintiff with 50% of the original monthly retirement allowance for the rest of her life. The 50% joint and survivor option was closer to the equitable distribution formula set forth in Majauskas.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order - Waiver of Appellate Review by failure to file proof of service of copy of objections

In Matter of DiFede v. DiFede, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 5233511 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father appealed from an order of the Family Court which denied his objections to an order of the court, which, after a hearing, granted his petition for downward modification of his child support obligation only to the extent of reducing his obligation to the sum of $865 biweekly. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the issues raised by the father on appeal were not reviewable. The Family Court properly denied the father's objections on the ground that he failed to file proof of service of a copy of the objections on the mother. Family Court Act § 439(e) provides, in pertinent part, that "[a] party filing objections shall serve a copy of such objections upon the opposing party," and that "[p]roof of service upon the opposing party shall be filed with the court at the time of filing of objections and any rebuttal." By failing to file proof of service of a copy of his objections on the mother, the father failed to fulfill a condition precedent to filing timely written objections to the Support Magistrate's order and, thus, failed to exhaust the Family Court procedure for review of his objection. Consequently, the father waived his right to appellate review of the merits of his objections.

Child Custody - Modification - Hearing - Due Process - Mother's Due Process Rights Violated When Hearing Concluded Without Her Being Permitted to Present Any Evidence, Call the Father or Any Other Witnesses, or Properly Answer the Allegations Asserted Against Her.

In Matter of Thomson v Battle, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4800966 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) pursuant to a July 19, 2006 order entered on consent, the mother was awarded custody of the child, with visitation to the father. In May 2007, the father filed a petition alleging that the mother had violated the July 19, 2006, order by cancelling and otherwise interfering with visitation. In August 2007, the father filed additional petitions seeking custody of the child and alleged that the mother had moved with the child from Queens County to Greene County and had informed him that he would have to travel to Greene County for visitation, that the child, was six years old at the time and was not yet enrolled in school, and that the mother had demonstrated patterns of neglect and abuse.

The mother appeared before a Court Attorney Referee on December 21, 2007, and acknowledged that she and the child were living in Greene County. The Court Attorney Referee, describing the mother's conduct as "very distressing," and noting that the mother had a history of interfering with visitation and moving residences, issued a temporary order awarding custody of the child to the father, with unsupervised visitation to the mother. Thereafter, citing a forensic evaluation, the father moved to suspend unsupervised visitation between the mother and the child. After a limited hearing on this motion, the Court Attorney Referee issued a temporary order directing that the mother's visitation be supervised.

The hearing on the father's petitions commenced in December 2008, and the father called the mother as his first witness. The direct examination of the mother continued for four days over the course of three months, during which time the father's attorney, often over objection, questioned the mother on topics including her experience in parochial school, her employment and educational history, her teenage years touring with the band The Grateful Dead, her study of herbal medicine and thoughts on "Western medicine," the condition of various residences she had maintained since 1999, her religious and dietary preferences, and the manner in which she cared for her dog. During the course of this wide-ranging examination, the mother displayed hostility towards the father's attorney, her own attorney, and the referee. She had also failed to appear on more than one occasion, citing, among other things, medical issues and transportation problems. Eventually, the mother's attorney, moved for leave to withdraw as counsel. The attorney's motion was granted and the mother was assigned a new attorney. After the mother's assigned attorney moved for leave to withdraw as counsel, the father's attorney urged the court to conclude the hearing and issue a final order in his favor and the Court Attorney Referee issued a recommendation to that effect which . Family Court adopted. It issued an order concluding the hearing without the need for further testimony, awarding the father sole custody of the child, and awarding the mother only supervised visitation.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in concluding the hearing without allowing her an opportunity call any witnesses or introduce any evidence. In a proceeding seeking modification of a prior custody order, a full and comprehensive hearing is required. At the hearing, due process requires that a parent be afforded a full and fair opportunity to be heard. The mother's due process rights were violated when the hearing was concluded without her being permitted to present any evidence, call the father or any other witnesses, or properly answer the allegations asserted against her. It observed that a person's right to due process is not violated when she is afforded the opportunity to be heard but chooses not to avail herself of that opportunity (see Matter of Anita L. v. Damon N., 54 AD3d 630). Here, while the mother's disruptive behavior could not be condoned or excused, her conduct was not the sole cause of the abrupt termination of the hearing. A review of the record revealed that the father sought, through his attorney, to prolong the hearing, inflame the situation, and interfere with the mother's right to be heard by engaging in an extended direct examination filled with irrelevant details and unsubstantiated accusations, primarily focused on incidents and behaviors that long preceded the prior order of custody and visitation. Under these circumstances, the Court Attorney Referee, by repeatedly refusing to appropriately limit the father's inquiry and by abruptly concluding the hearing without allowing the mother to present her case, failed to ensure that the mother was afforded a full and fair opportunity to be heard.

The order was reversed insofar as appealed from, and the matter remitted to the Family Court for a full hearing on the merits before a different Court Attorney Referee.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order of Support Magistrate- Documentary Evidence Submitted to Family Court in Support of Objections Properly Disregarded Where Not Offered at the Hearing Before Support Magistrate Agreements - Construction - College Education Provision - in Absence of Provision to Contrary, in Determining Parents' Respective Obligations Court Should Not Take into Account College Loans for Which Student Responsible

In Korosh v. Korosh, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4900972 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the evidence adduced at the hearing before the Support Magistrate did not establish that the father violated the child support provisions of the parties' stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce, by failing to pay certain college expenses other than the father's share of student loans obtained by the parties' oldest son to finance that son's college education. Although the mother's attorney made certain factual allegations at the hearing, these allegations did not constitute evidence. Contrary to the mother's contention, the documentary evidence submitted in support of her objections, allegedly establishing various college expenses owed by the father, was properly disregarded since she did not establish that it was offered at the hearing before the Support Magistrate. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the mother's objection to the Support Magistrate's order dated June 17, 2011, as denied that branch of her petition which sought compensation for these expenses.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court improperly denied the mother's objection to that part of the order which denied her request to require the father to reimburse the parties' oldest son for the father's share of loans that were obtained by that son in connection with that son's college education, based on provisions of the parties' stipulation of settlement. The Appellate Division found that the stipulation of settlement was ambiguous with regard to the father's obligation to, in effect, reimburse the parties' oldest son for the father's share of the expense of student loans. It held that in the absence of a clear and unambiguous provision to the contrary in the stipulation of settlement concerning the matter, in determining the parents' respective obligations towards the cost of college, a court should not take into account any college loans for which the student is responsible (citing Matter of Yorke v. Yorke, 83 AD3d 951, 952; Matter of Kent v. Kent, 29 AD3d 123, 133-134). Therefore, it held that these loans should not be deducted before calculating the father's share of the son's college costs. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a calculation of the respective shares of the father and the parties' oldest son of the expenses of obtaining student loans to pay for the son's college education, and a new determination on the request to require the father to reimburse the son for the father's share of loans obtained by the son in connection with the son's college education.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Child Custody - UCCJEA - Domestic Relations Law §§ 76[1][b]; 76-f [2] - Family Court Judge violated doctrine of the law of the case by overruling prior finding of another judge of the court that New York had subject matter jurisdiction, but Appellate Division not bound or restricted by that doctrine, and Finds Jurisdiction in Washington More Appropriate.

In Matter of Joy v. Kutzuk, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4933288 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the parties were the parents of the child (born in 2007) and separated prior to the child's birth. Respondent (mother) relocated with the child from Sullivan County to the state of Washington when the child was four months old. In March 2010, the child returned to Sullivan County to reside temporarily with petitioner (father). After the child had been in the father's custody for approximately three weeks, the father commenced a custody proceeding alleging, that the mother, a recovering alcoholic, had relapsed and failed to enter a rehabilitation program. By order entered in August 2010, upon the mother's default, Family Court (Ledina, J.) granted the father custody of the child. The mother then moved to vacate the order, alleging that she had never received notice of the proceeding prior to entry of the order, and that New York lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the proceeding under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act. She also filed petitions in Washington to establish paternity and guardianship of the child. Finding that it had neither subject matter nor "emergency" jurisdiction, Family Court, by order entered September 17, 2010, vacated the custody order that had been entered upon the mother's default.

On October 1, 2010, the father commenced this custody proceeding. Following an ex parte telephone conference with the judge presiding over the mother's proceeding in Washington, Family Court (Ledina, J.) issued an order, entered in December 2010, finding that New York had gained subject matter jurisdiction due to the child's presence in New York for six consecutive months and that New York was the appropriate venue given the location of witnesses and relevant evidence. The court then awarded the father temporary custody of the child. Following a fact-finding hearing, Family Court (Meddaugh, J.) dismissed the petition in May 2011, finding that, contrary to the prior order, New York did not have subject matter jurisdiction over the matter. The father appealed and the Appellate Division affirmed.

The Appellate Division agreed with the father that Family Court (Meddaugh, J.) violated the doctrine of the law of the case by overruling the prior finding of the court (Ledina, J.) that New York had subject matter jurisdiction, but stated that it was not bound or restricted by that doctrine. Upon its review of the order from which the appeal was taken, "in the interest of achieving substantial justice", it affirmed.

The Appellate Division observed that pursuant to the UCCJEA, a child's "'home state' [is] the state in which [the] child lived with a parent ... for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding" (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [7]). However, a parent may not wrongfully remove or withhold a child from the other parent for the purpose of establishing a "home state" for that child. When a child resides in New York as a result of being wrongfully removed or withheld from his or her home state, the child will be considered to be temporarily absent from the home state (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [7]), and such time will not be counted toward establishing New York as the home state for purposes of deciding custody issues. Family Court (Meddaugh, J.) properly determined that the child had not lived with the father for the six-month period required to establish subject matter jurisdiction in New York. There was no dispute that the father was supposed to return the child to the mother after approximately one month. However, after approximately three weeks, the father unilaterally decided to keep the child in New York and commenced a custody proceeding, thereby wrongfully withholding the child from the mother. His actions in that regard could not result in New York acquiring home state jurisdiction over the child for the purposes of making a custody determination. The Court agreed with Family Court (Meddaugh, J.) that the court's (Ledina, J.) prior finding that New York was a more appropriate forum than Washington (see Domestic Relations Law §§ 76[1][b]; 76-f [2]) was not proper. Although the court (Ledina, J.) allegedly came to an agreement with a judge in Washington that New York was the more appropriate forum in which to decide the issue of custody, no record of that communication between the courts was in the record (Domestic Relations Law § 75-i[4], [5]). Further, a review of the record did not support the court's (Ledina, J.) conclusion that "the most significant issues relating to the case presented [were] provable by witnesses resident in New York, and the issues of the ... [m]other [were] capable of proof largely in documentary form." It was apparent that more relevant evidence in the form of both witness testimony and documents existed in Washington.

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act § 416[d][2], [3] - Availability of Health Insurance - Reasonable in Cost - Whether Health Insurance Benefits Are "Available" Within the Meaning of the Statute Is Not Always Discernible by a Simple Mathematical Calculation.

In Chemung County Com'r of Social Services ex rel. Rafferty v. Beard, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4936081 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondent's son (born in 2001) began receiving public assistance in July 2010. Thereafter, petitioner commenced a support proceeding on behalf of the person (an aunt of the child's mother) who had custody of the child. At a hearing before a Support Magistrate, the parties agreed to the amount of respondent's weekly child support payment and further agreed that, although family health insurance benefits were offered by respondent's employer, such benefits were not "available" within the meaning of Family Ct Act § 416 because at nearly 14% of his gross income the benefits were not "reasonable in cost" (Family Ct Act § 416[d][2], [3]). The Support Magistrate, while verbally directing respondent to notify the Support Collection Unit of any changes in his health insurance benefits, nonetheless refused petitioner's request that the order contain language directing respondent to enroll his son for health insurance benefits in the future if such benefits became available at a reasonable cost. Family Court modified the Support Magistrate's order by directing respondent to notify petitioner in writing if there is any change in health insurance benefits available to him, and directing petitioner to refrain from issuing a medical execution before obtaining a judicial determination of availability. Petitioner's objection was otherwise denied.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected petitioner's argument on appeal that Family Court's order did not go far enough and that it should have also included language requiring respondent to immediately enroll his child in health insurance "should it become available." Petitioner asserted that the statute requires that such language be included in the support order and that such language would ensure that the burden to act regarding a child's possible health insurance benefits would be on the parent rather than the support collection unit.

The Appellate Division pointed out that the issue of whether health insurance benefits are "available" within the meaning of the statute is not always discernible by a simple mathematical calculation, and the statute implicates judicial involvement in that determination. For health insurance benefits to be considered "available," the benefits must be both "reasonable in cost" and "reasonably accessible" (Family Ct Act 416[d][2]). As for the cost element, "cost" in this context is "the cost of the premium and deductible attributable to adding the child or children to existing coverage or the difference between such costs for self-only and family coverage". There is a presumption that the cost as so-defined is reasonable if it does not exceed five percent of the combined parental gross income. The presumption can be rebutted upon a finding that the cost is "unjust or inappropriate" in light of, among other things, "the circumstances of the case" and "the best interests of the child"; a finding that requires a judicial determination. Further, cost is not reasonable if it "would reduce the income of th[e] parent below the self-support reserve" (Family Ct Act § 416[d][3]). The second element in establishing that health insurance benefits are "available" is that the benefits are "reasonably accessible to the person on whose behalf the petition is brought" (Family Ct Act § 416[d][2]). While there is a presumption of accessibility based upon distance and travel time, this may be rebutted "for good cause shown including, but not limited to, the special health needs of the child". Varying from this presumption must be based on a judicial finding that is set forth in the support order (Family Ct Act § 416[d][3]).

The Appellate Division stated that Petitioner's position that a parent should be obligated to navigate these statutory provisions and determine whether any change in his or her health insurance benefits results in such benefits becoming "available" is unrealistic. Including the language requested by petitioner routinely causes confusion to those enforcing the support order because the word "available" is read broadly, resulting in a medical execution being sent because health insurance benefits are offered (available) by a parent's employer even though the benefits are not "available" as that term is used in the statute. On the other hand, Family Court's approach of requiring that any change in health insurance benefits be immediately reported by respondent provides a workable framework that ensures that once "available"-within the meaning of the statute-health insurance benefits will be extended to the child. This provision complies with the statutory requirement that the support order provide for, among other things, future health insurance benefits for the child when "available" (see Family Ct Act § 416[c]).

Supreme Court

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) - Where Insufficient Evidence to Determine Gross Income, Award Based upon Needs of the Payee or the Standard of Living of Parties, Whichever Is Greater.

In Salaman v Salaman, 2012 WL 5048190 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51964(U) the Defendant-wife moved, among other things, for pendente lite maintenance and child support of $5,354.78, retroactive to the date of commencement of the action; and order appointing a neutral forensic evaluator to value the businesses held by the husband and his father and granting her an interim award of counsel fees in the sum of $25,000.00.

The parties were married in Florida on June 1, 2008. The wife was 28 years of age and the husband was 30 years of age. There was one child of this marriage who was born in August 2009. The wife commenced an action for divorce in Palm Beach County, Florida in March, 2011. The husband commenced an action for divorce in Kings County, New York on June 14, 2011. The Court granted the wife's application that the issues of custody and visitation be heard by the Florida Court in a written decision dated September 12, 2011 (Salman v. Salman, 32 Misc.3d 1242(A), 2011 WL 4056895). It retained jurisdiction over the financial matters in the divorce, including the issues of maintenance, child support and equitable distribution.

The Courts lengthy opinion discussed the opposing positions of the parties. The wife alleged that the parties lived a luxurious lifestyle and that the court should impute more than $100,000 in income to the husband based upon the cash he had been receiving from his father and his businesses. The husband denied these allegations and claimed poverty. The Court concluded that his affidavits were incredible. It observed that the husband had repeated opportunities to be candid and forthright with the Court regarding his financial circumstances and annual income but he had repeatedly chosen to attempt to obscure his income. At different times and often in quick succession-sometimes during the same court appearance-the husband made vastly inconsistent representations regarding his income which he later attempted to reconcile when confronted with financial records and documentation discrepant with his representations. Based on the husband's own representations, through counsel, both on the record in open court during court appearances and in sworn documents filed with the Court, it appeared that the husband grossly under-reported his income on his individual 2010 tax returns. The Court noted that the husband failed to offer any credible explanation for deposits into his checking account totaling $30,000.00 in 2010 when he only reported $4,250.00 annual income on his 2010 tax returns. The husband also failed to credibly trace whether the $30,000.00 in deposits included some or all of the monthly cash gifts he acknowledged that he received from his family in 2010. The husband did not indicate whether or not those deposits included the cash income he allegedly earned selling items at a flea market in 2010. According to the husband's representations, he earned $1,000.00, $7,000.00 or $8,000.00, depending on which representation the Court considered, in cash income from sales at a flea market in 2010. The husband did not report any of this cash income in his 2010 tax returns. Additionally, the husband initially denied that he received any cash gifts from his family, including his business-partner father, during the marriage; however, as the proceeding continued, he eventually conceded that he received $1,650.00 monthly in cash gifts from his family throughout the marriage, including 2010 and 2011, but that he did not report this cash as income or produce a gift tax return. The husband offered no explanation for why this income was omitted from his 2010 tax returns and his Affidavit of Net Worth, dated November 11, 2011. The Court noted that it was undisputed that the husband also received many financial benefits, such as rent-free use of apartments and automobiles owned by his father and business partner, payment of credit card bills and utilities and purchase of groceries throughout the marriage and that he continued to enjoy these financial benefits. Based on the vast number of inconsistencies and self-contradictory statements, the Court could not rely on the husband's last filed tax return in determining his interim support obligation. The Court also found that the husband's Affidavit of Net Worth was wholly incredible. The Court considered the parties' representations regarding their lifestyle during the marriage and the supporting documentation annexed to their papers. The Court found that, based on the lifestyle of the parties during the marriage and their reasonable needs, that the wife and the parties' child's reasonable annual expenses required $80,000.00 annually. The wife was employed earning approximately $33,017.76 annually ($35,000.00, less $1,982.24 for FICA, Social Security and Medicare). As such, the reasonable needs of the wife and the parties' child required support of $46,982.24 annually.

The Court noted that DRL §236[B] (5-a)(g) provides: ... when a party has defaulted and/or the court is otherwise presented with insufficient evidence to determine gross income, the court shall order the temporary maintenance award based upon the needs of the payee or the standard of living of the parties prior to commencement of the divorce action, whichever is greater. Furthermore, DRL § 240(1-b)(b)(5)(iv)(D) gives the Court discretion to attribute and/or impute income to a party on the basis of "money, goods, or services provided by relatives and friends". It was clear that the husband received substantial and consistent financial assistance from his family, including rent-free living accommodations and monthly infusions of cash.

The Court found that under the facts and circumstances presented, including the husband's complete lack of candor with the Court and his incredible and inconsistent sworn financial affidavits, tax returns and deposition testimony it could not calculate the presumptively correct sum of temporary maintenance utilizing the temporary maintenance guidelines. Therefore, it found it an appropriate situation for the Court, under the authority in DRL 236[B] (5-a)(g), to deviate from awarding a presumptively correct sum of temporary support under the guidelines and to award pendente lite maintenance based on the needs of the payee or the standard of living of the parties prior to commencement of the divorce action.

According to the wife's sworn Affidavit of Net Worth her monthly expenses for herself and the parties' child would be $7,210.41, monthly ($86,524.92 annually.) The husband's declarations of poverty were incompatible with the parties' lifestyle during the marriage and the husband's lifestyle following commencement of the proceeding. The Court noted that the wife represented that the parties enjoyed a very comfortable lifestyle during the marriage. The wife presented documentation, including credit card receipts, in support of her representations. The wife's itemized expenses in her Affidavit of Net Worth appeared consistent with the lifestyle she and the child would have enjoyed had the marriage continued.

The Court found that an award of pendente lite spousal support to the wife of $1,305.06 was appropriate based on the prior lifestyle and the needs of the wife. There were many open questions regarding the husband's tax returns. The husband conceded that he did not disclose the vast majority of his annual income anywhere in his 2010 tax returns. The husband enjoyed the tax-free benefit of certain sums of income. The Court found that there was a clear rationale for not permitting the husband to use any payments of pendente lite maintenance as tax deductions.

The Court noted that where a party presents "insufficient and incredible evidence" to establish his or her income that the Supreme Court may properly award child support based on the needs of the child (DRL § 240[1-b][k]). The Court found that the husband presented insufficient and incredible information regarding his income and, therefore, the Court did not have the ability to impute a specific sum of income to the husband at this time for the purposes of determining his interim child support. The Court awarded pendente lite child support based on the pre-commencement standard of living the child would have enjoyed had the marriage continued and the child's current needs.

In determining this award of pendente lite child support, the court considered the pre-commencement standard of living the child would have enjoyed had the marriage continued and found that the needs of the child required that the husband pay $2,610.12 monthly for pendente lite child support. The Court noted that the wife included statutory add-ons, such as the cost of child care and private tuition for the parties' young child. The Court did not direct the husband to pay an additional percentage for add-ons as it would result in a double-dipping situation. Given the husband's refusal to be forthright and candid regarding his finances, the Court was unable to adequately determine any pro rata interim payment of statutory add-ons. Payment of interim statutory add-ons was included in the child support sum based on the needs and expenses of the child and the prior lifestyle.

The wife's application for appointment of a neutral forensic expert to appraise Salman Sons, the linens and household items store co-owned by the husband and his father was granted. The business was started during the marriage on or about March 2010 and he was a fifty (50%) percent owner. He contended that the business had no value. The wife alleged that the business generated significant sums of cash income which the husband and his father did not report. The husband conceded that he and his father did not maintain inventory logs and that they routinely deleted and destroyed sales and order logs and it was likely that the forensic evaluator will require random on site audits of the business. As it was the husband's failure to be forthright with the Court and his business practice not to maintain business records, the court directed that the husband be solely (100%) responsible for the payment of the neutral forensic appraisal of the retail business, subject to reallocation at time of final determination of the financial issues.

The Court found that it was an appropriate exercise of the Court's discretion to award the wife $10,000.00 in interim counsel fees. The husband was the monied spouse.

Divorce - Voluntary Discontinuance - CPLR 3217(a)(1) - Notice of Discontinuance - Motion to Vacate Notice of Discontinuance Granted based upon Estoppel.

In Hammer v Hammer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4857023 (N.Y.Sup.) the matter was commenced by the filing of a summons with notice in November 2009. In January 2010 the plaintiff served and filed an amended summons with notice. The defendant served and filed a notice of appearance and demand for a complaint that month. On June 17, 2010 the parties entered into an Interim Stipulation.

The Interim Stipulation provided that grounds for divorce were resolved, and that the plaintiff husband would serve a verified complaint on the ground of constructive abandonment of the husband by the wife. The wife waived her time to answer the complaint and agreed to sign an affidavit neither admitting nor denying the allegations set forth in the complaint and consenting to placing the matter on the uncontested matrimonial calendar. The parties agreed that upon the signing of the Interim Stipulation the mortgage on the marital residence would be satisfied by certain funds originally held in the plaintiff's investment account. The plaintiff was to purchase another home, and then transfer title to the marital residence to the defendant wife. The parties agreed that $92,000 would be used to pay off the mortgage, and the plaintiff was to take an additional sum of $56,000 to aid in purchasing another residence. The parties acknowledged that they would determine credits due as a result of the mortgage pay-off and transfer at a later date, "once the parties determine how the remaining assets shall be divided, the amount of which shall be determined by the parties or by a Court of competent jurisdiction ."The Interim Stipulation concluded with a paragraph stating that "The parties agree that all other aspects of the division of property shall be determined upon the completion of certain appraisals and valuations that are in the process of being prepared. Both parties executed an affidavit In Lieu of Oral Allocution in support of the Interim Stipulation.

In a December, 2010 Preliminary Conference order the parties agreed that the issue of grounds for divorce was resolved. The case was certified as ready for trial by order issued in June, 2011. Defendant alleged that in August, 2011 she commenced her own action because of plaintiff's default under the Interim Stipulation. In September 2011 the defendant moved to enforce the Interim Stipulation in this (2009) action. On October 21, 2011 the plaintiff filed and then served the Notice of Discontinuance of the 2009 action, under which the Interim Stipulation had been made. In November, 2011 the defendant moved to vacate the Notice.

The defendant claimed in her affidavit that the plaintiff exercised his right under the Interim Stipulation and withdrew and used the $56,000 for a new home. He paid off the mortgage. However, he did not transfer the marital residence to the defendant. The plaintiff submitted no opposing affidavit. He relied entirely on the law regarding discontinuance of actions.

Supreme Court observed that CPLR 3217(a)(1) permits any party asserting a claim to discontinue it without a court order by serving upon all parties a notice of discontinuance "at any time before a responsive pleading is served or within twenty days after service of the pleading asserting the claim, whichever is earlier, and filing the notice with proof of service with the clerk of the court. No complaint was served, and thus there was no responsive pleading. Where no pleadings have been served, a plaintiff has the "absolute and unconditional right" to discontinue an action without seeking judicial permission by serving a notice upon the defendant. (Tutt v. Tutt, 61 A.D.3d 967, 878 N.Y.S.2d 760 (2d Dept.2009), citing Battaglia v. Battaglia, 59 N.Y.2d 778, 464 N.Y.S.2d 725, 451 N.E.2d 472 (1988))

The Court noted that the right may be waived if there is a voluntary and knowing relinquishment of such right, which may arise by express agreement or by conduct, either by actions or by a failure to claim the advantage given by the right. Since service of the complaint was contemplated by the parties, there could be no finding of a waiver of the statutory right to discontinue the action before the complaint was served.

However, the Court held that the defendant set forth undisputed evidence that should lead to an estoppel. A court's power to invoke equitable jurisdiction to vacate a notice must be limited to instances where the conduct is particularly egregious and amounts to more than just an altering of the respective rights of the parties. The Court found the requisite conduct here. The defendant permitted plaintiff to take $56,000 in marital funds based upon an express promise to pay off the mortgage on the marital home and then to transfer the home to her. He did not transfer the property to her. Even assuming that the Interim Stipulation was unenforceable under principles of contract law, he induced her by his conduct in signing this agreement to permit him to do something he otherwise would have been barred from doing under the Automatic Orders (DRL 236-B (2)(b)); i.e, taking the money to purchase his own home. Seeking now to wipe out the action and, as plaintiff's counsel asserted, with it any further obligation under the Interim Stipulation, smacked of deviousness and unfair conduct and met the threshold for vacating the Notice of Discontinuance on equitable grounds.

The Court agreed with the defendant regarding the enforcement of the Interim Agreement as it applied to transfer to her of the marital residence. The mortgage was to be paid off, and the wife was then to receive the house, free of the mortgage. In exchange, the husband was to receive the funds needed to purchase a separate residence. While it is true that final division of assets was left to a further and final agreement, such a later agreement was not stated to be a condition to performance of the foregoing, and both behaved accordingly. The defendant's motion to vacate the Notice of Discontinuance was granted, the 2009 action was reinstated, and the two actions were consolidated for purposes of joint trial. The Court directed the plaintiff to serve and file a complaint within 20 days of the date of the order.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit

Second Circuit Holds Defense of Marriage Act Unconstitutional

In Windsor v U.S.--- F.3d ----, 2012 WL 4937310 (C.A.2 (N.Y.)) Plaintiff Edith Windsor sued as surviving spouse of a same-sex couple that was married in Canada in 2007 and was resident in New York at the time of her spouse's death in 2009. Windsor was denied the benefit of the spousal deduction for federal estate taxes under 26 U.S.C. 2056(A) solely because Section 3 of the Defense of Marriage Act ("DOMA"), 1 U.S.C. 7, defines the words "marriage" and "spouse" in federal law in a way that bars the Internal Revenue Service from recognizing Windsor as a spouse or the couple as married. The text of section 3 is as follows: In determining the meaning of any Act of Congress, or of any ruling, regulation, or interpretation of the various administrative bureaus and agencies of the United States, the word "marriage" means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, the word "spouse" refers only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife. 1 U.S.C. 7. At issue was Windsor's claim for a refund in the amount of $363,053, which turned on the constitutionality of that section of federal law.

The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Jones, J., 833 F.Supp.2d 394, granted summary judgment for the taxpayer. The United States, as nominal defendant, and the congressional group appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed. It held, among other things, that Windsor's suit was not foreclosed by Baker v. Nelson, 409 U.S. 810, 93 S.Ct. 37, 34 L.Ed.2d 65 (1971), which held that the use of the traditional definition of marriage for a state's own regulation of marriage status did not violate equal protection, and that Section 3 of DOMA is subject to intermediate scrutiny under the factors enumerated in City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985), and other cases. It concluded that the statute did not withstand that review and was unconstitutional.

Appellate Division, First Department

Child Custody - Conditions on Visitation - Family Court Properly Suspended Petitioner's Visitation until He Revealed to Mother Where He Took the Children During Visitation.

In Matter of Samuel A. v. Aidarina S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4490973 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which dismissed petitioner father's petition to modify custody and visitation, and an order which suspended petitioner's visitation with the children until he disclosed to the mother where the children were being taken during weekend visitation. It held, inter alia, that Family Court properly suspended petitioner's visitation until he revealed to the mother where he took the children during visitation, as petitioner disregarded the court's direct order to reveal that information during the hearing on his petition. Under these exceptional circumstances, petitioner forfeited his right to visitation.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Exclusive Occupancy - Exclusive Possession of the Marital Residence Usually Granted to Spouse Who Has Custody of Children. Imputed Income - Where a Party's Account Is Not Believable, the Court May Impute a True or Potential Income Higher than Alleged. Neutral Expert Properly Calculated Value of Plaintiff's Enhanced Earning Capacity

In Greisman v Greisman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4372994 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the plaintiff husband appealed from portions of a judgment which awarded the defendant wife exclusive occupancy of the marital residence until the parties' youngest child reaches the age of 18 or was otherwise emancipated; imputed to the husband an annual income of $93,570.00; awarded the defendant $10,665.60 representing one-third of the value of the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity derived from his certification as a certified public accountant, $31,663.50 representing one-third of the value of plaintiff's accounting practice, and $204,701.01 representing one-third of the value of the plaintiff's interest in an investment property located on Carroll Street in Brooklyn.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in making the award of exclusive occupancy. Exclusive possession of the marital residence is usually granted to the spouse who has custody of the minor children of the marriage. In making such a determination, the need of the custodial parent to occupy the marital residence is weighed against the financial need of the parties. The evidence at trial established that the parties were capable of maintaining the marital residence, and the plaintiff failed to establish an immediate need for his portion of the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence and failed to demonstrate that suitable comparable housing could be obtained at a cost less than that necessary to maintain the marital residence. In addition it would be inappropriate to allow the plaintiff to utilize his failure to make court-ordered child support payments as a way to force the sale of the marital residence.

It rejected plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court improperly imputed an annual income of $93,570.00 to him. Where a party's account is not believable, the court may impute a true or potential income higher than alleged. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in imputing income to the plaintiff based on, among other things, the parties' tax return filed just prior to the commencement of this action and evidence of the plaintiff's attempts to conceal his true income.

In determining the value of the plaintiff's business and his certification, the Supreme Court properly relied on the report prepared by the neutral appraiser. There is no uniform rule for fixing the value of a going business and the valuation of a business for equitable distribution purposes is an exercise properly with the fact-finding power of the trial court, guided by expert testimony. The opinion of the neutral expert was not challenged, and the Supreme Court's conclusion as to the value of the business was supported by the record. With regard to the certification, the neutral expert properly calculated the value of the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity by comparing the expected earnings of a similarly situated individual with the plaintiff's actual normalized earnings as a certified public accountant and applying a present value discount.

Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in determining the value of the investment property. The valuation rested on the credibility of the defendant's expert witness and his appraisal techniques, and was supported by the record.

New York Had Subject Matter Jurisdiction of Issue of Custody Where South Carolina Family Court Found South Carolina Was the Child's Home State and That New York Was the Appropriate Forum.

In Dalcollo v. Dalcollo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4512926 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff father commenced an action for a divorce on September 27, 2010. He alleged that he and the defendant mother had resided in their home in Commack, New York, since 2005, and had married on February 7, 2010. The parties' child was born on September 22, 2010, in a Maryland hospital, while the defendant was en route from New York to South Carolina, where she intended to relocate with the child. The defendant moved, in effect, to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a cause of action pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7). The plaintiff made an untimely cross motion to restrain the defendant from removing the child from Suffolk County until final disposition of the action. In an order dated December 22, 2010, the Supreme Court denied the defendant's motion and, sua sponte, restrained her from removing the parties' child from Suffolk County until final disposition of the action. It then denied the plaintiff's cross motion as academic, and noted that if it had not denied the cross motion as academic it would have denied it as untimely.

The Appellate Division noted that contrary to the defendant's contention, New York had subject matter jurisdiction of the issue of custody of the parties' child. The South Carolina Family Court, where the mother had commenced a custody proceeding in mid-October 2010, found that, under South Carolina's version of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act South Carolina was the child's home state. However, since the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, had already determined, in its order dated November 23, 2010, that it had jurisdiction over the issue of custody of the parties' child in the divorce action commenced by the father, the South Carolina Family Court determined that New York was the appropriate forum, and stayed the custody proceeding before it pending a determination of the New York action. Under those circumstances, New York acquired jurisdiction under Domestic Relations Law §76(1)(b) and §76-f. Thus, the Supreme Court correctly denied defendant's motion which was, in effect, pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7) to dismiss the complaint.

While no appeal lies as of right from an order that does not determine a motion made on notice the Appellate Division granted the defendant leave to appeal from that portion of the order dated December 22, 2010 which sua sponte, restrained the defendant from removing the parties' child from Suffolk County until final disposition of the action. When the plaintiff cross-moved to restrain the defendant from removing the child from Suffolk County until final disposition of the action, the defendant objected to the cross motion as untimely, and did not submit any substantive opposition thereto. In the order dated December 22, 2010, the Supreme Court, sua sponte, restrained the defendant from removing the parties' child from Suffolk County until final disposition of the action, then denied the plaintiff's untimely cross motion for that same relief as academic. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court's order prejudiced the defendant, who had no fair notice of the plaintiff's cross motion and was deprived of a sufficient opportunity to address the issues raised. Accordingly, it modified the order dated December 22, 2010, by deleting the provision thereof restraining the defendant from removing the child from Suffolk County until final disposition of the action.

Second Department Holds That for Purposes of an Order of Protection Child Was in an "Intimate Relationship" with the Live-in Boyfriend of Her Mother.

In Matter of Jose M. v. Angel V., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4373042 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the petitioner father commenced a family offense proceeding on behalf of his then-nine-year-old daughter by filing a family offense petition against the respondent (boyfriend), who was the live-in-boyfriend of the mother. The father alleged, in effect, that his daughter, K. M., was in an "intimate relationship" (Family Ct Act §812[1][e]) with the boyfriend. The petition alleged that, on September 25, 2010, the boyfriend "tied [the child] up with [a belt] around her hands which were pulled behind her back before being tied and [the child was tied with a belt] around her ankles." After tying up the child, the boyfriend allegedly "dumped her on the couch and then later [on] the kitchen table." The child was crying and calling for her mother throughout the incident. The child's mother finally appeared and told the boyfriend to stop, but he left the child tied up for several more minutes and told her that he would put her out on the fire escape the next time he tied her up. According to the petition, the child was terrified of the boyfriend and did not want to see the mother. The father alleged that he filed a police report and contacted the Administration for Children's Services (ACS), which then initiated an investigation. The father requested, inter alia, that the Family Court enter an order of protection against the boyfriend and in favor of the child. On the same day that he filed the petition, the father appeared before the Family Court. The father explained that he and the mother had a joint custody arrangement under which the father would have custody of the child during the week and one weekend per month, and the mother would have visitation with the child three weekends per month. The incident alleged in the petition had occurred during the weekend prior to the filing of the petition.

During a subsequent court appearance, the Family Court stated that because the boyfriend was not related to the child by blood or affinity, an issue existed as to whether there was an "intimate relationship" between the two. In response, the attorney for the child argued that the boyfriend was acting as the child's stepfather since the child was at the boyfriend's residence on a regular basis, the child identified the boyfriend as her stepfather, and the boyfriend exercised parental authority over the child. On May 23, 2011, the father, the mother, and the boyfriend, each pro se, appeared before the Family Court. The Family Court stated that the Legislature did not intend the term "intimate relationship" to cover situations such as this, involving a "quasi stepchild versus a quasi stepparent." It concluded that it did not have subject matter jurisdiction over the proceeding because the parties were not related by blood or affinity and, therefore, they were not in an intimate relationship within the meaning of the Family Court Act. Family Court dismissed the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Leventhal reversed on the law. He observed that a court's lack of subject matter jurisdiction is not waivable, but may be raised at any stage of the action, and the court may, ex mero motu [on its own motion], at any time, when its attention is called to the facts, refuse to proceed further and dismiss the action. The Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction, constrained to exercise only those powers conferred upon it by the New York Constitution or by statute. Pursuant to Family Court Act §812(1), the Family Court's jurisdiction in family offense proceedings is limited to certain enumerated acts that occur "between spouses or former spouses, or between parent and child or between members of the same family or household" (Family Ct Act §812[1]). On July 21, 2008 (see L 2008, ch 326), the Legislature expanded the definition of "members of the same family or household" to include, among others, "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time" (Family Ct Act §812[1][e]). The Legislature expressly excluded from the definition of "intimate relationship" a "casual acquaintance" and "ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts" . However, beyond those delineated exclusions, the Legislature left it to the courts to determine, on a case-by-case basis, what qualifies as an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act §812(1)(e). Additionally, the Legislature suggested certain factors which the courts may consider, including, but not limited to, "the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship".

In his opinion Justice Leventhal observed that following the 2008 amendment, courts have found that persons who have dated or were engaged in a sexual relationship are covered within the meaning of "intimate relationship". The record supported a finding that the mother and the boyfriend were in an intimate relationship. However, while the nature of the relationship between the mother and the boyfriend is relevant, it was not dispositive of the issue before the Court. In this regard, case law suggests that in order for an "intimate relationship" to exist within the meaning of Family Court Act §812, the relationship should be direct, not one based upon a connection with a third party. Nonetheless, under the facts of this case, the Court found that the child and the boyfriend were in an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act §812(1)(e) such that the Family Court has jurisdiction over the proceeding. Even prior to the 2008 amendment, Family Court Act §812(1) encompassed a relationship between a stepparent and a stepchild, based on affinity. Here, the relationship between the child and the boyfriend was direct and akin to the relationship between a stepparent and a stepchild. The following factors, which are alleged in this case, supported the existence of this "quasi-stepparent-stepchild" relationship: the boyfriend had dated the child's mother for more than three years, he resided with the child's mother, and the child spent substantial time visiting with the mother in the home the mother shared with the boyfriend. The allegation that the boyfriend exercised parental authority over the child while she visited with the mother was particularly significant. Moreover, the interaction between the child and the boyfriend reportedly occurred on a regular basis (three weekends per month, from Friday afternoon until Monday morning) and was likely to continue in the future. Hence, the alleged relationship between the child and the boyfriend was one of the "unique or special" relationships that "subject persons to greater vulnerability and potential abuse because of their nature"

The Court noted that the determination as to whether persons are or have been in an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act §812(1)(e) is a fact-specific determination which may require a hearing. However, considering the allegations here, the Family Court possessed sufficient relevant information to allow it to make an informed determination on that issue. Consequently, the Family Court incorrectly determined that the child was not in an intimate relationship with the live-in boyfriend of her mother. Accordingly, the Family Court erred in dismissing the proceeding on the ground that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The order was reversed, on the law, the petition reinstated, and the matter remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings on the petition.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Suspension of the Recreational Licenses of Respondents Who Have at Least Four Months of Arrears Does Not Apply to Respondents Who Are Receiving Supplemental Security Income

In Matter of Commissioner of Social Services ex rel. Foster v. Turner, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 4748312 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Respondent contended that the court erred in failing to cap his unpaid child support arrears at $500 and that his hunting and fishing licenses should not have been suspended because he received supplemental security income. Those contentions were raised for the first time on appeal and were not preserved for review. Nevertheless, the Appellate Division exercised its power to review his contention regarding his recreational licenses as a matter of discretion in the interest of justice. It observed that Family Court Act § 458-c (a) permits the court to order the suspension of the recreational licenses of respondents who have at least four months of arrears, but the statute further states that its provisions "shall not apply to ... respondents who are receiving ... supplemental security income" (Fam. Ct. Act §458-c [c][1]). Petitioner did not dispute that respondent received supplemental security income. Therefore, in light of the mandatory language in the statute, it modified the order by vacating that part suspending respondent's hunting and fishing licenses.

Equitable Distribution - Real Property - a Notice of Pendency May Be Filed in Any Action in Which the Judgment Demanded Would Affect the Title To, or the Possession, Use or Enjoyment Of, Real Property. A Claim That Real Property Is a Marital Asset Subject to Distribution Does Not, by Itself, Establish Grounds for a Notice of Pendency.

In Jolley v Lando, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4748740 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Plaintiff husband commenced an action seeking equitable distribution of the parties' marital assets, which allegedly included 18 parcels of real property. In addition to filing a summons and complaint, plaintiff filed a notice of pendency as to the real property. The Appellate Division reversed. It agreed with defendant wife that Supreme Court erred in denying her motion to cancel the notice of pendency. It observed that a notice of pendency may be filed in any action in a court of the state or of the United States in which the judgment demanded would affect the title to, or the possession, use or enjoyment of, real property"(CPLR 6501). In determining the merits of a motion to cancel a notice of pendency, a court is limited to examining the face of the pleadings. A claim that real property is a marital asset subject to distribution does not, by itself, establish grounds for a notice of pendency inasmuch as a claim for equitable distribution will not necessarily affect the title to, or possession, use, or enjoyment of, the subject real property. It held that the court erred in relying on, inter alia, Caruso, Caruso & Branda, P.C. v Hirsch (41 AD3d 407, 409) because the complaint in the underlying divorce action in that case asserted causes of action for fraudulent conveyance and constructive trust in addition to equitable distribution. Here, the complaint sought only equitable distribution. It rejected the plaintiff's contention that the relief demanded in the complaint "would, obviously, affect [defendant's] title to and/or her possession, use or enjoyment of the parcels identified in" the notice of pendency. At this juncture of the litigation was unclear whether the court, in the event that it ruled in favor of plaintiff, would order defendant to convey the properties to plaintiff or would instead order defendant to pay a money judgment to plaintiff. It thus could not be said with certainty that defendant would be required to sell or mortgage the subject properties.

Child Support - Award - Emancipation - Child Who Worked on a Full-time Basis and Filed Individual Income Tax Returns Not Emancipated Where Mother Continued to Pay for Child's Food, Gas, and Cell Phone and Demonstrated That Child Was Not Economically Independent and Self-supporting

In Matter of Cedeno v Knowlton, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4468502 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly denied the fathers objections to the Support Magistrate's order that, after a hearing, determined that the parties' child was not emancipated and continued the father's child support obligation until the child turned 21 years of age. It pointed out that a parent is obligated to support his or her child until the age of 21 unless the child becomes emancipated, which occurs once the child becomes economically independent through employment and is self-supporting (Matter of Smith v. Smith, 85 AD3d 1188, 1188; see Matter of Drumm v. Drumm, 88 AD3d 1110, 1112-1113; Matter of Burr v. Fellner, 73 AD3d 1041, 1041-1042; Matter of Thomas B. v. Lydia D., 69 AD3d 24, 28). Although the parties' child worked on a full-time basis and filed individual income tax returns, the fact that respondent mother continued to pay for the child's food, gas, and cell phone demonstrated that the child was not economically independent and self-supporting.

Supreme Court

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) - Insufficient Evidence to Determine Gross Income - Unjust or Inappropriate - Child Support - Pendente Lite - CSSA Not Considered - Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Presumption Rebutted - Support Award Shifted Parties' Finances, Giving the Defendant More Available Resources than Plaintiff.

In Gaetano D v Antoinette D, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4748311 (N.Y.Sup.) the defendant wife moved for pendente lite relief, including an order of child support of $1,854.00 per month plus 71% of all statutory add-ons, maintenance of $1,443.00 per month, contribution to the expenses of the marital residence including paying one-half of the mortgage and real estate taxes, an order directing the plaintiff to complete the transfer of title to the 1998 Ford Suburban and 2004 GMC Suburban to his sole name and to obtain insurance for these vehicles without prejudice to defendant's equitable distribution of these assets, and an award of interim counsel fees in the amount of $10,000.00. The plaintiff opposed the motion claiming it was unnecessary. He alleged that he had been voluntarily contributing to the shelter and support of the children based upon his actual income. He claimed that the support award the defendant sought from him was impossible, as she misrepresented both his income and the parties' expenses to this Court.

The parties were married on March 7, 1999 and had two children of the marriage, ages 10 and 13. The action for divorce was commenced on December 13, 2011. The plaintiff was 45 years of age and the defendant was 52 years of age. The marital residence was located in Westchester County, New York. The plaintiff was removed from the marital residence after being arrested on December 4, 2011, following an incident where he allegedly choked the parties' son. The plaintiff denied choking his son, claiming he was only wrestling with him. A CPS report was "unfounded." The plaintiff lived with his parents in Westchester County.

The defendant was employed as a secretary in a school district and also worked selling real estate. In 2011 she earned $45,127.55, comprised of $30,150.50 from income as a secretary, as reflected on her 2011 W-2, and $14,977.50 from her work in real estate, as reflected on her 1099. The plaintiff was self-employed and owned a construction business. The parties' 2010 tax return showed the plaintiff earned business income of $28,345.00, with a net profit of $8,571.00 after expenses. The parties' 2011 income tax return showed the plaintiff earned business income of approximately $37,000.00, which, after deduction of various expenses, netted a profit of $24,106.00. A review of the business' schedule C's for other years indicated net profits of $42,635.00 for 2004, $36,740.00 for 2005, $37,937.00 for 2006, $46,580.00 for 2008 and $31,246.00 for 2008. Both parties acknowledged that many of the household expenses were historically paid through the plaintiff's business.

The defendant asked the Court to impute income to the plaintiff in the amount of $110,000.00, claiming he had underreported his income on their tax returns. She asserted that they could not have afforded their lifestyle on plaintiff's claimed income. She asserted they purchased the marital residence in 2006 by paying $100,000.00 in cash and taking a mortgage of $400,000.00. She asked the Court to conclude that the plaintiff earned substantially more income than reported based upon their lifestyle and expenses. The plaintiff claimed his income as reported was accurate, pointing to the decline in the construction industry since 2008 due to the poor economy. He claimed that the parties were able to afford their lifestyle because their income had been supplemented by the proceeds of the sale of a "spec" house in 2008, which earned plaintiff a profit of $258,946.09. This money was deposited into various marital accounts and used over the last four years for living expenses, with the remaining balance of $48,000.00 distributed equally to the parties in approximately December, 2011, with each party receiving $24,000.00. The defendant's stated expenses on her net worth statement dated March 2, 2012 totaled $7,404.18 per month and included $3,322.00 for the mortgage and real estate taxes, $560.00 for utilities, $540.00 for food, clothing, and laundry, $298.00 for various insurances, $350.00 for unreimbursed medical expenses, $350.00 for household maintenance, $200.00 for household help, $280.00 for automobile expenses, $90.00 for education, $85.00 for camp, $200.00 for recreation, and $790.00 for miscellaneous expenses. She listed assets of $36,909.99 in a Capital One account, $24,106.00 in HSBC Mutual Funds, a life insurance policy on the plaintiff with a face value of $1,588.86, a pension with an indeterminate amount, and an IRA valued at $14,267.53. She claimed to have $18,000.00 in premarital funds, which the plaintiff disputed. Her debts were listed as a mortgage on the marital residence in the amount of $383,151.39 and approximately $11,000.00 in credit card debt, $5,000.00 of which she claimed was the plaintiff's business debt. She was also paying half of the automobile insurance coverage for two vehicles owned by the parties but used by the plaintiff in his business.

The plaintiff's stated expenses on his net worth statement dated February, 2012, totaled $6,777.31 per month and included $3,200.00 for the mortgage, $640.00 for utilities, $640.00 for food, $416.66 for various insurances, $26.50 for unreimbursed medical expenses, $511.50 for automobile expenses for three vehicles, $172.00 for educational expenses, $251.00 for recreational expenses, and $263.00 in miscellaneous expenses, which include the repayment of a loan. He claimed his personal monthly expenses included $430.00 for groceries, $475.00 for clothing, $15.00 for dry cleaning, $166.00 for automobile insurance, $26.50 for unreimbursed medical expenses, $511.50 for gasoline, repairs, and tolls, $58.00 for miscellaneous expenses and $200.00 for credit card debt. He also claimed he paid his parents $700.00 per month for rent, which the defendant disputed. The plaintiff listed assets of $13,800.00 in cash accounts, $24,000.00 in a joint CD, and equity in the marital residence in an indeterminate amount. The plaintiff was the sole owner of a construction company, the value of which was unknown. His net worth statement listed liabilities of $4,700.00 in credit card expense, some of which was incurred by the business, and the mortgage of $370,000.00.

The plaintiff had been voluntarily contributing support for the household expenses and children's needs. Initially, he was paying one-half of the mortgage on the marital residence, as well as paying the cable, internet, phones, car insurance, and Con Edison bills through his business. Currently, he was paying one-half of the mortgage payment and giving the defendant $1,000.00 for other expenses, totaling $2,700.00 per month. He challenged many of the defendant's claimed expenses, such as the expenses for babysitting when her family watches the children for no charge, and $100.00 for a maid when she has never employed one. He also criticized her monthly expenses for gardening and snow plowing when there were no charges for these services. Many of the defendant's claimed expenses were non-existent or inflated, as she conceded in her reply affidavit. However, she anticipated having these expenses in the future once the parties are divorced. The defendant's net worth statement established her reasonable monthly expenses to maintain the home and care for herself and the children, excluding add-on expenses, were about $6,000.00 per month.

It appeared the plaintiff had historically earned income greater than the amount reported on the parties' income tax returns. While it appeared the plaintiff underreported his income since 2008, the parties had also supplemented their earned income with proceeds from the sale of the spec house. The remaining proceeds in the approximate amount of $50,000.00 to $60,000.00 had been distributed to the parties. The defendant took the position that the remaining funds she received from the sale of the spec house should not be used to pay the household expenses, but rather, her share should be considered her separate property since the accounts had already been divided.

Supreme Court observed that for all actions commenced after October 12, 2010, courts are required to apply a statutory mathematical formula in determining temporary maintenance awards (DRL § 236 B[5-a][c]). The standards previously used by the courts no longer apply. (Khaira v. Khaira, 93 A.D.3d 194, 197, 938 N.Y.S.2d 513 [1st Dept 2012]). Pursuant to DRL §236 B(5-a)(c), after the statutory formula is applied to the parties' income, the calculated amount is considered the presumptive award of temporary maintenance, which shall be ordered, unless the court finds that the presumptive award would be unjust or inappropriate based upon 17 factors prescribed in DRL § 236 B(5-a)(e)(1). In making the calculations, the court must first determine the parties' income as defined by DRL § 236 B(5-a)(b)(4). In determining income for purposes of calculating temporary maintenance, the statute uses the same definition of income as set forth in the Child Support Standards Act, and also includes any income from income producing property to be distributed as part of equitable distribution (DRL § 236 B[5-a][b][4]). The court is required to establish the parties' support obligation "as a function of the income that is, or should have been, reflected on the party's most recently filed income tax return" (DRL § 240[1-b][b][5][I]). Where the record demonstrates that a party's income tax return does not reflect the party's actual income or demonstrated earning potential, the court may impute income to establish the party's support obligation. The Court pointed out that in determining income for purposes of calculating temporary maintenance, the statute is problematic, as it requires the court "to consider factors some of which can only be established after a full trial and or extensive discovery" (Scott M. v. Ilona M., 31 Misc.3d 353, 361, 915 N.Y.S.2d 834 [Sup Ct Kings Co 2011]). However, where the court is presented with insufficient evidence to determine gross income, or where a party defaults, DRL § 236(B)(5-a)(g) requires the court to issue a temporary maintenance award based upon the needs of the party seeking maintenance, or the standard of living of the parties prior to commencement of the divorce action, whichever is greater. Here, determining the plaintiff's income was particularly challenging. The parties' lifestyle and expenses suggested income greater than what they had reported on their income tax returns. Due to the questionable financial information contained in the parties' submissions, the Court could not determine with accuracy plaintiff's actual income. It was apparent that the parties' lifestyle and the expenses set forth in their net worth statements exceeded the income stated in their tax returns. The defendant suggested that this Court should impute income to the plaintiff of $110,000.00. However, based upon the submissions, it appeared that the plaintiff earned less than this amount. The Court stated that if it were to use this figure for plaintiff's imputed income, the presumptive award for temporary maintenance would be $13,048.00 per year, or $1,087.33 per month. [The plaintiff's net income would be calculated at $96,489.00 ($110,000.00 less $13,511.00 for FICA). The defendant's net income would be calculated at $42,579.00 ($45,128.00 less $2,549.00 for FICA).

In addition to the guideline amount of temporary maintenance, the defendant requested that the temporary maintenance award direct the plaintiff to pay one-half of the monthly payments for the mortgage and real estate taxes. The Court noted that the statutory formula for calculating temporary maintenance is intended to cover all of the payee spouse's presumptive reasonable expenses, including an allowance for housing. If the Court were to order the plaintiff to pay a portion of the defendant's housing expenses in addition to the guideline amount of temporary maintenance, this award would include an impermissible double shelter allowance. (See generally Khaira v. Khaira, 93 A.D.3d 194, 198, 938 N.Y.S.2d 513 [1st Dept 2012]. After considering the 17 statutory factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236 B(5-a)(e)(1), and the reasonable expenses to maintain the pre-divorce marital residence, the court found the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance of $1,087.33 per month, which was based upon the imputed income suggested by the defendant, would be unjust and inappropriate, thereby warranting a deviation.

Since the Court was provided with insufficient evidence to determine the plaintiff's gross income, the temporary maintenance award was based upon the defendant's reasonable needs (DRL §236 B[5-a] [g]). It held that considering the defendant's income and the child support award an appropriate award for temporary maintenance would be $2,000.00 per month.

Supreme Court observed that Courts considering applications for pendente lite child support may, in their discretion, apply the CSSA standards and guidelines, but they are not required to do so. Considering the children's reasonable monthly expenses, the Court declined to apply the guidelines and made an award of child support of $1,200.00 per month, which was just and appropriate after considering the expenses covered by the temporary maintenance award.

The Court noted that defendant was responsible for paying all of the expenses for the marital residence, including the mortgage and taxes, as well as all other expenses for herself and for the children, except those set forth in its decision, which was to be paid based upon the parties' pro-rata share of income. The maintenance award was tax deductible to the plaintiff and taxable as income to the defendant, or as permitted by the IRS.

The Court directed that the parties maintain in full force and effect any life insurance policy in effect with the other spouse designated as beneficiary; maintain in full force and effect the current medical and dental insurance coverage and contribute to the cost thereof based upon their pro-rata share of income. The parties and the children were directed to use in-network healthcare providers whenever possible. The parties were directed to pay for the unreimbursed medical, dental, and other healthcare expenses, including psychological, psychiatric, therapy, and prescription expenses, based upon their pro-rata share of income, with the plaintiff's share being 70% and the defendant's share being 30%. The parties were also directed to pay the children's reasonable add-on expenses, including school expenses and extra-curricular activities based upon their pro rata share of income (DRL§ 240[1-b][c][4], [5], and [7]).

This award was retroactive to the original date of service of the application. Retroactive sums due by reason of the award were to be paid at the rate of $500.00 per month in addition to the sums awarded until all arrears have been satisfied. The plaintiff was permitted to take a credit for sums voluntarily paid for actual support of the children incurred after the making of the motion and prior to the date of the decision for which he had canceled checks or other similar proof of payment.

The Court noted that DRL § 237 creates a "rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse." The Court stated that at first blush it appeared that the plaintiff would be considered the monied spouse based upon the parties' respective incomes. However, the support award shifted the parties' finances, giving the defendant more available resources than the plaintiff. Considering that the parties had few assets to consider, the shift in financial resources to the defendant rebutted the presumption that the plaintiff is the monied spouse (See Scott M. v. Ilona M., 31 Misc.3d 353, 915 N.Y.S.2d 834 [Sup Ct Kings Co 2011]). Nevertheless, the plaintiff had been the primary wage earner during the marriage and had the ability to earn a substantially higher income than the defendant over the long term. The defendant only recently returned to work in a secretarial position. Considering her educational level and experience, her earnings potential was limited. Defendant sought $10,000.00 in interim counsel fees. To date she had paid her counsel $7,500.00 and owed an additional. In order to create parity in the divorce litigation, while also considering the shift in financial resources to the defendant, the availability of limited assets to pay for litigation fees, and the non-complexity of the issues presented, the plaintiff was awarded interim counsel fees of $7,500.00 to be paid by the plaintiff directly to the defendant's attorney within 30 days after the date of the decision.

Actions - Stay of Proceedings - Federal Service Members Civil Relief Act and New York's Military Law - Right to a Stay Is Not Automatic

In Lawry v Lawry, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4785176 (N.Y.Sup.) the wife served a summons with notice for divorce upon her husband and eventually served an amended verified complaint. In her amended complaint, the wife alleged that her husband was "in the military service of the United States," stationed at Fort Drum in upstate New York, and that he had not been deployed outside the United States since July 2010. The defendant appeared without counsel for a pretrial conference and the court informed the defendant that because of his failure to file an answer to the complaint, he was in default and the court could award judgment to the wife based on his default. The court engaged wife's counsel and the defendant in a discussion over the resolution of the disputes in the underlying divorce action. The wife's attorney asked the defendant to produce any records regarding the credit card charges on the wife's credit card, so the wife could determine which charges were incurred for marital expenses during the marriage. The wife counsel also asked the husband to provide several items of personal property that the wife claimed were either separate property or marital property that she wanted distributed to her. The husband asserted that he wanted to retrieve personal property in the wife's possession, and that he would come to Rochester and pick up the property he claimed. The court ordered that the property exchange would occur no later than August 24, 2012, and that the husband needed to give his wife 48 hours notice of when he would make the exchange. After examining the undisputed facts and listening to the respective argument, the court verbally ordered the husband to refinance a certain truck by August 24, 2012, or return the truck to his wife's possession so she could sell the truck. In addition, the court ordered the husband to provide the credit card statements and accounts in his possession by August 15, 2012. The court also instructed the defendant to appear in court on September 6, 2012 to resolve any remaining issues in the case.

The date set by the court during the pretrial conference for delivery of the truck came and went. The truck was not delivered as directed and there was no evidence before the court that the husband refinanced the truck. The credit card statements were not provided and the items of personal property not exchanged. The wife's counsel then asked the court to sign an order for the husband to return the truck in good working order or, if he failed to deliver it, then permitting the wife to retrieve the vehicle. The requested order also required the husband to return a list of separate property.

In response, the husband provided the court with a letter, received on August 20, 2012, in which he stated that he was currently in military training and "my military service prevents me from appearing" in court. He asserted his "rights under the Service Members Civil Relief Act" and requested a stay of all proceedings, and an extension of time to file an answer for a period not less than 90 days. He added that he was participating in military training for which leave was not authorized. The defendant included a letter from his "commanding officer" which he stated verified "that my current duties prevent my appearance until at least November 14, 2012." The commanding officer's letter was addressed to the court and identified the defendant as a soldier under his command. The letter indicated that the officer knew that the defendant had been ordered to "exchange property" by August 24, 2012. The letter stated that the defendant's "ability to appear is materially affected by his military service" as the defendant was participating in required military training exercises and leave was not currently authorized. The commander suggested that the defendant was requesting "a stay in the proceedings until a time when his military service does not materially affect his ability to fulfill his civil obligation."

The court stated that it needed to resolve whether it could sign an order requiring the return of the truck and the personal property in the face of the soldier's application for a "stay" of proceedings under the federal Service Members Civil Relief Act and, although not requested by the soldier, whether New York's Military Law similarly bars the issuance of the repossession order. In addition, the Court needed to resolve whether it could order the service member's compliance with disclosure requests even if the court stayed any further court appearances. Both of these questions appeared to be without precedents in any other federal or state courts. Both of these questions it answered in the affirmative.

Supreme Court observed that the Service Members Civil Relief Act applies if the defendant is in military service and has received notice of the proceeding. 50 USCA App. 522. The statute requires the court, upon application by the service member, to stay the action if the service member attests in writing that his "current military duty requirements materially affect the service members' ability to appear" and the member's commanding officer makes a similar written statement. 50 USCA App. 522(b)(1)(2). The stay shall persist for not less than 90 days. The stay may be extended beyond 90 days upon further application and the court is empowered, if it denies an additional stay, to appoint counsel for the service member. Nakayama v. Cameron, 2007 Haw.App. Lexis 263 (Int.Ct.Hawaii, 2007). The only exception, granted in the language of the statute, is a provision that the stay may be denied if in the opinion of the court, "the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action or the defendant to conduct his defense is not materially affected by reason of his military service." 50 USCA App. 521.

The Court also observed that New York's Military Law reaches even further than the federal statute, although the stay language nearly mirrors the terms of the federal law. Section 304 of the New York Military Law provides, in pertinent part: At any stage thereof, any action or proceeding in any court or in any adjudicatory proceeding before any state agency, including any public authority in which a person in military service is involved as a party, during the period of such service or within sixty days thereafter shall, on application to it by such person or some person on his behalf, be stayed unless, in the opinion of the court or adjudicatory agency, the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action, or the defendant to conduct his defense, or in any adjudicatory proceeding the ability of the party to represent his interest, is not materially affected by reason of his military service.

Despite the absence of any reference to divorce litigation, the Court readily acknowledged that the stay, under either statute, had been applied to prevent default divorces from being granted against servicemembers. (Roslyn B. v. Alfred G., 222 A.D.2d 581 (2nd Dept.1995) Boelsen v. Boelsen, 182 Misc. 361 (Sup.Ct. Queens Cty.1944). It observed that in Wuster v. Levitt, 268 AD926, 927 (2nd Dept.1944), the Second Department noted: Under the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Boone v. Lightner (319 U.S. 561) considerable discretion is vested in the trial courts in the determination of motions of this character. However, the rule there is stated to be that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act (U.S.Code, title 50, Appendix, § 501 et seq.) is always to be liberally construed to protect those who have been obliged to drop their own affairs to take up the burdens of the nation, and that the discretion that is vested in trial courts to that end is not to be withheld on nice calculations. While "nice calculations" are not sufficient to deny a stay, a claim of substantial prejudice to another party would clearly qualify. The Supreme Court in Boone v. Lightner made that point clear: the stay would be conditioned, in part, on what "prejudice" to the non-military party might occur as a result of the stay. Boone v. Lightner, 319 U.S. 561, 569. In that respect, the court has an obligation to balance the substantial and respected rights of a member of the military service under state and federal law with the right of this wife to reclaim her own property and avoid substantial additional costs. Nerkowski v. Nerkowski, 2006 Conn.Super. Lexis 2706 (Sup.Ct.Conn.2006) (husband could not "viably invoke the protections of law to escape financial obligations" to his spouse and the court declined to stay the sale of the marital residence). Importantly, the critical language in the statutes was the phrase "materially affect" as a description of the consequences of the husband's absence from court proceedings. The same discretion in considering whether military service "materially affects" the service member's case applies in the New York Military Law. Warshawsky v. Warshawsky, 215 A.D.2d 374 (2nd Dept.1995 (stay denied where no material affect on the servicemember's ability to litigate a matter) Comparative analysis of sections 200 and 201 of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act indicated that while section 200 certainly aims to prevent default judgments from being obtained against members of the military, section 201 permits the court to order a case forward if the military service does not materially affect the party's ability to proceed. In point of fact, the aim of sections 200 [of the federal law] and 303 [of the New York Military Law] was not in a blunderbuss fashion to protect members of the military from having a default judgment entered against them, but to protect them from having default judgments entered against them without their knowledge or when unable to defend themselves.

The Court noted that this servicemember was simply seeking a stay of any court appearances until November 14, 2012. The letter from the service member and his commanding officer specifically referenced that the service member's inability to attend court dates. Because the service member's letter specifically referenced the "inability to appear," the court granted the service member's application to stay the appearances scheduled by the court. However, the application before the Court did not seek a stay from a requirement that the servicemember deliver the goods sought by the wife or participate in discovery. The commanding officer letter acknowledged that the service member was "ordered to exchange property," but he added only that the service member's "ability to appear is materially affected by his military service."The commanding officer did not suggest that the husband, as a result of his training and inability to obtain leave, was forbidden or restrained from turning over the requested personal property or the truck. There was no evidence, in the application letter or the commanding officer's letter, that the husband's military service would "materially affect" his ability to return the truck or impede his wife's right to repossess the truck. Furthermore, the wife's repossession of the truck did not prejudice the husband. During the appearance in Supreme Court, the husband acknowledged that the truck was purchased using his wife's pre-marriage money, the truck was titled in her name, she paid the monthly installment payment on the truck and she was paying the insurance. At that time, in the courtroom, the court ordered the husband to return the truck or refinance it and take over the insurance and the payments. Under these circumstances, the truck was the wife's separate property, and although she had permitted him to use the vehicle, the husband had no marital interest in the truck. The refusal to grant a stay, in this instance, did not harm the husband's interest in the resolution of his disputes over marital property because he had no right to claim any marital interest in the truck.

Finally, the court noted that the service member was not geographically distant from Monroe County, a factor in determining whether a stay of all aspects of the proceeding was appropriate. Fort Drum was approximately 175 miles from the courthouse and, if the wife was willing to drive to pick up the truck and her other property, the husband, who admitted he had no interest in those properties, should be required to turn them over now. In addition, the order to provide disclosure of the credit card purchases was not impacted by the defendant's military service. The husband could review the statements and provide information on his purchasers through the internet or other resources. He did not have to take any leave in order to accomplish this task, and could forward the results to the wife's counsel.

Foreign Judgments - Recognition - Comity - Supreme Court Grants Applications Register, and Enforce a Judgment of Divorce and Order of Custody Rendered by the Courts of Abu Dhabi Where Both Parties Appeared and Fully Participated in the Proceedings

In S.B. v W.A., 2012 WL 4512894 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51875(U) plaintiff sought to enter, register, and enforce a judgment of divorce and order of custody rendered by the courts of Abu Dhabi where both parties appeared and fully participated in the proceedings. The parties were married on May 14, 1998 in a civil ceremony in the City, County, and State of New York. Thereafter, on July 19, 1998, the parties married in a religious ceremony under Islamic law, also in the State of New York. As part of the religious ceremony, the parties signed a Mahr agreement requiring the defendant to pay the plaintiff an advanced dowry of $5,000.00 and, in the event of divorce, a deferred dowry of $250,000.00. There were two children of the marriage, a girl, born on July 12, 2001, and a boy, born on August 3, 2004. Both children were born in the United States. In 2002, the parties purchased the marital residence in Westchester County, New York. In the fall of 2006, the defendant received an employment offer in Abu Dhabi, an emirate of the UAE, and decided to move there. The plaintiff and children remained in the United States until August 2007, when they joined the defendant in Abu Dhabi. Once there, the plaintiff obtained a job with United National Bank and entered into a three-year employment contract. The contract required her to fulfill the three-year term and give at least three months' advance notice before leaving her employment. If the plaintiff terminated her contract early, she would be subject to financial penalties and forfeiture of benefits, including an immigration ban

The Court observed that the UAE is a civil law country where regulations and procedures are codified in the UAE federal laws.. All emirates have Courts of First Instance and Courts of Appeal, either federal or local, in addition to the Sharia courts, which mainly deal with matters of personal status, such as marriage, divorce, and inheritance. The primary source of all legislation in the UAE is Shari'a (Islamic Law), based upon the Quran and the traditions of the Prophet Mohammed.

On July 1, 2009, the plaintiff filed a petition for divorce in the Court of First Instance under Article 117 of the Personal Status Law of the UAE, alleging that the defendant failed to provide support for the family, and physically and verbally abused the plaintiff, causing her to sustain numerous injuries, and that it had become impossible for her to live with him. The plaintiff requested that the court grant her a divorce and order the defendant to pay her the deferred dowry pursuant to the Mahr agreement in the amount of $250,000.00, Udda (the three-month period observed by the wife before marrying someone else) Alimony and children's alimony, to provide and pay for a maid, custody of the children, possession and title to the marital residence, to provide a means of transportation for the children and to pay the previous support allowance, and other relief. The defendant filed a counterclaim against the plaintiff seeking an order from the court directing the plaintiff "to obey him, not to go out of the house without his permission, to move with him to their Homeland America, and to pay all fees and expenses."

Hearings on the divorce were held and both parties were represented by counsel and fully participated in the proceedings. Although the parties had a right to request that the Abu Dhabi Court apply the laws of the State of New York to their divorce proceedings, at no time did either party make the request. On December 27, 2009, in the presence of both parties, the Court issued a ruling on the merits rejecting the defendant's counterclaim and finding in favor of the plaintiff. The Court granted the plaintiff a divorce from the defendant on the ground of "harm and damage," and issued a ruling declaring the Udda Alimony to be valid; directing the defendant to pay the plaintiff the Udda Alimony in the amount of 30,000 AED, payable upon the effective date of the divorce judgment; directing the defendant to pay the plaintiff the deferred dowry of $250,000.00; directing the defendant to provide appropriate housing for the plaintiff, as the children's caregiver, or a housing allowance of 9,000 AED per month; directing the defendant to pay alimony for the children in the amount of 14,000 AED per month for each child, including food, clothing and transportation allowances, retroactive to January 7, 2009; directing the defendant to pay the plaintiff alimony in the amount of 10,000 AED per month retroactive to January 7, 2009 and payable until the effective date of the judgment of divorce; and directing the defendant to provide the plaintiff and children with a maid or 700 AED per month, which was the salary of a maid as of January 7, 2009. The Court also awarded the plaintiff custody of the children and directed the defendant to pay all relevant fees and expenses. The decision of the lower court was appealed to the Court of Appeals, and the Court of Cassation. Both courts affirmed the judgment, except that the Udda Alimony was reduced from 30,000 AED to 15,000 AED to allow for the accommodation allowance, only, since it was revealed that the defendant had already divorced the plaintiff and she was not pregnant.

Following the final conclusion of the divorce proceedings, the defendant left the UAE and returned to the United States. While the plaintiff remained in Abu Dhabi, she retained counsel in New York to pursue recognition and enforcement of the Abu Dhabi judgment of divorce in New York. She commenced a declaratory judgment action in January, 2011. During this time, the plaintiff also sought to obtain temporary passports for the children, as she intended to return to the United States with the children so they could register and attend school in September of 2011. After six months, the United States Embassy finally issued temporary passports enabling the plaintiff and the children to return to the United States on June 3, 2011.

The plaintiff filed an order to show cause seeking an order, inter alia, under the principles of comity, for an order recognizing, registering, and allowing the entry of a judgment of divorce and order of custody of the United Arab Emirates ("UAE"), with the same force and effect as if it were granted by a court of competent jurisdiction of the State of New York; an order pursuant to the principles of comity directing that custody of the parties' children be immediately transferred to the plaintiff as the adjudicated custodial parent; or in the alternative, an order awarding the plaintiff immediate custody of the children. While the plaintiff's motion was pending, the defendant filed a cross-motion on April 23, 2012 seeking physical custody of the parties' children.

The defendant claimed that the parties were deemed married under the laws of New York, as the Abu Dhabi courts entered a divorce judgment based on their religious marriage, applying the laws of the Islamic Sharia, and no divorce action had been filed based upon the civil marriage. He claimed that the Abu Dhabi divorce was a religious judgment of divorce, not a civil judgment of divorce, and therefore, the New York courts should not afford it comity. The Supreme Court rejected this argument. It observed that the general principle of law is that a divorce decree obtained in a foreign jurisdiction by residents of this State, in accordance with the laws thereof, is entitled to recognition under the principle of comity unless the decree offends the public policy of the State of New York" (Kraham v. Kraham, 73 Misc.2d 977 [Sup Ct Nassau Co 1973]). Although not required to do so, the courts of this State generally will accord recognition to the judgments rendered in a foreign country under the doctrine of comity which is the equivalent of full faith and credit given by the courts to judgments of our sister States. A court has the inherent power pursuant to the principles of comity to recognize and enforce a foreign judgment of divorce"unless there is some defect of jurisdiction shown to be against the public policy of the domestic state. Absent some showing of fraud in the procurement of the foreign country judgment ... or that recognition of the judgment would do violence to some strong public policy of this State ... a party who properly appeared in the action is precluded from attacking the validity of the foreign country judgment in a collateral proceeding brought in the courts of this State (Greschler v. Greschler, 51 N.Y.2d at 376). Since New York recognizes bilateral divorce decrees from foreign countries, recognition will be given to all the contents of such a decree, including a separation agreement incorporated' and approved' therein. No specific language is necessary to create an incorporation by reference. The court must look to the entire judgment of divorce and the surrounding circumstances. A separation agreement incorporated in a valid foreign divorce judgment is also immune from challenge under the doctrine of comity, because such a challenge would essentially constitute an impermissible collateral attack on the foreign judgment" (Tal v. Tal, 158 Misc.2d 703, 706 [Sup Ct Nassau Co 1993] citing Greschler v. Greschler, 51 N.Y.2d at 378).

Both parties were residing in Abu Dhabi when the plaintiff instituted the divorce proceedings. The divorce decree was obtained after a trial and two appeals, including an appeal to the highest court in Abu Dhabi, the Court of Cassation, that rendered a final and binding judgment of divorce. Both parties were represented by counsel, participated in the divorce proceedings, and had a full opportunity to contest jurisdiction and all other issues. There was no question that the foreign court had jurisdiction over the parties at the time the divorce judgment was issued and that it was a final binding order, thereby precluding the defendant from now collaterally attacking its validity or relitigating any of its provisions (see Borenstein v. Borenstein, 151 Misc. 160 [Sup Ct N.Y. Co 1934]; Greschler v. Greschler, 51 N.Y.2d at 376).

Supreme Court found no compelling public policy for refusing full recognition of the Abu Dhabi judgment of divorce under the doctrine of comity and therefore, the defendant was precluded from attacking the validity of the foreign judgment of divorce in a collateral proceeding in the New York courts.

Plaintiff also sought an order recognizing, registering, and allowing entry of the Abu Dhabi judgment against the defendant for $250,000.00 pursuant to the Mahr agreement. The Mahr agreement was executed as part of a religious ceremony two months after the parties' civil marriage on July 19, 1998. The plaintiff submitted that the Court should recognize the foreign court's judgment declaring the Mahr agreement valid and enforceable against the defendant, and allow entry of the judgment under article 53 of the CPLR since the Abu Dhabi court had jurisdiction over the parties, the judgment was rendered under a system compatible with the requirements of due process of law, neutral principles of law may be applied to the Mahr agreement without reference to any Islamic religious principles, and the agreement does not violate any public policy.

The Court found that the issue of the Mahr agreement was fully litigated at trial as well as on appeal to the highest court in Abu Dhabi. Both parties appeared, were represented by counsel, and fully participated in all proceedings. The defendant had not established nor raised any facts to suggest that the Mahr agreement was procured through fraud. Nor had he demonstrated that enforcement of the judgment derived from the Mahr agreement would be repugnant to the public policy of this state or our notions of fairness. Considering the relevant provisions of the Constitution, Personal Status Law, and procedural rules of the UAE, along with the court decisions in the civil divorce and criminal cases, the Court concluded that the Abu Dhabi courts had jurisdiction over the parties and the judgment was rendered under a system of justice compatible with due process of law. The defendant's challenge to the foreign judgment was nothing more than a forbidden collateral attack. The court held that the foreign judgment against the defendant in the amount of $250,000.00 shall be recognized and entered as a New York judgment pursuant to CPLR 5301 et seq.

In her motion, plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment recognizing each provision of the divorce judgment, including those provisions covering spousal and child support. The defendant argued that article 53 of the CPLR specifically excludes foreign court support judgments in matrimonial matters from recognition and enforcement and therefore, the plaintiff is estopped from seeking support arrears based upon the foreign judgment of divorce. The Court held that this argument was inapposite. The plaintiff did not rely upon article 53 of the CPLR as the procedural tool for the Court to recognize the support portions of the foreign divorce decree. The mere fact that foreign court judgments for support are excluded from recognition and enforcement under article 53 does not prevent this Court "from recognizing the judgment as a simple matter of comity ... as long as the various features of the foreign proceedings are shown to satisfy basic concepts of due process analogous to our own." The foreign court's proceedings and procedural rules were compatible with the requirements of due process of law and our notions of fairness. The foreign court had jurisdiction over the parties and the support provisions of the divorce decree present no issues of fraud or violation of public policy. Accordingly, the support provisions of the foreign judgment of divorce would be recognized under the principles of comity and the plaintiff was permitted to convert the Abu Dhabi support judgment into a New York judgment. It observed that once entered as a domestic support judgment, a New York court could entertain an application for enforcement or modification under Domestic Relations Law §244 and Family Court Act §§461(b) and 466(c).

To the extent the plaintiff's motion sought a judgment against the defendant for support arrears under the Abu Dhabi judgment of divorce, the application was denied with leave to renew. Although the Court had jurisdiction to entertain applications to enforce foreign decrees for spousal and child support before they are reduced to a domestic judgment, the record was insufficient for the Court to grant such relief, even in the form of a money judgment. "A decree of divorce by a foreign country court ... is enforceable in New York on the principle of comity, and should be given the same degree of enforceability with respect to entering a judgment for support arrears as would be given to a similar application based on a judgment of a New York court, subject to the discretion of the court, and inasmuch as there is a judgment stating the full amount of arrears," (see M.H. v. M.G., 172 Misc.2d 526, 530 [Fam Ct Albany Co 1996]) or sufficient proof to establish that the accrued support arrears are vested and "incapable of being modified by the rendering country" (Mandel-Mantello v. Treves, 79 A.D.2d 569; see also Oka v. Oka, 92 Misc.2d 1080 [Sup Ct App Term 1977]; Tannenberg v. Beldock, 68 A.D.2d 307, 313 [1st Dept 1979]). "[I]f the rendering court has the power to modify its decree with retroactive effect, and thus reduce the amount of unpaid arrears or extinguish them entirely, an action will not lie in this state to recover the arrears unless and until the amount thereof has first been definitely fixed by the rendering court" (48A NYJur2d, Domestic Relations s 2735). Here, the Abu Dhabi support order did not represent a final determination of a fixed amount of money then found to be due, but rather, consisted of a directive to the defendant for the payment of specific sums to the plaintiff for support (see Mittenthal v. Mittenthal, 99 Misc.2d at 781). There was no proof in the record to establish the precise amount of accrued support arrears or that the accrued support arrears were vested and not subject to modification under the laws of the UAE (see Tannenberg v. Beldock, 68 A.D.2d at 313).

The Court noted that the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) applied nationally and internationally. The UCCJEA is mandatory and provides that "a child custody determination made in a foreign country under factual circumstances in substantial conformity with the jurisdictional standards of this article must be recognized and enforced," except where "the child custody law of a foreign country as written or as applied violates fundamental principles of human rights" (Domestic Relations Law §75-d [2] and [3]). This statute mandates that any foreign nation must be treated as if it were a state within the United States for purposes of jurisdiction and inter-court cooperative mechanisms. The UCCJEA is not a reciprocal act. There is no requirement that the foreign country enact a UCCJEA equivalent. The plaintiff was awarded custody of the children by the Abu Dhabi courts. The decision from the Court of First Instance noted that the mother usually has the right to custody of the children unless proven otherwise. The defendant made no showing to refute the custody award to the plaintiff. This award of custody to the plaintiff was affirmed following two appeals, including an appeal to the highest court in Abu Dhabi. The defendant thereafter petitioned the Abu Dhabi court to change custody from the plaintiff to the defendant based upon the fact that he had moved to the United States. Defendant's application was denied by the Court of First Instance and affirmed on appeal. Neither party alleged that any of the child custody laws of the UAE violated fundamental principles of human rights or that the Abu Dhabi courts were without jurisdiction to determine custody. Nor did the Court find any such violation or lack of jurisdiction. Therefore, based upon the principles of comity and pursuant to Domestic Relations Law s 75-d, the Court had to recognize and enforce the custody determination of the Abu Dhabi courts awarding plaintiff custody.

Plaintiff moved for counsel fees in the amount of $25,000.00 pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237. In reviewing all of the circumstances of the case, including the financial circumstances of the parties and the relative merits of the parties' positions, the equities favored an award of counsel fees to the plaintiff. Based upon the totality of the circumstances of the case, an award of counsel fees to the plaintiff was appropriate. However, "[w]here an action or proceeding is not one expressly included in DRL§ 237, no award of counsel fees may be made thereunder". "It is well settled that DRL §237 does not provide for an award of counsel fees in actions to enforce or rescind prenuptial agreements" (Schapiro v. Schapiro, 204 A.D.2d 87, 88 [1st Dept 1994]); Ravel v. Ravel, 235 A.D.2d 410 [2d Dept 1997]). Since an action to enforce a premarital or postmarital agreement is a contract action rather than a matrimonial action, the Court held that it may not award counsel fees to the plaintiff in connection with her seeking an order advancing the validity of the Mahr Agreement (See generally Lamborn v. Lamborn, 56 A.D.2d 623 [2d Dept 1977]). However, to the extent that any portion of plaintiff's counsel fees were incurred in connection with an attempt to obtain maintenance or distribution of property under the foreign judgement of divorce, she was entitled to an award under Domestic Relations Law §237(a)(5) which permits a counsel fee award in an action brought to obtain maintenance or distribution of property following a foreign judgment of divorce. The plaintiff may also be awarded counsel fees she incurred to defend against the defendant's attempts to obtain custody of the children. Domestic Relations Law § 237(b) gives the court discretion to award counsel fees in child custody proceedings when warranted under the circumstances of the case. Domestic Relations Law § 237(b) also authorizes an award of counsel fees to the plaintiff to the extent her order to show cause concerns the maintenance of the children. Since the Court could not determine what portion of plaintiff's counsel fees were incurred on the issues of custody, maintenance, distribution of property, or maintenance of the children, plaintiff's counsel was directed to submit a separate affidavit detailing the counsel fees and expenses incurred on these issues. The Court directed that the defendant would be given an opportunity to challenge the reasonableness of the fees. A party resisting a counsel fee application is entitled to an evidentiary hearing as to the extent and value of the attorney's services. The right to a hearing includes the right to cross-examine the attorney-applicant.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Child Support - Award - Imputed Income - Income Properly Imputed Based upon Support Received from Family - Proper to Take Judicial Notice of Net Worth Statement Filed with Court

In Baumgardner v. Baumgardner,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3968575 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married on March 22, 1997 and there were two children of the marriage. The action for a divorce was commenced on March 17, 2008. After an inquest on grounds for divorce, the plaintiff husband established the grounds for divorce and the parties executed stipulations as to, inter alia, custody, visitation, and partial equitable distribution, and referred to the court resolution of, child support and equitable distribution of the parties' respective retirement accounts. Supreme Court determined that each party would be awarded sole ownership of his or her respective retirement accounts, that the plaintiff would pay to the defendant child support for the parties' youngest son of $1,063.21 per month, and that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff child support for the parties' oldest son of $282.62 per month.

The Appellate Division observed that in determining a parent's child support obligation, a court need not rely upon the parent's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon money received from friends and relatives. Where the parent's account of his or her income is not credible, the court may impute an income higher than that claimed. Moreover, a court may impute income where the parent has received money, goods, or services from a relative or friend. Here, the record supported the Supreme Court's determination that the plaintiff's testimony lacked credibility and that an imputation of income higher than that claimed was warranted. The court properly determined that the plaintiff had access to, and received, financial support from his family. Considering these factors and all of the evidence presented, the court providently exercised its discretion in imputing income to the plaintiff of $75,000 per year. Based on the evidence presented, the record supports the court's imputation of income to the defendant of $20,000 annually.

The Court found no merit to the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court erred in taking judicial notice of the defendant's net worth statements which had been filed with the court pursuant to section 236 of the Domestic Relations Law and 22 NYCRR 202.16(b).

The Appellate Division reiterated the rule that there is no requirement that the distribution of each item of marital property be made on an equal basis. It held that

Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion by, in effect, awarding sole ownership of the defendant's retirement account to the defendant.

Editors Note: In Halse v Halse, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 850604 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out in a footnote that although defendant filed a statement of net worth with Supreme Court in 2008, it was not proper for the court to take judicial notice of the factual material contained therein (citing Matter of Grange v. Grange, 78 A.D.3d 1253, 1255 [2010]).

Child Support - Pendente Lite - Children's Unreimbursed Medical Expenses - must Be in the Same Proportion as Each Parent's Income Is to the Combined Parental Income

In Goldberg v. Goldberg, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3971662 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant appealed from an order which granted the plaintiff's motion for pendente lite relief. Most of the appeal was dismissed as the appeal from those portions of that order was rendered academic in light of a subsequent order of the Supreme Court . The Appellate Division found that the parties married in 2000 and had three children. The plaintiff was a high school guidance counselor and earned a yearly income of approximately $103,000. At the time this action was commenced, the defendant was an investment banker with a yearly income of approximately $500,000, of which approximately $220,000 was a fixed income and the remainder was a bonus. The plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce on or about October 13, 2010, and subsequently moved for pendente lite relief, including payment of temporary maintenance, child care expenses, past due and future unreimbursed medical expenses of the plaintiff and the children, carrying charges for the marital residence, expenses related to a Honda Odyssey automobile and a Mercedes Benz automobile, and interim counsel fees.

The Appellate Division found that the the plaintiff was the less monied spouse, and the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in directing him to pay interim counsel fees to the plaintiff's counsel in the sum of $30,000. However, the Supreme Court erred in directing the defendant to pay 100% of the past due and future unreimbursed medical expenses of the children. The obligation for children's unreimbursed medical expenses is to be prorated in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][5][v]). It modified amended order by deleting the provision thereof directing the defendant to pay 100% of the past due and future unreimbursed medical expenses of the children, and remitted the matter for a calculation of the parties' respective pro rata obligations with regard to these expenses.

Child Custody - Modification - Attempt to Thwart the Child's Relationship with Other Parent Warrants Transfer of Custody to Father

In O'Loughlin v. Sweetland, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3978838 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a child custody proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 6, the mother appeals an order of the Family Court dated December 31, 2010, which, after a hearing, granted the father's petition to modify an order of the dated February 23, 2009, so as to award him sole legal and residential custody of the parties' child, and an order of the same court dated March 18, 2011, which denied her motion pursuant to CPLR 4404(b) to set aside the order dated December 31, 2010.

The Appellate Division affirmed both orders. It found that Family Court properly denied the mother's motion to preclude the introduction into evidence of the report and testimony of a forensic evaluator, or, alternatively, for a negative inference to be drawn concerning the evaluator's credibility, based upon the evaluator's destruction of certain audiotapes of interviews she conducted in the course of her evaluation. The record did not support the mother's contention that the missing audiotapes denied her the ability to effectively cross-examine the forensic evaluator.

The parties had entered into a stipulation, pursuant to which they had joint custody of their daughter, with the mother having residential custody in California, and the father having visitation in New York for extended periods of time during school breaks and the summer, and the right to exercise weekend visitation in California two weekends each month. The relationship between the parties was strained when they entered into the stipulation, and subsequently deteriorated to the point that they could not communicate and cooperate with one another concerning the child; therefore, joint custody was no longer feasible. That factor, together with the Family Court's finding that the mother's animosity towards the father and her attempts to undermine the child's relationship with him were harmful to the child, constituted a sufficient change in circumstances to warrant a determination of whether a change in custody would be in the child's best interest. The court found there was a sound and substantial basis for the Family Court's determination that it was in the child's best interest to transfer sole custody to the father in New York, based upon the findings that the mother was attempting to thwart the child's relationship with her father, and that the father would be more likely than the mother to foster a meaningful relationship between the child and the noncustodial parent.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Credit for Payment of Pre-Marital Debt - Lump Sum Distributive Award - Lump Sum" Distributive Award Improper in View of Nonliquid Nature of Defendant's Assets, Which He Would Otherwise Have to Sell to Satisfy the Plaintiff's Distributive Award

In Iarocci v. Iarocci, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4094837 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant appealed, from portions of a judgment of the Supreme Court, which inter alia, awarded the plaintiff $4,050 in monthly child support, directed the defendant to pay his pro rata share of the children's nanny and private school tuition expenses and his pro rata share of the children's extracurricular activities expenses up to $3,000 per year, determined that the appreciation in value of the plaintiff's separate property located in White Plains was not subject to equitable distribution, and awarded the plaintiff a money judgment for her "lump sum" distributive award of $591,832.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court incorrectly awarded the plaintiff a credit of $24,175, representing reimbursement of capital gains taxes paid by her as a result of the defendant's sale of property in Lake George. The tax liability was incurred during the parties' marriage from the sale of marital property and, therefore, constituted the parties' marital debt. The plaintiff's distributive award was therefore reduced by $24,175. It also held that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff a money judgment for her "lump sum" distributive award. In view of the nonliquid nature of the defendant's assets, which he would otherwise have to sell to satisfy the plaintiff's distributive award, the Supreme Court should have permitted him to pay the award in installments, together with interest at the statutory rate of 9% per annum, and it modified the judgment accordingly. It added a provision that, in the event the defendant should sell any of his real property during the payment period, the proceeds thereof should be applied to paying off any remaining balance of the plaintiff's distributive award.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion by giving the plaintiff a full $12,000 credit for repaying, during the marriage, the defendant's premarital separate debt owed by him to his sister (citing Nidositko v. Nidositko, 92 A.D.3d 653, 938 N.Y.S.2d 569; Micha v. Micha, 213 A.D.2d 956, 624 N.Y.S.2d 465).

The Appellate Division also found that under the circumstances of this case, where the parties' children had been attending private school during the parties' marriage, despite the defendant's purported objection to them doing so, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in directing the defendant to pay his pro rata share of the children's private school tuition. It rejected his argument that he should not have been directed to pay a pro rata share of the children's nanny expenses. The plaintiff, who was the custodial parent, worked full time, and had been incurring these child care expenses both during the marriage and after commencement of the action. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court's direction to the defendant that he pay his pro rata share of the children's nanny expenses would not be disturbed (DRL § 240[1-b][c][4])

Child Support - Award - Imputed Income - Income Properly Imputed Where Account of Finances Is Not Credible or Is Suspect

In Matter of Huddleston v. Rufrano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4094865 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) as a result of the parties' August 2000 divorce, the father, who was a plumber by trade, was directed to pay $250 per week as support for the child. In September 2004, because of a work-related injury resulting in the father's receipt of Workers' Compensation benefits, his obligation was modified downward to $108 per week. In April 2008, in accordance with a cost-of-living adjustment, the father's obligation was increased to $121 per week. In August 2011, the mother petitioned for an upward modification of the father's support obligation. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate determined that the father's annual income, stemming from self-employment with A & J Drain, Inc. was $47,382.52, consisting of both monetary compensation and benefits, and, inter alia, directed the father to pay child support of $155 per week. The mother filed objections, which the Family Court denied.

The Appellate Division observed that a court need not rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated future potential earnings. The court may impute income to a party based on his or her employment history, future earning capacity, educational background, or money received from friends and relatives" The court may also properly impute income where a party's account of his or her finances is not credible or is suspect. It found that the Support Magistrate should have imputed an additional $31,448.30 to the income earned by the father. The Support Magistrate failed to include a $10,611 payment made to the father by A & J for services rendered as its vice president in the year 2010. The evidence at the hearing supported the conclusion that this was not a one-time payment, but would be a recurring one, particularly since the father's business was growing. Since the incorporation of A & J, the father increased his hours, charged a higher hourly rate, and added sheet-rocking as a component of his business. In addition, the Support Magistrate should have imputed $8,736 to the father as income, based on the earnings generated for A & J by the father's father-in-law through sheet-rocking. The father's testimony that he received as salary only 30% of the amount he billed on behalf of A & J was not credible. The father did not know the balance on A & J's corporate checking account, and he provided only vague testimony about A & J's business expenses. A & J operated out of the father's home, and its only employees were the father, his wife, and his father-in-law. The father's credibility was impaired by his testimony that he was "volunteering" his time for A & J for more than one year after it came into existence while at the same time receiving unemployment benefits from the State of Nevada.. Considering the father's lack of credibility and the amount of his past earnings, the Support Magistrate should have concluded that the father earned an additional $12,101.30 in income from the business he generated on behalf of A & J. Accordingly, the record demonstrated that the father's income was $78,830.82 and, thus, he was obligated to make child support payments of $259 per week.

Child Abuse or Neglect - Summary Judgment - Motion Made During Trial Is Untimely and Procedurally Improper Irrespective of Merit Where Respondent Not Given Opportunity to Present Case at Fact-finding Hearing

In Matter of Giovanni S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4094870 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the fact-finding hearing in this child protective proceeding was held on two dates, October 28, 2009, and June 3, 2010. The petitioner, the Administration for Children's Services, adduced the testimony of a police detective involved in an undercover "buy and bust" operation, who arrested the mother after receiving a radio transmission from undercover officers describing two suspects involved in the sale of narcotics. Upon arresting the mother, the detective recovered 10 glassine envelopes of heroin from a diaper bag placed on the bottom part of the baby carriage; the seven-month-old infant was in the top part of the carriage. In addition, the ACS established with a certificate of disposition that the mother was subsequently convicted, upon her plea of guilty, of attempted criminal possession of a controlled substance in the fifth degree with intent to sell. The court took judicial notice of prior Family Court dispositions against the mother with respect to other children.

At the commencement of the proceedings on June 3, 2010, the attorney for the mother indicated that the mother anticipated testifying at the hearing. However, after the ACS rested its case, the mother's attorney noted that there was insufficient time remaining in the day for the mother to present testimony and requested leave to file a written motion to dismiss on the ground that the ACS had failed to present a prima facie case. In granting that request, the Family Court Judge noted that, due to his retirement, his last day on the bench would be June 30, 2010, and therefore, a mistrial would be ordered in the event that the mother's motion to dismiss was denied.

In her motion the mother contended that ACS did not establish a prima facie case of neglect. The ACS opposed the motion and cross-moved for summary judgment on the petition, contending that the evidence adduced at the hearing eliminated all triable issues and established as a matter of law that the mother neglected the child. The mother opposed the cross motion on the merits without interposing any objection to the procedure employed by the ACS in filing a summary judgment motion mid-hearing, nor did she indicate that she wished to testify or that the fact-finding hearing must be continued. The Family Court denied the mother's motion and granted the cross motion, finding that the mother neglected the subject child. The Appellate Division modified.

It found that Family Court properly denied the mother's motion to dismiss the petition. However, the Court improperly granted the ACS's cross motion for summary judgment on the petition under the facts and circumstances of this case. In an appropriate case, the Family Court may enter a finding of neglect on a summary judgment motion in lieu of holding a fact-finding hearing upon the petitioner's prima facie showing of neglect as a matter of law and the respondent's failure to raise a triable issue of fact in opposition to the motion (see Matter of Suffolk County Dept. of Social Servs. v. James M., 83 N.Y.2d 178, 182-183). Here, however, the ACS submitted an untimely cross motion for summary judgment in the midst of the fact-finding hearing after presenting its case and prior to the mother presenting a case or resting her case. Moreover, even if the ACS's motion is deemed analogous to a motion for judgment during trial, such a motion should have been denied as premature, since such motions must be made "after the close of the evidence presented by an opposing party with respect to [the subject] cause of action or issue" (CPLR 4401). Although, in opposition to the cross motion, the mother did not actively seek continuation of the fact-finding hearing or object on the ground that the cross motion was procedurally improper or untimely, it did not deem these contentions waived in light of the Family Court Judge's imminent retirement and statements implying that it was impossible for the mother to present a case. It held that Family Court should have denied the ACS's motion outright as untimely and procedurally improper irrespective of its merit, since the mother had not been given the opportunity to present a case at the fact-finding hearing. It remitted the matter to the Family Court for a continued fact-finding hearing and a new determination.

Supreme Court

Maintenance - Modification - DRL § 236(B)(9)(b) -Surviving Agreement - Downward - Extreme Hardship - Child Support - Modification - Surviving Agreement - Boden - Brescia Rule - Where Stipulation did not contain any standard to apply to Modification once threshold Permitting application for a reduction has been met Supreme Court in effect ignores the Agreement Provision.

In Mark P v Teresa P, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3984468 (N.Y.Sup.) Plaintiff Mark P. moved by Order to Show Cause for a downward modification of his maintenance and child support required to be paid to the Defendant Teresa P. ("Defendant"). The parties were married in April 1987. They entered into the Stipulation of Settlement on October 7, 2004 which was incorporated but not merged into the divorce judgment entered on November 17, 2004. The Stipulation required the Plaintiff to pay spousal maintenance to Defendant in the annual amount of $250,000.00 until 2017, and annual child support of $140,000.00; the amount of child support is to decrease as the parties' children become emancipated (collectively the "Support Payments"). Paragraph XIX (2) of the Stipulation provided as follows: "2. Anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding, in the event of an involuntary, substantial, adverse change in the Husband's income, including income produced by his assets (such as involuntary loss of employment), he shall have the right to make application to a court of competent jurisdiction, which must include a sworn statement of net worth, for an appropriate modification of child-related support and/or spousal maintenance obligations hereunder, and if granted, the parties' Agreement shall be deemed amended to the extent of any relief afforded on such application. In the event that the Husband is granted a downward modification and the Husband's income thereafter improve, the Wife shall have the right to make application to a court of competent jurisdiction for an upward modification of child support and/or maintenance, however, in no event shall the Husband be required to pay more than the amounts set forth in this Agreement.”

At the time the Stipulation was signed in 2004, Plaintiff was a securities trader with annual income of $3.3 million dollars. At the time of this motion, Plaintiff was and remains employed as a securities trader; however, according to Plaintiff, his compensation decreased to $651,000.00 in 2011, including capital gains, and Plaintiff stated that he anticipated earning no more than $251,000.00 in 2012. Plaintiff maintained that the decline in his annual compensation was due to changes in the securities industry, the economy and a general decline in securities' sales volume, not to any lack of effort on his part. Plaintiff contended that under Paragraph 2, as long as he showed that he has suffered "an involuntary, substantial, adverse change in ... income", he may not only apply for, but was entitled to, a reduction in Support Payments, which would then be recalculated based upon his current income. Plaintiff argued that to read Paragraph 2 as limited to affording Plaintiff no more than an opportunity to apply for Support Payment relief would impermissibly render Paragraph 2 a nullity, since under the Domestic Relations Law and case authority, any party has the right to, at the very least, petition a court for support payment modification, be it in the nature of an increase or a decrease. Defendant contended that Paragraph 2 should be limited to what its terms expressly provided: a standard to determine when Plaintiff may apply for, but not necessarily obtain, a Support Payment reduction. Since Paragraph 2 is silent as to how the judicial determination of whether the payments should be reduced, and if so by how much, that standard may only be supplied by well recognized and prevailing law: in the case of child support, the amounts set forth in a Stipulation must be paid unless such provision was unreasonable or inequitable when entered into-a situation which is not at issue herein-or if an unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances has occurred. Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 397 N.Y.S.2d 701, 366 N.E.2d 791 (1977), Merl v. Merl, 67 N.Y.2d 359, 502 N.Y.S.2d 712, 493 N.E.2d 936 (1986). In the case of maintenance, in order to alter such payment terms, there must be a showing that extreme hardship would result should the originally agreed upon amounts remain in effect. See DRL 236, Part B(9)(b); Alice C.V. Bernard C., 193 A.D.2d 97, 602 N.Y.S.2d 623 (2d Dept.1993).

The Court concluded that Defendant had the better argument, and that Plaintiff's motion should be denied. The Stipulation did not contain any standard to apply once the stated threshold sanctioning the application for a reduction has been met. This gap should only be filled by the standard generally invoked by the courts in assessing whether to deviate from the support payment regimen established by the parties' agreement. See Heller v. Heller, 43 A.D.3d 999, 842 N.Y.S.2d 512 (2d Dept.2007) (" unless such an alternative standard is clearly spelled out in the agreement, the Court will make that determination itself, using well established principles of whether a reduction in amount is warranted.)

Applying the general legal standards to determine whether a downward modification of Support Payments was warranted herein, it was clear that Plaintiff had not adduced sufficient facts to require a hearing with respect to either child support or maintenance payment reduction. Plaintiff's effort to reduce his child support obligations as set forth in the Stipulation proved equally unavailing. While Plaintiff does allege that his income has decreased significantly, he offered no evidentiary facts that would lead this court to conclude that he has actively and diligently sought more remunerative employment. Moreover, the fact that Plaintiff had over $5.5 million in liquid assets also weighs against a reduction in child support. The law is clear that a parent's assets and financial resources, in addition to his or her income, should be taken into account in determining child support obligations, and whether such obligations should be modified. Plaintiff's current, albeit reduced, income in addition to his $5.5 million in liquid assets proved more than sufficient to meet his child support obligations at the levels specified in the Stipulation.

Defendant's income was substantially lower than Plaintiff's income. However the Stipulation specifically gave Plaintiff the right to apply for downward modification of his support obligations. Plaintiff's income did substantially decrease, and although he failed to maintain that he had made efforts to augment this reduced income, the decrease appeared to be involuntary. Accordingly, notwithstanding the income disparity between the parties, the court held that it would be unfair to award counsel fees under these circumstances, when the Stipulation specifically provides for such a modification application.

Child Custody - Visitation - Modification - Hearsay - Evidence of Child's Out of Court Statements Admissible Where Corroborated By In Court Testimony of Child.

In LDM v. RA, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 4054423 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were the parents of a nine-year-old boy, D. The petitioner-mother sought seeking to modify a prior weekend visitation order to require that all contact between D. and his father take place at a social work agency in the presence of a supervisor. She claimed in a modification petition filed May 1, 2012 that the respondent-father had been driving in a fast and reckless manner with D. in the car and further endangered the boy by shoplifting with him at Macy's department store. The respondent-father denied the allegations.

The attorneys for the mother and child sought to have the Court admit into evidence the child's out-of-court statements regarding the father's alleged behavior. They sought to corroborate those statements with the child's in camera testimony. At a hearing at which the mother attempted to prove her allegations, she was asked during direct examination to testify as to what D. told her about these incidents. The father's counsel objected, arguing D.'s statements constituted inadmissible hearsay. Counsel for both the mother and the child argued they were admissible pursuant to case law allowing the admission of statements by children that relate to abuse or neglect.

The Court observed that Courts around the state have determined, usually without articulating any rationale, that a child's out-of-court statements about abuse or neglect are admissible in custody and visitation proceedings just as they are in formal neglect cases. See Mildred S.G. v. Mark G., 62 A.D.3d 460, 462, 879 N.Y.S.2d 402 (1st Dept.2009); Albert G. v. Denise B., 181 A.D.2d 732, 580 N.Y.S.2d 478 (2d Dept 1992); Kimberly CC v. Gerry CC, 86 A.D.3d 728, 730, 927 N.Y.S.2d 191 (3d Dept 2011); Sutton v. Sutton, 74 A.D.3d 1838, 902 N.Y.S.2d 746 (2010); see also, Mateo v. Tuttle, 26 A.D.3d 731, 809 N.Y.S.2d 699 (4th Dept.2006).

The statements counsel for the mother and the child sought to introduce through the mother revolved around two incidents; one, where the father allegedly shoplifted from a department store while with D., resulting in their arrest and the other, where the father drove at such an excessive rate of speed he caused D. to become ill and vomit. With regard to the shoplifting allegations, in Bernton v. Mattioli, 34 A.D.3d 1165, 1166, 825 N.Y.S.2d 566 (3rd Dept.2006), the court upheld the admission of a child's out-of-court statements regarding his mother's use of him as a decoy while she shoplifted as "they would support a finding of neglect." Another court determined a father was neglectful where he drove a car with his daughter after drinking alcohol and failed to place her in a child seat or restraint and allowed his son to ride in a car with a friend he knew or should have known was intoxicated. In re: Bianca P., 94 A.D.3d 1126, 1127, 943 N.Y.S.2d 200 (2nd Dept.2012). The mother sought to introduce D.'s statements to her involving his father's shoplifting in his presence and his father's reckless driving while D. was in the car. Both these statements, under the principles stated in the Bernton and Bianca cases, go to possible abuse or neglect and were, therefore.

A child's out-of-court statements regarding possible abuse or neglect require corroboration. F.C. A. 1046(a)(iv), In re: Mildred S.G., 62 A.D.3d at 462, 879 N.Y.S.2d 402. The Court held that if the parties wish to rely upon the child's own statements to corroborate his prior out-of-court statements, an in camera proceeding is insufficient. Given a child's best interests are paramount in custody matters, the Court in Lincoln determined that "in many cases" it would be necessary to conduct in camera interviews to protect those interests. 24 N.Y.2d at 272, 299 N.Y.S.2d 842, 247 N.E.2d 659. In instances where the family court receives material information adverse to one of the parents during the in camera, it is incumbent to "in some way" ascertain "its accuracy during the course of the open hearing." That was the situation here. Cross-examination is considered to be one of the most reliable and time-tested methods of getting to the truth. The child was at nine-years-old, legally capable of being sworn. See, e.g., C.P.L. 60.20(2). No testimony had been put forth by any expert indicating he was particularly vulnerable or emotionally fragile. The Court held that if the parties choose to corroborate D.'s out-of-court statements by his own testimony about what happened, the child must testify in court, but his parents, who were both represented by counsel, would be excluded. (citing In re: Randy A., 248 A.D.2d 838, 839-40, 670 N.Y.S.2d 225 (3rd Dept.1998).

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Pre-Marital Debt - Reimbursement Not Permitted for Debt Incurred to Pay for the Parties' Wedding and Honeymoon

In Snacki v. Pederson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 8941733 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married in April 2009 and separated six months later. The wife sought, through equitable distribution, reimbursement for debt she incurred to pay for the parties' wedding and honeymoon. The husband contended that the debt was "separate property" belonging to the wife alone because she incurred it prior to their marriage.

The husband has moved for a declaration that the pre-marriage expenses are separate property, not subject to equitable distribution. The wife alleged that $12,294.84 (in Canadian dollars) in wedding, vacation, and honeymoon expenses were marital debts. The expenses included a wedding ring, vacation flights to Myrtle Beach, South Carolina, expenses in South Carolina, the honeymoon to Mexico, and other expenses. It is undisputed that the wife incurred these expenses, but it was unclear to the Court, based on the documents before it, what exact expenses the wife seeks to have equitably distributed under New York law. There was no evidence that the husband, prior to the marriage, entered into an agreement to share the wedding/honeymoon expenses. New York has recognized claims for breach of contract-even oral contracts-for wedding anticipation expenses. The only basis for the wife's claims for repayment of these expenses was through her right to equitable distribution under the Domestic Relations Law. The Court granted the husband's motion. It observed that only property acquired during the marriage is classified as "marital." DRL s 236 Part B, 1(c), (d)(1). Debt is subject to the same rules: only debt acquired during the marriage is marital property. Eigenbrodt v. Eigenbrodt, 217 A.D.2d 752, 754, 629 N.Y.S.2d 328 (3d Dep't.1995).] Conceding that her debt was incurred prior to her marriage, the wife nonetheless argued that it should be considered marital because it was incurred in expectation and in furtherance of the marriage. The Court rejected this argument finding that the authorities cited by the wife, Jonas v. Jonas, 241 A.D.2d 839, 660 N.Y.S.2d 487 (3d Dep't.1997); Feldman v. Feldman, 291 A.D.2d 876 (4th Dep't 2002), simply stood for the proposition that when determining whether a debt incurred during marriage is marital or separate, the nature of the debt itself is the primary factor to be considered. But, unlike the litigants in Jonas and Feldman, the wife incurred this disputed debt before the marriage, not during it. The debts incurred in this case were not marital property because they were incurred outside the marriage. The Court declined to use any legal theory to convert them into marital debts and sweep them into equitable distribution.

Agreements - Prenuptial - Validity - Agreement Held Invalid Where Agreement Not Read, Wife Has No Attorney, Agreement Did Not Contain What Was Promised, and Agreement Not Seen Prior to Signing it

In A.N. v. E.N., 2012 WL 4335245 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51839(U) a hearing was held to determine whether the parties' prenuptial agreement was valid and enforceable. The Court found, after trial, that sometime in late 1994, the parties met and soon thereafter began dating each other. Plaintiff was 27 years old and working for Marrs Sales, a lighting company, as a sales representative. Defendant was 30 years old and employed by the New York City Police Department and had been so employed since 1993. The parties continued to date and in December 1996, they became engaged. Thereafter, in November 1997, Defendant bought a house in Garnerville, New York. Due to his own misgivings, and as the relationship intensified, Defendant made clear that if the parties were going to get married, Defendant wanted Plaintiff to sign a prenuptial agreement. However, since Defendant was not all too keen on the idea of getting married, Defendant researched another option through the NYPD which would provide insurance benefits for Plaintiff, i.e., a Domestic Partnership Agreement, as an alternative to marriage. Since Plaintiff was "old fashioned" and intent on getting married, she told Defendant she had no problem with signing a prenuptial agreement. The parties had a few discussions over the course of their courtship regarding such an agreement and pursuant to those discussions, Plaintiff understood that she would be giving up her right to Defendant's two bank accounts (i.e., an individual bank account and a jointly-held bank account Defendant had with his mother). During one of the conversations about the prenuptial agreement, Plaintiff told Defendant that he could probably find an attorney to prepare the prenuptial agreement on 149th Street in the Bronx. Plaintiff did not specify the name of any one particular attorney for Defendant to contact. In or about January or February 1998, Defendant contacted the law firm of Marvin Goldberg, a firm located on 149th Street in the Bronx to prepare a prenuptial agreement. Defendant met with the attorney one time and provided him with some of his financial records. In early June 1998, after Defendant made many telephone calls to the attorney's office to check on the status of the agreement, Defendant was finally advised that the prenuptial agreement was ready to be signed. Although Defendant may have seen a draft of the agreement prior to signing it, there is no dispute that Plaintiff never saw a copy of the agreement prior to signing it.

With their wedding date set for June 20, 1998, on June 6, 1998, Defendant contacted Plaintiff at work and told her that the prenuptial agreement was ready to be signed. Defendant arranged to pick Plaintiff up at work so that they could drive to the attorney's office in the Bronx to sign the agreement. At approximately 3:15 p.m., Defendant picked Plaintiff up and they drove to the attorney's office in the Bronx. On their way into the office, Defendant asked Plaintiff, "Are you sure about this?" and thinking he was asking her about getting married, Plaintiff answered in the affirmative. Defendant then clarified that he was talking about signing prenuptial agreement. Plaintiff indicated she was fine with it after Defendant reiterated to her that he would not marry her if she did not sign it.

Once in the attorney's office and after the attorney introduced himself to the parties and handed a copy of the prenuptial agreement to each of them, the parties' signed the prenuptial agreement. According to Plaintiff, they were in the attorney's office for a total of "maybe 15 minutes." In addition, Plaintiff testified that at no time did the attorney discuss the specific contents of the agreement with them nor did the attorney discuss with her that she should have an attorney review it. Plaintiff did not read the agreement before signing it. After the parties' signed the prenuptial agreement, they were each given a copy of the agreement in a manilla envelope. However, after that date, Plaintiff never saw her copy of the agreement until she requested it from Defendant in 2010.

Supreme Court observed that a threat to cancel a wedding does not arise to duress. See, Cohen v. Cohen, 93 AD3d 506 (1st Dept.2012); Ramunno v. Ramunno, 91 AD3d 1355 (4th Dept.2012); Weinstein v. Weinstein, 36 AD3d 797 (2d Dept.2007). Numerous factors weighed heavily in favor of setting aside the prenuptial agreement. The evidence established that elements of overreaching, unconscionability and duress all surrounded the execution of the subject prenuptial agreement. Plaintiff had no input in negotiating the terms of the agreement or in its preparation. The agreement itself was prepared by an attorney that Defendant hired and paid for based on one, maybe two conversations between them. Nor was Plaintiff represented by counsel at any time during the drafting of the agreement or at the time of its execution. The result was a prenuptial agreement that left Plaintiff with absolutely nothing. There was no bargained-for benefit. The prenuptial agreement was completely one-sided in favor of Defendant, the party who was the prime beneficiary of the assistance of the attorney. Moreover, the terms of the agreement Plaintiff actually signed were very different from the terms of the agreement she thought she was signing. Based on several conversations she had with Defendant, Plaintiff thought that the purpose of the prenuptial agreement was to protect Defendant's individual and joint bank accounts. There was never any discussion between the two of them about Plaintiff waiving her rights to maintenance, insurance benefits, his pension, or his estate should he predecease her. Plaintiff did not see a copy of the agreement prior to signing it, nor did Defendant's attorney explain the contents of it to her prior to her signing it. Defendant testified that he did not entirely understand the provisions of the agreement at the time he signed it or even to this day. Defendant's testimony in this regard was significant for two reasons. First, Defendant's actions contradicted the terms of the agreement. Pursuant to the agreement, Plaintiff waived her right to Defendant's insurance benefits. Yet, prior to even retaining the attorney to draft the agreement, Defendant researched ways he could provide benefits to Plaintiff without them having to get married. Clearly, Defendant wanted to provide for her. In addition, pursuant to the agreement, the parties each waived their survivorship rights and waived any rights to each other's estate. Yet, in 2001, the Plaintiff and Defendant had "mirror" wills drawn up and signed, which was contradictory to the terms of the agreement. Again, it established that Defendant was unaware of, or did not fully understand the terms of the prenuptial agreement. Second, several of the terms of the prenuptial agreement made reference to specific statutes in the Domestic Relations Law and General Obligations Law. Based on the testimony of both parties, it was clear that such statutory references were never explained to either party and that neither party understood their import.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Domestic Relations Law § 243 - Sequestration - Receiver Has No Personal Liability for Actions Performed Within His Official Capacity and Within His Authority

In Maltz Auctions, Inc., v Tannenbaum, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3711186 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) after the defendant was divorced, the Supreme Court issued a judgment appointing him as receiver of the marital residence. It directed him to execute any and all documents necessary for conveying and transferring his former wife's title interest. The Supreme Court issued such directive so that the defendant would become the sole and exclusive owner of the property for the purpose of selling it in order to satisfy a money judgment for his share of the equity in the property. Thereafter, the defendant entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff Maltz Auctions, Inc. for the purposes of determining the market value of the property, as well as advertising and marketing the property for its eventual auction by Maltz. Their agreement included a liquidated damages clause which recited, in pertinent part, that in the event the property was withdrawn from auction by the defendant prior to auction, the defendant was obligated pay to Maltz an amount equal to 8% of the reserve price, with the reserve price set at $350,000. Nearly one month after the parties entered into this agreement, and only two days prior to the scheduled auction date, the defendant directed Maltz to withdraw the property from auction. On that same day, the defendant entered into a stipulation of settlement with his former wife conveying the property to her for a sum certain. When Maltz demanded payment under the liquidated damages provision, the defendant refused, arguing that inasmuch as he entered into the agreement with Maltz in his capacity as court-appointed receiver, he was not personally liable.

Maltz commenced an action to recover damages for breach of contract. Supreme Court, inter alia, granted Maltz's motion for summary judgment on the complaint. The Appellate Division modified and denied the motion. It observed that generally, a receiver has no personal liability for actions performed within his or her official capacity and within the scope of his or her authority pursuant to the receivership order. Here, the receivership order directed the defendant to execute documents in order to become the exclusive owner of the property for the purpose of selling it, which he did. Contrary to the Supreme Court's determination, Maltz failed to demonstrate, prima facie, that the defendant entered into the agreement in his individual capacity. Based on Maltz's own submissions, triable issues of fact existed as to whether the defendant entered into the subject agreement in his individual capacity or in his capacity as receiver and, consequently, whether he was subject to personal liability under the contract. Specifically, for example, Maltz submitted proof in support of its motion which demonstrated that it listed the auction on certain on-line auction web sites, including its own, as a "receiver ordered auction" subsequent to a divorce.

Child Support - Modification - Substantial Change in Circumstances - Party Seeking a Downward Modification based upon a Loss of Employment must Demonstrate He Diligently Sought to Obtain Employment Commensurate with Earning Capacity

In Matter of Suyunov v. Tarashchansky, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 3711201 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the record supported the Support Magistrate's findings that the father was entitled to a downward modification of his child support obligation based upon his loss of employment. A party seeking modification of a support order has the burden of establishing the existence of a substantial change in circumstances warranting the modification. Loss of employment may constitute a substantial change in circumstances. A party seeking a downward modification of his or her child support obligation based upon a loss of employment has the burden of demonstrating that he or she diligently sought to obtain employment commensurate with his or her earning capacity. The father demonstrated that his loss of employment constituted a substantial change in circumstances and that he made a good faith effort to obtain new employment commensurate with his qualifications and experience..

Child Support - Modification - Surviving Agreement - Boden - Brescia Rule - Must Demonstrate Unanticipated and Unreasonable Change in Circumstances, or Needs Were Not Being Met

In Schneider v. Schneider,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3711298 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties stipulation of settlement dated November 28, 2005, provided that the defendant would have primary residential custody of their two children. The parties also agreed that the plaintiff would pay the defendant $2,000 per month in child support until the emancipation of a child, whereupon the plaintiff's monthly child support obligation would be reduced by 32 percent. They also agreed that they would each pay one half of certain expenses for the children. Approximately 4 ½ years after the parties' marriage was dissolved, the parties' younger son moved out of the defendant's residence and moved into the plaintiff's residence. Subsequently, the plaintiff moved in effect, to modify the child support provisions of the stipulation to require the defendant to pay him child support for that son in accordance with the Child Support Standards Act. The defendant, who alleged that the plaintiff failed to pay his share of certain expenses of the children, cross-moved, among other things, to direct the entry of a money judgment in her favor in the sum of $6,660.45, representing child support arrears.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly determined that the plaintiff failed to demonstrate that the stipulation should be modified to adjust the parties' respective child support obligations so as to require the defendant to pay the plaintiff child support for the younger son. The plaintiff did not claim that the younger son's change of residence was "an unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances," and failed to show that the younger son's needs were not being met (citing Matter of Brescia v. Fitts, 56 N.Y.2d 132, 138; see Matter of Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 212-213; Bruney v. Hollingsworth, 83 AD3d 755, 756).

Supreme Court

Child Custody - Modification - Relocation - Request Denied Where Preference of Older Children given Significant Weight by Court

In Byron v. Davis,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3846534 (N.Y.Sup.) the Supreme Court denied the mothers request to relocate with her two talented sons to Washington D.C. over the objections of their father. The Supreme Court observed that in assessing a parent's request to relocate, the relevant factors include each parent's reasons for seeking or opposing the move, the quality of the relationships between the child and the custodial and noncustodial parents, the impact of the move on the quantity and quality of the child's future contact with the noncustodial parent, the degree to which the custodial parent's and child's life may be enhanced economically, emotionally and educationally by the move, and the feasibility of preserving the relationship between the noncustodial parent and child through suitable visitation arrangements. Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d 727, 741, 642 N.Y.S.2d 575, 665 N.E.2d 145 (1996)

The attorney for the 14 and 11 year-old sons intoned that they favored remaining in Rochester, a factor for the court to consider, but as precedent clearly indicates, a non-decisive one. Both parents served in the ministry in Rochester-the father as the pastor of small church and the mother as the dean of Black Church Studies at Colgate Rochester Crozer Divinity School. It was undisputed that the mother and father were fine parents and that the sons were thriving in Monroe County. Both excelled in academic performance. Both were heavily involved in activities from lego robotics, to Boy Scouts, music, religious instruction and other activities. Neither parent could cite a single example in which the two sons had not achieved substantial success in their home community. The mother, in seeking to relocate the children, had obtained a substantial career advancement. She landed a position as an associate dean at a university-affiliated divinity school in Washington, D.C. The position paid nearly double what he had made in Rochester. In addition, she had already secured enrollment for the children at top-notch schools in Washington, which, she argued, would afforded her children of not just comparable, but "better opportunities" academically. While she admitted that her children would need to find new friends, she argued, without objection, that her sons were social and affable and would easily find new friends. She also argued that the cultural opportunities for her sons in Washington D.C., would be enhanced. She testified that the larger African-American community in the District of Columbia would provide better role models and advantages for her sons. In addition, because of her work in a university-affiliated divinity school, the mother indicated that the children would have the advantage of tuition free college educations after their mother completed her first year at the university.

The father argued that his sons were thriving in Rochester, excelling in school, active in scouts, engaged with friends, playing music and otherwise appeared to be secure in their current environment. He described his relationship with his children as "close." The mother was the primary caretaker for the children. She testified, without contradiction, that she performed the daily living tasks. The Court examined the relevant factors. In the court's judgment, the relocation to Washington D.C. would impact the quantity of the visitation as well as the casual, easy-going quality described by the father as he interacted with his sons. If the father were required to visit his sons in Washington, there was no evidence of how he would achieve reasonable visitation while staying in a hotel, for example. Based on these factors, the quantity and quality of the father's visitation would be substantially impacted by the relocation. It also considered the economic, emotional, educational enhancement from the relocation and found that the moved did not not envision a substantial enhancement. While Washington offers some unique opportunities of a larger city and the nation's capital and perhaps greater cultural opportunities available in a large African-American community, it appeared these children had the skills to seize opportunities in their current environment and hence, there would be no significant "enhancement" occurring as a result of their relocation. The proof did not provide a sufficient basis to differentiate the educational opportunities possible in Washington with those already realized in Rochester. The son's already had an "enhanced" educational experience and the court did not find sufficient proof to adjudge that the Washington experience would be substantially better for these already fine students. The court could not conclude that the mother established that the emotional health of the sons would be favorably impacted by relocating to Washington or harmed by staying in Rochester. There was no persuasive evidence that the sons's religious education would be substantially enhanced by a move to Washington. In considering the feasibility of preserving the relationship between father and sons there was also no evidence before this court that "suitable visitation" arrangements could preserve the relationship between father and sons if they moved. The court noted that the wishes of the two sons were and their wishes had some role in the court's decision. The sons were middle school aged and described by their parents as highly intelligent and well rounded. There was no evidence of any impairment of their judgment. The sons remained firm in their desire to stay in Rochester since their mother announced the potential move. The sons knew the living options in their father's apartment and they were familiar with his preacher's lifestyle and, although their father's lifestyle was based on a much smaller income than his mother's future income, the sons's preference remained firm. The constancy of their preference and the sound basis for it required that the court ascribe some significant weight to their choice.

Family Court

Termination of Parental Rights - Surrender Agreements - Post Termination Visitation - Despite Breach of Forfeiture Clause Court Refused to Vacate Visitation Provision Because of Timely Attempt to Cure and Lack of Proof Visit Was Not in Child's Best Interests

In Matter of Brown v. Westfall, 36 Misc.3d 1234(A), 2012 WL 3655321 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) petitioner sought an order enforcing a November 22, 2010 Judicial Surrender, post-surrender/post adoption contract agreement ("agreement") regarding her biological child, later adopted by the respondent and her husband on March 23, 2011. The petitioner executed a Judicial Surrender with conditions on November 22, 2010 and the respondents also agreed to allow certain contact of the child by the petitioner. The conditions stated, inter alia: "B. Erin Brown shall have visitation with the child once each year during the month April for a period of one hour at a public location, the specific day, time and place to be determined by mutual agreement. In order to arrange the visitation Erin Brown shall call the cell phone of Melissa Westfall between April 1 and April 7, inclusive, each year and if the phone is not answered shall leave a phone number where she (Erin Brown) can be reached, and Melissa Westfall or Jeffrey Westfall shall return the call as soon as possible.... At the time of execution of this document Melissa Westfall shall provide Erin Brown with her current cell phone number. If at any time there is a change in Melissa Westfall's cell phone number she shall promptly provide the new number in writing to the Deputy Commissioner of the Yates County Department of Social Services, 417 Liberty Street, Penn Yan, N.Y. 14527 and the number shall be provided to Erin Brown on her request. Should Erin Brown fail to call to arrange a visitation as set forth herein or should she fail to attend an arranged visitation, then in that event all visitation shall cease; and all visitation rights of Erin Brown shall be deemed abandoned by her and shall not be enforceable.

The proof established that for two years prior to execution of the Judicial Surrender, the petitioner had visitation with her son in her home twice a week and on April 29, 2011, the petitioner had a visit with her biological son (then age 2 ½) pursuant to the agreement. In 2011 the petitioner had a telephone number for respondent. The number was in her cell phone, but sometime in December of 2011 she had to change her cell phone because the battery would not take a charge. During this process she lost respondent's cell phone number as she did not take it out of her old government phone and put it into her new one. The petitioner got a new phone number but didn't give it to Yates County Department of Social Services (DSS) caseworker, Sarah Laun until February 15, 2012. Laun gave it to the respondent who acknowledged receiving it in a letter to the petitioner dated February of 2012. As the time for the April, 2012 visit approached the petitioner realized she no longer had respondent's phone number. She called Laun a number of times in order to get respondent's number. But she did not get a return call from Laun until after April 7th, which was outside the specified time period to contact respondent to arrange for her yearly visit. Even so, the petitioner attempted to call and leave messages with the respondent, but respondent did not return petitioner's calls. As a result, no 2012 visit took place in accordance with the agreement.

The Court observed that it was the petitioner's and not the respondent's responsibility under the agreement to call and arrange for the yearly visitation. Petitioner had no phone records to back up her claim that she called Laun numerous times between February and April, 2012. Petitioner did not attempt to call the Westfalls at their published phone book number. However, she felt that would be a breach of the agreement as it set out that the only way to contact respondent was through her cell phone and not her home phone. Sarah Laun testified that it was her recollection that she first heard from the petitioner at the end of March 2012 regarding giving petitioner's new phone number to respondent. However, this was contradicted by respondent's February, 2012 letter to the petitioner acknowledging receipt of her new telephone number. On or about April 10th, respondent contacted Laun and said that petitioner did not contact her regarding the set-up of the yearly visit. She wanted this documented in her foster care file. Prior to the April 10, 2012 call from the Westfalls, Laun said she had not received any request from the petitioner for the Westfalls' phone number.

Family Court pointed out that in Matter of Mya V. P., 79 AD3d 1794 (4 Dept 2010), the Court found that the hearing court correctly applied principals of contract law in making its determination that the agreement was void because the biological mother breached the contract by missing visits due to her incarceration. The agreement provided it would be voided if the biological mother missed two visits during any 12 month period. But, the Appellate Division also remitted the matter to Family Court for a new hearing to determine whether enforcement of the agreement was in the best interests of the child. In the case at bar the petitioner did not strictly comply with the terms of the agreement but, unlike the mother in Mya V. P., she was ready, willing and able to participate in a visit. Petitioner amply explained why she did not make the call in the required time frame, and she offered a reasonable excuse why she didn't. The respondent had petitioner's new telephone number by February 2012. The petitioner corrected her breach as soon as she got the respondent's phone number and in the meantime, she made efforts to obtain it from DSS. As to best interests, the petitioner's proof was that she participated in the visit in 2011, and that it went well. Petitioner also testified that before the surrender, she exercised her visits with the child in her home, twice a week, for two years. The Court found that the petitioner's failure to comply with the provision requiring her to contact respondent between April 1 and April 7 regarding the 2012 visit was a breach of the agreement. However, given the nature of the circumstances surrounding the breach, including the petitioner's timely attempt to cure same and lack of proof that the annual visit was not in the child's best interests, the Court refused to vacate the visitation provision of the agreement.

Child Custody - Modification - Substantial Change of Circumstances - Evidence Regarding Wife's Interest in Spiritual and Paranormal Phenomena Did Not Establish a Change in Circumstances Warranting Modification of Custody Award.

In Sano v Sano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3590462 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that a modification of an existing custody arrangement should be allowed only upon a showing of a sufficient change in circumstances demonstrating a real need for a change of custody in order to insure the child's best interests. It found that the husband failed to meet that burden with the evidence he presented regarding the wife's interest in spiritual and paranormal phenomena, which did not establish a change in circumstances contrary to the best interests of the child. Moreover, the evidence of an isolated accidental injury of the child while in the wife's care was an insufficient basis on which to change the custodial arrangement. Accordingly, the Supreme Court's determination that there had been a sufficient change in circumstances since the Family Court's issuance of the custody and visitation order to warrant a change in residential custody was not supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record.

Child Custody - Modification - Relocation - In Determining Request of Parent to Relocate Sufficient Weight Must Be Given to Allegations of Domestic Violence.

In Matter of Eddington v McCabe, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3324264 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly found that there was a change of circumstances sufficient, in effect, to grant the mother's amended petition to modify the parties' amended stipulation of settlement to award her sole custody of the parties' child. It noted that after the amended stipulation of settlement transferred primary custody to the father, the mother moved in with the father and continued to serve as the child's primary caregiver for several years. In addition to the evidence that the mother had been, in effect, the primary caregiver throughout the child's life, the father had limited involvement in the child's life due, in large part, to the father's unusual work schedule. The Family Court found credible the mother's allegations that the father engaged in incidents of alcohol-induced domestic violence against her.

It also found that the determination by the Family Court to condition the custody award on the mother residing in Orange County to ensure that the child could stay in his current school district and to deny the branch of the mother's amended petition which was for leave to relocate with the child to Auburn, New York, lacked a sound and substantial basis in the record. Despite the multitude of factors that may properly be considered in the context of a relocation petition, the impact of the move on the relationship between the child and the noncustodial parent remains a central concern. The mother had been the primary caregiver throughout the child's life, while the father had limited involvement in the child's day-to-day care. Even when the child lived only with the father, primary care had fallen to the father's relatives, such as the father's aunt and the child's paternal grandmother. Family Court failed to give enough weight to the mother's allegations of domestic violence, often in the child's presence, even though it credited those allegations. The mother, whose income was limited to Social Security disability payments, testified that she could not afford to live in the Monroe-Woodbury school district. The mother expressed a willingness to provide liberal visitation to the father and to drive the child to visit with the father. The mother's move was motivated by a desire to escape domestic violence, to reside closer to her extended family who could provide financial and emotional support, and to secure affordable housing. Although the mother's relocation would inevitably have an impact upon the father's ability to spend time with the child, a liberal visitation schedule, including extended visits during summer and school vacations, would allow for the continuation of a meaningful relationship between the father and the child. Under the totality of the circumstances, the hearing testimony established that the child's best interests would be served by permitting the mother to relocate with the child to Auburn, New York.

Supreme Court

Maintenance - Modification - DRL § 236(B)(9)(b) - Surviving Agreement - Downward - Extreme Hardship - Extreme Hardship Calls for Substantial Dislocation of Financial Circumstances So That the Litigant Is Nearly Without Resources or Shelter.

In Platt v Platt, 2012 WL 3627418 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51583(U), in March 2011, the parties entered into a separation agreement which provided that the 47-year-old husband would pay maintenance to the wife at a rate of $700.00 per month from the period of March 1, 2011 through February 1, 2015. The agreement provided that the maintenance payments would increase in later years to $1000 per month, after the couple's daughter had graduated from college. At the time that the parties entered into the agreement, the husband was employed and earning an annual salary of $68,000. The wife was disabled and receiving $721.00 per month in Social Security benefits, $60.00 per month in SSI benefits, and food stamps in the amount of $187.00 per month. After the parties were divorced, the husband's job was terminated and he began collecting unemployment benefits. This Court then reduced his maintenance obligation from $700.00 per month to $400.00 per month. In April 2012, the husband's unemployment benefits expired and he moved for a suspension of his maintenance obligations until he regained employment. He claimed that the unemployment benefits that he received until April 2012, were his sole source of income, and that he had engaged in a diligent and extensive search to obtain employment commensurate with his qualifications, both inside and outside of New York State. The wife contended that the husband has failed to demonstrate that a continuation of the agreed upon maintenance obligation will result in extreme financial hardship to him. As evidence of the employment search, the husband provided the court with a three-page list of the positions that he had applied for, the approximate dates of the application, and the location of the prospective employer. Despite his efforts, he has not received an offer of employment. He asserted that it has been extremely difficult to find employment in the IT field because he lacked a college degree. Since his unemployment benefits expired, the husband admitted he has received financial assistance from his parents, as they contribute to his rent and grocery bills. The husband's statement of net worth revealed that a checking account and 401(k) were his only assets. As of May 2012, he had a balance of $978.56 in his checking account. He had $9.54 in his savings account. He had a 2005 car with a value of $5,498. He listed household furnishings at $1,000. As of May 17, 2012, the husband's 401(k) had a balance of only $4,302.00 which he had not withdrawn from because he planned to use this money to fund the parties' daughter's college expenses next quarter. The husband had no other assets. Under the terms of the separation agreement, he was solely responsible for the daughter's college expenses. He listed debts to his attorney in excess of $2,000 and a $464 debt to his physician. He borrowed money from a relative to move back to Rochester. His 2011 income tax return listed $31,452 in earned income and then $10,024 in unemployment compensation. There was no evidence of any other income. His expenses in his statement of net worth, substantially exceeded his income. After he paid rent, telephone, groceries, auto payments and insurance, college loans and other sundries, his monthly expenses were $2,177.75. The wife, in her response, painted an equally dismal fiscal picture.

Supreme Court observed that a party seeking to modify the maintenance provisions of a judgment of divorce in which the terms of a separation agreement have been incorporated, but not merged, must demonstrate that the continued enforcement of these maintenance provisions would create an "extreme hardship." DRL § 236(B)(9)(b). In addition, the movant must show that the loss of his or her income was unavoidable. Absent a prima facie showing of entitlement to a modification, the proponent has no right to a hearing. (Rockwell v. Rockwell, 74 AD3d 1045, 1046 (2nd Dept.2010); Vinnik v. Vinnik, 295 A.D.2d 339-40 (2nd Dept.2002); Barden v. Barden, 245 A.D.2d 695, 696 (3rd Dept.1997). The Court noted that extreme hardship in its plain meaning calls for a "substantial dislocation" of financial circumstances such that the party is almost lacking resources or shelter (citing V.P. v. C.P., 936 N.Y.S.2d 62 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.2011). It is extreme financial hardship which diminishes his ability to maintain his lifestyle, brings him below any poverty guideline, or compels him to liquidate assets or incur huge unmanageable debt. "Extreme hardship" is not merely the medical consequences of a maturing life but its plain meaning calls for a substantial dislocation of financial circumstances so that the litigant is nearly without resources or shelter. The Court found that the husband had made a prima facie showing of extreme hardship. His statement of net worth and most recent income tax return documented his chronic unemployment. He had no consistent source of income. He earned meager sums through daily labor. He admitted that he relied on the financial contributions of his parents to meet his financial obligations such as rent and grocery bills. This constituted an appreciable change in circumstances which was unforeseen and unanticipated such that the husband would experience extreme hardship in the absence of a temporary suspension of his maintenance obligation. The husband's current level of income also placed him well below the federal poverty limit for the western New York area. The court also declined to require him to invade his 401(k) to satisfy his maintenance obligation, as the wife suggested he should.

The husband's motion to suspend his maintenance obligation was granted based on the finding of extreme hardship and the wife's motion to deny the suspension of maintenance payments was denied. The Court directed that maintenance payments resume immediately, "in an amount that the court deems proper," upon the husband obtaining employment or receiving other benefits from any sources, including significant gifts from his parents. The Court, as a condition of the suspension of the maintenance obligations, required the husband to: (a) immediately, upon securing full or part-time employment, provide the name, address and amount of salary to the wife and further provide that, until the further order of this Court, one-quarter of his net payment, each week, shall be forwarded directly to the wife; (b) provide a monthly statement, under oath, to the wife of his income, including any gifts from any other person and include any pay stubs or contracts under which he is providing services and identify the name and addresses of any employer; (c) provide a monthly list of employment applications, with the names and addresses of the putative employers, filed by the husband during that month or other steps taken to procure employment; and, (d) provide a monthly list of all government sponsored benefits received by the husband.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Effect of Disciplinary Rules - Where 'Substantial Compliance' with Matrimonial Rules, Attorney Allowed to Recover Fees Owed for Services Rendered, but Not Yet Paid For - Block Billing Is Not Improper

In Daniele v Puntillo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3079201 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), Plaintiff was retained by defendant in March 2004, replacing defendant's prior counsel in her divorce proceeding. Plaintiff and defendant executed a retainer agreement in March 2004. The agreement specified the nature of representation, a $25,000 retainer fee, billing arrangements and payments, and billing rates, among other details. Attached to the retainer agreement was a Statement of Client's Rights and Responsibilities, also executed by both parties in March 2004. Plaintiff contended that on May 14, 2004, he filed a copy of the executed retainer agreement with the court as well as defendant's updated statement of net worth, as mandated by 22 NYCRR 1400.3. Shortly after executing both documents, defendant paid the $25,000 retainer fee. Plaintiff represented defendant from March 2004 through December 2004, when defendant's divorce proceedings ended in a stipulation of settlement. During that time, plaintiff sent defendant detailed billing statements, which were in "block billing" form, meaning that each timekeeper would enter a description of his or her work for a particular day, along with the total amount of time spent on those tasks for that day. Defendant made intermittent payments up until December 2004. When plaintiff commenced suit, there was an outstanding balance of $104,918.46.

At the close of plaintiff's case, defendant moved for a directed verdict dismissing the complaint on the ground that plaintiff failed to comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.3, thereby barring his claim for fees. The trial court denied the motion on the ground that defendant had admitted compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.3 in her answer. The trial continued to conclusion, and the court found an account stated in that defendant had not established that she objected to the bills. The court then granted judgment to plaintiff in the amount of $106,048.96.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that where there has been 'substantial compliance' with the matrimonial rules, an attorney will be allowed to recover the fees owed for services rendered, but not yet paid for. The applicable rule, 22 NYCRR 1400.3, mandates that an attorney in a matrimonial matter file a copy of the signed retainer agreement with the court, along with the statement of net worth. The record showed that a copy of the executed retainer was filed with the court on May 14, 2004, along with the updated statement of net worth. Even if plaintiff, as substituted counsel, should have filed the retainer within 10 days of its execution, he substantially complied with the requirements by filing the executed copy with the updated statement of net worth. Although it would have been better practice for plaintiff to have put proof of the filing in evidence on his direct case, his failure to do so did not change the fact that he substantially complied with the rule.

The Appellate Division rejected the Defendant's argument that plaintiff's billing practices and willful spoliation of evidence should result in sanctions, and dismissal of his claims. Defendant argued that block billing was improper and that "task billing," which listed the time for each separate task and is an enhanced level of billing, should have been used. However, block billing is common practice among law firms and neither 22 NYCRR 1400.3 nor the retainer agreement called for task based billing. Regarding the spoliation of evidence allegation, defendant contended that plaintiff intentionally destroyed a particular attorney's individual time sheets, thereby preventing her from using those records to impeach plaintiff. Plaintiff testified at trial that the information from that attorney's individual time sheets was entered into the firm's time entry system, then reviewed by him and incorporated into the firm's bills to defendant. The court found that, in any event, the time sheets were not key evidence, and thus their alleged destruction did not deprive defendant of the ability to defend against plaintiff's claim for fees. Accordingly, a spoliation sanction was not warranted.

Maintenance - Award - Imputed Income - Wife of 30 Year Marriage Who Worked Only 3 Years During Marriage Properly Denied Maintenance Where She Was Highly Educated and Similarly Situated to the Defendant

In Carr-Harris v Carr-Harris,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3204572 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) plaintiff and the defendant were married for more than 30 years, during which time the defendant worked as a church minister. The parties had four children, one of whom was a minor at the time the trial was commenced. At trial, the plaintiff testified that the defendant was the main breadwinner of the family and that, although she had a Master's degree and had worked towards two separate doctorate degrees, she worked for only three years during the course of the marriage. She also testified that the parties had borrowed more than $75,000 from her aunt, Gloria Ewsuk, although they did not execute a promissory note or other documentation confirming the loan. The parties also borrowed $40,000 from the plaintiff's mother, Kathleen Petrochko, and received $50,000 from the defendant's mother, Zoya Carr-Harris. The plaintiff claimed that, although the parties executed a promissory note for the sums received from Zoya, the principal amount was a gift and the parties were obligated only to repay $20,000 in interest, of which $17,000 had been repaid. Toward the end of the trial, the plaintiff admitted that she signed confessions of judgment in favor of various family members and friends, claiming that these individuals had loaned her money during the marriage and during the divorce proceedings and that she wished to ensure that the lenders would be repaid. The defendant claimed that the sums received from Ewsuk were gifts and that he never had any direct discussions with Ewsuk regarding the alleged loans. He acknowledged that the parties borrowed $40,000 from Petrochko, which they agreed to pay back with interest. He also claimed that the entire sum received from Zoya was a loan, and the parties were obligated to repay the principal and accumulated interest.

Supreme Court found that the sums received from Ewsuk were gifts, as there was no documentary evidence to support the claim that the sums were intended to be loans. It determined that the parties owed $70,000 to Petrochko, $50,000 to Zoya, and $21,000 to the three nonminor children, reflecting the sums the parties had borrowed from their children in order to make a down payment for the purchase of the marital home. Supreme Court determined that the plaintiff was not entitled to reimbursement of the cost of repairs to the marital residence, as her proof on this point was insufficient. Supreme Court ordered the sale of the marital home and determined that the parties should share equally in the proceeds after payment of all loans and expenses other than the liens that the plaintiff unilaterally placed on the home in favor of her family and friends. It imputed an income of $40,000 to the plaintiff, noting that she was highly educated and had not worked to her potential. Supreme Court found that the defendant, who was now working as a public school teacher, had an income of $54,000. The court ordered the defendant to pay $705.91 per month in child support and determined that the parties would share in the cost of statutory add-ons, with the defendant being liable for 57% of such expenses. In addition, it ordered defendant to maintain health insurance for the minor child until he reached the age of 21, ordering the parties to share the cost of unreimbursed medical expenses with the defendant paying 57% of such costs. The defendant was also ordered to pay child support arrears from his share of the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence. The Supreme Court found both parties at fault for the litigious nature of the proceedings and determined that the parties were equally situated, as both were in the process of beginning new careers. Thus, Supreme Court denied the plaintiff's requests for counsel fees and spousal support. The parties were ordered to share equally in the educational costs for the minor child's college through his 21st birthday.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that Supreme Court appropriately exercised its discretion in denying spousal maintenance to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was highly educated and was similarly situated to the defendant in terms of age, educational background, and future potential to work. Like the defendant, she was in the process of beginning a new career and, according to her own testimony, she should be able to earn approximately $40,000 per year. Thus, Supreme Court's imputation of income to her was appropriate, and the record supported the court's finding that the plaintiff was not entitled to spousal maintenance. It found that for the same reasons, Supreme Court properly denied the plaintiff an award of counsel fees. It also found that each of each of the Supreme Court's findings regarding the loans was supported by the record. The Supreme Court was free to credit the defendant's testimony. The Supreme Court properly denied the plaintiff's request for reimbursement of expenses that she allegedly incurred in making repairs to the marital home because the plaintiff failed to sufficiently prove that claim.

Maintenance - Award - Imputed Income - Proper to Impute Annual Income Based on Pre-retirement Earnings and Experience, Where No Proof Disability Retirement Medically Necessary -- Counsel Fee Awarded for Delaying Litigation

In Morales v. Inzerra, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3104243 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division noted that "in order for appreciation in the value of separate property to be deemed marital property subject to equitable distribution, the nontitled spouse must demonstrate the manner in which his or her contributions resulted in the increase in value and the amount of the increase which was attributable to his or her efforts" . Here, the plaintiff failed to sustain his burden, as he failed to set forth proof that the property actually increased in value and, in any event, he failed to demonstrate the manner in which his contributions resulted in any alleged appreciation .

The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in requiring the plaintiff to pay the defendant -wife maintenance of $325 per week for a period of 10 years. The Supreme Court found that the defendant was disabled as a result of multiple sclerosis. She lived in an assisted-living facility and Social Security disability benefits were her only independent source of income.

Supreme Court properly determined that the defendant was unable to support herself, and would not likely become self-supporting in the future. Supreme Court properly imputed $52,000 in annual income to plaintiff based on his pre-retirement earnings and experience. Although the plaintiff claimed that he retired because of a purported disability, he failed to offer medical evidence of his disability and his employment was uninterrupted in the years leading up to the commencement of the action. Moreover, the court found that he retired shortly after he was ordered to pay pendente lite maintenance to the defendant.

Supreme Court properly awarded the defendant an attorney's fee of $10,000, based on the relative financial circumstances of the parties, the relative merits of their positions at trial, and its finding that the plaintiff's actions prolonged the litigation.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Credit for Payment of Pre-Marital Debt - Where Marital Funds Used to Pay off the Separate Debt of Titled Spouse on Separate Property, Nontitled Spouse May Be Entitled to a Credit to Remedy Inequity Created by the Expenditure of Marital Funds to Pay off Separate Liabilities.

In Khan v. Ahmed, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3104254 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that when evaluating whether a court providently exercised its discretion in awarding maintenance, the factors to be considered are whether the award encourages economic independence, the present and future earning capacity of the parties, the reduced or lost lifetime earning capacity of the party seeking maintenance, the duration of the marriage, whether the amount and duration of the award is appropriate in light of the pre-separation standard of living, the reasonable needs of the recipient spouse, the income and property of the parties, the distribution of the marital property, and the health of the parties. In light of the relevant factors, including the disparity in the parties' income, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff maintenance of $350 per week until March 15, 2014. However, the court erred in awarding maintenance retroactive to the date of commencement of the action, as the record reflected that the plaintiff did not make an application for maintenance until she filed a proposed statement of distribution dated May 14, 2010. Accordingly, the award of maintenance should have been made retroactive to May 14, 2010.

The Appellate Division pointed out that where marital funds are used to pay off the separate debt of the titled spouse on the separate property, the nontitled spouse may be entitled to a credit. The reduction of indebtedness on separate property is not considered appreciation in the value of the separate property; rather, the credit is to remedy the inequity created by the expenditure of marital funds to pay off separate liabilities. The marital funds used to pay off those liabilities are added back into marital property, and the nontitled spouse is awarded his or her equitable share of those recouped marital funds. While the Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff's Toyota Corolla was her separate property, it erred in failing to credit the defendant for one-half of the $7,000 in marital funds used to pay off the loan on the vehicle. Accordingly, the defendant was entitled to a credit in the sum of $3,500, to be deducted from the plaintiff's distributive award, which had been in the sum of $3,520.

In light of the disparity in the parties' incomes and the defendant's actions in unnecessarily prolonging the litigation, the award of an attorney's fee to the plaintiff in the sum of $20,000 was appropriate.

Attorneys - Disqualification of Counsel - Rule 4.2 of the Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR 1200.0) - Violation of the Rule Against ex Parte Communications Will Support a Motion Seeking an Attorney's Disqualification, Including Situations Where the Party Is a Child

In Madris v. Oliviera,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 97 A.D.3d 823, 2012 WL 3024450 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order which granted mother's motion to disqualify the father's attorney and the attorney's law firm from appearing in the action. In the course of this Family Court Act article 6 proceeding, the father and the subject child allegedly experienced difficulty communicating with the caseworker assigned by the Nassau County Department of Social Services (DSS) to complete the court-ordered investigation. The father's attorney wrote to the caseworker's supervisor to alert her to the problem and to ask that she interview the parties to ensure that a complete and accurate report was produced for the court, and sent copies of the letter to the attorneys for the mother and the child. The mother moved to disqualify the father's attorney and the attorney's law firm on the basis that the attorney had violated Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR 1200.0) Rule 4.2 by engaging in improper ex parte communications with the child and with the DSS. The court granted the motion and disqualified the father's attorney and her firm.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that a party's entitlement to be represented in ongoing litigation by counsel of his or her own choosing is a valued right which should not be abridged absent a clear showing that disqualification is warranted. While the right to choose one's counsel is not absolute, disqualification of legal counsel during litigation implicates not only the ethics of the profession but also the parties' substantive rights, thus requiring any restrictions to be carefully scrutinized. The party seeking to disqualify a law firm or an attorney bears the burden to show sufficient proof to warrant such a determination.. Whether to disqualify an attorney is a matter which lies within the sound discretion of the court.

Rule 4.2 of the Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR 1200.0) provides that an attorney may not communicate with a represented party regarding the subject of the representation (subsection a) or permit his or her client to do so (subsection b) unless opposing counsel has consented or the communication is authorized by law. Although a violation of the rule against ex parte communications will support a motion seeking an attorney's disqualification, including situations where the party is a child, conclusory assertions of conduct violating a disciplinary rule will not suffice to support disqualification. Here, the court improperly placed the burden on the father rather than on the mother (i.e., on the opponent of disqualification rather than on the movant) and failed to consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. There was no evidence that the father or his attorney improperly questioned the child regarding his interactions with the caseworker assigned to conduct the court-ordered investigation. Because there was no violation of Rule 4.2(b) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR 1200.0), there was no basis for disqualification of the father's attorney due to communications with the child.

The Appellate Division also held that family court misapprehended the role of the DSS where it has merely been assigned as the agency to complete a court-ordered investigation. An entity cannot claim a blanket protection from ex parte interviews by taking the position that house counsel is responsible for all future legal matters affecting that entity. Similarly, if a governmental party were always considered to be represented by counsel for purposes of the rule against ex parte communications, the free exchange of information between the public and the government would be greatly inhibited. Because the DSS was not a represented party within the meaning of Rule 4.2(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR 1200.0), the court erred in disqualifying the father's attorney and the attorney's law firm on this basis as well.

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Referees - Referee Lacks Jurisdiction to Issue Order Made after Reference to Referee to Hear and Report Only

In Martinborough v. Martinborough, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3104237 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in 2009, the father filed a petition alleging that the mother was violating a prior order of visitation by interfering with his visitation rights. The mother responded by filing a petition to suspend the father's visitation rights indefinitely. In an order dated November 15, 2010, the Court Attorney Referee (Referee), granted the mother's petition to suspend the father's visitation upon the father's default in appearing. The father moved to vacate the order entered upon his default. By order of reference dated May 19, 2011, the Family Court, on its own initiative pursuant to CPLR 4212 and 4313, referred the matter to the Referee to hear and report. In an order dated July 28, 2011, the Referee denied the father's motion.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that a referee derives his or her authority from an order of reference by the court. Here, the order of reference referred the matter to the Referee to hear and report only, not to hear and determine. Thus, the Referee lacked jurisdiction to issue the order dated July 28, 2011. Accordingly, the order dated July 28, 2011, was reversed and the matter remitted to the Family Court, for a new determination of the father's motion.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Wife Awarded $300,000 more than Husband. No requirement that the assets be split evenly

In Franco v Franco, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 3023999 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married for 41 years. During the course of the marriage, the defendant was the sole source of financial support for the plaintiff and their three children (now emancipated), while the plaintiff, who never worked outside of the home, took care of the marital home and the parties' children. Also during the course of the marriage, the parties acquired a number of commercial properties and business interests, as well as significant liquid assets, which were equitably distributed between the parties by the Supreme Court following a nonjury trial. The plaintiff's distributive award was valued at $3,032,226 and consisted largely of the liquid assets, and the defendant's award was valued at $2,700,000, consisting largely of rental income-producing property, prior to various adjustments. Observing that there is no requirement that the assets be split evenly the Appellate Division found no basis to disturb the Supreme Court's determinations regarding the equitable distribution of the parties' property.

The Court noted that in exercising its discretionary power to award counsel fees, a court should review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions, as well as the tactics of a party in unnecessarily prolonging the litigation. Under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court's award of $15,000 counsel fees to the plaintiff, including appellate counsel fees to defend against the defendant's appeal and counsel fees to enforce the defendant's obligations under the divorce judgment, were a provident exercise of discretion .

Supreme Court

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Award - Imputed Income - $ 75,000 Income Imputed to Unemployed Husband Based on Employment History and Continual Influx of Financial Assistance from His Parents

In G.R.P. v. L.B.P., 2012 WL 3023506 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51364(U) the court had to determine, on this motion for pendente lite support, what income and assets, financed almost exclusively by a parent, were imputable to the son for purposes of supporting his now estranged wife and his children. The parties were married for twenty years and had three children. During their marriage, the parties lived a substantial lifestyle. They lived in a home valued in excess of $300,000, belonged to a country club and health clubs, vacationed annually in resort communities including skiing in Colorado and winters in Florida. This way of life persisted throughout most of the couple's marriage. The husband held two undergraduate degrees; the wife had one. The husband had been employed as a photographer in a business owned by his father, but the business stalled and was closed in the last 18 months. In his statement of net worth, the husband identified $8,470 in annual income as of July 2011. The wife, in her statement of net worth submitted in the same period, listed $25,000 in income from employment at Paychex. The husband never earned significant sums. His social security report indicated that his annual earnings in the last decade had never exceeded $39,000. On the average, his yearly income from 2000-2009 was approximately $35,000. If he paid his income and payroll taxes for those years, his net income would have been less than $30,000.

The degree to which the couple's lifestyle was subsidized by outside sources was revealed by an undisputed analysis of the family expenses. The husband's statement of net worth listed monthly expenses of $7,901 or $94,812 annually and asserted that he is "primarily responsible for expenses of our family." The wife, estimated the family expenses at $8,988 monthly or more than $107,000 annually. The costs revealed that the couple were able to buy a $30,000 automobile for the husband in 2007, but did not include any expenses for the college education of the oldest child, who attended Marquette University. The husband listed as separate property a margin account in the amount of $143,252, which was based on an annual gift from his mother. The husband's only other significant asset was another gift in the form of an Individual Retirement Account valued at $32,378. His assertion that his parents "helped us from time to time" seemed to be understated. The wife's statement of net worth was further evidence of the same. She had only $1,000 in a savings account, an estimated $10,000 in the cash surrender value of a life insurance policy, and $1,900 in credit card debt. The parental subsidy extended to the marital residence as the home was owned by the husband jointly with his father. According to the husband's statement of net worth, his father also was a joint owner of the entire contents of the house. The house was valued in excess of $325,000, and there were three separate mortgages, one held jointly by the father and the husband. The couple were not paying this mortgage. The second mortgage was a demand note for $100,000 to his mother, given in 1997 for which there had been no payments, and no accumulated interest because the value of the current debt equaled the value of the original loan. The third mortgage was from a bank and was placed in 1997. The husband and his wife were jointly liable on all three mortgages. The husband and wife never generated enough income to pay their mortgages, yet they lived in a fully furnished, expensive, suburban home. The husband had no income, had not worked for two years, and had $96,000 in annual family expenses. From the documents before the court, the husband needed more than $95,000 in net income in order to meet his expenses, but exclusive of unemployment insurance benefits, he had less than $10,000 in income. The Court observed that either the husband had borrowed huge sums from third parties to maintain his lifestyle during the last two years or his parents financed his entire financial life. There was no evidence that the former had occurred-the husband's statement of net worth showed no credit card balances, no notes payable, and no other debts. There was no evidence of accumulated debt, which might lead to the conclusion that the husband borrowed sums in previous years to finance his family expenses. The conclusion was inescapable that the husband's parents have routinely gifted or transferred large sums of money to the husband to pay for his family living expenses. In reaching this conclusion, the court was struck by the husband's failure to quantify the "loans" or "gifts" given to him by his parents during the last two years. At no point did he admit the amount of annual gifts; he never stated exactly how much he received from his parents.

Supreme Court observed that New York law gives the court considerable discretion to impute income to a parent where the parent receives money, goods, or services from a relative or friend. DRL 240(1-b)(b)(5)(iv)(D)). The court held that it had to impute income to the husband based on his employment history and his parental support; and there was an equally compelling command to impute income to the wife based on her income and family support. The husband's decade long history of income, as reflected in his social security report, justified imputing $35,000 in annual income to him. In addition to his earnings history, the husband had two college degrees, has operated a business, and worked as stock broker. Based on the history of the families's earnings and the continual influx of financial assistance to the husband through his parents, the husband was determined to have annual financial assistance from his parents in an amount of $75,000. For purposes of the application, the court found that the wife had $25,000 in imputed income.

Based on these determinations, the court found that the husband had total resources available in the amount of $110,000; $75,000 from annual subsidies from his parents and the $35,000 as imputed income. This court reduced that amount by the amount of payroll taxes that would be paid on $35,000 to $33,023. The total income for purposes of maintenance and child support was $103,023. The maintenance to be paid to the wife under the temporary maintenance guidelines was $25,906 annually or $2,158.91 monthly. The child support, calculated after subtracting the maintenance from the father's income, was $22,363 annually or $860 bi-weekly. The pro rata contributions to add-ons expenses (health insurance, extracurriculars) were calculated using a 75% contribution for the husband and 25% contribution for the wife.

Child Support - Modification - Substantial Change of Circumstances - Substantial Reduction in the Father's Visitation with Child, Which Significantly Reduced Amount of Money He Was Required to Spend on Child Constituted an Unanticipated Change in Circumstances That Created Need for Modification of Child Support Obligations

In McCormick v McCormick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2819303 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that mother established that an increase in the father's child support obligation was warranted by a change in circumstances (Matter of Gravlin v. Ruppert, 98 N.Y.2d 1, 3-6). The substantial reduction in the father's visitation with the child, which significantly reduced the amount of money the father was required to spend on the child, "constituted an unanticipated change in circumstances that created the need for modification of the child support obligations". Furthermore, contrary to the Family Court's conclusion, the child's derivative Social Security benefits may not serve as a credit against the father's child support obligation. It reversed and remitted the matter to the Family Court for a new determination of child support.

Custody - Visitation - Domestic Relations Law § 71 - Sibling Visitation - Petitioners' Attorney Was a "Proper Person" to Commence Proceeding

In Matter of Alexandra D. v. Santos, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2913497 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), a sibling visitation proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 6, Alexandra D. and Natalie D. appealed from an order of the Family Court, which, in effect, denied their petition and dismissed the proceeding for lack of standing. The Appellate Division reversed, on the law, and reinstated the petition. It observed that pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 71, a sibling may commence a proceeding to seek visitation with a whole or half sibling who is under the care, custody, and control of a parent or other person or party. Where the sibling seeking such relief is a minor, "a proper person" may seek such relief on his or her behalf . Contrary to the Family Court's determination, the petitioners at bar, who were seeking visitation with their half brother, had standing to commence this proceeding. Moreover, the petitioners' attorney was a "proper person" to commence this proceeding on their behalf. Accordingly, the Family Court erred by, in effect, denying the petition and dismissing the proceeding for lack of standing.

Custody - Appeal - Record on Appeal - Matter De Hors the Record - Judicial Notice - Appellate Division Considers and Rejects New Facts Submitted to It on Appeal

In Matter of Cooper v. Robertson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2913503 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division found Family Court's determinations that there had been a change in circumstances since the issuance of the order awarding the parties joint custody of the subject children, and that an award of sole custody of the subject children to the father would be in the their best interests, had a sound and substantial basis in the record and, thus, should not be disturbed. It observed that the new facts that the attorney for the subject children set forth on appeal did not demonstrate that the record before it was no longer sufficient for determining the best interests of the subject children (citing Matter of Michael B., 80 N.Y.2d 299, 318).

Authors Note: We note that in Matter of Michael B., 80 N.Y.2d 299, the Court of Appeals considered new facts brought to its attention on appeal which required it to remit the matter to Family Court for an expedited hearing and determination of whether appellant was a fit parent and entitled to custody of the Child. The Court was informed that, during the pendency of the appeal, that appellant was charged with--and admitted--neglect of the children in his custody (not Michael), and that those children had been removed from his home and were again in the custody of the Commissioner of the Social Services. The neglect petitions alleged that appellant abused alcohol and controlled substances including cocaine, and physically abused the children. Orders of fact finding had been entered by Family Court recognizing appellant's admission in open court to "substance abuse, alcohol and cocaine abuse." Moreover, an Order of Protection was entered prohibiting appellant from visiting the children while under the influence of drugs or alcohol. The Court of Appeals stated that " Appellant's request that we ignore these new developments and simply grant him custody, because matters outside the record cannot be considered by an appellate court, would exalt the procedural rule--important though it is--to a point of absurdity, and "reflect no credit on the judicial process." (Cohen and Karger, Powers of the New York Court of Appeals § 168, at 640.) Indeed, changed circumstances may have particular significance in child custody matters (see, e.g., Braiman v Braiman, 44 NY2d 584, 587, 590; Matter of Angela D., 175 AD2d 244, 245; Matter of Kelly Ann M., 40 AD2d 546). This Court would therefore take notice of the new facts and allegations to the extent they indicate that the record before us is no longer sufficient for determining appellant's fitness and right to custody of Michael, and remit the matter to Family Court for a new hearing and determination of those issues.” It reversed the order of the Appellate Division and remitted to Family Court for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion.

Maintenance - Child Support - Equitable Distribution - Error for the Supreme Court to Direct That That Separate Property Be Sold. Plaintiff Entitled to a Credit for Her Equitable Share of the Marital Funds That Used to Pay off the Mortgage That was the Defendant's Separate Debt. Accordingly, the Matter Was Remitted to the Supreme Court for the Calculation of That Credit.

In Davidman v Davidman, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 2819349 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant acquired the marital residence prior to the parties' marriage, using the proceeds of a settlement from a personal injury action. The deed and mortgage were placed and kept solely in his name. Consequently, the marital residence was separate property. The Appellate Division found that plaintiff failed to carry her burden establishing that the marital residence appreciated in value during the parties' marriage and, if so, that such appreciation was due in part to her efforts. Thus, it was error for the Supreme Court to award the plaintiff a 50% share in the appreciation of the marital residence. Moreover, it was error for the Supreme Court to direct that this separate property be sold (see London v. London, 21 AD3d at 603). However, the plaintiff was entitled to a credit for her equitable share of the marital funds that were used to pay off the mortgage, which was the defendant's separate debt. Accordingly, the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for the calculation of that credit.

Since the Supreme Court did not direct the plaintiff to pay the carrying charges for the marital residence, including the mortgage, during the pendency of her exclusive occupancy of it, the defendant became obligated to do so, while also paying child support. Moreover, the Supreme Court did not award the defendant a credit against his child support obligation for any portion of the carrying charges he paid during the plaintiff's exclusive occupancy of the marital residence. As a result, the defendant was making double shelter payments. (Mosso v. Mosso, 84 AD3d 757, 759). Therefore, the matter had to be remitted to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the defendant's child support obligation, with the defendant receiving a credit for any double shelter payments he previously made.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Child Support - Award - Split Physical Custody - When Custodial Arrangement Splits Children's Physical Custody So That Neither Parent Can Be Said to Have Physical Custody of the Children for a Majority of the Time" the Parent with the Greater Pro Rata Share of the Child Support Obligation Should Be Identified as the Noncustodial Parent

In Smith v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2848686 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff and defendant were married in 1996 and had twin sons (born in 1996) and a daughter (born in 2004). In 2009, plaintiff commenced the action for divorce. After a trial, Supreme Court issued findings of fact and conclusions of law which provided that it was in the best interests of the children that the parties have "joint custody with shared parenting as set forth in the existing temporary order ... [which order] shall become the permanent order of the [c]ourt." Supreme Court also "deemed [plaintiff] to be the non-custodial parent by virtue of his greater income for purposes of child support," and directed plaintiff to pay an amount of support to defendant pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b). The parties' marriage was thereafter dissolved by judgment of divorce which incorporated the findings of fact and conclusions of law. The judgment, specifically provided that the children's primary residence would be with plaintiff.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erroneously designated plaintiff as the noncustodial parent and required him to pay child support. It observed that generally, the custodial parent for purposes of child support is the parent who has physical custody of the children for the majority of the time. In such cases, the court may determine which parent is the custodial parent based on the " 'reality of the situation' " (Bast v. Rossoff, 91 N.Y.2d at 728). It is only when "the parents' custodial arrangement splits the children's physical custody so that neither can be said to have physical custody of the children for a majority of the time" that the parent with the greater pro rata share of the child support obligation as calculated pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act should be identified as the noncustodial parent (Baraby v. Baraby, 250 A.D.2d 201, 204 [1998]). Here, Supreme Court's judgment provided that the children's primary physical residence was with plaintiff and set a parenting schedule that undisputedly resulted in the children being with plaintiff 18 nights out of every 28 nights and with defendant 10 nights out of every 28 nights during the school year. For the remainder of the year, including school recesses and holidays, the parties shared parenting time equally. Inasmuch as "shared" custody is not synonymous with "equal" custody and plaintiff clearly had physical custody for a majority of the time during the greater part of the year, Supreme Court incorrectly determined that plaintiff was the noncustodial parent for child support purposes by virtue of his higher income, and erred in directing plaintiff to pay child support to defendant. It reversed the direction to pay child support to defendant and remitted the matter Supreme Court for further proceedings.

Agreements - Construction - "Inherited" - In Construing the Provisions of an Agreement the Court Should Consider the "Plain Meaning" of the Words and Phrases Used by the Parties

In Momberger v Momberger, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2849162 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties executed a separation agreement in 2007, later incorporated but not merged into their April 2009 judgment of divorce, providing that plaintiff would pay defendant $1,000 a month in maintenance. Under the terms of the agreement, plaintiff's maintenance obligations would be either reduced if defendant inherited over $100,000 or terminated if the inheritance exceeded $200,000. In January 2009, defendant was deeded a remainder interest in her father's residence, which was valued at over $200,000, subject to a life estate retained by the father. Upon the death of defendant's father in 2010, plaintiff claimed that defendant had "inherited" the residence and ceased making maintenance payments. Plaintiff thereafter sought an order terminating his maintenance obligation and directing defendant to disclose information related to her inheritance. Supreme Court denied plaintiff's motion.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected plaintiff's challenge to Supreme Court's finding that defendant did not inherit her father's residence for purposes of the separation agreement. In considering the "plain meaning" of the words and phrases used by the parties in the separation agreement it noted that an "inheritance" is commonly defined as property acquired "under the laws of intestacy" or "by bequest or devise" (Black's Law Dictionary [9th ed 2009]). Plaintiff conceded that defendant's father made a valid inter vivos gift of a remainder interest in his residence to defendant, and that interest was indefeasible and immediately vested upon the deed's delivery. Accordingly, Supreme Court properly concluded that defendant's interest had been transferred prior to her father's death and did not constitute an inheritance for purposes of the separation agreement.

Divorce - Grounds - Domestic Relations Law §170(7) - Irretrievable Breakdown - Divorce on Irretrievable Breakdown Grounds Is Not Another Action Pending for the Same Relief Where Other Action Is Based upon Cruel and Inhuman Treatment and Abandonment.

In Rinzler v Rinzler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2849241 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), plaintiff commenced an action for divorce on the grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment and abandonment in 2009. Defendant answered and counterclaimed for spousal support arrears. In September 2010, after enactment of Domestic Relations Law § 170(7), plaintiff unsuccessfully sought defendant's consent to discontinue the action, presumably so that he could commence a new action based on the recently added no-fault ground. In March 2011, plaintiff commenced an action for divorce pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §170(7). Supreme Court granted Defendants motion to dismiss the action on the basis that there was "another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action" (CPLR 3211[a][4]).

The Appellate Division reversed. It did not agree that the complaint in the second action alleged the same cause of action as the complaint in the first action. It observed that in determining whether two causes of action are the same, it considers "(1) [whether] both suits arise out of the same actionable wrong or series of wrongs[] and (2) as a practical matter, [whether] there [is] any good reason for two actions rather than one being brought in seeking the remedy". (Siegel, Practice Commentaries, McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 7B, CPLR C3211:15, at 29). Plaintiff's first complaint sought a divorce on the grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment and abandonment. To obtain a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, plaintiff was required to show that the conduct of the defendant so endangers the physical or mental well being of the plaintiff as renders it unsafe or improper for the plaintiff to cohabit with the defendant.(Domestic Relations Law § 170[1]). The other ground asserted by plaintiff in the first action required proof of the abandonment of the plaintiff by the defendant for a period of one or more years (Domestic Relations Law § 170[2]). On the other hand, the complaint in the second action sought a no-fault divorce. Such relief requires a sworn declaration that the marriage was irretrievably broken for a period of at least six months (Domestic Relations Law § 170[7]). In its view these causes of action were not the same.

Turning to the second prong of the inquiry, as a practical matter, there was a good reason to allow plaintiff to maintain this action. As the Legislature noted, the intent of no-fault divorce was "to lessen the disputes that often arise between the parties and to mitigate the potential harm to them ... caused by the current process" Similarly, the Governor stated, in signing the legislation, that its intent was to "reduce litigation costs and ease the burden on the parties in what is inevitably a difficult and costly process.". Thus, allowing plaintiff to proceed on the cause of action for a no-fault divorce, which was not available to him at the time he commenced the first action, would not "unreasonably burden ... defendant with a series of suits emanating from a single wrong merely by basing each suit on a different theory of recovery".

It rejected the defendant's contention that having previously commenced an action prior to the effective date of Domestic Relations Law § 170(7), plaintiff may not avail himself of the benefit of the no-fault provision by commencing a new action because it would contravene the Legislature's intent regarding the statute's effective date. Unlike the equitable distribution statute, which substantially expanded the economic rights of a spouse in a divorce the change created by Domestic Relations Law 170(7) simply provides another ground for obtaining a divorce . Thus, allowing plaintiff to maintain the new action for a no-fault divorce would not circumvent the Legislature's intent.

Antenuptial Agreements - Construction - Where a Contract Employs Contradictory Language, Specific Provisions Control over General Provisions

In Herr v Herr, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2849472 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff and defendant, who had each gone through a divorce, began to discuss marriage in 2002. As part of that discussion, plaintiff encouraged defendant to prepare a prenuptial agreement in order to overcome his reluctance to remarry and to accommodate each party's desire to devise certain assets to their children from their previous marriages. Defendant then contacted an attorney to draft an agreement that would allow the parties to opt out of the statutory scheme governing equitable distribution. When defendant presented an early draft of the agreement to plaintiff in 2003, she objected to its failure to provide for her in the event that defendant died while the parties were still married. Defendant had his attorney add language to the agreement stating that it would not preclude plaintiff from making claims on defendant's separate property in the event of his death. Additionally, language which required the parties to forfeit their rights to each other's retirement plans by consenting to the beneficiary designation made by the other party was completely eliminated. Apparently satisfied with the changes, plaintiff executed the agreement and, two days later, the parties were married.

In 2010, plaintiff commenced this action for divorce and, moved for an order setting aside the prenuptial agreement. Following hearings, Supreme Court found that the evidence did not support plaintiff's contention that the signing of the agreement was the product of duress or coercion. Nevertheless, the court held that the terms of the agreement were unconscionable because, as read by the court, they did not allow plaintiff any interest in defendant's property in the event that the marriage terminated by his death and, since that was the provision that plaintiff had insisted on, she could not have understood its language. It granted plaintiff's motion to set aside the agreement.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that Supreme Court erred. "[D]uly executed prenuptial agreements are generally valid and enforceable given the 'strong public policy favoring individuals ordering and deciding their own interests through contractual arrangements' " (Van Kipnis v. Van Kipnis, 11 NY3d 573, 577 [2008], quoting Bloomfield v. Bloomfield, 97 N.Y.2d 188, 193 [2001]). Such an agreement is construed in accord with the parties' intent, which is generally gleaned from what is expressed in their writing. So long as the agreement is fair on its face, it will be enforced according to its terms absent proof of fraud, duress, overreaching or unconscionability. In holding that the prenuptial agreement was unconscionable, Supreme Court erroneously interpreted the agreement's provisions as failing to provide for plaintiff in the event of defendant's death during the parties' marriage. The agreement's second recital stated that the parties desire their separate property, as defined in the agreement, to be free from any claim of the other if the marriage were to terminate "other than by death." Paragraph 1.1 of the agreement further emphasized that the parties waived their right to share in each other's separate property in the event the marriage terminates other than by death. Paragraph 1.2 specifically provided that the parties do not waive any rights to share in each other's separate property in the event of death. While paragraph 1.3 stated that "neither party shall at any time make a claim against the separate property owned by the other" and, when read separately, it may suggest an internal inconsistency in the document, a contract should be interpreted in a way which reconciles all its provisions, if possible. Thus, where a contract employs contradictory language, specific provisions control over general provisions. Here, paragraph 1.2 carved out a specific exception to the general language of paragraph 1.3 and, taken together, these provisions established that plaintiff retained a right to her elective share in defendant's separate property in the event that the marriage terminated by death. Accordingly, it disagreed with Supreme Court's determination that plaintiff's interest in defendant's separate property was "at best, illusory." In view of this, it did not have to consider the extrinsic evidence of the parties' intent.

Agreements - Construction - Termination Provision - Dum Custa Clause - Supreme Court Finds No "Spousal Type of Relationship" Where No Economic Partnership

In Fecteau v Fecteau, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2923994 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties entered into a separation agreement in 2004 in which defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a monthly spousal support payment until the occurrence of any one of four specified termination events. The agreement, amended in 2005 as to the monthly payment, was incorporated into, but not merged with, a 2007 judgment of divorce. One of the events that would trigger termination of plaintiff's spousal support was her "living habitually with another person over the age of [18] years in a spousal type of relationship." In September 2010, defendant moved to terminate his spousal support obligation, alleging that plaintiff had triggered the termination provision by cohabiting with an adult male. After a full hearing, Supreme Court denied the motion and awarded plaintiff counsel fees.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that the record amply supported the conclusion that plaintiff had been living habitually with the male, an adult. The dispute distilled to whether plaintiff's relationship with him was a "spousal type of relationship" within the meaning of the separation agreement. Consideration of the entirety of the agreement failed to shed light on the parties' intent in drafting the "spousal type of relationship" language, although it was clear that it did not equate to marriage inasmuch as the agreement contained a separate termination provision regarding remarriage by plaintiff. Both parties appeared to concede, and the court agreed, that, given the ambiguous language, it was necessary for Supreme Court to hold a hearing to consider extrinsic evidence in order to determine their intentions (see Dagliolo v. Dagliolo, 91 AD3d at 1260).

Defendant testified that, although not represented by counsel during the negotiations, he was "very actively involved" in drafting the terms of the agreement, and that it was he who proposed the phrase at issue. As to his intent in including the "spousal type of relationship" phrase, defendant provided various explanations, including: that it was "intended to cover any and all possible occurrences of [plaintiff] living under the same roof in any type of relationship, under any circumstance, with anyone on a regular basis, over the age of 18"; Plaintiff testified, among other things, that she thought a "spousal type of relationship" was "being married in every way other than that legal piece of paper, total."

Supreme Court found the majority of defendant's testimony regarding his intentions surrounding the disputed phrase to be self-serving and incredible and rejected his broad proposed definition of the phrase. The court found plaintiff's testimony and that of the male to be credible and concluded that the evidence demonstrated that their relationship was not a spousal type of relationship within the meaning of the termination clause.

The Appellate Division held that the record fully supported Supreme Court's conclusion. Plaintiff and the parties' teenage daughter moved in with the male in the spring of 2010. According to plaintiff, she was experiencing financial hardship from her mortgage payments and carrying charges on her house and substantial credit card debt. After discussing her finances with the male, the two agreed that plaintiff and the daughter would stay in his home until plaintiff became financially secure, and that this arrangement would keep the daughter in their current school district and allow plaintiff to sell her house. Although this arrangement did not initially require plaintiff to pay rent or utilities, they did agree that she would begin to pay both after the sale of her house. While they did not determine an exact date where the arrangement would end, they believed that it would take approximately two to three years before plaintiff was financially secure, at which point she planned to purchase or rent a residence of her own. Plaintiff's attempts to carry through with this plan were evidenced by her efforts to sell her house after making various renovations, with his assistance, to make it more attractive to buyers. While there was evidence that plaintiff and the male share many responsibilities around his home, including cooking meals, buying groceries and doing laundry for one another, the record demonstrated that all of plaintiff's finances remained independent of his and neither held any expense, debt or asset of the other. The only evidence of money being exchanged between them was his $2,000 loan to her in 2008, which she had fully repaid before the hearing. Although plaintiff named him as the beneficiary of a $25,000 term life insurance policy, she testified that she did so because he is familiar with her children, and she trusted him to distribute the proceeds among her children according to their needs. Although his current marriage would prohibit any greater commitment until after any divorce proceedings were finalized, the male and plaintiff both testified that, while their relationship was romantic they had not discussed any such plans.

Maintenance - Award - Equitable Distribution - Award - Plaintiff Was Entitled to a Credit for Half of the Marital Funds Used to Reduce Defendant's Separate Indebtedness - Domestic Relations Law § 236[b][5][D] [13] - Court May Consider Transfers Made in Contemplation of a Matrimonial Action as One of the Factors in Equitably Distributing Marital Property

In Biagiotti v. Biagiotti,--- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 2849476 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the parties were married in September 2002. In June 2010, when plaintiff was 48 and defendant was 54, plaintiff commenced the divorce action. In response to a request for temporary relief, Supreme Court granted plaintiff exclusive use and occupancy of the marital residence, instructed defendant to pay carrying costs on the residence, awarded plaintiff $250 per month in temporary maintenance and ordered the equal division of a Charles Schwab investment account held in defendant's name that was valued at around $20,000.

Following trial, Supreme Court granted plaintiff a divorce, equitably distributed the parties' property, and awarded plaintiff exclusive use of the marital residence until August 2012 and maintenance of $250 per month for 15 months and $125 per month for three years thereafter or until she remarries, whichever comes first. The judgment contradictorily stated that $250 should be paid for 12 months and 15 months.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err with respect to its award of maintenance to plaintiff. The court identified 11 factors that it found particularly relevant here. This was not a marriage of long duration, the parties did not have any children in common, they were in relatively good health and employed, and they enjoyed an upper middle class standard of living. Plaintiff had been occupying the marital residence, which was defendant's separate property, while defendant had been paying the carrying costs. Although plaintiff earned significantly less than defendant, her salary was approximately $40,000 and she received child support for her child from a previous marriage. She was also attending college and planned to become a certified public accountant in the near future, which will enhance her earning potential. "[M]indful that the primary purpose of maintenance is to encourage self-sufficiency by the recipient," and noting that Supreme Court considered the relevant statutory factors, it could not say that the court abused its discretion in awarding plaintiff maintenance.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in distributing the appreciation in value of the marital residence. The parties agreed that the residence, which defendant owned prior to the marriage, was defendant's separate property. Appreciation in value of separate property can become marital property if the appreciation is due to the contributions or efforts of the nontitled spouse. The parties stipulated that the residence increased in value by $105,500 between the date of marriage and date of commencement of the divorce action, and that they spent $185,000 to improve the home. The evidence showed that defendant was more personally involved in the renovations than plaintiff. The renovations were paid for with marital funds. According to an appraisal the improvements only accounted for approximately $11,000 of the increase in value. Considering the parties' different levels of involvement, and that most of the appreciation was passive based on market forces rather than related to the improvements, the court did not err in granting plaintiff 15% of the amount of the property's appreciation.

The Appellate Division held that Plaintiff was entitled to a credit for half of the marital funds used to reduce defendant's separate indebtedness. "If marital assets are used to reduce one party's separate indebtedness, the other spouse can recoup his or her equitable share of the expended marital funds" (Burtchaell v. Burtchaell, 42 AD3d 783, 786 [2007]). Defendant testified that he had a mortgage and a home equity line of credit as liens against his home prior to the marriage. In 2003, shortly after the marriage, he refinanced the mortgage and paid off the existing line of credit by rolling it into the new mortgage. The parties each testified that the mortgage payments were made from a checking account where both parties deposited their paychecks. The amount of the refinanced mortgage was reduced by $24,028 during the marriage. As these payments from marital funds reduced defendant's indebtedness on his separate property, plaintiff was entitled to recoup $12,014, or half of the marital funds applied to this separate debt. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly divided the debt from the home equity line of credit. After refinancing the mortgage, defendant took out a new line of credit. Both parties testified that it was repeatedly borrowed against and paid down during the marriage from marital funds. Defendant testified that they borrowed to pay for home maintenance and repairs, vehicles, furniture and other living expenses. As this evidence established that the line of credit was used for marital expenses and plaintiff's evidence did not refute this, the court did not abuse its discretion by equally dividing the debt between the parties.

The Appellate Division modified Supreme Court's distribution of the parties' retirement accounts. The court relied upon the same factors for analyzing defendant's retirement plan as for plaintiff's retirement plan and IRA, yet awarded plaintiff 10% of defendant's account while giving defendant 20% of plaintiff's accounts. Based on the parties' disparate incomes, and the court's lack of any explanation for the discrepancy in the percentages awarded for these similar assets, it modified by awarding each party 10% of the other's retirement plans.

The record did not include any value for defendant's three IRAs for any time period between the date of commencement of the action and the date of trial. As Supreme Court must use a valuation date within that time frame (Domestic Relations Law 236[B][4][b]), the court could not assign a value to these assets. The burden of proving the value of a pension rests on the party seeking an equitable share of that pension. Because plaintiff did not meet her burden, the court did not err in declining to distribute any portion of defendant's IRAs to plaintiff.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred by ordering defendant to reimburse plaintiff for all withdrawals from his Charles Schwab account made in the six months prior to commencement of this action. A court may consider transfers made in contemplation of a matrimonial action as one of the factors in equitably distributing marital property (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5][d] [13]). In the months prior to commencement, and after defendant had informed plaintiff of his desire to end the marriage, defendant withdrew over $17,000 from the subject account. The account was marital property, so the court did not err in determining that plaintiff was entitled to credit for some of the amounts that defendant had withdrawn from that account. On the other hand, plaintiff already received the benefit of the amounts that defendant used to make a payment toward the loan on plaintiff's vehicle and for a utility bill at the marital residence where she was living. These were not improper transfers made in contemplation of the divorce but, instead, were ordinary living expenses that inured to plaintiff's benefit. Thus, the court erred in requiring defendant to repay plaintiff $500, representing half of the vehicle payment, and $505.82, representing half of the utility bill.

Supreme Court

Divorce - Grounds - Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) - Irretrievable Breakdown - Separation Agreement Which Resolves All Issues Between the Parties Is Not a Bar to the Granting of Summary Judgment

In Burger v Burger, 2012 WL 2849614 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 22181 Unreported Disposition, Plaintiff ("Wife") moved for an Order awarding her summary judgment as a matter of law; granting a judgment of absolute divorce in favor of the dissolving the marriage upon the ground of an irretrievable breakdown of the marriage for a period of at least six months; incorporating by reference the terms of the written Agreement of Separation entered into between the parties on April 18, 2011, such that same shall survive and not be merged into the Judgment of Divorce; and directing Husband to reimburse Wife the reasonable counsel fees and costs incurred her in connection with the motion.

The parties were married on July 2, 1994, and there were two children of the marriage. On or about September 1, 2009, the wife commenced an action for divorce, which was resolved pursuant to a Separation Agreement executed and acknowledged by the parties on April 18, 2011. On or about January 17, 2012, the wife commenced another action for divorce, by the filing of a Summons and Verified Complaint, upon the grounds set forth in DRL § 170(7) an irretrievable break down of the marriage for a period of six months. She requested that the Court incorporate the terms of the Separation Agreement into a Judgment of Divorce.

In opposition to Wife's motion, the husband argued that at the time they entered into the Separation Agreement, it was the parties' intent to live pursuant to the agreement for a period of at least two years, so that he could continue to receive health benefits. He did not cite any provision in the Agreement requiring the parties to remain separated and living under the Agreement for at least two years. The Husband counter-claimed for specific performance of Article VII of the Separation Agreement, which provided for future medical coverage of each party.

The Supreme Court found that under the terms of the Separation Agreement, the wife was not precluded from bringing the action for divorce under DRL §170(7), notwithstanding the fact that parties had not been living separate and apart under the agreement for at least one year. DRL § 170(7) provides that an action for divorce may be maintained by a husband or wife to obtain a Judgment of Divorce dissolving the marriage where the "relationship between husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months, provided that one party has so stated under oath. No judgment of divorce shall be granted under this subdivision unless and until the economic issues of equitable distribution of marital property, the payment or waiver of spousal support, the payment of child support, the payment of counsel fees and experts' fees as well as the custody and visitation with the infant children of the marriage have been resolved by the parties or determined by the Court and incorporated into the Judgment of Divorce.

It was undisputed that all of the issues set forth in DRL § 170(7) were fully resolved by the Separation Agreement. What remained in the action were the parties' respective claims of non-compliance. Supreme Court granted the motion. It held that non-compliance with/or enforcement of the Separation Agreement is not an element of DRL §170(7) such that the Court would be without the authority to grant the wife a Judgment of Divorce based upon the wife's sworn statement that the parties' marriage had been irretrievably broken for a period of six months, and the existence of the parties' Separation Agreement pursuant to which all financial and ancillary issues had been resolved. The statute does not require compliance with the terms of an agreement between the parties, and this Court is not authorized to add or insert requirements.

Family Court

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection- Jurisdiction - No Intimate Relationship Where Parties Met on the Internet , Communicated by Email, Met Once Socially and Never Had Any Kind of Sexual Relationship.

In Matter of Shannon M. v. Michael C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2877566 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) Petitioner filed a family offense petition seeking an order of protection against the Respondent. In the petition the Petitioner alleged that the most recent incident was on September 20, 2011 at her residence: "Respondent e-mailed Petitioner with a bizarre message that his protests are going to start again soon.'His protests involve his delusional belief that Petitioner owes him money for carpentry work done inside her brownstone 1 ½ years ago. Petitioner has long since paid the Respondent for services rendered, and after she received last night's e-mail, she made it clear to him via e-mail that she was not going to pay him a second time for the work already paid for. That led to another e-mail from Respondent this morning, in which he continued his harassing and threatening behavior telling her in the e-mail that this is going to stop;' just pay me, pay me, pay me.' He also said to Petitioner that he was really enjoying this' and that she should be logical and just pay him'." Additionally on 8/29/11 at 10:30 a.m. at Petitioner's residence, Respondent arrived with an unidentified man, both unannounced and uninvited, and they both screamed and banged on Petitioner's front door for 45 minutes, demanding money to go away.' Petitioner called 911; Respondent overheard this call from outside the residence, which led to more screaming on his part. He left with this threatening warning: We'll be back and stronger'." A third incident, not pled in the petition but testified about by the Petitioner and one of her witnesses, without objection, involved an encounter between the parties in Prospect Park on the evening of June 30, 2011 when she alleged the Respondent intruded on her picnic with friends and began "relentlessly" talking to her and them about getting paid for the work he did on her house.

At the hearing Respondent maintained the matter should be dismissed, in the first instance, for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because the parties were involved in nothing more than a business transaction and there was no evidence to support a conclusion that this was an "intimate relationship" as that term is defined in the statute.

The Petitioner maintained there was subject matter jurisdiction and the petition should not be dismissed as an "intimate relationship" was established based on their numerous, lengthy chats and e-mails and the three dates they had between January and mid-February 2010 before they entered into a business relationship.

The Family Court found that there was no intimate relationship and dismissed the petition for lack of jurisdiction. It observed that under the definition in Family Court Act, in 812.1 (e) the phrase, "members of the same family or household," includes "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time." In determining whether an "intimate relationship" exists between the parties, the Legislature set forth a dearth of factors for the courts to consider. "Leaving more precise definition to the courts, the legislature suggested factors to be considered in determining whether an intimate relationship exists including but not limited to the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between persons; and the duration of the relationship" (Lodichand v. Kogut, 30 Misc.3d 891 [Sup Ct Nassau County 2011]). However, the Legislature did exclude from the statute's protection "casual acquaintances" and "ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts." The Appellate Division, Third Department suggested that "[b]ecause the Legislature declined to include a definition of the term intimate relationship' in Section 812(1)(e) ... courts should construe the term using its usual and commonly understood meaning" (Jessica D. v. Jeremy H., 77 AD3d 87, 89-90 [3rd Dept 2010]).

Based on the evidence it was clear that the contact and communication began as just ordinary fraternization in a social context. When the parties lost interest in each other, she by "discovering [he] was crazy," and he by meeting "the girl of his dreams," the conversation changed to ordinary fraternization in a business context. The evidence was clear that in January and February 2010, the parties were prospecting for an intimate relationship and their contact over the internet focused on getting to know each other. Since it is not uncommon for people who meet over the internet to ask for a date to meet the person in a public place to see if they live up to the picture and promotion contained in their profiles and whether there is any "chemistry" between them, the Petitioner's testimony that the Respondent immediately asked her for a date on January 2, 2010 was not contrary to the conventions of online dating. There was no evidence the content of the parties' chatting and e-mailing went beyond casual conversation about each other's history and interests. The personal content revealed in their conversations was innocuous. There was no evidence of sexual undercurrents or emotional investment in their chatting or e-mailing. In these exchanges the parties did not reveal the kind of information from which it could be assumed a personal relationship existed. The flirtations revealed in these conversations were precisely what the Respondent labeled them-"just banter" between two casual people who have never met "and not the stuff of an actual true intimate relationship."The Respondent's final attempt to show that theirs was not an intimate relationship was based on the domestic incident report which the Petitioner filed on August 29, 2011 in which she identified the relationship of the victim to the perpetrator as "employee, not boyfriend, ex-boyfriend or intimate partner."

Even though the Petitioner ultimately gave the Respondent her cell phone number, there is no evidence the dialogue between them moved off the printed electronic page to a live, in-person cell phone conversation. There was no evidence the parties utilized Google Talk or Skype software with a webcam to engage in voice and video chats online. Within a few weeks the parties' flirtation fizzled without incident and their attention quickly turned from a social purpose to a business one.

Adoption - Domestic Relations Law § 110 - Standing - a Functioning Second Parent Has Standing to Adopt a Child Where Petitioner and the Child's Adoptive Father Were Not Married, Did Not Live Together, Had Never Had a Spousal Relationship, and Were Not "Unmarried Intimate Partners."

In re Adoption of a Child Whose First Name is Chan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2923194 (N.Y.Sur.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 22196 Petitioner ERJ and LMB had a romantic relationship which led them to desire to adopt a child together. ERJ was active in charitable pursuits in Cambodia, and while there located an orphaned boy, Chan, the subject of the current proceeding. At the time, the United States had a moratorium on adoption of Cambodian children, so the only way for Chan to enter the U.S. was through a humanitarian visa based on alleged medical problems. Once here, ERJ and LMB tried several schemes to have LMB adopt the child through his alleged membership in an Indian tribe, or in Trinidad and Tobago, where LMB was born, and which citizenship he re-obtained in efforts to avoid the U.S. moratorium. During this time, Chan, now called William, lived with ERJ where he was cared for by a nanny who had raised ERJ's other, biological children. LMB was a constant visitor, was acknowledged as William's father, and he and his family were very much a part of William's life. Unfortunately, the relationship between ERJ and LMB soured, and after some time she cut off LMB's contact with William. In early 2006 she petitioned this court to "re-adopt" William, based on what she stated was her earlier Cambodian adoption. LMB was not given notice, did not appear, and the adoption was granted in April 2006 in routine manner. When LMB subsequently learned of the adoption, he brought a proceeding to vacate it on the ground, inter alia, that he had validly adopted William in Cambodia, that his alleged renunciation of that adoption was invalid because it did not comply with the requirements of New York law, and that ERJ's subsequent Cambodian adoption and New York re-adoption were, therefore, void.

ERJ then took the position, contrary to her re-adoption petition, that Cambodia does not grant binding and final adoptions, but, rather, only permission to adopt in a foreign country, here, the U.S. As such, she claimed, LMB had never validly adopted William, thus entitling him to no relief. The court held a trial on Cambodian law which resulted in findings that: a) William, a Cambodian orphan, was validly adopted by LMB under Cambodian law in June 2004; b) the Cambodian adoption should be accorded comity; c) LMB was, therefore, William's legal father; and d) ERJ's adoption of William was vacated, as fatally flawed because LMB's rights were never effectively relinquished; thus, adoption by ERJ could not take place in the absence of notice to, and consent by, LMB. The decision was affirmed by the Appellate Division (Matter of Doe, 58 A.D.3d 186, 868 N.Y.S.2d 40 [1st Dept 2008]), and the Court of Appeals subsequently affirmed (14 N.Y.3d 100, 896 N.Y.S.2d 741, 923 N.E.2d 1129 [(2010)]).

Throughout this entire period LMB was steadfast in this willingness to treat and acknowledge ERJ as William's mother and to enter into a second-parent adoption with her, if permitted by law. In October 2011, the parties entered into a joint parenting agreement which recites, inter alia: "[LMB] shall consent to a second-parent adoption of William by [ERJ] ..." LMB then petitioned to re-adopt his son, William, and ERJ petitioned for a second-parent adoption with a signed consent by LMB.

The Court observed that Domestic Relations Law § 110 states in pertinent part: "An unmarried adult person or an adult husband and his adult wife together or any two unmarried intimate partners together may adopt another person." While the statutory text neither authorizes nor prohibits the adoption of a child by two unmarried individuals, in 1995 the Court of Appeals settled the question of whether unmarried couples are barred under all circumstances from adopting under the statute, holding that an unmarried partner of a biological parent has standing to adopt the child they are raising together (Matter of Jacob, 86 N.Y.2d 651 [1995]). In so holding, the Court advised that while the language of New York's adoption statute must be strictly construed, it must also be interpreted in accordance with the statute's legislative purpose: to effect the best interests of the child. Subsequent cases, relying upon the Court of Appeals' analysis in Matter of Jacob, have interpreted § 110 in a manner that further expands the class of persons who may adopt. While the standing of an unmarried couple to file a joint petition to adopt a child biologically unrelated to either party was not before the Court of Appeals, New York courts have since conferred standing upon unmarried joint petitioners without any biological tie to the child (Matter of Carolyn B., 6 A.D.3d 67, 774 N.Y.S.2d 227 [4th Dept 2004]; Matter of Carl, 184 Misc.2d 646, 709 N.Y.S.2d 905 [Fam Ct Queens County 2000]; Matter of Joseph, 179 Misc.2d 485, 684 N.Y.S.2d 760 [Sur Ct Oneida County 1998]), as well as upon joint petitioners with a remote biological tie (Matter of Emilio, 293 A.D.2d 27, 742 N.Y.S.2d 22 [1st Dept 2002]). And, in 2010, the legislature amended § 110 to specifically include "unmarried adult intimate partners" "to both codify and broaden the ability of domestic partners to undertake a joint adoption". The Court observed that under the law as it currently existed there was no question that an adult unmarried person had standing to adopt under the plain language of §110. Furthermore, there was no question that an adult partner of a child's biological parent had standing to adopt the child under the Court of Appeals' ruling in Matter of Jacob. There was also little question under Matter of Jacob and its progeny that an adult partner of a child's adoptive parent had standing to adopt . And there was no question that unmarried persons, regardless of their gender, who are "intimate partners," can adopt together. The question remained, however, whether an adult unmarried person had standing to petition to become the second parent of a previously adopted child where petitioner and the adoptive father of the child did not reside together and, in fact, have never had a spousal relationship, and are not currently "unmarried intimate partners."

The Court held, among other things, that the limited issue of petitioner's standing could be determined based on the plain language of the statute with the only inquiry whether petitioner is an unmarried adult. It noted that as stated in Matter of Jacob: "Domestic Relations Law § 110, entitled Who May Adopt,' provides that an adult unmarried person or an adult husband and his adult wife together may adopt another person'.... Under this language, both appellant G.M. in Matter of Dana and appellant Stephen T.K. in Matter of Jacob, as adult unmarried persons, have standing to adopt and appellants are correct that the Court's analysis of section 110 could appropriately end here" (86 N.Y.2d at 660, 636 N.Y.S.2d 716, 660 N.E.2d 397).

The court indicated that once standing is found to exist, courts are still bound to make a further determination as to whether adoption will serve a child's best interest. It may be that in some cases, a court's best interest analysis will lead it to conclude that adoption by a petitioner who does not live with the child and is not romantically involved with the child's legal parent will not serve her or his best interest, even as adoption by a married couple might not. That such a conclusion may ultimately be reached by a given court in a given case does not, however, affect the analysis of whether standing exists in the first instance. Based upon the same considerations identified by the Court of Appeals in Matter of Jacob, this court concluded that, as a "functional parent," ERJ had standing under § 110 to seek to adopt William. This holding had also been implicitly approved by Court of Appeals' apparently favorable notice that, with regard to William's best interest, "LMB is still willing to agree to a second-parent adoption by ERJ" (Matter of Doe, 14 N.Y.3d at 111, 896 N.Y.S.2d 741, 923 N.E.2d 1129).

Unjust Enrichment - Elements of Cause of Action - Court of Appeals Holds Pleadings must Indicate Relationship Between Parties That Could Have Caused Reliance or Inducement.

In Georgia Malone & Co., Inc. v. Rieder, --- N.Y. 3d ----, 2012 WL 2428246 (N.Y.) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Graffeo, set forth the current elements to establish a cause of action for "unjust enrichment". In an opinion by Judge Graffeo, the Court observed that " '[t]he theory of unjust enrichment lies as a quasi-contract claim' " and contemplates "an obligation imposed by equity to prevent injustice, in the absence of an actual agreement between the parties" (citing IDT Corp. v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co., 12 N.Y.3d 132, 142 [2009], quoting Goldman v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 5 N.Y.3d 561, 572 [2005]). An unjust enrichment claim is rooted in "the equitable principle that a person shall not be allowed to enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another". Thus, in order to adequately plead such a claim, the plaintiff must allege "that (1) the other party was enriched, (2) at that party's expense, and (3) that it is against equity and good conscience to permit the other party to retain what is sought to be recovered" (citing Mandarin Trading Ltd. v. Wildenstein, 16 N.Y.3d 173, 182 [2011]).

Judge Graffeo noted that in Sperry v. Crompton Corp. (8 N.Y.3d 204 [2007]), the Court held that a plaintiff cannot succeed on an unjust enrichment claim unless it has a sufficiently close relationship with the other party. In that case the Court held that, while "a plaintiff need not be in privity with the defendant to state a claim for unjust enrichment," there must exist a relationship or connection between the parties that is not "too attenuated" . More recently, the Court elaborated on the pleading requirements for unjust enrichment in Mandarin, (16 N.Y.3d at 177), where, reaffirming Sperry, the Court held that although the plaintiff was not required to allege privity, it had to assert a connection between the parties that was not too attenuated. It concluded in that case that "under the facts alleged, there are no indicia of an enrichment that was unjust where the pleadings failed to indicate a relationship between the parties that could have caused reliance or inducement." Judge Graffeo pointed out that the Court's mention of awareness in Mandarin was intended to underscore the complete lack of a relationship between the parties in that case. Thus, the pleadings must indicate a relationship between the parties that could have caused reliance or inducement.

Chief Judge Lippman dissented, in an opinion in which Judge Pigott concurred. He pointed out that the majority now required plaintiffs pleading unjust enrichment to have a "sufficient relationship" with defendant, involving "dealings with each other" . He stated that requiring a relationship of mutual dealing where the plaintiff confers a benefit on the unjustly enriched party treads too close to requiring privity, which the Court expressly disclaimed in Sperry and Mandarin Trading, and that those holdings never required that there be direct contact or a close relationship between the parties.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Maintenance - Award - Factors Considered - Equitable Distribution - Factors Considered - (13) Any Transfer or Encumbrance Made in Contemplation of a Matrimonial Action Without Fair Consideration-

Defendant Should Have Been Charged with Marital Waste Based upon to Agree to File Joint Income Tax Returns - Required Life Insurance Should Be Declining Term.

In Leavitt v Leavitt, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2580397 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, among other things, awarded the wife maintenance of $7,500 per month until the date of the sale of the marital residence and $15,000 per month for a period of 10 years thereafter, awarded her retroactive maintenance from the date of the commencement of the action of $92,177.42, equally distributed the plaintiff's stock, stock options, and interests in two limited partnerships, directed the plaintiff to secure his maintenance obligation by maintaining a life insurance policy with a death benefit in the amount of $1,800,000, held that the defendant would not be charged with marital waste of $73,500, and denied her request for an award of an attorney's fee.

The Appellate Division observed that in determining the amount and duration of an award of maintenance, the court "must consider the factors enumerated in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(6)(a) , which include the predivorce standard of living of the parties, the income and property of the parties, the equitable distribution of marital property, the duration of the marriage, the present and future earning capacity of the parties, the ability of the party seeking maintenance to be self-supporting, and the reduced or lost earning capacity of the party seeking maintenance. Considering the relevant factors, including the long duration of the marriage, the extended absence of the defendant former wife from the work force, and the parties' predivorce standard of living, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant maintenance of $7,500 per month until the date of the sale of the marital residence, and $15,000 per month for a period of 10 years thereafter. However, the Supreme Court incorrectly calculated retroactive maintenance from the date of the commencement of the action, as it was the former husband who commenced the action. It observed that a party's maintenance obligation commences, and is retroactive to, the date an application for maintenance was first made (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][a]). In addition, the court erred by failing to credit the plaintiff for voluntary maintenance payments he made during the pendency of the action. Consequently, the matter had to be remitted for further proceedings, including a hearing if warranted, to calculate the amount of retroactive maintenance from the date of the defendant's first application for maintenance, and to credit the plaintiff for any amount of temporary maintenance already paid

The Appellate Division agreed with the plaintiff that the life insurance policy he was required to maintain to secure his maintenance obligation may be a declining term policy that would permit him to reduce the amount of coverage by the amount of support actually paid. Additionally, it found that the Supreme Court should have charged the defendant with marital waste in the sum of $73,500, representing the amount of additional income tax the plaintiff was required to pay based upon the defendant's failure, as of the time of trial, to agree to file joint income tax returns for 2009 (citing cf. Teich v. Teich, 240 A.D.2d 258; Bursztyn v. Bursztyn, 379 NJ Super 385, 397-398).

Equitable Distribution - Property Determination - Personal Injury Recovery - Award for Pain and Suffering Transmuted into Marital Property by Deposit into Joint Account.

In Harris v Harris, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2580405 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married on January 11, 1987, and had two children, born October 26, 1990, and May 18, 1993, respectively. The action for divorce was commenced on September 4, 2007. In a pendente lite order dated June 24, 2008, the Supreme Court directed the plaintiff to pay the monthly carrying charges on the marital residence consisting, inter alia, of mortgage payments. The judgment appealed from directed the plaintiff to pay $436.19 per week in child support computed pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act, plus 63.41% of future unreimbursed health care expenses, and 65% of certain educational expenses, commencing January 1, 2010. That judgment also directed the plaintiff to continue to pay carrying charges on the marital residence occupied by the defendant and the children until entry of the judgment of divorce, and directed the plaintiff to pay the defendant maintenance of $1,000 per month for two years after entry of the judgment of divorce, and $500 per month in the third year following entry of the judgment of divorce. The judgment of divorce was entered on January 11, 2011. Therefore, because of the delay in entering the judgment of divorce, the plaintiff's obligation to pay child support pursuant to that judgment, in addition to obligations pursuant to the pendente lite order, were continued for one year beyond the entry of the judgment.

Both parties acknowledged on appeal that the award of basic child support was excessive. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improperly included the children's social security benefits in computing the plaintiff's income (Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d 605). It also held that Supreme Court's directive that the plaintiff pay child support pursuant to the CSSA and the mortgage on the marital residence for the same period of time erroneously granted the children a double shelter allowance. Further, in calculating the plaintiff's child support obligation, which commenced on January 1, 2010, the Supreme Court deducted maintenance from the plaintiff's income notwithstanding that the plaintiff's obligation to pay maintenance only commenced on January 11, 2011, when the judgment of divorce was entered. Since the court erroneously deducted maintenance from the plaintiff's income in determining child support commencing January 1, 2010, it appeared that the court contemplated that the judgment would be entered, and the maintenance obligation would commence, shortly after January 1, 2010. The one-year delay in entering the judgment, until January 11, 2011, extended the plaintiff's support obligations for an additional year. In view of the foregoing, the plaintiff's obligation to pay maintenance for three years should have commenced on January 1, 2010, and his obligations pursuant to the pendente lite order should have terminated on January 1, 2010.

The Appellate Division held that basic child support pursuant to the CSSA had to be recalculated. The plaintiff's pro rata share of unreimbursed health care expenses also had to be recalculated, since it was directly connected to the basic child support calculation and based upon the plaintiff's share of combined parental income (see Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][5]). Therefore, it remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, for new determinations of basic child support pursuant to the CSSA and the plaintiff's pro rata share of unreimbursed health care expenses.

The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the provisions of the judgment directing the plaintiff to pay 65% of certain educational expenses of the children was a provident exercise of discretion. Considering the long-term marriage of the parties, the predivorce standard of living, the present and future earnings capacities of the parties, and the ability of the defendant to become self-supporting the award of maintenance was proper. However, the Supreme Court should have directed that, in the event that either party dies or the defendant remarries during the period when the plaintiff was obligated to pay maintenance, that obligation would terminate.

The Appellate Division observed that an issue at the nonjury trial was whether the plaintiff's award for pain and suffering, which he received during the marriage in a personal injury action, constituted marital property. The judgment appealed from awarded the defendant the sum of $63,436.49, representing 25% of the funds remaining from that award maintained in a jointly held account. At the time the plaintiff received the award for personal injuries, that award constituted separate property. However, the plaintiff deposited that separate property into a jointly held investment account, creating a presumption that those funds constituted marital property. Although that presumption is rebuttable, and a depositor may create a joint account with the right of survivorship "without necessarily transferring a present beneficial interest in the funds in the account" (Wacikowski v. Wacikowski, 93 A.D.2d 885, 885), here, the plaintiff used money in the account to pay marital expenses. Thus, those funds did not retain their character as separate property. The weight of the credible evidence adduced at trial supported the Supreme Court's conclusion that the plaintiff failed to rebut the presumption that the subject funds were marital property. The award to the wife of counsel fees of $15,000 was affirmed.

Equitable Distribution - Property Determination - Appreciation of Separate Property - Failure of Proof - Counsel Fee Award - Claim Without Merit Where No Formal Application Made and No Supporting Documentation Submitted.

In DiNoto v DiNoto, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2580416 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff wife appealed from that part of a divorce judgment which failed to direct that her name be placed on the deed for, and grant her equal use of the parties' condominium unit in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, awarded her only one-third of the net proceeds from any sale of marital real property located in Whitestone, Queens, and failed to award her an attorney's fee.

The Appellate Division observed that where the determination as to equitable distribution has been made after a nonjury trial, the trial court's assessment of the credibility of witnesses is afforded great weight on appeal. Here, the trial court providently exercised its discretion in drawing unfavorable inferences from the plaintiff's testimony. In particular, the court correctly determined that the plaintiff's testimony was substantially unworthy of belief. The trial court also properly determined that the plaintiff was not entitled to share in the appreciation in value of the former marital residence, which was the defendant's separate property. Appreciation in the value of separate property is considered separate property, except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse. (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][1][d][3]). Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that she made either direct financial or any nonfinancial contributions to this property such that the appreciated value was subject to equitable distribution. Inasmuch as the court concluded that the plaintiff was responsible for causing damage to the former marital residence, the court providently exercised its discretion by awarding her only one-third of the net proceeds from any sale of marital real property located in Whitestone, Queens, rather than one-half of the net proceeds from the sale.

The Appellate Division held that the trial court properly determined that a condominium unit located in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, was marital property, and that the parties were to share equally in either the financial loss or gain realized upon the sale or transfer of the property. Accordingly, the judgment was modified to direct that the plaintiff's name be placed on the deed to that property as a tenant in common with the defendant.

The plaintiff's claim that the court should have awarded her an attorney's fee was without merit, "since she never made a formal application for such an award, and submitted no supporting documentation regarding the legal services rendered.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Home State - Foreign Country - Domestic Relations Law §§ 75-d, 76 [1][a] and 75-a[7] - New York Not Home State of Child

In Matter of Malik v Fhara, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2580303 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which dismissed the father's custody petition for lack of jurisdiction. The child was born in New York on November 20, 2007. The father stated that the mother brought the child to Bangladesh on May 7, 2008. The father filed a custody petition dated December 30, 2008. The father's petition for custody was dismissed on the ground that New York lacked jurisdiction.

The Appellate Division observed that under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act specific and limited grounds are set forth to establish initial child custody jurisdiction, including, inter alia, that "this state is the home state of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or was the home state of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from this state but a parent or person acting as a parent continues to live in this state" (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a]). The home state of the child is "the state in which a child lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding" (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a[7]). For purposes of the Act, a court must treat a foreign country as if it were a state of the United States (Domestic Relations Law § 75-d).

The Appellate Division held that Family Court properly determined that New York was not the child's home state since, as the father conceded, the child did not live in New York for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of this child custody proceeding, and New York was not the home state of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a]).

Child Support - Modification - Downward - Law of the Case - Court of Coordinate Jurisdiction Has No Authority to Rule on Matter Already Reviewed by Another Judge of Equal Authority

In Grossman v Composto-Longhi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2401852 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) pursuant to the parties' stipulation of settlement dated April 22, 2005, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce entered August 16, 2005, the plaintiff agreed to pay child support to the defendant of $3,000 per month. In an order dated September 29, 2008, the Family Court granted the defendant's petition for an upward modification and increased the plaintiff's child support obligation to $4,340 per month. The plaintiff moved for a downward modification of his child support obligation in the Supreme Court, Suffolk County. In an order dated July 20, 2009, the Supreme Court, after a hearing, granted the plaintiff's motion for a downward modification of his child support obligation. Thereafter, in an order dated April 8, 2010, the Supreme Court granted those branches of the plaintiff's motion which were to transfer a proceeding entitled Matter of Composti-Longhi v. Grossman, which was pending in Family Court, Suffolk County, under Docket No. F-06377-08, to the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, and to vacate orders of the Family Court dated September 29, 2008, and April 10, 2009, respectively, granting the defendant a retroactive increase in child support. Additionally, in an order dated May 11, 2010, the Supreme Court denied the defendant's motion, inter alia, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 to impose sanctions upon the plaintiff and his counsel.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly exercised its concurrent jurisdiction with the Family Court (N.Y. Const, art VI, s 7[a]) in entertaining the plaintiff's motion for a downward modification of his child support obligation. The plaintiff demonstrated his entitlement to a downward modification of his child support obligation. A party seeking downward modification of a support obligation has the burden of showing a substantial change in circumstances and that he used his best efforts to obtain employment commensurate with his qualifications and experience. The plaintiff showed that his prior employment was terminated through no fault of his own and that, despite his efforts to secure employment commensurate with his qualifications and experience, he was only able to obtain a position at a much lower salary.

However, it held that the Supreme Court should not have granted plaintiff's motion to vacate orders of the Family Court, Suffolk County, dated September 29, 2008, and April 10, 2009, granting the defendant a retroactive increase in child support. A court of coordinate jurisdiction has no authority to rule on a matter already reviewed by another Judge of equal authority. Supreme Court had no discretion to reduce or cancel arrears of child support which accrue before an application for downward modification of the child support obligation.

Child Custody - Visitation - Grandparent Visitation - Domestic Relations Law § 72 - Hearing Not Necessary to Determine Standing Where Order of Protection in Effect.

In Chifrine v. Bekker,--- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 2580315 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the petitioners were the grandmother and step-grandfather of the child, who was born in December 2001, and the respondents were his parents. The petitioners had a close and loving relationship with the child until December 2007, when the grandmother and the mother got into an altercation and the grandmother stabbed the mother with a knife. The mother filed a criminal complaint and the matter was resolved when the grandmother pleaded guilty to disorderly conduct. The mother also filed a family offense petition against both grandparents and requested, and was granted, several orders of protection against the grandmother, prohibiting her from contacting either the mother or the child from December 2007 to December 2010. On April 18, 2008, the grandparents separately petitioned for visitation. Family Court granted a motion to dismiss on the basis of lack of standing, and dismissed the petitions without a hearing.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that petitioner Maxim Chifrine was not the biological grandfather of the child, and he was not a legal grandfather by virtue of adoption. He was, therefore, not the child's grandparent within the meaning of Domestic Relations Law § 72, which governs the standing of grandparents to seek visitation, and had no right thereunder to visitation. The Family Court also properly determined that the petitioner Irina Chifrine lacked standing to seek visitation with the subject child. In considering whether a grandparent is entitled to visitation under Domestic Relations Law § 72 where both parents are alive, the Family Court must determine, first, whether equitable circumstances exist which provide the grandparent with standing and, if such circumstances exist, whether visitation would be in the grandchild's best interest. Under the particular circumstances of this case, a hearing was not necessary to determine that the grandmother lacked the requisite standing.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Continuing Jurisdiction - Inconvenient Forum - Domestic Relations Law §§ 76-a[3], 76-f - New York Has Continuing Jurisdiction to Modify its Own Orders until Connections with New York Cease.

In Matter of Belcher v Lawrence, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2579533 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of a son (born in 1999) and a daughter (born in 2001). Pursuant to a 2005 New Hampshire judgment of divorce, they were awarded joint legal custody of the children with primary physical custody to the mother and liberal visitation to the father. The father thereafter relocated to New York. In 2006, he commenced a proceeding to modify the New Hampshire custody order. The mother, who did not reside in New York, appeared and was represented by counsel. By order entered in 2007, Family Court granted the father sole legal and physical custody of the son and set visitation between the parents and the children. The mother subsequently relocated with the daughter to Virginia, where she has since resided. In August 2011, the father commenced a proceeding seeking sole custody of the daughter on the ground that the mother's husband had neglected her and subjected her to repeated acts of physical abuse. The petition also alleged that the mother's husband had physically abused the son during a recent visit, and sought to modify the prior order by requiring that visitation between the son and the mother occur outside the presence of the mother's husband. Family Court placed the daughter in the temporary custody of the father, and the mother moved to dismiss the petition for lack of jurisdiction with regard to the daughter. Family Court found that it lacked jurisdiction to make a child custody determination with respect to the daughter and that, although it had exclusive continuing jurisdiction to determine issues of custody and visitation with regard to the son, New York was "the least convenient forum" to address those claims. Accordingly, Family Court dismissed the petition.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-a, a court of this state that has made a child custody determination maintains exclusive continuing jurisdiction over that determination until certain circumstances exist divesting the court of such jurisdiction. Family Court erroneously found that, because its prior order addressed custody only with respect to the son, the court did not have continuing exclusive jurisdiction as to the issue of custody of the daughter. "Child custody determination" is defined, however, as "a judgment, decree, or other order of a court providing for the legal custody, physical custody, or visitation with respect to a child" (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [3]). Thus, as the 2007 order addressed visitation with respect to the daughter, it constituted a prior "[c]hild custody determination" over which Family Court maintained continuing jurisdiction (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [3]). As Family Court had continuing exclusive jurisdiction over custody matters involving the daughter, that jurisdiction continued until it is determined, as relevant here, that "neither the child [nor] the child and one parent ... have a significant connection with this state and that substantial evidence is no longer available in this state concerning the child's care, protection, training, and personal relationships" (Domestic Relations Law § 76-a [1][a]). Although Family Court never reached this issue in light of its finding that the 2007 order did not constitute a child custody determination with respect to the daughter, the parties fully argued and briefed it before Family Court and, upon its independent review, the Appellate Division found that Family Court retained jurisdiction over the proceeding.

The father had lived continuously in New York since 2005. This state was also the home of the daughter's brother, who had resided here for the past seven years. The daughter visited with the father and her brother several times each year in New York, including summer vacations and various holidays. Moreover, in the prior custody proceeding, New York exercised jurisdiction over the daughter, an attorney for the child was appointed to represent her and, following a fact-finding hearing, Family Court made decisions about her best interests. Thus, the daughter continued to have a significant connection to New York. Although the events that form the basis of the petition occurred in Virginia, it found that that substantial evidence pertaining to those events, as well as the ultimate issue of custody, lie within this state. The allegations in the petition centered mainly around the alleged abuse and mistreatment of the daughter, who was currently residing in this state albeit on a temporary basis. The son allegedly witnessed the abuse committed upon the daughter and was himself the victim of abuse and neglect. The father witnessed the bruising and other injuries suffered by the daughter, and possessed evidence regarding a conversation he had with the mother following the incident in which she purportedly stated that the physical abuse was "no big deal and well deserved." All of these individuals were present in New York and could provide significant evidence relevant to the determination at issue. Moreover, evidence regarding what custodial arrangement would serve the daughter's best interests was equally present in New York and, given that Family Court presided over the most recent custody proceeding involving these children, it was the New York courts, not those of Virginia, that possessed pertinent information regarding the parties' past circumstances. Applying the "flexible approach" of Domestic Relations Law § 76-a (1)(a) to the facts of this case the record supported the conclusion that the daughter continued to have a significant connection to New York and that substantial evidence existed in this state regarding her care, protection, training and personal relationships .

The Court rejected the mother's contention that the petition should be dismissed on the ground that New York was an inconvenient forum (Domestic Relations Law §76-f). It noted that this case involved allegations that the children were subject to violence, mistreatment and abuse by the mother's husband. Much of the evidence underlying the allegations of the petition, particularly the testimony of the children, was located in New York and, to the extent that such proof or evidence relating to the best interests of the daughter was available in Virginia, this evidence may be submitted by way of depositions or testimony "by telephone, audiovisual means, or other electronic means" (Domestic Relations Law § 75-j [2]). In addition, having heard the previous custody matter involving these children, the New York Family Court had the ability to expeditiously resolve this matter and was far more familiar with the case than the Virginia courts.

Inasmuch as it was undisputed that Family Court had jurisdiction to modify its 2007 custody order with respect to the son, as he had continuously lived in New York since 2005, and given that the issue of custody of the daughter, which involved the same allegations underlying the request for a modification of the son's visitation, would be litigated in New York, it found that this state was the more appropriate and convenient forum to address issues of visitation with respect to the son.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Appeals - Inadequate Record on Appeal - Effect upon Determination - Counsel Fee Reversed Where Trial Court Failed to State its Reasons.

In Andress v Andress, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2626965 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) defendant appealed from an order in this post-matrimonial proceeding that, inter alia, directed him to pay plaintiff's counsel fees. The Appellate Division agreed with defendant that the court abused its discretion in granting that part of plaintiff's motion seeking an award of counsel fees. While plaintiff asserted in support of her motion that she incurred counsel fees solely because of defendant's failure to disclose his remarriage, the record established that, even had he disclosed that information, the contested issues regarding maintenance would have nevertheless required litigation. The record was silent regarding the court's rationale for awarding plaintiff counsel fees, and the court was unable to determine whether the court considered 'appropriate factors' in granting" that part of plaintiff's motion (citing Carnicelli, 300 A.D.2d 1093 (2002) . Therefore, it concluded on the record before it that the award was not appropriate.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act § 812 - Harassment Not Established Where Petitioner Failed to Establish Conduct Had "No Legitimate Purpose".

In Matter of Marquardt v Marquardt, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2626949 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Family Court concluded that respondent committed a family offense by engaging in acts that would constitute either first or second degree harassment "by cutting open [her] pills on the counter, knowing that the Petitioner has allergies" to medications. The Appellate Division reversed finding that the evidence was not legally sufficient to establish that she committed a family offense. Although harassment in the first or second degree is a family offense it held that petitioner failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that respondent engaged in acts constituting either offense. To establish that respondent committed acts constituting harassment in the second degree, petitioner was required to establish that respondent engaged in conduct that was intended to harass, annoy or alarm petitioner, that petitioner was alarmed or seriously annoyed by the conduct, and that the conduct served no legitimate purpose (Penal Law 240.26[3]). Assuming, arguendo, that petitioner was alarmed or seriously annoyed by the conduct of respondent in opening her medicine to eat it with pudding based on her inability to swallow the pills, and further assuming, arguendo, that respondent thereby intended to harass, annoy or alarm him, the Appellate Division concluded that petitioner failed to establish that the conduct served no legitimate purpose. Petitioner testified that respondent took the medication as prescribed to prevent acid reflux, and that respondent opened the pills and ate the medication with food because she was unable to swallow the pills. With respect to petitioner's allegation that he was allergic to certain medications, he failed to establish that he was allergic to the particular medication taken by respondent, or to introduce any expert evidence in support of his testimony that the medication was "a poison, a toxic poison that causes death."

Similarly, petitioner failed to establish that respondent's acts constituted harassment in the first degree. That statute requires, inter alia, that the perpetrator commit "acts which place [another person] in reasonable fear of physical injury" (Penal Law 240.25). Even assuming, arguendo, that petitioner was in fear of physical injury when respondent opened her medication, the Court concluded for the reasons set forth above that he failed to establish that his fear was reasonable.

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Where Family Court Lacks Jurisdiction Ab Initio All Orders Entered Must Be Vacated.

In Matter of Allen v Fiedler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2478244 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the child's parents were both deceased. From the child's birth until her mother's death in August 2008, the child resided with the mother. After the mother's death, petitioner, the child's maternal aunt, and the father filed petitions seeking custody of the child. Family Court issued an order awarding custody to the father and visitation to petitioner. Thereafter, the father's health began to deteriorate. In October 2009, the father designated respondent, a family friend, as standby guardian of the child in the event of the father's physical or mental incapacitation or death and, in January 2010, the father executed a last will and testament naming respondent as the child's guardian.

In March 2010, the child began residing with respondent as a result of the father's declining health. In May 2010, Surrogate's Court granted letters of guardianship to respondent, appointing her guardian of the child. The letters of guardianship "authorize and empower [respondent] ... to perform all acts requisite to the proper administration and disposition of the person ... of the [child] in accordance with the decree and the laws of New York State." The father passed away in August 2010. Petitioner then commenced a proceeding in Family Court seeking to "modify" the prior custody order on the ground that the father's death constituted a change of circumstances. The parties entered into a stipulation transferring custody of the child to petitioner, and entitling respondent to one week of visitation with the child each year and telephone contact twice per month. After Family Court entered the modification order based upon that stipulation, respondent moved to vacate the stipulation and modification order on the grounds of duress, unconscionability, ineffective assistance of counsel, and the best interests of the child and to transfer the matter to Surrogate's Court because that court had previously appointed her as the child's guardian. Family Court denied respondent's motion.

The Appellate Division reversed holding that the proceeding had to be dismissed because Family Court lacked jurisdiction ab initio and all orders entered therein had to be vacated. The Appellate Division observed that both Family Court and Surrogate's Court are courts of limited jurisdiction, with concurrent jurisdiction in certain areas and exclusive jurisdiction in other areas. Neither court is superior to the other and neither court's orders take priority over the other's. Family Court and Surrogate's Court share concurrent jurisdiction over the guardianship of minors, although only Surrogate's Court can appoint a guardian of both the person and the property of the child (SCPA 1701; Family Ct Act 661). Where courts have concurrent jurisdiction, the law demands that their orders do not conflict. It is well established that when two courts have concurrent subject matter jurisdiction, once one has exercised jurisdiction in the matter, it should not be entertained by the other. In October 2009, the father, the child's only living parent and legal custodian, commenced proceedings in Surrogate's Court to designate respondent as the child's standby guardian in the event of his physical incapacitation or death. SCPA

103(24) defines "[g]uardian" as "[a]ny person to whom letters of guardianship have been issued by a court of this state, pursuant to this act, the family court act or article 81 of the mental hygiene law." "[L]etters granted by the [Surrogate] are conclusive evidence of the authority of the persons to whom they are granted until the decree granting them is reversed or modified upon appeal or the letters are suspended, modified or revoked by the [Surrogate] granting them" (SCPA 703[1]). Thus, once Surrogate's Court issued letters of guardianship to respondent in May 2010, she became the child's legal guardian.

Five months after the issuance of the letters of guardianship, petitioner commenced this custody proceeding. While guardianship and custody are separate concepts, custody decrees and those appointing a legal guardian of the person create the same sort of relationship between the child and the person to whose care he or she is awarded.. In amending the provisions of the Family Court Act and the SCPA in 2008 concerning the legal powers of custodians and guardians of children, the Legislature stated that "there is no substantive difference between the rights and responsibilities of a custodian or guardian of a child" . Thus, the general rule is that guardianship of the person of an infant implies the custody and control of the person of an infant .

The Appellate Division concluded that Family Court erred in ignoring the letters of guardianship and the prior decree of Surrogate's Court, and in entertaining the petition inasmuch as Family Court lacked jurisdiction from the outset. Nothing in the Family Court Act permits Family Court to amend or supersede an order of Surrogate's Court, which is in essence what Family Court did when it awarded custody of the child to petitioner despite the letters of guardianship appointing respondent as the child's guardian. SCPA 701(3) specifically provides that "[n]o court except the court which issues letters [of guardianship] shall have power to suspend, modify or revoke them, so long as the court issuing them has jurisdiction of the estate or matter in which the letters were issued." Family Court therefore lacked authority to act as it did, by in effect revoking the letters of guardianship granted to respondent.

The Court noted that that, aside from general principles of comity and the first-in-time rule, Surrogate's Court was the proper forum in which to determine the custody and guardianship of the child in light of the father's designation of respondent as the child's guardian in his will (SCPA 1701). A court "cannot disregard the testamentary provisions for guardianship, unless the welfare of the child demands it (Matter of Lewis's Will, 74 N.Y.S.2d 865, 867; see Matter of Sapanara, 89 Misc.2d 956, 960). Although the father's will had not been submitted to probate prior to commencement of the proceeding, the will was subsequently filed with Surrogate's Court and a probate petition was pending when respondent moved to vacate the modification order.

Supreme Court

Equitable Distribution - Maintenance - Property Distribution - Removal of Barriers to Remarriage - Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5][h] - Husband to Forfeit Maintenance and Equitable Distribution If He Doesn't Remove Barriers to Remarriage.

In Mojdeh M. v. Jamshid A., 2012 WL 2732169 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51236(U), Unreported Disposition, the parties were married on October 21, 1996 in a religious ceremony. The husband was 56 years of age and the wife was 41 years of age. The wife was granted a divorce on the grounds of constructive abandonment and the wife was awarded custody of the parties' child. The Supreme Court, in a very lengthy decision, made awards of maintenance to the unemployed husband, directed he pay child support and divided the parties marital property equitably, but denied the parties requests for counsel fees.

At trial the wife testified that since the date she commenced the action, on December 27, 2007, she repeatedly asked the husband, both in person and by email, to accompany her to a mosque to obtain a religious divorce. The wife averred that in accordance with the parties' religious practices in the Islamic faith, the husband had to accompany the wife to a mosque where "...there is a gentleman or lady that will read some part of the Koran that we are divorced. So it's going to be transported to [her] birth certificate" thereby officially divorcing the parties. The wife testified that this is the only way the parties can obtain a religious divorce. The wife also testified that in the Islamic faith until her birth certificate reflects her religious divorce, she would be unable to remarry. She testified that she located a mosque located near both parties in an effort to make it as convenient as possible. Despite these efforts and the wife's repeated requests, the husband had not participated in this process. He simply stated "no comment. I have to talk to my lawyer". Thereafter, the husband conceded that he had still not accompanied the wife to a mosque. There was no testimony by the husband to explain his refusal to participate in this process. In addition to the wife being unable to remarry if she did not obtain a religious divorce she averred that if she were to travel to Iran, the husband could legally withhold his permission for her to leave Iran indefinitely. The wife asserted that she would have no remedy; a civil judgment of divorce would bear no impact in this situation.

The credible testimony by the wife led the court to find that the husband's refusal to give the wife a religious divorce, thereby removing barriers to her remarriage, was a basis to exercise its discretion under Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5][h] to disproportionately distribute marital assets. It directed that the husband would have 45 days from the date of the decision to take any necessary steps to remove any barriers to the wife's remarriage. In the event that the husband failed to comply, he would forfeit the maintenance and equitable distribution award.

The wife also testified that Iranian society follows a practice of signing a "mehrieh" which is an amount of money paid or a gift given to the bride from the groom. The couple negotiates, agrees and signs the mehrieh which is a written marital contract. The wife testified that if this agreement is not signed by both parties at the time of the marriage ceremony, the religious ceremony does not take place. During the preparations the bride is to propose an amount to the groom to pay. In this case, the wife proposed that the husband pay to her 1,348 Iranian gold coins which are called Bahar Azadi. The wife testified that the Bahar Azadi are full gold coins that are sealed by a bank. She testified that she chose 1,348 gold coins based on the year she was born in her calendar. The husband rejected the wife's proposal and counter offered the amount of 1,000 coins. When the wife asked the husband why he was decreasing her request by 348 coins, she testified that he stated that he had to agree to an amount that he could pay her. Thereafter, the parties agreed on 1,000 coins, a silver mirror, candle sticks and a Koran. The wife testified that both parties had the opportunity to read the document in its entirety before signing the mehrieh. She also testified that they each signed various portions of the mehrieh in front of the person performing the marriage ceremony, and three (3) witnesses that included the wife's father, the husband's father and the wife's uncle. The wife testified that the coin value fluctuates on a weekly basis. At the time of trial, the wife testified that a coin was valued at approximately $340.00, but that a week prior, a coin's value was approximately $380.00, according to an official Persian news channel that announces its values. The wife further testified that as part of the agreement, any time after the marriage ceremony, she may ask the husband to pay her the financial portion of the agreement. She testified that she asked the husband for the coins on two (2) occasions since the marriage.

The Court observed that the mehrieh was an agreement between the parties that was made prior to the parties' marriage. It was in writing and subscribed by both parties, but it was not acknowledged or proven in the manner required to entitle a deed to be recorded. Accordingly, due to its failure to comply with all three statutory requirements of Domestic Relation Law section 236[B][3], the court lacked the necessary jurisdiction to enforce its terms as part of this matrimonial action. Although the court could not enforce the mehrieh as a valid and enforceable matrimonial agreement, the court noted that the wife may bring a separate plenary action in civil proceeding, seeking enforcement of the mehrieh as an independent contract (citing Singer v. Singer, 261 A.D.2d 531, 690 N.Y.S.2d 621 [2 Dept., 1999]).

Agreements - Validity - Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3) - Attorneys - Disqualification of Counsel - Unexecuted Collaborative Law Agreement Which Does not comply with DRL § 236 [B][3] Not Enforceable in Matrimonial Action and Not a Basis for Disqualification.

In Mandell v Mandell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2476675 (N.Y.Sup.) the Defendant moved to disqualify Ellen Jancko-Baken, Esq. as counsel for Plaintiff based on his contention that she represented Plaintiff in a "Collaborative Law" process prior to the commencement of the action. In late October of 2011, Plaintiff contacted Defendant to notify him she had retained counsel to commence a divorce and was interested in pursuing a "Collaborative Law" process.

Supreme Court pointed out that this is a form of dispute resolution in which the parties retain counsel specially trained in collaborative law and enter into a contract to negotiate a settlement without involving the Court or a third party arbitrator. As part of the process the parties may agree to engage neutral experts to assist them, such as accountants or appraisers. One of the principal features of the process is that, if the matter is not resolved, the attorneys who represented the parties in the unsuccessful effort to collaborate upon a settlement may not represent the parties in the ensuing litigation. The theory is that pre-litigation posturing is eliminated and clients have a greater degree of influence in candid negotiations in which the clients participate directly. The prospective expense of having to hire new lawyers if the matter has to go to court will motivate the parties to continue working toward a mutually agreeable resolution. Having counsel agree to absent themselves from any future litigation makes it clear that counsel are committing themselves to the process of dispute resolution by limiting their engagement to that endeavor and counsel have an economic incentive to stick with the process.

On November 1, 2011, Ms. Jancko-Baken wrote to Defendant to advise him that the firm of Fredman Baken and Kosan had been retained by Plaintiff. Ms. Jancko-Baken's letter expressed her client's desire to resolve issues relating to the divorce using the Collaborative Law process. However, the letter also stated Plaintiff's insistence that her immediate interim financial concerns be addressed before moving forward with the process. The retainer agreement between Plaintiff and her attorneys expressly contemplated representation in settlement negotiations and representation in contested litigation. Defendant then retained counsel trained in collaborative law and signed a Collaborative Law retainer with the firm of Kramer Kozek. The retainer agreement between defendant and his counsel was entitled limited scope retainer for collaborative law. While it covered some litigation-related activities, such as the expenses of court reporters and stenographers, it specifically stated that the law firm "will not be permitted to represent you in any court-related matter against your spouse" and that the firm had no obligation to represent the defendant in any litigation or appeal.

The parties and their counsel met on November 17, 2011. Plaintiff's counsel prepared and circulated an agenda for the meeting. The Participation Agreement was not signed on November 17, 2011. Defendant conceded that he was advised prior to the start of the next meeting that Plaintiff's counsel would not sign the Participation Agreement because she wanted to reserve the option of moving for interim support if the collaborative process fell apart. Despite having knowledge of the position of Plaintiff's counsel, Defendant elected to proceed with a second meeting, on the theory that "we were clearly working within the collaborative process even without a signed Participation Agreement". The second meeting proceeded but the issue of temporary support was not resolved and the Participation Agreement was not signed. A third meeting was held with the same result. Plaintiff commenced the action for divorce on December 15, 2011.

In support of his motion to disqualify Plaintiff's counsel, Defendant argued that by attending meetings with lawyers trained in Collaborative Law and discussing matters that were to be part of the collaborative process, the parties engaged in the Collaborative Law process, notwithstanding the lack of a signed Participation Agreement. Defendant contended that the attorney for the plaintiff should be disqualified because entering into the Collaborative Law process necessitates that the lawyers retained for that purpose may not litigate the matter should the collaborative process break down. Defendant asserted that by participating in the collaborative process, Plaintiff's counsel learned confidential information and had to be disqualified.

Supreme Court denied the motion. It pointed out that the Collaborative Law process is a relatively new concept and there are few New York decisions touching on it (see H.K. v. A.K., 35 Misc.3d 1210(A) [Sup Ct Monroe County 2012] [holding that a breach of the disclosure provisions of a collaborative law agreement does not provide a new or additional basis for voiding separation agreement beyond the legal standards which generally govern the validity of marital agreements]). The Court indicated that the real issue was whether there was an agreement between the parties, enforceable by Defendant, that Plaintiff's counsel may not represent her in a contested matrimonial action between the parties. The most distinguishing feature of collaborative law is the commitment of counsel not to represent their clients in future litigation. Disqualification of a party's chosen counsel is a severe remedy which is ordered by courts only in narrow circumstances where counsel's conduct would taint the trial (see Matter of Dream Weaver Realty, Inc., 70 AD3d 941 [2d Dept 2010]). In general, disqualification is ordered only where a prior attorney-client relationship existed and the former and current representation is both adverse and substantially related or where the concerns of the advocate-witness rule are implicated (see S & S Hotel Ventures Ltd. Partnership v. 777 S.H. Corp., 69 N.Y.2d 437 [1978]). The courts are most reluctant to interfere with a party's selection of counsel: "A party's entitlement to be represented in an ongoing litigation by counsel of his or own choosing is a valued right which should not be abridged absent a clear showing on which the party seeking disqualification carries that burden that counsel's removal is warranted" (Goldstein v. Held, 52 AD3d 471, 472 [2d Dept 2008]).

Defendant argued that plaintiff and her counsel agreed to the terms of the Participation Agreement by their actions in participating in meetings with Defendant and his counsel. The Court held that since this is a matrimonial action, no agreement made before or during the marriage is enforceable within the action unless the agreement has been duly signed and acknowledged by the parties (DRL § 236, Part B, subd. 3; Matisoff v. Dobi, 90 N.Y.2d 127, 659 N.Y.S.2d 209, 681 N.E.2d 376 (1997). Courts cannot enforce provisions for alternative dispute resolution which are contained in writings executed without compliance with the formalities required by statute (citing Arabian v. Arabian, 79 AD3d 517 [1st Dept 2010] [provision for arbitration in rabbinical court unenforceable where not set forth in signed, acknowledged writing]). Nor may the courts enforce resolutions reached in mediation conducted during marriage where the resolutions are not embodied in duly signed and acknowledged writings (citing Wetherby v. Wetherby, 50 AD3d 1226 [3d Dept 2008]). Though it is true that defendant did not here seek to compel plaintiff to engage in collaborative law, he was seeking to enforce the provision in the unsigned Participation Agreement requiring plaintiff's counsel to step aside from representing plaintiff in a future contested matrimonial action. This he may not do. The Court concluded that, because the Participation Agreement was not signed and acknowledged by the parties, it was unenforceable in this matrimonial action.

Agreements - Construction - College Education Provision - Court Construes Agreement Provision Requiring Parents to Contribute According to "Their Respective Means".

In L.L. v R.L.--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2466971 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties made a provision for their children's undergraduate education in their separation agreement, requiring them to contribute according to "their respective means" if and when the children went to college. They had joint custody of their three children. They agreed that decision making would be shared "on all matters having a significant impact on the children's lives including ... education" and that they would finance the children's college education "according to their respective means at the time the child attends college, after grants and scholarships have been taken into consideration." The agreement also stated: The parents shall consult, in advance, with each other and their children concerning college education, costs, and the choice of colleges for the children, and each shall be encouraged to participate in the planning of said education. The parties shall cooperate in completing and filing any and all financial aid applications for the children in whatever manner shall maximize the children's financial entitlement.

In 2011, the parties' oldest son enrolled at Penn State University. Prior to his departure, the wife moved for an allocation of the college expenses under the agreement and other relief. The court granted a portion of the requested relief, but reserved on the question of the college expense allocation. Thereafter the couple's second son applied for college and the wife now sought an allocation of those expenses as well. The husband contended that his wife failed to consult him on the first son's college choice. He argued that he was never informed of the child's decision to enroll at Penn State until the wife sent him a bill for the tuition and other costs. He also argued that he did not have the "means" to pay what the wife requested for the child's college education. In 2012, the middle child applied to college, was accepted at Hofstra University and St. John's University, and was awarded scholarships at both schools. The expenses, as estimated by the wife, totaled $33,000 per year for the middle child.

The court found no definition of the term "means." It held that for purposes of this proceeding, the term "means" implied that the parties would permit a review of their assets and liabilities in addition to their annual income before determining their "respective" shares of the obligation. The court interpreted the term "means" to be an amount of contribution by each parent that would support the child's college education, but not unduly overburden either parent while maintaining a reasonable lifestyle. The amount of each parent's contribution would depend on their "respective" incomes, expenses, and assets. The court did not interpret the term "means" to include an obligation to borrow to finance the children's college expenses. The agreement made no provision that either party borrow money to finance their child's college education. The court found that the term "respective means" did not mandate borrowing by either party to finance their children's college education.

In 2010, the husband reported income of $51,288. In 2011, his earnings were $64,464. After paying his taxes and mandated child support, the husband had $28,478 in "spendable income" in 2010 and $40,024 in 2011. In the statement of net worth the husband had monthly expenses of approximately $2,800 per month. His annual expenses totaled $33,600. The court described his expenses as modest because he included less than $300 per month for food (including dining out) and had a meager clothing, laundry, and vacation allowance. The statement included a $400 per month retirement contribution, which seemed reasonable for a 54-year-old man. To allocate this sum to college expenses constituted a determination that college education expenses for the children were more important than retirement savings for the adult. The court declined to interpret the language of this agreement to require the husband or the wife to defer retirement savings and use the deferred resources to pay the child's college education. There was no language in this agreement that required this sacrifice by the parent. It found that the husband did not have any excess income or "means," to contribute to his oldest son's college education in 2010. His base expenses exceeded his net available income after paying taxes and child support. The circumstances changed in 2011, when his available net annual income increased to $40,024 (based on his increase in income from $51,288 in 2010 to more than $64,000 in 2011). In view of expenses of $33,600, and assuming he continued his child support contributions for all three children, he would have approximately $6,500 (net annual income of $40,023 minus the $33,600 in annual expenses) available as excess income or "means" to contribute to his children's college expenses. In considering the husband's means, the court said it could also look to more than his income. (Citing Crispino v. Crispino, 30 Misc.3d 1214A (Sup.Ct. Queens Cty. 2010) (requirement to pay college expenses depends on "actual financial resources" and not just income). However, based on the statement of net worth, there was little to add to the husband's financial picture. The court concluded that he had to contribute up to $3,500 from his 2011 income to cover out-of-pocket or other costs for his son's college education as described under the separation agreement. This amount represented more than 50% of his excess available resources for 2011 and would not require him to borrow or invade his retirement accounts.

The court noted that this analysis presumed that the husband would continue to contribute full child support for all three of his children. This amount was only for out-of-pocket college educational costs incurred by the children. In 2011, this amount was only $600, paid by the wife. This would be the only amount subject to allocation to the father in 2011. In 2012, it appeared that the husband may have comparable income to what he earned in 2011. If so, the husband had to contribute up to $3,500 to the college costs of both of his children. The only "means" the husband had was the $3,500 in available net resources, and this amount remained the same regardless of how many of his children need college assistance.

In considering the parties net available resources, the court declined to look to the income and assets of their current spouse to determine whether these resources free-up "means" of that party to pay college costs. The agreement provided that the contribution to the college expenses by the father will be based on "their respective means". There was no indication that in utilizing the term "their" in the agreement that the parents intended that the income of a future spouse would be utilized in calculating the parties's college contributions. The court reads the phrase "their respective means" to preclude the court from considering the income of any future spouse in deciding the "means" of each parent.

Although not formally before the court on motion, the parties asked the court to determine the wife's contribution to college costs as well. The Court applied the same net financial analysis of income and assets to the mother to determine her "respective means." In considering the wife's contribution, this court recognized that the child support payments are a statutory mandate for the minimal financial support of all three children and, to the extent that this court required the wife to make a college contribution, the court may be requiring the wife to invade her child support payments. In the court's view, the wife did have sufficient resources to make a contribution to her children's college education. The court determined that the wife had the means to afford $5,000 annually to help finance the cost of her children's college education. As with the husband, this amount was a cumulative total for all the children and their expenses will be totaled, but their mother's annual contribution will not exceed $5,000.

The court held that if the expenses exceeded $8,500, the combined contribution required by the terms of the agreement, the parents would only be required to contribute their respective shares. If the expenses were less than $8,500, as appeared to have been the case in 2011 when the out-of-pocket expenses totaled only $600, these costs should be shared on a pro rata basis, with the husband paying 41% of the total and the wife paying 59%.

Sanctions - 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 - Proper to Sanction Attorney and Client (An Attorney) for Deliberately Misleading Representations on Motion Concerning Material Facts with Regard to Marital Assets

In Capetola v Capetola, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2345140 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, after a hearing, imposed sanctions upon defendant Anthony A. Capetola and non-party Eliot F. Bloom, Esq., in the amount of $10,000 each to be paid to the Lawyers' Fund for Client Protection.

Defendant, a lawyer involved in his divorce proceedings, submitted an affidavit to the court that was intentionally misleading in that he stated that he opposed renting out an apartment that was a disputed marital asset because he needed to use it at times for work purposes. He failed to disclose that, at that time, he was renting the apartment to the daughter of his lawyer (Bloom) for an amount that was substantially below market rate. This deliberately misleading representation concerning marital assets was properly found to be sanctionable, as it related to material facts on a pending motion (see Weisburst v. Dreifus, 89 AD3d 536 [2011]; 22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c][3]). The court also properly found that Bloom had engaged in sanctionable conduct since he submitted the misleading affidavit, signing the certification on its back. The evidence also showed that Bloom proceeded to engage in frivolous conduct, including calling the police when plaintiff wife entered the apartment unaware that anyone might be there, and found Bloom's daughter there, and accusing plaintiff of trespass and violation of criminal laws. When plaintiff's counsel reminded Bloom that the apartment was held in plaintiff's name and that she was unaware of the secret rental arrangement, Bloom wrote letters to plaintiff's counsel that were insulting, legally incorrect, and characterized by the court as "shockingly unprofessional" and "unethical." Under the circumstances, the court properly found Bloom's conduct to be frivolous within the meaning of 22 NYCRR 130-1.1.

Child Support - Award - Direction to Pay Child's Unreimbursed Medical and Dental Expenses must Be to Pay "Reasonable" Expenses - Counsel Fee Award Proper

In Schorr v Schorr, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2299464 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Supreme Court ordered defendant to pay, inter alia, 35% of the costs of the child's unreimbursed medical and dental expenses. The Appellate Division modified the order on the law, to describe the child's unreimbursed medical and dental expenses to be paid by defendant as "reasonable," and otherwise affirmed. The Appellate Division held that the court erred in omitting the word "reasonable" from the description of the unreimbursed medical and dental expenses to be paid by defendant (citing Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][c][5][v]). It found that the court properly awarded plaintiff counsel fees upon consideration of the financial circumstances of the parties and all the circumstances of the case. Defendant had engaged in extensive motion practice, including motions that had little merit. In responding to each of defendant's motions, as well as bringing her own, plaintiff incurred counsel fees, while defendant, a trained attorney, represented himself. Defendant's contention that he was the non-monied spouse was without support in the record. It held that Supreme Court also properly ordered defendant to pay 50% of the cost of the neutral forensic expert

Custody - Relocation - Mother Permitted to Relocate to North Carolina Where She Had No Control over Where She Would Be Placed, and She Had Been the Primary Custodial Parent - Counsel and Pro Se Litigants Should Be Given Access to the Forensic Report under Same Conditions

In Sonbuchner v Sonbuchner, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2300319 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), Supreme Court awarded defendant sole custody of the child, permitted defendant to relocate with the child to Connecticut and then North Carolina, and awarded defendant child support and counsel fees. The Appellate Division vacated the awards of counsel fees and child support, and remanded the matter for a proper determination of child support. It found that the court's determination that it was in the best interests of the child to grant defendant sole custody and permission to relocate had a sound and substantial basis in the record (see Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d 727, 741 [1996]). The defendant was the child's primary caregiver, her decisions centered around the child, and she would continue to foster a relationship between plaintiff and the child of the proof and the relevant factors. The question of whether defendant should be allowed to relocate to Connecticut was essentially moot because she would be moving to North Carolina shortly. The testimony established that defendant was pursuing postgraduate medical clinical training, and had been matched with a residency program located in North Carolina; defendant had no control over where she would be placed. Although her move to North Carolina would have an impact on plaintiff's visitation, the court properly allowed defendant to relocate because she had been the primary custodial parent, was moving to ensure that she could earn a living wage to help support the child, and was prepared to ensure that plaintiff continued to have access to the child.

During the direct examination of the forensic expert, the forensic report was introduced into evidence, and plaintiff, who was proceeding pro se, had access to it before his cross-examination. On appeal, plaintiff argued that the court improperly prevented him from reviewing the report in advance of the forensic expert's direct testimony. The Appellate Division found that although the court erred in not allowing plaintiff to read the report before the expert testified, plaintiff had an opportunity when he was represented by counsel at an earlier point in the case to review the report with counsel. He also had an opportunity, long before the trial commenced, to review the report with the court-appointed social worker in the case. The plaintiff questioned the forensic expert about a number of issues that were covered in the report. Most of the expert's testimony turned on his recollection of his numerous interviews with the parties and his opinion as to the parties' parental fitness, and plaintiff had an opportunity to cross-examine him about those opinions. The court's reliance on the expert's testimony, as opposed to the report, was apparent from the fact that the court's decision cited to specific pages of that testimony. Plaintiff also was aware of the issues he had discussed during his interviews with the expert, and many of those issues were explored by plaintiff on cross-examination. The evidence about defendant's strong bond and parenting history with the child was substantial, and the court's decision on custody and relocation has ample record support. Thus, any error in not allowing plaintiff access to the report in advance was harmless, and provided no basis for reversal.

The Appellate Division reiterated, as it had previously, that counsel and pro se litigants should be given access to the forensic report under the same conditions (see Matter of Isidro A.-M. v. Mirta A., 74 AD3d 673 [2010]). Because defendant's attorney had a copy of the report, the court should have given the report to pro se plaintiff, even if the court set some limits on both parties' use, such as requiring that the report not be copied or requiring that the parties take notes from it while in the courthouse.

The Appellate Division found that the record was insufficient to determine whether the court's award of child support was unjust or inappropriate (Domestic Relations Law 240 [1-b][f]). The child support award failed to specify any dollar amounts, and simply directed plaintiff to pay "17% of his current salary based on his current pay stubs and income tax return," as well as one half of child care expenses, unreimbursed medical bills and health insurance premiums. There was no mention of the parties incomes. Thus, the court failed to follow the specific steps set forth in Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b). In addition, the court failed to abide by the direction of Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(c)(4) to determine the reasonable cost of child care expenses and separately state each party's pro rata share of those expenses. Thus, this matter was remanded for a proper determination of plaintiff's child support obligation pursuant to all applicable provisions of Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b).

The Appellate Division held that Plaintiff should not be required to pay defendant's counsel fees. Based on the parties' testimony at the time of the trial, their incomes were comparable, and defendant had not shown that plaintiff had the resources to pay her fees. The record showed that plaintiff could not continue with his own counsel and proceeded pro se at the trial.

Judge Saxe dissented in part. He believed that the custody award should be reversed and the matter remanded for a new custody trial before a different judge, based on the fundamental unfairness created by the denial of the pro se plaintiff's right to have sufficient access, before trial, to the 84-page report prepared by the court-appointed psychologist on the issue of custody.

Attorneys - Disqualification of Counsel - Waiver - Wife Waived Right to Move to Disqualify Father's Counsel Where She Brought Motion after Hearing Was Underway and She Was Aware of Possible Grounds for Disqualification Eight Months Before the Hearing.

In Matter of Aaron W. v. Shannon W.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2330260 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division the appeal, in this custody modification proceeding, brought up for review a Family Court order which denied the separate motions of the mother and the former attorney for the child to disqualify the father's counsel from representing him in this proceeding. The mother contended that the father's counsel should have been disqualified from representing the father because he also represented the children of the mother's live-in boyfriend in a separate proceeding to which neither the mother nor the father were parties. The Appellate Division observed that the disqualification of an attorney is a matter which rests within the sound discretion of the court. A party's entitlement to be represented in ongoing litigation by counsel of his or her own choosing is a valued right which should not be abridged absent a clear showing that disqualification is warranted, and the movant bears the burden on the motion. It held that Family Court properly denied the separate motions to disqualify the father's counsel. The mother brought this issue to the Family Court's attention after the hearing was already underway, even though various documents reflected that she was aware of the dual representation at least eight months before the hearing. Accordingly, the mother waived any objection to the father's dual representation. It agreed with the father and the child's current attorney that neither the mother nor the child suffered any prejudice under the specific circumstances of this case.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Marital Residence - Leasehold for Rent Controlled Apartment Constituting Former Marital Residence Is Not Property Distributable Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236(b)(1). Supreme Court Has the Authority to Decide Which Party in a Matrimonial Action Is Entitled to Possess Nondistributable Property.

In Cudar v Cudar, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2330657 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant, Frank Cudar, resided in the rent-controlled apartment commencing in 1960. In 1969 the plaintiff moved into the apartment when the parties were married. They parties resided together in the apartment until August 2004, when the defendant was required to vacate the premises by court order. A final order of protection dated February 1, 2006, required the defendant to stay away from the plaintiff until January 31, 2009. Since 2004, the plaintiff has continued to reside in the apartment and to pay the rent. In the course of the matrimonial action, but prior to the finalization of the divorce, the defendant specifically requested Supreme Court to make a determination as to which party was entitled to possession of the apartment. It concluded that, since the apartment leasehold was not a marital asset, it lacked the authority to make a determination as to the possession of the apartment. It indicated that the resolution of that issue could be made in a landlord-tenant proceeding. The parties were divorced by judgment entered on December 21, 2006. Neither the judgment of divorce, nor an oral stipulation made on the record in open court, which was incorporated into the judgment of divorce, addressed the issue of who was entitled to possession of the apartment or ownership of the apartment leasehold.

In April 2007, the defendant commenced a summary holdover proceeding against the plaintiff and her son in Civil Court to evict them from the apartment. The Appellate Division held, on an appeal, that there was no landlord-tenant relationship between the defendant and the plaintiff and, thus, the defendant was not entitled to a judgment of possession (Matter of Cudar v. O'Shea, 78 AD3d 1177).

In January 2011 the defendant moved by order to show cause in the matrimonial action for a determination that the leasehold interest in the former marital residence was his separate property, and for an award of sole possession of the apartment. The defendant asserted that the apartment was not marital property, and that the plaintiff had improperly refused to allow him to return to the apartment. The plaintiff contended that the defendant's motion with respect to the apartment was barred by the doctrines of collateral estoppel and res judicata. Supreme Court denied defendant's. It indicated that the defendant's contentions could no longer be considered and that it could not award the defendant sole possession of the apartment in light of the decision and order of the Appellate Division in the holdover proceeding.

The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Leventhal, found that the defendant's arguments were not barred by the doctrine of collateral estoppel or res judicata. He observed that for collateral estoppel to apply three criteria must be met: (1) the issue must actually have been litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment in a separate action, (2) that determination must have been essential to the judgment and (3) either the party to be precluded had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the prior proceeding or other circumstances do not justify affording him an opportunity to relitigate it. (Citing Braunstein v. Braunstein, 114 A.D.2d 46, 52-53). Res judicata serves to preclude the renewal of issues actually litigated and resolved in a prior proceeding as well as claims for different relief which arise out of the same 'factual grouping' or 'transaction,' and which should have or could have been resolved in the prior proceeding " (Braunstein v. Braunstein, 114 A.D.2d at 53). In the context of a matrimonial action, the Court of Appeals has recognized that a final judgment of divorce settles the parties' rights pertaining not only to those issues that were actually litigated, but also to those that could have been litigated (Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 NY3d 94, 100). Justice Leventhal found no merit to the Supreme Court's determination that collateral estoppel or res judicata barred the defendant's motion for an award of sole possession of the apartment. In the course of the matrimonial action, the Supreme Court expressly stated that it had no authority to decide who was to possess the apartment. The Supreme Court suggested that a determination as to the possession of the apartment would have to be made in the Housing Part of the Civil Court. Under these circumstances, since the issue of the possession of the apartment was raised by the defendant, and the Supreme Court stated that it could not decide which party was entitled to the apartment, neither collateral estoppel nor res judicata could bar the defendant's contention with respect to possession of the apartment.

The defendant contended that that the apartment leasehold should have been deemed his separate property. He argued that that since the Supreme Court stated that the apartment leasehold was not marital property, it must have determined that the apartment leasehold was his separate property. He also contended that because he resided in the rent-controlled apartment prior to the marriage, the apartment leasehold was his separate property and, therefore, could not be marital property and could not be subject to equitable distribution. The issue was whether the apartment leasehold could be defined as distributable property for purposes of equitable distribution. This issue was one of first impression for the Appellate Division, Second Department. However, other courts in the State have addressed similar situations, and the Court found those decisions instructive.

In Fedoff v. Fedoff (41 AD3d 114), the Appellate Division, First Department, stated "[w]here, as here, there is no expectation that a rental apartment will be converted into a condominium or cooperative, it is not distributable property, and therefore need not be appraised". The Court in Fedoff relied upon Pulitzer v. Pulitzer (134 A.D.2d 84), another decision of the First Department in a matrimonial action, explaining that the "cooperative apartment in Manhattan was not marital property since neither the wife nor the husband held any valuable property rights with respect to the apartment." The Court reasoned that the shares and proprietary leasehold referable to the apartment did not fit within the definition of marital property because they were not acquired by the parties during the marriage, and that the shares and leasehold did not fit within the definition of separate property because they were not acquired by the parties prior to the marriage. In S.A. v. K.F. (22 Misc.3d 1115 [A], 2009 N.Y. Slip Op 50141[U]), the Supreme Court, Kings County, also determined that equitable distribution was inapplicable to a former marital residence, a rental apartment, because the apartment was not owned by the parties. In Schwimmer v. Schwimmer (26 Misc.3d 1213[A], 2009 N.Y. Slip Op 52716[U]), the Supreme Court, New York County, denied a husband's application for an appraisal of the marital residence on the ground that there was no evidence that a conversion of the rental apartment into a cooperative apartment or condominium unit was imminent. Finally, in Cenci v. Cenci, (Supreme Court, Kings County) the husband resided in a rent-controlled apartment prior to the marriage, and the wife moved into the apartment only after the marriage. The husband was the tenant of record. The Supreme Court found that the apartment leasehold "had no value," but disagreed with the husband's contention that the wife had no rights to remain in the apartment because her name did not appear on the lease. The Supreme Court concluded that even though the apartment leasehold was not readily distributable under the equitable distribution statute, the court could determine which party should retain possession of the apartment pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 234, which permits courts to make directions concerning the possession of property. Ultimately, the Supreme Court found that the financial position of the parties and the wife's custody of the parties' son warranted the award of possession of the apartment to the wife.

Justice Leventhal observed that the crucial issue in deciding whether property is separate or marital is the date on which such property is acquired, i.e., either before or during the marriage. The term "acquired" merely means that a person gained possession. The Appellate Division held that obtaining a leasehold interest to use and occupy an apartment, regardless of when the interest is created, does not constitute an acquisition of property pursuant to the Domestic Relations Law. The Court was cognizant that rent-controlled apartments are relatively scarce in New York City and, rent-controlled tenants reap tangible benefits. However, this did not alter its determination. A leasehold interest in a rental apartment, even one subject to the rent control law, which is not expected to be converted into a form of ownership such as a cooperative, is neither marital nor separate property as defined by the Domestic Relations Law. Consequently, the apartment leasehold could not be classified as the defendant's separate property. Accordingly, the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly denied defendant's motion which sought a determination that the apartment leasehold was his separate property.

The Appellate Division also held that while the apartment leasehold was not distributable pursuant to the equitable distribution provisions of the Domestic Relations Law, the Supreme Court has the discretion to fashion an appropriate award as to the possession of property not subject to equitable distribution. Domestic Relations Law § 234, specifically permits a court in an action for a divorce to make such direction, between the parties, concerning the possession of property, as in the court's discretion justice requires having regard to the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties. As a result, the court may, under Domestic Relations Law §234, award possession of virtually every kind of property to one party or the other, even if legal title to the property cannot be similarly transferred . It concluded that Supreme Court was authorized, contrary to its averments in the record, to exercise its discretion and award possession of the apartment to either the plaintiff or the defendant . It modified the order and remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, for further proceedings on the motion for an award of sole possession of the marital residence, and a new determination pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 234.

Divorce - Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) - Irretrievable Breakdown - Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel - Neither Res Judicata Nor Collateral Estoppel Bar Action for Divorce since New York's No-fault Divorce Statute Had Not Yet Been Enacted at Time of Prior Action in 2008.

In Dayanoff v Dayanoff,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2330615 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1985. In September 2008, the plaintiff husband commenced a divorce action against the defendant wife pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(2), alleging constructive abandonment. Following the close of the plaintiff's case at a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint for failure of the plaintiff husband to make out a prima facie case. On appeal from the ensuing judgment in the defendant's favor, the Appellate Division affirmed (Dayanoff v. Dayanoff, 79 AD3d 1092). In 2011, the plaintiff commenced a divorce action pursuant to New York's no-fault divorce statute, Domestic Relations Law § 170(7), which became effective in 2010. The defendant wife moved, pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(5), to dismiss the complaint on the ground that since the 2008 divorce action had been dismissed, this action was barred by the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel. The Supreme Court denied the motion. The Appellate Division affirmed.

The Appellate Division observed that typically, res judicata, or claim preclusion, requires that once a claim is brought to a final conclusion, all other claims arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions are barred, even if based upon different theories or if seeking a different remedy. In the context of a matrimonial action, the Court of Appeals has recognized that a final judgment of divorce settles the parties' rights pertaining not only to those issues that were actually litigated, but also to those that could have been litigated. (Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 NY3d 94). Similarly, collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, precludes a party from relitigating in a subsequent action or proceeding an issue clearly raised in a prior action or proceeding and decided against that party whether or not the tribunals or causes of action are the same. The doctrine of collateral estoppel applies if the issue in the second action is identical to an issue which was raised, necessarily decided and material in the first action, and the plaintiff had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the earlier action. (Parker v. Blauvelt Volunteer Fire Co., 93 N.Y.2d 343, 349)

The Appellate Division held that the doctrine of res judicata did not bar this action, as the final judgment in the 2008 divorce action did not settle the parties' rights pertaining to the claims contained in this action (see Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 NY3d at 98), as New York's no-fault divorce statute had not yet been enacted in 2008. Similarly, as to the doctrine of collateral estoppel, the issue of no-fault divorce was not litigated in the prior divorce action, nor could it have been, as that cause of action for pursuing a divorce was not recognized under the law in 2008. Accordingly, Supreme Court properly denied defendant's motion which was to dismiss the complaint pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(5).

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Order of the Family Court May Be Enforced or Modified in That County or in the Family Court in Any Other County in Which the Party Affected by the Order Resides or Is Found

In Winter v. Karins, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2125832 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court, Kings County, erred by, in effect, granting the father's motion to dismiss the mother's petition to modify a visitation order issued by the Family Court, Albany County, upon the ground that it lacked jurisdiction. Family Court Act § 171 provides that "[a] lawful order of the family court made in any county may be enforced or modified in that county or in the family court in any other county in which the party affected by the order resides or is found." The mother and the parties' son resided in Kings County, and the mother was a "party affected" by the prior order of visitation . Thus, the Family Court, Kings County, had jurisdiction to entertain the mother's petition to modify the prior order of visitation issued by the Family Court, Albany County.

It also held that the father correctly asserted that the proceeding should be determined in Albany County, as the proceeding could have been originated there (Family Ct Act §§ 171, 174), and he demonstrated "good cause" for its transfer (Family Ct Act § 174). The father resided in Albany County and the mother's petition for modification was based upon incidents which allegedly occurred in Albany County. It held that the convenience of the parties and potential witnesses would be best served by the transfer of the proceeding to Albany County.

Counsel Fees- Family Court Act § 438 - Hearing Waived By Failure to Proceed With Hearing

In Tuglu v. Crowley,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2125843 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) The Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which, without a hearing, granted the mother an attorney's fee of $3,500. It held that Family Court properly determined that the father had caused the mother to incur additional legal fees by engaging in unnecessary litigation. Despite the Family Court's clear directive to the father to either stipulate to a fee award of $3,000, or request an evidentiary hearing, the father failed to stipulate to the proposed fee award or to request a hearing on the issue. In light of the father's failure to appropriately respond to the Family Court's directive, the Family Court scheduled a hearing. On the scheduled date of the hearing, the father refused to proceed with the hearing. Accordingly, the father waived his right to a hearing on the matter. In light of the parties' financial circumstances and the other evidence in the record, the Family Court's award to the mother of an attorney's fee of $3,500, which included the fee incurred in connection with the cancelled hearing to determine the amount of the fee award was a provident exercise of discretion.

Agreements - Child Support - Enforcement - Provision Waiving Right to Make Future Application to Modify Child Support Enforced

In Singer v. Prizer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2125850 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which dismissed his petition to terminate his child support obligation. The father annexed to his petition a so-ordered stipulation settling certain prior litigation between the parties. By attaching the stipulation to the petition, the father made the stipulation "a part of" the petition "for all purposes" (CPLR 3014). In the stipulation, the father agreed to pay certain child support to the mother, who, pursuant to the parties' judgment of divorce, had sole custody of the parties' child. The father also agreed that he would not "bring on any application to ... modify" the child support obligation he agreed to. The Appellate Division found that the father was precluded from commencing a proceeding such as this. Therefore, the cause of action alleged in the petition was completely undermined and rendered legally insufficient by the very terms of the stipulation.

Agreements - Child Support - Domestic Relations Law 236[b][9][B] - Modification of Amount Fixed by Court - Change of Circumstances Standard - Parties Waiver, for Limited Period , of Right to Fix the Child Support Obligations under the Child Support Standards Act Upheld

In Green v. Silver, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2125915 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties agreed in a stipulation of settlement incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce, to "waive their right to fix the child support obligations under the Child Support Standards Act for the period up to July 31, 2007," during which time the father, a licensed urologist who was attending law school, would make no payments to the mother for the support of the parties' child. The stipulation further provided: "Beginning August 1, 2007, the Husband agrees to pay the Wife child support pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act based upon his earnings at the time." In an April 2008, order, the father was directed to pay child support to the mother in the amount of $818, twice per month, which was based upon the father's salary at the time of $125,000 per year as a first year associate in a law firm. The mother commenced this proceeding in March 2010 for an upward modification, alleging that the father was now employed as a urologist earning approximately $350,000 per year. The Support Magistrate dismissed the proceeding on the ground that the mother failed to state a cause of action for modification. The mother filed objections with the Family Court, some of which were denied.

The Appellate Division modified the order and remitted the matter to the Family Court for further proceedings on the mother's modification petition. A review of the stipulation revealed that, with the exception of the period during which the father was finishing law school, the parties clearly did not intend to 'opt-out' of the Child Support Standards Act guidelines, but intended to follow them. Accordingly, Family Court should have applied the standard for modification applicable to child support obligations set by the court and not by stipulation (former Domestic Relations Law 236[B][9][b], as superceded by L 2010, ch 182, §§ 7, 13), instead of the more burdensome standard applicable to proceedings to modify child support obligations provided for in a stipulation of settlement incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce.

Where the original amount of child support was set by the court and not by stipulation, all that is required for modification is a substantial change in circumstances. Here, the father's nearly three-fold increase in earnings was sufficient to state a cause of action for modification and, therefore, the proceeding should not have been dismissed.

The Appellate Division also held that the Support Magistrate properly denied the mother's cross motion to limit the issues to the father's income, since the custodial parent's financial status is also a proper consideration for the court in making its determination.

Child Support - Modification - Downward - Parent Seeking Downward Modification Based upon Loss of Employment must Establish Termination Occurred Through No Fault of the Parent and That Parent Diligently Sought Re-employment

In Atabay v Cinar, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2125953 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that a parent seeking a downward modification based upon loss of employment must submit evidence demonstrating that the termination occurred through no fault of the parent and that the parent has diligently sought re-employment. The father failed to establish that his loss of employment driving a hazardous materials truck was through no fault of his own, or that he diligently sought re-employment. The father testified that he was prevented from seeking re-employment driving a truck because he suffered from sleep apnea, but he failed to provide any medical documentation to support this claim. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's finding that the father was not entitled to a downward modification of his child support obligation.

Child Abuse - Testimony of Child - Appellate Division Holds That it Is Proper to Allow Child to Testify via Closed-circuit Television

In re Elisha M.W. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2125840 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that the right of a respondent parent "to be present at every stage of a Family Court Act article 10 proceeding is not absolute, as such a proceeding is civil in nature" (Matter of Q.-L. H., 27 AD3d 738, 739). The Family Court must balance the due process rights of an article 10 respondent with the mental and emotional well being of the child. Family Court properly weighed the respective rights and interests of the father and the child Rebekah J.W., and thereafter providently exercised its discretion in permitting her to testify via closed-circuit television so that she did not have to testify in front of her father.

Equitable Distribution - Enhanced Earning Capacity - Distribution - Valuation - "Double Dipping"- Nontitled Spouse Required to Establish That a Substantial Contribution Was Made to the Acquisition of the Degree or License. Court Consider Spouse Altered His or Her Schedule And/or Took on Additional Household Duties That He or She Would Not Have Otherwise Performed. Not Necessary to Deduct Wife's Maintenance Payments to Husband from Award to Avoid Impermissible "Double Dipping".

In Quarty v Quarty, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2012 WL 2344664 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff (wife) and defendant (husband) were married in September 2000 and had a daughter (born in 2000). The wife also had a son (born in 1996) from a prior marriage. She had full custody of her son and did not receive support from the child's father. In 2009, the parties each commenced separate actions for divorce, which were subsequently consolidated. Supreme Court entered an order and judgment of divorce directing that the marital residence be sold and the marital debts be paid from the proceeds of said sale. The court also awarded the husband spousal maintenance of $1,100 per month for 30 months, a share of the wife's pension and a distributive award in the amount of $155,372, to be paid in 396 monthly installments, based on the wife's enhanced earnings as a nurse practitioner.

The Appellate Division pointed out that amount and duration of maintenance are generally within the trial court's discretion and it would not disturb the court's determination where, as here, the court has considered the statutory factors and set forth its reasoning and its determination is supported by the record. At the time of their marriage, the husband was "legally blind" and he used a guide dog, glasses and/or binoculars to assist him in certain tasks. At the time of the marriage, the husband was performing various odd jobs such as snowplowing and mowing with a tractor, as well as other types of property maintenance at a camp in exchange for free housing. When the parties first moved into the marital residence, the husband was responsible for maintenance of the exterior of the residence and assorted home improvement projects. The wife testified that the husband was also capable of performing certain household chores during the marriage, but that some tasks were very time-consuming for him. Although the husband admitted that he previously had employable skills, he claimed that his vision has since deteriorated, rendering him unable to maintain employment. The husband testified that, in September 2009, a "piece of calcium broke off from the aorta and went up into the back of the eye," blocking blood flow to his eyes. He further testified that he has bulging discs in his back and an unidentified problem with the arches of his feet.

He offered no medical evidence to support these contentions, nor did he testify regarding what efforts he made, if any, to obtain employment. The parties had been married for approximately 8 ½ years when the first action for divorce was commenced. At the time of trial, the husband was 57 years old and the wife was 34 years old. The husband was residing in a rented apartment and was receiving Social Security disability income of approximately $10,920 per year. The wife was earning $92,000 per year and was receiving Social Security benefits for the parties' daughter in the amount of $440 per month. The wife testified that her base salary at the time of trial was $70,000 per year and that she voluntarily worked additional "on-call" hours, which would increase her annual income to approximately $92,000. The wife further testified that the amount of on-call hours fluctuated according to her employer's needs and her availability.

While the record evidence pertaining to the husband's medical conditions and ability to become self-supporting was sparse, the award of spousal maintenance to the husband of $1,100 per month for 30 months was adequately supported by the record. The record revealed that the parties' predivorce standard of living was modest and the maintenance award was a reflection of that standard. There was no basis to disturb that court's implicit finding that the husband failed to convincingly demonstrate that he lacked the ability to work in some capacity. It held that the determination to award durational maintenance was a proper exercise of Supreme Court's discretion and provided a reasonable period of time to enable the husband to re-enter the work force and become self-sufficient.

The Appellate Division observed that a nontitled spouse seeking a portion of the enhanced earning potential attributable to a professional license or degree of a titled spouse is required to establish that a substantial contribution was made to the acquisition of the degree or license" (Esposito-Shea v. Shea, 94 AD3d 1215, 1217 (2102). In determining whether a nontitled spouse's contributions were substantial, the Court considers, among other things, whether that spouse altered his or her schedule and/or took on additional household duties that he or she would not have otherwise performed, in order to enable the titled spouse to obtain the license or degree (Carman v. Carman, 22 AD3d at 1006-1007; Farrell v. Cleary-Farrell, 306 A.D.2d 597, 599-600 [2003]). Where the attainment of the license or degree is more directly attributable to the efforts of the titled spouse, it is appropriate to limit the nontitled spouse's share of the enhanced earning capacity. The wife testified that she obtained two Associate's degrees prior to the marriage, in connection with which she had outstanding loans in the amount of approximately $32,000 at the time of trial. She began pursuing her nursing degree in January 2000 and obtained a Bachelor's degree and R.N. certification in 2003. Throughout her schooling, the wife worked at least part time and often full time. She also earned merit scholarships and incurred additional student loans to pay for tuition and household expenses. In 2004, the wife began a part-time graduate program, while continuing to work full time as a nurse. She began attending graduate school full time in 2005, took the board exams in the fall of 2007 and, after obtaining her license, began working full time as a nurse practitioner in 2008.

The wife testified that the husband did not assist her with her school work or clinicals. She testified that the family's sources of income were generally derived from her employment and the Social Security benefits of the husband and their daughter. She alleged that she requested the husband to obtain employment, which he denied. According to the wife, she performed a myriad of household duties throughout her schooling. Among other things, because the husband was unable to drive, she did all the grocery shopping, transported both children to their activities and appointments and transported the husband's guide dog to veterinarian appointments. She acknowledged that, at various times, the husband was responsible for significant child-care responsibilities and household duties, including outdoor home maintenance. In addition, the husband used his Social Security disability funds to pay the mortgage on their home for some periods of time. The husband similarly testified that he cared for the parties' daughter and the wife's son while the wife attended school, prepared the children for school, assisted with their homework and prepared meals for them. He also took care of the children during the summer and on weekends, except when they were with their grandparents.

Based on the totality of the circumstances, the Appellate Division could not say that Supreme Court's award to the husband of 25% of the value of the wife's enhanced earning capacity was an abuse of discretion. However, it found that Supreme Court erred in its valuation. The experts who testified on each party's behalf differed significantly in their calculations, with the husband's expert arriving at a value of $841,383 and the wife's expert opining the value to be $108,000. The husband's expert, William Blanchfield, premised his calculations on baseline earnings of $11,290 per year (the wife's actual earnings from part-time employment in 2002), a "topline" (post-license) income of $70,000 (as set forth in the wife's statement of net worth) and a work life expectancy of approximately 28 years (until the wife reached age 62). Blanchfield also applied a 4% discount rate, an additional 33% discount rate for taxes and a 2% annual enhancement increase. The wife's expert, T. Kevin Fahey, submitted a lengthy and detailed report. Fahey used baseline earnings of $46,000 in order to reflect the average income of an individual, like the wife, with a high school degree and two Associate's degrees working full time. Fahey, like Blanchfield in his report, used $70,000 as the wife's topline income. In addition, he applied a discount rate of 7% and an unspecified discount for taxes and assumed a work life expectancy of 33 years (until the wife reached the age of 67). Fahey also factored in the wife's probability of survival and of being employed for each year up to the age of 67.

In valuing the wife's enhanced earnings, Supreme Court appeared to have adopted all of the assumptions used by Fahey in his calculations, except the topline income figure, which the court determined to be $92,000 based on the evidence of the wife's anticipated actual earnings in 2010. After deducting the balance of the wife's student loans (in an amount which Supreme Court did not articulate), the court calculated one half of the total value of the wife's enhanced earnings to be $376,744 and awarded the husband one half of that amount, less the total amount of the maintenance award, resulting in a net distributive award to the husband in the sum of $155,372, to be paid at the rate of $392.35 per month for 396 months.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improperly valued the wife's license by using $92,000 as her topline income. Neither expert used that amount in calculating the value of such asset, nor was there any expert testimony that it would be appropriate to do so or, even if appropriate, specifically how it would affect the present value of the wife's license. Moreover, enhanced earnings are generally valued as of the date of commencement of a matrimonial action, which in this case was 2009. In 2009, the wife earned approximately $68,000. Even using the wife's base salary for 2010, the year in which the trial was primarily conducted, the amount would have been $70,000, the amount used by both experts in their reports.

Inasmuch as Supreme Court relied primarily on all of the other assumptions underlying Fahey's valuation including, among other things, the discount rate, the wife's baseline earnings and her work-life expectancy, all of which had ample support in the record, it concluded that the court should have valued the wife's enhanced earnings at $108,000. Its review of the record revealed that the total outstanding balance of the student loan incurred by the wife during the marriage was $45,165.52, which had to be deducted from the total value, leaving the amount of $62,834.48 subject to equitable distribution. Finding no basis to vary from Supreme Court's award to the husband of 25%, the distributive award was reduced to $15,708.62. Given this reduced award, the Appellate Division directed that the distributive award shall be payable at the rate of $400 per month until the termination of the wife's maintenance obligation to the husband and, thereafter, at the rate of $1,000 per month until paid in full.

In a footnote the Court explained that it was not necessary to deduct the wife's maintenance payments to the husband from this award in order to avoid impermissible "double dipping" on the enhanced earnings derived from the wife's professional license (see Grunfeld v. Grunfeld, 94 N.Y.2d 696, 704 [2000]). This was because it concluded that the amount of maintenance awarded was reasonable based upon the wife's prelicense income of $46,000, combined with the $22,000 difference between the $70,000 topline earnings used in its determination of the value of the license and the $92,000 annual income to which plaintiff testified at trial. Thus, the amount of enhanced earnings used to calculate the value of the wife's license (the difference between the $46,000 baseline income and the $70,000 topline income) was not considered in the maintenance award.

The Court also held that Supreme Court failed to properly determine each party's proportionate share of the wife's pension. Although the court directed that the pension be "split pursuant to the Majauskas formula," it did not provide any further guidance as to apportionment, as required. Thus, the matter had to be remitted to Supreme Court for a determination of each party's proportionate share thereof. Supreme Court also failed to address the wife's request in her complaint for an award of child support. Accordingly, it also remitted the matter to the court for a determination of the parties' respective obligations, if any, for child support.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Agreements - Validity - Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3) - Acknowledgment Insufficient Where it Does Not Provide That Person Taking Acknowledgment "Knows or Has Satisfactory Evidence, That the Person Making it Is the Person Described in and Who Executed Such Instrument - Fourth Department Holds That Defect Can Be Cured Rejecting Rules of First and Second Departments

In Galetta v Galetta, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2164527 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) after plaintiff commenced this divorce action, she moved for, inter alia, summary judgment determining that the parties' prenuptial agreement was invalid because it was not properly acknowledged. Supreme Court denied her motion. The Appellate Division observed that pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3), "[a]n agreement by the parties, made before or during the marriage, shall be valid and enforceable in a matrimonial action if such agreement is in writing, subscribed by the parties, and acknowledged or proven in the manner required to entitle a deed to be recorded." In order to satisfy the acknowledgment requirement, "there must be an oral acknowledgment before an authorized officer, and a written certificate of acknowledgment must be attached to the agreement" (Filkins v Filkins, 303 AD2d 934, 934; see Matisoff v Dobi, 90 NY2d 127, 137-138; see generally Real Property Law §§ 291, 306). The Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff that the written certificate of acknowledgment was insufficient because it did not contain the information required by Real Property Law § 303, i.e., that the person taking the acknowledgment "knows or has satisfactory evidence, that the person making it is the person described in and who executed such instrument."

The Court pointed out that contrary to defendant's contention, the certificate was not in "substantial compliance" with the statute, and thus the court's reliance on Weinstein v Weinstein (36 AD3d 797, 798) for that proposition was misplaced. In Weinstein, the language in the certificate failed to conform to the "precise language" of the Real Property Law. Here, however, the certificate failed to "stat[e] all the matters required to be done, known, or proved on the taking of such acknowledgment or proof" (§ 306). Inasmuch as the certificate was devoid of information required by the Real Property Law, the court concluded that it was insufficient on its face and did not establish that the prenuptial agreement was properly acknowledged.

However, the court agreed with defendant that a subsequently-filed affidavit from the notary who took defendant's acknowledgment raised a triable issue of fact whether the prenuptial agreement was properly acknowledged. The issue squarely before the Appellate Division was whether defects in such an acknowledgment are subject to cure, and it concluded that they could be cured. It observed that in Matisoff v Dobi (90 NY2d at 137), the Court of Appeals specifically declined to resolve the issue "whether and under what circumstances the absence of acknowledgment can be cured," and noted that other courts have been divided on the issue.

The court noted that it is well settled that defects in an acknowledgment required by EPTL 5-1.1-A (e) (2) (see EPTL 5-1.1 [f] [2]), concerning waivers of the spousal right of election, may be cured. Inasmuch as the language of the EPTL contains the same "restrictive acknowledgment language as the Domestic Relations Law under discussion in the Matisoff case". It concluded that the same reasoning should apply to Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3) and that defects in the acknowledgment required by that section may be cured. The court recognized that there was a split of authority on the issue whether such defects may be cured, and that it had yet to take a position. However, in Arizin v Covello (175 Misc 2d 453, 457), the court held that "an unacknowledged nuptial agreement which is acknowledged on a subsequent date is enforceable in a matrimonial action as long as the subsequent acknowledgment complies with the statutory requirements of Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3)" (see also Hurley v Johnson, 4 Misc 3d 616, 620). It noted that it had cited to Arizin in its decision in Filkins (303 AD2d at 934). In Filkins, however, there was no written certificate of acknowledgment attached to the parties' prenuptial agreement, and the Court held that "plaintiff's attempt to cure the defect by having the agreement notarized and filed after commencement of [the] divorce action fail[ed] because the agreement was never reacknowledged in compliance with Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3)" (id. at 934-935). It concluded that by citing to Arizin, the Court implicitly endorsed the possibility that a defect in a technically improper acknowledgment accompanying a nuptial agreement could be cured .

The Fourth Department recognized that the Second Department in D'Elia v D'Elia (14 AD3d 477, 478) held that the defendant's "attempt to cure the acknowledgment defect by submitting a duly-executed certificate of acknowledgment at trial was not sufficient," but it was not clear from that decision whether there was a contemporaneous acknowledgment that was technically improper. It also recognized that the First Department in Anonymous v Anonymous (253 AD2d 696, 697) "would not permit [the] defendant to cure [the] defect in the [prenuptial] agreement by an alleged acknowledgment in affidavit form which was executed and which surfaced some 12 years after the fact in the midst of a contested matrimonial action in light of the required formalities of Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3)." Inasmuch as the preamble to the decision in Anonymous refers to "the absence of an acknowledgment" , the court stated that its decision was not inconsistent with that of the Second Department. It reasoned that here the defendant was not attempting to cure the complete absence of a contemporaneous acknowledgment. Rather, he was attempting to submit evidence that there was, in fact, a proper and contemporaneous acknowledgment at the time the prenuptial agreement was executed. In its view, the affidavit from the notary who took defendant's acknowledgment was sufficient to raise a triable issue of fact whether "the parties . . . contemporaneously demonstrated the deliberate nature of their agreement" (Schoeman, Marsh & Updike v Dobi, 264 AD2d 572, 573). The statements of the notary, i.e., that it was his usual and customary practice to ask and confirm that the person signing the document was the same person named in the document and that he or she was signing said document, "constitute competent and admissible evidence concerning routine professional practice sufficient to raise a triable issue of fact"

The Appellate Division concluded that the court properly denied that part of plaintiff's motion for summary judgment seeking a determination as a matter of law that the parties' prenuptial agreement is invalid.

Full Faith and Credit - Florida Divorce Judgement - Entitled to Recognition Where Both Parties Were Subject to Personal Jurisdiction of Florida Court. Review by this State Is Limited to Determining Whether Rendering Court Had Jurisdiction.

In Khallad v. Blanc, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2164516 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) in 2002, defendant traveled to Morocco and conceived a child with plaintiff, a Moroccan native. The parties' child was born in Florida in July 2003 and, in March 2005, plaintiff and defendant were married in Florida. Thereafter, the parties resided together in Florida for one or two months before plaintiff moved to New York City. In January 2006, defendant filed a petition for dissolution of marriage in the Circuit Court for the Ninth Judicial Circuit, in and for Orange County, Florida, asserting that the marriage was "irretrievably broken" and that she and plaintiff had no children in common. Defendant submitted an "affidavit of diligent search and inquiry," in which she averred that plaintiff's current residence was unknown to her and that she had made a diligent search and inquiry to discover it. Defendant then served the petition upon plaintiff by publication in a local Florida newspaper. Plaintiff did not respond to the petition or appear in court, and a default judgment was entered against him. In April 2006, the Florida court granted a final judgment of dissolution of marriage

According to plaintiff, he first learned of the divorce judgment in or about June 2010, when deportation proceedings were commenced against him. On July 29, 2010, plaintiff moved to set aside the default judgment in the Florida court, asserting that he failed to appear in the divorce action because he did not receive a summons or petition. Plaintiff further alleged that defendant fraudulently obtained the divorce judgment inasmuch as she falsely stated that she did not know where plaintiff lived and that the parties did not have any children in common. After a hearing, the Florida court denied plaintiff's motion on the ground that it had been filed more than one year after entry of the divorce judgment (Fla Rules Civ Pro rule 1.540[b]).

Plaintiff thereafter commenced this action seeking a declaration that the divorce judgment is "invalid and of no force and effect" because it was fraudulently obtained. Supreme Court determined that the divorce judgment should be granted full faith and credit, and thus declared that the judgment was valid. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that a divorce judgment of a sister state made in an action in which both parties were subject to the personal jurisdiction of the court is entitled to full faith and credit by the courts of this state. Absent a jurisdictional challenge, a judgment entered upon a party's default is entitled to full faith and credit. The application of full faith and credit to the judgment of a sister State is the functional equivalent of interstate res judicata. As a matter of full faith and credit, review by the courts of this State is limited to determining whether the rendering court had jurisdiction, an inquiry which includes due process considerations. Thus, inquiry into the merits of the underlying dispute is foreclosed; the facts have bearing only in the limited context of the jurisdictional review. In determining whether the Florida court had jurisdiction over plaintiff, the Appellate Division noted that it had to "ascertain whether [Florida's] long arm statute has been complied with, and whether that court's exercise of jurisdiction comports with Federal constitutional principles of due process" (Mortgage Money Unlimited, 1 AD3d at 774).

Plaintiff did not contend that he lacked the requisite minimum contacts with Florida such that allowing the divorce action to proceed in that state deprived him of due process. The parties were married and thereafter lived together in Florida, and their child was born in Florida. The Appellate Division rejected Plaintiff's contention that the Florida court lacked personal jurisdiction because defendant failed to serve him personally with the summons and petition in the divorce action in accordance with Florida law.

Under Florida law, service of process by publication may be made in any court on any party identified in any action or proceeding for dissolution or annulment of marriage. Service of process by publication may be had upon any known or unknown natural person. As a condition precedent to service by publication, the plaintiff must file a sworn statement asserting that diligent search and inquiry have been made to discover the name and residence of such person," and "that the residence of such person is ... [u]nknown to the affiant". The notice must be published once per week for four consecutive weeks in a newspaper published in the county where the court is located, and proof of publication must be made by affidavit of an officer or employee, among others, of the newspaper. Defendant signed an "Affidavit of Diligent Search and Inquiry" swearing that she "ha[d] made a diligent search and inquiry to discover the name and current residence of" plaintiff. Defendant further averred therein that plaintiff's "current residence [wa]s unknown to [her]," and she signed the affidavit under penalty of perjury. A publisher's affidavit of publication confirmed that the notice was published for four consecutive weeks in a newspaper in Orange County, Florida, the situs of the Florida court. Thus, defendant established that she constructively served plaintiff by publication in accordance with Florida law.

Plaintiff contended that defendant committed fraud in procuring service of process by publication because defendant knew where plaintiff lived and how to contact him. The Appellate Division noted that Plaintiff's contention may have merit in light of the undisputed fact that defendant visited plaintiff in New York and stayed at his apartment several months before she commenced the divorce action. Once it has been determined, however, that a sister state properly exercised jurisdiction over a party, review of the foreign judgment ends and we must accord full faith and credit to that judgment.

Plaintiff's further contention that the Florida court deprived him of his parental rights by failing to determine issues of custody, visitation and a parenting plan before dissolving the marriage was beyond the scope of review. The Court's inquiry was limited to whether the Florida court that rendered the divorce judgment had jurisdiction (see Fiore, 78 N.Y.2d at 577), and the merits of the divorce action, including issues of custody, visitation and support, were not properly before it. It pointed out that Florida law permits plaintiff to commence an independent action challenging the validity of the divorce judgment on the ground of fraud upon the court more than one year after entry of that judgment. Thus, plaintiff remained free to commence such an action in Florida to challenge the validity of the divorce judgment and to assert his rights to custody and visitation.

Child Support - Award - Income - Family Ct Act 413[1][B][5] [li] - Sums Expended in Connection with Investment must Be Deducted from Investment Income.

In Fendick v Fendick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2164254 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Support Magistrate determined that the mother received investment income of $17,400 per year. That finding was based on the fact that the mother received monthly loan payments of principal and interest from two individuals to whom she made personal loans. The Appellate Division held that this finding was in error. Only the interest portion of those monthly payments, rather than the entire payments of principal plus interest, should have been considered "income" for purposes of calculating child support, inasmuch as the principal amounts of those loans were "sums expended in connection with such investment" (Family Ct Act 413[1][b][5] [ii]). The mother's interest income on those two loans, as reflected in her tax return, was $2,779 per year, and thus the calculations of the parties' adjusted gross income should have been amended to reflect that amount. Based on the revised calculations of the parties' adjusted gross income in light of those errors, the father's pro rata share of the child support obligation was 62%. It modified the child support order accordingly.

Court of Appeals

Termination of Parental Rights - Post Termination Visitation - Court of Appeals Holds That Family Court Lacks Authority to Direct Continuing Contact Between Parent and Child Once Parental Rights Have Been Terminated in a Contested Proceeding Pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b.

In the Matter of Hailey ZZ., No. 103, NYLJ 1202558306160, at *1 (June 7, 2012) the Court of Appeals resolved a conflict within the Appellate Divisions as to whether Family Court may direct continuing contact between parent and child once parental rights have been terminated in a contested proceeding pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b, and held that the Family Court lacks this authority.

Hailey ZZ., was born in 2007 and , initially resided with her birth mother and father and an older half-sister. The Father was sentenced to 5 to 15 years in prison in early 2008, when Hailey was three months old, and remained incarcerated ever since. On November 5, 2008, the Tompkins County Department of Social Services (DSS), effecting a removal under Family Court Act 1024, took Hailey and her half-sister away from their mother. The girls were placed in DSS's custody to reside with certified foster parents. On March 26, 2010, DSS filed petitions against both parents, seeking orders adjudicating Hailey to be permanently neglected, terminating parental rights and committing her guardianship and custody to DSS. On July 23, 2010, Hailey's mother surrendered her parental rights and signed a post-adoption visitation agreement. DSS withdrew its petition against mother, and proceeded with the fact-finding hearing against father. In a decision and order entered on August 12, 2010, Supreme Court adjudicated Hailey to be permanently neglected and ordered the requisite dispositional hearing. In its decision and order entered on October 29, 2010 after the dispositional hearing, Supreme Court concluded that it was in Hailey's best interests to terminate father's parental rights and free her for adoption so as to achieve permanency. Additionally, Supreme Court denied father's request for continuing visitation with Hailey. The Father cited several Fourth Department cases to support the availability of this option. The judge noted, though, that Third Department precedent did not allow for a court to mandate continuing contact between a parent and child after parental rights had been terminated pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b. He added that such contact would, in any event, not be in Hailey's best interests as there was no evidence of any emotional or lasting connection between Hailey and the father; they had spent only about 72 hours together in two years' time, or the equivalent of three out of 730 days. The Court ruled it was in Hailey's best interests to terminate father's parental rights, without post termination visitation "[e]ven if the Third Department allowed [it]," rather than suspend judgment. Father appealed.

The Appellate Division affirmed. The Court of Appeals granted the father leave to appeal (17 NY3d 709 [2011]), and affirmed. The father contended on appeal that the lower courts wrongly decided that the hearing court lacked authority to grant him post termination contact with Hailey, and asked the Court to remit the matter to the Appellate Division for its review of Supreme Court's alternative ruling that post termination visitation would not be in Hailey's best interests.

The Court of Appeals observed that Fourth Department has held that Family Court is authorized to award post termination contact where parental rights have been terminated pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b. In Matter of Kahlil S. (35 AD3d 1164 [4th Dept 2006], lv dismissed 8 NY3d 977 [2007]), the court upheld termination of the mother's parental rights with respect to her two children, Kahlil S. and Terrell Z., on the ground that she presently and for the foreseeable future was unable, by reason of mental illness, to provide proper and adequate care for them. The Fourth Department declared that where "parental rights are terminated after a finding that the parent is unable by reason of mental illness or mental retardation to provide proper and adequate care for his or her child or after a finding of permanent neglect (see Social Services Law §384-b [4] [c], [d]), Family Court may, in those cases in which the court deems it appropriate, exercise its discretion in determining whether some form of post termination contact with the biological parent is in the best interests of the child" (id. at 1165). Thus, the Fourth Department in Matter of Kahlil S. remitted the matter to Family Court for a hearing as to whether post termination contact with their mother was in the children's best interests (35 AD3d at 1165-1166). The court observed that in making this determination, Family Court was to "consider, inter alia, the ages of the children, the bond between [the mother] and the children, and the likelihood that the children will be adopted". Section 634 of the Family Court Act was the only statute cited by the Fourth Department to support its decision. This provision states merely that an order entered after a dispositional hearing committing a child's guardianship and custody to an authorized agency may be made "on such conditions, if any, as [the court] deems proper." Subsequent to Matter of Kahlil S., the Fourth Department has handed down decisions reiterating or presuming that Family Court possesses authority to provide for post termination contact, and must, upon a parent's request, decide whether such a continuing relationship is in the child's best interests

The Court of Appeals surveyed the cases in the First and Second Department, which it pointed out were not clear. It then noted that the Third Department appears to have grappled with the issue on this appeal as early as 1994 in Matter of Rita VV. (209 AD2d 866 [3d Dept 1994], lv denied 85 NY2d 811 [1995]). There, Family Court's dispositional order in the permanent neglect proceeding conditioned adoption upon visitation with the child's biological mother and maternal grandparents. The court held this to be error, commenting that Social Services Law §384-b contemplates an adversarial proceeding. It does not contain a provision that upon a determination that parental rights should be terminated a court can require or permit contact by and between a biological parent and a child who has been adopted. While Family Court was correct that the Legislature amended Social Services Law 383-c to allow a parent to condition a voluntary surrender for adoption upon contact with the child or information concerning the child, the proceeding here did not involve such a voluntary surrender. Accordingly, the provisions of Social Services Law 383-c were wholly inapplicable and, therefore, Family Court was without authority in this adversarial proceeding to require such continued contact as a condition of adoption. In a string of subsequent cases, the Third Department has steadfastly adhered to the position that Family Court may not direct post termination contact in a case where parental rights have been ended pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b.

Relying on section 634 of the Family Court Act, the father argued that if the disposition of a petition brought pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b "is to be termination of parental rights, then, the Family Court Act directs that termination is to be 'on such conditions, if any, as [the court] deems proper,' and what conditions, if any, to impose is to be decided solely on the basis of the child's best interests. Therefore, under the Family Court Act, if the child's best interests would be served by termination of parental rights on condition that the biological parent retain some right of contact with the child, then Family Court must so order." The Court pointed out that the flaw here is that father presupposed that this particular kind of condition — one preserving contact between parent and child notwithstanding the termination of parental rights — is a condition the court is empowered to mandate. There is concededly no statutory support for such authority outside the context of a voluntary surrender pursuant to Social Services Law §383-c, as the Third Department has repeatedly emphasized. The Father sought to overcome this obstacle by arguing, in effect, that Family Court possesses an inherent discretionary authority to provide for post termination contact in a dispositional order when determined to be in the child's best interests. This argument ran counter to the decision in Matter of Gregory B., 74 NY2d 77 (1989). In that case, the Court the Court of Appeals "express[ed] no opinion as to whether such contacts generally would be helpful and appropriate once parental rights have been terminated and the child has been adopted into a new family or whether a court should have the discretionary authority to order such contacts" . Further, it observed, "the 'open' adoption concept would appear to be inconsistent with this State's view as expressed by the Legislature that adoption relieves the biological parent 'of all parental duties toward and of all responsibilities for' the adoptive child over whom the parent 'shall have no rights'". It then closed the discussion of this issue as follows: "Although adoptive parents are free, at their election, to permit contacts between the adopted child and the child's biological parent, to judicially require such contacts arguably may be seen as threatening the integrity of the adoptive family unit. In any event, 'open' adoptions are not presently authorized. If they are to be established, it is the Legislature that more appropriately should be called upon to balance the critical social policy choices and the delicate issues of family relations involved in such a determination" (74 NY2d at 91).

The Court concluded that the Legislature, the entity best suited "to balance the critical social policy choices and the delicate issues of family relations involved" in such matters (Matter of Gregory, 74 NY2d at 91), has not sanctioned judicial imposition of post termination contact where parental rights are terminated after a contested proceeding. Absent legislative warrant, Family Court is not authorized to include any such condition in a dispositional order made pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b.

Custody - Kidnaping - Custodial Interference - Court of Appeals Holds it Is Possible for a Parent with Custodial Rights to a Child to Be Guilty of Kidnaping That Child

In People v Leonard, --- N.E.2d ----, 2012 WL 1946724 (N.Y.) the Court of Appeals held that it is possible for a parent who has custodial rights to a child to be guilty of kidnaping that child, and that it happened here, where defendant used his baby daughter as a hostage, threatening to kill her if the police approached him.

Defendant had a romantic relationship with a woman called Mary, which ended a few days after their daughter was born. Mary then moved with the baby from Brooklyn, where she and defendant had both been living, to Ulster County. There was no court order affecting the custody of the child, so defendant and Mary were equally entitled to custody. When the baby was six weeks old, defendant paid an unexpected visit to Mary's new home. He and Mary had an argument, in the course of which he abused her verbally, threatened her with a knife, and cut her. He then calmed down and permitted Mary to leave for work, while the baby remained with him. Mary called her mother and a friend from her car, and the friend called the police. Some time later, Mary's mother and stepfather came to Mary's home and found defendant outside the house, holding the baby. Shortly after that, Mary, her employer and several police officers arrived on the scene. At the sight of the police, defendant took out a knife and gestured toward the baby with it; still holding the baby, he retreated into the house. There followed a lengthy discussion in a bedroom between defendant and the police officers, during which defendant held the knife near the child's chest and throat, and told the officers that if they came closer he would kill the child. He was finally persuaded to give the baby, unharmed, to the police.

Defendant was convicted of Kidnaping in the second degree, as well as burglary, endangering the welfare of a child and two weapons offenses. The Appellate Division affirmed, and so did the Court of Appeals. The Court, in an opinion by Judge Smith observed that Penal Law 135.20 says simply: "A person is guilty of kidnaping in the second degree when he abducts another person." But the statutory definition of "abduct" is more complicated: " 'Abduct' means to restrain a person with intent to prevent his liberation by either (a) secreting or holding him in a place where he is not likely to be found, or (b) using or threatening to use deadly physical force." (Penal Law s 135.00[2].) And the statutory definition of "restrain" is more complicated still: " 'Restrain' means to restrict a person's movements intentionally and unlawfully in such manner as to interfere substantially with his liberty by moving him from one place to another, or by confining him either in the place where the restriction commences or in a place to which he has been moved, without consent and with knowledge that the restriction is unlawful. A person is so moved or confined 'without consent' when such is accomplished by (a) physical force, intimidation or deception, or (b) any means whatever, including acquiescence of the victim, if he is a child less than sixteen years old or an incompetent person and the parent, guardian or other person or institution having lawful control or custody of him has not acquiesced in the movement or confinement." (Penal Law 135.00[1].) A final layer of complexity is added by Penal Law 135.30, which says: "In any prosecution for kidnaping, it is an affirmative defense that (a) the defendant was a relative of the person abducted, and (b) his sole purpose was to assume control of such person."

The decisive question was whether defendant "restrain[ed]" the child, according to the statutory definition of that term. Judge Smith pointed out that he intentionally moved the child from one place to another (from the outside of the house to the inside), and also confined her to the place (the bedroom) to which she had been moved. Defendant argued that he did not "restrict" her "movements" or "interfere" with her "liberty" because a six-week-old child is not capable of going or remaining anywhere voluntarily. This argument was rejected as untenable: "it implies that no infant could ever be kidnaped. A restriction on movement, and an interference with "liberty," should be deemed to exist whenever the lawful movement of a person, including the lawful movement of a child by adults, is hindered."

In addressing the issue whether defendant restricted the child's movements "unlawfully," "without consent" and "with knowledge that the restriction was unlawful," he argued that it was impossible for him, a custodial parent with as much right to control the child as Mary had, to act unlawfully or without consent, or to know that he was acting unlawfully, either by moving the child or by preventing her from being moved. As the custodial parent he could lawfully take the child anywhere he wanted, and the only consent he needed was his own. Under the statute, he pointed out, "consent" exists when "the parent, guardian or other person ... having lawful control or custody" has "acquiesced in the movement or confinement"(Penal Law 135.00 [1][b]).

The Court of Appeals rejected the idea that he could lawfully move or prevent the movement of the child in the way he did here, or that he could give "consent" to his own act in doing so. Judge Smith wrote that "there comes a point where even a custodial parent's control over a child's movements is unlawful, and indeed obviously so." Although she found no New York decision that shed much light on the issue she observed that courts in other states have faced similar problems. In State v. Viramontes (163 Ariz. 334, 788 P.2d 67 [1990]), the Supreme Court of Arizona upheld a kidnaping conviction under a statute that contained a definition of "restrain" much like New York's . The defendant in that case had put his newborn child in a cardboard box, driven it to a restaurant and abandoned it in a parking lot. The court held that, though the defendant was the child's custodial parent, he lacked legal authority to "consent" to his own act of abandonment, observing: "under no imaginable circumstances could the legislature have intended that defendant's ... taking the child to abandon it be legally authorized". In Muniz v. State (764 So.2d 729 [Fla 2d DCA 2000]), a Florida District Court of Appeal confronted a set of facts almost exactly like this case: The defendant there, confronted by police officers demanding that he hand over his month-old child, reacted by picking up a razor and threatening the baby with it, thus holding the officers at bay for hours. The Muniz court reversed the defendant's conviction for kidnaping, holding that someone who was a "parent" under Florida law could not be guilty of kidnaping his child when there was no court order depriving him of custody. In a later decision, however, the Florida Supreme Court overruled Muniz and held "that a parent is not exempt from criminal liability for kidnaping his or her own child" (Davila v. State, 75 So.3d 192, 197 [Fla. 2011]; see also State v. Siemer, 454 N.W.2d 857 [Iowa 1990]).

Judge Smith concluded, like the Supreme Courts of Arizona, Florida and Iowa, that a kidnaping by a custodial parent of his own child is not a legal impossibility. It is possible, though only in cases, like this one, where a defendant's conduct is so obviously and unjustifiably dangerous or harmful to the child as to be inconsistent with the idea of lawful custody. The Court pointed out that its holding "should not be too readily extended." It held that on the facts found by the jury with support in the record, defendant's restriction of his daughter's movements was unlawful; that he could not consent to it, because at the time of the crime he did not have "lawful control or custody" of his daughter; and that the unlawfulness was blatant enough to justify the inference that he knew he was acting unlawfully. The evidence that he committed second-degree kidnaping was legally sufficient.

Chief Judge Lippman and Judges Graffeo and Read concurred. Judge Jones dissented in part and voted to modify in an opinion in which Judges Ciparick and Pigott concurred.

Appellate Division Affirms Civil Contempt Order Sanctioning Defendant Instead of Fining Him.

In Kosovsky v Zahl, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1987411 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order and judgment which adjudged defendant in civil contempt, and ordered him to pay $10,000 to plaintiff, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1. It found that the Special Referee's findings regarding counsel fees (as corrected) and retroactive child support arrears were amply supported by the record. Domestic Relations Law § 237(b) authorizes the court to award counsel fees in enforcement actions. In addition, the parties' so-ordered 2000 stipulation provided that plaintiff would be entitled to an award of counsel fees for fees incurred in connection with effecting payment of add-on expenses. Defendant's argument that no definitive order was issued that judicially determined that plaintiff was entitled to counsel fees is without merit. It found the record clearly supported a finding of civil contempt based upon defendant's failure to comply with court-ordered child support payments, which, as the Special Referee found, was undertaken primarily to harass plaintiff. The court's direction that defendant reimburse plaintiff for costs occasioned by his frivolous conduct was an appropriate exercise of discretion (citing Matter of Beiny, 164 A.D.2d 233 [1990]).

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Appreciation of Separate Property -Husband Denied Share of Appreciation of Marital Apartment Although He Contributed to Renovations Where Appraiser Made No Findings That Renovations Had Any Effect on Value of the Apartment

In Linda D. v Theo C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1988429 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified a judgment which, inter alia, denied defendant any portion of the marital apartment's appreciation, distributed the marital estate, directed that defendant pay child support of $1,200 per month, and awarded plaintiff counsel and expert fees, to the extent of vacating the award of counsel and expert fees. It held that Defendant failed to show that the marital apartment, which plaintiff purchased before the marriage, appreciated as a result of his contributions. Although defendant performed, and marital funds helped pay for, some renovations to the apartment, the court-appointed appraiser made no findings that the renovations had any effect on the value of the apartment. In any event, the trial court adequately compensated defendant for his contributions by giving him a credit for one-quarter of the renovation costs. It held that the trial court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding plaintiff $100,000 for attorneys' fees and $12,850 for expert fees. The parties' financial situations were not so disparate as to render this award appropriate.

Custody - Visitation - Modification - Hearing Is Generally Required Before a Judge May Award a Temporary Change of Custody in a Non-emergency Situation

In Rodger W v Samantha S.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1913878 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which granted petitioner father's application for temporary custody of the child and granted alternate weekend visitation to respondent mother. It reinstated the original custody arrangement granting primary custody to the mother and visitation to the father. Pursuant to a 2010 judgment of divorce the mother was awarded primary physical custody of the child, while the petitioner father was allowed liberal access in the form of visitation. On March 11, 2011, petitioner filed a petition to enforce his visitation rights. After respondent was diagnosed with a brain tumor in June 2011, petitioner filed an order to show cause on September 19, 2011 seeking temporary custody of the child, which the Family Court denied on September 23, 2011. At the time of the November 3, 2011 court appearance, the only matter pending before the court was the father's petition to enforce visitation. The father made a sua sponte application seeking a temporary change of custody, which the court granted that same day without holding an evidentiary hearing.

The Appellate Division observed that it had previously noted that a hearing is generally required before a judge may award a temporary change of custody in a non-emergency situation (Matter of Martin R.G. v. Ofelia G.O., 24 AD3d 305, 3055]). It held that Respondent was deprived of her fundamental rights when the Family Court sua sponte converted the hearing on the petition for visitation into one concerning custody and then transferred custody of the child without notice and without affording her a hearing with the opportunity to present evidence and to call and cross-examine witnesses. As reports issued by two professional organizations confirmed that there were no immediate safety concerns or other risks concerning respondent's care of the child, there was no emergency situation to warrant Family Court's decision not to hold a hearing.

In addition the finding did not have a sound and substantial basis in the record. At the time of the hearing, Family Court did not take any testimony from the parties or collateral witnesses, and the limited information presented in the home evaluation reports indicated that there were significant factual disputes as to whether the child was subjected to a stressful situation in respondent's home, or as to what effect, if any, respondent's illness had on the child's schooling. Petitioner, as the non-custodial parent, failed to satisfy his significant burden of demonstrating that the child's best interests under the totality of the circumstances warranted a modification of the previously entered custody order.

Custody - Conditions on Visitation - Considering 'Economic Realities' of the Case" Non-custodian Mother Should Not Be Made to Bear the Full Burden for Visitation Transportation

In re Jasmine L v Ely G., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1868615 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Family Court's imposition upon the petitioner-mother of full responsibility for transporting the child to and from all exchanges at the home of respondent-father, the custodial parent, did not have a sound and substantial basis in the record. The mother, was of limited financial means and lived in lower Manhattan without access to a car. She testified that transporting herself, her other minor child, and the child to and from the father's home in Yonkers for alternate weekend visitation subjected her to a significant financial expense that was several times her monthly child support obligation. In contrast, it was significantly less of a burden for the father, who worked only one weekend per month and had access to two cars, to pick the child up at the Woodlawn subway station in the Bronx, which was only a few miles and a relatively short drive from his home, and which is where the exchanges had been conducted for several months without incident prior to the fact-finding hearing. It held that upon consideration of the " 'economic realities' of the case" (Ingarra v. Ingarra, 271 A.D.2d 573, 574 [2000]), the mother should not be made to bear the full burden for such transportation. It directed that the exchanges resume at the Woodlawn subway station during the weekends when respondent was not working.

Agreements - Prenuptial - Absent a Provision to Contrary, Waiver of Maintenance and Counsel Fee Does Not Bar Pendente Lite Award.

In Vink v Lee, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2094382 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed defendant to pay $6,000 per month in unallocated interim support, and awarded plaintiff $25,000 in counsel fees, and an order, which, awarded plaintiff an additional $25,000 in counsel fees. It observed that while the parties' premarital agreement limited their rights to obtain spousal support and waived their rights to counsel fees, the Agreement did not bar temporary relief, including temporary maintenance and interim counsel fees. Since the parties' agreements did not address custody and child support, the waiver of counsel fees did not apply to counsel fees related to litigating child custody and support issues. (Citing Kessler v. Kessler, 33 AD3d 42, 45 [2006]; Alvares-Correa v. Alvares-Correa, 285 A.D.2d 123, 128 [2001]).

Child Custody - Relocation - Denied Where Mother Not Honest With Father About Her Location and Record Showed Pattern of Deception.

In Koegler v. Woodard,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2036460 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the parties lived in New York. The mother was unemployed for 18 months, during which time she searched for a job in both the New York metropolitan area and Texas. She started a job with First American Bank in Dallas, Texas in July 2009, but did not inform the father or the court that she was working in Texas. This came to light after the father noticed that the mother was often not at her home, and was told by the child's grandmother that she did not know when the mother would return.

The father made a motion to the court in August 2009 for more visitation time with the child. The parties entered into a stipulation that the father could have additional visitation with his daughter when the mother was in Texas. The mother sought to relocate with the child to Texas. Family Court granted the parties joint custody and appointed a parent coordinator. The mother was awarded residential custody, provided that she maintained adequate housing in New York. The father was awarded parenting time with the child. While the mother was in Texas working, the father had residential custody of the child and the mother had residential custody while she was in New York, subject to the father's weekend parenting time.

The Appellate Division found that there was a sound and substantial basis in the record for the Family Court's determination to deny the mother's request to relocate to Texas, and there was no reason to disturb the findings of the court. The court gave due consideration to the Tropea factors (Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d 727 [1996]) in concluding that the best interests of the now six-year-old girl would not be served by relocation to Texas. Family Court found that the mother had not honest with the father when she first obtained the Texas job and was out of town for extended periods, and that with respect to her work schedule in Texas, she had been "either misleading or not forthright in giving [the father] information to which he was entitled," it appearing that the mother "has been trying to hinder [the father] from having the additional visits to which he is entitled by virtue of the Court order." The court concluded that it was hard to imagine that the mother would be truthful and forthcoming with the father as to the child's activities and general well-being if she lived in Texas.

The Appellate Division observed that the custodial parent must be able to place the child's needs first while fostering a continued relationship between the child and the noncustodial parent". Family Court had a sound basis for concluding that, were the mother and child to live in Texas, the mother would not foster and facilitate a relationship with the father, and that was a relevant factor when assessing the best interests of the child. Despite the court order requiring the mother to inform the father of her schedule regarding her time in Texas and her time in New York, which order provided that the father was to have additional visitation with the child when the mother was in Texas, the record showed a pattern of deception by the mother, who admittedly lied to the father that she was in New York when she was actually in Texas, thus depriving him of the visitation time to which he was entitled by court order.

The Appellate Division also noted that Family Court indicated that its decision on the relocation petition was based, in part, on the bona fides of the request, as the record demonstrated that it was always the mother's intention to move to Texas, and she did not really want to find employment in New York.

Custody - Visitation - Suspension - Error to Suspend Visitation Without a Hearing to Determine Best Interests of Child.

In Walker v Diaz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1859942 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which, sua sponte, suspended the father's visitation with the child, and remitted for further proceedings on the issue of visitation consistent with the child's best interests. It observed that a noncustodial parent is entitled to meaningful visitation. Denial of that right is so drastic that it must be based on substantial evidence that visitation would be detrimental to the welfare of the child. When adjudicating visitation issues, a court must determine the best interests of the child. Supreme Court failed to determine the best interests of the child before suspending the father's visitation with the child.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Agreements - Construction - Child Support - Where No Termination, Provision Unallocated Child Support For Two Children Continues Despite One Child Reaching

In Matter of Katz v Dotan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1940576 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties' stipulation of settlement required the father to pay the sum of $300 per week in child support for the couple's two children, Brooke and Caroline, "until the emancipation of Brooke and Caroline." Shortly after the older child reached 21 years of age, the father filed a petition seeking to terminate his support obligation as to that child, and for a credit of 50% for all child support "charged" after that child's college graduation, on the ground that the older child was emancipated. The Support Magistrate interpreted the stipulation as terminating the father's support obligation only upon both children becoming emancipated, which had not occurred. Family Court denied the father's petition.

The Appellate Division observed that a separation agreement or stipulation of settlement which is incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce is a contract, the terms of which are binding on the parties. When interpreting a contract, such as a separation agreement, the court should arrive at a construction that will give fair meaning to all of the language employed by the parties to reach a practical interpretation of the expressions of the parties so that their reasonable expectations will be realized. Stipulations and separation agreements that provide for an unallocated child support payment may only be reduced or terminated on conditions that are expressly provided for in the stipulation or agreement (Matter of Winokur v. Winokur, 31 A.D.3d 653, 654, 819 N.Y.S.2d 282). Noticeably absent from the stipulation was any express provision allowing the father to reduce his support payments as each child becomes emancipated. Thus, it had to be concluded that the emancipation of an individual child has no bearing on the petitioner's support obligation. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order.

Appellate Division Holds That in a Paternity Suit Party Raising the Defense of Equitable Estoppel Bears the Initial Burden of Proof, and Application of the Doctrine Does Not Involve the Equities Between the Adult Participants

In Matter of Starla D. v Jeremy E., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1948004 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) petitioner, a resident of Alabama, commenced proceeding in January 2011, pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (Family Ct Act art 5-B) against respondent, a New York resident, seeking a DNA test to establish that respondent was the biological father of the child (born in 2001) and, an award of child support. At the initial appearance, a Support Magistrate concluded, based upon a notation contained in the underlying petition, that the proceeding should be transferred to Family Court to determine whether equitable estoppel would bar petitioner from seeking the requested relief (Family Ct Act 439[b]). Following respondent's unsuccessful motion to dismiss, a hearing was held, at the conclusion of which Family Court dismissed respondent's equitable estoppel defense and ordered respondent to undergo DNA testing.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be used by a purported biological father to prevent a child's mother from asserting biological paternity, when the mother has acquiesced in the development of a close relationship between the child and another father figure, and it would be detrimental to the child's interests to disrupt that relationship. The party raising this defense, here, respondent, bears the initial burden of proof, and application of the doctrine does not involve the equities between the adult participants. In the context of a paternity proceeding, it is the child's justifiable reliance on a representation of paternity that is considered and, therefore, the doctrine of equitable estoppel will be applied only where its use furthers the best interests of the child.

Based upon its review of the record as a whole, the Appellate Division could not say that Family Court erred in dismissing respondent's equitable estoppel defense. Petitioner testified that "Eddie," her long-time friend, fleeting romantic interest and occasional roommate, has served as a "father figure" for the child since the child was three months old. Petitioner acknowledged that Eddie had called the child "his son", as had various members of Eddie's family, and that the child, in turn, had referred to Eddie as "dad". Petitioner testified that she previously told both the child and other individuals that Eddie was the child's father. he record also reflects that Eddie and the child have engaged in a number of activities together over the years and that, despite the fact that both petitioner and Eddie were, as of the time of hearing, involved in relationships with other people, the child and Eddie still enjoyed regular and frequent telephone contact with one another and saw each other approximately every three weeks. Although respondent asserted that the foregoing was sufficient to make a prima facie showing of "a recognized and operative parent-child relationship" the Appellate Division disagreed. Noticeably absent from the record was any indication that Eddie played a significant role in raising, nurturing or caring for the child, provided food, clothing and shelter for the child for most of [his] life, or otherwise carried out all the traditional responsibilities of a father. While the record established that Eddie served as a father figure for the child, petitioner identified three other individuals, her boyfriend, her father and a family friend, as father figures for the child, noting that her boyfriend and the child also addressed each other as "son" and "dad," respectively. The record did not support a finding that the child truly believed Eddie to be his biological father, as evidenced by petitioner's testimony that the child asked for permission to call Eddie "dad" . The record failed to establish that the child would suffer irreparable loss of status, destruction of his family image, or other harm to his physical or emotional well-being if this proceeding were permitted to go forward.

Domestic Relations Law §76-h [3] - Where it Is Alleged by Petitioner in a UCCJEA Proceeding That Child Resides in Another State it Is Error for Family Court Not to Take Sworn Testimony Regarding Child's Residence Prior to Reaching Determination That it Lacked Jurisdiction.

In Metz v Orta, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1948025 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were the unmarried parents of a daughter born in 2003. Petitioner (father) commenced a proceeding seeking joint custody and visitation by filing a verified petition in June 2011. He averred that the child and respondent (mother) had lived at an address in the Schenectady for the past four years and that he also lived in Schenectady. When the mother appeared telephonically at the initial appearance and claimed that she had been living in Florida for five years, Family Court stated that it did not have jurisdiction and that the father would have to file a petition in Florida. After further discussion between the court and the parties, the court reversed its position and concluded that it was not going to dismiss the petition. The court then scheduled a hearing date, advised the father that he would be assigned an attorney and concluded the appearance. Three days later the court issued an order of dismissal stating that no one had appeared on the petition, dismissing the petition due to lack of jurisdiction and canceling the previously scheduled hearing.

The Appellate Division reversed. It agreed with the father that Family Court erred in failing to take sworn testimony regarding the child's residence prior to reaching any determination that it lacked jurisdiction. Family Court's jurisdiction is controlled by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which provides specific grounds as the basis for jurisdiction in an initial child custody proceeding (Domestic Relations Law 75-a [4]; 76[1]). Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law s 76-h (1), every party to a child custody proceeding must, in the first pleading or in an affidavit attached to that pleading, give information under oath as to the child's present address, the places where the child has lived within the five years immediately preceding the case and the names and addresses of the persons with whom the child has lived. Here, the father alleged that the child was a resident of New York. Although there was no responsive pleading in the record from the mother, her statement at the initial appearance that she lived in Florida for the past five years raised an issue that should have caused the court to "examine the parties under oath as to the details of the information furnished and other matters pertinent to the court's jurisdiction and the disposition of the case" (Domestic Relations Law 76-h [3]).

Although the attorney for the child argued that the father did not dispute that the child resided in Florida for the past five years, the initial petition listed a New York address as the child's most recent residence, the court did not ask the father for any response to the mother's statement and, by the end of the brief appearance, the father had no reason to dispute the issue of jurisdiction as the court had stated on the record that the petition was not being dismissed. Based on this record, the Appellate Division was unable to conclude that New York did not have jurisdiction over the child custody proceeding and remitted for a hearing on this issue.

Agreements - Construction - Life Insurance Provision - Where No Termination Provision Life Insurance Requirement Continues Despite Children Reaching Age of Majority

In Barlette v Barlette, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1948161 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties, who were divorced in 1995, were the parents of twin daughters (born in 1989). In November 2010, plaintiff moved by order to show cause to hold defendant in contempt unless he provided evidence that he was in compliance with a provision of the parties' stipulation, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, that required him to annually provide proof to plaintiff that he maintained life insurance in the amount of $100,000 for the benefit of each child. Finding that defendant's obligation to maintain life insurance for the benefit of the parties' children expired when the children reached the age of 21, Supreme Court denied the motion.

The Appellate Division modified and remitted for a hearing. It observed that where, as here, a stipulation of settlement is incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce, it constitutes an independent contract by which both parties are bound. The parties' agreement must be "construed in accordance with the principles of contract interpretation" and, if the "language is clear and unambiguous, the intent of the parties must be gleaned from the agreement without resort to extrinsic evidence". Here, the contract provision by which defendant agreed to maintain life insurance in the amount of $100,000 for the benefit of each child was clear and unambiguous, and did not contain any language stating, or even implying, that his obligation to maintain such was related to his child support obligation or would otherwise expire in the future. The stipulation specifically provided that all issues regarding child support, custody and visitation were previously and separately determined by an order of Family Court. In view of these two separate obligations, the stipulation could not be construed as relieving defendant from his agreed-to obligation to maintain life insurance for the benefit of his daughters when they turned 21 years of age (Matter of Meccico v. Meccico, 76 N.Y.2d 822, 824 [1990]; Coloney v. Coloney, 80 A.D.3d 840, 843 [2011]). It had to be presumed that had the parties intended for that result, the stipulation would have included language to that effect. While defendant contended that the obligation automatically expired, by operation of law, when the children turned 21, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][8][a]), that statutory provision applies to obligations imposed by the court, and does not affect or restrict the terms of a stipulation that defendant freely negotiated and agreed upon with the advice of counsel.

Having determined that defendant's obligation to maintain life insurance for the benefit of his children did not expire, the Appellate Division remitted the matter to Supreme Court for further proceedings inasmuch as no hearing was held on plaintiff's motion. Although defendant apparently admitted that he had not maintained life insurance as required by the stipulation, he alleged that he was unaware that the policy he had obtained would decrease in value over time, and further alleged, but provided no actual proof, that he was currently uninsurable due to his allegedly poor health. To the extent that plaintiff requested this Court to award damages based upon defendant's apparent concessions, there was insufficient evidence on this record to determine whether defendant's failure to maintain insurance in the amount set forth in the stipulation constituted contempt and what, if any, an appropriate remedy may be, keeping in mind that "civil contempt penalties should be remedial, not punitive" in nature.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) - Irretrievable Breakdown - Fourth Department Holds That Pleadings Requirements of CPLR 3016 (c) Are Inapplicable and Cause of Action Is "Continuing" for Purposes of Statute of Limitations - Observes Defendants Right to Contest Allegations at Jury Trial

In Tuper v Tuper, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 2053770 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the parties were married in 1973 and had been separated since November 1996, when plaintiff wife moved out of the marital residence. Her complaint for a divorce action based on allegations of cruel and inhuman treatment was dismissed after a nonjury trial. In February 2011, approximately five months after the no-fault statute took effect, plaintiff commenced this action. The complaint alleged in conclusory fashion that the parties' relationship has been irretrievably broken for at least six months. No facts were alleged in support of that assertion. Defendant contended that the complaint fails to comply with CPLR 3016(c), which provides that, "[i]n an action for separation or divorce, the nature and circumstances of a party's alleged misconduct, if any, and the time and place of each act complained of, if any, shall be specified in the complaint..." The Appellate Division rejected that contention holding that because a cause of action for divorce under Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) does not require a showing of any "misconduct" by either party, the requirements of CPLR 3016(c) are inapplicable. In any event, the affidavit submitted by defendant in support of his amended motion to dismiss cured any alleged pleading defects in the complaint. Defendant stated that he and plaintiff have been separated since 1996 and that they have not communicated with each other within the past five years. Those allegations, accepted as true, clearly established that the parties' relationship has been irretrievably broken for far more than the required six months.

The Appellate Division agreed with defendant that a cause of action under the no-fault statute is subject to the five-year limitations period set forth in Domestic Relations Law §210. However, it did not agree with defendant that the action was time-barred inasmuch as plaintiff failed to commence it within five years of the date that the parties' relationship initially became irretrievably broken. In its view, a cause of action for divorce under the no-fault statute should be treated similarly to a cause of action for divorce based upon imprisonment of a spouse (DRL § 170[3]), which is also governed by the five-year statute of limitations set forth in section 210. It observed that in Covington v. Walker (3 NY3d 287, 291) , the Court of Appeals held that a cause of action for divorce based on imprisonment "continues to arise anew for statute of limitations purposes on each day the defendant spouse remains in prison for 'three or more consecutive years' until the defendant is released." It concluded that like a spouse serving a life sentence, an irretrievable breakdown in a married couple's relationship is a continuing state of affairs that, by definition, will not change. The breakdown is "irretrievable." It thus stands to reason that a cause of action under the no-fault statute may be commenced at any time after the marriage has been broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months.

The Court noted that a contrary ruling would force a spouse such as plaintiff to unwillingly remain in a dead marriage. That is inconsistent with the general intent of the Legislature in enacting the no-fault statute, which was to enable parties to legally end a marriage which is, in reality, already over and cannot be salvaged. (Senate Introducer Mem in Support, Bill Jacket, L 2010, ch 384, at 13).

Interestingly, the Appellate Division pointed out in a footnote, that during the debate in the New York State Assembly over the bill that became the no-fault statute, the Assembly sponsor of the legislation, Assemblyman Jonathan Bing, was asked directly by a fellow member of the Assembly whether a defendant in a no-fault case would have a right to contest the plaintiff's allegations at a jury trial. "Yes," Assemblyman Bing responded. "I can't imagine that happening frequently, but yes, technically, that possibility would exist" (N.Y. Assembly Debate on Assembly Bill A9753-A, July 1, 2010, at 238). Bing repeatedly stated "that the legislation does not take away any grounds or any procedural maneuver or anything that currently exists under the law"(id. at 231, 237), and that the allegation of an irretrievable breakdown in the marital relationship can be "contested" (id. at 236). Bing's representations appeared consistent with the fact that the Legislature, upon enacting the no-fault statute, did not amend Domestic Relations Law § 173, which reads: "In an action for divorce there is a right to trial by jury of the issues of the grounds for granting the divorce."

Supreme Court

Domestic Relations Law § 244 - Pre-Judgment Interest - "Wilful Defined" - Agreements - Construction of Life Insurance Provision.

In MM v TM, 2012 WL 1939970 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 50962(U) the parties oral stipulation, and December 2005 agreement provided that the maintenance provision in the separation agreement merged into the divorce decree. The maintenance was $41,600 a year. The husband admitted that he failed to make his monthly maintenance payments from November 2006 through December 2010. In November 2008, the wife commenced a proceeding to collect unpaid maintenance and enforce the life insurance provision of the agreement. She alleged that the husband should be held in civil contempt because of the failure to pay maintenance and to put in place what she alleges is required life insurance coverage. She also sought prejudgment interest on the missed maintenance payments and attorneys fees.

The husband did not dispute that the maintenance for this time was never paid. The husband's primary defense was that he could not afford to pay maintenance because he lost his job in March 2006 through no fault of his own. He also alleged that he paid substantial sums to put his youngest son through college, and he took issue with the initial maintenance determination. None of these defenses constituted a basis to reduce or eliminate maintenance arrears. The Supreme Court held that the wife, who was previously awarded a money judgment for arrears from November 2006 to November 2008, was entitled to a judgment for the maintenance arrears for the months of December 2008 and January 2009. The court finds that the modification petition was filed on January 14, 2009, and therefore, the amount awarded would be a full month's maintenance for December 2008, and half a month's maintenance for January 2009.

The wife also sought pre-judgment interest on the unpaid maintenance, both on an amount previously awarded as arrears upon which decision had been reserved, and upon the amount awarded by this decision. The Supreme Court observed that under Domestic Relations Law §244, the court can award pre-judgment interest if the default was wilful and the husband "knowingly, consciously and voluntarily disregarded the obligation." The statute appeared to define "wilful" as a "knowing, conscious and voluntary" failure to comply with a court's directive. There was no doubt that the husband's failure to pay maintenance in this case was "wilful" from the time of November 2006 through January 14, 2009, when he filed his cross-motion to modify the maintenance. It was undisputed that he knew he had an obligation, under the agreement and judgment, to pay maintenance during this time. He consciously disregarded this obligation. He made no effort to make partial payments. There was abundant evidence that he had access to funds during this period of time. The husband admitted that he sold stocks, cashed in money from retirement accounts, maintained a household, owned a condominium in New Jersey through a solely-owned limited liability company, paid substantial real estate taxes (on a property he did not own which benefitted his second family), had access to a promissory note in which the debtor owed him $100,000, and paid his son's $30,000 college tuition. In all of these instances, he found money to pay for housing, life expenses, and other expenditures, but he never even made a partial payment on his maintenance obligation. Based on these facts, the wife proved by clear and convincing evidence that the husband's failure to pay maintenance from November 2006 through January 14, 2009, was wilful under DRL § 244, and she was entitled to prejudgment interest on those payments.

The Court determined that once he cross-moved to modify his maintenance obligation, the husband's conduct could not be considered wilful. At the time of his application, he was unemployed, had attempted to find employment, and his income had suffered a reduction. Under these circumstances, and because of his court-application, the husband's conduct in failing to pay maintenance, commencing on January 14, 2009, could not be considered wilful because he had a reasonable belief, articulated in cross-moving papers, that he was entitled to a reduction. The court found that his lack of maintenance payments, commencing in January 2009, was not willful.

The wife argued that the husband's "wilfulness" was again present when he obtained new employment at a salary that she alleged was roughly comparable with his salary at the time of the divorce. The evidence established that the husband returned to work in March 2010, but did not inform his wife that he had secured new employment. She only found out about it shortly before issuing an income execution in December 2010. Despite his apparent deceit in failing to report his new income, the court declined to find that his failure to pay maintenance during this time (from March 2010 through December 2010) was a "wilful" violation of his obligations. The husband still had a valid prima facie application to modify his maintenance pending before the court at the time, and although his new source of income made it unlikely that he would be relieved completely of his maintenance obligations, nonetheless, he had some justifiable basis for failing to make these payments. The court concluded that the missed payments from January 2009 through December 2010, were not wilful, and therefore, prejudgment interest was not awarded on these payments under DRL §244.

The judgment of divorce and the agreement contained identical language regarding the provision of life insurance: "In the event the Husband predeceases the Wife, the Husband shall make provisions for the Wife to receive either from life insurance on his life and/or from his estate a sufficient sum of money to make up any shortfall from the amount of $800 per week maintenance, pursuant to Article VI of this agreement, that the wife has from monies received by her from the Husband's pension plans pursuant to Article III, J, 4, 5, and 76 of this agreement and social security payments that she is entitled to receive at that time."

The facts established at the hearing indicated the husband has no life insurance for the benefit of the wife, and has made no provisions for her under any testamentary documents. He testified that he had $266,000 in term life insurance through his employer, but the wife was not a beneficiary under any policy. The wife interpreted the agreement as requiring her designation as a beneficiary to the extent required to make up any shortfall in the maintenance payments. She argued that the husband's failure to comply with this portion of the agreement is wilful and contemptuous. The husband argued that the provision was unenforceable because by its terms the language had no effect unless the husband predeceased the wife, and, that even if the language created an enforceable obligation, the benefits paid to the wife under the pension benefits and social security will exceed her anticipated maintenance benefits.

The court declined to read the prefatory phrase "in the event that the husband predeceases the wife" as a condition precedent to the husband's obligation to obtain the required insurance coverage. This condition precedent was a condition to the requirement to pay over the insurance coverage to the wife. The rationale for the court's interpretation was that if the husband outlives the wife, then the entire life insurance clause is meaningless. The agreement and the judgment of divorce provide that maintenance terminates upon the wife's death. Therefore, the phrase "in the event that the husband predeceases the wife" does not set up a condition precedent to the husband's obligation. This court read this clause as a declaration of the circumstances in which the life insurance payments must be paid to the wife: the obligation only arises when the husband predeceases the wife.

The Court found that the life insurance provision was enforceable, but that did not justify the conclusion that the husband should be held in contempt for violation of the clause. The language of the clause, agreed to by both husband and wife, had an inartfully drafted prefatory clause that mitigated against a finding that the insurance requirement was a "clear and unequivocal mandate." In the court's judgment, the language, by itself, failed to meet the "clear and unequivocal mandate" sufficient to justify a finding of contempt, and it found that the wife has failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the husband, by failing to comply with his contractual obligations under the life insurance clause, was guilty of contempt. The court ordered the husband to procure the insurance coverage required by the agreement within ten (10) days of an order incorporating the decision.

Domestic Relations Law § 234 - Supreme Court Reiterates Oft-Stated Rule That There Is No Authority in the Domestic Relations Law for an Advance or Interim Distribution of Marital Assets

In J.E. v T.E., 2012 WL 1971141 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 50989 (U), Supreme Court denied plaintiff's pendente lite motion to require payment to him of $51,863.00 for the purpose of paying his creditors. The parties were married on April 25, 2001 and had three children. They lived separate and apart with defendant having residential custody of the children and plaintiff having parental access. Just prior to the commencement of the action, defendant wife won a substantial amount of money in the New York State Lottery, and pursuant to the parties' written stipulation most of the winnings were placed in accounts with an investment company subject to mutual restraints against withdrawal or other use of the Fund. Tax free income from a portion of the Fund was payable to defendant and, pursuant to the Stipulation, she deferred plaintiff's obligation for child support, pending trial. Plaintiff was given permission by defendant to withdraw $50,000.00 from the Fund for his personal use, with an additional $10,000.00 that was paid to plaintiff's attorney. In a more recent stipulation defendant was granted permission by plaintiff to withdraw monies from the Fund to pay income taxes and legal and accounting fees arising in connection with her lottery winnings. In this application, plaintiff claimed that he needed monies to pay various judgment creditors, some of whom had attached his wages. Plaintiff was a "Union Ironworker" reporting income from wages and interest of $81,332.00 in 2011, and claiming the three children as exemptions. His net worth statement listed 14 accounts payable which added up to the $51,863.00 requested. Plaintiff submitted two recent credit reports which showed a plethora of debts in various stages of collection. However, he did not submit any judgments, details or records showing when, to whom, by whom or for what purpose the debts were incurred. This lack of information was a sufficient basis, alone, for denial of the motion because the Court was not able to discern whether the debts were incurred in furtherance of the marriage. It observed that outstanding financial obligations incurred during the marriage, which are not solely the liability of either spouse, may be deemed marital obligations. However, a financial obligation incurred by one party in pursuit of his or her separate interests should remain that party's separate liability. Moreover, there is no authority in the Domestic Relations Law for interim distribution of marital assets, especially where, as here, numerous economic issues remain for consideration. The Court cited Damon v. Damon, 34 AD3d 416 (2d Dept.2006), which supports the necessity of withholding even partial equitable distribution until the trier of fact has heard all of the evidence at a trial.

Family Court

Child Support - Modification - Imputed Income - Not All Union Fringe Benefits Should Be Considered as Income for Calculating Support. To Be Considered as Part of Gross Income They must Be Regularly or Periodically Received by the Recipient or Reduce the Recipient's Living Expenses.

In Matter of K.W. v. M.W. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1858976 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) petitioner filed an application seeking to modify the parties' divorce decree signed on September 1, 2011, alleging that the Judgment of Divorce stated that he had a right to apply for a modification of child support within 30 days of the divorce if he was not employed; and the petitioner was working for less than he did in 2010, as 2010 was an exceptional year. The petitioner requested a downward modification of the support order. The Support Magistrate found that the petitioner did not demonstrate that his income for 2011 was less than his income was in 2010 when factoring his fringe benefits into his hourly rate of pay. The Support Magistrate also found that the petitioner did not provide proof of his actual business expenses. Based upon these findings, the Support Magistrate concluded that the petitioner had not demonstrated a sufficient change in circumstances such that a modification of the support order was warranted and dismissed the petition with prejudice.

The petitioner argued before the Family Court that the fringe benefits provided to the petitioner through his union were not a part of his salary in that he did not receive these monies. Petitioner's W-2 statements, which were received into evidence, indicated that he received only the union base rate of $28.55 per hour and not the amount in excess of $45.00 per hour ascribed to him by the Support Magistrate. Family Court observed that the Child Support Standards Act does not limit a parent's income to the amount reported as taxable income on the income tax return. Section 413(1)(b)(5)(iv)(C) of the Family Court Act provides that the court may impute to gross income an amount which considers "fringe benefits provided as a part of compensation for employment."

The evidence of benefits from the petitioners union showed that the base rate was $28.55 per hour with additional hourly rates for the following benefits: pension fund, welfare fund, annuity fund, apprenticeship fund, industry advancement fund, and LMCT. When the base rate and the fringe benefits were added, the total was $45.35 per hour, which was the amount cited by the Support Magistrate.

In this case of first impression, the Family Court agreed that not all union fringe benefits should be counted as income for the purposes of calculating child support. As a general rule, the Court found that such benefits must be regularly or periodically received by the recipient or must reduce the recipient's living expenses to be considered as a part of a parent's gross income. It found the reasoning of Kansas Court of Appeals decision to be persuasive on this subject. (See Woolsey v. Woolsey, 153 P.3d 570, WL 806022 (Kan.App.)). For example, the amount contributed by an employer to the employee's pension fund, 401k account, or health insurance premium would not be imputed to gross income for the purpose of calculating child support. However, an allowance for a vehicle or cell phone which is used for personal use would be considered for inclusion in the gross income amount. Such a rule would be applied by the court on a case-by-case basis taking into consideration the evidence adduced at trial on that particular proceeding.

There was insufficient information in the record before the Court to determine which, if any, of the petitioner's union fringe benefits should be counted as gross income for the purpose of calculating child support. However, the Court found there was sufficient basis to affirm the decision of the Support Magistrate. Irrespective of his employment status, the Court found that the petitioner did not demonstrate an adequate change of circumstances in support of a downward modification of his child support obligation. A downward modification of child support is granted when a party demonstrates that there has been a change in circumstances since the entry of the last support order which necessitates a reduction of the child support award. Child support is determined by the parent's assets and ability to provide for the child rather than the parent's current economic situation. While the evidence showed that the petitioner earned less money in 2011 than in 2010, there was no indication that he made any effort to make up for the loss of earnings by seeking other, or additional, employment. Petitioner testified that he was not eligible to receive unemployment compensation for a five-week period in 2011 as he chose to take a "vacation" during those weeks. He testified that during that period he took his children on a cruise, spent a week in Canada, and spent the rest of the time at home. Although the loss of employment or the reduction in employment may constitute a change in circumstances warranting the modification of the child support amount, the moving parent must demonstrate a good-faith effort to obtain employment commensurate with that parent's qualifications and experience. The record was devoid of any such proof.

Family Court Act 216-c - Duty of Person Who Assists Pro Se Litigant in Preparation to Include All Allegations Presented by the Petitioner - Court Suggests it May Be Appropriate Modify Statute.

In Matter of Adefunke A v Adeniyi A, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1948798 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) between June 21, 2011 and January 26, 2012 Adefunke A. filed three family offense petitions against her brother, Adeniyi A.

The June 21, 2011 family offense petition alleged that the parties reside together in Corona, and that: The most recent event was on June 1, 2011 at home. Petitioner states the respondent was verbally derogatory to her. Petitioner also states that the respondent wanted her to wear dirty clothing. The respondent also made an inappropriate call to 911 * * * Petitioner was taken by ambulance to Elmhurst Hospital and she was hospitalized in the psychiatric ward for three (3) days against her will. Petitioner also states that on April 19, 2011 the respondent slapped her in the chest. Petitioner also states that back in 2009 the respondent illegally cashed a check made out to her. Petitioner also states that the respondent illegally held her passport until he returned it to her in February 2011. * * * I have filed a criminal complaint concerning this incident. At the conclusion of the hearing the Court dismissed the petition as not proven by a preponderance of the evidence.

On December 7, 2011 Ms. A. filed a family offense petition against her brother, in which Ms. A. alleged that the parties continue to reside together in Corona, and that: On or about November 27, 2011 at my home in Corona, N.Y. the respondent slapped me on both sides of my face and repeatedly hit me all over my upper body with my slippers. The respondent then stepped on my glasses causing them to break. On or about mid-to-late November 2011 the respondent took my passport and repeatedly refused to return my passport to me. My passport was returned to me yesterday. The respondent has withheld my passport from me on more than one occasion. The Court granted respondent's motion to dismiss this petition based upon petitioner's failure to appear and prosecute the petition.

The third petition, filed by Ms. A. on January 26, 2012, alleged that she and her brother continue to reside together and that: The most recent incident was on December 29, 2011. Petitioner states "Note presence of assaults on other dates after the original case (see 1st line for dated entry). Respondent is aggressive and inappropriate with bodily insult, deform verbal expressions [sic] and derogatory comments and inappropriate courtesy [sic]. There have been multiple fights with bodily involvement-upper body (see hits and slaps to the upper body); other bodily assaults-see push/pull and wrestling; verbal insults with derogatory remarks and intention to psychological assault [sic] see inappropriate and unruly comments about guest relations and co-living expenses. Defendant/ Respondent is responsible for damages/Hetch values [sic]. Petitioner further states in June 2010, "911 call to psychiatric ward at East Elmhurst after a laundry/load dispute [sic]; has been to same court w/o appropriate resolution; physical aggression and inappropriate response/affect about courtesy, right and age-relations-note date sequences (see 911 reports after 06/01/2011; also note 12/29/2011) [sic] and the history of explanations connected to date sequence. Respondent recently broke a pair of new glasses (see need for reimbursement); also review docket No.O-12688/11 connected to this file for damages that were not properly treated for awards and right of collection see history of documents. I have filed a criminal complaint concerning these incidents: petitioner states that she wrote a letter.

During the proceedings upon the third family offense petition, Mr. A. presented the Court Attorney-Referee and this Court with documentation relating his sister's mental condition demonstrating that she was suffering from psychosis and needed anti-psychotic medication. She had refused medication on a sufficient number of occasions to materially affect her condition" and her "illness interferes with her ability to make reasoned decisions with respect to her treatment" and "[l]eft untreated, the patient's mental illness will continue to deteriorate ."

The Court dismissed this third family offense proceeding at the same time that the second family offense petition was dismissed due to the failure of the petitioner to appear and prosecute the proceeding. Based upon the Court's review of the records of the three family offense petitions filed in the Court, and the information concerning petitioner's psychiatric condition, the Court's order of dismissal provided that the petitioner was prohibited from filing any further family offense petitions against her brother without prior court authorization.

The Family Court observed that Family Court which was envisioned as a unified statewide tribunal equipped to determine every symptom of familial dysfunction. It noted that "Family Court is frequently characterized as a pro se tribunal, i.e., a court whose doors are open to any member of the public who believes that she has a justiciable claim against any other individual. Filing fees are non-existent. The large number of unrepresented litigants adds to the chaotic and anarchic atmosphere in the Family Court, and providing assistance to the many unrepresented litigants adds tremendously to the burden placed upon court personnel. The Court noted that free access to the court was not always the prevailing practice. In the late 1970s it was alleged that probation officers and court officials had adopted a pattern and practice of attempting to discourage the filing of family offense petitions by unrepresented persons, and of delaying the presentation of family offense petitions to a judge for prompt action, even where the prospective litigant had made allegations of immediate danger. In 1977 amendments were made to the Family Court Act "to prohibit officials from discouraging or preventing any person who wishes to file a petition from having access to the court for that purpose. The legislation amended

Family Court Act 812(3) to provide that "[n]o official or other person designated pursuant to subdivision two of this section shall discourage or prevent any person who wishes to file a petition or sign a complaint from having access to any court for that purpose" (L 1977, ch 449). In 1981 (L 1981, ch 416) the Legislature again amended the Family Court Act, adding Family Court Act 216-b and 216-c, which provide procedures intended to ensure that unrepresented litigants have access to the court. Family Court Act 216-c provides specific procedures which court personnel must observe in preparing petitions on behalf of unrepresented litigants. Family Court Act 216-c, provides: (a) Whenever a petitioner is not represented by counsel, any person who assists in the preparation of a petition shall include all allegations presented by the petitioner. (b) No clerk of the court or probation officer may prevent any person who wishes to file a petition from having such petition filed with the court immediately. (c) If there is a question regarding whether or not the family court has jurisdiction of the matter, the petition shall be prepared and the clerk shall file the petition and refer the petition to the court for determination of all issues including the jurisdictional question. (d) This section shall not be applicable to juvenile delinquency proceedings.

Family Court observed that in this case court personnel were assigned to assist Ms. A. in filing all three of her family offense petitions and an application for leave to file a fourth petition. With respect to the third family offense petition, court personnel faithfully complied with the mandate of Family Court Act 216-c, and every allegation made by the petitioner was included in the petition, without regard for whether the allegations were intelligible or whether the allegations set forth a cause of action for a cognizable family offense. The petition was then filed and referred to this Court on the same day, as required by Family Court Act s 153-c, which provides that a person filing a petition in the Family Court in which a temporary order of protection is requested "shall be entitled to file a petition without delay on the same day such person first appears at the family court, and a hearing on that request shall be held on the same day or the next day that the family court is open following the filing of such petition.

The Court observed that Family Court Act 216-c was enacted 30 years ago because court clerks and probation officers were seen as unresponsive to the needs and desires of unrepresented petitioners, and the statute "totally divests clerks of the power to regulate the content and filing of petitions" (Weiner v. State of New York, 273 A.D.2d 95, 97 Allen v. Black, 275 A.D.2d 207, 209). The Court concluded that the concerns which led to the enactment of these statutory provisions no longer exist, and the number and complexity of the cases coming before the Family Court have increased exponentially since 1981. The strict construction afforded to Family Court Act 216-c has reduced experienced Family Court clerks to "scribes", and as applied, the provisions of this section make it quite likely that many petitions will be filed that lack legal merit or that contain unnecessary or improper allegations. Given the heavy caseload of the Family Court, the shortage of available resources, and the inconvenience and cost which result from the filing of meritless petitions, the court pointed out that it may be appropriate for the Legislature and court administrators to consider whether Family Court Act 216-c should be modified to improve the efficiency of the Family Court without denying access to unrepresented litigants.

Given petitioner's demonstrated proclivity to engage in vexatious and baseless litigation against her brother, and the strong suggestion that she may be presently afflicted with untreated mental illness, the Court's prior order directing that Ms. A. obtain permission of a Family Court Judge prior to initiating any further family offense petitions against Adeniyi A. was continued.

Appellate Division, First Department

Counsel Fee Award - Domestic Relations Law §237 - 22 NYCRR 202.16[k][2], [3] - Updated Net Worth Statement Not Necessary Where No Evidence Plaintiff's Economic Condition Substantially Changed from Previously-submitted Recent Net Worth Statement.

In Kiwon S. v. Daniel S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1836379 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted plaintiff's motion for pendente lite relief to the extent of directing defendant to pay plaintiff's attorney interim counsel fees in the amount of $100,000, subject to reallocation at trial. It held that the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding counsel fees, given the evidence of the large discrepancy in the parties' respective incomes, the significant business investments within defendant's control, the nature of the issues in dispute, and plaintiff's lack of sufficient funds of her own to compensate counsel without depleting her limited assets. Plaintiff's moving papers included both the requisite statement of net worth and affirmation of counsel (22 NYCRR 202.16[k][2], [3]). The court properly exercised its discretion in concluding that plaintiff's failure to provide an updated statement of net worth was not fatal to her motion. Although an updated net worth statement would have given the court the most current information, there was no evidence that plaintiff's economic condition had substantially changed from what had been reported on her previously-submitted recent net worth statement. Nor was movant required to submit a personal affidavit (22 NYCRR202.16[k][2],[3]).

Evidence - Cross Examination - Hostile Witness - Improper to Ask Leading Questions Where Witness Not Declared Hostile and No Showing She Was Lying or Refused to Answer.

In Maria A.M. v Dexter N., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1623377 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which modified the order of custody and awarded petitioner sole legal and physical custody of the child while awarding respondent liberal visitation. Respondent acknowledged that the child did not wish to live with him, there was testimony that, on at least one occasion, the police were called and arrested the child after she had an altercation with respondent, and the child, who would soon turn 18, had requested to live with her mother and younger half sibling. Given this evidence, petitioner established that there had been a change in circumstances since the April 29, 2009 custody and visitation order and stipulation were entered, and that the change in custody from respondent to petitioner was in the child's best interests. Respondent's hearing counsel called petitioner as a witness but did not request that she be declared a hostile witness and made no showing that she was either lying or unwilling to answer his questions. Thus, the referee properly sustained the objection to the leading questions counsel asked petitioner.

In re Giannis F, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1673089 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the application of the attorney for the child alleged to have been abused to permit the child to testify at the fact-finding hearing through two-way closed circuit television, subject to contemporaneous cross-examination by the parties. It held that the court properly balanced respondent mother's due process rights with the emotional well-being of the child in permitting the child to testify to years of sexual abuse by her stepbrother, which the mother did not believe took place, outside their presence, but visible via closed-circuit television and subject to contemporaneous cross-examination (citing Matter of Q.-L.H., 27 A.D.3d 738, 739 [2006]) The affidavit of the social worker who interviewed the child on multiple occasions and who spoke with a social worker at the facility where the child was being treated sufficiently established the potential trauma to the child, which would likely interfere with her ability to testify accurately and without inhibition.

Equitable Distribution - Domestic Relations Law 236 [B][6] - Under Circumstances of Case Maintenance Awarded Should Be Taxable to Plaintiff and Deductible by Defendant

In Chaudry v Chaudry. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1699445 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff nontaxable spousal maintenance of $1,583.33 per month for a duration of 4 years commencing June 2010, and $1,235 per month for a duration of 10 years commencing June 2014, directed that the defendant shall not take such maintenance as a tax deduction, directed the defendant to pay the college tuition, fees, and book costs of the parties' unemancipated child, awarded the plaintiff credits of $40,127.52, and denied plaintiff an attorney's fee. The Appellate Division deleted the provision directing that spousal maintenance shall be nontaxable to the plaintiff and that the defendant shall not take such maintenance as a tax deduction, and awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee of $47,905. It held that under the circumstances of this case, including the present and future earning capacity of the parties, the reduced or lost lifetime earning capacity of the plaintiff, and the marital standard of living, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in its determination of the amount and duration of maintenance. However, it held that the maintenance awarded should be taxable to the plaintiff and deductible by the defendant (citing Markopoulos v. Markopoulos, 274 A.D.2d 457, 459, 710 N.Y.S.2d 636). It found that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to award the plaintiff an attorney's fee. In determining whether to award fees, the court should "review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions" In light of, among other things, the significant disparity in the parties' incomes and the amount of time spent at trial tracing the funds that the defendant admittedly withdrew from marital accounts without the plaintiff's knowledge, an award of one half of the plaintiff's counsel fees was appropriate. Accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to an attorney's fee of $47,905.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) - Proper to Apply Formula in Separate Action Commenced after effective date of new statutory Formula

In Charasz v. Rozenblum, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1699448 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that as the parties were entitled to commence separate actions for divorce, the Supreme Court properly applied the new statutory formula set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) to determine an appropriate award of temporary maintenance pursuant to the wife's application for pendente lite relief, which was made in her separate divorce action, commenced after the effective date of the new statutory formula.

Agreements - Construction - College Education Provision - Obligation to Consult - Family Court Did Not Have Jurisdiction to Make a Declaration as to the Validity of an Alleged Oral Modification of a Separation Agreement .

In Tammone v Tammone, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1415417 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court improperly granted the mother's objections to an order dated October 26, 2010, which granted the father's petition to require the mother to pay a share of the college expenses for the parties' older child pursuant to the parties' separation agreement. Article VII section B of the parties' separation agreement provided in relevant part that the parties "shall be obligated to pay for each child's undergraduate education consisting of four years of undergraduate schooling in proportion to each party's income at the time each child attends college so long as the child pursues said education on a full time, continuous basis with the reasonable diligence calculated to obtain grades commensurate with the child's ability," and that the children's colleges "shall be chosen with the consultation and consideration of their parents [sic] wishes and financial condition," but that "[i]rrespective of the parties [sic] incomes at the time the children attend college, neither party shall pay more than 60% of the above college expenses" after the exhaustion of funds in certain bank accounts and the funds in the father's life insurance policy. The mother admitted that she was consulted at the time the parties' oldest child selected her four-year undergraduate college, but she contended that the father did not comply with the obligation to consult her regarding the selection of the child's school for her second year of college and, therefore, that her obligation to pay her share of the college expenses never arose.. The father admitted that he never consulted the mother regarding the subject child's continued attendance at High Point University for the 2010-2011 academic year, i.e., her second year at this four-year university, contending he had no obligation to do so under the separation agreement.

The Appellate Division agreed with the father. It observed that where the agreement's language is clear and unambiguous, the court should determine the intent of the parties based on that language without resorting to extrinsic evidence. Here, the separation agreement did not provide that the mother was to be consulted regarding the subject child's choice of school on a yearly basis. Such an interpretation would effectively add a term to the separation agreement that did not exist under the guise of contractual interpretation. Courts may not by construction add or excise terms, nor distort the meaning of those used and thereby make a new contract for the parties under the guise of interpreting the writing.

The Appellate Division held that to the extent the Family Court determined that the parties orally modified the separation agreement, or that the father waived rights thereunder, those determinations were incorrect. The Family Court did not have jurisdiction to make a declaration as to the validity of an alleged oral modification of a separation agreement (Gottlieb v. Gottlieb, 294 A.D.2d 537, 538). Moreover, even if the mother had sought an order modifying her support obligations, and even if the Family Court had jurisdiction to grant such relief, the mother made no showing that an unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances had occurred since the parties entered into the separation agreement. Furthermore, the father did not waive any rights provided under the separation agreement, since waiver is not created by negligence, oversight or thoughtlessness, and cannot be inferred from mere silence. In any event, the separation agreement in this case included a "no waiver" clause which required a written stipulation to alter its terms.

Neglect - Family Ct Act 1046[b][1]) - While Domestic Violence May Be a Permissible Basis upon Which to Make a Finding of Neglect Not Every Child Exposed to Domestic Violence Is at Risk of Impairment.

In Matter of Chiam R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1415432 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) at approximately 1:30 A.M. on December 10, 2009, the mother and father were arguing in the living room of their home. The argument led to a physical altercation in which both the mother and father sustained minor physical injuries. The police were called and, when they arrived, the mother was sitting calmly on the couch in the living room while the father was standing holding the youngest child, who was then seven months old. The older child, then two years old, was in the bedroom, and neither child was crying. After interviewing the parents, the police arrested them and charged them each with assault in the third degree. The petitioner filed neglect petitions against the mother and father, alleging that they neglected the children when they perpetrated acts of physical abuse against each other. In subsequent interviews with a caseworker, the mother initially stated that the children were not present during the argument, but later stated that they were. The father admitted that he and the mother had argued, but did not provide further details to the caseworker. At the fact-finding hearing, the petitioner elicited the above evidence by presenting the testimony of the police officer who responded to the home after the incident and the caseworker who had interviewed the mother and father. No evidence was provided detailing the altercation or regarding the impairment of the children's physical, mental, or emotional condition. The mother and father did not testify. At the conclusion of the hearing, the Family Court entered a neglect finding against both parents. The Family Court subsequently issued a dispositional order, that upon releasing the children to the mother's custody, directed that she be supervised by the petitioner for a period of six months and that the father be supervised by the petitioner for a period of 12 months, complete an anger management course, and attend individual therapy.

The Appellate Division reversed and dismissed the petitions. It observed that to establish neglect, the petitioner must demonstrate, by a preponderance of the evidence, (1) that the child's physical, mental or emotional condition has been impaired or is in imminent danger of becoming impaired, and (2) that the actual or threatened harm to the child is due to the failure of the parent or caretaker to exercise a minimum degree of care in providing the child with proper supervision or guardianship (Family Ct Act 1046[b][1]). While domestic violence may be a permissible basis upon which to make a finding of neglect not every child exposed to domestic violence is at risk of impairment (Nicholson v. Scoppetta, 3 N.Y.3d at 375). Under the facts presented here, the petitioner failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the children's physical, mental, or emotional conditions had been impaired or were in imminent danger of becoming impaired as a result of the incident of domestic violence between the parents.

Child Support - Modification - Substantial change in circumstances - father's support obligation to his son from a different relationship could not be basis for a downward modification of obligation to instant child.

In Matter of Montgomery v Prioleau, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1415446 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother and the father had one child in common, who was four years old at the time of the hearing. The father was obligated to pay the mother a total of $160 per week in child support, pursuant to an order of the Family Court dated September 23, 2008. The father also paid approximately $160 per week in child support for his son from a different relationship, pursuant to an order of the Family Court, Bronx County, dated March 13, 2007. In 2010, the father filed a petition in the Family Court, Westchester County, for a downward modification of his child support obligation as set forth in the order of that court dated September 23, 2008. At the ensuing hearing, the father testified that he had maintained his two jobs working for Pepsi and Gristedes Supermarket, but that his overtime hours had been cut due to the economic downturn. In an order dated December 16, 2010, the Support Magistrate in Westchester County found that the father was not entitled to a downward modification of his support obligation, holding that the father had failed to demonstrate a substantial change in circumstances. The Family Court denied the father's written objections.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that contrary to the father's contention that he need only demonstrate a change in circumstances in order to obtain a downward modification in his child support obligation, a party seeking a downward modification of a support order must demonstrate a substantial change in circumstances warranting the modification. Family Court properly found that the father failed to demonstrate such a substantial change in circumstances. Family Court properly concluded that the father's support obligation to his son from a different relationship could not, under the circumstances, be a basis for a downward modification of his obligation to the instant child. The father's obligation to the son from a different relationship was set by the Family Court, Bronx County, before his obligation to the child in this case was set by the Family Court, Westchester County. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the father's objections to so much of the Support Magistrate's order as denied the father's petition for a downward modification of his child support obligation.

Child Custody - Modification - Substantial Change of Circumstances - Recurring Medical Issues and lateness to school demonstrated change of circumstances warranting modification of custody order.

In Matter of Ferran v Fenner, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1415468 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father presented evidence at the hearing which established that the child had developed recurring infections while in the mother's care, and the mother failed to treat the infections as prescribed by the doctor. In addition, the father's evidence showed that the child had numerous absences and was late to school on many occasions when she was in the mother's care. The child was thriving in the father's care, and her previously recurring medical issues had resolved. Moreover, the father actively participated in the child's educational process and fostered the relationship between the child and the noncustodial parent. This evidence was sufficient to demonstrate a change in circumstances warranting a modification of the prior order of custody to protect the best interests of the child. Accordingly, it declined to disturb the Family Court's award of sole custody of the child to the father with certain visitation to the mother.

Child Custody - Natural Parent Vs. "Stranger" - Extraordinary Circumstances Demonstrated Where Boys Living in Deplorable, Unsanitary and Unsafe Conditions.

In Matter of Carpenter v Puglese, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1431836 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Edward A. Carpenter Jr. (father) and Brandy M. Sharp (mother) were the unmarried biological parents of fraternal twin boys. Approximately five weeks after the boys' birth in February 2008, a caseworker from the local social services agency made an unannounced visit to the parents' home and discovered that the boys were living in what she described as deplorable, unsanitary and unsafe conditions. Specifically, the parents' residence was littered with garbage, animal feces and the remnants of a cat's afterbirth, had several broken windows and lacked a working stove, toilet and heating system. At the time of the caseworker's visit, the boys were at the home of the mother's uncle, Robert P. Puglese, and his girlfriend, Melissa S. Switzer. Following discussions with the caseworker, Puglese and Switzer agreed to allow the mother and the boys to stay with them. Although the mother returned to live with the father shortly thereafter, the boys remained with Puglese and Switzer. The father proceedings in April 2010 seeking custody of the boys and naming the mother and Puglese as respondents. Puglese and Switzer then commenced a separate custody proceeding against the mother and the father in August 2010, which was followed by the mother's petition for custody in October 2010. Following a hearing, Family Court awarded custody of the boys to Puglese and Switzer with supervised visitation to the mother and the father.

The Appellate Division affirmed. The Appellate Division observed that evidence that the parent has failed either to maintain substantial, repeated and continuous contact with a child or to plan for the child's future has been found to constitute persistent neglect sufficient to rise to the level of an extraordinary circumstance. Puglese and Switzer met their heavy burden of demonstrating the requisite extraordinary circumstances here. By his own admission, the father only saw the boys for brief periods of time (15 to 30 minutes each) on three occasions shortly after they went to live with Puglese and Switzer in April 2008 and subsequently did not see them again until August 2008. The father attempted to see the boys once in 2009 but, upon finding no one at home, "never went back ... there for awhile." the father did not see the boys at all during 2009 and, as of the time of the hearing, The father did not own a car, possessed only a restricted driver's license and, with the exception of his last two visits with the boys, never provided them with gifts or otherwise contributed to their support. Thus, notwithstanding the father's attempt to gain custody of the boys in 2008, there was ample evidence to support Family Court's finding that he persistently neglected the boys.

The Appellate Division reached a similar conclusion as to Family Court's finding that the father was an unfit parent. In addition to the foregoing, the father's decision to permit his newborn twins to reside in a residence with several broken windows, "snow coming in underneath the front door and so forth" and no working stove, toilet or heating system, coupled with the parents' history of domestic violence, evidenced a lack of judgment sufficient to rise to the level of parental unfitness. The mother admitted that she was bipolar, and the father testified that she was prone to fits of violence. On one occasion, the mother purportedly came at the father with a butcher knife, prompting him to "literally punch her in the head and knock her out" in order to protect himself. Upon considering the totality of the circumstances, including the parents' respective housing and employment situations, it was in the boys' best interests to award custody to Puglese and Switzer, who had been caring for them since shortly after their birth.

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - plaintiff entitled to a credit for he contributed to closing costs and down payment, and amount of the mortgage loan balance forgiven by his mother.

In Lurie v Lurie, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1431850 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) an action for divorce, defendant challenged Supreme Court's division of the equity in the parties' marital residence. The residence was purchased in July 1998, approximately one month after the parties were married. In order to pay for the purchase price of $130,000, plaintiff liquidated an individual retirement account that he acquired prior to the marriage and secured a personal loan from his mother. At the closing, defendant discovered that the deed to the property was issued to plaintiff alone, and insisted that she be added as a grantee. Shortly after the closing, another deed from the sellers was recorded, which named both plaintiff and defendant as grantees. In November 2000, plaintiff's mother forgave the balance then existing on the mortgage. Thereafter, plaintiff executed a quitclaim deed in August 2003, which transferred the property from his name, alone, to both him and defendant as tenants by the entirety. Plaintiff commenced this action for divorce in July 2008. Supreme Court ordered, among other things, that plaintiff was entitled to a credit in the distribution of the equity in the marital residence for the amounts he contributed to the closing costs and down payment for its purchase, as well as the amount of the mortgage loan balance forgiven by his mother.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that the parties did not dispute that the marital residence constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution or that plaintiff's contributions to its acquisition, including the mortgage loan forgiveness, constituted his separate property. It rejected defendant's argument that Supreme Court improperly credited plaintiff for such contributions in the distribution of the residence and should have divided the equity in that asset equally between the parties. Specifically, defendant contended that Supreme Court failed to consider the implications of certain financial circumstances and of various transactions that occurred with respect to the parties' properties during the marriage which, she argued, resulted in the transmutation of plaintiff's separate property interest in the marital residence into marital property. For example, defendant emphasized that she was the primary wage-earner during the marriage, paid the majority of the marital expenses, including the expenses related to the marital residence, and negotiated a reduction in mortgage payments. In addition, she noted that the marital residence was debt free by December 2000, but was encumbered by a mortgage in the amount of approximately $44,000 at the time of trial as a result of various other investments, including a failed business on plaintiff's part, which were financed by loans secured by the marital residence. Defendant also argued that the 2003 quitclaim deed was intended by plaintiff to convert to marital property any separate property claim that he may have had to the equity in the marital residence. Plaintiff gave varying explanations for this deed. After hearing the testimony, Supreme Court apparently discredited defendant's interpretation as to its significance.

The Appellate Division observed that absent an abuse of discretion, it may not disturb the trial court's distributive award (Fields v. Fields, 15 N.Y.3d 158, 170 [2010]). Moreover, given Supreme Court's superior opportunity to assess the credibility of the witnesses, it defers to its determinations. It was clear that Supreme Court considered the parties' respective financial contributions to the acquisition of their marital property in general, and to the marital residence in particular. Moreover, the record evidence supported Supreme Court's conclusion that plaintiff contributed separate funds toward the acquisition of the marital residence and did not relinquish or forgo his claim to such separate contribution. It discerned no abuse of Supreme Court's discretion in its determination to credit plaintiff for his separate property contributions to the marital residence in equitably distributing that asset.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 451(1) - Family Court Not Required to Dismiss Petition Based upon Petitioner's Failure to File Supporting Affidavit - Family Ct Act § 424-a [C] - Financial Disclosure Requirement Is Not Waivable by the Parties or the Court.

In Malcolm v Trupiano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1431883 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were the parents of one child (born in 2001). By order entered in January 2011 and corrected in February 2011, Family Court found that respondent's pro rata share of child support, including health insurance premiums, was $813.30. The court then determined that this amount would be unjust or inappropriate due to petitioner's receipt, as representative payee, of $1,008 monthly from the Social Security Administration (SSA) on behalf of the child as a result of respondent's entitlement to Social Security retirement benefits (Family Ct Act 413[1][f]). The court set respondent's support obligation at $540.15 per month. At the end of January 2011, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking to modify the newly issued order, alleging that respondent had contacted the SSA requesting that he be named the child's representative payee, the SSA made the change, and the child's Social Security check had been redirected to respondent. Following two appearances at which no sworn testimony was taken and no documents were received into evidence, the Support Magistrate granted petitioner's application, set respondent's child support obligation at $1,300 per month and continued all other provisions of the prior order. Family Court denied respondent's objections.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that Family Court was not required to dismiss the petition based upon petitioner's failure to file a supporting affidavit. Because the language of Family Ct Act § 451(1) is "permissive rather than preemptory," the court has discretion to determine whether to proceed with a hearing on an application to modify an order of support. Nevertheless, reversal was required because in all support proceedings, including modification proceedings, "there shall be compulsory disclosure by both parties of their respective financial states" (Family Ct Act § 424-a [a]). While dismissal of the petition is not required if a petitioner fails to file mandated financial disclosure documents, "the court may on its own motion or upon application of any party adjourn such proceeding until such time as the petitioner files with the court such statements and tax returns" (Family Ct Act § 424-a [c]). It held that although respondent did not seek such an adjournment, Family Court should have imposed one. The record did not indicate that disclosure of any of the statutorily required financial information occurred. As no documents were admitted and no testimony was taken, no actual hearing occurred, the record lacked any reliable information upon which the court could base its determination. The Support Magistrate presumably relied on the financial information supplied in conjunction with the prior petition, which had been resolved shortly before the commencement of this proceeding. It held that the financial disclosure requirement is not waivable by the parties or the court (see Matter of Skrandel v. Haese, 2 AD3d 1188, 1189 [2003]). Relying on recent information is important especially where, as here, a party alleges that the financial circumstances have changed. Additionally, the court did not calculate respondent's child support obligation in conformity with the requirements of the Child Support Standards Act. The order was reversed and the matter remitted to Family Court for further proceedings on the petition.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Child Custody - Attorney for Child - Role - Attorney for Child Has Right to Be Heard and Object to Proposed Settlement but No Right to Veto Settlement.

In Matter of McDermott v Bale, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1450178 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), a custody proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 6, the Attorney for the Children (AFC) appealed from an order granting the parties joint custody of their two children, with primary physical residence to petitioner-respondent mother and liberal visitation to respondent-petitioner father. The order incorporated the terms of a written stipulation executed by the parties on the eve of trial. The AFC refused to join in the stipulation, but Family Court approved the stipulation over the AFC's objection. We reject the AFC's contention that the court erred in approving the stipulation. Although we agree with the AFC that he " 'must be afforded the same opportunity as any other party to fully participate in [the] proceeding and that the court may not "relegate the [AFC] to a meaningless role" the children represented by the AFC are not permitted to "veto" a proposed settlement reached by their parents and thereby force a trial. The record reflected that, unlike in Matter of Figueroa, upon which the AFC relies, the court here gave the AFC a full and fair opportunity to be heard, and the AFC stated in detail all of the reasons that he opposed the stipulation. Indeed, the court gave credence to many of the comments made by the AFC, as did the attorneys for the parents, both of whom agreed to modify the stipulation to address several of the AFC's concerns. It rejected the argument of the AFC that children in custody cases should be given full-party status such that their consent is necessary to effectuate a settlement. The purpose of an attorney for the children is "to help protect their interests and to help them express their wishes to the court" . There is a significant difference between allowing children to express their wishes to the court and allowing their wishes to scuttle a proposed settlement. It noted that the court is not required to appoint an attorney for the children in contested custody proceedings, although that is no doubt the preferred practice. Thus, there is no support for the AFC's contention that children in a custody proceeding have the same legal status as their parents. It concluded that where the court in a custody case appoints an attorney for the children, he or she has the right to be heard with respect to a proposed settlement and to object to the settlement but not the right to preclude the court from approving the settlement in the event that the court determines that the terms of the settlement are in the children's best interests. Parents who wish to settle their disputes should not be required to engage in costly and often times embittered litigation merely because their children or the attorney for the children would prefer a different custodial arrangement.

Equitable Distribution - Factor 14 - Tax Consequences - Dependency Exemption - Proper to Allow husband to purchase wife's exemption for amount of tax savings wife would have realized - Pensions - Error to Direct that wife shall not share in any early retirement benefits or enhanced pension payments, if any, that husband may receive in future.

In D'Ambra v D'Ambra, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1450282 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division found no merit to the wife's contention that the court erred in granting one dependency exemption to each party while allowing the husband to purchase in any given year the wife's exemption for the amount of tax savings the wife would have realized were she to claim the child on her tax return. It noted at the outset that the wife did not appear to be aggrieved thereby. According to the uncontradicted testimony of the husband's tax expert, the wife would derive no benefit from the dependency exemption due to her limited income, which consisted solely of disability benefits. In any event, nothing in the language of the federal tax law limits the discretion of a state court to allocate the dependency exemption (Agnello v. Payne, 26 AD3d 837), and the court therefore could have awarded both exemptions to the husband. It agreed with the wife that the court erred in awarding the husband one half of the funds in the wife's M & T savings account as of the date of commencement of the action, and modified the judgment accordingly. That account was in the wife's name only, and she established at trial that the funds in the account came exclusively from her disability payments. Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(1)(d)(2) provides that "compensation for personal injuries" is separate property not subject to equitable distribution, and disability payments constitute compensation for personal injuries. It concluded that the court erred in determining that the wife shall not share in any early retirement benefits or enhanced pension payments, if any, that the husband may receive in the future and modified the judgment accordingly. "Vested rights in a noncontributory pension plan are marital property to the extent that they were acquired between the date of the marriage and the commencement of a matrimonial action, even though the rights are unmaturing at the time the action is begun" (Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 485-486). Although Social Security bridge payments and severance payments generally are not subject to distribution under Majauskas, early retirement or pension benefits of the type at issue in this case have been treated differently (Olivo v. Olivo, 82 N.Y.2d 202, 207-209). It rejected the wife's contention that the court erred in awarding her only a 15% share of the husband's business, given that the wife made only indirect contributions to that business and concluded that the " 'equities of the case and the financial circumstances of the parties' " supported the court's refusal to award attorney's fees to plaintiff.

Child Support - Family Court Act 580-201(5) - Acts of Parents Who Requested Children Be Placed in Care of Aunt in New York, Executed Limited Power of Attorney Authorizing Aunt to Withdraw Child from School, and Executed Durable Powers of Attorney for Health Care in New Mexico, Supported Conclusion That Children Resided in New York "As a Result of the Acts or Directives" of Respondents" - Due Process - Parents Voluntary Decision to Place Children with Aunt in New York and Formal Acts Effectuating Decision Constituted More than Mere Acquiescence. As Distinguished from Kulko, Parents Purposefully Availed Themselves of the Privilege of Conducting Activities Within this State , by Sending Their Children to Live with Their Aunt Without Providing Financial Support for Children.

In Matter of Chautauqua County Department of Social Services o/b/o Colleen A. Y.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1450294 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Petitioner commenced proceedings pursuant to Family Court Act article 4 seeking an order directing Rita M.S., the respondent in proceeding No. 1 (hereafter, stepmother), and Kenneth M.Y., the respondent in proceeding No. 2 (hereafter, father), both of whom were nonresidents of New York, to furnish support for the four children who were the subjects of these proceedings (collectively, children). Petitioner sought child support retroactive to the time that the children entered the foster care system in New York. Upon respondents' default, the Support Magistrate, directed the father to pay child support in the amount of $775 per week effective the date on which the children were placed in foster care and directed the stepmother to notify the Support Collection Unit of any change in employment status and health insurance benefits. The support orders were dated July 6, 2010. Respondents did not file objections to the July orders. In October 2010, respondents moved to vacate the support orders and to dismiss the support proceedings pursuant to CPLR 5015(a)(4) based upon Family Court's alleged lack of personal jurisdiction. By orders dated November 9, 2010 , the Support Magistrate "denied and dismissed" respondents' motions to vacate the support orders, determining that the court had jurisdiction over respondents pursuant to Family Court Act 580-201(5). Respondents filed objections to the November orders, and Family Court dismissed those objections and affirmed the November orders of the Support Magistrate. The Appellate Division affirmed.

The Appellate Division rejected respondents argument on appeal that the court erred in failing to review their challenges to the July orders in the context of their objections to the November orders. Although respondents were correct that the proper procedure to challenge an order entered upon a default is by way of a motion to vacate the default pursuant to CPLR 5015(a) rather than by way of the filing of objections pursuant to Family Court Act 439(e) respondents moved to vacate the July orders and to dismiss the proceedings solely on the basis of alleged lack of personal jurisdiction pursuant to CPLR 5015(a)(4), not on the basis of excusable default pursuant to CPLR 5015(a)(1). Thus, respondents' motions brought up for review only the issue of jurisdiction, not the underlying merits of the July orders.

The Court rejected the Respondents argument that the court's jurisdictional determination had to be vacated because it was not based upon competent evidence.. Contrary to respondents' contention, the Support Magistrate was not required to hold a hearing on the issue of personal jurisdiction before issuing the July orders. The support petitions alleged that New York had long-arm jurisdiction over respondents pursuant to Family Court Act 580-201(5), and respondents failed to answer the petitions, failed to move to dismiss the petitions for lack of personal jurisdiction (see CPLR 3211[a][8]), and failed to appear in court in opposition to the petitions. It concluded that the Support Magistrate properly determined, based upon the documentation provided by petitioner, that it had long-arm jurisdiction over respondents. The court observed that when respondents moved to vacate the July orders on the ground that the court lacked personal jurisdiction, the Support Magistrate was faced with conflicting submissions on that issue from respondents and petitioner. Assuming, arguendo, that respondents' submissions disputed the underlying jurisdictional facts and not simply the legal conclusions to be drawn therefrom, respondents would have been entitled to a hearing on the issue of personal jurisdiction. Respondents, however, waived any right to a hearing on jurisdiction by submitting their motion on papers only.

The Appellate Division concluded that respondents failed to preserve for review their contention that the Support Magistrate's jurisdictional findings were not based upon competent evidence inasmuch as they did not challenge the competence of the evidence submitted by petitioner in their motions to vacate the July orders. Although respondents contended in their objections to the November orders denying their motions to vacate the July orders that those orders were not based upon competent proof, Family Court properly determined that such contention was unpreserved inasmuch as it was not raised before the Support Magistrate in the motions to vacate.

The Appellate Division concluded that the court properly determined that it had personal jurisdiction over them. Family Court Act § 580-201 provides that, "[i]n a proceeding to establish ... a support order ..., the tribunal of this state may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident individual ... if[, inter alia,] the child[ren] reside[] in this state as a result of the acts or directives of the individual" . It held that the children clearly resided in New York as a result of respondents' acts and directives. After respondents were arrested and each charged with felony child abuse against the children, the Magistrate Court for Dona Ana County, Las Cruces, New Mexico ordered respondents to avoid all contact with the children. In light of the no-contact order, respondents requested that the children be placed in the care of the children's aunt in New York. In an August 2008 letter to the New Mexico Children, Youth and Families Department (CYFD), the father stated that "[t]he relative who will be available to take custody of any or all of the girls on our behalf is their aunt who would take them back to her dairy farm. We request they be released to her Monday 8/11/08 ... [I]t is beyond all doubt in their best interest to be in such household rather than in foster care. She will be here as early tomorrow as you say they might be released." To that end, respondents executed a limited power of attorney authorizing the aunt to withdraw one of the children from school, and executed durable powers of attorney for health care designating the aunt as the children's agent for health care decisions. On August 11, 2008, CYFD and the aunt entered into a "safety contract" pursuant to which the aunt agreed to provide for the children's basic needs. In addition, the safety contract stated that the aunt understood that respondents "have voluntarily placed the children in [her] care for an undetermined length of time," and that she was

"to contact [respondents] if [she were] in need of any financial assistance for the [children], as the [respondents] are still legally responsible for the [children's] well-being." Thereafter, the aunt transported the children to her home in New York. Under those circumstances, we conclude that the children began residing in New York "as a result of the acts or directives" of respondents within the meaning of Family Court Act § 580-201(5), and thus that the court properly exercised personal jurisdiction over respondents.

The Court rejected respondents' further contention that the assertion of jurisdiction in this case violates due process. "As a general rule, in order for the courts of one State to exercise jurisdiction over an individual who is domiciled in another State, due process requires that there be sufficient minimum contacts between that individual and the forum State such that the forum State's assertion of jurisdiction will not offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice' ". In particular, the subject individual's "conduct and connection with the forum State [must be] such that he [or she] should reasonably anticipate being haled into court there". Respondents rely on Kulko v. Superior Ct. of California (436 U.S. 84), in which the United States Supreme Court addressed the issue of personal jurisdiction in a child support action. There, the Supreme Court held that the father's mere "acquiescence" in his daughter's desire to live with the mother in California did not confer jurisdiction over the father in the California courts. Respondents contended that they merely acquiesced in the arrangement between CYFD and the aunt to place the children temporarily in New York with the aunt. Unlike in Kulko, where the father assented to his daughter's desire to live with her mother in California, here respondents chose to send the children to New York after they were ordered to have no contact with the children. Respondents notified CYFD that they wished the children to reside with the children's aunt in New York rather than being placed in foster care in New Mexico, and they executed the necessary documents to facilitate the transfer of the children to the aunt. Respondents' voluntary decision to place the children with the aunt in New York and their formal acts in effectuating that decision constitute more than mere acquiescence, and the fact that respondents did not make the children's travel arrangements was not dispositive. Further, as distinguished from Kulko, here respondents "purposefully avail[ed themselves] of the privilege of conducting activities within th[is] State", by sending their children to New York to live with their aunt, a New York resident, without providing financial support for the children. Pursuant to the safety contract, the aunt "agree[d] to provide for the [children's] basic needs, to include their medical, educational, and mental health needs." The aunt further agreed that she would "contact [respondents] if [she was] in need of any financial assistance for the [children], as they are still legally responsible for their well-being ". The Support Magistrate aptly noted, "[i]t [wa]s foreseeable, certainly that someone, whether it be [petitioner] or the aunt herself, was, at some point, going to be asking for support of children that are not theirs." It thus concluded that respondents' conduct in relation to New York was such that they "should [have] reasonably anticipate[d] being haled into court here, and, thus that the court properly exercised personal jurisdiction over respondents

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Court Erred in Adding Provision with Respect to Tax Deductions and Exemptions as Jurisdiction Is Generally Limited "To Matters Pertaining to Child Support and Custody", and Tax Deductions or Exemptions Are Not an Element of Support.

In Warner v Warner, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1450408 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed that part of the judgment of divorce providing that all future "issues relative to income tax deductions and exemptions concerning the children" shall be referred to Family Court. Although the judgment was entered upon consent, the provision was added by Supreme Court sua sponte, and defendant's attorney objected to that provision. Thus, defendant's contention was properly before the Court. It agreed with defendant that the court erred in adding the provision with respect to the tax deductions and exemptions inasmuch as the jurisdiction of Family Court is generally limited "to matters pertaining to child support and custody", and tax deductions or exemptions are not an element of support. Although Family Court Act § 115(b) provides that Family Court has jurisdiction "over applications for support, maintenance, a distribution of marital property and custody in matrimonial actions when referred to the family court by the supreme court", marital property is defined as that property which is acquired during the marriage, and the parties' entitlement to tax deductions and exemptions concerning the children will affect only property acquired after the marriage.

Health and Medical Insurance - Domestic Relations Law § 236B(A) - Obligation to Provide Insurance Ceases upon the Termination of the Spouse's Duty to Provide Maintenance, Child Support or a Distributive Award Despite Prior Appellate Division Holding.

In Lomaglio v Lomaglio, 2012 WL 1676768 (N.Y.Sup.) Unreported Disposition, the parties were divorced in 1998. It was undisputed that the original divorce judgment, which was not submitted on the motion, required the husband to pay maintenance for 18 months. The judgment did not require him to contribute any sum to the wife's health insurance costs. In 1999 Supreme Court held a hearing on the wife's request for modification of her maintenance and to require the husband to make a contribution to her health insurance costs. After a trial, the court denied her request for modification of maintenance and a contribution to her health insurance. The Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's conclusion that the wife was not entitled to permanent maintenance. (LoMaglio v. LoMaglio, 273 A.D.2d 823 (4th Dep't 2000). It found that 18 months was a sufficient period to permit the wife to become self-sufficient concluding there was "no basis to disturb the court's exercise of discretion in awarding durational maintenance for that limited period." However, considering the application for contribution to or purchase of health insurance, the court directed: "because defendant's medical condition is likely to be permanent, the court should have directed plaintiff to continue to provide the same level of medical insurance coverage that he provided during the marriage to the extent such coverage is not provided by defendant's employer." It modified the judgment accordingly.

The Supreme Court found that the Appellate Division determination regarding the "permanency" of the wife's condition was intriguing. The lower court concluded that her condition did "not prevent her from maintaining regular full-time employment." The Appellate Division declined to modify the maintenance provision in the divorce decree but, in the quoted section, gave some direction regarding the husband's obligation to provide health insurance for the wife. After the Appellate Division decision, the husband continued to provide "medical insurance" for the wife. He paid for premiums for the coverage from 2000 through 2008. In 2008, he discontinued paying the premiums. The wife brought an application for reimbursement and restoration of the health insurance coverage. The husband challenged the interpretation of the Appellate Division, arguing that the court's use of the word "permanent," while describing the wife's infirmities, did not require non-durational health insurance coverage. The husband argued that interpreting this language to require him to provide non-durational health insurance coverage defied the Domestic Relations Law and was unenforceable. Supreme Court observed that DRL § 236B(a) provides, in relevant part, that: "The obligation to provide such insurance shall cease upon the termination of the spouse's duty to provide maintenance, child support or a distributive award."

The husband argued that regardless of the Appellate Division's use of the word "permanent" to describe the wife's infirmities, the Court was without the statutory authority to require the husband to provide health insurance for the wife beyond the term of the maintenance which, under the separation agreement, was only 18 months. The wife argued that the Appellate Division holding was decisive on the question of the husband's obligation to provide health insurance and that DRL §236B(a) does not undercut the Appellate Division holding as either res judicata or the law of the case.

Supreme Court granted the husband's cross-motion to extinguish the husband's obligation to provide health insurance. Supreme Court found no evidence that either party raised the question before the Court in 2000 and, there was no evidence the Appellate Division even considered the statute. It could not ignore the statutory language of DRL § 236B(8)(a), which limits the period in which an order for the continuation of health insurance can occur. It observed that the Legislature could not have been clearer: the obligation to provide health insurance "shall cease upon the termination of the spouse's duty to provide maintenance." There was simply no statutory authority to continue the husband's obligation to pay for health insurance beyond the 18-month period for maintenance that the original divorce decree mandated. After reviewing the existing case law Supreme Court found that there was there is no case authority which required the husband to pay health insurance costs after the period of maintenance terminates. Given this express statutory command, the Court could not read the 2000 Appellate Division decision in Lomaglio v. Lomaglio to require the husband to continue health insurance payments beyond the 18-month period set forth in the divorce decree. The Court concludes that the Appellate Division's Court's use of the phrase "permanent" in the text of its Lomaglio v. Lomaglio opinion was ambiguous and was used to only describe the wife's infirmities and was not intended to be construed to create a requirement for the husband to pay health insurance costs beyond the expiration of his maintenance.

The court declined to hold that the husband's voluntary payment of health insurance premiums well beyond the period of maintenance required him to continue to pay them. It also declined to preclude the husband's claims through invocation of either res judicata or the law of the case doctrines.

Child Support - DRL § 240(1-b)(c)(7) - College Expenses - Decision to Impose a Suny Cap on Cost of Child's College Education must Be Determined on a Case-by-case Basis, Considering Parties' Means and Child's Educational Needs.

In Tishman v Bogatin,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1392995 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed defendant to pay 40% of the cost of the parties' older child's college education. It held that the motion court properly rejected defendant's contention that a so-called SUNY cap should be imposed on his obligation to contribute to the costs of the child's college education-that is, that his contribution should be based on the cost of an education at a college in the State University of New York system, because plaintiff failed to show that the child's needs cannot be met adequately at a SUNY college. Whether to impose a SUNY cap is determined on a case-by-case basis, considering the parties' means and the child's educational needs. A rule that, absent unusual circumstances, a parent's obligation is limited to the maximum SUNY tuition would be inconsistent with Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(c)(7), which provides that a court may award educational expenses where it determines, "having regard for the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties and in the best interests of the child, and as justice requires," that the education sought to be paid for is appropriate. The record supported the court's direction that defendant pay 40% of the costs of the parties' older child's education at a private college. The child attended an elite public high school, his reasons for preferring the private college over SUNY schools were sound, both parties attended private college and private law school, and both parties had the resources to pay the tuition at the private college where the child was enrolled

Judgments - Incorporation of Agreement - Where Judgment Does Not Accurately Incorporate the Provisions of a Stipulation of Settlement the Stipulation Prevails

In Ayrovainen v Ayrovainen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1322433 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that when a party alleges that a judgment does not accurately incorporate the provisions of a stipulation of settlement, the preferred remedy is to move in the trial court to resettle or vacate the judgment, rather than to appeal. Nevertheless, the Court may address the issue and, upon examining the stipulation and the judgment appealed from in this matter, it found that the latter did not conform to the former in several key respects including: the percentage of the college expenses of the parties' children for which the defendant was responsible, the date upon which the defendant's obligation to maintain the former marital residence would cease, under what conditions the defendant's maintenance obligation would terminate, and the manner in which the parties would claim their youngest child as a tax exemption. In addition, the judgment conflicted with the stipulation with respect to the defendant's responsibility to maintain a life insurance policy with the plaintiff as a beneficiary, whether the parties agreed that there would be a cost of living increase for the defendant's child support obligation, and whether the defendant was to assist the plaintiff with a potential sale of certain real property located in Livingston Manor. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court to issue a corrected judgment which accurately reflects the terms of the parties' stipulation entered on the record in open court.

Divorce - Irretrievable Breakdown - Supreme Court Permits Amendment of Complaint to Add Irretrievable Breakdown Ground under DRL § 170 (7) Rejecting Strack and Schiffer Decisions - Finds No Statute of Limitations Under DRL § 170 (7) and Res Judicata Does Not Apply to DRL § 170 (7)

In Palermo v Palermo, 2011 WL 7711557 (N.Y.Sup.), 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 52506(U), the couple were married in 1977. In September 2000, the wife moved out of the marital residence. In 2001, the wife commenced a divorce action against the husband on grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment and a jury returned a verdict of no cause for action. In February 2011, the wife again filed a verified complaint, this time on the grounds that the marital relationship had broken down for a period in excess of six months. The husband answered, denying the allegations, and asserting an affirmative defense that the couple had lived separate and apart for a period of at least 10 years. The husband moved to dismiss the wife's complaint, arguing that the statute of limitations had expired on her claims, that they were barred by res judicata, and that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. The wife cross-moved to replead the claim under DRL § 170(7) to include the specific allegation that the marriage was irretrievably broken for a period of greater than six months. Because amendments to pleadings at the early stages of litigation are widely favored, the motion to amend and serve the complaint was granted. CPLR 3025(b).

The Supreme Court held that the verified statement of "irretrievable breakdown" of a marriage, in itself, without a trial, provided the necessary predicate to granting a divorce under the Domestic Relations Law. It examined the history of New York's no fault divorce law. It observed that in Gleason v. Gleason, 26 N.Y.2d 28 (1970) the Court of Appeals pointed out that the legislature recognized "that it is socially and morally undesirable to compel a couple whose marriage is dead to remain subject to its bond." The Gleason decision is important to the current question because it recognizes that the state legislature could fashion divorce remedies based on both parties consent to end their marriage without further testimony or evidence as to their private intentions. In this case, the question was whether the state legislature provided the same relief-divorce-based on the intentions of just one of the two partners to the marriage, without any inquiry into their intent or conduct by enacting DRL § 170(7). Supreme Court pointed out that under this statute the legislature no longer requires evidence of the "mutual contemporaneous intention" as required by the two previous no-fault grounds. Under DRL § 170(7), one partner alone can declare the marriage is "dead" if sworn to under oath, in accordance with the statutory language. While a strict reading of the statute suggests that the declaration alone provides the basis for a divorce, the husband contended that he was entitled to a trial on this provision relying on Strack v. Strack, 31 Misc.2d 258 (Sup.Ct. Essex Cty.2011), where, citing the Domestic Relations Law provision for a right to trial by jury, the court concluded that the legislature failed to include anything in the Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) to suggest that the grounds contained therein are exempt from this right to trial. Had it intended to abolish the right to a trial for the grounds contained in the Domestic Relations Law, it would explicitly have done so. The court concluded that the question of whether a breakdown is irretrievable is a question of fact to be determined at trial.

In view of the Strack decision, there was an apparent collision of the no-fault entitlement under DRL §170(7), and the trial right under DRL § 173. The legislative history of New York's newest no-fault statute demonstrated the legislature's recognition of this "evil" and the proposed "remedy." It was apparent that the legislature intended to provide estranged couples a simple and incontestable basis for ending their marriage, and avoid the squabbling over issues that flow from the other objective grounds in DRL § 170. In view of this intent, the court declined to follow the logic or holding of Strack. The court concurred with A.C. v. D.R., 32 Misc.3d 293 (Sup. Cty. Nassau Cty.2011) that there is "no defense to the no-fault grounds." This court also considered the opinion in Schiffer v. Schiffer, 33 Misc.3d 795 (Sup.Ct. Dutchess Cty.2011), which followed the logic of Strack, holding that the no-fault assertion under DRL § 170(7) was subject to the trial requirement.

The court found little in Schiffer that differed from the analysis in Strack and declined to follow it. The Schiffer court suggested that what is required, as a matter of fact finding under DRL § 170(7), is that the relationship be irretrievably broken and a statement under oath by the party seeking the divorce. However, there is no "and" connecting the sworn statement provision and the "irretrievable breakdown for six months" assertion. The legislature used another connector: "provided." The use of this word-"provided"-rather than "and" means that the "irretrievable breakdown for six months" must be accepted as true "provided" one party swears that it is true. The court in Schiffer also raised a "due process" argument, claiming that the courts should not deprive a spouse of the right to trial on irretrievable breakdown and that to hold otherwise reduces the court to a "rubber stamp" when presented with a claim under DRL § 170(7). This suggestion ignored the Court of Appeals directive in Gleason: [R]ights growing out of the [marriage] relationship may be modified or abolished by the Legislature without violating the provisions of the Federal or State Constitution which forbid the taking of life, liberty or property without due process of law. Gleason v. Gleason, 26 N.Y.2d 28 (1970); see also A.C. v. D.R., 32 Misc.3d 293, 306 (Sup. Cty. Nassau Cty. 2011) (reasserting compelling conclusion of Gleason that there is no due process right to any defense in matters involving the dissolution of marriages). For these reasons, this court declined to follow Schiffer. The defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint, because it failed to state a cause of action, was denied.

The Supreme Court also denied the motion to dismiss for violation of the statute of limitations. It held that there is no statute of limitations under DRL § 170(7) because the cause of action only arises at the time the party swears that the marriage has been irretrievably broken for a period in excess of six months. A cause does not accrue until there is "a legal right" to be enforced. Hahn Automotive v. Amer. Zurich Ins. Co., 81 AD3d 1331 (4th Dep't 2011). The cause of action for divorce on the basis of irretrievable breakdown accrues at the time of the attestation by one partner and not sooner. The statute of limitations has no pertinence to a cause of action that arises at the time of the filing of the complaint.

Finally, the Supreme Court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss based on res judicata. It held that res judicata did not preclude the claim under DRL § 170(7) because it is based on a different theory and cause of action. A jury finding that no cause of action for cruel and inhuman treatment existed a decade ago only applied to the facts before the jury at that time. It did not preclude this claim for a divorce on the grounds that one party has sworn that the marriage has been irretrievably broken for a period of excess six months.

Divorce - Irretrievable Breakdown - Supreme Court Permits Amendment of Complaint to Add Irretrievable Breakdown Ground under DRL § 170(7) Even Though Amendment States That the Act Shall Apply to Matrimonial Actions Commenced after the Effective Date

In G.C v G.C., 2012 WL 1292729 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 50653(U) Supreme Court permitted an amendment to a divorce complaint to add new causes of action under the Domestic Relations Law which arose after the filing of the complaint. The plaintiff brought a divorce action prior to October 10, 2010. He alleged that his wife had engaged in cruel and inhuman treatment toward him. The wife answered the complaint, denying the specific allegations. After the commencement, the parties lived apart. The wife moved to Ohio. During discussions over the status of the case, the wife made it clear that she would contest the grounds for the divorce. The husband moved to amend the complaint to assert two new grounds: a ground under Domestic Relations Law § 170(2) for abandonment and a claim under Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) for an "irretrievably broken" marriage. The wife opposed the abandonment amendment, arguing that the husband can not allege abandonment when it occurred during a year after the filing of complaint and that its assertion, now, after the action has been pending for more than two years, is untimely and prejudicial. She opposed he amendment on the grounds of under Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) because the complaint was filed prior to the effective date of the change.

Supreme Court observed that amendments were both made pursuant to CPLR 3025(b), which provides that amendments should be freely given or a complaint may be supplemented "by setting forth additional or subsequent transactions or occurrences, at any time by leave of court."CPLR 3025(b). An avalanche of authority directs that the leave to amend a complaint should be "freely granted" unless the proposed amendment is clearly and patently insufficient on its face. Williams v. Ludlow's Sand & Gravel Co., 122 A.D.2d 612 (4th Dep't 1986). A cause of action under Domestic Relations Law s 170(2) requires allegations that a spouse's actual physical departure from the marital residence for one year is unjustified, voluntary, without consent of the plaintiff spouse, and with the intention of the departing spouse not to return. The amended complaint, on its face, met this minimal pleading requirement: it alleged that the wife left the marital residence in 2009, has not returned and her leaving was without justification. The pleading stated the cause of action. Under the weight of cases favoring "freely granting" amendments to complaint, the cause of action for abandonment, although it accrued while this action had been pending, was properly pleaded and did not lack merit.

The Court pointed out that in October, 2010, the Legislature added a statutory change to the Domestic Relations Law which created "no-fault divorce" and permitted one party to be granted the divorce upon a sworn declaration that the marriage was "irretrievably broken for a period in excess of six months" and the parties had agreed on all the issues related to support and equitable distribution The wife correctly noted that the statutory amendment states that the "act ... shall apply to matrimonial actions commenced after the effective date."It was undisputed that the effective date was October 12, 2010. The clear intention of the Legislature, based on this language, was to not allow litigants to simply amend their complaints, after the amendment took effect, and allow those claims to proceed to adjudication on the basis of the new "no-fault" allegations by claiming that the six months of "irretrievable breakdown" included time before the effective date of the amendment. Nevertheless, the court granted his motion noting that the husband was not seeking any relief other than that sought in the original complaint: a divorce and accompanying property distribution. By virtue of the statutory change, the husband, having waited six months after its effective date, could now meet the time requirement of six months because all of the time accrued after the amendment took effect. The court reasoned that the husband's motion did not violate the language of the statute or the intention of the Legislature. Instead, he sought to invoke what the Legislature extended to him: a cause of action that has ripened because more than six months have passed since the date of the amendment and during that time, the husband swears that his marriage has been irretrievably broken. It pointed out that in Gleason v. Gleason, 26 N.Y.2d 28 (1970), the Court held that a statutory amendment, which added subdivision (4) to Section 170 of the Domestic Relations Law, could be used to permit an uncontested divorce to incorporate a separation agreement signed before the effective date of the statutory change. The Court of Appeals, in resolving the issue of the application of a new ground for divorce to an agreement, signed before the effective date of new statute, could not ignore the beneficial aspect of the statute and its goal of reducing tensions in obtaining final judgments in matrimonial cases. In this case, the change created by the addition of Section 170(7) paralleled the statutory change in Gleason v. Gleason: it simply provides another ground for a divorce. The new statute does not create greater rights for a spouse in a divorce. The no-fault change provides a speedy method for establishing the grounds and does not obviate the wife's right to insist on a trial regarding any and all financial issues related to the couple. The new change gives neither party any greater property rights. For these reasons, the language of CPLR 3025(b), the lack of any prejudice to the wife's property rights and the judicial command to "freely grant" such applications weigh heavily in favor of granting this motion. The motion to amend to add claims under Section 170(4) and 170(7) was granted.

First Department Holds Although Husband Retained All the Property, Court Will Not Set Aside Agreement on Ground of Unconscionability Where Inequitable Conduct Lacking

In Barocas v Barocas, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1293783 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division rejected defendant's contention that the property division provisions of the parties prenuptial agreement were unconscionable. Defendant failed to establish that her execution of the agreement was the result of inequitable conduct on plaintiff's part. Rather, the parties fully disclosed their respective assets and net worth, and the agreement was reviewed by independent counsel, who defendant admitted had told her that the agreement was "completely unfair" and advised against signing it. The fact that plaintiff's attorney recommended defendant's counsel, and that plaintiff paid her counsel's fees, was insufficient to demonstrate duress or overreaching. Defendant's claim that she believed that there would be no wedding if she did not sign the agreement, that the wedding was only two weeks away and that wedding plans had been made, was insufficient to demonstrate duress. Although application of the provisions would result in plaintiff retaining essentially all the property, courts will not set aside an agreement on the ground of unconscionability where inequitable conduct was lacking and simply because, in retrospect, the agreement proves to be improvident or one-sided. The circumstances surrounding the execution of the agreement disclosed no issue of fact as to whether there was overreaching. It therefore adhered to the general rule that " '[i]f the execution of the agreement ... be fair, no further inquiry will be made' " (Levine v. Levine, 56 N.Y.2d 42, 47 [1982], citing Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 73). Moreover, duly executed prenuptial agreements are accorded the same presumption of legality as any other contract" (Bloomfield v. Bloomfield, 97 N.Y.2d 188, 193 [2001]). The majority disagreed with the dissent's conclusion that there was an issue of fact as to whether the property division provisions of the instant agreement are unconscionable. They observed that an unconscionable contract is one "which is so grossly unreasonable as to be unenforcible because of an absence of meaningful choice on part of one of the parties together with contract terms which are unreasonably favorable to the other party" (King v. Fox, 7 NY3d 181, 191 [2006]). Here, meaningful choice was not an issue inasmuch as defendant knowingly entered into the agreement against the advice of her counsel.

The majority also held that although defendant's waiver of spousal support was not unfair or unreasonable at the time she signed the agreement, given her knowing and voluntary execution thereof with benefit of counsel, factual issues existed as to whether the waiver would be unconscionable as applied to the present circumstances (Domestic Relations Law 236[B][3][3]). A Child support award for the parties' two children had not been established, and it was unclear whether defendant would become a public charge without spousal support. It was also unclear whether waiver of all spousal support would result in inequality "so strong and manifest as to shock the conscience and confound the judgment of any [person] of common sense" (Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 71). The evidence showed that, despite the 15-year marriage, under the agreement, plaintiff would be entitled to retain property valued at about $4,600,000, while defendant would be entitled to only an IRA account valued at approximately $30,550. She claimed that she had no other assets or sources of income, and could no longer work, given that she was now 50 years old and that plaintiff had thwarted her efforts to get a college education and pursue a career during the marriage. Plaintiff, contends that defendant chose not to get a college degree or pursue a career, and that, while he supported her various business projects, the projects failed or she would quit after losing interest. The majority found that issues of fact existed as to whether the maintenance waiver would be unconscionable as applied to the current circumstances. Justices Freedman and Manzanet-Daniels dissented in part in separate memoranda.

Finding of Neglect Does Not Require Actual Injury But, Rather, an Imminent Threat That Such Injury or Impairment May Result.

In Matter of Lamarcus E.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1211389 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondent, the father of the child (born in 2002), was granted custody in 2008 in a contested proceeding against the child's mother. In August 2009, while under petitioner's supervision, respondent informed petitioner that he intended to relocate to Connecticut in October 2009 to obtain employment and live with his girlfriend, but that he would not be taking his then seven-year-old son with him. Petitioner rejected respondent's request to accept the child into a voluntary placement. After Family Court and petitioner rejected three different plans proposed by respondent for the future care of the child, petitioner filed a neglect petition against him alleging that he intended to imminently implement his plan to permanently relocate to Connecticut without the child and without any viable plan for the child's care. Upon receipt of the petition, the court immediately removed the child and placed him in the temporary custody of petitioner, and respondent relocated to Connecticut as planned. Following a fact-finding hearing, respondent, who remained living out of state, was found to have neglected the child and, after a dispositional hearing, the court continued the child's placement with petitioner in foster care. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that a finding of neglect does not require actual injury but, rather, an imminent threat that such injury or impairment may result. In addition, the impairment "must be a consequence of the parent's failure to exercise a minimum degree of parental care" (Matter of Afton C. [James C.], 17 NY3d at 9; Nicholson v. Scopetta, 3 NY3d at 368, 370). Parental behavior, in turn, is evaluated by asking whether, under the circumstances, a reasonable and prudent parent would have so acted. Family Court based its determination of neglect upon respondent's plan to effectively abandon the care and custody of his child which, absent the intervention of petitioner, the court found would "certainly" have led to the impairment of the child's physical, mental or emotional condition. Upon learning of his plan to leave his child behind without a viable caretaker, petitioner's caseworkers had multiple discussions with respondent regarding the child's future. One caseworker testified that, during these discussions, respondent told her that he did not want to take the child along because he was "too much to handle" and he did not want to be responsible for facilitating, from Connecticut, visitation with the child's mother; he persistently requested that the child be placed in foster care. Significantly, although Family Court had previously ordered respondent not to relocate with the child out of state, he told a caseworker that he would not be taking his child with him even if granted the court's permission to do so and he did not file a petition to modify that restriction. While respondent implied in his brief that petitioner's refusal to permit him to voluntarily place his child in foster care is the basis for the neglect finding against him, a voluntary placement is appropriate only where a parent is unable to care for his or her child, and not where a parent is simply unwilling to do so, as here (see Social Services Law 384-a). Respondent's knowledge that his child would be placed in foster care upon his refusal to take him to Connecticut, fully aware that this placement would result in a charge of neglect against him, reflected his clear intention to abdicate his parental obligations, including his responsibility to adequately plan for his child's needs, thereby placing the child at risk. Respondent's suggested alternatives to placing his child in foster care reflected a glaring and fundamental misunderstanding of his responsibilities as a parent. Respondent's blatant unwillingness to provide proper care and supervision for his child placed the child in imminent danger of impairment.

Supreme Court Holds Agreement Provision Prohibiting Divorce until Apartment Sold Violated Public Policy Governing Divorces in New York

In Filstein v Bromberg, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1167458 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married in 1989. They parties purchased the marital residence, a three-bedroom condominium located on West 23rd Street in Manhattan ("the apartment") in 1998. In October 2007 the wife brought an action for separation. On February 15, 2008, the parties entered into the separation agreement that settled the wife's action for separation. The separation agreement, at Article IV, Paragraph 4(G), provides, in relevant part: " Prior to the sale of the Apartment, (i) the parties' attorneys shall prepare a package of documents for the parties and counsel to sign, pursuant to which the Husband will be able to obtain an uncontested divorce based upon the Wife's having abandoned the Husband more than one year prior to the commencement of this action; and (ii) neither party shall file any papers to obtain a judgment of divorce." More than four years after the parties entered the separation agreement resolving the 2007 action for separation, the apartment remained unsold and the parties remained married. The husband commenced an action in March 2011 for divorce and for a declaratory judgment determining that the no-divorce clause of the separation agreement was unenforceable. The husband moved pursuant to CPLR 3212 for partial summary judgment on his cause of action for declaratory judgment. He argued that conditioning the ability to obtain a judgment of divorce on the parties' ability to sell the apartment violated public policy. The wife argued in opposition that the clause is an enforceable contractual provision and that striking it would amount to the court finding that there is an absolute right to divorce. The wife also argues that if the no-divorce clause is held to be unenforceable, then she is entitled to have the entire separation agreement invalidated.

Supreme Court held that Article IV, Paragraph 4(G) of the parties' separation agreement violated public policy governing divorces in this state. In Gleason v. Gleason, 26 N.Y.2d 28 (1970), the Court of Appeals laid out New York's public policy position: "Implicit in the statutory scheme is the legislative recognition that it is socially and morally undesirable to compel couples to a dead marriage to retain an illusory and deceptive status and that the best interests not only of the parties but of society itself will be furthered by enabling them "to extricate themselves from a perpetual state of marital limbo." He observed that in P.B. v. L.B., 19 Misc.3d 186 (Sup Ct, 2008), the trial court applied the policy enunciated in the Gleason case to a party's challenge of a separation agreement clause preventing the husband from filing for divorce for five years after the parties signed the agreement. The court found that the clause was unenforceable, stating that "no waiver of a person's right to seek a divorce for longer than the statutory one year after execution of a separation agreement will be enforced by the court." Subsequently, another trial court found that a separation agreement preventing either spouse from commencing a divorce action for five years was void for the same reasons. Corso v.

Corso, 21 Misc.3d 1102(A) (Sup Ct, 2008). The husband's motion for partial summary judgment was granted.

Supreme Court rejected the wife's argument that if the court strikes the provision, then it must strike the entire agreement. The agreement contained a severability clause. Case law makes clear that when a clause in a separation agreement is voided, it can be severed and the rest of the agreement may stand. The court found the rest of the agreement was valid and remained enforceable.

Supreme Court Holds That Breach of the Collaborative Law Participation Agreement Does Not Require Finding That Husband Overreached During Collaborative Law Process.

In H.K. v A. K., 2012 WL 1232970 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 50639(U) (Table, Text in WESTLAW), Unreported Disposition, the parties were married in 1980 and had three children, two of whom were emancipated. They encountered marital problems and entered into a collaborative law process, each retaining attorneys experienced in collaborative law, and signed a participation agreement. The participation agreement executed by the parties and their attorneys, on September 8, 2009, stated that the collaborative process "relies on honesty, co-operation, integrity, and professionalism" and that the parties will deal in good faith and "shall provide all relevant and reasonable information" which includes "sworn statement of net worth and supporting documentation of their income, assets and debts ." The parties acknowledge that they are setting aside "certain procedures" including "formal discovery proceedings." To assist in handling the couple's complicated finances, the parties retained a financial specialist who also signed the agreement. A lengthy collaborative process ensued. It was undisputed that the husband was in charge of the couple's finances. He had significant assets, traceable to his family, which provided the backbone of their income, and held senior titles in various real estate based entities. The wife was a part-time college professor. Once the collaborative process commenced, the husband provided significant financial disclosure. He averred, without contradiction, that he provided income tax returns, financial statements, and detailed financial records to the attorneys and the retained financial specialist.

The couple signed a separation agreement on June 10, 2010. In it they acknowledged the role of the collaborative process, that they had "applied their individual standards of reasonableness and acceptability to the agreement," and that they believed the agreement "to be fair, just, adequate, and reasonable." In the final paragraphs, the parties acknowledged that they had full and complete discovery and they "unequivocally waive" any further disclosure. The attorneys oversaw the preparation of the agreement and notarized their respective clients' signatures.

After signing the agreement, the wife learned from a third-party that the husband had a girlfriend and allegedly used marital funds to finance that relationship during the time he was negotiating the separation agreement. According to the wife, she raised this issue with her counsel and the attorney probed the husband on it. The wife alleged that the husband then refused to negotiate and was unwilling to fully disclose his involvement in the alleged relationship. When the issue boiled over, the wife changed counsel and the collaborative process ended. Shortly thereafter, this action was commenced and the competing motions for summary judgment were filed.

The wife argued that the husband breached the collaborative agreement and such a breach constituted fraud or overreaching under the principles established by the Court of Appeals in Christian v. Christian, 42 N.Y.2d 63 (1977). The wife argued that the husband breached the collaborative law agreement by misrepresenting the status of his EMA asset and requiring his wife to transfer it to their children's trusts. The wife's argument that the collaborative agreement sets a standard of conduct, which when breached by the husband constituted overreaching, was an issue of first impression in New York. The Court observed that the "collaborative law" process is a relatively new concept in matrimonial practice. New York courts have never considered its application. Collaborative law attempts to foster an amiable rather than an adversarial atmosphere by creating a "four-way" agreement between each party and their attorneys "in which all are expected to participate actively". The question of the scope of the participant's voluntary disclosure, which commentators have suggested is at the "hallmark" of the collaborative process, remains somewhat unsettled. A party can unilaterally terminate collaborative law at any time and for any reason, including failure of another party to produce requested information. Thus, if a party wishes to abandon collaborative law in favor of litigation for failure of voluntary disclosure, the party is free to do so and to engage in any court sanctioned discovery that might be available. In this case, the wife did not terminate the process prior to executing the agreement, nor did either attorney. Only after the agreement was signed, when the wife was told that the husband had financed his relationship with his girlfriend, did the wife terminate. For most intents and purposes the process had already reached its goal: the separation agreement was signed. Under these circumstances, the court declined to consider whether the husband's alleged breach of the collaborative agreement would subject the husband to a finding of overreaching under Christian v. Christian. The Court pointed out that if the wife or her attorneys suspected the husband was guilty of overreaching, they could have discontinued the process, but they chose not to. The Court held that a breach of the participation agreement did not require a finding that the husband overreached during the collaborative law process.

In Valuing Wife's Law Decree Any Reliable Analysis of the Wife's Potential Earning Capacity Had to Assume That If She Had Not Attended Law School, She Would Have Sought Employment Commensurate with Her Education and Bachelor's Degree.

In Shea v Shea, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1124582 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) after the parties married in 1991, defendant (husband) completed his studies in psychology and obtained his Ph.D. degree. During the marriage, plaintiff (wife), in addition to having two children, attended law school and earned a law degree. After this divorce action was commenced in December 2006, the wife passed the bar exam and received her license to practice law. After a trial, Supreme Court awarded the husband $12,600, 10% of the value it placed on the wife's law degree. The court also directed the husband to pay $1,200 a month in child support and decreed that he owed $17,363.51 in child support arrears dating back to when the divorce action was commenced. In addition, the court denied applications by the wife that she be awarded a distributive share of the husband's Ph.D. degree, and by the husband that the wife be removed as custodian of bank accounts held in trust for their children.

On appeal the husband challenged Supreme Court's decision which adopted the opinion offered by the wife's expert that placed the value on her law degree at $126,000. He argued that since his expert's analysis was based in large measure on the wife's actual employment history, that analysis was more reliable, and the value of $252,617.82 that his expert placed on the degree should have been adopted by the court. The Appellate Division observed that in analyzing the value of the law degree, both experts compared what they believed the wife should have been able to earn during the relevant time period with and without a law degree and then factored the wife's work-life expectancy into the difference between these two figures to determine the extent to which the degree served to enhance her earning capacity. The principal difference in the evaluations offered by both experts revolved around what each believed the wife's earning capacity would have been had she not obtained a law degree. The wife's expert focused on her actual employment history, as well as statistical data on what an individual with a Bachelor's degree could have earned in the area where she lived during the relevant time period, and concluded that, without a law degree, the wife would have had an annual earning capacity of $44,500. The husband's expert arrived at a significantly lower figure primarily because of the emphasis he placed on the wife's actual employment history in the period prior to obtaining her law degree. He assumed in his analysis that the wife would not have entered the work force until 2006, or after she was admitted to practice law, and that she would have continued to work as a clerk throughout this entire period, even though before attending law school she had obtained a Bachelor's degree and had been accepted into a doctoral program at Indiana University. He concluded, given this history and based on these assumptions, that the wife's potential earning capacity, even with a Bachelor's degree, would not have exceeded $22,827 per year. Supreme Court rejected the opinion of the husband's expert and concluded, as did the wife's expert, that any reliable analysis of the wife's potential earning capacity had to assume that if she had not attended law school, she would have sought employment commensurate with her education and Bachelor's degree. The Appellate Division found that the decision to adopt the opinion of the wife's expert as to the value of her law degree was supported by credible evidence introduced at trial.

The Appellate Division rejected the husband's argument that he was entitled to a greater degree of the value of the wife's law degree because he was the family's primary wage earner during the parties' marriage and arranged his work schedule so that he could care for their children while the wife attended law school. It observed that a nontitled spouse seeking a portion of the enhanced earning potential attributable to a professional license or degree of a titled spouse is required to establish that a substantial contribution was made to the acquisition of the degree or license". Where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity". His sacrifices represented overall contributions to the marriage rather than an additional effort to support the wife in obtaining her license. In addition, the wife's own efforts in obtaining her law degree could not be minimized. For example, she worked in part-time positions throughout the marriage and was employed during the summer months while attending law school. She earned merit scholarships and paid a significant part of her law school tuition with an inheritance she received during the marriage. It reached a similar conclusion as to the wife's claim that she should share in the value of the husband's Ph.D. degree. The husband had satisfied most of the requirements he needed to obtain this degree before the parties married and paid for it while providing financial support for his family. What assistance the wife may have provided in aiding him in acquiring this degree was simply not so significant or unique as to warrant awarding her a distributive share of its value.

Bonus Which Was Compensation for Future Services That Were Not Performed Prior to the Commencement of the Action Was Separate Property Not Subject to Equitable Distribution

In Ropiecki v Ropiecki, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1109179 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in directing that the husband's maintenance obligations be retroactive to the date the action was commenced and properly awarded the defendant credit toward the maintenance arrears for voluntary payments he had made of $180,179.28. The defendant was not entitled to any further credit for voluntary payments, as the expenses from his net worth statement included payments made on behalf of himself and his emancipated children, payments for which the wife was not responsible (see Horne v. Horne, 22 N.Y.2d 219, 224; LiGreci v. LiGreci, 87 AD3d 722, 724). The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court properly considered the relevant statutory factors in fashioning the distribution. The parties were married for 27 years, and the plaintiff's very limited earning potential was a result of her staying home and taking care of the parties' four children, including their daughter, who suffered from Retts Syndrome and was severely disabled. The defendant, by contrast, acquired considerable earning potential. Under the circumstances, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff 100% of the equity in the marital home. Similarly, the Supreme Court properly required the defendant to pay the remaining mortgage debt on the marital home in full before transferring title to the plaintiff.

The Appellate Division agreed with the defendant that the Supreme Court improperly awarded the plaintiff a portion of his bonus in the sum of $200,000 as part of the equitable distribution of marital assets. The defendant's bonus, awarded in 2006, after the commencement of the action, was provided as an incentive for future services. Based on the defendant's testimony at trial, as well as the Executive Incentive Bonus Plan, the bonus plan was adopted by the defendant's employer in October 2006 as an incentive for certain employees, including the defendant, to meet certain goals and to ensure the successful sale of the company in the future. Accordingly, the bonus was compensation for future services that were not performed prior to the commencement of the action and, thus, was separate property not subject to equitable distribution. In light of the foregoing, the distributive award had to be reconsidered to ensure that the plaintiff was awarded her equitable share of the marital property, and the matter was remitted to Supreme Court for further review and a recalculation, if warranted, of the equitable distribution of marital property other than the marital residence.

The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, including the monthly amount of the defendant's maintenance obligation and the ages of the parties, the $1,500,00 of life insurance the defendant was required to carry, as ordered by the Supreme Court, was excessive, and was reduced by substituting a provision directing the defendant to maintain a life insurance policy naming the plaintiff as an irrevocable beneficiary in the sum of $1,200,000 until the plaintiff reaches the age of 65, and in the sum of $600,000 thereafter for as long as the defendant is obligated to pay maintenance. It also held that Supreme Court improvidently directed the defendant to pay 90% of the plaintiff's unreimbursed health care expenses, as such open-ended obligations have been consistently disfavored by the Court. It held that Supreme Court should have directed the defendant to pay 90% of the plaintiff's unreimbursed health care expenses only for as long as he is obligated to pay maintenance.

Argument, That Child Should Have Attended Less Expensive College, Without Merit Where Parties Stipulation Did Not Require Parental Consent to Child's College Choice, and Did Not Place Limit on Tuition Amount

In Matter of Filosa v Donnelly, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1109332 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the father failed to establish, in accordance with the terms of the parties' stipulation of settlement of divorce, that he was financially unable to pay for the child's college tuition or that the mother did not comply with her obligation to encourage the child's use of financial aid, scholarships, and available student loans. Thus, Family Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in granting the mother's petition and apportioning 50% of those expenses to him. It found his argument, that the child should have attended a less expensive college, without merit. The parties' stipulation did not mandate parental consent to the child's college choice, and it did not place a limit on the tuition amount for which the parties were responsible. Similarly, the father was not entitled to a credit toward his child support payment by virtue of the room-and-board component of the child's tuition, as no such credit was contemplated by the parties' stipulation of settlement.

Default must Be Vacated Once Movant Demonstrates Lack of Personal Jurisdiction, and Movant Is Relieved of Obligation to Demonstrate a Reasonable Excuse for Default and Meritorious Defense

In Matter of Anna M, 940 N.Y.S.2d 121, 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 01676 (2d Dept 2012) in an order dated October 24, 2008, the Family Court appointed the petitioner, the uncle of the subject children, as guardian of the children. The father had failed to appear in these proceedings. Almost two years later, the father moved, inter alia, to vacate the order of guardianship, arguing that the Family Court lacked personal jurisdiction over him. The father argued, among other things, that he was not served with the order to show cause or petitions in this matter. In addition, his attorney argued that the affidavit of service stated that the father was served on September 28, 2008, which was a Sunday, rendering service void (see General Business Law 11). Family Court denied the father's motion without addressing the issue of personal jurisdiction. It found that the father had notice of the petitioner's request for guardianship but failed "to take action" and "explain his delay" in moving to vacate the order of guardianship and opposing the petitions. The Family Court therefore determined that even if there was a defect in service, the doctrine of laches operated to bar the father from vacating the guardianship order. The Appellate Division held that this was error. CPLR 5015 provides that "[t]he court which rendered a judgment or order may relieve a party from it upon such terms as may be just," upon the ground of, inter alia, "excusable default" (CPLR 5015[a][1]) or "lack of jurisdiction to render the judgment or order" (CPLR 5015[a][4]). A court may not rule on the excusable nature of a defendant's default under CPLR 5015(a)(1) without first determining the jurisdictional question under CPLR 5015(a)(4). Where want of jurisdiction is the ground for a motion to vacate pursuant to CPLR 5015, a default must be vacated once the movant demonstrates a lack of personal jurisdiction, and the movant is relieved of any obligation to demonstrate a reasonable excuse for the default and a potentially meritorious defense. Family Court failed to determine whether personal service was properly effected, or whether any defect in service could be disregarded as an irregularity under CPLR 2001. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a hearing to determine the issue of personal jurisdiction and thereafter for a new determination of the motion to vacate the order dated October 24, 2008.

Court of Appeals Rejects Husbands Argument That Intention to Equally Divide Marital Estate Was Frustrated Because Both Parties Operated under "Mistake" or Misconception as to Existence of a Legitimate Madoff Investment Account

In Simkin v Blank, --- N.E.2d ----, 2012 WL 1080295 (N.Y.) Plaintiff Steven Simkin (husband) and defendant Laura Blank (wife) married in 1973 and had two children. The Husband was a partner at a New York law firm and the wife, also an attorney, was employed by a university. After almost 30 years of marriage, the parties separated in 2002 and stipulated in 2004 that the cut-off date for determining the value of marital assets would be September 1, 2004. The parties, represented by counsel, spent two years negotiating a detailed 22-page settlement agreement, executed in June 2006. In August 2006, the settlement agreement was incorporated, but not merged, into the parties' final judgment of divorce. The settlement agreement set forth a comprehensive division of marital property. The Husband agreed to pay the wife $6,250,000 "[a]s and for an equitable distribution of property ... and in satisfaction of the Wife's support and marital property rights." In addition, wife retained title to a Manhattan apartment (subject to a $370,000 mortgage), an automobile, her retirement accounts and any "bank, brokerage and similar financial accounts in her name." Upon receipt of her distributive payment, the wife agreed to convey her interest in the Scarsdale marital residence to husband. The Husband received title to three automobiles and kept his retirement accounts, less $368,000 to equalize the value of the parties' retirement accounts. He also retained "bank, brokerage and similar financial accounts" that were in his name, two of which were specifically referenced-his capital account as a partner at the law firm and a Citibank account. The agreement also contained a number of mutual releases between the parties. Each party waived any interest in the other's law license and released or discharged any debts or further claims against the other. Although the agreement acknowledged that the property division was "fair and reasonable," it did not state that the parties intended an equal distribution or other designated percentage division of the marital estate. The only provision that explicitly contemplated an equal division was the reference to equalizing the values of the parties' retirement accounts. The parties further acknowledged that the settlement constituted: "an agreement between them with respect to any and all funds, assets or properties, both real and personal, including property in which either of them may have an equitable or beneficial interest wherever situated, now owned by the parties or either of them, or standing in their respective names or which may hereafter be acquired by either of them, and all other rights and obligations arising out of the marital relationship."

At the time the parties entered into the settlement, one of husband's unspecified brokerage accounts was maintained by Bernard L. Madoff Investment Securities (the Madoff account). According to husband, the parties believed the account was valued at $5.4 million as of September 1, 2004, the valuation date for marital assets. The Husband withdrew funds from this account to pay a portion of his distributive payment owed wife in 2006, and continued to invest in the account subsequent to the divorce. In December 2008, Bernard Madoff's colossal Ponzi scheme was publicly exposed and Madoff later pleaded guilty to federal securities fraud and related offenses. As a result of the disclosure of Madoff's fraud, in February 2009, about 2 ½ years after the divorce was finalized, the husband commenced an action against wife alleging two causes of action: (1) reformation of the settlement agreement predicated on a mutual mistake and (2) unjust enrichment. The amended complaint asserted that the settlement agreement was intended to accomplish an "approximately equal division of [the couple's] marital assets," including a 50-50 division of the Madoff account. To that end, the amended complaint stated that $2,700,000 of wife's $6,250,000 distributive payment represented her "share" of the Madoff account. The Husband alleged that the parties' intention to equally divide the marital estate was frustrated because both parties operated under the "mistake" or misconception as to the existence of a legitimate investment account with Madoff which, in fact, was revealed to be part of a fraudulent Ponzi scheme. The amended complaint admitted, however, that funds were previously " 'withdrawn' from the 'Account' " by husband and applied to his obligation to pay wife.

In his claim for reformation, the husband requested that the court "determine the couple's true assets with respect to the Madoff account" and alter the settlement terms to reflect an equal division of the actual value of the Madoff account. The second cause of action sought restitution from wife "in an amount to be determined at trial" based on her unjust enrichment arising from husband's payment of what the parties mistakenly believed to be wife's share of the Madoff account. Supreme Court granted the Wife's motion to dismiss the amended complaint. The Appellate Division, with two Justices dissenting, reversed and reinstated the action (80 AD3d 401 [1st Dept 2011]).

The Court of Appeals observed that on a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211, the pleading is to be given a liberal construction, the allegations contained within it are assumed to be true and the plaintiff is to be afforded every favorable inference. At the same time, however, "allegations consisting of bare legal conclusions as well as factual claims flatly contradicted by documentary evidence are not entitled to any such consideration" . Moreover, a claim predicated on mutual mistake must be pleaded with the requisite particularity necessitated under CPLR 3016(b). The Court, in an opinion by Judge Graffeo, noted that marital settlement agreements are judicially favored and are not to be easily set aside. Nevertheless, in the proper case, an agreement may be subject to rescission or reformation based on a mutual mistake by the parties. Similarly, a release of claims may be avoided due to mutual mistake. The mutual mistake must exist at the time the contract is entered into and must be substantial". Put differently, the mistake must be "so material that ... it goes to the foundation of the agreement". Court-ordered relief is therefore reserved only for "exceptional situations". The premise underlying the doctrine of mutual mistake is that "the agreement as expressed, in some material respect, does not represent the meeting of the minds of the parties". After reviewing Appellate mutual mistake cases in the context of marital settlement agreements the Court was of the view that the amended complaint failed to adequately state a cause of action based on mutual mistake. As an initial matter, the husband's claim that the alleged mutual mistake undermined the foundation of the settlement agreement, a precondition to relief under the Court's precedents, was belied by the terms of the agreement itself. The Court pointed out that in True v. True (63 AD3d 1145 [2d Dept 2009]), the settlement agreement provided that the husband's stock awards from his employer would be "divided 50-50 in kind" and recited that 3,655 shares were available for division between the parties. After the wife redeemed her half of the shares, the husband learned that only 150 shares remained and brought an action to reform the agreement, arguing that the parties mistakenly specified the gross number of shares (3,655) rather than the net number that was actually available for distribution. The Second Department agreed and reformed the agreement to effectuate the parties' intent to divide the shares equally, holding that the husband had established "that the parties' use of 3,655 gross shares was a mutual mistake because it undermined their intent to divide the net shares available for division, 50-50 in kind" (id. at 1148). Unlike the settlement agreement in True that expressly incorporated a "50-50" division of a stated number of stock shares, the settlement agreement here, on its face, did not mention the Madoff account, much less evince an intent to divide the account in equal or other proportionate shares. To the contrary, the agreement provided that the $6,250,000 payment to wife was "in satisfaction of [her] support and marital property rights," along with her release of various claims and inheritance rights. Despite the fact that the agreement permitted husband to retain title to his "bank, brokerage and similar financial accounts" and enumerated two such accounts, his alleged $5.4 million Madoff investment account was neither identified nor valued. Given the extensive and carefully negotiated nature of the settlement agreement, the Court did not believe that this presented one of those "exceptional situations") warranting reformation or rescission of a divorce settlement after all marital assets have been distributed.

Even putting the language of the agreement aside, the core allegation underpinning the husband's mutual mistake claim, that the Madoff account was "nonexistent" when the parties executed their settlement agreement in June 2006, did not amount to a "material" mistake of fact as required by case law. The amended complaint contained an admission that husband was able to withdraw funds from the account in 2006 to partially pay his distributive payment to wife. Given that the mutual mistake must have existed at the time the agreement was executed in 2006 the fact the husband could no longer withdraw funds years later was not determinative. This situation, however sympathetic, was more akin to a marital asset that unexpectedly loses value after dissolution of a marriage; the asset had value at the time of the settlement but the purported value did not remain consistent. The Court found this case analogous to the Appellate Division precedents denying a spouse's attempt to reopen a settlement agreement based on post-divorce changes in asset valuation. The Court held that the husband's unjust enrichment claim likewise failed to state a cause of action. It is well settled that, where the parties executed a valid and enforceable written contract governing a particular subject matter, recovery on a theory of unjust enrichment for events arising out of that subject matter is ordinarily precluded. Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division was reversed, the order of Supreme Court reinstated, and the certified question answered in the negative.

QDRO Based on a Stipulation Can Convey Only Those Rights to Which the Parties Stipulated as a Basis for the Judgment

In Gursky v Gursky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1033543 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) after plaintiff commenced an action for divorce, the parties entered into a partial written stipulation in which they agreed upon the total present value of the marital portion of the defined benefits component of plaintiff's pension. They did not reach any agreement as to the division of this asset. Instead, they specifically reserved their rights with respect to its equitable distribution. When they appeared for trial, they entered into an oral stipulation in which they agreed that the pension "will be divided pursuant to the Majauskas [f]ormula" (Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481 [1984]). The stipulation was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, and defendant then moved for an order directing entry of his proposed qualified domestic relations order. Plaintiff objected, arguing that the proposed order exceeded the terms of the parties' stipulation because it created a separate pension interest for defendant by providing that he could elect to receive payment from the pension plan when plaintiff reached the plan's early retirement age of 55, regardless of whether she had yet retired. Supreme Court rejected plaintiff's objections and granted the motion. The Appellate Division reversed and denied the motion. It observed that a qualified domestic relations order based on a stipulation "can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment" (McCoy v. Feinman, 99 N.Y.2d 295, 304 [2002]). Where the language of the stipulation is unambiguous, the intent of the parties must be ascertained from within its four corners and the Court will not add language that the parties did not include. Here, there was no ambiguity. The parties agreed to divide the pension by applying the Majauskas formula. To interpret that agreement, Supreme Court was required to look to Majauskas, where the formula entitled the nonemployee spouse to receive a proportionate share of one half of each pension check received by the employee spouse, with the denominator of the fraction based on the length of the employee spouse's employment prior to his or her retirement. By invoking the Majauskas formula, without more, the parties stipulated that distribution of the pension would take effect upon plaintiff's retirement, as in Majauskas, resulting in a shared payment. Thus, Supreme Court's distribution of a separate pension interest to defendant prior to plaintiff's retirement improperly expanded the terms of the parties' stipulation.

Wife Did Not Waive Right to Challenge Husband's Claims Regarding Income Because She Signed Joint Tax Returns That Listed His Annual Income.

In Harrington v Harrington, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1033451 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff (husband) and defendant (wife) were married in 1991 and had two children (born in 1989 and 1991). The husband was a self-employed contractor who operated his own construction business while the wife, who was permanently disabled, devoted herself to the care of the parties' children and was not otherwise employed. The husband commenced this action for a divorce in December 2008. After a trial, Supreme Court granted the wife's counterclaim for divorce, distributed certain marital assets, and directed the husband to pay maintenance for 15 years and approximately $10,000 towards the wife's counsel fees. The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected the husband's challenge to Supreme Court's decision to impute an additional $30,000 to the income he claimed to earn each year. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court is not bound by representations made by a party in a matrimonial action regarding his or her annual income and may increase that figure where the record establishes, as it did here, that a party routinely paid "personal expenses from business accounts" and had access to other income to offset such expenses. In support of his claim regarding his annual income, the husband submitted tax returns for a four-year period beginning in 2005 in which he claimed annual adjusted gross income between $13,802 and $33,689. Supreme Court found, and the record established, that despite the husband's claims regarding his limited income, he paid, in addition to other expenses, $559 per month in child support and $2,000 each month to his girlfriend to live at her residence and for bookkeeping services she provided his contracting business. Also, the husband admitted using the business checking account for personal expenses and paying for numerous vacations he had taken with his girlfriend, plus $950 a month in rent for a residence in which he did not reside. This evidence provided ample support for Supreme Court's determination that additional income should be imputed to the husband to reflect an annual income of $60,000 per year. Supreme Court was not bound by a determination previously rendered by Family Court in a child support proceeding that his annual income was $30,000. Here, evidence was presented that the husband's claims in this regard were not accurate or credible, and provided a rational basis for Supreme Court's decision placing his annual income at $60,000. In addition, the wife did not waive her right to challenge the husband's claims regarding his annual income simply because she had previously signed joint tax returns that listed his annual income as $30,000.

Supreme Court conducted a hearing at which the wife's counsel testified to the legal services she provided during the course of these proceedings. Given the wife's need for these legal services, and the parties' respective financial conditions, the Appellate Division held that court did not abuse its discretion by directing the husband to contribute $9,816 to the payment of the legal expenses that the wife incurred in these proceedings. While the wife's counsel did not, as required, bill the wife every 60 days for her services, she did provide her with a copy of a retainer agreement, as well as a statement of client's rights and responsibilities pursuant to 22 NYCRR 1400.3. Counsel's failure to bill the wife for these services every 60 days was not a ground upon which the husband can rely to avoid paying a share of her legal expenses. The court noted that the action was commenced prior to the amendment to Domestic Relations Law 237(a) (see L 2010, ch 329, s 1).

Error in Failing to Afford Father Opportunity to Make Closing Statement Does Not Require Reversal Where Court Familiar with the Facts of Case and Parties' Arguments

In Matter of Bond v Bond, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1033469 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of six children. The three youngest children, two daughters (born in 1994 and 1995) and a son (born in 2001), were the subject of the proceeding on appeal. In November 2004, the parties stipulated to a custody arrangement by which the mother had sole legal and primary physical custody of the three children, with extended alternate weekend visitation with the father. This agreement was later incorporated into a custody order in January 2005 and the judgment of divorce in March 2007. In April 2010, the father filed a petition for modification seeking joint legal and primary physical custody of the younger daughter and joint legal and shared physical custody of the son. Following trial, Family Court dismissed the petition on the ground that the father had failed to establish a sufficient change in circumstances. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that the father's petition alleged that the two younger children wished to spend more time with him, that the mother was verbally and physically abusive, and that the mother disappointed the younger daughter by failing to bring her to an out-of-state award ceremony. As the allegations of abuse were unsubstantiated and the children's preferences standing alone did not establish a sufficient change in circumstances, there was a sound and substantial basis in the record supporting Family Court's determination. The Appellate Division observed that the trial testimony and decision referenced events occurring prior to the existing custody order. As the father argued, relying upon those prior events would be improper in assessing whether there had been a change in circumstances. However, it did not find that the Courts analysis relied upon these extraneous references. It rejected that the father's contention that Family Court's error in failing to afford him the opportunity to make a closing statement required reversal (see CPLR 4016[a]). At the conclusion of the fact-finding hearing, the father's counsel stated that he wished to make a short closing statement only if the mother did so, and the court indicated that arrangements would be made following the Lincoln hearing. The mother subsequently submitted a written closing statement; the father neither responded to this submission nor requested a further appearance, and more than four weeks passed before the decision was rendered. Considering these circumstances, and that the court was fully familiar with the facts of the case as well as the parties' arguments, no reversible error occurred (See Matter of Saggese v. Steinmetz, 83 A.D.3d 1144, 1145 [2011; Lohmiller v. Lohmiller, 140 A.D.2d 497, 498 [1988]).

On Motion to Dismiss Family Offense Petition Pursuant to CPLR 3211(a) (7) Court Should Wade Through Allegations and Dismiss Only Those Which Do Not Sufficiently Allege Conduct That Constitutes a Family Offense

In Matter of Pamela N v Neil N, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1033487 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Petitioner (mother) and respondent (father) were married in 2003 and had twins in 2005. The father was awarded custody by order of August 20, 2010. In December 2010, the mother filed two family offense petitions against the father, and filed a third such petition in February 2011, as well as a modification of custody petition. Family Court granted the father's motions to dismiss the two December 2010 family offense petitions, and also dismissed the custody petition given that a divorce action was then pending in Supreme Court. The court also dismissed the February 2011 family offense petition, on the father's motion, for failure to state a cause of action (CPLR 3211[a][7]), without a hearing. The Appellate Division observed that presented with a motion to dismiss pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7), which is proper here in that family offense proceedings under Family Ct Act article 8 are civil in nature a court may freely consider affidavits submitted by the petitioner to remedy any defects in the petition, and the criterion is whether the proponent of the pleading has a cause of action, not whether he or she has stated one. (Guggenheimer v. Ginzburg, 43 N.Y.2d at 275). A family offense proceeding is originated by filing a petition alleging that the respondent committed one of the enumerated offenses against, among others, a spouse, former spouse or child. In her pro se February 2011 petition, the mother checked all boxes on the petition form listing those enumerated offenses. Her attached affidavit and handwritten answers contained many conclusory, irrelevant, ambiguous and insufficiently specific allegations, including claims against individuals who were not "members of the same family or household". However, liberally construing the petition and giving it the benefit of every favorable inference (Leon v. Martinez, 84 N.Y.2d at 87-88), the Court found that while it was inartfully drafted, it adequately alleged, at the very least, that the father had stalked and harassed her. For example, the mother alleged in her affidavit that on November 23, 2008, the father came to her house while she had the children and threatened and harassed her, making excuses for his presence; he then called her three times that evening and continued to make excuses for coming to her house, leading her to file a domestic incident report with police the next day. These allegations described the type of conduct required to originate a family offense proceeding (Family Ct Act 821[1]) in that they adequately allege, so as to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action (CPLR 3211 [a][7]), that the father, acting with the requisite intent that is inferable from the alleged circumstances, engaged in a course of conduct which alarmed or seriously annoyed the mother, which served no legitimate purpose, thereby committing the offense of harassment in the second degree (Penal Law 240.26 [3]) Additionally, the allegations, if credited, were sufficient to allege that respondent committed the offense of stalking in the fourth degree (Penal Law 120.45[1], [2]). The Appellate Division agreed with the mother and attorney for the children that Family Court should not have dismissed the petition in its entirety but, rather, should have waded through the myriad allegations and dismissed with specificity only those which did not sufficiently allege conduct that constituted harassment, stalking or any other act listed in Family Ct Act 821(1). The order granting respondent's motion to dismiss the February 18, 2011 petition was reversed, the motion denied and matter remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

Family Court Lacks Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Enforce Purported Modification Agreement Not Incorporated into Judgment

In Hirsch v Schwartz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 1033520 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (mother) and respondent (father) were divorced in 2009 and had two children from the marriage (born in 2001 and 2003). The parties' 2007 separation agreement, which required the father to pay 96% of all child-care expenses, was incorporated but not merged into their 2009 judgment of divorce. Shortly thereafter, the mother sent the father a letter offer which proposed a reduction of the father's child-care expenses from 96% to 75%. Although the father did not sign and return the letter offer he made at least two full reimbursement payments and several partial payments in the months that followed. The mother subsequently commenced this proceeding seeking to enforce the child support provisions of the judgment of divorce. In response, the father argued that the mother's letter offer served to modify his support obligations and that the terms of this subsequent agreement should be enforced. Following a trial, a Support Magistrate found that the letter offer constituted a valid modification of the parties' separation agreement that reduced the father's child-care expenses to 75%, and ordered arrears in the amount of $2,625.25. Upon the mother's written objections, Family Court concluded that the Support Magistrate lacked the authority to enforce the terms of the purported modification agreement and, therefore, the provisions in the judgment of divorce concerning the father's child-care obligations controlled. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that Family Court, as a court of limited jurisdiction, may only enforce or modify child support provisions contained in a valid court order or judgment (Family Ct Act 422, 461[b][1]; 466; Matter of Johna M.S. v. Russell E.S., 10 NY3d 364, 366 [2008]; Matter of Brescia v. Fitts, 56 N.Y.2d 132, 139 [1982]; Kleila v. Kleila, 50 N.Y.2d 277, 282 [1980]). Thus, even assuming that the mother's letter offer constituted a valid modification of the parties' separation agreement, Family Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to enforce the amended agreement which stands as an independent contract between the parties .

New Child Support Standards Chart released April 1, 2012

According to the Child Support Standards Chart, [LDSS 4515 (4/12)] released April 1, 2012, prepared by New York State Office of Temporary and Disability Assistance, Division of Child Support Enforcement, the 2012 poverty income guideline amount for a single person as reported by the United States Department of Health and Human Services is $11,170 and the 2012 self-support reserve is $15,080.

The combined parental income amount is $136,000. It will be adjusted every two years (effective January 31st for applicable years) based on the average annual percent changes to the federal Department of Labor's Consumer Price Index for Urban Consumers. The adjusted combined parental income amount will be announced and available at January 31st until such time as this revised form is released. st for applicable years) based on the average annual percent changes to the federal Department of Labor's Consumer Price Index for Urban Consumers. The adjusted combined parental income amount will be announced and available at www.childsupport.ny.gov until the revised Child Support Standards Chart is released.

The Child Support Standards Chart is released each year on or before April 1. The income tables are used to determine the annual child support obligation amount pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 567 of the Laws of 1989. The chart may be downloaded from https://newyorkchildsupport.com/dcse/pdfs/cssa_2012.pdf.

Res Judicata Bars Court from Considering Fathers Biological Parental Status Which Holds He Has No Standing to Seek Visitation with Child

In Matter of Weaver v Durfy--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 895497 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Family Court dismissed the Petitioners prior petition seeking to establish paternity of the child. The court found that respondents were married when the child was born and at the time of the hearing on the paternity petition and that, based upon petitioner's admissions, he had acted as a friendly neighbor to the child, although he had regular and significant contact with the child with respondents' consent. The court therefore determined that it was not in the best interests of the child to disrupt her legitimate paternal relationship with respondent father. After he perfected his appeal from the prior order dismissing the paternity petition, petitioner discontinued that appeal based on his agreement with respondents that respondent mother and the child would participate in DNA testing, which revealed a probability of 99.99% that petitioner was the child's biological father, and that respondents would permit petitioner to visit with the child. The child subsequently began to receive Social Security benefits as petitioner's biological child. Thereafter, respondents refused to permit petitioner to visit with the child, and he filed a petition seeking, inter alia, visitation based upon the DNA test results. Family Court determined that the petition was barred by res judicata and dismissed the petition. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that the resolution of the proceeding presented a coalescence of the various societal interests promoted by the doctrine of res judicata, particularly the need for finality, stability and consistency in family status determinations. Thus, the court properly determined that it was prohibited by the doctrine of res judicata from considering petitioner's biological parental status as a basis for determining his standing to seek visitation with the child and as petitioner has no legal standing to seek visitation with the child, the court properly dismissed the petition.

Where Agreement Required Decedent to Name Children as the "Joint Irrevocable Designated Beneficiaries" He Was Without Authority to Name Any Other Person as a Partial or Sole Beneficiary

In Johnson v New York State and Local Retirement System, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 895707 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Plaintiff Wendy Johnson and Dan Johnson (decedent) were divorced in 1998. During the divorce action, they executed a matrimonial settlement agreement, pursuant to which they were required to name their children, plaintiffs Dane Johnson and Danika Johnson, as "joint irrevocable designated beneficiaries" of, inter alia, the death benefits provided by their retirement plans. That agreement was subsequently incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce. In March 1998, shortly before executing the matrimonial settlement agreement, decedent had named his then girlfriend, defendant Kimberly Leone-Johnson, as a one-third beneficiary of his New York State Retirement Plan death benefit and each of his children as a one-third beneficiary. Leone was not removed as a beneficiary after the judgment of divorce was entered in May 1998 and, moreover, in June 1998 decedent purportedly designated Leone as the sole beneficiary of his retirement plan death benefit. In July 2000 decedent and Leone executed a prenuptial agreement and were married. Pursuant to that agreement, decedent and Leone expressly waived all rights and claims to each other's pensions and retirement plans. In June 2006, decedent and Leone executed a separation agreement, which contained clauses that, inter alia, reaffirmed the pension and retirement plan waivers contained in the prenuptial agreement and mutually released and waived all rights that decedent and Leone had to each other's estate. Decedent and Leone allegedly reconciled without divorcing just prior to decedent's death in October 2008. No beneficiary changes were made to decedent's retirement plan death benefit after Leone was allegedly named the sole beneficiary in 1998. After decedent died, however, defendant New York State and Local Retirement System (System) notified Leone that decedent's designation naming her as the sole beneficiary was invalid and that the System intended to disburse the death benefit to Leone and the children in accordance with decedent's March 1998 designation. Plaintiffs commenced an action seeking to designate the children as the joint irrevocable beneficiaries of decedent's retirement plan death benefit in compliance with the matrimonial settlement agreement and to remove Leone as a beneficiary thereof. They moved for summary judgment and Supreme Court determined that Leone and the children were each entitled to one-third of decedent's retirement plan death benefit. The Appellate Division held that Leone was not entitled to any part of decedent's retirement plan death benefit. The matrimonial settlement agreement clearly required decedent to name the children as the "joint irrevocable designated beneficiaries" of his retirement plan death benefit. As a result of that agreement, decedent was without authority to name any other person as a partial or sole beneficiary of such death benefit. Moreover, any right to that benefit that Leone would have acquired by virtue of being married to decedent was waived by the prenuptial and separation agreements. The court erred in determining that Leone's waiver of her interest in the retirement plan death benefit was not "explicit, voluntary and made in good faith" (Silber v. Silber, 99 N.Y.2d 395, 404, cert denied 540 U.S. 817). The contention of Leone that decedent's obligation to name the children as beneficiaries of his retirement plan death benefit was solely to provide security for his child support obligation was contrary to a fair interpretation of the matrimonial settlement agreement. It rejected Leone's further contention that her separation agreement with decedent became void when they allegedly reconciled prior to his death. By its terms, the separation agreement could only be canceled in writing.

Improper for Court to Take Judicial Notice of Factual Material in Filed Net Worth Statement.

In Halse v Halse, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 850604 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff commenced an action for divorce in September 2008 and, thereafter, a pendente lite order was entered which, among other things, directed the parties to submit to drug testing and prohibited the parties from selling or transferring any assets. In June 2010, plaintiff moved to have defendant held in contempt, alleging that she had sold various marital assets and was using drugs and alcohol. After a nonjury trial, Supreme Court issued a judgment of divorce, ordered the equitable distribution of marital assets, awarded maintenance to defendant and ordered plaintiff to pay child support for the parties' two children. In a separate order, the court adjudged defendant to be in contempt of the pendente lite order, but imposed no punishment.

The Appellate Division held that substantial deference is accorded to the trial court's determination regarding equitable distribution so long as the requisite statutory factors were considered. In this case, it was apparent that Supreme Court considered all of the relevant factors before equitably distributing the parties' marital assets; of particular note was the long duration of the marriage and the parties widely disparate future financial circumstances. Moreover, contrary to plaintiff's contention, the record reflected that Supreme Court adequately addressed defendant's dissipation of marital assets. Notably, the court awarded plaintiff adjustments to compensate him for the value of various items of marital property that had been improperly sold by defendant, including $12,500 representing half of the value of a backhoe. As for the marital residence, it was not persuaded by plaintiff's contention that he should have been awarded an adjustment based upon defendant's alleged dissipation of that asset. While the evidence did indicate that defendant had not maintained the residence in optimal condition, there was also evidence that the real estate market was overburdened with properties in the residence's price range and that market conditions, in general, had declined. As such, there was no definitive proof that the approximately $200,000 decline in the market value of the house was due solely to defendant's actions. Further, although plaintiff opined that the residence needed between $45,000 and $62,000 in repairs to become marketable, he submitted no proof to support these figures. In awarding defendant maintenance, Supreme Court considered the statutory factors and determined that a maintenance award to defendant in the amount of $3,000 per month for two years and then $2,500 per month for three years was appropriate. Although defendant did not offer a statement of net worth at trial, the record contained sufficient evidence regarding both parties' assets and liabilities to permit it to conclude that the durational maintenance award was a provident exercise of the court's discretion. The Appellate Division pointed out in a footnote that although defendant filed a statement of net worth with Supreme Court in 2008, it was not proper for the court to take judicial notice of the factual material contained therein (citing Matter of Grange v. Grange, 78 A.D.3d 1253, 1255 [2010]).

Failure to Disclose Financial Information and Lack of Counsel Insufficient to Set Aside Prenuptial Agreement

In Cohen v Cohen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 851206 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that plaintiff's alleged threat to cancel the wedding if defendant refused to sign the agreement did not constitute duress (Colello v. Colello, 9 A.D.3d 855, 858 [2004]). Nor did the absence of legal representation establish overreaching or require an automatic nullification of the prenuptial agreement, especially as the evidence showed that the agreement was prepared by an independent public official unaligned with either party. Plaintiff's alleged failure to fully disclose his financial situation was also insufficient to vitiate the prenuptial agreement (Strong v. Dubin, 48 A.D.3d 232, 233 [2008]). There was no evidence that plaintiff concealed or misrepresented any financial information or the terms of the agreement. To the extent the prenuptial agreement, to be enforceable in New York, must contain an acknowledgment sufficient to entitle a real property deed to be recorded, this requirement was satisfied by plaintiff's filing, at the direction of the court, of a certificate of conformity attesting to the credentials of the French official who drafted the agreement, and certifying that his proof of acknowledgment of the agreement conformed to the laws of France (Real Property Law 301-a).

Where Supreme Court Refers Issue to Family Court, it Has Jurisdiction to Determine Issue of Child Support During Divorce Action.

In Francois v Francois, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 833185 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Family Court had subject matter jurisdiction to hear and determine the issue of child support during the pendency of the divorce action. When an action for divorce is pending, the Family Court may exercise its jurisdiction only in certain situations, such as where the Supreme Court refers an application for support to it ... or where the Supreme Court has not acted concerning support and the spouse is likely to need public assistance" (FCA 464). Here the Supreme Court referred all issues of child support to the Family Court for a hearing and determination .Accordingly, the Family Court properly exercised its jurisdiction over the child support proceeding.

Spouse generally obligated to pay 50% share of income tax liability if spouse benefits from use of funds or delay in paying tax liability. Imputation of income may be based upon testimony of expert. Provision for Future Modification Improper.

In Lago v Adrion,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 833203 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were married on September 10, 1995, and had one child, born October 28, 1996. The plaintiff wife commenced the action by filing a summons and complaint on September 19, 2006, after 11 years of marriage. The parties agreed on joint custody of the child and the primary physical residence of the child with the plaintiff, and consented to a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment. In March 2010 the parties proceeded to a nonjury trial on certain financial issues. At the conclusion of the trial, the Supreme Court found that the defendant was a tax attorney with a current income of $475,000 per year, that the plaintiff was not working, and that the plaintiff had a masters' degree in architecture from Harvard University and performed some doctoral work at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Based upon her educational qualifications and experience, and expert testimony, the Supreme Court imputed income of $80,000 per year to the plaintiff. The Supreme Court determined that the defendant was obligated to pay $2,041 per month in basic child support based on the plaintiff's imputed income of $80,000 per year, and a finding that the child support percentage should only be applied to the first $150,000 of the defendant's annual income. The supplemental findings of fact stated that "[t]o the extent that this court may have deviated from the guideline standards," it did so for the reasons that the child was "thriving" on the pendente lite child support of $2,041 per month, and the parties' standard of living during the marriage was that of a "middle-class" family. The judgment appealed from further provided that "should the Defendant lose his law license by suspension, revocation, or otherwise, and be unable to sustain his current level of income, such event shall constitute a sufficient change of circumstances warranting application for downward modification" of child support. With respect to the equitable distribution of property, the Supreme Court concluded that the parties incurred Federal tax liability of $430,476 for 2005 and 2006 up until September 19, 2006, and New York State tax liability of $38,000 for that same period, which constituted a marital debt which should be divided equally between the parties. This tax liability included interest and penalties. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiff's one-half share of that tax liability was $234,238.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly imputed $80,000 in annual income to the plaintiff based upon her education and experience, and the testimony of the defendant's expert. "In determining a child support obligation, a court need not rely on a party's own account of his or her finances", but may, in the exercise of its considerable discretion, impute income to a party based upon his or her employment history, future earning capacity, and educational background , and what he or she is capable of earning, based upon prevailing market conditions and prevailing salaries paid to individuals with the party's credentials in his or her chosen field . Further, imputation of income may be based upon the testimony of an expert regarding a party's ability to earn an income. Here, the Supreme Court's imputation of income was supported by unrefuted expert testimony and testimony regarding the plaintiff's education and experience.

The Court observed that effective January 31, 2010, the Child Support Standards Act provides that the applicable child support percentage should be applied to the first $130,000 of combined parental income (DRL 240[1-b] [c][2]; SSL111-i[2][b]). Where the parents' income exceeds the income cap, as in this case, the amount of child support in excess of the income cap is determined based upon a consideration of factors set forth in DRL 240 (1-b)(f) "and/or the child support percentage" (DRL 240 [1-b][c][3]). The factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(f) include, in pertinent part, the financial resources of both parents, the needs of the child, the standard of living the child would have enjoyed had the marriage not been dissolved, nonmonetary contribution that the parents will make to the care and well-being of the child, and any other factor which the court determines to be relevant to the case. Here, the evidence at the trial supported the Supreme Court's conclusion that, during the marriage, the child enjoyed a "middle-class" lifestyle, and her needs were met by the pendente lite child support award of $2,041 per month. The application of the child support percentage to the first $150,000 of the defendant's annual income, and the amount of child support awarded was supported by the record.

The Appellate Division held that the provision of the judgment of divorce which stated that, "should the Defendant lose his law license by suspension, revocation, or otherwise, and be unable to sustain his current level of income, such event shall constitute a sufficient change of circumstances warranting application for downward modification" of child support, was improper. (Matter of Knights v. Knights, 71 N.Y.2d 865). This provision of the judgment was deleted.

The Appellate Division observed that the income tax liability of the parties was subject to equitable distribution, but equitable distribution does not necessarily mean equal distribution. A spouse is generally obligated to pay his or her 50% share of income tax liability during the marriage if the spouse benefits from use of the funds or the delay in paying the tax liability. However, if one spouse makes the financial decisions regarding the income tax return, and earned virtually 100% of the parties' income during the period, the court, in its discretion, may direct that spouse to pay the entire tax liability. The defendant acknowledged that he handled all tax matters for the parties during the marriage, and attributed his inability to pay his taxes from his current income to the fact that his expenses were too high, in part because he had to maintain a rented home for his family while the parties' house in Pawling was being renovated. The evidence adduced at trial indicated that it was his decision to move the parties' full-time residence to the house in Pawling, despite the fact that the house was in "bad shape." Under the circumstances of this case, it could not be said that the plaintiff derived a benefit from the defendant's failure to pay the taxes. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court, in its discretion, should have directed the defendant to pay the entire tax liability.

Supreme Court Agree's with Justice Falanga - Holds Plaintiff's Self-serving Declaration about State of Mind Is All Required for Divorce on "Irretrievable Breakdown" Ground, Disagreeing with Schiffer v. Schiffer and Strack v. Strack.

In Vahey v Vahey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 832350 (N.Y.Sup.) Supreme Court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the action pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7) to the extent that the first and second causes of action, alleging cruel and inhuman treatment and constructive abandonment, respectively, were dismissed.

Supreme Court observed that CPLR 3016(c) requires that in an action for divorce, "the nature and circumstances of a party's alleged misconduct, if any, and the time and place of each act complained of, if any, shall be specified in the complaint ..." In this case, the plaintiff has sought a divorce on three grounds: cruel and inhuman treatment, and an irretrievable breakdown in the marital relationship.

The Court agreed with the defendant that a claim of cruel and inhuman treatment was not made out, as it did not specify the time and place of the misconduct, and, in addition, did not allege conduct that rises to the required level. All that was alleged was that the wife called the husband vile names and used obscene language, told the plaintiff husband that she didn't want to be married to him any more, and that he was not a good husband. This was patently insufficient and this claim was dismissed.

The plaintiff alleged in his verified complaint that "The relationship between Plaintiff and Defendant has broken down irretrievable [sic] for a period of at least six months." The Supreme Court disagreed with the defendant that CPLR 3016(c) and the cases that cite that statute mandate factual allegations supporting this claim. CPLR 3016(c) refers to the necessity of pleading allegations of "misconduct." Domestic Relations Law 170(7) permits a party to seek a divorce upon a sworn statement by that party that the marital relationship between husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months. This has been pled. This section does not require the plaintiff to allege that the other party was responsible for the breakdown or had misbehaved in any way. The very essence of the law is to dispense with the necessity of proving misconduct by the other spouse. CPLR 3016(c) speaks only of pleading acts of misconduct, and misconduct does not have to be alleged under Domestic Relations Law 170(7). Therefore, it is more accurate to say that CPLR 3016(c) continues to apply where marital fault is alleged, but does not apply when the plaintiff alleges a breakdown in the relationship, as there is no need to cast blame on the other party. Given the clear language of the statute regarding the need to prove "misconduct," the lack of an amendment to CPLR 3016 indicated that the Legislature was not requiring a party asserting the new "no-fault" ground to plead and prove facts in support of the irretrievable breakdown. If its intention were otherwise, such an amendment to the divorce action pleading requirements would be needed. Rather, all that is required is the sworn statement of the irretrievable breakdown, a statement that finds no counterpart in any of the "fault" grounds. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss was denied as to the claim made under Domestic Relations Law 170 (7). The Court noted that as the Legislature in adopting section 170(7) has not required the pleading of objective facts of the breakdown, but has required instead no more than a sworn statement of a breakdown by the plaintiff, it did not appear that a plaintiff can be put to his or her proof on the subject. Under this ground the plaintiff's sworn belief about the state of the relationship must be deemed sufficient, for if not the party seeking the divorce on this basis could be put through the same type of litigation regarding the marital relationship that this legislative addition was clearly designed to avoid. The Court agreed with the analysis set forth by Justice Falanga that the section 170(7) ground is inherently subjective in nature, and "a plaintiff's self-serving declaration about his or her state of mind is all that is required for the dissolution of a marriage on the ground that it is irretrievably broken." D.R.C. v. A.C., 32 Misc.3d 293 (Sup Ct Nassau County 2011). The Court disagreed with the views expressed in Schiffer v. Schiffer, 33 Misc.3d 795 (Sup Ct Dutchess County, 2011) and Strack v. Strack, 31 Misc.3d 258 (Sup Ct Essex County 2011).

The Court denied that cross motion for a sharing of family expenses pro rata based upon the parties' income at the commencement of the action. There was no demonstration that the reasonable needs of the movant or of the parties' children were not being met, as all continued to reside together in the marital residence, and it was apparent that the bills were being paid. The basis of the request for this relief was that plaintiff believed it unfair that the defendant, who retired from the New York City Police Department after the action was commenced, now asserted that she no longer had her full salary and thus had less to contribute to household expenses. Plaintiff, in effect, wanted the Court to "balance the scales" by imputing income to the defendant and to direct specific percentages based on such imputed income. This is not the purpose of a pendente lite award. Here, there was no proven need for support on the part of the moving party, especially in view of the fact that even before the defendant's retirement the plaintiff's income exceeded hers.

Temporary Maintenance Guidelines Income Cap Raised from $500,000 to $524,000.

The "cap" on each spouses annual income, to be utilized in calculating temporary maintenance orders, has increased from $500,000 to $524,000 effective January 31, 2012 in accordance with Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5-a][b][5] . (See Temporary Maintenance Guidelines Worksheet, revised January 31, 2012 at www.nycourts.gov/divorce/TMG-worksheet.pdf or Temporary Spousal Maintenance Guidelines Calculator, revised January 31, 2012 at www.nycourts.gov/divorce/calculator.pdf) Beginning January 31, 2010 and every two years thereafter, the income cap increases by the product of the average annual percentage changes in the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) as published by the united states department of labor bureau of labor statistics for the two year period rounded to the nearest one thousand dollars. The office of court administration is required to determine and publish the income cap. See Domestic Relations Law § 236[B], [5-a][b][5].

Downward Modification of Child Support Based on a Loss of Employment Due to Injury Granted Where Father Demonstrated Injuries Severely Limited His Ability to Resume His Veterinary Practice

In Smith v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 88100 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) pursuant to a 2002 judgment of divorce, defendant (mother) was awarded sole custody of the parties' four children. Pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act (DRL 240[1-b]), plaintiff (father) was directed to pay $2,887 per month in child support based on his imputed income of $160,000 as the sole proprietor of a veterinary practice. The mother, who had no income, was awarded durational maintenance. In 2007, the father was seriously injured in a motor vehicle accident and, in 2009, he sought a downward modification of his child support payments, alleging that there had been a substantial change in circumstances because, among other things, his injuries severely limited his ability to resume his veterinary practice and to perform veterinary services. After a hearing, Supreme Court granted the motion and recalculated the father's monthly child support payments under the Child Support Standards Act to be $634.96 based on the mother's present income of $49,605 from her work as a part-time dental hygienist and the father's income of $24,877.20 from his limited practice and his Social Security disability benefits. The mother appealed, contending that, despite the father's injuries and disability, the motion for a downward modification should have been denied because the father could provide support through some other type of veterinary practice. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that she did not present any evidence contradicting the father's proof of his limited ability to work or supporting her claim that he could hire other veterinarians to assist in running his practice. While a request for a downward modification of child support based on a loss of employment due to injury or illness may be denied where the parent seeking the modification still has the ability to provide support through some other type of employment Supreme Court credited the father's testimony that he is no longer able to work full time at his own practice, could not afford to hire another person to assist him in his practice and was not employable at another practice because of his condition. Giving deference to Supreme Court's credibility determinations there was no basis to disturb its determination that the father demonstrated a significant change in circumstances warranting a downward modification of his child support obligation. The Appellate Division rejected the mother's argument that the presumptively correct amount of child support was unjust or inappropriate and that, as a result, the father's personal injury settlement should have been considered in determining his child support obligation. The children received derivative Social Security benefits, and the evidence established that most of the father's settlement had already been used to pay the father's child support arrears, continue his child support payments and otherwise mitigate his financial problems.

Appellate Division Generally Accords Deference to Supreme Court's Determination Regarding Amount and Duration of Maintenance as Long as the Court Considers the Statutory Factors and Provides a Basis for its Conclusion

In O'Connor v O'Connor, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 88226 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties in this matrimonial action were married in 1986, they had three children (one born in 1990 and twins born in 1992), and plaintiff commenced this action in August 2009 premised upon defendant's abandonment. Following a nonjury trial, Supreme Court, as relevant to this appeal, awarded plaintiff maintenance of $1,000 per month until she was eligible for Social Security retirement benefits in January 2022, subject to earlier termination upon various conditions, including if she remarries or the commencement of her receipt of her share of defendant's pension. In its decision and order, the court also partially granted plaintiff's motion for counsel fees, awarding $7,500 of the over $20,000 in then unpaid counsel fees and disbursements. These awards were included in the April 2011 judgment of divorce. Defendant, challenging the duration of maintenance, appealed from the judgment, which prompted plaintiff to cross-appeal therefrom and to move for an award of appellate counsel fees. Supreme Court, in July 2011, granted plaintiff $900 in counsel fees for making the motion and $9,000 for appellate counsel fees. Defendant appealed from the July 2011 order.

The Appellate Division stated that while its authority is as broad as Supreme Court's regarding maintenance it generally accords deference to Supreme Court's determination regarding the amount and duration of maintenance "as long as the court considers the statutory factors and provides a basis for its conclusion. Maintenance is appropriate where, among other things, the marriage is of long duration, the recipient spouse has been out of the work force for a number of years, has sacrificed her or his own career development or has made substantial noneconomic contributions to the household or to the career of the payor. The fact that a wife has the ability to be self-supporting by some standard of living does not mean that she is self-supporting in the context of the marital standard of living. Here, Supreme Court discussed each of the statutory factors. This was a long-term marriage of 24 years and plaintiff was 50 years old. Although she had a marketing degree and had a job related to her degree early in the marriage, she passed on a promotion because defendant would not move, and later she gave up her position in order to raise the parties' children. She has not worked in marketing since early 1992. At the time of the divorce, she worked as a school aide and her earnings for 2009 and 2010 were about $14,000 and $18,000, respectively. Supreme Court accepted her testimony that she would need considerable educational updating of an unknown duration and cost before being able to return to a marketing position or another professional field. Defendant's 2010 income was about $78,854, but Supreme Court noted that he did not work available overtime which, in the prior four years, resulted in income levels between approximately $95,000 and $117,000. Defendant's child support obligation for the oldest child ended in August 2011 and the remaining obligation ceases in June 2013. In light of Supreme Court's discussion of the pertinent factors, the length of the marriage, career sacrifice by plaintiff, large discrepancy in current earning power and plaintiff's age, the Appellate Division was unpersuaded that the duration of maintenance determined by Supreme Court should be modified. It rejected defendant's argument that it was error to order him to pay counsel fees for the underlying action and the appeal. It is within the discretionary power of Supreme Court to award counsel fees and, in doing so, "a court should review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions" (DeCabrera v. Cabrera-Rosete, 70 N.Y.2d 879, 881 [1987]). Supreme Court discussed the financial position of the parties, including defendant's superior earning capacity, and otherwise adequately explained its reasons for awarding counsel fees. Although plaintiff did not pursue her cross appeal, plaintiff's counsel stated in an affirmation that the cross appeal involved a narrow issue that appellate counsel had indicated did not affect her fee. It found no abuse of discretion by Supreme Court in the award of counsel fees .

Equitable Distribution and Counsel Fees Denied Where Parties Elected Not to Treat Marriage as an Economic Partnership

In Medley v Medley, 2011 WL 6975934 (N.Y.Sup.), 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 52457(U) (Table, Text in WESTLAW), Unreported Disposition, the action was commenced August 2007 for absolute divorce by Plaintiff, Claudette Medley, against Defendant, Maurice Medley. A divorce was granted in favor of Defendant after inquest on the grounds of constructive abandonment. There were no children of the marriage. A trial was held on the ancillary issues of equitable distribution and counsel fees. The parties were married in a civil ceremony on March 5, 1997, after a brief courtship. At the time of the marriage, Plaintiff was in the United States with temporary legal status and Defendant was an American citizen. Prior to the marriage, each party resided in and owned their own home. Plaintiff's home, 141-15 255th Street, Queens, N.Y. ("255 Street property"), was jointly owned with a friend and Defendant was the sole owner of 130-60 221st Street, Queens, N.Y. ("221 Street property"). The parties agree that they lived together at 130-33 221st Street, Queens, N.Y. ("130-33 Street property"), from March 2005 until July 7, 2007. The parties' living arrangements between March 1997 and 2005 were disputed and was the core issue at trial. Both parties engaged in real estate investments. Plaintiff as a real estate sales agent and owned real estate businesses. Defendant bought and sold investment properties. Except for one joint ownership, all their investments, businesses were conducted separately by each.

Supreme Court found that Plaintiff migrated to the United States in 1988 under a temporary Visa with a work permit. She was employed in administration at a Hospital. In 1994, Plaintiff purchased the 255 Street property, jointly with a friend. Her friend and co-owner subsequently deceased and the one half share was inherited by her friend's daughter. Upon the death of Plaintiff's friend, the mortgage insurance paid off the mortgage on the 255 Street property. Plaintiff later refinanced the property by herself and solely kept the undisclosed proceeds. It was unclear how Plaintiff, solely, refinanced the joint ownership 255 Street property. The daughter did testify that she was aware the property was refinanced; however, no documents were executed by the daughter nor did she receive any of the undisclosed proceeds. After three months of dating, in early 1997, Plaintiff showed Defendant a letter from Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") informing Plaintiff that her Visa status had expired. The parties ensued in a conversation on how to change Plaintiff's status or whether Plaintiff will leave the United States to, what Plaintiff classified as, "her father's farm". After this conversation, the parties immediately planned the wedding. The day before the marriage, at Plaintiff's residence, the parties discussed drafting a pre-nuptial agreement. Plaintiff wrote a handwritten document. The document entitled, Prenuptial Agreement between Maurice Medley and Claudette as of 3/3/97, states "that neither party would take any legal action to seek the other's assets". The agreement, though not acknowledged, is signed by both parties and dated March 4, 1997. One day later, the parties were married, March 5, 1997. It was undisputed that the parties resided together from March 2005 until July 2007 at the 130-33 Street property. Plaintiff had one child, not of the marriage, who resided with Plaintiff and one other family member. There was no document placed into evidence to show that the parties filed joint tax returns or commingled their incomes and bank accounts. Although no tax records were placed into evidence, as Plaintiff claimed joint filing, she contradicted her testimony by acknowledging that as of 2003 she filed as head of household. Plaintiff filed as head of household to show diminished income so that her son could receive financial aid and a scholarship from the private school he attended in New Jersey. The tuition for the school was approximately $28,000.00 to $30,000.00 annually. As a result of Plaintiff's tax filing and the financial application she misrepresented to the school, her son obtained the scholarship and she paid $2,400.00 annually as a single parent.

Plaintiff obtained a Bachelor of Arts degree from York College in 2004. From 1997 through 2005, she earned approximately $30,000.00 annually from Memorial Sloan Kettering. In 2005, her salary increased to $50,000.00. Plaintiff obtained her real estate license in 1997 and began real estate sales. In addition to Plaintiff's earnings from the hospital, she earned additional income ranging through 2010 from as high as $50,000.00 to low as $2,000.00. Consistent with the document signed on March 4, 2005, Plaintiff kept her income separate and apart from Defendant and some of this income was not disclosed prior to the commencement of this case.

All income received from the properties were kept and used by Defendant towards the mortgages and carrying charges on the properties. Although there was a marriage on paper, the parties communication and financial partnership was non existent. Plaintiff's incomes were either not disclosed or shared. Defendant's income although known was not shared.

The credible evidence showed that the parties lived their lives in a manner consistent with the written document they signed in March 1997. Each engaged in separate investment ventures, buying and selling investment properties and kept all their incomes separate from each other. Plaintiff did not disclose any of her real estate investment income prior to trial to Defendant although she claimed entitlement to Defendant's. Defendant did not claim any entitlement to Plaintiff's income, investments or license claiming this was the intent of the parties. Throughout the marriage, there was no credible evidence that the parties spent any significant time together but rather maintained a separate business lifestyle. At most the parties had a sparse emotional life but it was impacted by a clear separate financial life. What contribution Plaintiff made to the investment property purchased with Defendant's funds was unproven since the record was devoid of any documents to support Plaintiff's claim except her testimony.

The Court found that there were several innuendoes of the purpose and true meaning of the parties nuptial. Their arrangement was a sparse emotional life with no financial partnership. For an approximate ten year marriage, the parties lived together for a total of two years and four months just prior to filing of the action. There was evidence that Plaintiff filed deceptive and misrepresented legal school documents and tax returns. Although the Court would not define or marshal what is a "married life". The cliché "you know it when you see it" could be inferred in this case. These parties engaged in a pattern of behavior that was inconsistent of any semblance of a marriage life in its ordinary and reasonable meaning. Plaintiff failed to present any documentary proof or credible evidence for her claims of entitlement. It was undisputed that during the marriage, Defendant purchased three properties, titled solely in his name. Defendant claimed that Plaintiff failed to meet her burden to establish that she made any contribution to these properties, thus warranting an equitable distribution of the value of these real properties. Defendant made no claim of an equitable distribution of Plaintiff's businesses or license.

Looking to DRL 236(B)(1)(c), it was clear that all property acquired during a marriage acquired by either spouse, with the exception of property in specifically delineated categories, is considered to be marital property. In this matter, Defendant purchased the Dean Street property, the DeCosta Avenue property, and the 130-33 Street property, during the marriage in 1999, 2001 and 2005, respectively. Pursuant to the statutory presumption, all three properties are deemed to be marital property. In addition to the real property acquired during the marriage, both parties also acquired retirement benefits throughout the duration of the marriage. The Court found that to the extent the benefits were accrued during the marriage, the retirement benefits were marital property.

Turning to the unique circumstances of this case, the Court considered the economic partnership, as created by the parties in this marriage. While the living arrangements of the parties from March 1997 through May 2005 was disputed, it was undisputed that from the outset of the marriage the parties agreed not to treat the marriage as an economic partnership. While the document signed on March 4, 1997, was not a pre-nuptial agreement, as it did not satisfy the requirements for a pre-nuptial agreement as required by DRL 236(B)(3), the written signed document evinced the intent of the parties to forego any legal claim each party may have to the other party's assets in the event that the marriage was unsuccessful. While the Plaintiff testified that the agreement only concerned the property owned prior to the marriage, the evidence presented established that the parties maintained separate finances throughout the life of the marriage. Although Plaintiff testified that the parties held one joint account until approximately 2004, she failed to present evidence to establish the existence of that or any joint account. Plaintiff did not contribute to the down payment or mortgage payments nor made any spousal or homemaker contribution on any of the properties purchased by Defendant. Moreover, while Plaintiff testified that the parties filed joint tax returns during the early years of the marriage, until approximately 2004, she failed to present any joint tax returns for any year during the marriage.

In addition to maintaining separate bank accounts, the parties also conducted their real estate investments and business endeavors separately. The parties' separate real estate dealings evinced an intention to maintain separate financial accounts and investments consistent with the document written and signed on March 4, 1997. Plaintiff's testimony of the parties' intent was inconsistent with the parties' actions. The manner in which the parties conducted their real estate endeavors was inconsistent with the economic partnership theory.

Supreme Court observed that Courts have held in matrimonial proceedings where parties conduct themselves in a manner inconsistent with the economic partnership, the Court may find that equitable distribution of property is not warranted (see Duspiva v. Duspiva, 181 A.D.2d 810, [2d Dept 1992]; Miller v. Miller, 4 AD3d 718, [3d Dept 2004]; Galvin v. Galvin, 20 AD3d 550, [2d Dept 2005]). The parties began their marriage with an agreement that neither party would pursue legal action to claim the other party's assets. For the duration of the marriage, the parties lived in a manner consistent with the terms of that the document they wrote and signed. Although the parties resided in the same residence, 130-33 Street property, the Court found that the parties continued to conduct themselves in a manner consistent with the terms of the document signed on March 4, 1997, and conducted themselves in a manner inconsistent with the typical economic partnership and, therefore, equitable distribution of the property was not warranted.

Plaintiff presented evidence and testimony to establish that she purchased furniture for the residence at 130-33 221st Street in the sum of $11,734.23. Plaintiff further testified that although she left the residence in July 2007 Defendant did not allow her to remove the furniture from the residence. In light of the parties' agreement and conduct consistent with the agreement, the Court finds that the furniture purchased for the 130-33 221st Street residence is property of Plaintiff. However, as the furniture has remained in Defendant's possession since 2007, Defendant had to pay Plaintiff for the cost of the furniture. Defendant was directed to pay Plaintiff $11,734.23 for the furnishings in the residence.

Plaintiff sought counsel fees. According to Plaintiff's testimony, in 2009, she earned approximately $70,000.00 from her employment at the hospital and an additional $20,000.00 from her real estate businesses. Additionally, she testified that for the year 2010, she anticipated earning approximately $70,000.00 from the hospital and has already derived $15,000.00 from her real estate businesses. Plaintiff earned a minimum of $85,000.00 in 2010. Defendant's Amended Statement of Net Worth indicated that Defendant's monthly income was $12,707.44. While Defendant's income was greater than that of Plaintiff, throughout the duration of the marriage, the parties maintained separate finances and Plaintiff was able to meet her financial obligations without the assistance of Defendant. Considering the unique circumstances of this case, Plaintiff's request for counsel fees was denied.

Child Support Cap Raised from $130,000 to $136,000

The "combined parental income amount" to be utilized in calculating child support orders has increased from $130,000 to $136,000 effective January 31, 2012. (See Child Support Worksheet (Form UD-8) revised January 2012).

Where Support Obligation in Judgment Which Incorporated a Surviving Agreement Is Modified in Court on Consent, Party Seeking Further Modification must Show a Substantial Change in Circumstances

In Anderson v Anderson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 503584 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties originally executed a separation agreement that was incorporated, but not merged, into a judgment of divorce dated August 24, 2006. Upon a petition by the mother, the Family Court conducted a hearing, after which the support obligations as set forth in the separation agreement were modified, upon the consent of the parties, in an order of the Family Court dated February 5, 2008. In May 2010 the mother commenced a proceeding to modify the father's child support obligations as set forth in the order dated February 5, 2008. The Appellate Division affirmed the order granting an upward modification. It observed that where a party seeks to modify a child support order entered on consent, he or she "has the burden of showing that there has been a substantial change in circumstances" (Matter of Ceballos v. Castillo, 85 AD3d 1161, 1162; see Matter of Jewett v. Monfoletto, 72 AD3d 688, 688-689; Weiss v. Weiss, 294 A.D.2d 566, 567). Here, in light of the testimony and documentary evidence demonstrating the increased cost of clothing, food, and heating oil, as well as the increased expenses related to the son's special education needs and the children's involvement in activities such as music lessons, karate lessons, soccer, and girl scouts, the mother demonstrated a substantial change in circumstances sufficient to warrant the modification of the father's child support obligation.

Attorney for Child May Not Report to Court Contents of Her Conversations with Child. Inappropriate for Attorney for Child to Present Reports Containing Facts Which Are Not Part of the Record.

In Matter of New v Sharma, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 89855 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in October 2010 the father filed a petition to modify a prior order of visitation dated January 14, 2010. In opposing the father's petition, the attorney for the child, based on the father's submissions, requested that the Court limit the father's parenting time to periods of "short duration and in a specific location." In an order dated December 7, 2010, the Family Court, without a hearing, in effect, denied the father's petition and granted the application of the attorney for the child to modify the prior order of visitation dated January 14, 2010, so as to limit the father's parenting time to brief visits at public places. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the father's contention, the Family Court had the authority to grant the relief requested by the attorney for the child in her opposition to his petition. However, under the circumstances of this case, the Family Court erred by, in effect, denying the father's petition and granting the application of the attorney for the child without conducting a full evidentiary hearing. Generally, visitation should be determined after a full evidentiary hearing to determine the best interests of the child. A hearing is not necessary, however, "where the court possesses adequate relevant information to enable it to make an informed and provident determination as to the child's best interest". Here, the Family Court did not possess adequate relevant information to determine that the limitation of the father's parenting time to brief visits at public places was in the best interests of the child. To the extent that the Family Court relied on the detailed accounts provided by the attorney for the child concerning her conversations with the child, it is inappropriate for an attorney for the child to present " 'reports containing facts which are not part of the record' " (Cervera v. Bressler, 50 AD3d 837, 841, quoting Weiglhofer v. Weiglhofer, 1 AD3d 786, 78 n 1; see 22 NYCRR 7.2[b]). The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a hearing on the father's petition and the application of the attorney for the child, including an in camera interview with the child, and thereafter a new determination. In light of certain remarks made by the Family Court Judge, it directed that the proceeding should be held before a different Judge.

Disposition in Protection Proceeding Must Comply with Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children Where Custody Awarded to Non-respondent Parent Who Lives in Another State.

In Matter of Alexis M., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 89868 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the issue on this appeal was whether the Family Court properly disposed of a child protective petition by transferring custody of the subject child to a nonrespondent parent who lived in another state. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances, the order transferring custody of the child in this case was improper. The New York City Administration for Children's Services (ACS) commenced a child protective proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 10 against the mother in 2008. The mother consented to the jurisdiction of the Family Court pursuant to Family Court Act 1051(a), and a finding of neglect was entered with respect to the child. In July 2008, during the pendency of the proceeding, the child was removed from the mother's home pursuant to Family Court Act 1024, remanded to the custody of the Commissioner of Social Services (Commissioner), and placed in foster care. At some point after the proceeding was commenced, the nonrespondent father, who lived in Virginia, filed a petition for custody of the child. The Family Court, after a hearing, issued an order of disposition which, inter alia, terminated the Commissioner's custody and supervision of the subject child, and awarded temporary custody of the child to the father, pending further proceedings on the father's custody petition. The mother appealed from the order of disposition. The Appellate Division held that the order of disposition violated the provisions of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (ICPC), codified at Social Services Law 374-a. A stated purpose of the ICPC is to ensure that a child who is in the custody or supervision of a Commissioner of Social Services will not be placed in another state with an inappropriate resource. The state that is to receive a child must be provided with a "full opportunity to ascertain the circumstances of the proposed placement, thereby promoting full compliance with applicable requirements for the protection of the child" (SSL 374-a[1], art I[b]). Article III of the ICPC provides that the sending agency shall furnish the receiving state with written notices, so that the appropriate child welfare authorities in the receiving state can determine whether the proposed placement is consistent with the interests of the child. That article further provides that a child "shall not be sent, brought, or caused to be sent or brought into the receiving state until the appropriate public authorities in the receiving state shall notify the sending agency, in writing, to the effect that the proposed placement does not appear to be contrary to the interests of the child" (SSL 374-a[1], art III[d]). The "physical transfer of the child to the receiving state is not to occur at all absent full compliance with Social Services Law 374-a, including the transmittal of the required written notices to the receiving state and the approval of the proposed placement by the receiving state". Here, the order of disposition terminated the custody and supervision of the child by the Commissioner, and temporarily awarded custody to the father, who lived in Virginia. Where the custody of a child who is under the supervision of the Commissioner is transferred to the custody of a parent or relative in another state, the provisions of the ICPC apply. The relevant authorities in Virginia did not approve the proposed placement of the subject child pursuant to the ICPC. Consequently, the order terminating supervision of the child by the Commissioner and awarding temporary custody to the father was improper. The Appellate Division held that the child had to be remanded to the supervision of the Commissioner, pending a new dispositional hearing and new disposition.

Must Be a Clear and Unequivocal Order to Be Held in Contempt for its Violation
In Matter of Formosa v Litt--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 89886 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed, inter alia, that to sustain a finding of civil contempt based upon a violation of a court order, it is necessary to establish that a lawful court order clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate was in effect and the person alleged to have violated the order had actual knowledge of its terms). Here, the mother failed to meet her burden in seeking to hold the father in contempt. The relevant provisions of the two court orders that the father allegedly violated directed him to make every effort to provide reasonable accommodation to the mother when she could not drive to visit the daughter on a regular visitation date because of a religious holiday. Due to a religious holiday on the mother's scheduled visit on Wednesday, May 19, 2010, she requested the father to permit her to visit the child on one of the dates she specified. The father allegedly denied the request because the child had activities scheduled on those dates. The subject provisions only required the father to "make every effort to accommodate" the mother when it was "feasible." Accordingly, the father's failure to accommodate the mother on this occasion did not constitute the willful violation of a clear and unequivocal mandate

Severance of Claims in Matrimonial Action Proper Where No Issues of Fact or Questions of Law That Are Common to the Two Causes of Action

In Herskowitz v Klein, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 89950 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the husband commenced this action for a divorce and ancillary relief. The wife interposed an answer asserting three counterclaims against the husband. The third counterclaim sought to recover damages for "theft of intellectual property." It was undisputed that the alleged intellectual property did not constitute marital property, and the wife did not contend that it affected equitable distribution or any other issue in the action. The husband moved, inter alia, to sever the wife's third counterclaim from the action and the Supreme Court granted his motion. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that in furtherance of convenience or to avoid prejudice the court may order a severance of claims, or may order a separate trial of any claim, or of any separate issue (CPLR 603). The determination to grant or deny a request for a severance pursuant to CPLR 603 is a matter of judicial discretion. While the granting of a motion for consolidation or joint trial hinges upon a finding of common issues of law or fact, the granting of severance generally depends upon an absence of such commonality. Thus, severance may be inappropriate where there are common factual and legal issues involved in two causes of action, and the interests of judicial economy and consistency of verdicts will be served by having a single trial. Conversely, severance may be appropriate where there are no issues of fact or questions of law to be determined that are common to the two causes of action. Here, the wife's third counterclaim and the other causes of action did not contain common factual or legal issues, and are not intertwined so as to raise concerns regarding the interests of judicial economy or consistency of verdicts. In light of the circumstances of this case, Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion when it granted the husband's motion.

Award of Counsel Fees to Monied Spouse Cannot Be Made Merely to Punish a Party for Claimed Discovery Delays or for Seeking a Jury Trial on Grounds

In Wells v Serman,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 539303 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed, on the law, an order which granted plaintiff's motion for an award of interim counsel fees in the amount of $17,850. It held that Supreme Court's award of interim counsel fees to plaintiff, the monied spouse, based solely on defendant's conduct in delaying the litigation, was improper under Domestic Relations Law 237. An award of counsel fees under DRL 237 cannot be made merely to punish a party for claimed discovery delays or for seeking a jury trial on grounds (see Silverman v. Silverman, 304 A.D.2d 41, 47-48 [2003]).

Although Emergency Jurisdiction Is Generally Temporary, Court Was Authorized to Make a Permanent Custody Award Under DRL 75-c [2]

In Mater of Tin v Thar Kyi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 517161 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order granting custody of the parties' two children to petitioner mother, with visitation to the father as the parties agree. The court conducted a fact-finding hearing at which the mother testified without contradiction that the father had physically and verbally abused her and that he had physically abused one of the children. The mother further testified that the father threatened her life shortly before the hearing. The father did not testify at the hearing and called no witnesses. In its findings of fact, the court stated that it found the mother to be credible. Thus there was a sufficient evidentiary basis for the court to award custody of the children to the mother. Evidence of the father's acts of domestic violence demonstrated that he possessed a character was ill-suited to the difficult task of providing his young child[ren] with moral and intellectual guidance. The Court also concluded that the court had subject matter jurisdiction over the custody proceeding pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-c, based on evidence that the father had committed acts of physical violence against the mother and one of the children (see Matter of Callahan v. Smith, 23 A.D.3d 957, 958, 805 N.Y.S.2d 157). Although emergency jurisdiction is generally temporary, the court was authorized to make a permanent custody award because no other custody proceeding had been instituted in a competing forum and New York had become the children's home state following commencement of the proceeding (76-c [2]).

Father's Appeal Dismissed for Failure to Assemble Proper Record

In Butti v Butti, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 503580 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division dismissed the father's appeal from an order which directed him to pay a certain sum for college expenses for the child because the record did not contain the transcript of the hearing. It noted that an appellant is obligated "to assemble a proper record on appeal, which must include any relevant transcripts of proceedings" before the hearing court or trial court. Here, the appellant's failure to provide the Court with the transcript of the Family Court hearing renders the record on appeal inadequate to enable the Court to reach an informed determination on the merits.

Despite 9 Year Separation Husbands Pension Distributed Equally. Obligation to Pay College Expenses Extended Beyond 21 Where Husband Acknowledged He Had Agreed to Pay Part of Children's College Education Costs.

In Shapiro v Shapiro--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 88161 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties married in 1985 and had two sons (born in 1990 and 1992). They separated in November 1999. Defendant commenced a divorce action in December 1999; however, plaintiff successfully contested that action, resulting in it being dismissed in 2000. They remained separated and, in January 2008, plaintiff brought this divorce action. After stipulating to a ground for plaintiff to obtain a divorce, a bench trial ensued after which Supreme Court directed, in relevant part, that the marital portion of plaintiff's pension, calculated pursuant to the formula in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481, 494 [1984]), be distributed equally in periodic payments when plaintiff received his pension payments. The court also directed that plaintiff contribute a pro rata share to college expenses at a State University of New York college until each child reaches the age of 22. On appeal the Plaintiff urged that the marital portion of his pension should not have been distributed equally in light of the parties' long separation. He presented a report from his economist stating that the value of the marital portion of his pension when defendant sought a divorce in December 1999 was $29,148, whereas such value had increased to $112,613 by January 2008 when plaintiff brought this action. The Appellate Division pointed out that while the value of the pension at the time of the earlier unsuccessful action cannot control, the circumstances surrounding the earlier action can be considered in the overall equitable distribution of marital property. Substantial deference is accorded to the trial court's determination regarding equitable distribution so long as the requisite statutory factors were considered. Supreme Court noted that defendant left the workforce to care for the parties' children, she made substantial noneconomic contributions to the parties' assets during the early years of the marriage, she continued as primary caretaker for the children after the separation, she sacrificed career development and she now earned substantially less than plaintiff. It held that under such circumstances, Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding defendant half the marital portion of plaintiff's pension. Plaintiff argued that the portion of his pension considered marital property should have been distributed in a lump sum rather than future periodic payments. The Appellate Division held that either method is acceptable, and it generally rests within the discretion of the trial court as to the method best suited for the particular facts of each case. Supreme Court's determination was within its discretion. Plaintiff contended that his obligation to pay college expenses should not extend beyond the age of 21 of his children. The Appellate Division noted that absent an agreement extending the obligation, a parent is not legally obligated to pay college costs for a child that has reached the age of 21. It found that Plaintiff acknowledged in his testimony that he had, in fact, agreed to pay part of the children's college education costs, there was no indication that he intended to limit his payments to the children's first three years in college, and proof at trial established that funds had been previously set up to assist in such costs. Under these circumstances, it held that it was not error for Supreme Court to direct plaintiff to pay a portion of the children's college costs until they reach the age of 22.

Defendant Wastefully Dissipated Marital Assets by Failing to Make Mortgage Payments, Using Money from His Retirement Account for Personal Reasons Rather than to Prevent Foreclosure and Permitting Vehicles Purchased During the Marriage to Be Repossessed In Maggiore v Maggiore, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 88166 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) defendant contended on appeal that Supreme Court abused its discretion in determining that he had wastefully dissipated marital assets, failed to find economic fault by plaintiff, and erred in granting plaintiff maintenance. The parties were married in 1996, were the parents of two children (born in 1992 and 1996), and defendant commenced a divorce action in 2008. He discontinued his action in December 2009 and plaintiff immediately commenced the current action. Several orders were entered while the actions were pending, including mutual orders of protection as well as an order that defendant continue paying the mortgage on the marital residence and that he keep plaintiff on his health insurance.

Defendant, however, stopped the mortgage payments resulting in a foreclosure proceeding, and he removed plaintiff from his health insurance at a time when she was recovering from back surgery. In an attempt to prevent foreclosure on the home, defendant was permitted, with plaintiff's consent, to withdraw some retirement funds, which he instead used for his personal expenses. He also violated the protective order resulting in a multicount indictment, and he pleaded guilty to criminal contempt in the second degree. At the outset of trial, the parties stipulated to grounds for divorce and custody, with a bench trial ensuing on the issues of maintenance, equitable distribution and child support. Although Supreme Court rejected plaintiff's contention that defendant's action constituted egregious conduct that should affect equitable distribution, it did find wasteful dissipation by defendant and was unpersuaded by defendant's assertion of economic fault by plaintiff. The court awarded plaintiff the marital residence (which was characterized by Supreme Court as essentially worthless in light of foreclosure and other judgments) and her salon business, as well as a distributive award of $14,341.71. Plaintiff received maintenance of $250 per week for six years and child support was set at $182 per week. The Appellate Division found that the record supported Supreme Court's determination that defendant wastefully dissipated marital assets, which is one of the statutory factors in equitable distribution analysis (DRL 236[B][5][d][12]). During the divorce actions, defendant failed to make mortgage payments resulting in foreclosure on a primary marital asset, and he used money from his retirement account for personal reasons rather than to prevent foreclosure. He permitted vehicles purchased during the marriage to be repossessed and a judgment to be entered for unpaid marital debt. Defendant repeatedly violated court orders resulting in a substantial reduction in marital assets. Defendant's assertion that Supreme Court erred in not finding economic fault by plaintiff was unpersuasive. This matrimonial action was replete with acrimoniousness and uncooperative postures by both parties. However, Supreme Court was in the best position to consider the credibility of the parties' various accusations and its decision not to attribute economic fault to plaintiff in its equitable distribution analysis was not an abuse of discretion. Supreme Court's determination regarding equitable distribution had ample record support. The requisite statutory factors were considered by Supreme Court regarding maintenance, and the award was well within its discretion. The court noted, among other things, defendant's superior earning power, plaintiff's back problems and the potential affect on her ability to continue working as a hair stylist, her need to train for other work, the length of the marriage, the amount of time before the children reached the age of majority, and plaintiff's role as primary caretaker of the children.

Child Support Cap Raised from $130,000 to $136,000

The "combined parental income amount" to be utilized in calculating child support orders has increased from $130,000 to $136,000 effective January 31, 2012. (See Child Support Worksheet (Form UD-8) revised January 2012). The amount of the “combined parental income” is established by Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (2) as the amount set forth in Social Services Law § 111-l (2) (b). Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (2) provides that the amount established shall be multiplied by the appropriate child support percentage and such amount shall be prorated in the same proportion as each parent’s income is to the combined parental income. Social Services Law § 111-l (2)(b) provides that the $130,000 cap is increased automatically on January 31, 2012 and on January 31 every two years thereafter by the product of the average annual percentage changes in the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) as published by the United States department of labor bureau of labor statistics for the two year period rounded to the nearest one thousand dollars. (See Bureau of Labor Statistics for its publications at <http://www.bls.gov>)

First Department Holds That Double Dipping Is Not Allowed Under Temporary Maintenance Guidelines

In Khaira v Khaira, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 371997 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Saxe, considered the guidelines for awards of temporary spousal maintenance under Domestic Relations Law 236 (B)(5-a), particularly with regard to the circumstances in which the court may deviate from the guideline amount derived by formula (the presumptive award), and the procedures that must be undertaken to do so. The parties married on July 8, 2006. They had two sons, and the wife had a son from a previous marriage. In September of 2010, the husband voluntarily moved out of the marital residence, and in October 2010, the wife commenced the divorce proceeding. She moved for pendente lite support, asking for monthly maintenance of $11,500 and child support of $7,290, and a direction that the husband directly pay the carrying costs on the marital residence, child care expenses, and all health care expenses for the family.

The court observed that to determine temporary maintenance, the motion court had to apply Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a), which had become effective on October 12, 2010. The court determined the presumptive award to be $11,500 per month, awarded the wife $13,870 in unallocated spousal and child support, tax deductible to the husband, and required the husband to directly pay to the lender the monthly mortgage payments on the marital residence in which the wife and the children continue to reside, and the health care insurance premiums and unreimbursed health care expenses for the family, including his stepson. It also directed the husband to pay the wife interim counsel fees of $42,000.

On appeal, the husband contended that the motion court awarded the wife an excessive sum because it failed to consider his actual, documented net monthly income and cash flow, and incorrectly calculated his annual income by including non-recurring earnings such as a one-time bonus, and illiquid, noncash equity compensation. He challenged the counsel fee award on the ground that the wife’s mother guaranteed her counsel fee obligation, and counsel has been paid in full to date. He also challenged the directive that he pay the health care expenses of his stepson.

Justice Saxe observed that Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a) reflects a substantial change in the Legislature's approach to temporary maintenance. The previous spousal maintenance provision gave the court great leeway, directing only in general terms that it order maintenance "in such amount as justice requires," considering the parties' standard of living during the marriage, the reasonable needs of the non-monied spouse and the monied spouse's ability to pay, and with regard to a list of factors such as the parties' respective earning capacities (former DRL 236[B][6]). Courts applying that provision observed that pendente lite maintenance was awarded to "tide over the more needy party, not to determine the correct ultimate distribution and to ensure that a needy spouse is provided with funds for his or her support and reasonable needs" The new provision, rather than aiming merely to "tide over" the non-monied spouse, creates a substantial presumptive entitlement. He noted that the motion court properly followed the initial procedures. It applied the $500,000 cap to the husband's income, and using $60,000 as the wife's income, based on the monthly payments she acknowledged receiving from her parents, performed the two calculations: for the first, it subtracted 20% of $60,000 ($12,000) from 30% of $500,000 ($150,000), arriving at $138,000; for the second, it calculated 40% of $560,000 ($224,000), then deducted $60,000, arriving at $164,000. It properly treated the lesser of these two calculations, $138,000, as the guideline amount. At that point, the court observed that the parties' 2008 joint income tax return reflected an adjusted gross income of $851,549, almost all from the husband's earnings at the investment firm the Blackstone Group, and that their 2009 tax return reflected an adjusted gross income of $1,063,426, also almost entirely from the husband's employment. However, it did not then proceed to explicitly discuss whether an additional amount of maintenance was warranted from the portion of the husband's income that exceeded the $500,000 cap, as required by 236(B)(5-a)(c)(2). Instead, the court next examined the wife's submitted monthly expense budget of approximately $21,267 and concluded that with the exception of claims for $1,000 for gifts and $225 for charitable contributions, the remainder ($20,041), which included $4,125 for the cost of a nanny, represented the wife's and the children's reasonable needs. In essence, the court simply ruled that the husband should pay the full amount of the wife's and the children's claimed needs, partly through his payment of the mortgage on the marital residence ($5,317) and the family's health care premiums and unreimbursed medical expenses ($855), and partly through monthly payments to the wife of $13,870. In other words, the court awarded the wife $20,041 in unallocated spousal and child support without setting out a calculation of appropriate child support and without discussing or even mentioning the factors in Domestic Relations Law 236[B][5-a][c][2]).

In considering the husband's challenge to the award, the Court rejected his suggestion that his support obligation should have been calculated based solely on his base pay, without reference to his bonus, or that the court should have taken into consideration his net pay. The statute instructs the court to base the calculations on the payor's gross income as reported in his federal income tax return, and the motion court properly did exactly that, correctly treating the husband's bonuses as income and ignoring his reliance on his net income (which can be manipulated with deductions and deferred compensation). However, the motion court did not strictly comply with the requisites of Domestic Relations Law 236 (B)(5-a).

Justice Saxe observed that no language in either the new temporary maintenance provision or the CSSA specifically addresses whether the statutory formulas are intended to include the portion of the carrying costs of their residence attributable to the non-monied spouse and the children. The new law "does not factor in child support issues or payment of household expenses. In the absence of a specific reference to the carrying charges for the marital residence, the Court considered it reasonable and logical to view the formula adopted by the new maintenance provision as covering all the spouse's basic living expenses, including housing costs as well as the costs of food and clothing and other usual expenses. The Court believed that the new approach of calculating spousal support payments to the non-monied spouse by means of a formula is intended to arrive at the amount that will cover all the payee's presumptive reasonable expenses. By calculating the guideline amount and then simply adding the direct mortgage payment on top of that, the motion court awarded more than the amount reached by the formula, without providing the required explanation.

Justice Saxe indicated that it is possible that directing payment above and beyond the guideline amount may be appropriate in certain situations. For instance, the direct mortgage payment might be justifiable as additional support when the payor's income exceeds $500,000 and the applicable factors listed in Domestic Relations Law 236 (B)(5-a)(c)(2)(a) are taken into account; or, depending on the size of the mortgage payment, perhaps only part of it should be treated as the payee's housing costs, and the remainder should be treated as the upkeep of a marital investment. He suggested that perhaps there are other reasons why the guideline amount is unjust or inappropriate. "It may well be that in this case, consideration of the enumerated factors, such as the stark difference in the parties' current earning capacities, their standard of living during the marriage, and the need to pay for day care, would justify the motion court's direction that the husband pay as additional maintenance a specified portion of his income beyond the $500,000 cap."

Because the statute expressly requires the court to both make and explain that determination (DRL 236[B][5-a][c][2][b]), the Appellate Division could not permit the award to remain as it stood. While the ultimate support award may well be appropriate, it must be appropriately supported and explained. The Court therefore modified so as to vacate the support award and remanded the matter for a reconsideration of the award in light of the directives of Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a). It also vacated the portion of the order that placed responsibility on the husband for his stepson's health care insurance and unreimbursed health care expenses. There was no allegation that the stepson was a recipient of public assistance or that he was in danger of becoming a public charge, and no other legal rationale for imposing that obligation on the husband.

The Court upheld the award of counsel fees to the wife as the "less monied spouse" (Domestic Relations Law 237[a]). Justice Saxe observed that the statute provides that "[p]ayment of any retainer fees to the attorney for the petitioning party shall not preclude any awards of fees and expenses to an applicant which would otherwise be allowed under this section"; the husband's argument that no award of fees was appropriate because the wife's mother paid her attorney's retainer fee failed to rebut the presumption in favor of the award.

Comment:

Counsel for the spouse paying temporary maintenance should request, in his opposing papers, that the temporary maintenance order contain a provision directed the spouse who is awarded temporary maintenance to pay the "carrying costs of the marital residence" . Without such a direction, the spouse receiving the temporary maintenance award will not be under any court ordered obligation to pay those expenses, even though the temporary maintenance award includes sums for their payment, and the credit rating of the payor spouse may suffer or the mortgage may go into foreclosure..

Counsel for a spouse seeking temporary maintenance should to make sure, in preparing an application for temporary support, that the "presumptive award" will be enough to permit his client to pay the "carrying costs of the marital residence." The application for temporary maintenance should ask the court to specify what items are considered "carrying costs of the marital residence".

Supreme Court Holds Once a Party Has Stated under Oath That the Marriage Has Been Irretrievably Broken for a Period of at Least Six Months, the Cause of Action for Divorce Has Been Established as a Matter of Law and There Is No Defense

In Townes v Coker, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 444054 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married on June 12, 1981 and had three emancipated children. On October 6, 2008, Wife commenced an action for divorce against Husband. In her verified reply the Wife consented to the entry of the Judgement of Divorce based on Husband's counterclaim for constructive abandonment. On March 23, 2009, the parties executed a Stipulation, "So-Ordered" by Hon. Anthony J. Falanga, wherein Wife agreed to discontinue the 2008 action so that Husband may commence his own action on the grounds of constructive abandonment. Pursuant to the terms of the March 23, 2009 Stipulation, on or about April 8, 2009, the Husband commenced an action for divorce based upon the grounds of constructive abandonment. (Action No. 1). The Wife served a Verified Answer consenting to a divorce on the grounds of constructive abandonment. On or about March 21, 2011 the Husband made a motion seeking to discontinue Action No. 1. The Court denied Husband's motion. On or about February 15, 2011 the Wife commenced Action No. 2 and moved to consolidate Action No. 1 and Action No. 2 pursuant to CPLR 602 which the Court granted. The wife then moved Summary Judgment with respect to her cause of action alleged in Action No. 2, based upon the irretrievable breakdown of the marriage between the parties for at least six (6) months. The Wife's cause of action in Action No 2 was predicated upon the "no-fault" ground for divorce established in DRL 170(7), the irretrievable breakdown of the relationship of the parties. The Wife's Verified Complaint (Action No. 2) stated in relevant part: 11. The grounds for divorce are as follows: Irretrievable Breakdown of the Relationship (DRL Sec. 170(7)): The relationship between the Plaintiff and Defendant has been broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six (6) months. In opposition to Wife's application for summary judgment as to grounds, the Husband categorically denied his Wife's claims that the marriage had broken down irretrievably. The Supreme Court found that the Legislature did not enact a defense to this cause of action and courts cannot employ statutory construction to enact an intent that the Legislature did not express. Thus, neither the Husband, nor the Court, may create a defense where it is clear that the Legislature intentionally declined to do so. See, Pajak v. Pajak, 56 N.Y.2d 394, 452 N.Y.S.2d 381 (1982). Since the Wife stated "under oath" that the marriage is irretrievably broken, there was no basis for directing a trial with regard to this action of action for divorce. DRL 170(7) states that a divorce may be granted where: (7) The relationship between husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months, provided that one party has so stated under oath. Thus, once a party has stated under oath that the marriage has been irretrievably broken for a period of at least six months, the cause of action for divorce has been established as a matter of law. The Court declined to follow the holding in Strack v. Strack, 31 Misc.3d 258, 916 N.Y.S.2d 759 (Sup.Ct., Essex Cty., 2011), which held that a husband has the right to a trial on the "no fault" ground asserted by Wife. Also, see Schiffer v. Schiffer, 33 Misc.3d 795 (Sup.Ct. Dutchess Co., 2011). Supreme Court held that pursuant to DRL §170(7), once either party states under oath that the marriage has been irretrievably broken for at least six months, the grounds are no longer at issue and there is no right to a trial, by jury or otherwise. The entire purpose of the statute was to permit the Court to grant a divorce without requiring a trial. It noted that in AC v. DR, 32 Misc.3d 293, 305, 927 N.Y.S.2d 496 (Sup.Ct. Nassau Co., 2011), Justice Falanga stated the plaintiff's self-serving declaration about his or her state of mind is all that is required for the dissolution of a marriage on grounds that it is irretrievably broken. In the court's view, the Legislature did not intend nor is there a defense to DRL 170(7). Notwithstanding the foregoing and assuming arguendo, that the Husband was entitled to a defense regarding DRL 170(7), here the Husband's general denial of Wife's allegations that the marriage was broken down irretrievably was belied by his sworn statement in his Verified Complaint (Action No. 1) in which he stated: Continuing for a period of more than one (1) year immediately prior to the commencement of this action, defendant has continuously refused to have sexual relations with the plaintiff despite plaintiff's repeated requests to resume such relations. Based upon the Husband's sworn admission that his Wife has refused to have sexual relations with him for at least one (1) year despite his repeated request for same, it was difficult for this Court to imagine a better example of a irretrievable breakdown of the marriage relationship where one spouse continually refuses to have sexual relations with the other spouse for a period of at least one year. Here, the Husband was bound by his own sworn admission contained in his Verified Complaint, thereby eliminating any triable issues of fact for the Court to determine.

UCCJEA Requires Court to Communicate with Sister State Court Where Custody Actions Commenced in Two States

In Guzman v Guzman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 401081 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in November 2009, the mother commenced a proceeding, seeking to modify the custody and visitation provisions of a 2008 Florida judgment of divorce, entered upon the parties' stipulation, which awarded the father primary residential custody of the child. Before any determination could be made in this proceeding, the father relocated with the child to Florida. Thereafter, on December 22, 2009, the Family Court issued a determination, in effect, dismissing the petition for lack of jurisdiction, and it advised the mother to seek relief in Florida. However, when the mother subsequently commenced a custody proceeding with respect to the child in Florida, the Florida court determined that Florida was an inconvenient forum and that New York was the more appropriate forum, and it stayed the custody proceeding commenced in the Florida court. The mother then moved in the Family Court, Queens County, to vacate the Family Court's determination dated December 22, 2009. Without consulting with the Florida court, the Family Court denied the motion in an order dated March 2, 2011. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the order dated March 2, 2011, had to be reversed, that branch of the mother's motion to vacate the determination dated December 22, 2009, granted, the petition reinstated, and the matter remitted to the Family Court, for further proceedings. At the time the mother commenced this modification proceeding in November 2009 the Family Court, Queens County, had jurisdiction over it pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §76-b, based on the fact that the parties and the child lived in New York, and none of them had resided in Florida for over a year. The child was enrolled in school in New York, her sister had resided in New York with the mother since 2007, the father had commenced a proceeding in New York to modify the custody provisions of the Florida judgment of divorce with respect to the sister, and the Family Court, Queens County, had obtained a forensic study of the parties for use in that proceeding. Therefore, the parties and the subject child had significant connections with this State, and it appeared that "substantial evidence [was] available in this state concerning the child's care, protection, training, and personal relationships" (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][b][ii]). Accordingly, New York had jurisdiction to modify the custody and visitation provisions of the parties' Florida judgment of divorce with respect to the subject child. Nonetheless, where custody proceedings relating to a child are pending in different states-in this case, New York and Florida-Domestic Relations Law § 76-e applies, and the courts of the two states must confer with each other. Since the Family Court made its initial determination, in effect, dismissing the petition in this proceeding, the father and the child apparently had resided in Florida. In view of these circumstances, upon remittal, the Family Court, Queens County, was directed to contact the Florida court so that the courts of the two states may confer with each other and determine which state was the more appropriate forum for the proceeding at this juncture.

Threat to Cancel Wedding Is Not Duress.

In Ramunno v Ramunno, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 266464 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Plaintiff commenced a action seeking a determination that the parties' Antenuptial Agreement was null and void on the grounds of , inter alia, duress. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court property determined that defendant's threat to cancel the wedding unless plaintiff signed the agreement did not amount to duress (citing Colello v. Colello, 9 AD3d 855). The Appellate Division held that court erred, however, in sua sponte determining that plaintiff could not, prior to the marriage, waive her right to equitable distribution of defendant's pension (citing Strong v. Dubin, 75 AD3d 66, 72-73) or her right to maintenance (DRL 236[B][3][3]), and modified the order accordingly.

Husband's Motion to Modify Divorce Judgment to Conform to Agreement Not Barred by the Doctrine of Laches, Although He Waited Eight Years to Make the Motion

In Markell v Markell--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 234084 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in a stipulation of settlement dated May 14, 2002, the plaintiff former wife and the defendant former husband agreed, inter alia, that the defendant would pay child support on the fifteenth day of each month, and that unreimbursed health care expenses for their children would be divided equally after the plaintiff paid the initial sum of $500 per child. The Supreme Court issued Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law dated December 10, 2002, which reflected this agreement. However, the judgment of divorce, which was entered on December 10, 2002, provided that the defendant was to pay child support on the first day of each month and two thirds of the children's unreimbursed health care expenses after the plaintiff paid the initial $500 per child. On or about December 10, 2010, the defendant moved to modify the judgment of divorce to "accurately reflect the provisions of the December 10, 2002 Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law and [the] parties' May 14, 2002 Stipulation of Settlement." The Supreme Court denied the motion and, upon reargument, adhered to its original determination. The Supreme Court determined that the husband's motion to modify the judgment was barred by the doctrine of laches, in that he waited eight years to make the motion.

The Appellate Division modified the order made upon reargument. It observed that the doctrine of laches is an equitable doctrine which bars the enforcement of a right where there has been an unreasonable and inexcusable delay that results in prejudice to a party. The mere lapse of time without a showing of prejudice will not sustain a defense of laches. In addition, there must be a change in circumstances making it inequitable to grant the relief sought. Notably, prejudice may be established by a showing of injury, change of position, loss of evidence, or some other disadvantage resulting from the delay (Skrodelis v. Norbergs, 272 A.D.2d at 316-317). In support of his motion, the defendant demonstrated that the subject provisions of the judgment were the result of a clerical error, as the parties had been adhering to the terms of the stipulation of settlement for approximately eight years, and that the plaintiff had only recently informed him at a Family Court proceeding that the judgment contained terms different from those in the stipulation of settlement and Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. In opposition, the plaintiff conceded that the parties had been complying with their stipulation of settlement since it was executed in May 2002. Since the parties had been operating under the terms of the stipulation of settlement for approximately eight years prior to the husband's motion, the plaintiff failed to demonstrate a change in circumstances that would render inequitable the relief sought by the defendant. Further, the plaintiff failed to show that she would be prejudiced by a modification of the judgment to accurately reflect the provisions contained in the stipulation of settlement and Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law .

Court Should Not Rely on New Statutory Formula in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a) in Actions Commenced Prior to its Effective Date

In Truglia v Truglia, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 233765 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that in determining an award of pendente lite maintenance, a court should not rely on the new statutory formula in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a) in actions, such as this one, commenced prior to its effective date (see Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 86 AD3d 684, 685). Here, however, the Supreme Court's award, while erroneously arrived at using the new statutory formula, was upheld in accordance with the prior standard under former Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a). The award of pendente lite maintenance reflected " 'an accommodation between the reasonable needs of the moving spouse and the financial ability of the other spouse... with due regard for the pre-separation standard of living.

Plaintiff Made Direct Contributions to the Business Established by Husband Prior to Parties Marriage by Serving as Company Bookkeeper for Approximately Seven Years

In Scher v Scher,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 233930 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that contrary to the determination of the Supreme Court, the plaintiff was entitled to share in the appreciated value of Home Companion Services of New York, Inc., which the defendant incorporated approximately three years prior to the marriage. Separate property includes "property acquired before [the] marriage" (Domestic Relations Law 236[B] [1][d][1]), such as the business interest in Home Companion Services in this case, as well as "the increase in value of [such] separate property, except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse" (Domestic Relations Law 236[B][1][d][3]). In order for appreciation in the value of separate property to be deemed marital property subject to equitable distribution, the nontitled spouse must demonstrate the manner in which his or her contributions resulted in the increase in value and the amount of the increase which was attributable to his or her efforts. Here, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in finding that the plaintiff made no direct or indirect contributions to the appreciation of Home Companion Services which resulted in the increase in the value of the company. The evidence established that the plaintiff made direct contributions to the business by serving as the company bookkeeper for approximately seven years. The evidence further established that the defendant's active participation in expanding the business was aided and facilitated by the plaintiff's indirect contributions as homemaker and occasional caretaker of one of his children from a prior marriage. Moreover, the defendant failed to establish that the plaintiff committed "wasteful dissipation" of marital assets in her role as bookkeeper. The Appellate Division held that in light of the plaintiff's direct and indirect contributions, the Supreme Court should have awarded her 20% of the appreciated value of Home Companion Services. As the parties stipulated that the appreciated value over the course of the marriage amounted to $1,146,000, the plaintiff was entitled to an award of $229,200.

Furthermore, contrary to the determination of the Supreme Court, the plaintiff was entitled to an equitable share of the appreciated value of the marital residence over the course of the marriage, notwithstanding that the residence was the separate property of the defendant until March 2005, when the property was transferred to the plaintiff and defendant as tenants by the entirety. The increase in the value of separate property remains separate property except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse at which point the increase in value becomes marital property, in accordance with the rule that the definition of marital property is to be broadly construed, given the principle that a marriage is an economic partnership. The parties stipulated to a neutral appraisal which found that the marital residence had increased in value by $40,000 due to "active appreciation" in the form of physical improvements, and $300,000 due to "passive appreciation" in the form of "market forces, without regard to any improvements, except normal maintenance." Since the record established that the $340,000 in appreciation was attributable to the efforts of both parties, the plaintiff was entitled to share equitably in that increased value. Applying the plaintiff's 50% distributive share to the $340,000 in appreciation, she was entitled to an award of $170,000 for the appreciated value in the marital residence from the date of marriage. In light of the plaintiff's contributions, the Supreme Court should have awarded the parties equal shares in the increase in the value of the marital residence.

The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court erred in finding that the interest in Green Fields East Holding, LLC, which was held in the defendant's name, was the separate property of the defendant. Domestic Relations Law 236 defines "marital property" as "all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held". Likewise, expenses incurred prior to the commencement of an action for a divorce are marital debt to be equally shared by the parties upon an offer of proof that they represent marital expenses. Where a party has paid the other party's share of what proves to be marital debt, reimbursement is required.

As the interest in Green Fields was acquired during the marriage and before the commencement of the instant action, it was marital property. Likewise, a loan in the approximate amount of $239,000 which was taken out simultaneously, was marital debt. Since the defendant established that he paid the plaintiff's share of the marital debt by satisfying the loan, reimbursement was required. Taking the market value of the interest in Green Fields ($350,000), and applying the plaintiff's 50% distributive share thereto, she was entitled to an award of $55,500 after reimbursing the defendant the sum of $119,500 for satisfying her portion of the marital debt.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding the defendant a separate property credit in the amount of $32,719.59. Where separate property has been commingled with marital property, there is a presumption that the commingled funds constitute marital property. However, a party may overcome this presumption by presenting sufficient evidence that the source of the funds was separate property. Defendant failed to present sufficient evidence to establish that the source of the funds in the disputed profit-sharing plan account was separate property.

Considering the plaintiff's distributive award with respect to the marital residence and Home Companion Services and Green Fields, and in light of the plaintiff's direct and indirect contributions, an award of 10% of the value of the parties financial accounts, except a 529 college savings plan account, was equitable. It declined to disturb the provision of the judgment which directed that the defendant was to receive all the proceeds of the 529 college savings plan account.

In light of the distribution of the marital property and the plaintiff's own testimony regarding her expenses and earning capacity, the Appellate Division declined to disturb the Supreme Court's determination that the plaintiff was not entitled to future maintenance payments and declined to disturb the Supreme Court's determination that the plaintiff was not entitled to an award of an attorney's fee. In light of the substantial distributive award in favor of the plaintiff, she was capable of paying for her own attorney.

Emergency Jurisdiction Continues Under UCCJEA for More than Three Years Where Family Court Not Satisfied With Steps to Protect Children Taken by Home State of New Mexico Court

In Matter of Bridget Y, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6848352 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), a 3-2 decision, the primary issue raised was whether Family Court properly exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-c (3). The parents Kenneth M.Y. and Rita S., appealed from an order of fact-finding and disposition determining, following a fact-finding hearing, that their children were neglected and placing the children in the custody of petitioner Chautauqua County Department of Social Services (DSS), and from a corrected order that denied their motion to vacate the order of fact-finding and disposition in appeal No. 1. The parents contended in both appeals that Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction because New Mexico was the home state of the children, the neglect took place in New Mexico, and the parents were neither domiciliaries of nor otherwise significantly connected to New York State. The majority opinion concluded that the court properly exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-c (3) inasmuch as the children were imminent risk of harm, and concluded that both orders should be affirmed.

Respondent Kenneth M.Y. (father), the biological father of the children, married respondent Rita S. (stepmother), after the children's biological mother died in September 2001. The stepmother subsequently adopted the children. At some time between February 2007 and November 2007, the parents moved with the children from Pennsylvania to New Mexico. On August 7, 2008, the parents were arrested and were each charged with seven counts of child abuse with respect to the children. The charges stemmed from allegations that the parents left Kelly and Colleen, then 15 years old, and Michaela, then 12 years old, unsupervised in a bug-infested trailer miles away from the family residence, with limited supplies and inadequate food for a period of six to eight weeks. It was further alleged that the parents, as a form of discipline, had confined each of the children to their bedrooms or to the garage for days, weeks, or months at a time. While confined to the garage, the children received only water, bread, peanut butter and a sleeping bag, and they were permitted to use the bathroom once or twice a day.

As a result of the criminal charges, a Magistrate Court in New Mexico ordered the parents to avoid all contact with the children. In light of the no-contact order, on August 11, 2008 the parents placed the children in the care of their "maternal step-aunt and uncle", Robin S. and Paul S., who were respondents in appeal No. 2. Robin S. signed a "safety contract" with the New Mexico Children, Youth and Families Department (CYFD), which stated that the parents voluntarily placed the children in the care of the aunt and uncle and that the parents were "still legally responsible for the [children's] well-being." Robin S. agreed to prohibit any contact between the parents and the children and to advise the Dona Ana County District Attorney's Office in the event that the parents attempted to remove the children from her care or otherwise to contact the children in any way. Robin S. transported the children to her home in Chautauqua County, New York.

By letter dated September 22, 2008, CYFD notified the parents that it had closed its file concerning the children. The letter further stated that "[t]he Department believes that the voluntary placement of the children with Robin S[.] was in the best interests of the children. However, [the parents] are free to make changes in that voluntary placement if they choose to as they remain the legal custodians of their children. The Department has no legal authority with respect to the children at this time. The safety contract between the Department and Robin S[.] was for placement purposes and does not prevent [the parents] from making changes to the children's placement."

According to the parents, they provided a copy of that letter to the aunt and uncle and notified them of their "intent to revoke the temporary placement of the minor children in their care and place the minor children with an appropriate guardian." The aunt and uncle refused to return the children, however, and instead filed a petition in Family Court seeking custody of the children. On October 1, 2008, the parents were indicted in New Mexico on six counts each of felony abuse of a child. On November 5, 2008, the parents filed a "Petition to Determine Custody Pursuant to the [Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act]" in District Court in New Mexico against the aunt and uncle. The petition alleged, that the parents had resided in New Mexico since February 2007, that New Mexico was the home state of the children, and that the parents had placed the children with the aunt and uncle on a temporary basis "until a more suitable placement could be made or until [the parents'] conditions of release were modified or disposed of so that the children could be reunited with them." By their petition, the parents sought to place the children in the care and custody of a different temporary guardian. The parents thus sought an order confirming that they are the legal guardians of the children, and appointing a temporary guardian for the minor children until the criminal charges against them were resolved or their conditions of release were modified.

Two days later, Family Court issued a temporary order of custody asserting temporary emergency jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-c and granting temporary custody of the children to the aunt and uncle. DSS thereafter commenced the neglect proceeding in Family Court by petition filed November 13, 2008, alleging that the parents had neglected each of the children. At a Family Court appearance on November 24, 2008, an attorney for the parents appeared for the limited purpose of contesting jurisdiction, asserting that the parents were residents of New Mexico, that the alleged neglect took place in New Mexico, and that the children remained residents of New Mexico. Family Court continued to assert temporary emergency jurisdiction over the matter.

On December 10, 2008, the New Mexico court issued an "Order Assuming Jurisdiction." The New Mexico court determined that it had jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter, i.e., the children, noting that the children had resided with the parents in New Mexico since February 2007 and expressly stating that New Mexico is the home state of the children. With respect to the merits, the New Mexico court ruled that the parents "remain the sole legal custodians of the minor children, which includes the right to decide the temporary placement of the minor children with an appropriate guardian of their choosing." According to the New Mexico court, the parents wished to nominate Jim L. and Angela L., residents of Ohio, as temporary guardians of the children. To that end, the New Mexico court ordered the parents to arrange for a home study of the Ohio guardians, and to pay for the cost of the home study. Finally, the New Mexico court ruled that "[t]he issue of permanent custody is hereby reserved pending resolution of the criminal charges. Following resolution of the criminal proceeding, the Court may appoint a guardian ad litem herein and may conduct in camera interviews of the minor children."

The parents sought to register the above New Mexico order in Family Court. At a December 15, 2008 appearance, Family Court indicated that it had some concerns relative to relinquishing jurisdiction to the New Mexico court. Specifically, the Family Court judge indicated that "[w]hat concerns me is, apparently, there is no neglect proceeding in the State of New Mexico. There are criminal proceedings against these parents, but for whatever reason, there was no neglect proceeding ... [W]ith criminal charges pending, and the children being the ones who would be put in the position of testifying, should there be a criminal trial, ... the children are left with no legal remedies. There hasn't even been a law guardian appointed ... for these children in the State of New Mexico. And the parents are given full authority to do whatever, and place these children wherever they so choose."

By order entered January 9, 2009, the New Mexico court approved the home study and ordered the immediate transfer of the children to the Ohio guardians. The New Mexico court reiterated that the parents "are the sole legal guardians of the minor children and maintain their constitutional right to management and control of their minor children," and approved "[t]he parents' selection of placement guardian for their minor children." In light of that order, the parents requested that Family Court issue an order (1) registering and enforcing the New Mexico order assuming jurisdiction; (2) dismissing the New York custody proceeding; (3) dismissing the New York neglect proceeding; (4) vacating the temporary order of custody; and (5) enforcing the New Mexico transfer order.

DSS thereafter sought an award of temporary custody of the children. In support thereof, DSS submitted an affidavit of a psychologist who had counseled each of the children. The psychologist averred that the children "have related very credible stories of child abuse and neglect," and that the parents demonstrated a "disturbing pattern of isolating these children from each other, from children their age, and from their mother's relatives." With respect to the proposed move to Ohio, the psychologist averred that "[a]ny change in placement for the [children] that is instigated by their father or adoptive mother carries the implicit message to these girls that they are still under the control of their father, and therefore still at risk for abuse and maltreatment ... Removing them from an emotionally secure family environment, the friends they have recently established, and a school environment which has been affirming for them, must be considered a further emotional deprivation for these girls, and a demonstration to the girls that they remain at risk of capricious, abusive and insensitive treatment by their father. Accordingly, by generating a constant state of anxiety and uncertainty for them, such a move would result in a perpetuation of the emotional abuse and deprivation that these children suffered under the care of their father and adoptive mother."

Family Court granted temporary custody of the children to DSS, concluding that the basis for asserting emergency jurisdiction continued to exist. Family Court explained that, "[w]hen there is a placement out of state in a situation where parents are facing criminal charges, and there is no underlying custody order, and no law guardian appointed for the children, ... then the children are left without protection, plain and simple." At the fact-finding hearing on the neglect petition, DSS introduced testimony from each of the children as well as from the maternal step-aunt, Robin S., and the children's psychologist, and Family Court received in evidence records from the New Mexico Police Department and financial records relative to the father. The parents failed to appear at the hearing and subsequently moved to dismiss the neglect proceeding for lack of personal and subject matter jurisdiction.

By the order in appeal No. 1, Family Court implicitly denied the parents' motion to dismiss the neglect proceeding by issuing an order of fact-finding and disposition, which determined that the parents neglected each of the four children, ordered that the children be placed in the custody of DSS, and adopted the permanency plan proposed by DSS. By the corrected order in appeal No. 2, Family Court, inter alia, denied the parents' motion to vacate the order of fact-finding and disposition. The Appellate Division initially agreed with the parents that, absent the exercise of temporary emergency jurisdiction, Family Court would lack subject matter jurisdiction over the neglect proceeding. Pursuant to New York's version of the UCCJEA (Domestic Relations Law art 5-A), Domestic Relations Law 76(1) "is the exclusive jurisdictional basis for making a child custody determination by a court of this state" (DRL 76[2]). A "[c]hild custody determination" is defined as "a judgment, decree, or other order of a court providing for the legal custody, physical custody, or visitation with respect to a child. The term includes a permanent, temporary, initial, and modification order" (DRL 75-a [3]).

Here, the neglect proceeding commenced by DSS fell within the UCCJEA's expansive definition of a child custody proceeding (DRL 75-a [4]). There was no question that New Mexico, not New York, was the home state of the children at the time of commencement of the neglect proceeding. New Mexico remained the home state of the children when the neglect proceeding was commenced in New York, and Family Court lacked jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination. In addition, Domestic Relations Law 76-e states that, "[e]xcept as otherwise provided in section [76-c] of this title[, i .e., temporary emergency jurisdiction], a court of this state may not exercise its jurisdiction under this title if, at the time of the commencement of the proceeding, a proceeding concerning the custody of the child[ren] has been commenced in a court of another state having jurisdiction substantially in conformity with this article...." Here, at the time of commencement of the neglect proceeding in New York, the parents had already commenced a custody proceeding in New Mexico. Thus, inasmuch as a custody proceeding was pending in the children's home state when the neglect petition was filed, New York was precluded from exercising jurisdiction except in an emergency.

The Majority concluded that Family Court properly exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-c. In the absence of subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to section 76(1), section 76-c provides that a New York court has "temporary emergency jurisdiction if the child[ren are] present in this state and the child[ren] ha [ve] been abandoned or it is necessary in an emergency to protect the child [ren], a sibling or parent of the child[ren]" (DRL 76-c [1];). There was no question that the children were present in New York at all relevant times in which Family Court exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction. There must, in addition, be an emergency that is real and immediate, and of such a nature as to require [s]tate intervention to protect the child[ren] from imminent physical or emotional danger". The duration of an order rendered pursuant to temporary emergency jurisdiction depends upon whether there is an enforceable child custody determination or a child custody proceeding pending in a court with jurisdiction. Here, a child custody proceeding had been commenced in New Mexico when Family Court first asserted temporary emergency jurisdiction. Thus, Family Court's exercise of temporary emergency jurisdiction was governed by DRL 76-c (3), which provides that "any order issued by a court of this state under this section must specify in the order a period that the court considers adequate to allow the person seeking an order to obtain an order from the state having jurisdiction under sections [76] through [76-b] of this title. The order issued in this state remains in effect until an order is obtained from the other state within the period specified or the period expires, provided, however, that where the child who is the subject of a child custody determination under this section is in imminent risk of harm, any order issued under this section shall remain in effect until a court of a state having jurisdiction under sections [76] through [76-b] of this title has taken steps to assure the protection of the child."

Family Court first exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction on November 7, 2008, when it issued a temporary order of custody in the proceeding commenced by the aunt and uncle. In the Majority's view there was no question that an emergency existed at that point in time. On September 22, 2008, CYFD notified the parents' attorney that it had closed its file concerning the children and that the parents, as the "legal custodians of their children," were "free to make changes in th[eir] voluntary placement." Shortly thereafter, the parents sent the stepmother's father, who lived with them, to New York in an attempt to take the children to an undisclosed address in New Mexico. On November 5, 2008, the parents commenced a custody proceeding in New Mexico seeking, inter alia, to place the children in the care and custody of yet another temporary guardian. According to the aunt and uncle, the parents also made "a threat ... immediately before the [New Mexico] Grand Jury Proceedings where the children were told that they would be taken to an unknown location." The parents initially sought to appoint the father's office manager as temporary guardian for the children. They then nominated the Ohio guardians, allegedly "long time and close friends of the family," as the temporary guardians of the children. The children told their attorneys and Family Court that they had never met the Ohio guardians. We thus conclude that Family Court properly acted to protect the children from imminent danger, i.e., the likelihood of returning the children to the home at which the abuse and neglect occurred or to another guardian under the control of the parents. At that point in time, no New Mexico court had issued an order protecting the children, and CYFD-the New Mexico equivalent of DSS-had determined that it had "no legal authority with respect to the children."

The orders challenged on appeal, however, were issued after the parents had obtained two orders in New Mexico: (1) the December 10, 2008 order assuming jurisdiction, and (2) the January 9, 2009 order approving the home study and ordering the immediate transfer of the children. The propriety of Family Court's orders thus depended upon whether this case fell within the narrow exception set forth in Domestic Relations Law 76-c (3), which provides that, "where the child[ren] who [are] the subject of a child custody determination under this section [are] in imminent risk of harm, any order issued under this section shall remain in effect until a court [of the home state] has taken steps to assure the protection of the child[ren]." The Majority concluded that this case falls within that category.

With respect to the first of the two New Mexico orders issued before the orders challenged on appeal, the court noted that, despite the criminal charges, the substantial evidence of abuse and neglect, and the no-contact order, the New Mexico court allowed the parents to select new guardians for the children and ruled that it would not address the issue of permanent custody until after the criminal charges had been resolved. The order provided that the New Mexico court "may appoint a guardian ad litem herein and may conduct in camera interviews of the minor children" following resolution of the criminal proceeding. The order further provided that the parents "shall not in any manner communicate with the minor children or cause any third party or their agent to communicate in any manner with the minor children regarding this matter or the criminal matter " (emphasis added). The New Mexico court thus left open the possibility of communication or contact between the parents and the children on other subjects. Although the New Mexico court ordered the parents to "continue to abide by the no[-]contact order or any further order" issued in the criminal proceeding, the court noted that "[t]here is no other order limiting [their] parental rights to the minor children." With respect to the second of the two New Mexico orders, the New Mexico court, after reviewing a home study arranged and paid for by the parents, reiterated that the parents "maintain their constitutional right to management and control of their minor children," approved the parents' "selection of placement guardian[s] for their minor children," and ordered the immediate transfer of the children to the Ohio guardians. Thus, without any input from CYFD or any other agency charged with the protection of children, an attorney for the children, or the children themselves, the New Mexico court ordered that the children be transferred from family members to non-relatives who were strangers to them and who resided in a state with which they had no connection, all at the behest of the parents who had abused them.

The Majority found it particularly troubling that CYFD failed to commence an abuse or neglect proceeding against the parents and that the New Mexico court failed to appoint an attorney for the children to advocate on their behalf pursuant to New Mexico law. CYFD apparently failed to conduct the statutorily mandated investigation into the abuse and neglect allegations against the parents (see NM Stat Ann s 32A-4-4 [A]), and the agency also failed either to recommend or to refuse to recommend the filing of an abuse or neglect petition against them (see 32A-4-4 [C]). Instead, CYFD simply transferred the children to New York and closed its file, leaving the children's fate to the wishes of their alleged abusers. In addition, upon asserting jurisdiction over the case, the New Mexico court failed to appoint a guardian ad litem or attorney for the children to "represent and protect the best interests of the child[ren] in [the] court proceeding" (s 32A-1-4 [J]; see s 32A-4-10). The New Mexico court then proceeded to change the children's placement at the request of the parents without enabling the children to have a voice in the courtroom and without any consideration, let alone determination, of the children's best interests. The children's psychologist averred in an affidavit presented to Family Court that the parents displayed a "disturbing pattern of isolating these children from each other, from children their age, and from their mother's relatives," and he opined that moving the children to Ohio at the behest of the parents "would result in a perpetuation of the emotional abuse and deprivation that the[] children suffered under the care of their father and adoptive mother". The parents' actions in attempting to remove the children from their New York placement constituted "a continuing pattern of abuse to isolate [the children] from family members," and she and the psychologist similarly concluded that the parents' actions communicated to the children that they remain under the control of their abusers. In light of the above-described circumstances, including the absence of a neglect proceeding in New Mexico and the refusal of the New Mexico court to act to protect the children pending the resolution of the criminal charges against the parents, the Majority concluded that Family Court properly continued to exercise temporary emergency jurisdiction of the children after the issuance of the two New Mexico orders. In their view, the children remained "in imminent risk of harm," namely, emotional abuse inflicted by the parents, and it appears from the record before us that New Mexico has not acted to "assure the protection of the child[ren]"

The parents further contended that, even if Family Court properly exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction in the neglect proceeding, such jurisdiction did not permit Family Court to enter an order of disposition. The Majority rejected that contention. It stated: "Domestic Relations Law § 76-c (3), however, which is previously quoted herein and governs the instant case in light of the custody proceedings in New Mexico, contains no such provision. Thus, orders issued pursuant to section 76-c (3) are required to expire at a date certain unless the "imminent risk of harm" exception applies, in which case the order applies "until [the home state] has taken steps to assure the protection of the child." Even assuming, arguendo, that the parents are correct, they concluded that Family Court was not thereby precluded from issuing the order of disposition in appeal No. 1. Although an order of fact-finding and disposition is a final order for purposes of appellate review (see Ocasio v Ocasio, 49 AD2d 801; see generally Matter of Gabriella UU., 83 AD3d 1306; Matter of Mitchell WW., 74 AD3d 1409, 1411-1412), it is not a final or permanent "child custody determination" (§ 76-c [2], [3] [emphasis added]). Rather, the order in appeal No. 1 here simply placed the children in the custody of DSS, scheduled a permanency hearing, and approved a proposed plan for the children. A placement with DSS is never intended to be a final or permanent custodial relationship. In cases such as this in which a child is placed with DSS pursuant to Family Court Act § 1055, the court retains continuous jurisdiction over the case (see § 1088), and the child's placement is reviewed at permanency hearings conducted every six months (see § 1089 [a] [2], [3]). Such jurisdiction continues until the child is "discharged from placement" (§

1088), i.e., until permanency is achieved Family Court “maintains complete continuing jurisdiction whenever a child has been placed outside his [or her] home. Accordingly, the case remains on the Court’s calendar — there is no final disposition until permanency has been ordered — and the Court may hear the matter upon motion at any time. There is no need or requirement to wait until the next scheduled hearing date”. The parents therefore may at any time petition for the return of their children and/or move to vacate or terminate the children’s placement with DSS. Thus, the order of fact-finding and disposition in appeal No. 1, which concerns placement rather than custody of the children, does not conflict with New Mexico’s order, which provides that the “issue of permanent custody is hereby reserved pending resolution of the criminal charges” against the parents. Upon resolution of the criminal charges or when the emergency abates, i.e., when the New Mexico court ensures that the children are not “in imminent risk of harm” (Domestic Relations Law § 76-c [3]), the children’s placement with DSS may be revisited and the issue of permanent custody addressed. Until then, the order of fact-finding and disposition simply maintains the status quo – placement in the custody of DSS – with periodic judicial review to assess any changed circumstances. Inasmuch as the order of fact-finding and disposition does not constitute a final custody determination, it cannot be said that Family Court exceeded the scope of its temporary emergency jurisdiction in issuing the order in appeal No. 1. “

Justice Smith dissented in part, only agreeing with the majority that the appeal must be dismissed with respect to the two older children because they were no longer under the age of 18 and voted to be reversed in accordance with an opinion in which Judge Lindley concurred. They would reverse the orders on appeal insofar as they applied to the children under the age of 18 and grant the parents’ motion to dismiss the proceeding with respect to them for lack of jurisdiction. The dissent could not agree with the majority that Family Court properly exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction over the subject children and could not agree that such an emergency existed here. The dissent pointed out that: “ The majority fails to note, however, that the latter order contained an order of protection prohibiting the parents from communicating with the children in any manner, including through third parties, regarding the custody case or the criminal proceedings. The New Mexico court also ordered the parents to attend a court- approved Parent Education Workshop, approved a home study of the Ohio family by a licensed social worker and, most importantly, ordered that the children shall not be removed from the care of that family, or from a 100-mile radius of the Ohio family’s residence without the prior approval of the New Mexico court. Consequently, there is no imminent risk that the parents will continue their alleged abuse of the children, and the majority’s conclusion that the New Mexico court acted “without any consideration, let alone determination, of the children’s best interests” is simply incorrect. The dissent also observed that: “Family Court has issued an order that was in conflict with an order of the children’s home state, and which had no provision for the eventual transfer of jurisdiction to the home state. Family Court thereby created a jurisdictional competition rather than eliminating such a competition, the latter of which is required by the UCCJEA.

Under the UCCJEA , which Controls Jurisdiction in Neglect Proceedings, Jurisdictional Facts must Be Demonstrated to the Court's Satisfaction 'In the First Instance' and Whatever May Occur after the Jurisdictional Question Is Determined Is Irrelevant to That Issue"

In Matter of Destiny EE, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6820412 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondent was the mother of two sons (born in 1997 and 2000) and a daughter (born in 2003). In 2001, petitioner commenced abuse and neglect proceedings against respondent and her husband arising out of the husband's sexual abuse of the older son; both sons were removed from their custody. Respondent subsequently consented to a finding of neglect based on, among other things, her admission that she should have known of the abuse. The husband absconded, and Family Court issued a warrant for his arrest, which was never executed. Following an inquest held in the husband's absence, Family Court determined that he had sexually abused the older son and had neglected both sons, and issued orders of protection as to both children; the order applicable to the older son extended until his 18th birthday. In July 2003, the sons were returned to respondent's custody. Petitioner continued to provide services and supervision until approximately June 2005, when the proceedings were closed. Respondent thereafter took the children to Wisconsin, where they lived for approximately 18 months before returning to New York. In June 2007, approximately one month after her return to New York, respondent filed a custody petition alleging that the younger son was visiting the husband in Mississippi, the husband was "doing drugs" and drinking, the husband's girlfriend had hit the younger son with a belt, and the husband had refused respondent's request to return him to her custody. On the day that this custody petition was filed, petitioner applied, pursuant to Family Ct Act 1022, for temporary removal of respondent's children on the ground that she had sent the younger son to visit the husband despite her knowledge of his sexual abuse of the older son. After a two-day hearing, the court found that it had jurisdiction, ordered the removal of the children, and placed them in petitioner's temporary custody. The court also vacated the 2001 warrant against the husband and issued a new warrant for his arrest. The younger son was thereafter returned to New York. Petitioner commenced neglect proceedings as to each of the children and, following respondent's admission that her actions constituted neglect, the court placed the children in petitioner's custody.

In 2009, petitioner commenced proceedings seeking termination of respondent's parental rights as to all three children. Respondent moved to dismiss the petitions and requested vacatur of the 2007 neglect determination and return of the children to her custody. Family Court denied the motion in its entirety, and the Appellate Division affirmed.

Respondent contended that dismissal and vacatur were required because Family Court lacked jurisdiction over the temporary removal and neglect proceedings under Domestic Relations Law article 5-A, known as the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA). The Appellate Division observed that the UCCJEA controlled as to jurisdiction here, as in all matters falling within the statutory definition of child custody proceedings (DRL 75-a [4]). Here, no jurisdiction other than New York had ever issued custody determinations affecting the subject children, nor had any applications for such determinations been made elsewhere. Therefore it found that Family Court properly determined that it had jurisdiction over the 2007 proceedings.

The Appellate Division observed that the UCCJEA establishes specific grounds as the basis for initial child custody jurisdiction, including, among others, that "this state is the home state of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or was the home state of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from this state but a parent or person acting as a parent continues to live in this state" (DRL 76[1][a]). The home state is defined as "the state in which a child lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding" (DRL 75-a [7]). In certain circumstances, children do not have home states. Respondent's children did not have a home state when the temporary removal proceedings were commenced, as they did not live in Wisconsin immediately before the proceedings were commenced and had not yet lived in New York for the requisite six months (see DRL 75-a [7]). Although Wisconsin had been the children's home state within the previous six months, it did not have jurisdiction when the removal application was filed because no "parent or person acting as a parent" was residing there (DRL 76 [1][a]; see DRL 76[1][b]).

Respondent claimed that the family's stay in New York was intended to be a "temporary absence" (DRL 75-a [7]), that Wisconsin was still the children's home state, and that she was still a Wisconsin resident. However, the record did not support this claim. "Jurisdictional facts must be demonstrated to the court's satisfaction 'in the first instance' and whatever may occur after the jurisdictional question is determined is irrelevant to that issue" (Gomez v. Gomez, 86 A.D.2d 594, 595 [1982], affd 56 N.Y.2d 746 [1982], quoting Vanneck v. Vanneck, 49 N.Y.2d at 608, 427 N.Y.S.2d 735, 404 N.E.2d 1278). The jurisdictional analysis here thus depended upon the facts presented to Family Court when petitioner filed the emergency removal application in June 2007.

At that time, the record included respondent's sworn statements in her custody petition providing New York addresses for herself and the younger son, alleging that the younger son had lived in New York since May 2007, seeking his return to New York, and giving no indication that either respondent's presence in New York or that of her children was temporary. Respondent and the older son also made several statements indicating that the family had relocated permanently to New York; among other things, respondent told petitioner's caseworkers that she sent the younger son to Mississippi in part to make it easier to get settled after the move, and the older son stated that the family had moved from Wisconsin because of conflict between respondent and the maternal grandmother. During the removal hearing, respondent made no claim that her stay in New York was temporary, nor did she produce any evidence of continued residence in Wisconsin such as a permanent address or an anticipated date of return. Accordingly, the record before Family Court fully supported a determination that neither respondent nor her children still resided in Wisconsin and that their presence in New York was not temporary . Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76(1)(b), a New York court may exercise jurisdiction, as pertinent here, when no court in another state has jurisdiction, the child and a parent have a "significant connection" with New York, and "substantial evidence is available in [New York] concerning the child's care, protection, training, and personal relationships."Such a connection exists only when "the forum in which the litigation is to proceed has optimum access to relevant evidence. Maximum rather than minimum contacts with the [s]tate are required" (Vanneck v. Vanneck, 49 N.Y.2d at 610).

The Appellate Division found that the removal and neglect proceedings in this matter did not depend primarily upon information or contacts available in Wisconsin, but on the degree of risk posed to respondent's children by her decision to permit the younger son to visit the husband. New York was the only jurisdiction with pertinent information about the husband's previous abuse of the older son, respondent's knowledge of that abuse, and the related risk to her children. The prior proceedings took place in the same Family Court where the 2007 proceedings were commenced, extended over a four-year period, and resulted in determinations that the husband had abused the older son-then approximately four years old-by repeated acts of sodomy over an extended period of time, as well as respondent's admission that she knew or should have known of the abuse, and that her failure to protect the older son constituted neglect of both sons. A New York warrant for the husband's arrest was still outstanding at the time of the temporary removal application. At the removal hearing, respondent and the older son were represented by the same attorneys who had represented them throughout the prior proceedings. Petitioner was familiar with respondent and her children, as the sons were in its care between 2001 and 2003, and it had continued to provide supervision and services to the family over the next two years. As to contacts with New York, all three of respondent's children were born here and, except for the 18-month stay in Wisconsin, resided here throughout their lives. The children's previous foster family was still in contact with them; at the emergency removal hearing, respondent's counsel advised the court that the previous foster mother had come to court and was available to act as a resource. Moreover, the record indicated that the fathers of the older son and the daughter reside in New York, although it is unclear whether they had any significant involvement in the children's lives. Accordingly, both the "significant connections" and "substantial evidence" requirements were satisfied. New York was the jurisdiction with optimum access to evidence relevant to the determinations at issue, and Family Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Domestic Relations Law 76(1)(b).

The Appellate Division observed that as an alternative basis for jurisdiction, Domestic Relations Law 76 (1)(d) provides that a New York court may exercise jurisdiction where, as here, "no court of any other state would have jurisdiction under the criteria specified in paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of [DRL 76(1)]". Accordingly, it did not have to address whether New York's "exclusive, continuing jurisdiction" as to the sons resulting from the prior proceedings was severed by respondent's relocation to Wisconsin (DRL 76-b [1]; see 28 USC 1738A [d])

The Appellate Division rejected respondent's contention that vacatur of the 2007 neglect finding was required based upon a recent determination by the Court of Appeals holding that an untreated sex offender's residence in the same home as his minor children, without more, is insufficient to establish an imminent danger to his children or neglect by the mother in allowing him to reside there (Matter of Afton C. [James C.], 17 N.Y.3d 1, 11 [2011]). In that case, no evidence of actual danger to the children other than the sex offender designation was presented, but the Court of Appeals acknowledged that previous crimes against a child in an offender's care might be sufficient to establish such danger. In this case, the neglect finding against respondent was supported by evidence that the husband had sexually abused a child in his care, and by considerable additional evidence.

Where Family Court Has No Jurisdiction to Issue Order of Protection, Such Order Is Void Ab Initio for All Purposes, Including the Power to Hold a Party in Contempt

In Matter of Parrella v Freely, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6091331 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in January 2010 the appellant was dating the former boyfriend of Lisa Ann Parrella, with whom Parrella had a child. At that time, Parrella filed a petition against the appellant, alleging that the appellant violated a previous order of protection. On July 13, 2010, the Family Court entered an order which, granted the petition and directed the appellant to stay away from Parrella and to refrain from communicating with or about Parrella for a period of two years. The Appellate Division reversed finding that the Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the proceeding. It observed that Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction and, thus, it cannot exercise powers beyond those granted to it by statute. It held that where the Family Court has no jurisdiction to issue an order of protection or temporary order of protection initially, such an order is void ab initio for all purposes, including the power to hold a party in contempt (citing Matter of Robert B. - H. [Robert H.], 82 AD3d 1221, 1222; see Matter of Fish v. Horn, 14 N.Y.2d 905, 906). Pursuant to Family Court Act § 812(1), the Family Court's jurisdiction in family offense proceedings is limited to certain proscribed criminal acts that occur among enumerated classes of people, including persons who share an "intimate relationship" with each other (Family Ct Act § 812(1)(e)). Here, there was no evidence in the record that the appellant and Parrella had a direct relationship. Instead, the evidence revealed that the parties had met personally only during the course of the court proceedings and that the appellant had never met Parrella's child. Therefore, there was no evidence that the parties' relationship was an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e). Since the parties did not have an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act 812(1)(e), the Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to issue the original order of protection or to issue the order appealed from.

Courts Will Not Require Children to Subsidize Parent's Financial Decision to Forgo Present Employment for Potential Future Income.

In Matter of Berrada,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6090172 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1996 and had three minor children. After they separated in 2006, the mother obtained custody of the children and petitioned for child support (Matter of Berrada v. Berrada, --- AD3d ---- [appeal No. 511629, decided herewith]). Rejecting the father's claim that he was unable to find employment, a Support Magistrate determined that he had failed to conduct a thorough job search, imputed an annual earning capacity to him of $125,000, and directed him to pay $2,834 a month in child support. The father did not file objections to that order. He did, however, file modification petitions in 2009, again asserting that he was unable to find work. The Support Magistrate dismissed the petitions, finding that the father had not demonstrated a substantial change in circumstances. Family Court denied the father's objections and the Appellate Division affirmed. It held that in order to succeed upon his modification petitions, the father was required to establish a substantial change in circumstances since the entry of the child support order that warranted a modification of his obligation to pay child support. At the time of the hearing, the father remained unemployed, devoting his attention to various sales enterprises that paid on commission without producing consistent income. While he made an effort to find full-time employment within his narrow area of expertise, his search did not extend elsewhere. Moreover, the father was attempting to develop his own business and testified that he would only "jump on" a full-time job offer if it paid a substantial salary. Notwithstanding the father's argument that the new venture constitutes a substantial change of circumstances in that it may produce income in the future, the courts will not require the children to subsidize a parent's financial decision" to forgo present employment for potential future income.

Family Court Did Not Abuse Discretion by Terminating the Father's Child Support Obligation Where Mother Deliberately and Unjustifiably Frustrated Father's Visitation.

In Matter of Luke v Luke,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6090137 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of one child (born in 2001). The parties separated prior to the child's birth. In 2003, the parties agreed to a stipulated order of joint custody, physical custody to the mother and visitation with the father on alternate weekends. These visits apparently only occurred for one or two months. Also in 2003, a support order was entered against the father. The father then moved to New Jersey. Each party claimed that he or she lacked contact information for the other after 2003. In 2004, Family Court issued a default order awarding the mother sole custody, with visitation to the father as agreed upon by the mother. In 2007, the father returned to Schuyler County. That same year, the mother apparently moved to New Jersey and then Pennsylvania. In 2009, the father sought Family Court's assistance to locate the mother and filed a petition seeking visitation with the parties' daughter. In October 2009, after these proceedings had commenced, the mother moved back to Schuyler County, but within a few months she moved to Steuben County. The father filed numerous petitions seeking visitation, custody and downward modification of support, and alleging that the mother violated the prior visitation order as well as temporary orders entered during these proceedings. Following a hearing Family Court awarded the parties joint custody with the child spending four days per week with the father and three days per week with the mother. The court also terminated the father's support obligation effective January 2010, the date he filed his support modification petition.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court's modification of custody has a sound and substantial basis in the record. The parties' numerous moves, the father trying to reestablish contact and the mother hindering those efforts all provided changed circumstances reflecting a need to modify the prior custody and visitation order. Although the father did not actively attempt to enforce his visitation rights and pursue his relationship with his daughter from 2003 to 2009, he testified that he had no vehicle in New Jersey, had no contact information for the mother or child and did not know how to find them. The mother stopped bringing the child to visitation after one or two months in 2003 and-despite having agreed to the visitation-filed unsubstantiated petitions to terminate the visitation soon after entering the stipulation. The mother moved numerous times, including four times during the pendency of these proceedings, and never informed the father. One was a safe house where she fled to escape domestic abuse by her paramour-abuse that was witnessed by the daughter and caused her to fear the paramour. The mother also violated almost every temporary visitation order entered during the pendency of these proceedings by failing to bring the child to visit with the father. When she did not have a suitable place to live, she wrote a letter assigning custody of her daughter and son to her paramour's adult daughter, without consulting the father. The paramour's daughter also deprived the father of his court-ordered visitation, and the mother passed blame to her. At the time of the Lincoln hearing, the child had not seen her mother for almost two months, and the mother testified that she called only when she had minutes on her phone. While the father had lost contact with his daughter for several years and did not adequately explain why he took so long to attempt to reestablish a connection, at the time of the hearing he had been working for a year to form a relationship with her. Those efforts were constantly thwarted by the mother and her paramour's daughter, who failed to bring the child to visits and even kept the child out of school on Fridays when the father was supposed to pick the child up for weekend visitation. Everyone agreed that the child should remain in the same school district; the father lived near the child's school, while the mother had moved to a different district. The father also agreed to open a preventative services file with the local social services agency and bring the child to mental health counseling. Family Court did not err in placing the child with the father for four days per week. While the law expresses a preference for keeping siblings together, the rule is not absolute and has become complicated by changing family dynamics and the presence of multiple half siblings the court must ultimately decide what is best for the child at issue. Here, the custody petitions regarding the mother's son-the half brother of the daughter involved in this appeal-were withdrawn or dismissed, leaving that child in the mother's custody. Evidence indicated that the son would have difficulty being separated from his half sister, but there was no evidence of ill effects to the daughter from any separation. In any event, Family Court's order left those children together for three days each week. Considering the totality of the circumstances, including the custodial interference by the mother, the record contained a sound and substantial basis for the court's custody determination.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the father's child support obligation. The court was authorized to suspend support payments for periods when the mother wrongfully interfered with or withheld visitation. The record supported the finding that the mother deliberately and unjustifiably frustrated the father's visitation by failing to produce the child, moving without notifying the father and attempting to informally transfer custody to another person who also did not produce the child for visitation-again without informing the father. Additionally, the court's custody determination placed the child in the father's care for the majority of each week, providing a basis to eliminate his support obligation. Hence, the court did not err in terminating the father's support obligation as of January 2010, the date he filed a petition seeking such relief.

Family Offense Petition is Sufficient if it Alleges specific acts committed at identified places and times, which, if proven, would constitute a family offense enumerated in Family Court Act 812(1)

In Matter of Little v Renz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6224696 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that a proceeding pursuant to article eight of the Family Court Act is originated by the filing of a petition containing an allegation that the respondent committed an enumerated family offense. As a general matter, the factual allegations in a pleading must be "sufficiently particular to give the court and parties notice of the transactions, occurrences, or series of transactions or occurrences, intended to be proved and the material elements of each cause of action or defense" (CPLR 3013; Family Ct Act 165). It found that the petition in this case was not "a vague and conclusory repetition of the statutory language inasmuch as it alleged specific acts committed at identified places and times, which, if proven, would constitute a family offense . Accordingly, the allegations contained in the petition were sufficient to allege a family offense enumerated in Family Court Act 812(1), and the Family Court erred in denying the petition and dismissing the proceeding on the ground that the petition was insufficient.

Violation Petition Insufficient Where it Lacked Sufficient Specificity to Provide Respondent with Proper Notice of Alleged Violation and Failed to Outline How Petitioners Rights Prejudiced

In Miller v Miller, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6090163 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were the parents of two children, born in 2004 and 2005. A custody order entered in March 2008 granted sole legal custody to respondent (mother) with visitation to petitioner (father) as agreed between the parties. Among other provisions, it further required that the children be properly supervised at all times and that neither parent smoke or allow a third party to smoke in a vehicle in which the children are passengers. In June 2010, the father filed a violation petition alleging that the mother was in contempt of this order in that she failed to properly supervise and discipline the children, as she had permitted the older child to be violent towards others and to smoke. Finding that the petition lacked sufficient specificity to provide the mother with proper notice and failed to outline how the father's rights had been prejudiced, Family Court dismissed the petition without a hearing, but ordered a neglect investigation by the St. Lawrence County Department of Social Services. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the petition was subject to the requirements of CPLR 3013, and thus required to "be sufficiently particular" as to provide notice to the court and opposing party of the occurrences to be proved and the material elements of each cause of action (CPLR 3013; Family Ct. Act 165[a]). The generalized allegations of the petition, even liberally construed, failed to provide the mother with notice of a particular event or violation such that she could prepare a defense (CPLR 3026). Further, the father failed to assert how the mother's alleged failings " 'defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced' " his rights, as required to sustain a civil contempt finding. Although Family Court properly ordered an investigation to determine whether a neglect or abuse proceeding should be initiated, this protective measure did not serve to remedy the defects in the father's petition. Accordingly, there was no error in the dismissal of the petition without a hearing.

Appeal Dismissed for Failure of Appellant to Include Transcripts

In Matter of Katz v Dotan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6091334 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that it is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal (see Family Ct Act 1118; CPLR 5525[a]). The failure to provide necessary transcripts inhibits the Court's ability to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal. In this case, the full record of the proceedings in the Family Court had not been transcribed. The appeal was dismissed, as the papers provided were patently insufficient for the purpose of reviewing the issues the father has raised.

Appeal Dismissed for Failure to Full Trial Transcript in Record

In Clarke v Clarke, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6225188 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff appealed from a judgment of the Supreme Court which, after a nonjury trial, inter alia, failed to direct the defendant to pay child support arrears, failed to award her maintenance, and failed to equitably distribute the value of the defendant's medical license. The Appellate Division dismissed the appeal. It observed that an appellant is obligated to assemble a proper record on appeal, which must include any relevant transcripts of proceedings before the Supreme Court (CPLR 5525[a]; 5526). The record must also "contain all of the relevant papers that were before the Supreme Court, including the transcript, if any, of the proceedings" (Matson v. County of Nassau, 290 A.D.2d 494, 494). Here, the plaintiff appealed from a judgment which failed to direct the defendant to pay child support arrears, failed to award the plaintiff maintenance, and failed to equitably distribute the value of the defendant's medical license. However, the plaintiff's failure to provide the Court with the full transcript of the nonjury trial conducted before the Supreme Court rendered the record on appeal inadequate to enable the Court to reach an informed determination on the merits. Thus, the appeal had to be dismissed.

Father's Failure to Properly File a Full Record on Appeal, Despite His Contrary Statement Made Pursuant to CPLR 5531, Warranted Imposition of Costs

In Haleniuk v. Persaud, 89 A.D.3d 601, 933 N.Y.S.2d 33 (1 Dept, 2011), in affirming the order of Family Court, the Appellate Division found that the evidence in the record sufficiently supported Family Court's finding that the father failed to meet his burden of showing that the child was constructively emancipated. Although the record reflected a strained relationship between the father and child, it did not support a finding that the child completely refused to have a relationship with the father. The Appellate Division held that the father's failure to properly file a full record on appeal, despite his contrary statement made pursuant to CPLR 5531, warranted the imposition of costs incurred in preparing and filing a respondent's appendix (CPLR 5528[e]; 22 NYCRR 600.10[c][1]).

Child Denied the Meaningful Assistance of Appellate Counsel Where Attorney for Child Failed to Consult with and Advise Child in Manner Consistent with the Child's Capacities"

In Matter of Lamarcus E., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5984243 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondent was the father of the child (born in 2002). In August 2009, while under petitioner's supervision, the father told petitioner that he intended to relocate to Connecticut in October 2009 to work and live with his girlfriend, but that he would not be taking his son with him. Thereafter, petitioner filed a neglect petition against the father alleging that he planned to permanently relocate to Connecticut without his child and without any viable plan for the child's care in his absence, and that the father planned to place the child in foster care. Upon receipt of the petition, Family Court removed the child and placed him in the custody of petitioner. The father relocated to Connecticut the next day. Following a fact-finding hearing, the father was determined to have neglected his child and, after a dispositional hearing, Family Court directed that the child continue his placement with petitioner. The father appealed. No appeal was taken on behalf of the child. The Appellate Division observed that the attorney assigned to represent the child on this appeal was not the same attorney who continued to represent the child in Family Court. Although the child's appellate attorney had taken a position on this appeal that was consistent with that taken by the child's attorney in Family Court, she reported in her brief that she had not personally met with her client, who was now nine years old. She explained that the child's attorney in the ongoing proceedings in Family Court had been "able to provide me with continuing information on my client, his position and the status of the [proceedings in Family Court]." The child's appellate attorney provided the Appellate Division with no further explanation. Given the foregoing, the Appellate Division found that the child had been denied the meaningful assistance of appellate counsel. Counsel's failure to "consult with and advise the child to the extent of and in a manner consistent with the child's capacities" (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][1]) constituted a failure to meet her essential responsibilities as the attorney for the child. Client contact, absent extraordinary circumstances, is a significant component to the meaningful representation of a child. Therefore, given the circumstances, and for the reasons clearly articulated in Matter of Mark T. v. Joyanna U. (64 A.D.3d 1092, 1093-1095 [2009]) and Matter of Lewis v. Fuller, (69 A.D.3d 1142 [2010]), the child's appellate counsel was relieved, the decision was withheld, and new counsel to be assigned to represent the child on the appeal.

Error to Dismiss Custody Case for Lack of Personal Jurisdiction Given Provision UCCJEA Providing That Physical Presence Of, or Personal Jurisdiction Over, a Party or a Child Not Necessary or Sufficient to Make a Child Custody Determination.

In Matter of Malek v Kwiatkowski, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5984260 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the unmarried parents of two daughters (born in 2004 and 2008). The father commenced the proceeding for joint custody and visitation in June 2010, alleging that the mother had relocated with the children in April 2010. The mother appeared pro se by telephone at Family Court's first two hearings, but she withheld her out-of-state address from the father because she alleged that she and the children were fearful of him. At the third appearance, the mother's counsel appeared on her behalf and claimed that she was financially unable to travel to New York at that time. Although the mother's counsel raised the issue of the lack of personal jurisdiction over his client, Family Court stated that the mother had submitted to the court's jurisdiction, set a trial date and told counsel that the mother's failure to appear on that date would result in a default. At the scheduled trial date, however, Family Court directed the mother's counsel to again make a motion to dismiss based on lack of jurisdiction, determined that the mother had not waived service by appearing and dismissed the petition with prejudice.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Family Court erred in dismissing the case for lack of personal jurisdiction given the provision of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act found at Domestic Relations Law 76(3), which provides that "[p]hysical presence of, or personal jurisdiction over, a party or a child is not necessary or sufficient to make a child custody determination." Further, under the circumstances, it was improper to dismiss the father's petition without first ordering service by an alternative method (see Domestic Relations Law 75-g [1][c]). The mother had not revealed her address to the father, making normal service of process impractical. Additionally, the court had stated previously that the mother had submitted to its jurisdiction and ordered her to appear for a trial, thus giving the father no reason to believe that jurisdiction remained an issue. The court's peremptory resurrection of the issue when the mother did not appear on the trial date and its grant of the motion without affording the father an opportunity to serve the mother by alternative means was improper under these circumstances and it reversed and remitted for that purpose.

Support Order Which Fails to Comply with Family Ct Act 413(1)(H) Is Invalid and Unenforceable.

In Matter of McKenna v McKenna, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5984262 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) upon the oral stipulation of petitioner (mother) and respondent (father), an order was entered that set the father's basic monthly child support obligation for the parties' two children at $1,235. In March 2010, the father filed an application to vacate the order, claiming that it did not comply with Family Ct Act 413(1)(h). Family Court affirmed the Support Magistrate's denial of the father's motion.

The Appellate Division reversed. It found that the order was invalid and unenforceable because it failed to include, as required, "a provision stating that the parties have been advised of the provisions of [the Child Support Standards Act] and that the basic child support obligation provided for therein would presumptively result in the correct amount of child support to be awarded". While the parties acknowledged that they had agreed to the amount that the father would pay in basic child support-before any additional amount was added for child care and health insurance, no reference was made to the presumptive amount of child support under the Child Support Standards Act in their agreement or at the hearing, or in the order ultimately issued by Family Court. Because neither the agreement nor the order advised the parties in accordance with the nonwaivable requirements of the Child Support Standards Act and the record contained no explanation as to whether or why there has been a deviation from the child support calculation provided by that statute, the support order at issue was invalid and unenforceable. The matter was remitted to Family Court to determine the amount of child support that the father was obligated to pay.

Mistrial Granted and New Attorney Assigned Based upon Failure of Attorney for the Child to Fulfill Attorney's Obligations under 22 NYCRR 7.2 (d) to Advocate Child's Wishes

In Michael H v April H, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 6015796 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) on October 4, 1999, the Court issued an Order awarding April "H" ("the mother") and Michael "H." ("the father") joint legal custody of the subject child, Seth "H." with the mother having primary physical custody of the subject child subject to a schedule of visitation for the father. On August 3, 2011, the father filed a modification petition seeking sole legal and physical custody. The father alleged among other things, that the child has resided with the father since June 22, 2011, when the mother essentially kicked the child out of her home. During the trial, held on November 2, 2011, the Court conducted a Lincoln hearing to take the subject child's testimony under oath. See, Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d 270, 247 N.E.2d 659 [1969]. During the Lincoln hearing, the child, a mature fourteen year old, expressed a clear position to the Court and a reasonable basis for his position. During closing arguments, the Attorney for the Child advocated for a disposition that directly contradicted the wishes of the child as expressed in the Lincoln hearing.

As a result of the Attorney for the Child's closing arguments, the Court became concerned that the Attorney for the Child was not fulfilling her obligations under 22 NYCRR 7.2(d). This section requires the Attorney to zealously advocate for the child's position. See, Krieger v. Krieger, 65 AD3d 1350, 886 N.Y.S.2d 463 [2d Dept 2009]; and Mark T. v. Joyanna U., 64 AD3d 1092, 882 N.Y.S.2d 773 [3d Dept 2009]. Except in two circumstances, the Attorney for the Child must be directed by the wishes of the child even when the attorney believes that what the child wants is not in the child's best interest. The first exception applies when the child is not capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment.. The second exception applies when the child's wishes are likely to result in substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child.

After considering the events of the trial, the Court, sua sponte, moved for a mistrial and an order assigning a new Attorney for the Child to represent the child's interests going forward based upon the apparent failure of the Attorney for the Child to fulfill the attorney's obligations under 22 NYCRR 7.2 (d). In the Court's opinion the mother in effect stated that the child was capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment as those terms are used by 22 NYCRR 7.2(d). Neither the father nor the Attorney for the Child argued that the child was not capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment. The Attorney for the Child's credit frankly acknowledged that she failed to zealously advocate for her client during the closing argument. She acknowledged that although it was an honest mistake, it was a mistake.

The Court declared a mistrial. It found that counsel's error was not harmless. Reasonable minds could differ regarding what order served the best interest of the child and therefore, closing arguments were important in this case. If counsel elects to make a closing argument, the closing argument may not advocate for an outcome which directly opposed the child's position (except in the two circumstances described above). Second, if the Court were to ignore the Attorney for the Child's closing argument placed upon the record and make a decision in this case based upon the rest of the record, the legitimacy of the judicial process could be reasonably questioned. If the Court were to decide in the mother's favor, a reasonable mind may be suspicious that the Court was, in fact, not ignoring the Attorney for the Child's argument. If the Court were to decide in the father's favor, a reasonable mind may be suspicious that the Court was trying to manipulate the outcome in order to render this issue meaningless. Third, the Court could not be certain of the scope of the Attorney for the Child's error. If the error went beyond closing argument, the scope of the evidence admitted may have been effected. Given the Court's decision to declare a mistrial, it was consistent with the administration of justice and the best interest of the child to relieve the Attorney for the Child of any further responsibilities in the matter and to assign a new attorney to represent the child's interests going forward. The Court considered whether or not this issue should be raised sua sponte and acknowledged that neither parent nor the Attorney for the Child raised the issue or asked for any relief as a result of the issue. However, the trial judge was the only person present during the Lincoln hearing other than the child and the Attorney for the Child and thus, the parents and their counsel did not have an opportunity to evaluate the testimony of the child. Furthermore, the Court has an obligation to ensure that an individual's right to zealous advocacy is protected.

Billing Statements of Former Attorney Inadmissible in Counsel Fee Hearing

In Matter of Denton v Barr, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5922992 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified an order of the Family Court which awarded petitioner attorney's fees of $110,000 and child support arrears of $11,000 to award petitioner $11,742 in child support arrears and $5,322 in interest on the arrears, and to remand the matter for clarification of the amount of attorney's fees awarded to and reversed an order which directed that the $110,000 in attorney's fees be paid to petitioner and mailed to the offices of her counsel. On a prior appeal, the Court found that pursuant to the parties' stipulation of settlement, petitioner was "entitled to attorney's fees and remanded for a hearing to determine the amount of those fees" (69 AD3d 24, 32 [2009]). It found that the court, in determining the amount of fees due to petitioner, relied on documents that constituted inadmissible hearsay, namely, billing statements of respondent's former attorney (cf. Seinfeld v. Robinson, 300 A.D.2d 208, 209 [2002]). The matter was remanded to the trial court for clarification of the basis for the amount of fees awarded.

Family Courts Jurisdiction is Limited to Family Offenses Committed Against Persons Listed in Family Court Act 812 Only

In Matter of Janet GG v Robert GG,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5083241 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in March 2010, petitioner (mother) filed a Family Ct Act article 8 petition alleging that

respondent (father) committed a series of family offenses against her and their two children (born in 1996 and 1998). Specifically, she alleged that on March 2, 2010, the father telephoned the children's school, spoke to a guidance counselor and demanded to see his children. Because the counselor believed that an order of protection was in place that barred the father from having such contact with his children, the counselor informed the father that he should not come to the school and, in any event, would not be allowed by school authorities to visit with his children. The father, despite this admonition, went to the school and, upon entering the premises, confronted the school superintendent demanding to see his children. After he became loud and boisterous and refused to leave the premises, the police were notified and the father was placed under arrest. The mother subsequently filed a petition claiming that this conduct qualified as a family offense and, on that basis, sought an order of protection for herself and the children. The father argued that what had occurred, even if true, did not constitute a family offense and, therefore, Family Court did not have jurisdiction. The court agreed and dismissed the petition with prejudice. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that Family Court's jurisdiction over family offense proceedings is limited to those acts between family members that 'would constitute disorderly conduct, harassment in the first degree, harassment in the second degree, aggravated harassment in the second degree, ...stalking, menacing in the second degree, menacing in the third degree, reckless endangerment, assault in the second degree, assault in the third degree or an attempted assault (Family Ct Act 812[1]). Family Court determined that while the father's actions may have constituted disorderly conduct, they did not amount to a family offense because, when committed, the father was not in contact with the mother or either of their children. Instead, the father's actions were directed at school personnel and not any member of his family. The Appellate Division agreed. The father's actions were directed not at the mother or the children, but at school personnel, and what occurred did not constitute a family offense. As such, Family Court was without jurisdiction to entertain this petition (Family Ct Act 812).

Second Department Construes Parties' Stipulation Providing for the Distribution of "Any Pension," to Refer Only to the Portion of Pension Representing Deferred Compensation.

In Nugent-Schubert v Schubert, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5085506 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff former wife and the defendant former husband were divorced by judgment incorporating a stipulation of settlement. The stipulation of settlement provided for a 50% distribution to the plaintiff of the value of "any pension" received by the defendant. The plaintiff thereafter submitted to the Supreme Court a Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO), which included a provision entitling her to receive a share of any future disability pension, but limited to any portion thereof representing the defendant's earnings and years of credited service. However, the Supreme Court struck that provision of the QDRO. Subsequently, the defendant, who was employed by the New York City Police Department, retired on an accidental disability pension as a result of a line-of-duty injury. Pursuant to the QDRO in its current form, the plaintiff was receiving a portion of the defendant's accidental disability pension that represented compensation for personal injuries. The defendant moved to amend the QDRO so as to exclude this portion of his accidental disability pension from distribution to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division held that the motion should have been granted. It observed that where a QDRO is inconsistent with the provisions of a stipulation or judgment of divorce, courts possess the authority to amend the QDRO to accurately reflect the provisions of the stipulation pertaining to the pension benefits. A proper QDRO obtained pursuant to a stipulation of settlement can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. Under controlling law, pension benefits, "except to the extent that they are earned or acquired before marriage or after commencement of a matrimonial action, constitute marital property" because they are "in essence, a form of deferred compensation derived from employment" during the marriage. However, any compensation a spouse receives for personal injuries is not considered marital property and is not subject to equitable distribution. Thus, to the extent [a] disability pension represents deferred compensation, it is subject to equitable distribution while to the extent that a disability pension constitutes compensation for personal injuries, that compensation is "separate property" which is not subject to equitable distribution. In Berardi v. Berardi, 54 A.D.3d at 984-985, 865 N.Y.S.2d 245 this Court concluded that, absent a provision in the stipulation specifically awarding the [wife] accident disability benefits, the Supreme Court had erred in amending the QDRO to award the wife a portion of the husband's pension representing compensation for personal injuries, as such a provision in the QDRO expanded the rights granted to the wife under the stipulation. Similarly, here, the parties' stipulation providing for the distribution of "any pension," which was entered into before the defendant became entitled to or applied for an accidental disability pension, must likewise be construed to refer only to the portion of the defendant's pension representing deferred compensation. The Appellate Division distinguished this case from its decisions in Rosenberger v. Rosenberger (63 A.D.3d 898, 882 N.Y.S.2d 426) and Pulaski v. Pulaski (22 A.D.3d 820, 820-821, 804 N.Y.S.2d 404). In those cases, the husbands had applied for disability benefits, based upon line-of-duty injuries, prior to execution of the stipulation such that they were "chargeable with knowledge of the prospect of [an] eventual disability retirement when [they] entered into the stipulation". Thus, in Pulaski and Rosenberger, where the husbands were aware, before entering into a stipulation, of the specific potential for receipt of pension benefits that they would be entitled to treat as separate property, the broad language in the stipulation referring to distribution of a pension generally, with no provision for separate-property treatment of the pension, was reasonably interpreted as intending to distribute the entire disability pension. Here, as in Berardi, where it was unknown and unanticipated that the defendant would qualify for a disability pension, there was no reason to conclude that a general provision providing for equal distribution of "any pension" was intended to opt out of the controlling law in order to distribute portions of any such pension that would not ordinarily be subject to equitable distribution. The fact that the plaintiff submitted a QDRO which would have limited the distribution of any future disability pension to that portion representing deferred compensation further evinced the parties' understanding that separate-property portions of "any pension" received by the husband would not be subject to distribution.

Third Department Affirms Initial Custody Award Made without Evidentiary Hearing

In Matter of Cole v Cole, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4975299, 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 07328 (NYAD 3 Dept) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of two sons (born in 2007 and 2008). In June 2010, the father filed a petition for custody of the children. He thereafter left the marital residence at the home of the maternal grandmother, and relocated to the paternal grandmother's home. In July 2010, the mother filed a petition seeking custody of the children. At the initial appearance, Family Court assigned an attorney for the children and temporarily ordered joint legal custody of the children with physical custody to the mother and, when the mother was working, childcare provided by the father at the maternal grandmother's home. At the next appearance, the father requested shared physical custody of the children and Family Court granted this as to weekends, when the mother was working. At the third and final appearance, in November 2010, Family Court issued a final order essentially based upon this same arrangement. The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected the mother's argument that Family Court erred by issuing a final order without conducting a hearing or engaging in other formalities such as placing stipulations or consent of the parties upon the record. An evidentiary hearing is generally necessary to determine custody matters, but it is not obligatory where, as here, no request is made and the court has sufficient information to undertake a comprehensive independent review of the [children's] best interests. Although no sworn testimony was taken, all three appearances before Family Court were attended by each of the parents, their respective attorneys, and both grandmothers, and the court invited and received input from all involved. The attorney for the children attended the two later appearances, and advocated a position based on interviews with the mother, her employer, the father and various service providers for the children. Further, the Chemung County Department of Social Services provided Family Court with a report assessing the needs of the children and the current family circumstances. The two parents, with the support of the two grandmothers, were essentially collaborating relative to the matters of sharing time and the responsibilities of caring for their children during the course of the proceedings, and Family Court found this structure in the best interests of the children. Although the mother was represented by counsel at all three appearances, at no time did she or her counsel request a hearing or other formalities. Upon review, it found that Family Court had sufficient information before it to support the determination.

Third Department Holds that In Neglect Proceeding Attorney for Children May Advocate a Different Position When the Children's Wishes Would Likely "Result in a Substantial Risk of Imminent, Serious Harm to the Children

In Matter of Alyson J, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5083950 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) a neglect proceeding, the Appellate Division disagreed with respondent's contention that the attorney for the children failed to adequately represent the children's interests. It pointed out that the duty of the attorney for the children is to advocate and express the children's wishes to the court, but on occasion it is acceptable for counsel to deviate from this obligation; the attorney is specifically allowed to advocate a different position when the children's wishes would likely "result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child[ren]" (Citing (22 NYCRR 7.2 [d][3]; see Matter of Mark T. v. Joyanna U., 64 A.D.3d 1092, 1093-1094 [2009], lv denied 15 N.Y.3d 715 [2010]). Here, counsel had been involved with the children for several years and was well aware of their conditions, and the Appellate Division accepted the contrary position as in the best interests of the children. At the fact-finding hearing, the attorney for the children did indicate his clients' wishes, and properly informed Family Court that he was deviating from them.

Child Support Provisions of So-ordered Stipulation Which Did Not Contain Recitals Mandated by the CSSA Not Enforceable, But Remaining Provisions Held Enforceable.

In Bushlow v Bushlow--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5222909 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the parties' so-ordered stipulation of settlement dated January 26, 2009, which was incorporated, but not merged, into the judgment of divorce, did not comply with the requirements of the Child Support Standards Act (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][h]). The stipulation did not recite that the parties were advised of the provisions of the CSSA, and that the basic child support obligation provided for therein would presumptively result in the correct amount of support to be awarded. "[A] party's awareness of the requirements of the CSSA is not the dispositive consideration under the statute" (Lepore v. Lepore, 276 A.D.2d 677, 678, 714 N.Y.S.2d 343). Moreover, the parties' prorated shares of child care expenses and future reasonable unreimbursed health care expenses deviated from the CSSA guidelines, since they were not calculated based upon the parties' "gross (total) income as should have been or should be reported in the most recent federal income tax return" (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][b][5][i]; 240 [1-b][c][1]). Thus, the stipulation was required to contain the additional recitals setting forth, inter alia, the amount that the basic child support obligation would have been under the CSSA (see Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][h]). Since the so-ordered stipulation of settlement did not contain the specific recitals mandated by the CSSA, its provisions, insofar as they concerned the plaintiff's basic child support payment and "add-ons" for child care and unreimbursed health care expenses, were not enforceable. Accordingly, the Supreme Court should not have incorporated them into the judgment of divorce. However, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the remaining provisions of the so-ordered stipulation, and the parties' open-court stipulation entered into on September 9, 2008, continued to be enforceable. The record did not support a finding that these provisions were closely intertwined with the basic child support provisions. The matter was remitted to the Supreme Court, for a determination of the basic child support obligation, including the parties' prorated contributions towards child care and reasonable unreimbursed health care expenses, in accordance with the CSSA.

Appellate Division Explains Doctrine of Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel. Incidents in Counterclaim Occurring More than 5 Years Before Commencement May Be Properly Included If Relevant to Evaluation of Party's Claim for Cruelty Divorce.

In Maybaum v Maybaum, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5244417 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant wife and the plaintiff husband were married on March 13, 1995. Two children were born of the marriage. In April 2010, the defendant commenced a proceeding pursuant to article 8 of the Family Court Act, alleging that the plaintiff committed certain family offenses. Thereafter, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. On April 27, 2010, the parties appeared before the Family Court and entered into a stipulation on the record. The parties stipulated that the defendant was withdrawing the pending family offense petition, with prejudice, in exchange for the plaintiff giving the defendant exclusive use of the marital residence. The parties agreed that the stipulation was binding in the action for a divorce pending in the Supreme Court. Subsequently, the defendant answered the complaint in this action and asserted a counterclaim for a divorce and ancillary relief on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. In reply, the plaintiff asserted affirmative defenses, including, as a third affirmative defense, that the defendant's counterclaim was insufficiently specific to meet the requirements of CPLR 3016(c), and, as a fourth affirmative defense, that the counterclaim was barred, in whole or in part, by the doctrines of res judicata, collateral estoppel, and equitable estoppel, based on the stipulation between the parties. The parties made several motions and cross motions for relief.

The Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court erred in granting the plaintiff's motion to strike stated paragraphs of the defendant's counterclaim on the grounds of res judicata, collateral estoppel, and equitable estoppel. The allegations in the defendant's counterclaim for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, and the allegations in the plaintiff's family offense petition, did not arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions. "It is not always clear whether particular claims are part of the same transaction for res judicata purposes. A 'pragmatic' test has been applied to make this determination-analyzing 'whether the facts are related in time, space, origin, or motivation, whether they form a convenient trial unit, and whether their treatment as a unit conforms to the parties' expectations or business understanding or usage' " (Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 N.Y.3d 94, 100-101). Applying this test, it concluded that the family offense petition and counterclaim for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment did not form a convenient trial unit. Thus, the defendant was not precluded from litigating her counterclaim for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment in the separate action in the Supreme Court.

The Appellate Division pointed out that collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, precludes a party from relitigating in a subsequent action or proceeding an issue clearly raised in a prior action or proceeding and decided against that party, whether or not the tribunals or causes of action are the same. The doctrine applies if the issue in the second action is identical to an issue which was raised, necessarily decided and material in the first action, and the plaintiff had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the earlier action. Collateral estoppel effect will only be given to matters actually litigated and determined in a prior action. An issue is not actually litigated if, for example, there has been a default, a confession of liability, a failure to place a matter in issue by proper pleading or even because of a stipulation. Here, the issue of whether the plaintiff committed certain acts against the defendant was never determined in the Family Court proceeding, and the defendant's participation in the stipulation to withdraw her family offense petition, with prejudice, could not be construed to be the kind of determination following a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issues that would be necessary to collaterally estop the defendant from establishing that the plaintiff committed the alleged acts. Further, the circumstances set forth by plaintiff simply did not rise to a level of unconscionability warranting application of equitable estoppel.

Since the doctrines of res judicata, collateral estoppel, and equitable estoppel did not preclude the defendant from litigating certain of the allegations in her counterclaim that were alleged in her family offense petition, the Supreme Court should have granted defendant's cross motion to dismiss the plaintiff's fourth affirmative defense alleging that the defendant's counterclaim was barred in whole or in part by the doctrines of res judicata, collateral estoppel, and equitable estoppel, as that defense has no merit.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff's motion to strike stated paragraphs of the defendant's counterclaim, in effect, as time-barred on the ground they alleged acts occurring more than five years prior to the commencement of the action. The allegations in the counterclaim relating to incidents occurring more than five years before the commencement of the action may be properly included to the extent that those allegations may be relevant to an evaluation of a party's claim for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment in the context of the entire marriage.

Party Who Accepts Benefits of Separation Agreement for Considerable Period of Time Deemed to Have Ratified it but Party Who Receives Virtually No Benefits from Agreement Cannot Be Said to Have Ratified It.

In Kessler v Kessler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 5241275 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) on June 10, 1980, after 25 years of marriage, the parties entered into a separation agreement, which provided that the plaintiff husband would make payments to the defendant wife for her support and maintenance and for the mortgage and carrying costs relating to the marital residence, where the defendant continued to reside. The plaintiff complied with the terms of the separation agreement and, in 2009, he commenced this action for a conversion divorce. In response to the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, the defendant submitted an affidavit asserting that the plaintiff had procured the separation agreement through fraud and duress, and that the agreement was unconscionable. The defendant alleged that the plaintiff had concealed from her his vast wealth, and had induced her to enter into the separation agreement at a time when, unbeknownst to her, New York's equitable distribution law was about to be enacted. The Supreme Court granted the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, and subsequently entered a judgment of divorce directed the parties to comply with the terms of the separation agreement which was incorporated, but not merged into, the judgment of divorce. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that a party who accepts the benefits provided under a separation agreement for any considerable period of time is deemed to have ratified the agreement and, thus, relinquishes the right to challenge that agreement. By contrast, when a party received virtually no benefits from the agreement, he or she cannot be said to have ratified it. Assuming the truth of the allegations set forth in the defendant's affidavit, the benefits she received pursuant to the separation agreement were far less than those she likely would have received had there been an equitable distribution of the assets accumulated during the marriage. The record, however, did not support a finding that the defendant received "virtually no benefits" from the agreement. Moreover, while a spouse will not necessarily be held to have ratified an agreement if it is found to be the product of duress and overreaching, the disadvantage to the defendant created by the alleged fraud and duress in this case could not be deemed to have persisted throughout the 29-year period during which the defendant accepted the benefits of the separation agreement without challenging it. Thus, the plaintiff made a prima facie showing that the defendant ratified the separation agreement. In opposition, the defendant failed to raise a triable issue of fact. Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly granted the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment.

Factors Set Forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(F) Should Be Considered Only Where Court Is Able to Calculate Basic Child Support Obligation Pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(C), Not Where Calculated Pursuant to Family Court Act 413[1][K]

In Salvatore D. V. Shyou H., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4975542 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed respondent to pay $950 a month for the support of the parties' child. It held that the Support Magistrate properly ordered child support based on the needs of the child, since respondent presented insufficient evidence to determine her gross income (Family Court Act 413[1][k]). Respondent's stated expenses were more than twice the income reflected on her tax return. The Support Magistrate found incredible respondent's testimony regarding her employment, her living situation and loans from her employer and brother. The Support Magistrate properly declined to consider the factors set forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(f), including the child's receipt of Social Security disability benefits. Such factors should be considered only where, unlike here, the court is able to calculate the basic child support obligation pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(c). Respondent's testimony, including that she was a well-known esthetician with celebrity clients and 22 years of experience, supported the Support Magistrate's determination that she is able to pay the child support obligation. The Support Magistrate was not required to rely on respondent's account of her finances.

Third Department Holds That Emancipation by Employment Occurs Only When Child Attains Economic Independence. Fact That Child May Work Full Time Is Not Determinative Even Where Child Lives on His/her Own.

In Drumm v Drumm, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4975452 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (mother) and respondent (father) were the divorced parents of three children, Miranda, Nicholas and Matthew (born in 1990, 1994 and 1997, respectively). In May 2006, the parties entered into a separation agreement, pursuant to the terms of which they agreed to share physical custody of their children and to divide equally, among other things, the cost of the children's health insurance and any uncovered medical expenses. In apparent contemplation of that arrangement, the parties agreed to waive any child support "at [that] time." Although not entirely clear from the record, it appeared that Miranda and Nicholas thereafter elected to reside primarily with the mother, prompting the parties to enter into stipulations of settlement that referred various issues to Family Court, including child support for Miranda and Nicholas and the parties' respective obligations for the children's health care costs. The separation agreement, as modified, was incorporated but not merged into the parties' May 2009 amended judgment of divorce. In September 2009, the mother and the father entered into an order on consent wherein they agreed to, among other things, grant each other a "right of first refusal" during any period of time when the parent having physical custody of Matthew would be absent for five hours or longer. As the father often was required to work on weekends, he offered--and the mother frequently accepted-- the additional parenting time with Matthew. Shortly after entering into this stipulation, the mother commenced a modification proceeding contending that, having availed herself of the opportunity to spend more time with Matthew, she now had physical custody of him more than 50% of the time and, as such, was entitled to child support. Following a hearing, the Support Magistrate found that the mother's decision to exercise her right of first refusal did not alter the parties' shared custody arrangement as to Matthew and, therefore, the mother was not entitled to child support for him. The Support Magistrate further determined that Miranda became emancipated in June 2008 when she graduated from high school and obtained full-time employment and limited any award of support for Miranda accordingly. Family Court, sua sponte, dismissed the mother's subsequent objections to the Support Magistrate's order as untimely and, upon reargument, adhered to its prior decision. The Appellate Division reversed. It found that the record did not support Family Court's finding that the mother's objections were filed outside the 35-day window set forth in Family Ct Act 439(e) and held that Family Court erred in refusing to entertain the mother's objections on the merits. The Appellate Division held that with regard to the mother's request for child support for Matthew, the mere fact that the mother elected to exercise her right of first refusal with respect to this particular child did not fundamentally alter the parties' shared custody arrangement. At best, the mother's election resulted in her choosing to spend an additional three or four days each month with her son. In its view, regardless of the burden of proof employed, this minor and entirely voluntary "change in circumstances" was insufficient to warrant the mother's request for child support as to this child.

However, it found merit to the mother's objection regarding Miranda's alleged emancipation. A parent is statutorily obligated to support his or her child until the age of 21 (see Family Ct Act 413[1]) unless the child is sooner emancipated, which occurs, insofar as is relevant here, when the child attains economic independence through employment. The fact that a child may work full time is not determinative, as a child cannot be deemed economically independent if he or she still relies upon a parent for significant economic support. This remains true even where, as here, the child in question no longer resides with one of the parties, for long as the child is still dependent on one of them for a significant portion of his or her support. Here, although the father testified that Miranda went to work full time after graduating from high school, the record fell short of establishing that she had achieved economic independence. Notably, there was no documentation of Miranda's salary or expenses or the degree to which she continued to receive financial support from her mother. Accordingly, the Support Magistrate's determination in this regard could not stand. The Court was also persuaded that the Support Magistrate erred in failing to achieve some level of parity between the parties by consistently using their respective projected incomes for 2009 in computing child support. Although the Support Magistrate's decision to utilize the mother's projected income for 2009 instead of her actual income for 2008 was well founded (due to nonrecurring income that the mother received in the prior year), no similar explanation was offered for electing to use the father's actual 2008 income instead of his projected--and presumably higher--income for 2009. The record failed to disclose a valid reason for failing to utilize similar income valuations for both parties when computing their respective support obligations for Miranda and Nicholas. The orders were reversed, on the law and the matter remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

In a footnote the Court pointed out that to the extent that the parties' separation agreement defined emancipation as, among other things, a "child establishing a permanent residence away from his or her custodial parent," it noted that "the parties cannot contract away the duty of child support" (Matter of Thomas B. v. Lydia D., 69 A.D.3d 24, 30 [2009]).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Requires Reversal of Neglect Orders

In Matter of Jaikob O., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4974840 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order which granted petitioner's application to adjudicate the children to be neglected. The Appellate Division held that as a result of deficiencies in the representation provided by his assigned trial counsel at the fact-finding hearing, he was denied meaningful representation. It found that counsel's ineffectiveness permeated the proceedings. At the fact-finding hearing, counsel failed to make an opening statement or to cross-examine petitioner's witnesses on relevant matters such as the children's exposure to respondent's allegedly neglectful conduct during the relevant time period (i.e., February to June 2008). Counsel's cross-examination of the mother and the wife, both clearly young victims of disturbing domestic violence, was at points tasteless and irrelevant, even prurient. Counsel made no motions at the close of petitioner's case and no closing arguments, stating only, "I think everything's been said." Counsel never submitted, as directed by Family Court, proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. Likewise, petitioner submitted no findings or conclusions of law. Notably, at the close of the fact-finding hearing, Family Court merely stated that it found petitioner's witnesses to be "credible," but made no finding of neglect, deferring its decision thereon. Surprisingly, counsel then consented to immediately proceeding to a dispositional hearing. Particularly disturbing on the issue of whether counsel provided meaningful representation was a letter sent by counsel to respondent in prison after the fact-finding hearing, but before a neglect determination was issued, in response to his request for a new attorney. The letter contained a not-so-subtle threat that counsel would not send respondent anything, or convey any information to or cooperate with his next attorney, if he pursued a change of attorneys; counsel also flaunted that he had achieved financial success, upon which he elaborated, with his "clients who have money" and essentially did not need this assignment. The Appellate Division found that the letter was inappropriate and served to undermine any confidence respondent might have had in counsel effectively representing him. Accordingly, the fact-finding order was reversed. In light of the foregoing, all proceedings at which counsel represented respondent subsequent to the fact-finding hearing and order were invalid.

It also deemed it important to point out that, with regard to the dispositional hearing, counsel failed to object to petitioner's oral motion to dispense with its duty to make diligent reunification efforts for respondent and the children based upon the termination, years earlier, of respondent's (and the wife's) parental rights to their three oldest children. Such a motion by petitioner was required to be "in writing " and on notice to respondent, allowing him "the opportunity to gather evidence and raise issues of fact in answering papers and prepare for an evidentiary hearing". Moreover, absolutely no proof was offered by any party at the dispositional hearing addressing the children's "best interests" either on the propriety of terminating reasonable reunification efforts (see Family Ct. Act 1039-b[b][6] [last paragraph]) or on the ultimate disposition upon the neglect finding (see Family Ct. Act 1045, 1052); the current status and placement of the children was not disclosed at the hearing or in the dispositional order. Counsel filed no notice of appeal from the resulting dispositional order. As respondent was denied meaningful representation by trial counsel at the fact-finding hearing, the fact-finding order, as well as the subsequent resulting orders of Family Court, could not stand.

Third Department Holds That Evidence of Child's Needs Not Necessary in Fixing Child Support. CSSA Creates Rebuttable Presumption Guidelines Contained Will Yield Correct Amount of Child Support.

In Matter of Marcklinger v Liebert, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4975510 (NYAD 3 Dept) in a prior appeal in this child support case, the Appellate Division rejected petitioner's contention that the Support Magistrate improperly considered the parties' combined income exceeding $80,000 in the calculation of the basic child support obligation for their unemancipated child, but remitted the matter to Family Court for an articulation of a rationale for using the statutory percentage rather than the so-called "paragraph (f)" factors or a combination of both (72 A.D.3d 1431 [2010]). Upon remittal, the Support Magistrate recalculated petitioner's support obligation, using a higher adjusted gross income for respondent as petitioner had previously requested and in accordance with Family Court's prior order, which reflected respondent's receipt of maintenance payments from petitioner. This resulted in petitioner's pro rata share being decreased to 57.65% and respondent's share being increased to 42.35%. The Support Magistrate then applied the statutory percentage set forth in the Child Support Standards Act to the parties' total combined income--first to the portion up to $80,000 and then to the portion that exceeds that amount--and determined that petitioner's pro rata share amounted to $256 per week. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that in his amended order, the Support Magistrate reasoned that the application of the statutory percentage yielded an amount that was "neither unjust nor inappropriate" considering that (1) the child would have enjoyed an enhanced standard of living had the parties remained married, (2) the $80,000 cap had not been adjusted for inflation since 1989, (3) the income disparity between the parties, and (4) petitioner did not offer any reason for a contrary finding. This articulation of reasoning indicated that the Support Magistrate carefully considered the parties' circumstances and found no reason to depart from the prescribed percentage. Although petitioner faulted respondent for not submitting evidence of the child's needs, application of the CSSA "creates a rebuttable presumption that the guidelines contained therein will yield the correct amount of child support" and, if petitioner believed that his presumptive pro rata share was unjust or inappropriate, it was his burden to establish such.

Appellate Division Holds Family Court Has Jurisdiction to Determine Paternity of Child Born to Married Woman Rejecting Argument Based upon Statutory Definitions of "Child," "Mother" and "Father" Limiting Those Terms to Situations Involving "A Child Born out of Wedlock"

In Matter of Nathan O v Jennifer P, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4975692 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) up until at least April 6, 2009, petitioner and respondent Jennifer P. (mother) engaged in a sexual relationship, although they disputed when that relationship ended. In mid-April 2009, the mother engaged in a sexual relationship and began cohabiting with respondent Uwe P. The mother married Uwe P. in June 2009 and gave birth to a child on December 6, 2009. At the time of the birth, Uwe P. was listed as the child's father on the birth certificate.

Shortly after the child's birth, petitioner filed two petitions seeking a declaration of paternity and either custody or visitation. Uwe P. cross-petitioned for a declaration of paternity. Family Court denied the mother's motion to dismiss the petitions and ordered the parties and child to submit to DNA testing, with the results sealed pending further proceedings. During a hearing to address whether the presumption of legitimacy should preclude DNA testing (see Family Ct Act 532 [a]), the parties consented to unsealing the DNA test results, which revealed a high likelihood that petitioner was the biological father. The parties then stipulated to an order of parenting time for petitioner, subject to respondents' right to appeal the court's ruling on jurisdiction and standing. Over respondents' objections, Family Court declared that petitioner was the father of the child, entered an order of filiation to that effect, and dismissed Uwe P.'s paternity petition. The Appellate Division affirmed. Respondents argued on appeal that the court had no jurisdiction to determine paternity of a child born to a married woman. The argument was based upon statutory definitions of "child," "mother" and "father" limiting those terms to situations involving "a child born out of wedlock" (Family Ct Act 512). The Appellate Division held that Respondents' interpretation could not be harmonized with other aspects of Family Ct Act article 5. For example, their interpretation is belied by the statutory phrase "presumption of legitimacy of a child born to a married woman" (Family Ct Act 532[a]); the use of the word "married" would be unnecessary and superfluous under respondents' view. Considering the broad grant of jurisdiction in the N.Y. Constitution and in Family Ct Act 511, along with the numerous cases where courts have addressed paternity of children born to married mothers and the conflict between the definitions in Family Ct Act 512 and other aspects of Family Ct Act article 5, it held that Family Court has subject matter jurisdiction to address the paternity of a child born to a married woman. As a "person alleging to be the father," petitioner had standing to commence a paternity proceeding (Family Ct Act 522). Family Ct Act 523 only requires the petition to allege that a certain individual is the father of the subject child. A party seeking paternity testing under the Family Ct Act need not provide factual support for the allegations of paternity or nonpaternity; he or she need only articulate some basis for them," sufficient to show that a nonfrivolous controversy exists regarding paternity. In his application filed less than a month after the child's birth, petitioner alleged that he engaged in a sexual relationship with the mother during the probable time of conception, that the mother was not married at that time, and that he was the child's father. This information was sufficient to commence the paternity proceeding. Respondents consented--during the middle of a hearing--to Family Court unsealing the DNA test results. Upon learning of those results, the parties stipulated to the entry of an order of visitation to petitioner, subject to respondents' reservation of the right to appeal based on the court's ruling regarding jurisdiction and standing. In light of their consent, with this limited reservation of rights, respondents waived their argument that Family Court was required to conduct a full hearing concerning the child's best interests (see Family Ct Act 532[a]) before issuing an order of filiation. Hence, it did not address that argument.

Family Court Lacks Subject Matter Jurisdiction over Article 8 Proceeding Where There Is No Intimate Relationship Between Parties

In Matter of Riedel v Vasquez, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4600481 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which, without a hearing, granted Respondents motion to dismiss the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. On August 10, 2010, the petitioner commenced an Article 8 proceeding seeking an order of protection against Milagros Carranza Vasquez (respondent), who was the estranged wife of the petitioner's live-in boyfriend. The petitioner had two children with the boyfriend, and the respondent had one child with him. The petitioner alleged that she and the respondent, who did not reside together, had an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act 812(1). The Family Court, without a hearing, dismissed the petition on the ground of lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The Appellate Division affirmed. It pointed out that the Family Court is a court of limited subject matter jurisdiction, and "cannot exercise powers beyond those granted to it by statute" (Matter of Johna M.S. v. Russell E.S., 10 N.Y.3d 364). Pursuant to Family Court Act 812(1), the Family Court's jurisdiction in family offense proceedings is limited to certain prescribed acts that occur "between spouses or former spouses, or between parent and child or between members of the same family or household". Members of the same family or household include, among others, "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time" (Family Ct Act 8121). Expressly excluded from the ambit of "intimate relationship," are "casual acquaintance[s]" and "ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts". Beyond those delineated exclusions, what qualifies as an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act 812(1)(e) is determined on a case-by-case basis. Relevant factors include the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship. Here, the parties had no direct relationship and were only connected through a third party, who was the biological father of the parties' respective children. The parties never resided together and did not take care of each other's children. The respondent's contact with the petitioner and/or her children had been minimal. Given these undisputed facts, no hearing was required, as the Family Court possessed sufficient information to determine that the parties were not and never had been in an "intimate relationship" as defined by Family Court Act s 812(1)(e).

Family Court Lacked Exclusive, Continuing Jurisdiction to Modify Custody Order Where Neither the Child Nor the Father Maintained a Significant Connection with New York, and Substantial Evidence Regarding the Child's Present and Future Welfare Was No Longer Available in this State.

In Knight v Morgan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4600549 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Family Court issued an order of custody on consent, on August 24, 2009, in connection with the father's petition seeking joint custody of the subject child with the mother, awarding joint legal custody to both parents, with primary residential custody to the father. Accordingly, the child, who was born in 2000, and had resided with his mother in New York since his birth, moved to California in September 2009 to live with his father. After moving to California with the father, the child was diagnosed by a psychologist in California with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, oppositional defiant disorder, post-traumatic stress disorder and, possibly, a bipolar disorder. The child received treatment from healthcare providers in California, and was not permitted to travel until his condition was stabilized. The child had not returned to New York since moving to California. In December 2009 the mother filed a cross petition in the Family Court, to modify the prior order of custody so as to award her sole custody of the child, in which she alleged that the father had falsely accused her of abusing the child. In January 2010 the father separately cross-petitioned to modify the prior custody order so as to award him sole custody of the child. Subsequently, in May 2010, while both cross petitions were pending, the father moved, inter alia, to dismiss the mother's cross petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. After a hearing on the issue of jurisdiction, the Family Court granted that branch of the father's motion which was to dismiss the mother's cross petition on that ground. The Family Court did not address the father's separate cross petition. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Family Court correctly determined that it lacked exclusive, continuing jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-a(1), since neither the child nor the father maintained a significant connection with New York, and substantial evidence regarding the child's present and future welfare was no longer available in this State (Domestic Relations Law 76-a[1][a]). However, the Family Court had jurisdiction to hear the mother's cross petition for modification pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-a(2) since it would have had jurisdiction for an initial child custody determination under Domestic Relations Law 76(1)(a). New York was the child's "home state" within the six months immediately preceding the commencement of this proceeding, and the mother continued to reside in this State. The matter was be remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings on the cross petitions.

New York Does Not Have Subject Matter Jurisdiction Where it Is Not State in Which Child Lived for at Least Six Consecutive Months Before Commencement of Custody Proceeding

In Jablonsky-Urso v Urso, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4600550 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly granted the father's motion to dismiss the mother's petition for custody of the parties' son for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Domestic Relations Law 75-a (7) defines a child's home state as "the state in which a child lived with a parent ... for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding". Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, "[h]ome state jurisdiction is paramount and whether to accept jurisdiction is a home state prerogative" (Matter of Navarrete v. Wyatt, 52 A.D.3d at 836, 861 N.Y.S.2d 393). Here, the Family Court properly determined that New York was not the child's home state and, therefore, that New York did not have jurisdiction over this custody dispute (see Domestic Relations Law 76). However, it held that the Family Court erred in refusing to exercise temporary emergency jurisdiction over the family offense petition (see Domestic Relations Law 76-c) and in summarily dismissing the family offense petition upon its finding that the allegations contained in the mother's family offense petition were insufficient to sustain a family offense. The determination of whether a family offense was committed is a factual issue to be resolved by the hearing court and the allegations asserted in a petition seeking the issuance of an order of protection must be supported by a fair preponderance of the evidence. The Family Court improperly determined that the mother failed to demonstrate that the father possessed the intent required to sustain any of the family offenses alleged in the petition, as it did so without the benefit of a hearing. Based on the foregoing, that branch of the father's motion which was to dismiss the family offense petition had to be denied and the matter remitted to the Family Court, for a fact-finding hearing and a determination of the family offense petition with respect to the allegations contained therein.

Supreme Court Properly Declined to Imply a Term Which the Parties Did Not Insert into Their Stipulation, for the Purpose of Determining the Contempt Motion. Court Has Discretion to Decide If it Will Consider New Argument in Reply Papers.

In Penavic v Penavic, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4600442 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff moved, pursuant to Judiciary Law 756 to hold the defendant in civil contempt. Supreme Court denied the motion. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that to prevail on a motion to punish a party for civil contempt, the movant must demonstrate that the party charged with contempt willfully violated a clear and unequivocal mandate of a court's order, with knowledge of that order's terms, thereby prejudicing the movant's rights. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying her motion to hold the defendant in contempt for failing to remove her name from a home equity line of credit (HELOC) or closing it. While the plaintiff was aware of the HELOC at the time that she executed the stipulation, no provision was included in the stipulation requiring that her name be removed from it or that it be closed, even though the defendant was precluded from continuing to use the HELOC pursuant to the provision which prohibited him from incurring additional debt upon the plaintiff's credit. Since the terms of the stipulation with respect to whether the HELOC had to be closed were unambiguous, the Supreme Court properly declined to imply a term which the parties did not insert into the stipulation, for the purpose of determining the contempt motion. The plaintiff raised, for the first time in her reply papers, the argument that the defendant was also in contempt of the judgment by increasing the balance of the HELOC from $25,000, the amount of the balance at the time that the parties executed the stipulation, to $750,000, which he disclosed in his affidavit opposing the plaintiff's motion. The Appellate Division held that it was within the Supreme Court's discretion to decide if it would consider this new argument. Inasmuch as the plaintiff did not address this provision in her motion papers and relied solely upon the provisions concerning the acknowledgment that the bills or accounts for the former marital residence were solely in the husband's individual name as the basis for her motion, Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion to disregard that argument in connection with the motion before it (citing Matter of Allstate Ins. Co. v. Dawkins, 52 AD3d 826, 827).

Authors Note: In Matter of Allstate Ins. Co. v. Dawkins, the Appellate Division said: "The function of reply papers is to address arguments made in opposition to the position taken by the movant, not to permit the movant to introduce new arguments or new grounds for the requested relief (see Matter of Harleysville Ins. Co. v. Rosario, 17 AD3d 677 [2005]; Matter of TIG Ins. Co. v. Pellegrini, 258 AD2d 658 [1999]). Further, Dawkins was not afforded an opportunity to address the new argument (see Matter of Harleysville Ins. Co. v. Rosario, 17 AD3d 677 [2005]; Matter of TIG Ins. Co. v. Pellegrini, 258 AD2d 658 [1999])."

Maintenance Award Should Not Provide for an Automatic Increase upon the Prospective Emancipation of Each of Parties' Children

In O'Brien v O'Brien, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4839062 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Supreme Court found that the plaintiff former wife had an annual income of $33,262 from all sources, and the defendant former husband had an annual income of $115,747 from all sources. The parties were divorced by judgment dated November 30, 2009. In addition to child support of $2,625 per month, plus support arrears, the Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff maintenance in the amount of $1,375 per month over a period of 10 years, to increase as each of the parties' six children becomes emancipated, so that the plaintiff would receive the total sum of $4,000 per month in combined child support and maintenance for a period of 10 years, plus maintenance arrears. The Supreme Court also awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee in the amount of $10,000. The plaintiff was to remain in the marital residence and pay all carrying costs.

The Appellate Division pointed out that the awards of child support, maintenance, arrears, and an attorney's fee were based upon the Supreme Court's calculation of the parties' respective incomes. It found that Supreme Court made a mathematical error in calculating the plaintiff's income. The numbers reflecting the various components of the plaintiff's annual income, as set forth by the Supreme Court in its decision, added up to a total of $54,163, not $33,262, as erroneously stated by the Supreme Court. It pointed out that a court has the inherent power to relieve a party from judgments taken through mistake or inadvertence in the interest of justice, and directed that the awards of child support, maintenance, arrears, and an attorney's fee had to be recalculated based on the correct figures. It also found that with respect to one of the components of the defendant's annual income, the Supreme Court attributed an incorrect amount. Three of the components were supported by the record. However, the record did not support the Supreme Court's calculation and imputation of $15,376 in annual benefits from the defendant's employer for use of an automobile and cell phone, along with the employer's payment of expenses attributable to the use of those items. It observed that Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(b)(5)(iv)(B) provides that the Supreme Court may, in its discretion, "attribute or impute income from ... automobiles or other perquisites that are provided as part of compensation for employment to the extent [they] constitute expenditures for personal use, or ... directly or indirectly confer personal economic benefits." Here, although the defendant's employer expended the sum of $15,376 in 2007 for the defendant's use of an automobile and cell phone and related expenses, the amount attributable to income was considerably smaller in light of the defendant's testimony that only 10% of his use of the automobile, and only a "portion" of his use of the cell phone, were personal uses.

The Appellate Division observed that upon remittal for recalculation, the discrepancy between the parties' incomes would necessarily be smaller than previously calculated, and, the defendant's pro rata share of the basic child support obligation had to be recalculated. It also directed that upon remittal, the Supreme Court had to recalculate the award of maintenance based upon factors including the parties' respective incomes as recalculated, their pre-divorce standard of living, and the financial resources of each, considered separately, balancing the plaintiff's needs with the defendant's ability to pay. The Appellate Division held that the maintenance award should not provide for an automatic increase upon the prospective emancipation of each of the parties' children. Maintenance is designed to give the spouse economic independence and should continue only as long as necessary to render the recipient self-supporting. The award should meet the recipient spouse's reasonable needs while providing an appropriate incentive for the recipient to become financially independent. The amount of the maintenance award is a discretionary determination based upon a number of interrelated facts then in existence; unless a future event is imminent and measurable, an award of maintenance should not include a provision for increase or decrease upon the happening of a particular future event. Here, the provision for automatic increase of maintenance upon the emancipation of each of the parties' children ignored other factors which may come into existence at the time of each child's emancipation. Therefore, the parties' changing needs are best addressed in a future application for modification of the amount of maintenance. The Appellate Division found, based upon the apparent discrepancy between the parties' income and other circumstances, that Supreme Court did not improvidently award the plaintiff an attorney's fee. However, the amount of the award was premised upon an erroneous calculation of the parties' respective incomes. It directed that upon remittal, the Supreme Court should recalculate an appropriate award to the plaintiff of an attorney's fee.

Deprivation of Right to Counsel In a Custody or Visitation Proceeding is Denial of a Fundamental Right Which Requires Reversal

In Matter of Rosof v Mallory, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4839081 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) at the commencement of a hearing to determine whether the father should have only supervised visitation with his daughter, the father's attorney asked to be relieved, and the father consented to her discharge. The father asked that new counsel be appointed, but the Family Court declined to do so, and the father represented himself. The Appellate Division held that the father, as a respondent in a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 6, had the right to be represented by counsel. To determine whether a party is validly waiving the right to counsel, the court must conduct a "searching inquiry" in order to be reasonably certain that the party understands the dangers and disadvantages of giving up the fundamental right to counsel. Here, the Family Court conducted no inquiry at all to determine whether the father was waiving the right to counsel. Requiring the father to try the matter without the benefit of counsel impermissibly placed the Family Court's interest in preventing delay above the interests of the parents and the child, and violated the father's right to be represented by counsel. The deprivation of a party's fundamental right to counsel in a custody or visitation proceeding is a denial of due process which requires reversal, regardless of the merits of the unrepresented party's position. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a new hearing on the mother's petition and a new determination.

Supreme Court Finds No Basis for a Presumption That a Parent's Obligation to Pay for College Is to Be Limited to the Cost of a Suny Education Unless Proven Otherwise

In Pamela T v Marc B., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4861584 (N.Y.Sup.) the Supreme Court concluded that the proposition that before a parent can be compelled to contribute towards the cost of a private college there must be a showing that a child cannot receive an adequate education at a state college is a doctrine that in many cases is harmful to the children of divorced parents, acts to discriminate against them, and is largely unworkable. The parties were divorced on December 23, 2008. They had two sons, one who was 18 and one who was 16. The judgment of divorce incorporated a custody agreement and a stipulation of settlement by which the parties had resolved all issues of the divorce except for those concerning child support. No mention was made in either the decision, the custody agreement or the stipulation of settlement as to the payment of the children's college tuition and expenses. In 2007, the elder child was diagnosed with "moderate emotional difficulty" and learning/anxiety disorders, which necessitated certain educational accommodations. Despite this diagnosis, he graduated in 2011 from Beacon High School, a selective public high school in Manhattan. He was accepted at Syracuse University, SUNY Binghamton and SUNY Buffalo, along with a number of other schools. Syracuse, which awarded him $3,000 in financial aid, cost approximately $53,000 a year to attend as an undergraduate, while SUNY Binghamton and SUNY Buffalo cost only about $18,000 a year. Although the child visited Binghamton and gave serious consideration to going there, he ultimately decided to attend Syracuse. He was now a freshman there studying computer engineering and computer graphics. The parties were both practicing attorneys in New York City. Plaintiff worked for the Metropolitan Transit Authority Inspector General's Office and defendant was self-employed as a solo practitioner. Plaintiff's 2010 federal income tax return reported adjusted gross income of $109,896. Defendant's 2010 federal income tax return reported adjusted gross income of $105,135. Plaintiff's net worth statement showed she had assets of approximately $1,230,000.

Defendant's net worth statement showed he had approximately $580,000. Both plaintiff and defendant went to private undergraduate colleges and law schools, with plaintiff graduating from Northwestern University and New York University School of Law, and defendant graduating from Columbia University and Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law.

Defendant did not oppose an order directing him to contribute to his older child's college education, but he asked the court to apply the SUNY cap and limit his responsibility to a percentage of the costs of a state university education rather than to a percentage of a private college education. Defendant's position was based on his claim that he was unable to meet the financial demands of paying for private college and on his belief that his son could receive as good an education at SUNY Binghamton as he could at Syracuse.

Supreme Court observed that Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(c)(7) conferred upon the courts of this state the authority to "direct a parent to contribute to a child's private college education, even in the absence of special circumstances or a voluntary agreement. The statute provides that when a court exercises its discretion to direct such a contribution from a parent, it is to do so "having regard for the circumstances of the case and the parties, the best interests of the child, and the requirements of justice." Case law augmented the provisions of DRL 240(1-b)(c)(7) by setting forth specific factors that are to be considered in determining whether to award college expenses. These factors include the educational background of the parents and their financial ability to provide the necessary funds, the child's academic ability and endeavors, and the type of college that would be most suitable for the child. (See Rosado v. Hughes, 23 AD3d 318 (1st Dept 2005); Naylor v. Gastler, 48 AD3d 951 (3d Dept 2008); Reiss v. Reiss, 56 AD3d 1293 (4th Dept 2008).

The Court observed that DRL 240(1-b)(c)(7) does not provide for is a SUNY cap. The SUNY cap is a concept that has been judicially created by way of a string of decisions rendered since the enactment of the statute. The problem with these cases was that they provided little in the way of instruction as to when a SUNY cap might be properly applied over the objection of the parent who is seeking an award for college expenses. The Supreme Court found that Berliner v. Berliner, 33 AD3d 745, 749 (2d Dept 2006) was instructive because the Second Department's statement that there "is no basis in this record" for imposing the SUNY cap implied that the burden falls on the proponent of the cap to demonstrate that it is warranted. The inference to be drawn is that there is no presumption that a parent's obligation to pay for college is to be limited to the cost of a SUNY education unless proven otherwise; if anything, the presumption goes the other direction. It was also instructive because the decision's reference to the "so-called SUNY cap" can be seen as an indication that even the Second Department views the SUNY cap as something less than an established doctrine firmly ensconced in the fabric of family law.

Supreme Court rejected defendant's argument that plaintiff be required to prove that Syracuse was a better school than SUNY Binghamton in order for him to be required to pay Syracuse's higher expenses. He noted that it is difficult to conceive of a workable procedure, let alone a methodology, for a court to make a finding that one college is "better" than another. He stated that the real issue is what college or university is the best for the individual child in question in the ways that matter most to that particular child. The Court found that it had been shown that there was ample reason to support the child's choice of Syracuse, irrespective of whether it is ranked lower, higher or the same as SUNY Binghamton or any other SUNY school. Provided that the funds are available to finance the child's education, the fact that Syracuse was a private school and cost more than a public school was not a reason to interfere with the child going to the school he chose and he wanted to attend. This was particularly so in light of the fact that both his parents went to private colleges. One of the factors to be considered when making a determination under DRL 240(1-b)(c)(7) is the parents educational background. Inasmuch as plaintiff attended Northwestern and defendant attended Columbia, it could reasonably be assumed that there would exist an expectation in the family, and in the child himself, that he too could attend a private college.

Having found that the child's academic ability and endeavors, the type of college that would be most suitable for him, and the educational background of the parents were all factors that called for plaintiff to contribute to his son's education at Syracuse University, the court had to consider the defendant's ability to pay. It was defendant's position that even though plaintiff may have the means to pay the high cost of their son attending Syracuse, he lacked the means to do so. Consequently, he contended that he should have to pay no more than $9,000 a year towards his son's education, an amount that is roughly 50% of the present annual cost of a SUNY school.

The court rejected defendant's contention as to his inability to pay a significant share of the child's actual educational expenses being incurred at Syracuse. It was true that plaintiff has considerable more savings than defendant and that she had a pension plan through her employment. But it was equally true that defendant's net income the past year was over $100,000, which was only about $5,000 less than plaintiff's net income for the same period, and that he benefitted from the substantial tax deductions and write offs that come from being self-employed. Also, defendant, although remarried for a number of years, had chosen to keep a second apartment in addition to the residence he shared with his new wife. Defendant had paid and continued to pay a very small amount in basic child support and child support add-ons. If defendant's child support obligation were to be recalculated using his 2010 income, it would be far higher than the $686 monthly that he paid.

Supreme Court held that there was no basis to impose the SUNY cap, to the extent that it should be imposed at all, where the party seeking to invoke the cap has the financial ability to contribute towards the actual amount of his or her child's college expenses. (Citing R.E. v. S.E., 27 Misc.3d 1216(A); Bonnie B. v. Michael B., 6 Misc.3d 1004(A), 2004 WL 3050804 (Sup Ct, Suffolk County 2004). It found that the defendant had the income and the assets, as well as the ability to keep producing substantial income through his law practice, to make a significant contribution to his sons's college education. Although defendant's contribution should be less than plaintiff's, based on the difference between their net assets, and in particular what each of them had available for eventual retirement, that contribution should not be subject to some artificial construct like the SUNY cap. Rather, it should be based, as with all other child support obligations, on the respective finances of the parties. On this basis, the court concluded that defendant shall be obligated to contribute 40% of the total cost of the elder child attending Syracuse University, with those costs to include tuition, room and board, fees and books.

The Court observed that it has the discretion to direct parents to pay the costs of their children's college expenses when the separation agreement or other stipulation between the parents is silent in this respect. However, such a directive is premature when college is several years away, the choice of college and the cost of tuition are uncertain, and the child's academic interests and abilities are not supported by evidence. (Citing Gilkes v. Gilkes, 150 A.D.2d 200, 201 (1st Dept 1989); see also LaBombardi v. LaBombardi, 220 A.D.2d 642, 644 (2d Dept 1995). Here, college was more than a year and a half away for the younger child. It was therefore premature and unduly speculative to attempt to assess what the child's plans are with regard to college and the what the costs will be. As a result, plaintiff's application for this relief was denied without prejudice to renew at a subsequent date when the child has committed to attend college and the costs of attendance are supported by evidence.

First Department Establishes Rules Related to Obligation of Nonparty to Produce Electronically Stored Information Deleted Through Normal Business Operations

In Tener v Cremer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4389170 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department addressed the obligation of a nonparty to produce electronically stored information (ESI) deleted through normal business operations. The action underlying this discovery dispute concerned a statement about plaintiff that someone posted on a website known as Vitals.com on April 12, 2009. Plaintiff claimed this statement defamed her. Plaintiff claimed that through discovery she managed to trace the Internet protocol (IP) address of the computer from which the allegedly defamatory post originated "to a computer in the custody and control of New York University." This computer had accessed the Internet through a portal located at Bellevue Medical Center and registered to nonparty New York University Langone Medical Center. According to NYU's Chief Information Security Officer, NYU had installed the Internet portal at Bellevue for the convenience of its residents who trained there. The portal is a network address translation (NAT) portal that is essentially a switchboard through which a person can access the Internet. While only NYU personnel with proper security codes can gain access to NYU's computer system and medical records, anyone using a computer plugged into an ethernet outlet at Bellevue can access other web sites through the NYU portal. On April 30, 2010, plaintiff served a subpoena on NYU seeking the identity of all persons who accessed the Internet on April 12, 2009, via the IP address plaintiff previously identified. With the subpoena, plaintiff served a preservation letter advising NYU that the identity of the person who posted the remarks was at issue and that NYU should halt any normal business practices that would destroy that information. When NYU did not produce the information, plaintiff moved for contempt. In opposition to plaintiff's contempt motion, NYU's Chief Information Security Officer stated that "[c]omputers that simply access the web through NYU's portal appear as a text file listing that is automatically written over every 30 days. NYU does not possess the technological capability or software, if such exists, to retrieve a text file created more than a year ago and 'written over' at least 12 times." Plaintiff, in reply, submitted an affidavit from a forensic computer expert opining that NYU could still access the information using software designed to retrieve deleted information. The expert stated that "the term 'written over' is deceptive" because what really occurs is that " 'old' information or data is typically allocated to 'free space' within the system." Plaintiff's expert suggested using "X-Rays Forensic" or "Sleuth Kit" to retrieve the information from unallocated space. Supreme Court denied the contempt motion in part because it found that NYU did not have the ability to produce the materials plaintiff demanded and that "this allegation is unrefuted as a reply affidavit contradicting such allegation has not been supplied." The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court was incorrect. In its papers in opposition to the motion, NYU offered no evidence that it made any effort at all to access the data, apparently because it believed it could not, as a nonparty, be required to install forensic software on its system. However, the cases that NYU cites to support its assertion that it need not install forensic software were outdated. The most recent was from 1993, nearly 20 years ago (see Carrick Realty Corp. v. Flores, 157 Misc.2d 868, 598 N.Y.S.2d 903 (Civ Ct, New York County 1993)). Thus, there were several unanswered questions regarding NYU's ability to produce the requested documents.

The Appellate Division held that the party moving for civil contempt arising out of noncompliance with a subpoena duces tecum bears the burden of establishing, by clear and convincing evidence, that the subpoena has been violated and that "the party from whom the documents were sought had the ability to produce them" (Yalkowsky v. Yalkowsky, 93 A.D.2d 834, 835 [1983]; see also Gray v. Giarrizzo, 47 A.D.3d 765, 766 [2008]). In this day and age the discovery of ESI is commonplace. Although the CPLR is silent on the topic, the Uniform Rules of the Trial Courts and several courts have addressed the discovery of ESI and have provided working guidelines that are useful to judges and practitioners. The Commercial Division for Supreme Court, Nassau County publishes in depth guidelines for the discovery of ESI (the Nassau Guidelines). While aimed at parties, the Nassau Guidelines are appropriate in cases, such as this, where a nonparty's data is at issue. ESI is difficult to destroy permanently. Deletion usually only makes the data more difficult to access. Based on the specific facts of this case, the Court found that the Nassau Guidelines provided a practical approach. To exempt inaccessible data presumptively from discovery might encourage quick deletion as a matter of corporate policy, well before the spectre of litigation is on the horizon and the duty to preserve it attaches. A cost/benefit analysis, as the Nassau Guidelines provide, does not encourage data destruction because discovery could take place regardless. Plaintiff had variously described the information it seeks as stored in a "cache" file, as "unallocated" data or somewhere in backup data. Data from these sources is difficult to access. But, plaintiff's only chance to confirm the identity of the person who allegedly defamed her may lie with NYU. Thus, plaintiff thus demonstrated "good cause" necessitating a cost/benefit analysis to determine whether the needs of the case warrant retrieval of the data.

As the record was insufficient to permit the court to undertake a cost/benefit analysis it remanded to Supreme Court for a hearing to determine at least: (1) whether the identifying information was written over, as NYU maintained, or whether it is somewhere else, such as in unallocated space as a text file; (2) whether the retrieval software plaintiff suggested can actually obtain the data; (3) whether the data will identify actual persons who used the internet on April 12, 2009 via the IP address plaintiff identified; (4) which of those persons accessed Vitals.com and (5) a budget for the cost of the data retrieval, including line item(s) correlating the cost to NYU for the disruption. It observed that some of these questions (particularly [1] and [2]) may involve credibility determinations. Until the court has this minimum information, it cannot assess "the burden and expense of recovering and producing the ESI and the relative need for the data" (Nassau Guidelines) and concomitantly whether the data is so "inaccessible" that NYU does not have the ability to comply with the subpoena. That NYU is a nonparty should also figure into the equation. In the event the data is retrievable without undue burden or cost, the court should give NYU a reasonable time to comply with the subpoena.

Supreme Court May Not Determine Whether the Marriage Is Irretrievably Broken until All Ancillary Issues Are Resolved.

In Schiffer v Schiffer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4790060 (N.Y.Sup.) plaintiff husband moved for an order directing that summary judgment be granted in his favor of divorce under Domestic Relations Law 170 (7). The defendant wife opposed the application and cross-moved for summary judgment dismissing the complaint. The parties were married in Massachusetts on March 25, 1990 and had three unemancipated children of the marriage. On November 29, 2010, Mr. Schiffer commenced the action for divorce, claiming irretrievable breakdown of the marriage for a period of more than six months prior to the commencement of the action. On December 21, 2010, Mrs. Schiffer served her verified answer, contesting these allegations, specifically claiming that Mr. Schiffer's actions belied his claims that the marriage was irretrievably broken. The Supreme Court observed that Domestic Relations Law § 170 [7] allows parties to seek a judgment of divorce when "the relationship between the husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months, provided that one party has so stated under oath" also provides that "no judgment of divorce shall be granted under this subdivision unless and until the economic issues of equitable distribution of marital property, the payment or waiver of spousal support, the payment of child support, the payment of counsel and experts' fees and expenses as well as the custody and visitation with the infant children of the marriage have been resolved by the parties, or determined by the court and incorporated into this judgment of divorce" .

The Supreme Court agreed with the wife's argument that the husband was not entitled to summary judgment since no judgment of divorce can be made unless and until the economic and custodial issues are determined or resolved by the parties. The statute clearly states that a judgment may only be granted after economic and custodial issues were resolved. In this case, all of the conditions of the statute had not been met since the economic and custodial issues were yet to be addressed. Mr. Schiffer had failed to meet his prima facie burden, and his motion for summary judgment was denied.

Mrs. Schiffer's motion for summary judgment was also denied, but for a different reason. Supreme Court observed that in Strack v. Strack (31 Misc.3d 258 [Sup Ct, Essex County 2011]), Justice Muller held that the "determination of whether a breakdown of a marriage is irretrievable is a question to be determined by the finder of fact." This holding demonstrably agreed with fundamental concepts of due process and comported with similar interpretations of no-fault statutes from our sister states. Since the sole means of procuring a divorce in New York is by judicial process (N.Y. Const, art I, s 9), precluding a party from contesting a ground for divorce "must be regarded as the equivalent of denying [him or her] an opportunity to be heard ...and in the absence of a sufficient countervailing justification for the State's action, a denial of due process". A contrary finding would merely reduce the court to a rubber stamp whenever presented with an action for divorce under Domestic Relations Law 170 (7). While Mrs. Schiffer had established that the ancillary issues were not resolved and that her marriage to Mr. Schiffer had not broken down irretrievably, Mr. Schiffer raised a triable issue of fact that the marriage was irretrievably broken for at least six months. The proof bared by the parties sufficed to establish a true issue of fact as to whether this marriage was irretrievably broken, which the finder of fact would undoubtedly resolve after the other issues were resolved.

Family Court Finds Irrebuttable Presumption of Unfitness in SSL 378-a(2)(e)(1) and 378-a(2)(h) Violates Due Process Clauses of the New York State and United States Constitutions

In the Matter of the Adoption of Abel,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4436127 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.), Cheryl and Derrick Adamson filed a petition to adopt Abel. Abel was born on August 9, 2004. Since September 22, 2004 when Abel was discharged from the hospital, on the basis of a petition that had been filed alleging that his biological mother had neglected him, Abel resided in the home of his maternal cousin, Cheryl Adamson, and her husband, Derrick Adamson. On April 20, 2009, the court terminated Abel's biological mother's parental rights.. The evidence submitted provided incontrovertible support for the proposition that it was in Abel's best interest to be adopted by the Adamsons and clearly militated in favor of this court approving the Adamsons' petition to adopt Abel. Mr. Adamson's criminal history, however, created an issue as to whether there existed a statutory bar to such approval. Mr. Adamson had a 1987 Washington D.C. conviction for simple assault and a 1992 Kings County (New York State) conviction for Robbery in the Third Degree. On November 24, 2009, pursuant to Social Services Law 378-a(2)(h), New York Foundling conducted a safety assessment of the conditions of the Adamson household. Based on the remoteness in time of his criminal convictions and the fact that in the years since the 1992 robbery conviction, Mr. Adamson had reformed his behavior and has led a productive life, the safety assessment reported that Mr. Adamson did not pose a safety concern to Abel. The assessment concluded that because "Mr. Adamson has been the sole father figure in Abel's life, [New York Foundling] strongly believes that it is in the best interest of the child to be adopted by Mr. and Mrs. Adamson."

In order to gain further understanding of the facts underlying Mr. Adamson's 1992 robbery conviction, the court obtained the criminal court complaint and a transcript of Mr. Adamson's guilty plea. The criminal complaint alleged that on November 27, 1991, in Kings County, Mr. Adamson hit the victim with an unknown blunt object about his head and face and took a bag containing money that the victim had been carrying. The blows allegedly knocked out the victim's front teeth, caused his nose to bleed, and resulted in his sustaining a separated shoulder. On February 3, 1992, having been promised a sentence of one and one-third to four years imprisonment, Mr. Adamson pled guilty to one count of Robbery in the Third Degree and admitted that, on November 27, 1991, when the owner of a store came out [of the store], he hit him, caused him to fall, took his bag containing money, and fled. The Family Court observed that prior to the 2008 amendment of SSL 378-a(2)(e), the court would have found that Mr. Adamson's 1992 robbery conviction did not automatically disqualify him from adopting Abel because denial of Mr. and Mrs. Adamson's petition to adopt would have created an unreasonable risk of harm to Abel's mental health and granting said petition would have been in Abel's best interest and would not have placed his safety in jeopardy. However, in 2008, in order to comply with the federal Adam Walsh Child Protection Act of 2006, see Public Law 109-248, New York State eliminated the language in SSL 378--a which only presumptively disqualified from becoming foster or adoptive parents those who had been convicted of certain felonies, and by doing so made automatic the disqualification of those prospective foster or adoptive parents who had been convicted of certain felonies. The Court held that Mr. Adamson's conviction in 1992 for Robbery in the Third Degree fell within the category of convictions which would automatically disqualify him from adopting Abel. SSL 378-a(2)(e)(1)(A) reads, in pertinent part, "an application for certification or approval of a prospective foster parent or prospective adoptive parent shall be denied where a criminal history record of the prospective foster parent or prospective adoptive parent reveals a conviction for: (A) a felony conviction at any time involving: (i) child abuse or neglect; (ii) spousal abuse; (iii) a crime against a child, including child pornography; or (iv) a crime involving violence, including rape, sexual assault, or homicide, other than a crime involving physical assault or battery. See also 18 NYCRR 421.27(d)(1); 42 USCA 671(a)(20)(A)(I); 45 C.F.R. 1356.30(b)(4). Since assault was specifically excluded from the above-cited provision and since Mr. Adamson's assault conviction was both a misdemeanor and occurred over five years ago, there was no doubt that, unlike the robbery conviction, the assault conviction fell within the category of convictions for which the court had discretion to approve or deny the petition to adopt. See SSL 378-a(2)(e)(3(A). Because robbery was not specifically mentioned in this provision, the court, therefore, found that Mr. Adamson's 1992 robbery conviction constituted a "crime involving violence. The fact that robbery is not specifically included in Social Services Law 378-a(2)(e)(1)(A)(iv) is not dispositive. Although this provision specifically includes rape, sexual assault and homicide and specifically excludes assault as crimes involving violence, there is nothing in either the legislative history of this provision or the state or federal regulations promulgated thereunder that would indicate that the listed crimes are exhaustive, and not merely illustrative, of crimes involving violence.

It was beyond cavil that Mr. Adamson had rehabilitated himself and that removal of Abel from this home would have a devastating impact upon Abel. Under the circumstances of this case, it was clear that to follow the strict mandate of the statute and deny Mr. and Mrs. Adamson's petition to adopt Abel and to remove Abel from the home of his maternal cousin and her husband-the only home he has ever known-based solely upon Mr. Adamson's 1992 robbery conviction, would deprive both Abel and the Adamsons of their due process right to an individualized determination of whether this adoption is in Abel's best interest. That right, to a case-specific determination, was firmly established almost forty years ago in Stanley v. Illinois, 605 U.S. 645(1972) when the United States Supreme Court struck down as violative of the Fourteenth Amendment, Illinois' irrebuttable statutory presumption that all unmarried fathers are unqualified to raise their children. The Court held that a hearing was required by the due process clause, upon the death of the mother and prior to the removal of the children, to determine whether the father was fit to raise the children. In so ruling, the Court opined, "procedure by [irrebuttable] presumption is always cheaper and easier than individualized determination. But when ... the procedure forecloses the determinative issues of competence and care, when it explicitly disdains present realities in deference to fast formalities, it needlessly risks running roughshod over the important interests of both parent and child ... [and] therefore cannot stand." Based upon the due process clauses of the New York State and United States Constitutions, this court found that SSL 378-a(2)(e)(1) and 378-a(2)(h), as applied to the facts of this matter, violated Mr. and Mrs. Adamson's and Abel's right to a determination, based on the totality of the circumstances, as to whether the adoption of Abel by the Adamsons is in Abel's best interest. The court examined the totality of the circumstances presented and notwithstanding Mr. Adamson's criminal past, held that it was in Abel's best interest to be adopted by Mr. and Mrs. Adamson and granted the petition.

A Court May Not Delegate to a Parenting Coordinator the Authority to Resolve Issues Affecting the Best Interests of the Children

In Silbowitz v Silbowitz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4599852 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which, in effect, granted the defendant former husband's motion to appoint a parenting coordinator to assist the parties in implementing the terms of their existing child custody and visitation arrangement provided for in the parties' stipulation dated October 22, 2007. It observed that although a court may properly appoint a parenting coordinator to mediate between parties and oversee the implementation of their court-ordered parenting plan a court may not delegate to a parenting coordinator the authority to resolve issues affecting the best interests of the children. Here, despite the expansive scope of the issues entrusted to the parenting coordinator by the Supreme Court's order, his power was properly limited to implementing the terms of the existing child custody and visitation arrangement provided for in the parties' stipulation dated October 22, 2007, subject to the Supreme Court's oversight. Although the parenting coordinator was empowered to issue a written decision resolving a conflict where he was unable to broker an agreement between the parties, the Supreme Court's order also provided that the parties may seek to have the parenting coordinator's decision so-ordered by the Supreme Court and that they "retain their right to return to Court and seek a modification of their parenting plan at any time." Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly limited the role of the parenting coordinator and properly provided that his resolutions remained subject to court oversight. The plaintiff also contended that the order insufficiently protected the confidential and privileged information of the parties and the children because it required the parties to execute authorizations and releases allowing the parenting coordinator to obtain information which was otherwise confidential or privileged. However, the order required that the parenting coordinator maintain the confidentiality of the information and when read as a whole, clearly limited his authority to request authorizations or releases and use information only in furtherance of his duty to mediate between the parties in the implementation of their parenting plan. Accordingly, no further limitation was necessary.

Court May Not Order a Parent Undergo Counseling or Treatment as a Condition of Future Visitation or Re-application for Visitation Rights but May Direct a Party to Submit to a Mental Health Evaluation for Use in Any Future Determination of Visitation.

In Matter of Smith ex rel Hunter v Dawn F.B., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4600469 (2d Dept 2011) Family Court granted the petition of the attorney for the child alleging that the mother violated an order of custody and visitation, prohibited her from having any contact with her son, directed that she submit to a mental health evaluation, directed her to follow treatment recommendations resulting from that evaluation, and conditioned her application for resumption of visitation upon her compliance with treatment, including medication, recommended by a mental health professional.

The Appellate Division modified the order by deleting the provision conditioning the mother's application for resumption of visitation upon her compliance with treatment, including medication, recommended by a mental health professional. It found that Family Court's determination that it was in the child's best interest to suspend supervised visitation and prohibit all contact with the mother had a sound and substantial basis in the record. The mother, by her own admission, violated the express terms of the Family Court's previous order, which only permitted visitation supervised by designated individuals, by having unsupervised contact with the child at two separate little league baseball games. Moreover, the mother contributed to certain events at a recent therapeutic visit which adversely affected the child and undermined the progress of the therapeutic visitation. The Appellate Division pointed out that a court may not order that a parent undergo counseling or treatment as a condition of future visitation or re-application for visitation rights, but may only direct a party to submit to counseling or treatment as a component of visitation. Here, the Family Court improperly conditioned the mother's application for resumption of visitation upon her compliance with treatment, including medication, recommended by a mental health professional. However, the Family Court properly directed the mother to submit to a mental health evaluation for use in any future determination of visitation.

Method of Service Provided for in Order to Show Cause Is Jurisdictional

In Matter of Sharma v New, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4389744 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), in March 2010 the mother filed a petition and order to show cause to modify the overnight visitation provisions contained in an order dated January 14, 2010, alleging that the father violated that order by taking the subject child "to a different hotel than the one ... which he informed [the social worker] he would be using." In an order dated July 9, 2010, the Family Court, inter alia, granted the mother's petition so as to suspend the father's overnight visitation. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that the method of service provided for in an order to show cause is jurisdictional in nature and must be strictly complied with. Moreover, where the court orders service by a particular date, all components of service must be accomplished by that date. Here, the record did not contain any evidence establishing that the father was properly or timely served in compliance with the provisions of the order to show cause. Moreover, contrary to the contention of the attorney for the child, the father asserted the defense of lack of personal jurisdiction in his answer and did not waive the defense (see CPLR 3211[e]). Since personal jurisdiction was not obtained, the Family Court should have dismissed the proceeding.

Father Did Not Implicitly Consent to Referee by Merely Participating in Custody Proceeding. Referee Had No Jurisdiction

In Gale v Gale, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4090031 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law and remitted for a new hearing, an order of the Family Court which, after a hearing, granted the mother's petition to modify the custody provisions of a judgment of divorce so as to award her sole custody of the parties' children, and denied the father's petitions for sole custody of the children. It pointed out that a referee derives authority from an order of reference by the court (see CPLR 4311), which can be made only upon the consent of the parties, except in limited circumstances not applicable here. It found that the parties did not stipulate to a reference in the manner prescribed by CPLR 2104. In any event, there was no indication that there was an order of reference designating the referee who heard and determined the petitions at issue here. It observed that contrary to the mother's contention, the father did not implicitly consent to the reference merely by participating in the proceeding without expressing his desire to have the matter tried before a judge (see McCormack v. McCormack, 174 A.D.2d at 613). The Court held that "...to the extent that certain dicta in Chalu v. Tov-Le Realty Corp. (220 A.D.2d 552, 553) may suggest a different conclusion, it is not to be followed." Furthermore, a stipulation consenting to a reference to a specified referee, executed by the parties in connection with the father's previous petition to modify the visitation schedule, expired upon completion of that matter and did not remain in effect for this matter. Accordingly, the referee had no jurisdiction to consider the father's petitions related to custody and visitation and the mother's petition to modify custody, and the referee's order determining those petitions had to be reversed.

Mootness Doctrine Explained By Second Department in Opinion Dismissing Visitation Appeal as Academic

In Matter of Cisse v Graham, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4090037 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother, who was Muslim, and the father, who was Roman Catholic, had one child together, a daughter born on March 24, 2001. In an order dated June 30, 2004 Family Court awarded custody of the child to the mother and visitation to the father, with such visitation to occur pursuant to a stipulation signed by the parties. In a separate order, also dated June 30, 2004, made pursuant to the aforementioned stipulation, the Family Court provided, among other things, that the child was "to be exposed to the Catholic traditions and Muslim traditions." In an order dated August 31, 2005, the parties stipulated to the father having additional visitation time in 2005. Subsequently, the mother filed a petition, in effect, to modify the visitation provisions of the aforementioned orders and the father filed a petition to modify the custody order by awarding him custody of the child. During the pendency of those proceedings, the Family Court issued an order dated August 7, 2009, which modified the June 30, 2004, order made upon the parties' stipulation by directing that "either or both parents may enroll the child in religious instruction in their faith." When the parties appeared before the Family Court on March 15, 2010, for a continued hearing on the petitions, the father, through counsel, requested a temporary change in the visitation schedule to allow the child, in May 2010, to attend rehearsal for her first communion, the ceremony for her first communion at the father's Roman Catholic church, and any associated celebrations. Despite the mother's objection, in an order dated March 18, 2010, the Family Court granted the father's application. The Appellate Division dismissed the mothers appeal as academic. It observed that it is a fundamental principle of our jurisprudence that the power of a court to declare the law only arises out of, and is limited to, determining the rights of persons which are actually controverted in a particular case pending before the tribunal (Matter of Hearst Corp. v. Clyne, 50 N.Y.2d 707, 713). In general an appeal will be considered moot unless the rights of the parties will be directly affected by the determination of the appeal and the interest of the parties is an immediate consequence of the judgment. Contrary to the opinion of the dissent, the rights of the parties would not be directly affected by a determination of this appeal because the events associated with the temporary modification of the father's visitation schedule had already occurred, as conceded by the mother in her brief. Accordingly, the appeal was moot and could not properly be decided by the Court unless the exception to the mootness doctrine applied. The exception to the mootness doctrine occurs where the controversy or issue involved is "likely to recur, typically evades review, and raises a substantial and novel question" (Saratoga County Chamber of Commerce v. Pataki, 100 N.Y.2d 801, 811). Here, no exception to the mootness doctrine was argued or present, and the courts are prohibited from rendering purely advisory opinions absent an exception to the mootness doctrine. Justice Hall dissented and voted to decide the appeal on the merits.

Liability for the Payment of Marital Debt May Be Distributed in Accordance with the Equitable Distribution Factors

In DiFiore v DiFiore, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4090241 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that the Supreme Court has broad discretion in allocating marital debt. In addition, "liability for the payment of marital debt[] need not be equally apportioned but may be distributed in accordance with the [equitable distribution] factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(d)" (Lewis v. Lewis, 6 AD3d 837, 839-840). It agreed with the husband's contention that the remaining balance of a loan from his father to the parties toward the purchase of an apartment building should be repaid out of the wife's share of the proceeds of the sale of the apartment building in the principal amount of $48,388.99, plus 5% monthly interest from April 1, 2008, to the date of payment. Pursuant to the pendente lite order dated April 2, 2004, the wife was to receive the rental income from the apartment building, and pay the loan from these proceeds. She failed to do so. The prior decision and order of the Court dated June 7, 2011 (DiFiore v DiFiore, 85 AD3d 714), was recalled and vacated.

Dismissal of Counterclaims for Partition and Recoupment Warranted Pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(4) Because There Was Already an Action Pending Between the Parties That Sought, in Essence, the Same Relief.

In L.L. v B.H.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4007741 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties and their son resided together at XXX Ascan Road, Franklin Square, New York. The residence was purchased for $178,000.00 on November 13, 1991, thirty (30) days prior to the parties marriage. Title was in the names of the husband and wife, as joint tenants with rights of survivorship. There appeared to be no mortgages on the residence. The wife moved to dismiss the husband's counterclaims for partition and recoupment. In support of the motion, counsel for the wife alleged, among other things, that because disposition of the marital residence was an issue to be decided in the matrimonial action as part of equitable distribution, actions for partition and recoupment were improper as they sought to divest the court of its right to determine equitable distribution of the assets and obligations of the parties and exclusive occupancy of said residence. Counsel for the wife argued that this matrimonial action is regulated by Domestic Relations Law (DRL) 236(B)(5), and not Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law (RPAPL) 901 which permits partition, and that partition and recoupment are not cognizable legal theories in the context of a division of property between divorcing parties. In opposition to the motion, counsel for the husband alleged, among other things, that the counterclaims for partition and recoupment stated legally cognizable causes of action and that the existence of a matrimonial action did not bar the husband from commencing an action for partition and recoupment.

Justice Falanga framed the issue presented as whether the husband was barred from bringing counterclaims for partition and recoupment when a matrimonial action has been commenced, in which equitable distribution of the marital residence is being sought as well as possible exclusive occupancy of same and a division of all other assets and obligations of the parties. He observed that in the case at bar, the parties acquired title to the property before they were married, as joint tenants with rights of survivorship, and their marriage did not transform the joint tenancy into one by the entirety, which could be created only by a conveyance to a husband and a wife. As such, the marital residence was not "marital property" subject to equitable distribution, as the residence constituted separate property of each of the parties acquired prior to the marriage. In Novak v Novak, 135 Misc.2d 909, 516 N.Y.S.2d 878 [Sup. Dutchess Co.1987]) the court was faced with the same issue. The Novaks acquired a home as joint tenants ten (10) days before their marriage but they cohabited for only 2 ½ months before the action for divorce was commenced. The court there rejected the wife's argument that the joint tenancy created an undivided one-half interest in each party and that said interests were not subject to equitable distribution. The court found that the property was not subject to equitable distribution because it was acquired prior to the marriage and because there could be little or no passive appreciation due to the brevity of the marriage, The Novak court allowed a claim for partition to stand because substantial improvements had been made to the residence and the equities of the parties had changed with the contributions that each had made to the improvements. The Novak court found that, within the partition action, it was authorized to adjust all the equities arising out of the parties' relationship with respect to the property to be divided and, found that partition gave the court more flexibility to do equity than DRL 236 (B), given the unique circumstances of that case. In contrast, in the case at bar, the parties had been married and had resided in the subject residence for nearly twenty (20) years and raised their son there since he was born. Case law interpretation of DRL 236(B) had evolved since Novak to take into account the appreciation of separate property from the active contributions of the parties to the marriage, as spouse, parent, wage earner or homemaker.

It was the court's view that, in a matrimonial action, Domestic Relations Law 234 gives to the court broad authority to determine issues that arise between the parties with respect to title and possession of property and, when read in conjunction with DRL 236(B), which authorizes the court to distribute marital and separate property and to adjust debits and credits between the parties as equity would find just and proper given the circumstances of the case, each of the parties have sufficient remedies in the instant matrimonial action so that references to separate causes of action for partition and recoupment were duplicative and unwarranted. Neither party would receive any lesser or greater relief from a separate cause of action for partition or recoupment, when all of the relief that may be had in said actions were within the power of the court in the existing statutory scheme (cf., Chen v. Fischer, 6 N.Y.3d 94, 810 N.Y.S.2d 96, 843 N.E.2d 723 [C.A.2005]; Boronow v. Boronow, 71 N.Y.2d 284, 525 N.Y.S.2d 179, 519 N.E.2d 1375 [C.A.1988]). The matrimonial forum is a convenient forum for transactions between these parties relating to pre-marital and post-marital property claims and form a convenient trial unit for the purposes of this litigation. (see, Chen v. Fischer, supra.) The court was unconvinced that the husband could obtain any relief in a partition or recoupment action that was different from what the court does in every case involving the equitable disposition and possession of property, some of which may be separate, and the distribution of assets and debts. It was the court's view that dismissal of the counterclaims was warranted, pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(4), because there was already an action pending between the parties that sought, in essence, the same relief. The court found as a matter of law, that the partition and recoupment action were unwarranted and that the rights and remedies of the parties could be decided and granted in the matrimonial action. (cf. Boronow v. Boronow, supra.) As partition is an equitable remedy, a 50/50 split of the equity in the residence was not mandated, for the court may partition the property unevenly, in accordance with the contributions of the parties. That is the same exact remedy that is available in the matrimonial action and the court found that the issues raised in the counterclaims were subsumed into the matrimonial action where the court is given statutory powers to do equity. The court found the previous lower court cases holding to the contrary to be unpersuasive under the facts of this case. It was the court's view that, even when a property is acquired prior to the marriage and title is in both names of the parties, the matrimonial court has jurisdiction and authority to prevent unjust enrichment to either party. The wife's motion for an order dismissing the husband's counterclaims for partition and recoupment was granted and the counterclaims were dismissed.

First Department Emphasizes Policy of Broad Pretrial Disclosure Regarding Corporate Interests

In Jaffe v Jaffe, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 4089440 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) defendant served 37 nonparty subpoenas on the business office maintained by plaintiff's father. Each subpoena was addressed to a different entity closely held by, or affiliated with, plaintiff's family, which had many real estate holdings. Plaintiff acknowledged that, before the marriage, she had minority interests in many of the entities and that during the marriage she transferred the interests in those companies to a single holding company in exchange for a 25% interest in the holding company. Unlike two of her siblings, plaintiff was given no current or future managerial authority in the holding company. Defendant also addressed subpoenas to SC Management, the company that managed the real estate holdings of the various LLC's. Plaintiff claimed to have no interest in SC Management or six other entities that received subpoenas. In addition to the entities affiliated with plaintiff's family, defendant served a subpoena on Bank of New York Mellon, seeking documents related to accounts maintained there by all of the entities in which plaintiff held an interest, as well as SC Management and the six other entities in which plaintiff denied having any interest. The subpoenas addressed to the entities in which plaintiff had transferred her interest to the holding company differed from each other in some respects, but they uniformly sought financial statements; tax returns; detailed fixed asset registers and depreciation schedules for all assets held; building permits filed between 1996 and 2000; rent rolls identifying all tenants, their apartment numbers, their leases, the square footage of their apartment, and a calculation of their rent per square foot; documents reflecting "in kind" payments or barter transactions with any entity owned by the Hakim Organization, or with any employee, partner or shareholder of such entity; board meeting or other entity meeting minutes; business plans and projections; 1099's with copies of cancelled checks; ownership, operating, management, or subscription agreements; agreements of understanding signed by plaintiff; ownership schedules and stock transfer ledgers, including copies of front and back of all shares issued; copies of credit applications made to a bank or to other creditors; and outside accountants' working paper files and business evaluations or real estate appraisals conducted during the marriage.

Plaintiff moved to quash the subpoenas. She argued that the subpoenas were duplicative of discovery demands defendant had served on her directly (to which she also objected), and that they were intended solely to harass her parents. Plaintiff asserted, the subpoenas were served on the eve of Rosh Hashanah and immediately after defendant threatened to establish that plaintiff's parents were tax evaders. She further contended that, to the extent she had interests in the entities to which the subpoenas were addressed, it was separate property and had no bearing on the distribution of the parties' marital assets. She claimed to have no active role in the companies that would have caused any appreciation in their value to become marital property. In opposition to the motion, defendant argued that the documents and information sought by the subpoenas were necessary to determine whether a portion of plaintiff's family assets is marital property and because the documents bear on maintenance and child support. Pointing to documents he had already discovered during the litigation, defendant submitted that "[m]onies flow[ed] freely" among the subpoenaed entities and that plaintiff was active in the management and development of her family's real estate holdings. Defendant further asserted that the subpoenaed entities regularly made loans to various management companies controlled by the family, particularly SC Management, and used the management companies to pay for family members' personal expenses. Defendant stated that the discovery he sought was relevant to the issue whether plaintiff's actions caused appreciation to the separate property which should then be included in the marital estate. He also argued that, even if plaintiff's interests in the entities were non-marital, they were still relevant under Domestic Relations Law s 236(5)(d)(9), which requires the court, in determining equitable distribution, to consider "the probable future financial circumstances of each party ." The court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. It held that nonparty discovery was appropriate as to those entities in which plaintiff conceded having interest. However, it quashed the subpoenas for all companies in which plaintiff claimed to have no ownership interest, except for SC Management. The court found that there was evidence, such as checks payable to plaintiff, that "raise[d] the possibility" that plaintiff received compensation for work she performed for that company. The court did not expressly address the subpoena served on Bank of New York.

The Appellate Division observed that in a divorce action, "[b]road pretrial disclosure which enables both spouses to obtain necessary information regarding the value and nature of the marital assets is critical if the trial court is to properly distribute the marital assets" (Kaye v. Kaye, 102 A.D.2d 682, 686 [1984]). In Kaye, the court denied the husband's motion for a protective order preventing discovery into four closely held family corporations in which he held minority interests, observing, "[I]t has been held that both parties in a matrimonial action governed by the Equitable Distribution Law are now entitled to: a searching exploration of each other's assets and dealings at the time of and during the marriage, so as to delineate the extent of marital property, distinguish it from separate property, uncover hidden assets of marital property, discover possible waste of marital property, and in general gain any information which may bear on the issue of equitable distribution, as well as maintenance and child support. The entire financial history of the marriage must be open for inspection by both parties". Pursuant to this rule of liberal discovery in matrimonial litigation, defendant was entitled to records of the entities in which plaintiff had an interest, so that he may determine whether her interests have a bearing on the distribution of the marital estate as well as support obligations. However, it found that defendant had failed to establish that plaintiff had any interest in SC management, so the subpoena served on that entity should have been quashed. Further, to the extent the subpoena served on Bank of New York Mellon sought records related to El-Kam Realty, Aval Company, Old Salem Farm Acquisition Corporation and Affiliates, Enterprise Products Partners, LP Nantucket Campfire, LLC, and Bedford Entities, the bank need not comply. Defendant also failed to demonstrate any affiliation between plaintiff and those entities. The bank was required, however, to divulge information related to the companies in which plaintiff had conceded having an interest. While the entities were not immune from discovery in this action, the Appellate Division held that the subpoenas were overbroad in many respects. For example, the subpoenas included a demand to provide the names and addresses of all commercial and residential tenants, with copies of every lease, and all building permits filed for any building, including construction and renovations for every building plaintiff's family owned, over a 15-year period of time. This information appeared to be of dubious relevance. Accordingly, it remitted the matter and held that the motion court must reconsider plaintiff's motion to determine whether the particular demands annexed to the subpoenas were sufficiently tailored to the financial issues in the action, and whether it would be unduly burdensome for the entities to respond.

CPLR Amendments of Interest to Matrimonial Attorneys

Laws of 2011, Ch 473 , §1, amended CPLR 306-b, effective January 1, 2012, to provide that service be made within 120 days "after commencement of the action or proceeding." CPLR 306-b formerly required service of the summons and complaint, summons with notice, third-party summons and complaint, petition with notice of petition or order to show cause within 120 days after filing, with appropriate modifications where the statute of limitations is four months or less.

CPLR 306-b now provides:

§ 306-b. Service of the summons and complaint, summons with notice, third-party summons and complaint, or petition with a notice of petition or order to show cause. Service of the summons and complaint, summons with notice, third-party summons and complaint, or petition with a notice of petition or order to show cause shall be made within one hundred twenty days after the commencement of the action or proceeding, provided that in an action or proceeding, except a proceeding commenced under the election law, where the applicable statute of limitations is four months or less, service shall be made not later than fifteen days after the date on which the applicable statute of limitations expires. If service is not made upon a defendant within the time provided in this section, the court, upon motion, shall dismiss the action without prejudice as to that defendant, or upon good cause shown or in the interest of justice, extend the time for service.

Laws of 2011, Ch 473 , §2, amended CPLR 2101(f), effective January 1, 2012, to increase the time for raising objections to defects in form of a paper. The time in which an objection to a defect in form must be raised has been two days from receipt of the paper objected to. The period of time was amended from "two" to "fifteen" days.

CPLR 2101(f) now provides:

(f) Defects in form; waiver. A defect in the form of a paper, if a substantial right of a party is not prejudiced, shall be disregarded by the court, and leave to correct shall be freely given. The party on whom a paper is served shall be deemed to have waived objection to any defect in form unless, within fifteen days after the receipt thereof, the party on whom the paper is served returns the paper to the party serving it with a statement of particular objections.

Laws of 2011, Ch 473 , §3, amended CPLR 3025(b), effective January 1, 2012 , to require a party moving to amend its pleadings to attach a copy of the proposed amended pleading to its motion to amend that pleading, clearly showing the proposed changes to the pleading.

CPLR 3025(b) now provides:

(b) Amendments and supplemental pleadings by leave. A party may amend his or her pleading, or supplement it by setting forth additional or subsequent transactions or occurrences, at any time by leave of court or by stipulation of all parties. Leave shall be freely given upon such terms as may be just including the granting of costs and continuances. Any motion to amend or supplement pleadings shall be accompanied by the proposed amended or supplemental pleading clearly showing the changes or additions to be made to the pleading.

Laws of 2011, Ch 473 , §4, amended CPLR 3217(a)(1), effective January 1, 2012, to extend the time period in which, at the outset of a case, a voluntary discontinuance may be obtained without need for a court order or a stipulation of settlement. Formerly, a party alleging a cause of action in a complaint, counterclaim, cross-claim, or petition could only unilaterally discontinue it without court order or stipulation by serving and filing the requisite notice on all parties "at any time before a responsive pleading is served or within twenty days after service of the pleading asserting the claim, whichever is earlier..."CPLR 3217(a)(1). CPLR 3217(a)(1) was amended to permit a voluntary discontinuance without court order or stipulation before the responsive pleading is served or within 20 days after service of the pleading of the claim, whichever is later.

CPLR 3217(a)(1) now provides:

1. by serving upon all parties to the action a notice of discontinuance at any time before a responsive pleading is served or, if no responsive pleading is required, within twenty days after service of the leading asserting the claim and filing the notice with proof of service with the clerk of the court; or

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) subdivisions (d) (g) and (i) and Family Court Act § 413 (1) subdivisions (d) (g) and (i) amended by Laws of 2011, Ch 436, effective October 18, 2011

In Rose v Moody, 83 NY2d 65 (1993) the Court of Appeals held Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) and Family Court Act § 413 (1) unconstitutional insofar as they imposed an inflexible minimum child support obligation against support obligors whose income would, by virtue of the obligation, fall below the poverty level. The Court of Appeals held that that the irrebuttable presumption mandating that an indigent, non-custodial parent be ordered to pay a minimum of $25 per month in child support contravened the Federal Child Support Enforcement Act Social Security Act, Title IV-D §467(b)(2), as amended, 42 USCA §667(b)(2), thus violating the constitutional principle of Federal preemption. While the effect of the Court's ruling has been to require that support obligors be permitted to rebut the presumption in favor of a minimum obligation of $25 per month, the statutory language had not been conformed accordingly. Additionally, in cases where the basic child support obligation would reduce the non-custodial parent's income to a level below the self-support reserve, but not below the poverty level, both subdivisions provide alternative standards for determining child support, that is, the greater of $50 per month or the difference between the non-custodial parents' income and the self-support reserve. However, both statutes are silent regarding whether separate amounts may also be ordered in such cases for child care, future medical and educational expenses, in accordance with subparagraphs four, five, six and seven of paragraph (c) of both subdivision one of section 413 of the Family Court Act and subdivision (1-b) of section 240 of the Domestic Relations Law. Several cases have, therefore, disallowed the inclusion of any of these expenses as part of the child support order in such circumstances. See Callen v Callen, 287 AD2d 818 (3rd Dept 2001); In Re Rhianna R., 256 AD2d 1184 (4th Dept 1998) (citing Matter of Cary)(Mahady) v Megrell, 219 AD2d 334 (3rd Dept 1996), lv App Dismissed, 88 NY2d 1065 1996); Dunbar v. Dunbar, 233 AD2d 922 (4th Dept 1996.) (See NY Legis Memo 436 (2011).

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) and Family Court Act § 413 (1) were amended by Laws of 2011, Ch 436 to correct these anomalies and to codify the decision in Rose v Moody.

The amendments make the presumption in favor of a minimum order of $25 per month rebuttable by a showing that such an order would be unjust or inappropriate, based upon the ten factors applicable to departures from the child support standards set forth in Domestic Relations Law §240(1-b)(f); Family Court Act 413(1)(f). Family Court and Supreme Court are authorized to order payment of an amount it deems to be just and appropriate. The amendment eliminates the proviso that " in no instance shall the court order child support below $25 per month." The amendment also clarifies that in cases where imposition of the basic child support obligation would reduce the non-custodial parent's income to an amount below the self-support reserve, but not the poverty level, the Court would be authorized, although not required, to direct payments for child care, educational and health care expenses, as part of its child support order.

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b), subdivisions (d) (g) and (i) were amended accordingly. In addition, subdivision (i) was amended to make technical corrections , including deleting “social services” and replacing it with “the office of temporary and disability assistance”.

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b), paragraphs (d), (g) and (i) were amended to read as follows:

(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (c) of this subdivision, where the annual amount of the basic child support obligation would reduce the non-custodial parent's income below the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person as reported by the federal department of health and human services, the basic child support obligation shall be twenty-five dollars per month, provided, however, that if the court finds that such basic child support obligation is unjust or inappropriate, which finding shall be based upon considerations of the factors set forth in paragraph (f) of this subdivision, the court shall order the non-custodial parent to pay such amount of the child support as the court finds just and appropriate.

Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (c) of this subdivision, where the annual amount of the basic child support obligation would reduce the non-custodial parent's income below the self-support reserve but not below the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person as reported by the federal department of health and human services, the basic child support obligation shall be fifty dollars per month or the difference between the non-custodial parent's income and the self-support reserve, whichever is greater, in addition to any amounts that the court may, in its discretion, order in accordance with subparagraphs four, five, six and/or seven of paragraph (c) of this subdivision.

(g) Where the court finds that the non-custodial parent's pro rata share of the basic child support obligation is unjust or inappropriate, the court shall order the non-custodial parent to pay such amount of child support as the court finds just and appropriate, and the court shall set forth, in a written order, the factors it considered; the amount of each party's pro rata share of the basic child support obligation; and the reasons that the court did not order the basic child support obligation. Such written order may not be waived by either party or counsel; provided, however, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, the court shall not find that the non-custodial parent's pro rata share of such obligation is unjust or inappropriate on the basis that such share exceeds the portion of a public assistance grant which is attributable to a child or children. Where the non-custodial parent's income is less than or equal to the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person as reported by the federal department of health and human services, unpaid child support arrears in excess of five hundred dollars shall not accrue.

(i) Where either or both parties are unrepresented, the court shall not enter an order or judgment other than a temporary order pursuant to section two hundred thirty-seven of this article, that includes a provision for child support unless the unrepresented party or parties have received a copy of the child support standards chart promulgated by the commissioner of the office of temporary and disability assistance pursuant to subdivision two of section one hundred eleven-i of the social services law. Where either party is in receipt of child support enforcement services through the local social services district, the local social services district child support enforcement unit shall advise such party of the amount derived from application of the child support percentage and that such amount serves as a starting point for the determination of the child support award, and shall provide such party with a copy of the child support standards chart. (Laws of 2011, Ch 436, §1, effective October 18, 2011)

Almost identical amendments were made to Family Court Act , § 413 (1), paragraphs (d), (g) and (i). (Laws of 2011, Ch 436, §2, effective October 18, 2011)

Second Department Holds That Counsel Fees May Be Requested under FCA 438 (a) At Any Time until the Appellate Process Has Concluded

In Talty v Talty--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 3715407 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), a support proceeding, the Appellate Division, Second Department reversed an order of the Family Court which had vacated a counsel fee award of $11,893.04 and reinstated the award. It observed that Family Court Act § 438(a) provides: "[i]n any proceeding under this article, including proceedings for support of a spouse and children, or for support of children only, or at any hearing to modify or enforce an order entered in that proceeding or a proceeding to modify a decree of divorce, separation, or annulment, including an appeal under article eleven, the court may allow counsel fees at any stage of the proceeding, to the attorney representing the spouse, former spouse or person on behalf of children." It construed the language "[i]n any proceeding under this article" to include "an appeal under article eleven" , and held that the plain meaning of the statute supports the interpretation that a request for an attorney's fee can be made "at any stage of the proceeding," which includes "an appeal under article eleven". In this context, therefore, the "proceeding" does not conclude until the appellate process has concluded. The proceeding is terminated when an appeal has concluded and no more appellate relief is available, or when the time to file an appeal has expired. Applying this interpretation of the statute to the facts of this case, it held that the mother's motion for an award of an additional attorney's fee was timely, as the appellate process had not yet concluded at the time the motion was made. It further held that to the extent that any of its decisions suggested otherwise (citing Matter of McGrath v. Parker, 41 AD3d 852; Matter of Cassieri v. Cassieri, 31 A.D.2d 927, 298 N.Y.S.2d 844), they are no longer to be followed.

"Extraordinary Circumstances Analysis" must Consider "The Cumulative Effect" of All Issues Present in a Given Case and Not View Each Factor in Isolation. Custody Awarded to Non-biological Relative of Child Rather than Father

In Matter of Pettaway v Savage, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 3611215 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Eric Pettaway was the father of a daughter (born in 1997). In 2003, he and the child's mother, Denise Knight, now deceased, stipulated to joint legal custody of the child with primary physical custody to the mother and visitation to the father. The child resided with the mother and the child's two half siblings until the mother's death in June 2009, at which time the father commenced proceeding No. 1, seeking custody. In response, the attorney for the child moved by order to show cause for an award of sole legal and physical custody to William Savage II, also known as Eric Savage. Savage was not a biological relative of the child; he was the father of the child's older half sister and had fostered a close relationship with the child over the course of several years. Savage then commenced proceeding No. 2, also seeking custody of the child. Family Court found the existence of extraordinary circumstances sufficient to permit the court to intervene in the father's relationship with the child and then, further, that the child's best interests would be served by an award of sole custody to Savage. The father, was granted visitation on alternate weekends and such additional periods of time as the parties and the child may agree. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that extraordinary circumstances may not be established "merely by showing that the child has bonded psychologically with the nonparent". The extraordinary circumstances analysis must consider "the cumulative effect" of all issues present in a given case and not view each factor in isolation. In prior cases, extraordinary circumstances have been established based upon the combined effect of factors, including the child's psychological bonding and attachments, the prior disruption of the parent's custody, separation from siblings and potential harm to the child, as well as the parent's neglect or abdication of responsibilities and the child's poor relationship with the parent (see Matter of Banks v. Banks, 285 A.D.2d 686, 687 [2001]). In Matter of Banks v. Bank, a case in which there were a number of significant similarities to this one, the children--at the time of their father's death--had already developed a bond with his second wife after living with the couple for approximately 30 months. The Appellate Division reversed Family Court's award of custody to the biological mother, citing as extraordinary circumstances the death of the father, the "poor relationship" between the children and the mother, bereavement needs and other special issues affecting one of the children and the mother's recent "withdrawal as a parent". Each and all of those factors were present here; as in Banks, one of the child's parents was deceased, the child had formed a strong psychological bond with a nonparent, the child had special needs in addition to psychological needs resulting from bereavement, and the parent seeking custody withdrew almost completely from the parental role for an extended period before the other parent's death. Here, Family Court found that, prior to the mother's death, the father failed to play any significant role in the child's life, visited inconsistently throughout the child's life, and failed to attend to the child's emotional needs. The court credited a psychologist's testimony and opinion that the father had emotionally abandoned the child by his neglect of her and had demonstrated a fundamental lack of understanding of her needs. These findings were fully supported by the record. Family Court's conclusion that the father abdicated his parental responsibilities was supported by the testimony of several witnesses that the father frequently missed scheduled visits with the child and often left the child with other adults even when he did pick her up for visits, and by undisputed testimony that the father did not attend the child's school conferences or special education meetings until after the mother's death, did not know her teachers' names and never helped her with homework, although he testified that he knew she needed special assistance. Even while this matter was pending, the father failed to appear for a scheduled meeting with the child's teacher and guidance counselor, for reasons unexplained. Testimony further revealed that the father had failed to provide for the child's basic needs during her time with him--he had not provided her with enough food during past visits, nor did he supply her with essentials such as soap or deodorant. When the child sustained an injury while performing physical work for the father's brother, neither the father nor his brother furnished appropriate medical care. There was further disturbing testimony--which Family Court found to be credible--that the father knew that his brother had "badgered" the child about her desire to live with Savage, and that the brother had threatened the child that his conduct should not be mentioned in court; despite this knowledge, the father did not intervene or seek to protect the child. Family Court also found that the period in which the father had custody of the child after the mother's death "did not go well," noting that during this vulnerable period, the child felt isolated from her other family contacts and had limited interaction with them--at a time when any responsible parent or caretaker should have readily recognized that such support was essential. The court had ample basis for doubting the father's testimony that he would not relocate with the child to New Jersey, where his new wife resided and owned a growing travel business, finding it instead "extremely unlikely" that the father would foster the close relationship between the child and her sister and "the others [who] have become her true family." The court further found that the father lacked credibility regarding his previous conviction for attempted rape in the third degree of a person under 17, and his failure to complete sex offender treatment thereafter.

Error to Allow Wife to Benefit from Her Failure to Comply with Discovery

In Cabral v Cabral, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 3600503 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married on January 24, 1980, and had three children, born in 1980, 1982, and 1989. During the marriage, the parties purchased the marital residence in Westchester County, as well as a vacation residence in the Dominican Republic. Beginning in 1983, the defendant was employed by Westchester County, in which position she received a salary and accrued pension benefits. In 1986, the plaintiff obtained an insurance license and opened an agency selling insurance policies and providing financial and other services. The plaintiff was incarcerated from 1991 to 1994 upon his conviction of felony drug charges, and his insurance license was revoked. The plaintiff testified at trial that prior to his incarceration, he liquidated a retirement benefit and used the proceeds to provide a source of income to the defendant and the parties' children. The defendant continued operation of the agency during the plaintiff's incarceration, and during that time federal tax liens were levied against the agency. The plaintiff also testified that after he was released from prison, the defendant refused to allow him to return to work at the agency in any capacity. Thereafter, the plaintiff did obtain full-time employment, albeit at an annual salary which was significantly less than what he earned as an insurance broker. In 2001, the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce. Due to the defendant's failure to comply with pretrial discovery orders, she was precluded from offering evidence at trial on the issue of equitable distribution. Supreme Court equitably distributed marital property and awarded child support, and the wife appealed. The Appellate Division, 35 A.D.3d 779, 826 N.Y.S.2d 443, reversed and remitted. On remittal, the Supreme Court awarded child support arrears, awarded the husband no share of the wife's pension, directed that he be solely responsible for the federal tax lien assessed on parties' business, and directed him to pay child support. The husband appealed and the Appellate Division reversed insofar as appealed from and remitted. It held that Supreme Court erred in failing to include the defendant's income from the insurance agency in calculating her income or assets, thereby allowing her to benefit from her failure to comply with discovery and shielding her insofar as the income related to equitable distribution. The defendant's income was also improperly omitted in the calculation of child support and in the apportionment of the debt incurred by the parties' insurance agency. It found that Supreme Court should have included the defendant's pension benefits which accrued prior to the commencement date of the action in the equitable distribution of marital property. Finally, under the particular circumstances of this case, and in the absence of any evidence demonstrating that the plaintiff had the ability to earn a salary approaching his previous income, the Supreme Court improperly imputed annual income to him of $85,000 as part of its calculation of child support.

Inquest on Papers to Determine the Amount of Restitution Is Permitted Pursuant to Family Court Act 841(e)

In Polanco v Dilone, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2011 WL 3557068 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) Petitioner moved for summary judgment on her petition for an order of protection based on Mr. Dilone's guilty plea in Bronx Criminal Court to assault in the 3rd degree. On December 2, 2010, the court granted the motion, and issued findings of fact and a 5 year order of protection. The court also directed an inquest on papers to determine the amount of restitution. It observed that pursuant to Family Court Act 841(e), restitution is an available remedy in this case. Petitioner submitted an affidavit, dated December 15, 2010, delineating her expenses: Travel by Subway to prosecute this case: $78.50 Destroyed toys, bottle of perfume and bouquet of flowers: $100 Certificate of disposition: $10. There was no evidence that respondent was ordered to pay restitution in the criminal action and thus this order was not duplicative. Respondent failed to file opposition which was due by January 21, 2011. The Family Court observed that under FCA 834, the standard of proof at a dispositional hearing is material and relevant. Petitioner submitted a receipt for the certificate of disposition which established the $10 expense. Petitioner's travel expenses were also sufficiently documented in that her appearances in court were in the court's file and would necessitate trips to meet with her attorney, the detective and District Attorney. Further, petitioner testified to injuries for which medical treatment was documented and thus those travel expenses were supported by the record as well. However, petitioner did not allege in the petition that she suffered property damage. Since petitioner moved for summary judgment based on the criminal proceedings, there was no testimony here about property damage. The criminal disposition was silent as to property damage as well. In addition, there was no documentary evidence for the $100 for destroyed property. Admittedly, $100 was an estimate for items of sentimental value. While the court is authorized to award nominal damages, it cannot award sentimental value. Furlan v. Rayan Phot Works, Inc., 171 Misc. 839 (Mun Ct, Queens County 1939). The court accepted petitioner's credible testimony that the intrinsic value of the toys, perfume, and flowers was $100. Victoria C v. Higinio C., 1 AD3d 173 (1st Dept 2003). However, petitioner was required to first plead and prove property damage before any damages could be awarded. Therefore, petitioner had established damages in the amount of $88.50. The court granted the petition for restitution and directed that petitioner shall have judgment for $88.50 with interest from September 24, 2009. The clerk was directed to enter judgment accordingly.

Third Department Holds That While Plaintiff Lacked a Remedy at Law, the Dissolution of a Civil Union Falls Squarely Within the Scope of Supreme Court's Broad Equity Jurisdiction

In Dickerson v Thompson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2899241 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff and defendant, residents of New York, entered into a civil union in Vermont in April 2003. In November 2007, plaintiff, unable to obtain a dissolution of the civil union in Vermont due to that state's residency requirements commenced an action for equitable and declaratory relief seeking a judgment dissolving the civil union and freeing her of all the rights and responsibilities incident to that union. Upon defendant's default, plaintiff moved for a judgment granting the requested relief. Supreme Court, sua sponte, dismissed the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. On appeal, the Appellate Division reversed and reinstated the complaint (73 A.D.3d 52 [2010] [Dickerson I]), holding that the courts of this state may recognize the civil union status of the parties as a matter of comity and that Supreme Court is vested with subject matter jurisdiction to adjudicate the dispute. It did not, however, reach the issue as to what relief, if any, could ultimately be afforded to the parties on the merits. Upon remittal, Supreme Court granted plaintiff's motion seeking a declaration relieving the parties from all rights and obligations arising from the civil union, but denied that portion of the motion seeking a dissolution of the union. The Appellate Division modified, disagreeing with Supreme Court's conclusion that, in the absence of any legislatively created mechanism in New York by which a court could grant the dissolution of a civil union entered into in another state, it was powerless to grant the requested relief. It held that while plaintiff lacked a remedy at law, the dissolution of a civil union falls squarely within the scope of Supreme Court's broad equity jurisdiction. As it noted in Dickerson I, the N.Y. Constitution vests Supreme Court with "general original jurisdiction in law and equity" (N.Y. Const, art VI, s 7[a]). " 'The power of equity is as broad as equity and justice require' ". Indeed, "[t]he essence of equity jurisdiction has been the power ... to [mold] each decree to the necessities of the particular case" (State of New York v. Barone, 74 N.Y.2d 332, 336 [1989]). Thus, once a court of equity has obtained jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action, as Supreme Court had here, it has the power to dispose of all matters at issue and to grant complete relief in accordance with the equities of the case. In other words, even in the absence of any direct grant of legislative power, Supreme Court has the "inherent authority ... to fashion whatever remedies are required for the resolution of justiciable disputes and the protection of the rights of citizens," tempered only by our Constitution and statutes. It found that the exercise of Supreme Court's equitable powers to grant a dissolution of the civil union was clearly warranted here. Plaintiff was in need of a judicial remedy to dissolve her legal relationship with defendant created by the laws of Vermont. Residency requirements prevent her from obtaining a dissolution of the civil union in Vermont, and the provisions of Domestic Relations Law 170, which provide for divorce and dissolution of a marriage, were not applicable to this action since the parties did not enter into a marriage in Vermont. Thus, absent Supreme Court's invocation of its equitable power to dissolve the civil union, there would be no court competent to provide plaintiff the requested relief and she would therefore be left without a remedy. A court of equity "withholds its remedies if the result would be unjust, but freely grants them to prevent injustice when the other courts are helpless". Here, the uncontested evidence submitted by plaintiff established that, during the course of the parties' relationship, defendant had subjected her to violent physical abuse on several occasions and was verbally abusive to both her and her autistic son on a daily basis. Defendant also stole from her, resulting in defendant's criminal conviction of grand larceny, and removed the license plates from plaintiff's vehicle to prevent her and her son from escaping defendant's abusive conduct. Furthermore, the parties had lived apart since April 2006 and plaintiff had alleged facts demonstrating that resumption of the civil union was not probable. Since plaintiff would be entitled to a dissolution of the civil union in Vermont but for that state's residency requirement (see Vt Stat Ann, tit 15, s 551[3], [7]; ss 592, 1206), the Court found that equity would be served by granting her the requested relief and that Supreme Court erred in declining to invoke its equitable powers to do so. Furthermore, notwithstanding Supreme Court's declaration freeing the parties from the rights and obligations flowing from the civil union, the fact remained that, in the absence of a judgment granting a dissolution, plaintiff and defendant continued to be interminably bound as partners to the union. Given this legal status, plaintiff was precluded from entering into another civil union or a marriage in Vermont as well as analogous relationships in several other jurisdictions. Supreme Court's denial of the requested dissolution also barred the parties from enjoying the more limited protections available to domestic partners under certain local laws of this state, including New York City's Domestic Partnership Law, which forbids parties to a civil union from entering into a domestic partnership with another (see City of N.Y. Administrative Code s 3-241).

Costs of After-school Program and Summer Camp Qualify as Child Care Expenses.

In Matter of Scarduzio v Ryan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2714203 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that the party seeking modification of a support order has the burden of establishing the existence of a substantial change in circumstances warranting the modification. A change in the expenses for the child may constitute such a change in circumstances. It was undisputed that the child care expenses had decreased significantly since the order of support had been issued, due to the child attending school full time. It held that the father should only be required to pay his share of the child care expenses actually incurred by the mother commencing January 7, 2010, the date that the father filed his petition for a downward modification of his child support obligation. It rejected the father's argument that the costs of the after-school program and summer camp in which the child was enrolled did not qualify as child care expenses. The father offered no evidence to refute the mother's contention that these programs provided care for the child while she was at work. Accordingly, those programs qualified as child care expenses consistent with the purpose of Family Court Act 413(1)(c)(4).

An Evidentiary Ruling, Even When Made in Advance of a Trial on Motion Papers, Is Not Appealable

In Matter of Lyons v Lyons, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2714210 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) The Appellate Division ruled that the appeal from so much of the order dated August 9, 2010, as denied the motion of Audrey Lyons to preclude the testimony of a court-appointed forensic evaluator at a hearing to be held on the issue of custody and to preclude the use of that evaluator's report at the hearing must be dismissed because it concerned an evidentiary ruling, which, even when made in advance of a hearing or trial on motion papers, is not appealable as of right or by permission.

Supreme Court Did Not Improvidently Exercise its Discretion In, Sua Sponte, Enjoining the Father from Bringing Any Further Motions in this Action Without the Permission of the Supreme Court.

In Scholar v Timinsky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 3505708 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in the parties stipulation of settlement dated June 19, 2007, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce entered June 10, 2008, the parties agreed that the mother would have sole custody of the parties' child, the parties would equally pay the education costs for their child from preschool through high school, the parties would have joint decision-making authority on all issues relating to their child's education, and if they could not agree, that the parties would arbitrate any such issues with a certain arbitrator. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly determined that a change of circumstances existed so as to require a modification of the parties' stipulation of settlement to protect the best interests of the child. The resolution of a dispute regarding parental joint decision-making authority with respect to a child requires a determination of what is in the child's best interest, based on the totality of the circumstances. The Supreme Court possessed adequate relevant information which demonstrated that the parties were largely unable to cooperate on matters relating to their child's education. Therefore, an evidentiary hearing was unnecessary for the Supreme Court to determine that it was in the child's best interests, if the parties could not agree upon a parental coordinator, to award the mother sole decision-making authority over their child's education. Likewise, the Supreme Court properly disqualified, without a hearing, the individual whom the parties had previously selected to arbitrate issues relating to their child's education, in light of its decision to award the mother sole decision-making authority as to the child's education. Moreover, contrary to the father's contention, the attorney for the child did not overstep his authority in requesting that the father be directed to pay for his share of the child's preschool education costs. It held that the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in, sua sponte, enjoining the father from bringing any further motions in this action without the permission of the Supreme Court. While public policy generally mandates free access to the courts, the record reflected that the father forfeited that right by abusing the judicial process through vexatious litigation (see Vogelgesang v. Vogelgesang, 71 AD3d 1132, 1134).

Award of Interim Counsel Fees of $140,000 to the Nonmonied Spouse Was Warranted Where There Was a Significant Disparity in the Financial Circumstances of the Parties

In Palmeri v Palmeri, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 3505748 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which granted defendant temporary maintenance of $7,500 per month and interim counsel fees of $100,000, and an order which granted the defendant additional interim counsel fees of $40,000. It observed that an award of interim counsel fees is designed to create parity in divorce litigation by enabling the nonmonied spouse to litigate the action on equal footing with the monied spouse. Thus, "an award of interim counsel fees to the nonmonied spouse will generally be warranted where there is a significant disparity in the financial circumstances of the parties" (Princhip v. Princhip, 52 A.D.3d at 65. Here, the husband earned more than $3 million from his medical practice in 2008, and the resources available to him far exceeded those available to the wife, who was unemployed at the time she sought pendente lite relief. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding her interim counsel fees totaling $140,000. Furthermore, the husband had demonstrated no basis on which to modify the award of temporary maintenance to the wife. Modifications of pendente lite awards should rarely be made by an appellate court and then only under exigent circumstances, such as where a party is unable to meet his or her financial obligations, or justice otherwise requires. The husband had not established that the temporary maintenance obligation imposed upon him by the Supreme Court's pendente lite order would leave him unable to meet his own needs, or that other exigent circumstances warranting modification existed. Accordingly, it held that any perceived inequities in the pendente lite order can best be remedied by a speedy trial, at which the parties' financial circumstances can be thoroughly explored.

Antithetical to Grant Standing Due to Existence of No Contact Order.

In Matter of Thomas X, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2640258 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which dismissed Wayne RR.'s applications, in two proceedings for custody of the children. When the Broome County Department of Social Services alleged that respondent Megan X. (mother) had violated the terms of Family Court's order directing her to ensure that her children (born in 1997, 2002 and 2003) have no contact with her boyfriend, Wayne RR. (petitioner), who is a known sex offender, she surrendered her parental rights. The mother had previously admitted to allegations of neglect after allowing unsupervised and inappropriate contact between petitioner and the children. Thereupon, petitioner commenced two proceedings seeking custody of the children. Finding that petitioner lacked standing, Family Court dismissed his petitions without a hearing. Family Court also granted a one-year order of protection in favor of the children against petitioner and denied his subsequent motion to vacate that order. The Appellate Division held that inasmuch as petitioner has no biological relationship to the children, his standing to seek custody was determined under the common-law standard requiring the establishment of extraordinary factual circumstances (see Matter of Bennett v. Jeffreys, 40 N.Y.2d 543, 548 [1976]). While the mother's surrender, the absence of the biological fathers from the children's lives and the lack of any other suitable relative may normally be considered as extraordinary circumstances the Appellate Division agreed with Family Court that it would be antithetical here to grant standing in spite of the existence of the no contact order. The mother admitted neglect based, in part, on allowing petitioner, who had a history of exposing himself to children, to have unsupervised contact with the children, to sleep in the same bed with the male middle child and to shower and urinate in the toilet together with the oldest male child. Given the lack of any real factual dispute regarding petitioner's role in the circumstances leading to the mother's admission of neglect and the issuance of an order directing her to ensure that he have no contact with the children, it would not disturb Family Court's conclusion that he lacked standing to seek custody.

Motion to Dismiss Pursuant to CPLR 3211 May Be Directed Only Against a Cause of Action or a Defense, Not a Motion

In Matter of Burnham v Brenna, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2624043 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the father moved to dismiss the mother's motion pursuant to CPLR 2221 to renew her prior motion and for an award of an attorney's fee. The Appellate Division held that Family Court properly denied the father's motion, because a motion to dismiss pursuant to CPLR 3211 may be directed only against a cause of action or a defense, not a motion (see CPLR 3211[a], [b]). The proper response to the mother's motion would have been to submit opposition papers (see CPLR 2214[b]).

It Is Error as a Matter of Law to Make an Order Respecting Custody, Even in a Pendente Lite Context, Based on Controverted Allegations Without a Full Hearing

In Matter of Swinson v Brewington, 84 A.D.3d 1251, 925 N.Y.S.2d 96 (2d Dept, 2011) petitioner father and the respondent mother were in a relationship from 2001 to 2004, but were never married. Their son David was born on May 10, 2002. From the time of his birth, David lived with his mother in Brooklyn while his father visited him at least four times a month. There was no court order concerning David's custody. In the Spring of 2006 the father moved to Tennessee. Beginning in 2007, David spent the summer with his father in Tennessee, and remained during the school year in Brooklyn with his mother. The father also traveled to Brooklyn to visit David during the Christmas holiday season in 2006, 2007, and 2008. At the end of the summer in August 2009, the father enrolled David in school in Tennessee, rather than return David to his mother in Brooklyn. He also filed a petition for custody. Shortly thereafter, the mother filed a cross petition for custody. When the parties initially appeared before the Family Court on September 8, 2009, the Family Court decided that David should remain in Tennessee so as not to disturb the status quo until the court received more information, since David had started school on August 10, 2009. Toward that end, the Family Court referred the matter to a judicial hearing officer for an evidentiary hearing. On October 26, 2009, the parties appeared before the Judicial Hearing Officer, at which time no testimony was taken or exhibits received, although the father indicated he was prepared to go forward. There was only oral argument on the issue of temporary custody. In support of his petition, the father annexed David's file from PS 329, David's former school in Brooklyn, which included his school records and his teachers' notes regarding various behavior issues and interactions with the mother. PS 329's file showed that for the 2008/2009 school year, David had excessive absences, was frequently tardy, and performed poorly. It also documented that from April to June 2009, David used profanity toward his teacher and classmates on numerous occasions, pushed his classmates, and punched himself. The teachers' notes also indicated that the mother was asked to leave the school grounds one morning when she began harassing another child about bothering David, and failed to attend an appointment with school personnel to discuss David's behavior. During this appearance, the attorney for the child stated, without submitting any evidence in support of her comments, that David was a special needs child and, as such, would not receive the services as provided for by PS 329 pursuant to his Individual Education Plan at his school in Tennessee. She acknowledged that David did not want to choose between his parents because he loved both of them, but it was her position that the mother should be issued a temporary order of custody. The father objected to the attorney for the child making a "report" and providing her own recommendation to the Judicial Hearing Officer. He disputed the statements made by the attorney for the child with respect to the sufficiency of David's school in Tennessee and sought to enter David's Tennessee school records into evidence. However, the Judicial Hearing Officer refused to admit the records or proceed with a hearing. In an order dated October 26, 2009, the Judicial Hearing Officer awarded temporary custody of David to the mother. The Appellate Division pointed out that as a general rule, while temporary custody may be properly fixed without a hearing where sufficient facts are shown by uncontroverted affidavits, it is error as a matter of law to make an order respecting custody, even in a pendente lite context, based on controverted allegations without having had the benefit of a full hearing. The Judicial Hearing Officer erred in relying on the report of the attorney for the child and refusing to take testimony and receive documentary evidence offered by the father to refute the report. While attorneys for the children, as advocates, may make their positions known to the court orally or in writing, presenting reports containing facts which are not part of the record or making ex parte submissions to the court are inappropriate practices (citing Weiglhofer v. Weiglhofer, 1 A.D.3d 786, 788, 766 N.Y.S.2d 727 n.). Here, the Judicial Hearing Officer erroneously allowed the attorney for the child to refer to matters that were not in evidence, and compounded its error by refusing to allow the father to proffer documentary evidence to contradict the assertions of the attorney for the child.

An Oral Directive Placed upon the Record and Transcribed into the Minutes of the Proceeding May Form the Basis for Contempt

In Matter of Lagano v Soule, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2637330 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), prior to adjourning the April 2006 hearing the Judge repeatedly advised respondent-grandmother that she was required to produce the child on May 2, 2006, and respondent, in turn, indicated that she understood the court's directive. When Soule failed to appear or produce the child as ordered, the court awarded the mother sole legal custody with visitation to the father. After eventually locating and regaining physical custody of her son, the mother commenced a violation proceeding. The Appellate Division found that the mother established a prima facie case of a willful violation as to Soule and, as such, Family Court erred in granting the motion to dismiss. There was no question that she had actual knowledge of the Judge's oral directive. It held that "an oral 'order' or directive, issued in the contemnor's presence, placed upon the record and transcribed into the minutes of the proceeding, may be deemed a 'mandate' ... and, hence, may form the basis for contempt" (citing Matter of Betancourt v. Boughton, 204 A.D.2d 804, 808 [1994]). It was clear from a review of the April 2006 transcript, of which Family Court took judicial notice, that Soule was repeatedly and unequivocally ordered by the Judge to produce the child at the May 2006 court appearance, which, despite her acknowledgment of this directive and her expressed understanding thereof, Soule thereafter failed to do. Further, Soule's defiance of this clear and lawful mandate, as well as her subsequent conduct in secreting the child's whereabouts for the ensuing three years, plainly prejudiced the mother's parental rights and, was sufficient to establish a willful violation of the April 2006 order. In a footnote the court observed that Family Court, without objection, took judicial notice of "all prior proceedings involving [the child at issue]. The mere fact that the court did so in the context of a separate Family Court proceeding involving the child was of no moment, as a court may take judicial notice of prior judicial proceedings though in a different court and involving different parties. Family Court also took judicial notice of Judge Connerton's May 2006 order.

Expert Opinion Based on Hearsay Not Admissible Where Proper Foundation Not Laid

In Matter of Anthony WW, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2637279 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) licensed psychologists who examined respondent, in their reports and in their trial testimony, made reference to statements about respondent attributed to other witnesses who did not testify at trial, none of which was admitted into evidence or was otherwise qualified for admission pursuant to a recognized exception to the rule against hearsay. Danger testified that, in forming his opinion, he relied on his interview with respondent, as well as the results of various psychological tests that he performed on him. Danger also reviewed records that petitioner had on file regarding respondent, including case, progress and supervision notes, all of which were compiled during a four-year period beginning in 2003, as well as documents describing mental health treatment that respondent received during this time period. While Danger did not testify that this evidence was commonly relied upon in his profession to perform such an evaluation, Family Court determined that it was proper for him to refer to it, because some of this evidence was contained in the trial testimony given by other witnesses or in records that had been properly admitted into evidence at trial. However, the court did acknowledge that some of the references in Danger's report should not have been admitted and, for that reason, directed that a section of his report, entitled "Review of Records," be stricken because it referred to evidence that had not been admitted at trial. Significantly, Danger was never asked what impact this redacted evidence had on his evaluation of respondent and what effect, if any, it had on his opinion regarding respondent's mental condition. Similar issues existed with Liotta's report and testimony, both of which were admitted into evidence at trial. When he was first retained to perform his evaluation, Liotta was provided with petitioner's complete file on respondent. Later, he was asked to return the file and then, pursuant to a court order, was provided with a limited record to review. Liotta was also directed to limit his review to the records provided and not base his evaluation on respondent's fitness as a parent on statements made by the mother about respondent or on any collateral interviews that he may have conducted with other individuals regarding respondent. However, it was clear from the content of his report, as well as his testimony at trial, that Liotta, in forming his final opinion regarding respondent's fitness as a parent, relied on observations of respondent made by his eldest son's mental health provider as well as on statements made by the mother about respondent. In addition, Liotta's interviews with respondent's caseworker and his current mental health therapist were referenced in his report and obviously played a role in the opinion that he ultimately offered regarding respondent's mental illness and its impact on his ability to be a parent. Like Danger, Liotta was never asked if this evidence was normally relied on within his profession as appropriate for the performance of such an evaluation and, while some of it was redacted, including any reference to his interview with the mental health therapist, Liotta was never asked what impact this evidence had in formulating his final opinion as to respondent's fitness as a parent. As a result, a proper foundation was not laid for the admission of the testimony of either psychologist or their reports. In footnotes the court pointed out that a redacted version of respondent's records from 2005 through 2007 was admitted into evidence at the trial. It also noted that Danger's evaluation focused on respondent's ability to function and contained recommendations for treatment. It was not performed for the specific purpose of determining whether respondent had the ability to provide an acceptable level of care for his children and, for that reason alone, should not have been admitted into evidence (see Social Services Law 384-b).

Frye Hearing Not Necessary for Validation Testimony. Once a Scientific Procedure Has Been Proved Reliable, a Frye Inquiry Need Not Be Conducted

In Matter of Bethany F, 925 N.Y.S.2d 737 (4 Dept, 2011) respondent father appealed from an order that placed him under the supervision of petitioner based on a finding that he sexually abused his daughter. The Appellate Division affirmed holding that Family Court did not abuse its discretion in denying his motion for a Frye hearing with respect to the admissibility of validation testimony of a court-appointed mental health counselor. "Once a scientific procedure has been proved reliable, a Frye inquiry need not be conducted each time such evidence is offered and courts may take judicial notice of its reliability (People v. Hopkins, 46 A.D.3d 1449, 1450, 848 N.Y.S.2d 460]; see People v. LeGrand, 8 N.Y.3d 449, 458, 835 N.Y.S.2d 523, 867 N.E.2d 374). Here, the court-appointed counselor utilized the Sgroi method to interview the child and make a determination with respect to the veracity of her allegations. The Court of Appeals has cited to Dr. Sgroi's "Handbook of Clinical Intervention in Child Sexual Abuse" (see Matter of Nicole V., 71 N.Y.2d 112, 120-121, 524 N.Y.S.2d 19, 518 N.E.2d 9140, and other courts in New York State have admitted validation testimony of experts who have utilized the Sgroi method. The court-appointed counselor testified at the hearing that the Sgroi method was used by "all" counselors in the field to validate allegations of sexual abuse. Inasmuch as a Frye hearing is required only where a party seeks to introduce testimony on a novel topic (see People v. Garrow, 75 A.D.3d 849, 852, 904 N.Y.S.2d 589), and there was no indication in the record that the methods used by the court-appointed counselor to validate the allegations of sexual abuse in this case were novel, the father's motion for a Frye hearing was properly denied.

Disposition Based Almost Entirely upon Proof That Court Elicited Is Expressly Disapproved. Function of the Judge is to Protect the Record at Trial, Not to Make It.

In Matter of Kyle FF, 926 N.Y.S.2d 196 (3 Dept, 2011) in August 2010, respondent (born in 1995) appeared in Family Court and admitted to committing acts that, if committed by an adult, would constitute the crime of criminal mischief in the fourth degree. At the dispositional hearing that followed, the parties stipulated to the admission of the predispositional report, which recommended, among other things, that respondent be placed on probation for two years subject to various special conditions. Although the parties asked that Family Court accept that recommendation and indicated that they intended to offer no further proof in this regard, Family Court called as its own witness the author of the report and questioned her extensively regarding respondent's prior admission to the local hospital's mental health unit and a subsequent mental health evaluation conducted by the Northeast Parent & Child Society. In response to this testimony, Family Court then indicated that it would not close the proof until it obtained the corresponding records for respondent's admission/evaluation and stated its intent to issue subpoenas to that effect. Following additional discussion, Family Court agreed to accept the discharge summary from respondent's hospital admission and closed the proof. Thereafter, relying almost exclusively upon proof that it elicited, Family Court ordered that respondent be placed with the Office of Children and Family Services until August 31, 2011. The Appellate Division held that Family Court improperly assumed a prosecutorial role by eliciting testimonial and documentary evidence at the dispositional hearing. Although respondent did not object when Family Court called the author of the predispositional report as a witness and, further, stipulated to the admission of the discharge summary, thereby rendering this issue unpreserved for review it exercised its discretion and reversed Family Court's order. The Appellate Division observed that Family Court is vested with the discretion to call witnesses, including the author of the predispositional report (see Family Ct. Act 350.4[2]), and may assume "a more active role in the presentation of evidence in order to clarify a confusing issue or to avoid misleading the trier of fact" (People v. Arnold, 98 N.Y.2d 63, 67[2002]). However, "[t]he overarching principle restraining the court's discretion [in this regard] is that it is the function of the judge to protect the record at trial, not to make it" and the court must take care to avoid assuming "the function or appearance of an advocate" (Matter of Yadiel Roque C., 17 A.D.3d at 1169). Here, even though the parties agreed with the recommendation made by the Probation Department, Family Court called and extensively questioned the author of the predispositional report, secured the production of additional documentary evidence and then, according essentially no weight to the underlying recommendation and the parties' expressed wishes, crafted a disposition based almost entirely upon proof that it elicited—a practice with which this Court previously had expressed its disapproval (see Matter of Keaghn Y., 921 N.Y.S.2d at 739; Matter of Blaize F. [Christopher F.], 74 A.D.3d 1454, 1455 [2010]; Matter of Stampfler v. Snow, 290 A.D.2d 595, 596[2002]). Accordingly, Family Court's order was reversed and, as respondent's placement had not yet expired, the matter was remitted for a new dispositional hearing before a different judge.

Family Court Deprived Father of Right to Procedural Due Process by Denying Right to Cross-examine

In Matter of Middlemiss v Pratt, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2637285 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), pursuant to a prior order of custody, the parties shared joint custody of their child and had equal parenting time on alternating weeks. The mother cross-petitioned for modification, seeking full custody and parenting time with the father as agreed upon by the father and the child. During the fact-finding hearing, the mother completed her direct testimony but, due to witness availability and upon the consent of the parties, witnesses were then taken out of order, and the father was not afforded an opportunity to cross-examine the mother. The mother called several more witnesses, including the child, who testified in open court under oath. After the child testified, Family Court, sua sponte, concluded that it did not need to permit any cross-examination of the mother or any testimony from the father-or, indeed, to allow the presentation of any further evidence-in order to reach a decision. The court then suspended the father's parenting time and concluded the proceeding and, later, issued a written order embodying its decision. The Appellate Division reversed on the law agreeing with the father's contention that Family Court deprived him of his right to procedural due process. Although the father did not preserve this argument through objection, the argument was held to be properly before the Appellate Division, as Family Court's abrupt termination of the proceedings afforded him no opportunity to enter any objection. In a proceeding pursuant to Family Ct Act article 6 seeking modification of a prior custody order, a " 'full and comprehensive hearing' " is required. At such a hearing, due process requires that a parent be afforded a full and fair opportunity to be heard. Family Court abjectly denied the father due process by refusing him any opportunity to cross-examine a key witness, the mother, present any witnesses or even testify on his own behalf . It reversed and remitted for a full hearing on the merits and, given Family Court's wholesale refusal to entertain the father's position, directed that the case be remitted to a different judge for further proceedings .

Court of Appeals Holds That Marital Property' Within the Meaning of Domestic Relations Law 236 Includes the Proceeds of Fraud

In Commodity Futures Trading Commission v Walsh, --- N.E.2d ----, 2011 WL 2471544 (N.Y.) the Second Circuit certified the following two questions to the Court of Appeals. "(1) Does 'marital property' within the meaning of New York Domestic Relations Law 236 include the proceeds of fraud? "(2) Does a spouse pay 'fair consideration' according to the terms of New York Debtor and Creditor Law 272 when she relinquishes in good faith a claim to the proceeds of fraud?" The Second Circuit also invited the Court to "reformulate these questions as it sees fit, or expand them to address any other issues of

New York law pertinent to these appeals". The wife asserted that she validly acquired certain assets pursuant to a settlement agreement, and that by entering into this agreement she became a good faith purchaser for value of the distributed property. The Agencies responded that monies derived from the securities fraud were not part of the marital estate in the first instance and, consequently, cannot be retained or transferred through equitable distribution of marital assets under Domestic Relations Law 236. The Court concluded that given that it had repeatedly held that the scope of marital property is to be "construed broadly" (see e.g. Mesholam v. Mesholam, 11 N.Y.3d 24, 28 [2008]) the proceeds of fraud can constitute marital property as defined in Domestic Relations Law 236 and it answered the first certified question in the affirmative. It is therefore possible under the Domestic Relations Law to transfer assets derived from fraud to an innocent and unknowing spouse in a divorce proceeding. The Court held that ex-spouses have a reasonable expectation that, once their marriage has been dissolved and their property divided, they will be free to move on with their lives. To hold that the proceeds of fraud acquired by one spouse unbeknownst to the other cannot be subject to equitable distribution or conveyed through a settlement agreement as marital property would undermine one of the fundamental policies underlying the equitable distribution process, namely finality. The exception proposed by the Agencies would effectively undo court orders and settlement agreements for an indeterminate time after the "winding up of the parties' economic affairs" and "subvert the policy of upholding settled domestic relations ... in divorce cases". The Court accepted for purposes of answering the Second question the Second Circuit's assumption that the marital estate here "consisted almost entirely of the proceeds of fraud". It noted that there are other valid forms of consideration that are relevant to the determination of fair consideration, even where the bulk of a marital estate consists of ill-gotten gains. It reformulated the second question to read as follows: "Is a determination that a spouse paid 'fair consideration' according to the terms of New York Debtor and Creditor Law 272 precluded, as a matter of law, where part or all of the marital estate consists of the proceeds of fraud?" As reformulated, and under its analysis, it answered this question in the negative. The Court held that an innocent spouse who received possession of tainted property in good faith and gave fair consideration for it should prevail over the claims of the original owner or owners consistent with this State's strong public policy of ensuring finality in divorce proceedings.

Failure to Send Itemized Bills Every 60 Days Results in Reduction of Counsel Fee Award from Spouse

In Moyal v Moyal, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2473023 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that while there is no uniform rule for fixing the value of a business for the purpose of equitable distribution the Special Referee did not sufficiently explain her basic concurrence in the valuation of the husband's business by the wife's appraiser despite the numerous recognized flaws in his report, including, among other things, the insufficient examination and murky explanation of its accounts receivable, the unclear rationale for the particular earnings multiple chosen, the inadequate explanation for the application of a gross profit margin, unsubstantiated assumptions regarding personal use of business credit cards and the consideration of industry trends without adequate basis. It held that the husband's $1.2 million loan receivable should have been included as part of the marital estate, since he did not carry his burden to show that he did not use marital funds to make the loan. The Special Referee awarded the wife an additional $65,000 in counsel fees, substantially less than the total amount requested ($161,972.50, an amount that included a prior award of $25,000). In support of her decision to award less than the amount requested, the Special Referee took into account the substantial equitable distribution award, the $5,000 maintenance award, the fact that the wife "[p]lainly ... has more liquid assets than the husband," that numerous motions by the wife were "soundly defeated" and that "certain litigation strategy by the wife's counsel was nonproductive." The Special Referee noted the failure of the wife's counsel to comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.2, which entitles the client "to receive a written, itemized bill on a regular basis, at least every 60 days." The Special Referee also noted that counsel had provided a "mere four bills" over a 26-month period of the representation. The bills "lumped together multiple legal services rendered and [a] total amount for ... all of those services." One such bill lumped together dozens of separate services counsel provided and stated the total number of hours (136) for all the services. A computer printout providing considerably more specificity concerning the number of hours spent on each day that services were provided was admitted into evidence at the hearing. But for that printout and counsel's testimony that the daily entries were prepared either contemporaneously or shortly thereafter, the Court stated that it would direct an additional reduction in the fee award. Without impugning counsel's integrity, the Court stated that it thought that the printout was not an adequate substitute for the itemized bills required by 22 NYCRR 1400.2. It agreed with the Special Referee that "where there is a different individual to be charged by the court there should be an available higher level of scrutiny." Nonetheless, it appeared that the Special Referee reduced the award on account of counsel's failure to comply with this requirement of 22 NYCRR 1400.2, one of the rules "promulgated to address abuses in the practice of matrimonial law". Under all the circumstances of this case, it declined to exercise its discretion to further reduce the amount of the award.

In Voluntary Arbitration, Attorneys' Fees May Not Be Recovered Unless Expressly Provided for in the Arbitration Agreement

In Berg v Berg, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2478948 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) plaintiff and the defendant, who were separated, agreed to arbitrate the dissolution of their marriage before a rabbinical court, or Beth Din. They subsequently divorced, and the Beth Din limited the arbitration to the financial issues. The Beth Din issued an award dated January 6, 2008. The Supreme Court denied plaintiff's motion to vacate so much of the arbitration award as awarded an attorney's fee to the defendant and directed him to pay all of the defendant's legal expenses in all future matters in which he is the plaintiff, and granted defendant's cross motion which was to confirm that portion of the arbitration award. The Appellate Division held that the arbitrators erred in awarding an attorney's fee to the defendant and in directing the plaintiff to pay all of the defendant's legal expenses in all future matters in which he is the plaintiff. In a voluntary arbitration, attorneys' fees may not be recovered unless they are expressly provided for in the arbitration agreement.

Family Court Has No Jurisdiction to Make Support Award in Absence of a Petition for Such Relief

In Matter of Suffolk County Department of Social Services v Myrick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2496631 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the Support Magistrate's determination that respondent should pay child support arrears in the sum of $54 per week from February 2008 through November 2008 was properly based upon income imputed to him. Since the father confirmed that he lost his job as a home health aide in February 2008, but could not give a reason as to why his employment was terminated, the Support Magistrate providently exercised her discretion in determining that the loss of the father's earning ability was brought about by his own actions and thereupon imputing income to him based upon his past employment history. However, it agreed with the father that the Support Magistrate erred in directing him to pay $10 per week in spousal support. The Family Court has no jurisdiction to make such an award in the absence of a petition for such relief (see Family Ct Act 422).

Second Department Holds That 529 Plan College Fund Is Not a Bank Account under Stipulation for Division of Assets

In Zuchowski v Zuchowski, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2279060 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties 2009 stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but did not merge into their judgment of divorce that was entered on June 17, 2009 provided that "all joint bank accounts have been split to the mutual satisfaction of the parties and here and forward each party shall keep any bank accounts in their respective names; namely, the wife in her name, the husband in his name." The stipulation also provided that "each party is responsible to pay the 50/50 share of college" for their children, but "the children shall avail themselves of every possible loan, grant or any other moneys offered to them by the college before the parties are respectfully [sic] required to contribute towards the education of the children." In an order dated January 11, 2010, the Supreme Court granted the defendant former husband's motion which was, in effect, to direct the plaintiff former wife to provide him with quarterly statements relating to a "529 Plan" sponsored by the State of New Hampshire and managed by Fidelity Investments, which the parties had established as a college fund for their son Peter, and to apply the money in the subject account to Peter's college expenses before either party would be required to contribute to such expenses. The former wife moved for leave to reargue, contending that since the 529 Plan was in her name, it was, under the terms of the stipulation of settlement, separate property belonging to her, and thus should be applied to reduce only her share of Peter's college costs. The account statements named the former wife as the "participant" and Peter as the "beneficiary," and the record indicated that the participant is considered to be the owner of the account assets until they are withdrawn. Supreme Court granted the former wife's motion and, upon reargument, vacated the portion of its January 11, 2010, order relating to the 529 Plan.

The Appellate Division reversed on the law. It observed that when interpreting a contract, the court should arrive at a construction which will give fair meaning to all of the language employed by the parties to reach a practical interpretation of the expressions of the parties so that their reasonable expectations will be realized. Contrary to the former wife's contention, the stipulation of settlement could not reasonably be interpreted as treating the 529 Plan as one of the "bank accounts" that the party named as the account holder was entitled to "keep." While the stipulation of settlement provided that "all joint bank accounts have been split to the mutual satisfaction of the parties," there was nothing in the stipulation to support a finding that the parties intended the monetary assets they were allocating between themselves to include Peter's college fund. Although the former wife was technically the owner of the funds in the 529 Plan, the reason for that account's existence was not to personally benefit either of the parties, but to fund Peter's college education. Accordingly, upon reargument, the Supreme Court should have adhered to its original determination directing the former wife to provide the former husband with quarterly statements relating to the 529 Plan, and to apply the money in that account to Peter's college expenses before either party would be required to contribute to such expenses.

Failure to Agree on a Modified Visitation Schedule Is Not a "Default" for Purposes of Attorneys Fee Provision

In Matter of Allegretti v Fitzpatrick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2279571 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Family Court did not err in denying her motion for an award of an attorney's fee in connection with her petition to modify the visitation provisions set forth in a stipulation that was incorporated but not merged into the parties' judgment of divorce. The stipulation provided, among other things, that the parties were to "re-evaluate" the established visitation arrangements when their child began school. The stipulation also provided that in the event that either party defaulted with respect to their obligations thereunder, that party would be responsible for paying the attorney's fee incurred by the other party in an enforcement proceeding. The Family Court correctly concluded that the parties' failure to agree on a modified visitation schedule once their child began school did not constitute a "default" under the terms of the stipulation. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the mother's motion for an award of an attorney's fee.

Appellate Division Holds That Emancipation Occurs When Child Becomes Economically Independent Through Employment and Is Self-supporting.

In Smith v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2571089 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, granted the wife child support and spousal support. It found that the record supported the Support Magistrate's determination that the parties' son was not emancipated. It pointed out that a parent is obligated to support his or her child until the age of 21 unless the child becomes emancipated, which occurs once the child becomes economically independent through employment and is self-supporting. Although the parties' son worked full-time, paid for his own car insurance, and paid for his own cell phone, the fact that his mother still paid for his food, shelter, clothing, and health and dental insurance, demonstrated that he was not economically independent of his parents.

Family Court Lacks Jurisdiction to Consider Objections Unless Proof of Service Filed

In Matter of Girgenti v Cress, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2571850 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the father appealed from an order of the family court which dismissed his petition to enforce a stipulation of settlement concerning child support arrears. The Appellate Division affirmed the order finding that the issues raised by the father on this appeal are not reviewable, since he failed to file proof of service of a copy of the objections on the mother. Family Court Act 439(e) provides, in pertinent part, that "[a] party filing objections shall serve a copy of such objections upon the opposing party," and that "[p]roof of service upon the opposing party shall be filed with the court at the time of filing of objections and any rebuttal." By failing to file proof of service of a copy of his objections on the mother, the father failed to fulfill a condition precedent to filing timely written objections to the Support Magistrate's order. Consequently, the Family Court lacked jurisdiction to consider the merits of the objections and the father waived his right to appellate review.

Denial of Objections to Finding of Willfulness and Recommendation of Incarceration Proper since Recommendations Had No Force or Effect until Confirmed

In Matter of Ceballos v Castillo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2572307 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that to establish entitlement to a downward modification of a child support order entered on consent, a party has the burden of showing that there has been a substantial change in circumstances. Loss of employment may at times constitute a substantial change in circumstances. A party seeking a downward modification of his or her child support obligation based upon a loss of employment has the burden of demonstrating that he or she diligently sought to obtain employment commensurate with his or her earning capacity. Here, the father testified that he was unable to pay child support because he had not worked since 2008 and was not eligible to receive unemployment benefits. He stated that he had been working for the Renaissance Hotel until May 2008, but that he left that job after the hotel significantly cut back his hours. He thereafter obtained employment at a pizzeria, where he was initially able to work longer hours. Although he was eventually let go from his position at the pizzeria, he did not, contrary to the Support Magistrate's finding, quit the pizzeria job. The father further testified in detail that he attempted to obtain employment at various specified restaurants and supermarkets; that he went to an employment agency called Labor Ready to find a job; that he looked for employment in newspapers and the "Pennysaver" publication; and that he explored job leads which he learned of via word-of-mouth. Under these circumstances, the father demonstrated that his loss of employment constituted a substantial change in circumstances, and that he made a good faith effort to obtain new employment which was commensurate with his qualifications and experience. Thus, the Support Magistrate's determination that the father failed to satisfy his burden of establishing an inability to pay his child support obligation was not supported by the evidence. Accordingly, the father's objections to the denial of his petition for downward modification of his child support obligations should have been granted.

The Appellate Division pointed out that to the extent that the father filed objections to the Support Magistrate's finding of willfulness and her recommendation of a term of incarceration of six months, the denial of those objections was proper, since the Support Magistrate's recommendations had no force and effect until confirmed by the Family Court Judge. Upon, in effect, confirming the willfulness finding, the Family Court issued an order of commitment directing that the father be committed to the Westchester County Jail unless he purged his contempt by paying the sum of $1140 to the Support Collection Unit. The father's failure to pay child support constituted prima facie evidence of a willful violation. This prima facie showing shifted the burden to the father to come forward with competent, credible evidence that his failure to pay support in accordance with the terms of the order on consent was not willful. In the absence of proof of an ability to pay, an order of commitment for willful violation of a support order may not stand. Based upon the evidence in the record, the father met his burden of establishing his inability to meet his child support obligation set forth in the order dated April 11, 2005. The evidence did not support the Support Magistrate's finding that the father had the means, resources, and ability to pay child support, but chose not do so.

Counsel Sanctioned for Obtaining From Court a "So-Ordered Trial Subpoena Before Trial Date Was Set

In Duval v Duval, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2574001 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying defendant's motion to impose sanctions upon the plaintiff and her counsel pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1. Under the circumstances presented, the conduct of the plaintiff and her counsel in obtaining a "so-ordered" subpoena duces tecum and serving it upon Long Island Jewish Medical Center to obtain the defendant's medical records prior to filing a note of issue and before a trial date was set was frivolous within the meaning of 22 NYCRR 130-1.1(c), as it was completely without merit in law and cannot be supported by a reasonable argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law. Contrary to the defendant's contention, pretrial disclosure on the issue of child custody is permissible with respect to a parent's health, since the parties to a contested custody proceeding place their physical and mental conditions in issue. Here, in her attempt to obtain pretrial disclosure of the defendant's medical records in connection with the issue of child custody, the plaintiff sought a "so-ordered" trial subpoena duces tecum from the Supreme Court, thereby obviating the need to obtain the defendant's written authorization to release the records. The plaintiff also failed to serve the subpoena on the defendant in a timely manner, thus depriving him of the opportunity to request withdrawal of the subpoena or to make a timely motion to quash. Moreover, it can be inferred from the record that the challenged conduct was designed primarily to harass and maliciously injure the defendant. In view of the foregoing, the defendant's motion to impose sanctions upon the plaintiff and her counsel pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 should have been granted. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a hearing on the issue of the amount of an appropriate sanction to be imposed upon the plaintiff and her counsel. The Appellate Division also held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying, with limited exception, defendant's motion to suppress all information relating to the contents of records produced in response to the subpoena duces tecum served upon Long Island Jewish Medical Center and to preclude the plaintiff from using such information. Under the circumstances of this case, suppression and preclusion, along with the imposition of a sanction, were the appropriate remedies for the improper manner in which those records were obtained (see CPLR 3103[c]). Accordingly, that branch of the defendant's motion which was to suppress all information relating to the contents of records produced in response to the subpoena served upon Long Island Jewish Medical Center and to preclude the plaintiff from using such information should have been granted in its entirety, with a directive that the plaintiff and her counsel deliver all records produced in response to the aforementioned subpoena to the defendant and to affirm that all such records, and any copies thereof, have been so returned and/or destroyed and were not transmitted to any third party.

The Marriage Equality Act

On June 24, 2011 New York enacted "The Marriage Equality Act", which amended the domestic relations law to grant same-sex couples the ability to enter into civil marriages in New York. (See Laws of 2011, Ch. 95 and Laws of 2011, Ch. 96, both signed into law on June 24, 2011, effective on July 24, 2011.) New York, has joined Vermont and New Hampshire in becoming the third state to pass legislation permitting same-sex marriage. The only other U.S. jurisdictions that permit same-sex marriage are the District of Columbia, which also passed a same-sex marriage law, and Massachusetts, Connecticut and Iowa which permit same-sex marriage as a consequence of court rulings.

The Marriage Equality Act provides that an otherwise valid marriage shall be valid regardless of whether the parties are of the same sex or different sex. To ensure that the law does not improperly intrude into matters of conscience or religious belief, the Act affirms that no member of the clergy can be compelled to solemnize any marriage. The law also ensures that the statutory protections for religious organizations found in the New York Human Rights law remains intact, including, guaranteeing that religious institutions remain free to choose who may use their facilities and halls for marriage ceremonies and celebrations, to whom they rent their housing accommodations, or to whom they provide religious services, consistent with their religious principles. The Act contains language to ensure that benevolent organizations remain exempt from New York prohibitions against discrimination in public accommodations, and are not be required to rent social halls to weddings of same-sex or other couples it chooses not to accommodate.

The Domestic Relations Law was amended by adding two new sections Domestic Relations Law §§10-a and 10-b to read as follows:

§ 10-a. Parties to a marriage.

1. A marriage that is otherwise valid shall be valid regardless of whether the parties to the marriage are of the same or different sex.
2. No government treatment or legal status, effect, right, benefit, privilege, protection or responsibility relating to marriage, whether deriving from statute, administrative or court rule, public policy, common law or any other source of law, shall differ based on the parties to the marriage being or having been of the same sex rather than a different sex. When necessary to implement the rights and responsibilities of spouses under the law, all gender-specific language or terms shall be construed in a gender-neutral manner in all such sources of law.

§ 10-b. Religious exception.

1. Notwithstanding any state, local or municipal law, rule, regulation, ordinance, or other provision of law to the contrary, a religious entity as defined under the education law or section two of the religious corporations law, or a corporation incorporated under the benevolent orders law or described in the benevolent orders law but formed under any other law of this state, or a not-for-profit corporation operated, supervised, or controlled by a religious corporation, or any employee thereof, being managed, directed, or supervised by or in conjunction with a religious corporation, benevolent order, or a not-for-profit corporation as described in this subdivision, shall not be required to provide services, accommodations, advantages, facilities, goods, or privileges for the solemnization or celebration of a marriage. Any such refusal to provide services, accommodations, advantages, facilities, goods, or privileges shall not create any civil claim or cause of action or result in any state or local government action to penalize, withhold benefits, or discriminate against such religious corporation, benevolent order, a not-for-profit corporation operated, supervised, or controlled by a religious corporation, or any employee thereof being managed, directed, or supervised by or in conjunction with a religious corporation, benevolent order, or a not-for-profit corporation.

2. Notwithstanding any state, local or municipal law or rule, regulation, ordinance, or other provision of law to the contrary, nothing in this article shall limit or diminish the right, pursuant to subdivision eleven of section two hundred ninety-six of the executive law, of any religious or denominational institution or organization, or any organization operated for charitable or educational purposes, which is operated, supervised or controlled by or in connection with a religious organization, to limit employment or sales or rental of housing accommodations or admission to or give preference to persons of the same religion or denomination or from taking such action as is calculated by such organization to promote the religious principles for which it is established or maintained.3. Nothing in this section shall be deemed or construed to limit the protections and exemptions otherwise provided to religious organizations under section three of article one of the constitution of the state of New York.

Domestic Relations Law § 13 Marriage licenses, was amended to add the last sentence which provides that “No application for a marriage license shall be denied on the ground that the parties are of the same, or a different, sex.

Domestic Relations Law §11 was amended to make clear that no member of the clergy acting in such capacity may be required to perform any marriage. Domestic Relations Law §11, subdivision 1 was amended, to add the provision that “no clergyman or minister as defined in section two of the religious corporations law, or Society for Ethical Culture leader shall be required to solemnize any marriage when acting in his or her capacity under this subdivision, and subdivision 1-a was added.

The legislation provides that it is “...to be construed as a whole, and all parts of it are to be read and construed together. If any part of this act shall be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, the remainder of this act shall be invalidated. Nothing herein shall be construed to affect the parties’ right to appeal the matter. “

Fair Trial Denied Where Family Court Judge Took on the Function and Appearance of an Advocate

In Matter of Jacquilin M, 83 A.D.3d 844, 922 N.Y.S.2d 111 (2 Dept, 2011) Jacquilin M. appealed from an order of disposition of the Family which, upon a fact-finding order of a hearing, finding that the appellant committed acts which, if committed by an adult, would have constituted the crimes of grand larceny in the fourth degree and criminal possession of stolen property in the fifth degree, adjudged her to be a juvenile delinquent, and placed her on probation for a period of 18 months. The order of disposition was reversed on the law and as a matter of discretion in the interest of justice, the fact-finding order was vacated, and the matter is remitted to the Family Court for a new fact-finding hearing. The appellant's contention that she was deprived of a fair trial because the Family Court Judge took on the function of an advocate by excessively intervening in the fact-finding hearing was unpreserved for appellate review. However, the Appellate Division reached this issue in the exercise of its interest of justice jurisdiction because the Family Court Judge's excessive intervention deprived the appellant of her right to a fair fact-finding hearing. It observed that although trial courts may appropriately take an active role in the presentation of evidence "in order to clarify a confusing issue or to avoid misleading the trier of fact" (People v. Arnold, 98 N.Y.2d 63, 67, 745 N.Y.S.2d 782, 772 N.E.2d 1140), the function of the judge is "to protect the record at trial, not to make it". Thus, while a certain degree of judicial intervention in the presentation of evidence is permissible, "the line is crossed when the judge takes on either the function or appearance of an advocate at trial" (People v. Arnold, 98 N.Y.2d at 67, 745 N.Y.S.2d 782, 772 N.E.2d 1140; see People v. Zamorano, 301 A.D.2d 544, 546, 754 N.Y.S.2d 645). These principles apply in bench trials, including juvenile delinquency proceedings. Here, the Family Court Judge took on the function and appearance of an advocate by extensively participating in both the direct and cross-examination of the two presentment agency witnesses and eliciting testimony which strengthened the presentment agency's case. Furthermore, when the appellant indicated, during the course of her direct examination, that a certain document which would support her defense had been turned over to a Probation Department officer, the Judge interrupted her testimony to question a Probation Department Court Liaison who was present in the courtroom about whether documents of this nature would indeed be kept by the Probation Department. The Judge then summoned the Probation Department officer assigned to the appellant's case to the courtroom, and indicated to the appellant's attorney that unless he agreed to stipulate as to what certain Probation Department records would reflect, those records would be admitted into evidence through the Probation Officer's testimony. It was clear from the record that neither the presentment agency nor the appellant's attorney intended to call the Probation Officer as a witness or enter the Probation Department records into evidence, and the stipulation regarding what those records reflected had the effect of rebutting a portion of the appellant's testimony. Thus, the Judge essentially "assumed the parties' traditional role of deciding what evidence to present". Furthermore, the Judge offered no explanation on the record as to why he felt compelled to solicit this evidence. Under these circumstances, a new fact-finding hearing was warranted.

Third Department Explains Difference Between in Camera Hearing and True Lincoln Hearing

In Matter of Spencer v Spencer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2150028 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were the parents of three children (born in 1997, 1999 and 2001). In their divorce judgment, the parties agreed to joint legal custody, physical placement with respondent (mother), and visitation with petitioner (father) every other weekend. In 2009, the father commenced a proceeding seeking to modify the custodial arrangement based upon an improper relationship that the mother's male friend had with one of the parties' children while in the mother's care. Family Court temporarily placed the children with the father. After several court appearances and an in camera interview with each of the children, the court issued an order awarding primary physical custody to the father and extensive visitation to the mother. The Appellate Division found that the mother did not consent to the court making and order without a hearing, and held that Family Court erred by modifying the custody order without holding a fact-finding hearing. The father's petition adequately alleged a change in circumstances, namely that the mother exposed the children to a convicted sex offender and she was aware that this individual had an inappropriate relationship with one of the children. The mother admitted that an inappropriate relationship occurred, but denied knowing about it. The parties disagreed about most of the other allegations. The mother specifically objected to the court's failure to hold a hearing, and the court lacked record information that would permit it to determine whether the alleged change in circumstances required a modification of the prior custody order. A court may not grant a final order based upon mere allegations and a request by an attorney for a party or the children; evidentiary proof is required. Thus, it reversed the order on the law and remitted for Family Court to hold a hearing on the petition.

The Appellate Division observed that Family Court and the parties inaccurately referred to the in camera interviews with the children as a Lincoln hearing. The purpose of a Lincoln hearing in a custody proceeding "is to corroborate information acquired through testimonial or documentary evidence adduced during the fact-finding hearing" (Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d 270, 273 [1969]). Thus, a true Lincoln hearing is held after, or during, a fact-finding hearing; there is no authority or legitimate purpose for courts to conduct such interviews in place of fact-finding hearings, and Family Court erred in doing so here. Additionally, it cautioned the court to protect the children's right to confidentiality by avoiding disclosure of what children reveal in camera during a custody proceeding.

Unsubstantiated Allegations Insufficient to Warrant the Invocation of Temporary Emergency Jurisdiction under UCCJEA.

In Segovia v Bushnell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2150113 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondent, the mother of two sons (born in 1999 and 2002), refused to release the children to the paternal grandparents for visitation and instead brought them to New York from Texas. A Texas court thereafter issued a temporary order granting custody to the father and petitioner, the paternal grandmother. Petitioner then commenced a proceeding seeking registration and enforcement of the Texas order (Domestic Relations Law 77-d, 77-g). Respondent did not contest registration of the Texas order, but requested that Family Court exercise temporary emergency jurisdiction based on her allegations that the paternal grandparents had sexually abused the children (Domestic Relations Law 76-c). Family Court placed the children in the temporary custody of the Department of Social Services and ordered an investigation into respondent's allegations. Upon conclusion of the investigation, Family Court found the allegations to be unfounded and granted enforcement of the Texas order. The Appellate Division affirmed. Family Court heard, without objection, testimony that the children met with a local sexual abuse validator who determined that there was no sexual abuse, and it reviewed an investigative report prepared by authorities in Texas after respondent made the same allegations there. The Texas authorities conducted an exhaustive review and found no evidence to substantiate the allegations of sexual abuse. In light of the information rebutting respondent's claims, it agreed with Family Court that her unsubstantiated allegations were insufficient to warrant the invocation of temporary emergency jurisdiction.

The Rights and Needs of the Children Must Be Accorded the Greatest Weight in a Relocation Case

In Alaire K.G. v Anthony P.G.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2135385 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department, in an opinion by Justice Moskowitz, observed that the appeal, involving a custodial parent's request to relocate with the parties' child, fell within the class of cases that "present some of the knottiest and most disturbing problems that our courts are called upon to resolve" (Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d 727, 736 [1996]). The parties were married in January 2004, separated about a year and a half later and were divorced on July 13, 2006. They were the parents of a now six-year-old boy born on May 17, 2004. The stipulation settling the divorce case granted the mother legal and physical custody of the child. The father had visitation every week from Monday at 8:00 p.m. until Wednesday at 6:00 p.m. The stipulation allowed relocation within 25-miles of the father's house in the Bronx.

The father had a history of irregular employment and was currently not employed. At the time of trial, the mother, who was remarried, cared for her younger child from her second marriage, full time. After the parties separated, the mother remained in the marital apartment in the Bronx with the child for two years. In the fall of 2007, she began working as a project administrator in the construction field. In 2007, she moved with the child and her boyfriend to Connecticut. The mother testified that she always wanted her son to be in a suburban environment. She stated that she was trying "to mirror my own childhood. I had a wonderful suburban upbringing." The relationship in Connecticut ended when the boyfriend returned to his native New Zealand. The mother returned to New York with the child and moved into an apartment in Harlem. In March 2008, the mother met her future husband, Hugh Bonnar, on Match.com. Bonnar was retired from the Air Force, lived in North Carolina and was then involved in a nation-wide job search. Ultimately, Bonnar took a job with Northrop Grumman in San Diego. He had requested to work at Northrop Grumman's Long Island branch, but the company could not accommodate his request. The mother and Bonnar became engaged in May 2008. Soon after her engagement, the mother approached the father about moving to California to live with Bonnar. The father was concerned about the distance and the stability of the mother's new relationship. The parties therefore met with a mediator to try to work out an arrangement by which the mother could leave the child with the father temporarily while she settled in California. The mediator sent a letter, dated May 12, 2008, that purported to memorialize the parties' agreement. The letter stated that the parties agreed that the child would stay with the father from June 27, 2008 until December 31, 2008, with the mother making several long weekend visits to New York. Mother and son were also to participate in a webcam phone call two to three times a week. The letter did not address where the child would live after December 31, 2008. However, the father refused to sign an agreement embodying these terms and instead asked the mother to sign over custody to him. She refused. The mother left for California on June 26, 2008. She claimed that she never intended the father to have permanent custody, but arrangements to move to California had become irreversible by the time she learned that the father did not agree. The mother gave birth to Bonnar's son on April 4, 2009. She and Bonnar were also married in April 2009.

On July 17, 2008, the father filed a petition seeking sole legal and physical custody of the parties' child, claiming that the mother had abandoned the child. On December 1, 2008, the mother filed a petition for relocation.

Justice Moskowitz pointed out that each relocation request must be considered on its own merits with due consideration of all relevant facts and circumstances and with the predominant emphasis being placed on what outcome is most likely to serve the best interests of the child" (citing Tropea v. Tropea 87 N.Y.2d 727, 739 [1996]). The dissent stated that Tropea dictates that the court's "central concern" should be the impact of the move on the relationship between the child and the noncustodial parent. Justice Moskowitz held that this interpretation misreads the case. Tropea states that "[o]f course, the impact of the move on the relationship between the child and the noncustodial parent will remain a central concern." However, it is not "the" central concern. Rather, the case makes abundantly clear that "it is the rights and needs of the children that must be accorded the greatest weight". She noted that the Court of Appeals rejected the "three-tiered" analysis that required a court to determine first "whether the proposed relocation would deprive the noncustodial parent of regular and meaningful access to the child".

The court found that there was a sound and substantial basis in the record for the determination granting the mother's request to relocate to California with her son. First, there was no question that the California home was financially more stable than the father's home. The stepfather had a steady job with Northrop Grumman that provided his family with health insurance. By contrast, the father was not currently working. Although he had been offered a job as a teacher's aide, he had postponed his start date. He was currently on some type of public assistance and received money from his parents in Ireland. He admitted that "it's not been easy like money wise." He was not currently in a relationship. Given his bleak financial circumstances, with no career or family in New York, it appeared that there was nothing keeping the father from moving to San Diego himself to be closer to his son. The Court quoted that part of Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d at 740 which said "where the custodial parent's reasons for moving are deemed valid and sound, the court in a proper case might consider the possibility and feasibility of a parallel move by an involved and committed noncustodial parent as an alternative to restricting a custodial parent's mobility". Further, living in San Diego ensured that the child would grow up in the same house as his half brother. The father agreed that it was very important for the child to have a brother in his life. He even testified that he actually expected the child eventually to move to California so that he could be with his brother, the father was merely opposed to the date of the move. The mother established that the child would have access to an education that was just as good as, if not better than, his school in New York. Moreover, she testified that Bonnar's status as a veteran would allow the child to attend college within the State of California's university system free of charge. The record also reflected that the mother went out of her way to facilitate communication between the child and his father. The same could not be said of the father with respect to communication between the child and his mother. Finally, the child's own attorney recommended that the court permit the mother to relocate with the child, a factor that militated in favor of affirming the result the court reached.

Justice Moskowitz commented that the dissent's characterization of the mother as putting her own romantic interests ahead of her son's welfare was rank speculation. It was just as likely that the mother, herself an only child, was pursuing marriage aggressively to produce a sibling for her son, before he became much older, and an intact family. Regardless of the mother's motivations, it is the best interest of the child that must guide the decision.

The Court found that the visitation schedule, that required the mother to pay for air travel for the child to be with the father on numerous extended weekend visits throughout the year in addition to extended summer and holiday visits, did not deprive the father of the opportunity to maintain a close relationship with his son .

Memorandum of Understanding Was Not a Final Agreement Even Though it Contemplated Parties' Subsequent Execution of "Opting-out Agreement"

In Vega v Papaleo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2224860 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff commenced the action for divorce in 2006 on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. In 2008, after engaging in protracted litigation and settlement negotiations, the parties, both of whom were represented by counsel, signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) that provided for distribution of the parties' marital assets. Plaintiff's attorney then notified Supreme Court that the matter had been resolved and the case, which had been scheduled for trial, was removed from the trial calendar. Thereafter, plaintiff was presented with a settlement agreement but refused to sign it. Plaintiff subsequently retained new counsel and the matter was restored to the trial calendar. After several pretrial conferences, Supreme Court granted a motion by defendant for summary judgment, seeking a judgment granting plaintiff a divorce and incorporating, but not merging, the terms of the MOU into the judgment of divorce. A judgment of divorce was entered accordingly, prompting this appeal by plaintiff.

On appeal Plaintiff argued that the MOU was not an enforceable agreement and that, even if it is enforceable, it should be set aside on the basis that her attorney fraudulently induced her to sign the document by misrepresenting its legal significance. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that as the movant for summary judgment, defendant met his initial burden of demonstrating that the MOU was an enforceable agreement under Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(3), as the document, itself was in writing, subscribed by the parties, and acknowledged or proven in the manner required to entitle a deed to be recorded" (Domestic Relations Law 236[B] [3]; see CPLR 2104). Plaintiff conceded that the MOU met the statutory requirements. Her argument that it was not enforceable because it was not "endorsed" in open court was unavailing, as there is no requirement that a properly executed written settlement agreement be so endorsed. Thus, the burden shifted to plaintiff to demonstrate by the proffer of admissible evidence the existence of material issues of fact requiring a trial. To that end, plaintiff submitted her own affidavit, and the affirmations of her current attorney and a friend who accompanied her to her then attorney's office on the day she signed the MOU. According to those submissions, plaintiff did not wish to sign the MOU because it did not address certain assets, but she ultimately signed it based upon her then attorney's assurances that those issues could be raised at a later time. Plaintiff alleges that she would not have signed the MOU if she had known that it would be considered a final agreement. As to the merits, plaintiff had not alleged that defendant, or anyone acting on defendant's behalf, perpetrated any fraud or duress upon her. While plaintiff may have other remedies available to her, her allegations--relating solely to her attorney's conduct--were insufficient to set aside the MOU.

The Appellate Division also rejected plaintiff's argument that the MOU was not a final agreement because it contemplated the parties' subsequent execution of an "opting-out agreement." The MOU provided that it "will be incorporated into a full opting-out agreement to be signed by the parties containing these terms and only those other terms which are necessary to have a full and complete opting-out agreement, but due to the time constraints, [the parties] may not have the ability to finalize an opting-out agreement prior to the date scheduled for trial." The MOU then goes on to address, in detail, numerous issues including, among other things, a division of various items of real property, business interests, bank accounts, retirement accounts, marital debt and maintenance payments. It also contained a provision that "any additional terms and agreements to be contained within the opting-out agreement shall not alter or change any of the terms or conditions set forth in this [MOU]." Although the MOU directed entry into a further agreement, its terms were not contingent upon entry into such agreement. Accordingly, plaintiff failed to raise a question of fact sufficient to defeat defendant's motion.

Family Court's Determination That the Child Was Emancipated Pursuant to the Terms of the Parties' Stipulation Did Not Preclude the Child from Filing His Own Support Petition

In Wakefield v Wakefield, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2089752 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties October 2006 stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce provided for joint legal custody of their two children. It further provided that the mother would have physical custody of the children and that both parents would provide child support until the happening of an emancipating event, which included either of the children's "permanent residence away from the residence of the wife." The parties were divorced on January 29, 2007, and, in October 2008, the subject child moved from his mother's home to the father's home. In March 2009 the father filed a petition seeking to modify the support provisions of the stipulation of settlement so as to receive child support from the mother, upon the ground that the subject child was living with him. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate granted the petition, finding that the subject child's residence with the father constituted a change in circumstances warranting an award of child support to the father. Family Court granted the mother's objections to the extent of "deeming" the subject child to be emancipated pursuant to the parties' stipulation, and dismissed the father's petition. On September 24, 2009, the subject child filed his own petition seeking support from his mother. At a hearing on the petition, both the subject child and the father testified that the subject child was 18 years old, that he lived with the father, and that he attended Suffolk Community College full time. In an order dated February 8, 2010, the Support Magistrate granted the subject child's support petition. Family Court denied the mother's objection to the order dated February 8, 2010, rejecting her contention that the subject child was emancipated and, not entitled to child support. It also rejected the mother's contentions that the award was not based upon adequate evidence, and that a child who commences a support proceeding on his or her own behalf may not be awarded an attorney's fee. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court's determination that the subject child was emancipated pursuant to the terms of the parties' stipulation did not preclude the subject child from filing his own support petition. "A husband and wife, in entering into a separation agreement, may include in that agreement provisions pertaining to the support of the children of their marriage. The terms, like any other contract clauses, are binding on the parties to the agreement. The child, on the other hand, is not bound by the terms of the agreement ... and an action may be commenced against [a parent] for child support despite the existence of the agreement" (citing Matter of Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 212). Since the subject child moved from his mother's residence to the father's residence with his parents' consent, the subject child was entitled to adequate support from his mother. It also held that the Family Court properly rejected the mother's contention that the child was not entitled to an award of an attorney's fee (citing Family Ct Act 422 [a], 438[a]).

Motions to Enforce the Terms of a Stipulation of Settlement Are Not Subject to Statutes of Limitation. An Application or Motion for the Issuance of a QDRO Is Not Barred by the Statute of Limitations

In Denaro v Denaro, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2090821 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff former wife and the defendant former husband, who was a police officer employed by the New York City Police Department, were married in 1981. By a judgment entered July 2, 1997, they were granted an uncontested divorce. In a Stipulation and Agreement of Settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, the parties agreed that the plaintiff would be entitled to a certain percentage of the marital portion of the defendant's police retirement benefits. The parties acknowledged in the stipulation that a valuation of those benefits had been performed, and they agreed that that valuation would "be utilized to prepare a Qualified Domestic Relations Order to be submitted to the Court as soon as practicable after the Judgment of Divorce is signed." No Qualified Domestic Relations Order was submitted at that time. The defendant retired from the NYPD in 2003, after 20 years of service, and he began collecting his pension. In January 2010 the plaintiff submitted a proposed QDRO to the Supreme Court, requesting the Supreme Court to enforce the stipulation to the extent of issuing an appropriate QDRO. The defendant moved to vacate the retirement provision of the stipulation. Supreme Court granted the plaintiff's application and denied the defendant's motion. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the defendant's contention, the statute of limitations does not bar issuance of the QDRO. It held that motions to enforce the terms of a stipulation of settlement are not subject to statutes of limitation.. Because a QDRO is derived from the bargain struck by the parties at the time of the judgment of divorce, there is no need to commence a separate 'action' in order for the court to formalize the agreement between the parties in the form of a QDRO. It pointed out that the Court had expressly held that an application or motion for the issuance of a QDRO is not barred by the statute of limitations (citing Bayen v. Bayen, 81 AD3d at 866-867). The defendant also contended that the plaintiff's failure to submit the QDRO to the Court within 60 days of entry of the divorce judgment (see 22 NYCRR 202.48) barred its issuance thereafter. The Appellate Division found defendant's contention to be without merit because that court rule does not apply to a QDRO, which is merely a mechanism to effectuate payment of a party's share in a retirement plan. The plaintiff's right to her share of the defendant's pension was created by the stipulation and the judgment of divorce, and it was not abandoned when the QDRO was not filed within 60 days. It also rejected the defendant's claim that the doctrine of laches barred the plaintiff's entitlement to the QDRO. Invocation of laches requires a showing of both delay and prejudice. The delay in submitting a QDRO for execution was lengthy, but the defendant had not shown any prejudice to himself resulting from the plaintiff's delay. The Court also rejected defendant's claim that the plaintiff waived her right to her share of the defendant's retirement benefits. The plaintiff's delay in submitting the QDRO to the Supreme Court did not evince an intent to waive her rights. Waiver does not result from negligence, oversight, or inattention, and it may not be inferred merely from silence.

An Interim Restraint on the Disposition or Encumbrance of Property Should Not Be Imposed Absent a Demonstration That the Party to Be Restrained Has Done, or Is Threatening to Do, an Act Which Would Prejudice the Movant's Equitable Distribution Claim.

In Many v Many, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902259 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Residence to Meet His Pendente Lite Maintenance Obligation. The wife appealed from an order denying her motion to restrain the defendant husband from encumbering the marital residence, and in effect, authorized the defendant to refinance the equity in the marital residence and to use any funds obtained therefrom for the sole purpose of paying his pendente lite maintenance obligation. The order also directed the defendant to pay arrears for his pendente lite maintenance obligation retroactive to only February 1, 2010, and awarded her an attorney's fee of $15,000. The appellate division held that supreme court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in failing to restrain the defendant husband from encumbering the marital residence. It pointed out that an interim restraint on the disposition or encumbrance of property should not be imposed absent a demonstration that the party to be restrained has done, or is threatening to do, an act which would prejudice the movant's equitable distribution claim. Here, no evidence indicated that the defendant had done, or was threatening to do, an act that would threaten the plaintiff's equitable distribution claim. The court noted that while the plaintiff may be entitled to an equitable share of the value of the marital residence, that issue had yet to be adjudicated. At a later date, the supreme court would be able to ensure that the plaintiff was reimbursed for her equitable share of any funds used by the defendant as a result of the sale or refinancing of the marital residence.

Family Court Act Provides for the Award of an Attorney's Fee Only to a Prevailing Party in a Violation Proceeding

In Matter of Shvetsova v Paderno, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902198 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father appealed from an order of the Family Court which denied his objection to an order of the Court which granted the mother's motion for an award of an attorney's fee and awarded her $11,500. The Appellate Division observed that the attorney's fee at issue was awarded to the mother for legal fees she incurred in defending against the father's petition for a downward modification of his child support obligation, and in prosecuting her petition to hold the father in civil contempt for his alleged violation of a prior support order. In a related appeal, it reversed the Family Court's denial of the father's petition for downward modification of his child support obligation and remitted the matter to the Family Court for a new determination of the father's child support obligation and arrears. In light of the decision and order in the related appeal, it reversed the award of an attorney's fee to the mother insofar as it was in connection with her defense against the father's petition. In addition, in the same related appeal, it reversed the Family Court's finding that the father willfully violated the prior support order. Therefore, although the Family Court Act provides for the award of an attorney's fee to a prevailing party in connection with a violation proceeding (see Family Ct Act 438 [b]), here, the mother was not entitled to such an award. Accordingly, it directed that after the Support Magistrate makes a new determination of the father's petition for a downward modification of his child support obligation, in accordance with its decision and order in the related appeal, the Support Magistrate shall make a new determination on the mother's motion for an award of an attorney's fee. Any award of an attorney's fee, if warranted, shall be limited to fees incurred in connection with the mother's defense against the father's petition.

Family Court Act 1028 Hearing Is Triggered by the Removal of a Child from the Home

In Matter of Lucinda R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902203 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the question presented on this appeal was whether a Family Court Act 1028 hearing is triggered by the removal of a child from the home of one parent and temporary placement into the custody of another parent or relative, or whether such hearing is triggered only where a child is placed into government-administered foster care. The Appellate Division concluded that the Family Court erred in denying the mother's application for a hearing under Family Court Act 1028. In relevant part, that section provides: "(a) Upon the application of the parent or other person legally responsible for the care of a child temporarily removed under this part or upon the application of the [attorney for the child] for an order returning the child, the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the child should be returned (i) unless there has been a hearing pursuant to [Family Court Act 1027] on the removal of the child at which the parent or other person legally responsible for the child's care was present and had the opportunity to be represented by counsel, or (ii) upon good cause shown. Except for good cause shown, such hearing shall be held within three court days of the application and shall not be adjourned." The disposition of the mother's application here turned on the meaning of the word "removal," as used in the statute. The Family Court found that there was no removal within the meaning of Family Court Act 1028 because "when a child is moved from the [petitioner's] home to the non respondent father's home [,] that ... is not a removal and it does not generate a basis for a 1028 hearing." The Family Court reasoned that "1028 hearings protect the primacy of parental right[s] as against the state, not as against the parent vs. parent." Justice Belen wrote that the Appellate Division disagreed. In assessing the Family Court's interpretation of the statute, it begins with the language of the statute itself, "as the statutory text is the clearest indicator of legislative intent. If the terms of the statute are clear and unambiguous, the court should construe it so as to give effect to the plain meaning of the words used. On its face, Family Court Act 1028 does not limit a hearing only to parents whose children have been placed in the custody of a governmental agency. There is no qualification to its application whatsoever. It plainly and simply states that, upon the application of a parent of a child who has been temporarily removed, the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the child should be returned, and this must be done within three court days without adjournment. The Court pointed out that these rules of strict construction, however, cannot be applied without regard to the statute as a whole, as its various sections must be considered together and with reference to each other. The purpose of article 10 of the Family Court Act is to provide a due process of law for determining when the state, through its family court, may intervene against the wishes of a parent on behalf of a child so that the child's needs are properly met. (Family Ct Act 1011). The Appellate Division held that the Family Court's finding of a legal distinction between a child's removal from the home and placement in the custody of another parent, on one hand, and placement in the custody of a governmental agency, on the other hand, was illusory. In either case, it is the State acting within its parens patriae power effectuating that transfer and removal. Accordingly, the Court found that that the applicability of a Family Court Act 1028 hearing is not dependent on whether the child removed is placed with another parent or whether the child is placed in foster care. In sum, the trigger is that the State has acted to effectuate the removal of the child from the home and placed him or her in the custody of another.

Allegations of a Family Offense Are Not Subject to the Defense of Laches or Statute of Limitations. The Issue in Family Offense Matters Is Not the Age of the Threat but the Imminence of the Danger.

In Matter of Opray v Fitzharris, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902204 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the wife initiated a family offense proceeding on or about April 7, 2010, alleging that the husband committed the family offenses of assault and aggravated harassment during various incidents occurring in April 2001 and December 2006, as well as on January 6, 2010, April 3, 2010, and April 6, 2010. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court properly dismissed allegations in the petition regarding incidents alleged to have occurred in April 2001 and December 2006. It pointed out that allegations of a family offense are not subject to the defense of laches or statute of limitations (citing Matter of Ashley P., 31 AD3d 767, 769; Matter of Nina K. v. Victor K., 195 Misc.2d 726, 727). The issue in family offense matters is not the age of the threat but the imminence of the danger. (Matter of Nina K. v. Victor K., 195 Misc.2d at 727). Here, in addition to the remoteness of the allegations, the Family Court properly determined that they did not bear upon the existence of an "immediate and ongoing danger" to the wife or children (see Family Ct Act 827). However, it found that the Family Court erred in determining that the wife failed to establish a prima facie case of aggravated harassment with respect to the incident alleged to have occurred on April 6, 2010. In determining a motion to dismiss for failure to establish a prima facie case, the evidence must be accepted as true and given the benefit of every reasonable inference which may be drawn therefrom. The question of credibility is irrelevant, and should not be considered. Here, viewing the wife's testimony in the light most favorable to her, and accepting her testimony as true, the wife failed to establish a prima facie case of assault in the third degree or aggravated harassment in the second degree with respect to the incident alleged to have occurred January 6, 2010. The wife did, however, establish a prima facie case of aggravated harassment in the second degree based on her testimony that during a telephone conversation on April 6, 2010, the husband threatened, among other things, to find her and kidnap the children (see Penal Law 240.30[1][a]). The petition was reinstated and the matter remitted to the Family Court, for a new fact-finding hearing and for a new determination of the petition with respect to the allegations regarding the events of April 6, 2010.

Defense of Action for Fraudulent Misrepresentation Is Not an Enforcement of Rights Within Meaning of Counsel Fee Provision of Agreement

In Etzion v Etzion, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902589 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), an action, inter alia, to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentation in connection with negotiations relating to a stipulation of settlement dated June 8, 2005, which was incorporated, but not merged, into the parties August 16, 2005 judgment of divorce, the facts of the action were set forth in the decision and order on a prior appeal (see Etzion v. Etzion, 62 AD3d 646). On this appeal, the plaintiff contended that the Supreme Court erred in denying her motion pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (7) to dismiss a counterclaim asserted by the defendant former husband, Rafael Etzion (defendant), for an award of an attorney's fee pursuant to the terms of a stipulation of settlement entered into by the defendant and the plaintiff on June 8, 2005, or, in the alternative, for summary judgment dismissing the counterclaim. The Appellate Division observed that the fundamental, neutral precept of contract interpretation is that agreements are construed in accord with the parties' intent. Where the contract is clear and unambiguous on its face, the intent of the parties must be gleaned from within the four corners of the instrument, and not from extrinsic evidence. Thus, a written agreement that is complete, clear and unambiguous on its face must be enforced according to the plain meaning of its terms. Courts may not by construction add or excise terms, nor distort the meaning of those used and thereby make a new contract for the parties under the guise of interpreting the writing. Thus, a court will not imply a term where the circumstances surrounding the formation of the contract indicate that the parties, when the contract was made, must have foreseen the contingency at issue and the agreement can be enforced according to its terms. The construction and interpretation of an unambiguous written contract is an issue of law within the province of the court. It found that the defendant's counterclaim for an award of an attorney's fee was based on an overbroad reading of an attorney's fee provision in the parties' stipulation of settlement executed on June 8, 2005 which was subsequently incorporated, but not merged, into their judgment of divorce. The parties' separation agreement, at Article XXV, paragraph 3, stated, in relevant part: "In the event either party is forced to seek aid of counsel in enforcing any rights pursuant to this Stipulation, and in the event that party is successful in enforcing such right(s), the other shall reimburse him or her for any reasonable attorneys' fees necessarily incurred in enforcing such rights. The provisions of this paragraph shall be in addition, and without prejudice or limitation, to any other rights or remedies to which the aggrieved party may be entitled. The parties agree that the purpose of this paragraph is to prevent unnecessary litigation between them and to encourage each to fulfill his or her responsibilities under the terms of this Stipulation as fully as possible" The defendant, in his counterclaim, asserted that he was entitled to an award of an attorney's fee pursuant to the fees provision because he had been forced, in effect, to defend his rights under the separation agreement. However, the agreement clearly and unambiguously provided that only the party seeking to enforce any rights under the agreement shall be entitled to an attorney's fee, if successful. The defendant was not enforcing any rights under the agreement by simply defending against the plaintiff's motion. Had the parties intended the fees provision to be construed as the defendant contended, they were free to expressly so provide. The Court pointed out that where documentary evidence utterly refutes the proponent's factual allegations, conclusively establishing a defense as a matter of law, a motion to dismiss may be properly granted. Based upon the documentary evidence, consisting of the agreement, the plaintiff conclusively established, as a matter of law, that the defendant was not entitled to an award of an attorney's fee, regardless of the outcome of the current dispute. Accordingly, the Supreme Court erred in denying the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the defendant's counterclaim pursuant to CPLR 3211 (a)(1).

Stipulation Void as Against Public Policy, since it Expressly Required the Former Wife to Seek Dissolution of the Marriage and "Provided for the Procurement of Grounds of Divorce

In Charap v Willett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902605 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were divorced by judgment dated March 30, 2009. In a related appeal the Appellate Division affirmed the judgment of divorce insofar as appealed from. The former wife initially contested the divorce action commenced in 2003. After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court determined that the former husband failed to prove his alleged grounds for divorce. The parties then entered into a custody agreement and the former wife filed an amended answer dated May 7, 2007, containing a counterclaim for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The former husband waived his reply and, while neither admitting nor denying the allegations, consented to the former wife obtaining a divorce on that ground. A nonjury trial was held on the financial issues, and a judgment of divorce was issued on March 30, 2009. By order to show cause dated July 29, 2009, the former wife moved, inter alia, to direct the former husband to comply with a theretofore confidential stipulation between the parties dated May 7, 2007, and to pay back maintenance and child support in the sum of $13,587.61, plus interest. The stipulation was subscribed by the parties and notarized, but, in accordance with its provisions, was kept confidential from the court during the trial on financial issues. In the stipulation, the former husband agreed, inter alia, to pay the former wife $65,000 over and above a future equitable distribution award, and to pay her counsel $10,000. In exchange, the former wife agreed to promptly prepare an amended answer and counterclaim for a divorce alleging cruel and inhuman treatment. As soon as the court placed the matter on its calendar, the parties would proceed to inquest whereby the grounds for a divorce would be finally and irrevocably determined. The Supreme Court denied the former wife's motion, finding the stipulation unenforceable and her claim of entitlement to back maintenance and child support without merit. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the May 7, 2007, stipulation was void as against public policy, since it expressly required the former wife to seek dissolution of the marriage and "provides for the procurement of grounds of divorce" (General Obligations Law 5-311). As the offending provision represented the only consideration provided by the former wife for the agreement, which did not contain a severability provision, the stipulation was void in its entirety (cf. Taft v. Taft, 156 A.D.2d 444).

Supreme Court providently imputed $200,000 per year in income to the former wife, an attorney, for child support purposes.

In Charap v Willett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1902606 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1982. There were two children of the marriage, born in 1990 and 1995, respectively. The former husband left the marital residence in December 2002 and commenced this action for a divorce on March 17, 2003. After a nonjury trial on grounds for divorce, the Supreme Court determined that the former husband failed to prove his alleged grounds for divorce. On May 7, 2007, the parties entered into a "Stipulation as to Custody, Decision-Making and Parental Access," and the former wife filed an amended answer containing a counterclaim for divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The former husband waived his reply and, while neither admitting or denying the allegations, consented to the former wife obtaining a divorce on that ground. After an inquest, the divorce was granted, but entry of the divorce judgment was held in abeyance pending the resolution of ancillary issues. The matter was transferred for trial on the remaining financial issues. After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court, inter alia, distributed the marital estate and directed the former husband to pay the former wife durational maintenance in the sum of $5,000 per month for two years. The court also imputed income to the former wife for child support purposes, pro-rated the parties' obligations, and directed the former husband to pay the former wife $3,859.34 per month in child support, plus direct payments of the children's college expenses and other add-ons. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Supreme Court properly rejected the former wife's request for lifetime maintenance. First, a purported agreement dated March 19, 2001, which provided, inter alia, that the former wife would not be required to work outside the family home during a divorce, was ambiguous as to duration and, in any event, was not enforceable (see Domestic Relations Law 236[B][3]). Moreover, the former wife was an attorney who practiced law for almost 20 years and was capable of earning a significant salary. Given her skills, experience, and the children's mature ages, the Supreme Court appropriately limited maintenance to $5,000 per month for a period of two years. It also held that Supreme Court providently imputed $200,000 per year in income to the former wife for child support purposes. Child support is determined by the parents' ability to provide for their child rather than their current economic situation. In determining a party's child support obligation, the court 'need not rely upon the party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential. Courts are afforded considerable discretion in determining whether to impute income to a parent. Here, given the former wife's education, experience, and salary history, the imputed sum was supported by the record. Further, the court properly considered the statutory factors in capping the combined parental income at $300,000 for child support purposes, and there was no basis in this record for disturbing its determination. It held that Supreme Court providently awarded the former wife only 10% of the value of the former husband's law practice. The former wife made only indirect contributions to the former husband's career and was herself employed as an attorney for most of the marriage. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying the former wife's application for counsel fees, as she received a large distributive award and had a substantial earning capacity.

Cruel and Inhuman Treatment Divorce Granted

In Ying Jung Yan v Ke-en Wang, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 2184145 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted plaintiff's application for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. It found that Plaintiff's testimony that defendant directed her to have an abortion against her wishes and did not visit her during her two-week convalescence; that defendant often worked late into the evening and through the night and would not communicate his plans to plaintiff and ignored her telephone calls; that the parties fought often, both verbally and physically, especially after plaintiff refused to assist defendant in obtaining his green card; that defendant made false claims against plaintiff to the police; and that during an altercation, plaintiff suffered a serious laceration on her left forearm while attempting to block a knife yielded by defendant, amply established that defendant's conduct endangered plaintiff's physical and mental well-being and constituted cruel and inhuman treatment.

Improper to Incorporate Agreement into Judgment Where No Meeting of the Minds

In Alton v Alton, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1612577 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that the defendant husband contended that the Supreme Court erred in denying his motion which were to set aside the provisions of the parties' oral, on-the-record stipulation of settlement relating to equitable distribution, maintenance, his obligation to purchase an apartment for the plaintiff wife, and the validity of the parties' prenuptial agreement, because there was no meeting of the minds on an essential material term, to wit, the purchase price of the subject apartment. It held that since a judgment was entered that purported to incorporate the terms of the putative settlement, the defendant was precluded from challenging the validity or enforceability of the settlement by way of motion, but was required either to appeal from the judgment or commence a plenary action. Since the defendant appealed from the judgment, it reached the merits of the defendant's contention that no stipulation of settlement was, in fact, consummated. It noted that in determining whether an agreement exists, the inquiry centers upon the parties' intent to be bound and whether there was a meeting of the minds regarding the material terms of the transaction . A review of the transcribed proceedings at which the parties attempted to negotiate a settlement revealed that the parties never reached an agreement on the essential and material term regarding the purchase price of the apartment. The provisions relating to the apartment purchase were intertwined and integrated with the other provisions of the disputed stipulation of settlement, i.e., the provisions relating to equitable distribution, maintenance, and the validity of the parties' prenuptial agreement. Accordingly, the Supreme Court should not have incorporated the disputed stipulation of settlement provisions into the judgment of divorce.

Best Interest of Child Outweighed Application of Exclusionary Rule in Custody Case

In Matter of Young v Young, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 6622106 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which awarded the father sole custody of the parties child. It held that Family Court did not err in summarily denying the mother's motion to suppress certain evidence which she alleged was obtained illegally. In a custody case, the court is required to determine "solely what is for the best interest of the child, and what will promote its welfare and happiness, and make an award accordingly. It stated that the best interests of the child are determined by a review of the totality of the circumstances. It held that the application of the exclusionary rule to prevent the court from considering factors relevant to that determination, pertaining here to the condition of the home of a parent who was seeking custody, would have a "detrimental impact upon the fact-finding process and the State's enormous interest in protecting the welfare of children," which outweighed the deterrent effect of applying the exclusionary rule (citing Matter of Diane P., 110 A.D.2d 354, 354). It also rejected the mother's contention that the Family Court should have conducted a pretrial hearing as to the voluntariness of an admission she made and the effectiveness of her counsel in a neglect proceeding which had been brought against her. The mother testified as to these matters during the custody trial, such that the issues and her position thereon were before the Family Court. Family Court's determination that it was in the children's best interest for the father to be awarded custody had a sound and substantial basis in the record.

Well-established Precedent Overwhelmingly Supports a Party's Right to an Evidentiary Hearing Before a Finding of Contempt

In Bergman v Bergman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1796364 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a hearing is required on a contempt motion when the party opposing the motion asserts a defense of financial inability to comply. Domestic Relations Law s 246(3) in pertinent part states: "Any person may assert his financial inability to comply with ... an order or judgment ... as a defense in a proceeding instituted against him ... to punish him for his failure to comply ... and if the court, upon the hearing of such contempt proceeding is satisfied from the proofs and evidence offered ... that the defendant is financially unable to comply ... it may, in its discretion, until further order of the court, make an order modifying such order or judgment...." Further, Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(9)(b) provides that a party may seek downward modification if he or she has experienced a "substantial change in circumstances:" There is no limit to the number of times a party may seek downward modification. The party must demonstrate that there has been a substantial change in circumstances to merit any downward modification. There is no right to a hearing absent a prima facie showing of entitlement to downward modification. However, well-established precedent overwhelmingly supports a party's right to an evidentiary hearing before a finding of contempt (Boritzer v. Boritzer, 137 A.D.2d 477 [1988]; Comerford v. Comerford, 49 A.D.2d 818 [1975]; Singer v. Singer, 52 A.D.2d 774 [1976]; see also Gifford v. Gifford, 223 A.D.2d 669 [1996]). In Singer, this Court held that "[d]ue process requires that a hearing be held before one can be adjudged in contempt" , undoubtedly because a finding of contempt may result in incarceration as, indeed, it did in this case. Here, defendant has not had any opportunity to offer "proofs [or] evidence" at a hearing on either plaintiff's contempt motion or defendant's cross motion for downward modification. The court entirely ignored the affidavits prepared by a reputable forensic accountant, and the voluminous documentation defendant presented. In the court's opinion, defendant had "repeated days in court." However, on this motion, defendant clearly presented new financial information and an expert affidavit explaining that defendant's circumstances had changed, and not for the better. Accordingly, it held that defendant should have had a hearing to assess the new financial information and new expert affidavit.

Lifetime Maintenance Award of $200 per Week to Be Warranted Given the Identified Disparity in the Parties' Respective Incomes and the Wife's Reduced Earning Potential.

In Scarpace v Scarpace, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1797230 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) after 31 years of marriage, plaintiff (husband) commenced an action for divorce. The parties entered into a stipulation with respect to all issues with the exception of spousal maintenance. According to their stipulation, the marital property was divided such that each party would retain various liquid assets valued at approximately $580,000. The wife's share included the unencumbered former marital residence, appraised at $250,000, and a payment received from the husband in the amount of $110,000. The parties also stipulated, that they each retain their own pension rights as separate property. After a trial, Supreme Court awarded the wife maintenance in the amount of $200 per week for six years, effective May 22, 2009. On appeal the wife contended that Supreme Court erred in setting the amount of maintenance at $200 per week and in limiting its duration to six years. The wife argued that the maintenance award would impair her ability to save money and, because she would reach her intended retirement age when the maintenance award terminates, she will be forced to rely on her savings to maintain her standard of living. The Appellate Division modified the underlying judgment to the extent that the wife was to receive lifetime maintenance in the amount of $200 per week, retroactive to October 16, 2007, the date of her answer. The Appellate Division observed that "Maintenance is appropriate where, among other things, the marriage is of long duration, the recipient spouse has been out of the work force for a number of years, has sacrificed her or his own career development or has made substantial noneconomic contributions to the household or to the career of the payor". At the time of trial, both parties were in their mid-fifties and in generally good health. Throughout their marriage, they lived a financially conservative lifestyle, resulting in no college loans for their four emancipated children and no mortgage on the marital home. While the husband attended college and built his career, the wife worked various part-time and seasonal jobs and devoted her time to tending to the needs of their children. As a result, the wife did not commence her current full-time occupation with State Farm Insurance until approximately 1996, such that at the time of trial, her annual income was roughly $32,000. The husband was earning $104,000 per year as a 32-year employee of the Department of Taxation and Finance. While the husband estimated that he would receive over $5,000 per month from his pension alone upon retirement, the wife estimated that between Social Security retirement and her own pension, she would receive approximately $1,200 per month upon her retirement. The wife also testified that she was now required to pay for health and homeowner's insurance, school and property taxes and various utilities and household expenses, all of which previously had been paid for by the husband. Finally, the wife testified that, while she used to save $600 per month, since the divorce she can only afford to save $275 per month, and that she has accumulated $8,600 in credit card debt due to their son's college expenses. The Appellate Division was persuaded that an award of lifetime maintenance was appropriate here. While it was true that the parties enjoyed a modest standard of living during their marriage and that the wife not only can contribute toward her own support but also has received assets through equitable distribution, one of "the many specific considerations underlying an award of nondurational maintenance ... is the present and potential future income of the parties". Given the identified disparity in the parties' respective incomes and the wife's reduced earning potential, it found a nondurational maintenance award of $200 per week to be warranted.

Finding That MBA Made the Defendant a More Attractive Candidate for Position in the Financial Sector of the Cable Television Industry Enhanced His Earning Capacity and Was a Marital Asset.

In Huffman v Huffman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1817309 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff 30% of the value of defendant's master's degree, weekly child support of $1,281.14, and maintenance for four years commencing December 1, 2008, in the amounts of $5,000 per month for the first and second years, $3,500 per month for the third year, and $2,000 per month for the fourth year, and directed him to pay to the plaintiff $90,793.02 in connection with certain bonus money. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's determination of basic child support was proper. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in calculating child support against $300,000 of the defendant's income based upon the standard of living that the parties' children would have enjoyed had the marriage not dissolved and upon the parties' disparate financial circumstances, which were apparent from the record. Under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff maintenance for four years beginning December 2008, given the length of the parties' marriage, the plaintiff's ability to reenter the workforce, and the fact that the defendant was paying temporary support pursuant to a pendente lite order dated February 25, 2005, requiring him to pay the plaintiff $2,500 per month in maintenance retroactive to November 11, 2004. Thus, the maintenance award had to be recalculated retroactive to November 11, 2004, taking into account any credit due for amounts paid by the defendant pursuant to the pendente lite order. The Appellate Division disagreed with defendant's contention that the trial court erred in concluding that his MBA degree provided him with an enhanced earning capacity subject to equitable distribution. An academic degree earned during a marriage qualifies as marital property which is subject to equitable distribution (McGowan v. McGowan, 142 A.D.2d 355, 357). The value of a degree is the "enhanced earning capacity it affords the holder" (O'Brien v. O'Brien, 66 N.Y.2d 576, 588). Here, while the defendant presented some evidence that an MBA degree was not an actual prerequisite to his employment in various finance positions in the cable television industry, there was also ample evidence, including expert testimony, to support the Supreme Court's finding that the attainment of this degree made the defendant a more attractive candidate for a position in the financial sector of the cable television industry. Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly concluded that the MBA degree which the defendant obtained during the course of his employment enhanced his earning capacity. The Supreme Court also properly determined that the plaintiff was entitled to a 30% share of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity. Although the plaintiff did not make direct financial contributions to the husband's attainment of his MBA degree, she made substantial indirect contributions by, inter alia, supporting the husband's educational endeavors, working until August 2000 and contributing her earnings to the family, being the primary caretaker of the couple's children, cooking family meals, and participating in housekeeping responsibilities. Bonuses earned for work by a spouse during the marriage constitute marital property subject to equitable distribution, even if paid after commencement of the divorce action, and are distributed after taking income taxes into account. It saw no reason to disturb the Supreme Court's equitable distribution of the defendant's 2002 and 2003 bonuses. However, it agreed with the defendant's contention that the Supreme Court erroneously distributed his gross 2004 bonus without taking into account income taxes. Accordingly, upon remittal, to the Supreme Court the award had to be recalculated to the extent it is based upon the defendant's 2004 bonus, to take into account income taxes paid by the plaintiff.

Proper to Apply a Lack of Marketability Discount of 25% to Reflect the Risk Associated with the Illiquidity of a Close Corporation Whose Shares Cannot Be Freely Traded.

In Cooper v Cooper, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1817757 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married on April 8, 1984, and had two children, born in 1989, and 1992, respectively. Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff post-divorce maintenance of $5,000 per month for a period of four years, interest of 9% per annum on installment payments of the plaintiff's distributive awards, child support of $1,192.31 per week, based upon a finding that the defendant's "CSSA income is $250,000 per year," directed the defendant to maintain a life insurance policy for the benefit of the plaintiff and the children in the value of $500,000, and awarded her counsel fees of $50,000. This action was commenced in March 2003. The defendant was the founder and owner of Triangle Electronics Group, Inc. (Triangle), which distributed electronic components. A primary issue at trial and on appeal was the equitable distribution of the defendant's 100% interest in Triangle, which the Supreme Court determined was worth $1,625,000 on the date of commencement of the action. In so doing, the Supreme Court credited the defendant's expert. The Appellate Division held that the determination of the fact finder as to the value of a business, if within the range of the testimony presented, will be accorded deference on appeal if it rests primarily on the credibility of expert witnesses and their valuation techniques". The testimony of the defendant's expert, which was supported by competent evidence in the record and a written report admitted into evidence, was properly credited by the Supreme Court. The defendant's expert properly applied a lack of marketability discount of 25% to reflect the risk associated with the illiquidity of a close corporation whose shares cannot be freely traded. The Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was responsible for one-half of the federal tax liability of $1,371,744 incurred when the defendant filed amended income tax returns for the tax years 1999, 2000, 2001, 2002, and 2003, but that she was not responsible for New York State tax liability, or any interest and penalties as a result of the filing of the amended tax returns. Since that tax liability was incurred during the marriage, the Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was responsible for part of this liability. The record established that the defendant was responsible for the delay in reporting the income declared on those amended returns and, therefore, was properly required to pay all interest and penalties. Further, under all of the circumstances of this case, including that fact that, with respect to New York State tax liability, the plaintiff was officially adjudicated an innocent spouse, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in determining that the plaintiff was not responsible for any of the New York State tax liability. The Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff post-divorce maintenance in the sum of $5,000 per month for a period of four years, based upon the parties' standard of living during the marriage, their income, and the plaintiff's distributive awards. The amount of maintenance awarded to the plaintiff would ensure that her reasonable needs were met, while providing her with an incentive to become self-supporting. Further, the award of child support was proper. The award of counsel fees, and the denial of additional expert fees, was a provident exercise of discretion, in light of the interim awards of counsel fees and expert fees, and the Supreme Court's conclusion that the fees demanded by the plaintiff's expert were excessive. Further, the award of interest at the statutory rate of 9% per annum (see CPLR 5004), on the plaintiff's distributive awards, should the defendant elect to pay those awards in installments over a period of five years, was a provident exercise of discretion.

Amendments to Rule 7.1 (c), (d), (e) and (g) of Part 1200 of Title 22 of the Official Compilation of Codes, Rules and Regulations of the State of New York, entitled "Rules of Professional Conduct, were approved by the four presiding justices of the Appellate Division departments.

The amendments allow the use of testimonials or endorsements from clients with respect to a pending matter, as long as the clients give informed consent. They allow actors to portray judges, lawyers or clients provided the advertisements disclose that the characters are actors. The rule prohibiting a pop-up or pop-under advertisement in connection with computer-accessed communications has been eliminated.

The Amendments to Former Rule 7.1 (c), (d) (e) and (g) of Part 1200 of Title 22 of the Official Compilation of Codes, Rules and Regulations of the State of New York, entitled "Rules of Professional Conduct, deleted the sections highlighted below:

(c) An advertisement shall not:

In Determining Parents' Respective Obligations Towards Cost of College, a Court Should Not Take into Account Any College Loans for Which the Student Is Responsible

In Matter of Yorke v Yorke, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1499108 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were the parents of a child who was a college student beginning in the Fall 2007 semester. By orders dated October 16, 2007, and December 20, 2007, respectively, the father was directed to pay 83% of the college tuition for the child prior to March 2009, and 82% of the tuition for the child subsequent to March 2009. Those orders provided that the father was not responsible for contributing towards the child's room and board at college. In 2009 the mother commenced a proceeding, alleging that the father had failed to contribute the required amount to college tuition for the five semesters from Fall 2007 through and including Fall 2009. Family Court issued an order dated March 29, 2010, in which that court determined the father's obligation for college costs for the child and found that the father was entitled to a credit in the sum of $3,407. In the order the Family Court deducted financial aid, including "Stafford" loans, prior to determining the father's share of college costs for the child. The Appellate Division held that in determining the parents' respective obligations towards the cost of college, a court should not take into account any college loans for which the student is responsible. Therefore, any loans for which the child is responsible should not have been deducted from the college costs prior to determining the father's pro rata share of those costs. Here, the record did not indicate whether the child was responsible for repayment of the Stafford loans reflected on the statements from the college. Accordingly, the matter was remitted to the Family Court for clarification of this matter. In addition, the Family Court erred in applying the total amount of scholarships, grants, and student loans for which the child was not responsible (financial aid). First, the Family Court should have calculated the total cost of attending college, including tuition, and room and board. Next, it should have determined the percentage of that total cost which was covered by financial aid. That percentage should then have been applied to the tuition portion. Finally, the father's share of the net tuition, after deducting the pro rata financial aid, should have been calculated based upon his percentage of responsibility . For example, if tuition is $12,000 and room and board is $8,000, totaling $20,000, and financial aid is $15,000, or 75% of the total college cost, the net tuition after pro rata financial aid would be $3,000. The father's pro rata tuition obligation should then be applied to that amount to determine his contribution to tuition. Accordingly, the matter was remitted to the Family Court for recalculation of the father's obligation to contribute towards college costs.

No Reduction of Child Support Arrears Accrued Prior to the Making of Application for Modification Even Where Noncustodial Parent Establishes His Income Is less than Poverty Income Guidelines Amount

In Matter of Fisher v Nathan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1499660 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly denied the father's objection to the order of the Judicial Hearing Officer, which denied his motion for a temporary downward modification of his obligation to pay arrears for his daughter's college expenses. Although child support arrears cease to accrue above the sum of $500 where a noncustodial parent can establish that his or her income is less than or equal to poverty income guidelines amount for a single person, as reported by the United States Department of Health and Human Services (see Family Ct Act 413[1][g]), a "modification, set aside or vacatur [of a child support obligation set forth in a judgment or order] shall not reduce or annul child support arrears accrued prior to the making of an application pursuant to this section" (Family Ct Act 451). "In that regard, contrary to the father's claim, child support arrears may not be reduced or annulled even where the defaulting party shows good cause for failing to make an application for relief from the judgment or order of support prior to the accrual of arrears or where requiring the party to pay the arrears will result in a grievous injustice" (Matter of Mandelowitz v. Bodden, 68 AD3d 871, 875; see Matter of Dox v. Tynan, 90 N.Y.2d 166, 173-174). Here, the father failed to establish that any decline in business sustained by his solo law practice as a result of his illness left him below the Federal poverty income guidelines. Accordingly, his obligation for child support arrears continued to accrue, and there is no basis in law to adjust or reduce his obligation to pay child support arrears.

Direction in Judgment to Pay "One-half of the Mortgage and Real Estate Charges of the Marital Residence and Half of the Cost of Any Repair to the Home in Excess of $750.00" Constituted an Improper Open-ended Obligation

In Mosso v Mosso--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1733948 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) defendant appealed from so much of a judgment of the Supreme Court as (1) imputed an annual income to him of $52,000 for the purpose of calculating his child support obligations, (2) directed him to pay $1,160 per month in child support retroactive to the date of the commencement of the action, (3) directed him to pay one-half of the mortgage and real estate tax charges of the marital residence and half the cost of any repair to the home in excess of $750, (4) directed him to pay 100% of a $30,000 home equity loan on the marital residence, (5) awarded the plaintiff $13,777 from certain bank accounts, and (6) awarded the plaintiff exclusive use and occupancy of the marital residence until the last of the parties' children reaches majority. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in it imputing an annual income to the defendant of $52,000 for the purpose of calculating his child support obligations. However, in calculating the child support award, the Supreme Court's direction that the defendant pay both child support and half of the carrying charges on the marital residence resulted in an improper double shelter allowance. The matter was remitted to the Supreme Court to recalculate the child support award "taking into account the shelter costs incurred by the defendant in providing housing to the plaintiff and the minor children". It held that Supreme Court also improperly awarded retroactive child support to August 1, 2007, the date of the commencement of the action, since the plaintiff did not request child support until she filed an amended complaint on August 27, 2007. It directed that since an award of child support may be made "effective as of the date of the application therefor" (Domestic Relations Law 236[B][7][a]), on remittal, the Supreme Court's new child support award should be made retroactive to August 27, 2007. It found the defendant's contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to any retroactive child support because she later withdrew her amended complaint was without merit. The record established that the amended complaint was withdrawn solely to relinquish a cause of action for divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, and that the plaintiff's request for child support was intended to remain a part of the action. In addition, the matter had to be remitted to the Supreme Court because the Supreme Court's directive that the defendant pay "one-half of the mortgage and real estate charges of the marital residence and half of the cost of any repair to the home in excess of $750.00" constituted an improper open-ended obligation (citing 22 NYCRR subtitle D, Ch III, subchapter B0. The direction to pay for repairs and other maintenance should state a maximum monthly or yearly amount. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court also improvidently exercised its discretion in directing that the defendant be 100% responsible for repayment of a $30,000 loan drawn on a home equity line of credit. Expenses incurred prior to the commencement of a divorce action constitute marital debt and should be equally shared by the parties. Although the defendant should be solely responsible for repaying $10,000 of this loan, which he used to pay his attorney's fees, the burden of repaying the remaining $20,000 should be shared by the parties since this debt was incurred during the marriage and the evidence at trial failed to establish a compelling reason why the defendant should bear the cost of repayment alone. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in granting the plaintiff and the parties' children the exclusive use and occupancy of the marital residence until the youngest child reaches the age of 18. Exclusive possession of the marital residence is usually granted to the spouse who has custody of the minor children of the marriage. In making this determination, the need of the custodial parent to occupy the marital residence is weighed against the financial need of the parties. The evidence at trial established that the parties were capable of maintaining the marital residence and that suitable comparable housing could not be obtained at a lesser cost than the cost to maintain the marital residence. Further, the defendant failed to establish an immediate need for his share of the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence. The defendant failed to meet his burden of establishing that certain assets in a bank account, acquired during the marriage, were not marital property subject to equitable distribution. Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly provided for the equitable distribution of those funds.

Must be Sufficient Evidence to Support Interim Counsel Fee Award for Services Previously Rendered

In Mimran v Mimran, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1496465 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Supreme Court directed defendant to pay plaintiff $200,000 as interim counsel fees. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that regardless of whether plaintiff otherwise made a sufficient showing to support an award of interim counsel fees defendant was correct that neither plaintiff nor her counsel provided adequate documentation of the amount of fees already paid, the amount required for experts, the dates and nature of the services previously rendered, or the number of hours of work to be performed. Thus, there was insufficient evidence to support an award for outstanding fees already incurred and no basis upon which an appropriate prospective fee award could be determined.

Agreement Provision for Full Indemnification of Attorneys' Fees in Enforcement Proceedings must Be Enforced

In Colyer v Colyer,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1496486 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) upon granting plaintiff's motion for an order compelling defendant to pay college and medical expenses of the parties' daughter, Supreme Court awarded plaintiff $20,000 in attorneys' fees. The Appellate Division increased the attorneys' fees to $54,467.50 and otherwise affirmed. It noted that Plaintiff's entitlement to attorneys' fees in connection with the instant proceeding arose from the parties' separation agreement, which provided for defendant's full indemnification of fees if he defaulted on his obligation to pay the daughter's college expenses and certain medical expenses and it became necessary for plaintiff to bring proceedings to enforce his obligations. Thus, plaintiff was entitled to collect the full amount of her attorneys' fees in connection with the successful enforcement proceeding. Although defendant complained generally about the reasonableness of the total amount of attorneys' fees sought, he did not contend that any amounts should be excluded as unrelated to the successful portion of the application. Thus, there was no basis for reducing the total amount, which was $45,270.

Liberal Policy to Vacate Default Judgment in Matrimonial Cases Where Meritorious Position with Respect to Ancillary Issues

In Osman v Osman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1601891 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying the defendant's motion to vacate her default in appearing for a trial on the ancillary economic issues attendant to the parties' divorce. Although a party seeking to vacate a default must establish a reasonable excuse for the default and a potentially meritorious cause of action or defense, the courts of this state have adopted a liberal policy toward vacating defaults in matrimonial actions. In matrimonial actions, "[t]he State's interest in the marital res and allied issues ... favor[s] dispositions on the merits". The record revealed that the defendant former wife was taken directly from court to the hospital by ambulance on December 15, 2009, where she underwent medical tests, including a chest x-ray and EKG, before being released with a diagnosis of anxiety. Under these circumstances, it found that the wife's claim that the anxiety attack she suffered on December 15, 2009, caused her to misapprehend the Supreme Court's instructions as to the time she was required to return to court the next day, constituted a reasonable excuse for her failure to appear on the morning of December 16, 2009. Furthermore, the parties had been married for 27 years at the time of the commencement of the action, and the plaintiff former husband allegedly was the primary wage earner throughout the marriage. Thus, the wife had a potentially meritorious position with respect to all ancillary economic issues, including maintenance, which were resolved after the inquest held upon her default.

Appeal Dismissed for Failure to Include All Transcripts of Proceedings

In Kociubinski v Kociubinski,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1631591 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that it is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal, which must include any relevant transcripts of proceedings before the Supreme Court. The record must contain all of the relevant papers that were before the Supreme Court, including the transcript, if any, of the proceedings. Here, the plaintiff appealed from an order and judgment of the Supreme Court which, inter alia, granted the defendant's motion, after a hearing, for an award of child support arrears pursuant to the parties' judgment of divorce and stipulation of settlement. However, the plaintiff's failure to provide this Court with the full hearing transcript renders the record on appeal inadequate to enable the Court to reach an informed decision on the merits and, thus, the appeal was dismissed.

Plaintiff's Self-serving Declaration Is All That Required for the Dissolution on Irretrievably Broken Ground

In AC v DR, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1137739 (N.Y.Sup.) on a prior motion to the court, in which the husband sought full consolidation of Action 1 and Action 2, the wife sought joinder of the actions for trial, without consolidation, so that she could pursue the benefits of the newly enacted matrimonial legislation available to all actions commenced after October 12, 2010. By decision and order dated January 18, 2011, the court directed that Action 1 and Action 2 be joined for trial and discovery. In Action 2, the wife moved to partake in the benefits of the new matrimonial legislation and sought pendente lite maintenance and counsel fees as well as partial summary judgment on grounds (DRL 170[7]) under the new law. The Court observed that the newly enacted matrimonial legislation, effective October 12, 2010, provides a new no-fault ground for divorce, DRL 170(7), as follows: (7) The relationship between husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months, provided that one party has so stated under oath ... Citing a Massachusetts case the Supreme Court concluded that the decision that a marriage is irretrievably broken need not be based on any objectifiable fact. It is sufficient that one or both of the parties subjectively decide that their marriage is over and there is no hope for reconciliation (Citing Caffyn v. Caffyn 441 Mass. 487, 806 N.E.2d 415 [2004]). It concluded that a plaintiff's self-serving declaration about his or her state of mind is all that is required for the dissolution of a marriage on grounds that it is irretrievably broken. It asserted that the conclusion, that it is sufficient that a party subjectively decide that their marriage is over, finds support in the reasoning of other courts. (citing In re Marriage of Walton, 28 Cal.App.3d 108, 117 [1972]; Joy v. Joy, 178 Conn. 254, 255 [1979]; Mattson v. Mattson, 375 A.2d 473, 475 [Me. 1977]; Matter of the Marriage of Dunn, 13 Or.App. 497, 501-502, n. 1 [1973] Caffyn v. Caffyn, supra, n. 17). In the court's view, the Legislature did not intend nor is there a defense to DRL 170(7). Nevertheless, while the court would ordinarily grant partial summary judgment to movant, where there are no defenses and no triable issues of fact, the court pointed out that the new legislation directs that "no judgment of divorce shall be granted under this subdivision unless and until the economic issues of equitable distribution of marital property, the payment or waiver of spousal support, the payment of child support, the payment of counsel and experts; fees and expenses as well as the custody and visitation with the infant children of the marriage have been resolved by the parties, or determined by the court and incorporated into the judgment of divorce". (DRL 170 [7]). It noted that it had been the practice of the Part, when deemed appropriate, to hold bifurcated trials with respect to grounds for the purpose of disposing of fault issues so, if a divorce was granted, the court could concentrate its resources on equitable distribution. If a divorce was not granted, issues of support and custody, as well as related issues, always remained before the court. This was in aid of judicial economy. Yet, even in those cases where a divorce was granted, the court always held entry of judgment in abeyance pending determination of all other issues, as now set forth in detail in the new legislation. Since the new legislation directs that a judgment of divorce may not be "granted " when the cause of action is predicated on the no-fault ground until all the financial issues are complete, the court concluded that a motion for partial summary judgment cannot be granted nor can a bifurcated trial be held with respect to DRL 170(7). To continue this practice would allow fault trials on one party's claim to advance in time against the other party's no-fault claim. Moreover, since there is no defense to the no-fault ground, no judicial economy would be served by having a bifurcated trial on fault grounds, the only purpose of which was to determine whether a divorce would be granted in the first instance, and a divorce would be granted in this case provided the matter proceeds to its expected conclusion. Therefore, the wife's motion for partial summary judgment was denied, and that portion of the court's previous order, dated January 18, 2011, that directed a bifurcated trial on fault grounds was sua sponte recalled and vacated.

Anglo-American Custom to Give Child the Father's Name Is Not an Objection to Hyphenated Name

In Matter of Eberhardt, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1206136 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), 2011 the mother petitioned the Supreme Court for permission to change the child's surname by hyphenating the father's surname with the mother's surname. The impetus for the change was the mother's use of both parties' surnames on the child's application for a passport. The father, before signing the application, redacted the mother's surname. The mother reinserted her surname and filed the application, leading the father, once he saw the child's passport, to contact federal officials and ask that the passport reflect her legal name. The Appellate Division observed that to the extent the father's objection was based on traditional values, meaning that it is Anglo-American custom to give a child the father's name, the objection was not reasonable, because neither parent has a superior right to determine the surname of the child (citing Swank v. Petkovsek, 216 A.D.2d 920; Matter of Bell v. Bell, 116 A.D.2d 97, 99; Matter of Cohan v. Cunningham, 104 A.D.2d 716; Rio v. Rio, 132 Misc.2d at 319).

Family Court May Prohibit Mother from Telling Child That Any Man Other than the Father Is Child's Biological Father

In Matter of Buxenbaum v Fulmer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1206140 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Family Court's determination that there had been a change in circumstances since the issuance of the prior order of custody and visitation dated January 28, 2008, and that it was in the child's best interests to award sole custody to the father, was supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record. It held that Family Court properly took judicial notice of the order of filiation entered on consent. The Family Court's determination that the mother could not testify, in rebuttal to the admission of the order of filiation, that she had lacked the capacity to consent to the order of filiation, was not an improvident exercise of discretion (see Matter of Lane v. Lane, 68 AD3d 995, 997). The Family Court providently exercised its discretion in prohibiting the mother from telling the child that any man other than the father is the child's biological father (citing Matter of Powell v. Blumenthal, 35 AD3d 615, 617).

Error For Supreme Court to Disregard Parties Stipulation

In Aloï v Simoni, 918 N.Y.S.2d 506 (2 Dept 2011) the Appellate Division observed that where the determination as to equitable distribution has been made after a nonjury trial, the trial court's assessment of the credibility of witnesses is afforded great weight on appeal. It held that Supreme Court erred in disregarding the parties' stipulation that the appreciation in the value of the plaintiff's retirement account during the course of the marriage was the sum of $25,189. The plaintiff was entitled to 50% of the sum of the appreciation of the parties' respective retirement accounts (50% of $450,115 + $25,189 = $237,652). In calculating the amount to be paid to the plaintiff, the defendant was entitled to a credit of the appreciation remaining in the plaintiff's account ($25,189). Accordingly, the amended judgment had to be modified to direct the defendant to pay the plaintiff the sum of $212,463. The Supreme Court also erred in failing to award interest on the plaintiff's distributive award from the date of the decision until the entry of the judgment, and from the entry of the judgment to the date of payment. In exercising its discretionary power to award an attorney's fee, the court may consider, among other things, "whether either party has engaged in conduct or taken positions resulting in a delay of the proceedings or unnecessary litigation" Here, there was a significant economic disparity between the defendant and the plaintiff, and the complexity of the defendant's business endeavors, as well as the defendant's uncooperativeness with discovery and with sorting out his financial affairs, greatly contributed to the high cost of the litigation. Under these circumstances, it was appropriate to award the plaintiff one half of her total counsel fees, which, after crediting the defendant for his payment of interim counsel fees, amounted to $81,103.

Needs of a Child must Take Precedence over the Terms of the Agreement Where Needs Not Met

In Duggan v Duggan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1331920 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the father, and the mother entered into stipulation of settlement on February 26, 2009, to end their marriage. They had four children. The stipulation noted that the father's annual gross income was $475,000, whereas the mother had no income. It further noted that, according to the child support percentage calculation provided in the Child Support Standards Act the father's monthly child support obligation would be $11,929.54. The parties, however, agreed to deviate from this calculation, and set the father's monthly child support obligation at $8,000. The mother filed a petition seeking child support arrears. At the ensuing hearing, the husband stated that his yearly income had dropped from $475,000 to $466,757, and he argued that, pursuant to the language in the stipulation, this decrease in income entitled him to an 80 percent decrease in his child support payments, to $1,600 per month. In a fact-finding order dated April 21, 2010, the Family Court denied the father's motion to dismiss the petition, holding that his interpretation of the stipulation was "not plausible." The same court issued an order on the same day, in which it directed the father to pay the mother child support arrears in the sum of $19,200. The father filed objections, and the Family Court denied the objections in an order dated June 14, 2010. The Family Court held that the language of the stipulation, as interpreted by the father, would violate the CSSA, and was against the best interests of the children. The Appellate Division held that Family Court was without jurisdiction to modify the terms of a separation agreement absent a showing of an unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances, which the father had not alleged here (citing Kleila v. Kleila, 50 N.Y.2d 277). But the Family Court does have the authority to interpret and enforce the provisions of a separation agreement.. It pointed out that "When interpreting a contract, such as a separation agreement, the court should arrive at a construction that will give fair meaning to all of the language employed by the parties to reach a practical interpretation of the expressions of the parties so that their reasonable expectations will be realized" (Matter of Schiano v. Hirsch, 22 AD3d at 502). But "the needs of a child must take precedence over the terms of the agreement when it appears that the best interests of the child are not being met" (Matter of Gravlin, 98 N.Y.2d 1, 5). Thus, the Family Court had the authority to find that a provision in a stipulation of settlement violates the CSSA. The stipulation here provided that, according to the child support percentage calculation provided in the CSSA, the father's monthly child support obligation would be $11,929.54 per month. But the parties agreed to deviate from this calculation, on the grounds that it was in the best interests of the children and that the children's needs would be met, and set the father's monthly child support obligation at the sum of $8,000 per month. The father now sought to use the provision at issue to lower his child support obligation--for four children--to $1,600 per month, or 13% of the presumptive support level based on the CSSA. He sought to do this because his income dropped by 1.7%--from $475,000 per year to $466,757 per year. The Appellate Division concluded that Family Court properly found that this was against the best interests of the children.

Not Reversible Error to Deny Party's Right to Make Opening Statement

In Matter of Sage v Steinmetz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1306419 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of a daughter (born in 2004). The mother also had another child. In 2006, the parties consented to an order which granted them joint legal and physical custody of the child. In April 2009, based on allegations that there was a drug overdose in the residence where the mother resided, the father commenced a modification proceeding seeking sole custody of the child. In response, the mother filed a family offense petition and criminal complaint against the father alleging that the father struck her on the mouth during an argument. The father was subsequently arrested for assault, at which time he was found to be in possession of marihuana. The assault charge was later adjourned in contemplation of dismissal and the father paid a fine for the marihuana violation. In August 2009, Family Court issued a temporary order of custody providing that the parties share joint legal custody of the children, that the children reside with the paternal grandfather and, based on the father's marihuana conviction, that he submit to a chemical dependency evaluation. The resulting evaluation, based in part on a positive drug screen, diagnosed the father with cannabis abuse and recommended treatment. After a fact-finding hearing, Family Court awarded the parties joint legal custody of the children. Family Court further ordered that the father successfully complete chemical dependency treatment. The Appellate Division rejected the father's argument that Family Court committed reversible error by denying the father the right to present an opening statement. While a party to a civil proceeding has the right to make an opening statement (see CPLR 4016 [a]; De Vito v. Katsch, 157 A.D.2d 413, 415 [1990]), it found that Family Court's error did not require reversal since the court was fully familiar with the facts of the case, the parties and their respective arguments through the numerous court appearances during the year prior to trial (citing Lohmiller v. Lohmiller, 140 A.D.2d 497, 497 [1988]). The court held that Family Court did not err in ordering the father to attend substance abuse treatment. So long as a party's right to access to his or her child is not conditioned on participation in, or completion of, counseling, Family Court may, as part of its visitation or custody order, direct a party to obtain substance abuse treatment or counseling if such treatment or counseling will serve the children's best interests. In this regard, evidence of a party's continuous use of an illegal drug is certainly relevant to a determination of whether substance abuse treatment for the parent is in the children's best interests. Here, the father had already been convicted of the violation of unlawful possession of marihuana and, at the fact-finding hearing, he admitted to smoking marihuana "no more than once or twice per week" and during the pendency of his custody proceeding. While Family Court found the father to be a good parent, it did not find his testimony--that he did not purchase the drug, keep it in his home or use it in the presence of the children--to be credible. Family Court was also unpersuaded that the father's routine use of marihuana--which the record reflected could affect a person's judgment, memory and problem-solving ability--posed no risk to the children. Finally, to the extent that the father argued that treatment would create a financial burden, the record reflected that costs are based on ability to pay and the father was eligible to apply for Medicaid benefits, which would completely cover the costs of treatment.

Not Error to Suspend Child Support Payment Where Child Not of Employable Age

In Dobies v. Brefka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1307284 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the unmarried parents of two children, Jaclyn (born in 1993) and Nikolas (born in 1995). In October 2008, the father commenced violation proceedings. Family Court, inter alia, granted the father sole physical and legal custody of Nikolas, terminated the father's child support obligations for Jaclyn, and suspended the father's child support obligations for Nikolas..The father claimed that a sufficient change in circumstance had occurred since entry of these prior orders based on, among other things, the mother's deliberate attempts to influence and disrupt the father's parenting time with the children. At the hearing of this matter, the father testified that he had not had any visitation with Jaclyn since March 2007 and has had no weekend parenting time with Nikolas between August 2008 and March 2009. The father recounted multiple examples of alienating behavior engaged in by the mother, including in the spring of 2007 when the mother refused to let Nikolas participate in visitation with the father because of inclement weather--despite the fact that both parties had already driven to the custody exchange point. The father also testified that, in 2007, the mother told Jaclyn that she did not have to participate in the spring break visit with the father. The father further testified that on two occasions--in April 2007 and at the commencement of Father's Day weekend in June 2007--when Jaclyn refused to participate in visitation with the father, the mother indicated that there was nothing she could do about it and that Jaclyn had a mind of her own. The father also testified that during an attempted exchange occurring in the summer of 2007 at a restaurant parking lot--an exchange that never occurred--the mother refused to transfer Nikolas' suitcase to the father's car and then laughed at the father and took a photograph of him with her cell phone while she walked inside the restaurant with the children. Family Court found the mother's explanations for her conduct insufficient and her "credibility to be seriously impaired and her testimony contradictory throughout the trial, particularly when she denied actively discouraging the children from having a relationship with their father." Thus, there was sufficient evidence in the record supporting the court's conclusion that the mother interfered in the father's relationship with the children, such that the father established the requisite change in circumstances. While a determination of the children's best interests must be based on a totality of the circumstances "[e]vidence that the custodial parent intentionally interfered with the noncustodial parent's relationship with the [children] is so inconsistent with the best interests of the [children] as to, per se, raise a strong probability that [the offending party] is unfit to act as custodial parent". The Appellate Division held that Family Court did not err in terminating the father's child support obligation for Jaclyn and suspending the father's child support obligation for Nikolas. Child support payments may be suspended " '[w]here it can be established by the noncustodial parent that the custodial parent has unjustifiably frustrated the noncustodial parent's right of reasonable access' " (Usack v. Usack, 17 AD3d 736, 737-738 [2005]). In addition, child support payments may be deemed forfeited when "a child of employable age ... actively abandons the noncustodial parent by refusing all contact and visitation, without cause, ... a concept sometimes referred to as the doctrine of self-emancipation" (Labanowski v. Labanowski, 49 AD3d 1051, 1053 [2008]). However, abandonment by a child who is not "of employable age" cannot be deemed to constitute constructive emancipation (Foster v. Daigle, 25 AD3d at 1004) Family Court's determination that the mother deliberately frustrated the father's relationship with Nikolas had a sound and substantial basis in the record. While it agreed with the mother that Jaclyn, who was only 16 years of age at the time of the court's order, was unable to abandon the father so as to forfeit his support obligation and, thus, Family Court erred in terminating the father's child support obligation as to her the facts clearly supported a finding that the father's support obligation should also be suspended with respect to Jaclyn based on the mother's conduct in deliberately frustrating his relationship with Jaclyn . Accordingly, the father's support obligations with respect to Jaclyn were suspended pending further court order upon a showing that the mother has made good faith efforts to actively encourage and restore the father's relationship with the children.

Husbands Claim of Extreme Hardship Rejected Where No Appreciable Change in Lifestyle.

In Taylor v Taylor, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1440992 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties 2005 stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into their divorce judgment, provided that the plaintiff would have custody of the children, and that the defendant would pay maintenance and child support in an agreed-upon amount. The stipulation also provided that the defendant waived his right to seek any downward modification of his maintenance obligation until August 1, 2012, "excluding an unforeseen, unanticipated catastrophic event, that so negatively impacts the Husband's health or earning capacity as to result in 'extreme hardship' to him as that term is set forth in [Domestic Relations Law] 236(B)(9)(b)." After the defendant lost his job at Bear Stearns in 2008 and was hired by Natixis, a French bank, the defendant moved for a downward modification of his maintenance and child support obligations. After a hearing, Supreme Court denied defendant's motion for a downward modification of his maintenance obligation. The Appellate Division observed that the evidence at the hearing showed that, although the economic downturn resulted in the defendant losing his job at Bear Stearns and earning a substantially smaller bonus in 2009 than he had received in previous years at Bear Stearns, the defendant's base salary and compensation plan at Natixis were similar to his base salary and compensation plan at Bear Stearns. Moreover, the evidence at the hearing showed that the economic downturn did not result in any appreciable change in the defendant's lifestyle. Accordingly, the defendant failed to demonstrate that continued enforcement of his obligation to pay maintenance under the parties' stipulation of settlement would create an "extreme hardship" .

Party Must Prevail on All Issues to Be Awarded Counsel Fee Pursuant to Agreement Provision

In Matter of Bederman v Bederman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 749719 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties' stipulation of settlement which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce entered September 24, 2004, provided that in the event the parties agreed, or a court determined, that the parties' child should attend private preschool, elementary, or secondary school, the parties would proportionately share any educational expenses. The mother commenced a proceeding seeking reimbursement from the father for private school tuition and to direct the father to pay his proportionate share of religious education expenses. The Appellate Division found that the record supported the Support Magistrate's findings that the father was not required to pay certain private school tuition payments for previous years which were gifts from the maternal grandmother, and that the father was not required to pay for religious education expenses under the terms of the parties' stipulation of settlement. The Support Magistrate also properly denied the mother's request to direct the father to pay his monthly child support through the Nassau County Support Collection Unit pursuant to Family Court Act 440(2). The stipulation of settlement provided for an alternate arrangement for the payment of child support in the form of direct payment to the mother unless the father defaulted in his child support payments and the record established that the father was not in arrears on his child support obligations. It also held that the mother was not entitled to an award of an attorney's fee, as she did not prevail on all issues (citing D'Amico v. D'Amico, 251 A.D.2d 616).

Court Cannot Issue a QDRO More Expansive or Encompassing Rights Not Provided in Underlying Stipulation

In Coulon v Coulon, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 924351 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant appealed from so much of a Qualified Domestic Relations Order of the Supreme Court as designated the plaintiff as a surviving spouse under the pre-retirement and post-retirement survivor annuity provisions of his pension plan, and directed that she receive a share of such benefits in the event of his death. On the Court's own motion, the appellant's notice of appeal was treated as an application for leave to appeal, and leave to appeal was granted (see CPLR 5701[c]). The Qualified Domestic Relations Order was reversed on the law and the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for the entry of an amended Qualified Domestic Relations Order in accordance. The Appellate Division observed that a Qualified Domestic Relations Order entered pursuant to a stipulation of settlement can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. Thus, a court cannot issue a QDRO more expansive or encompassing rights not provided in the underlying stipulation. Here, the parties' 1992 stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged in their judgment of divorce, provided for the plaintiff to receive a share of the defendant's pension in accordance with Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481). However, "pension benefits and death benefits are two distinct matters" (Kazel v. Kazel, 3 NY3d 331, 334), and a stipulation which is silent as to death benefits cannot be read to include an intent to include such benefits (McCoy v. Feinman, 99 N.Y.2d at 303). Since the parties' stipulation contained no provision entitling the plaintiff to be designated as a surviving spouse under the pre-retirement and post-retirement survivor annuity provisions of the defendant's pension plan and to receive a share of such benefits in the event of his death, it was error for the Supreme Court to include such a provision in the QDRO.

Decision Denying Mothers Request to Relocate with Children Reversed Where Family Court Did Not Give Appropriate Weight to Domestic Violence.

In Matter of Clarke v Boertlein, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 924280 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Family Court awarded the mother custody of the parties' three children, but denied her motion for permission to relocate with the parties' three children to Pennsylvania. The Appellate Division reversed the order and granted her permission to relocate. The parties were the parents of three children, ages 10, 6, and 4. In August 2008 the mother removed the children from their home in Yaphank, New York, and moved to Bellefonte, Pennsylvania, where one of her sisters resided, allegedly to escape the father's domestic violence. The mother obtained an order of protection and temporary custody from a court in Pennsylvania. In November 2008 the mother reconciled with the father and returned with the children to New York, only to leave with the children again to Pennsylvania in April 2009. The father then commenced this proceeding in the Supreme Court (IDV Part), seeking custody of the children. The mother moved for an award of custody and permission to relocate with the children to Pennsylvania. After a hearing, the Supreme Court awarded the mother custody, but denied her request for permission to relocate with the children to Pennsylvania. The Appellate Division pointed out that the disposition of a petition for permission to relocate with minor children rests upon a determination of the best interests of the children. Moreover, "[d]espite the multitude of factors that may properly be considered in the context of a relocation petition, the impact of the move on the relationship between the child[ren] and the noncustodial parent will remain a central concern" (Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d at 739). Upon its review of the record, it found that Supreme Court's determination to deny the mother permission to relocate with the children to Pennsylvania lacked a sound and substantial basis in the record. The record demonstrated that the mother had at all times served as the primary caregiver to the children and had displayed a continued commitment to their needs, whereas the father showed little involvement with the children when the parties lived together. The Supreme Court failed to give enough weight to the mother's allegations of domestic violence, often in the presence of the children, which permeated the parties' relationship and caused the mother to remove herself and the children from the parties' home. While the father denied that there was any domestic violence in the home, the Supreme Court noted that the father exhibited his temper during the course of the hearing when he left the witness stand while yelling at the mother's attorney. The father also admitted that he engaged in harassing and intimidating behavior after the mother left, such as calling the mother's cell phone numerous times each day, questioning the oldest child as to the mother's whereabouts, and placing a tracking device on the mother's car. Contrary to the Supreme Court's finding, the mother's move to Pennsylvania did not appear to have been motivated by bad faith but, rather, was an opportunity to escape domestic violence in the home, to reside in close proximity to supportive family members, and to secure affordable housing. The mother testified as to her unsuccessful attempts to obtain affordable housing on Long Island, and compared those attempts to her ability to secure a suitable rental home in Pennsylvania near where her sister resides with her family and the maternal grandmother. Testimony also revealed that the children were adapting well to their new surroundings, and were living with their half-brother in close proximity to their aunt and maternal grandmother, and that the two oldest children were attending school and receiving educational services. In contrast, the record suggested that the father opposed the relocation in order to harass the mother and in order to keep the mother in close proximity to facilitate his efforts to reconcile with her.

Divorce Based upon Cruelty Affirmed Where Husband Threatened to Kill Wife

In Siu Nam Wong Pun v Che Kwok Pun, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1046040 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted plaintiff a divorce on the grounds of cruelty. Plaintiff testified that during the marriage, defendant regularly lost his temper and yelled at her, verbally abused and demeaned her, and made disparaging remarks in response to her cancer diagnosis. She further testified that several years before she commenced this action, defendant choked her. In addition, she testified that he frequently yelled at her insisting that the family had to listen to him because he was the master of the household. Plaintiff recounted defendant's threat to kill her if she sought a divorce, and explained that she ultimately moved out because she feared defendant and was concerned for her safety. This testimony, portions of which were corroborated by the testimony of the parties' adult son, was sufficient to support the finding of cruel and inhuman treatment. Although plaintiff periodically returned to the marital residence after she moved out, she credibly explained that she did so to cook and clean the residence for her sons, who resided there. The lower court was not persuaded by defendant's claim that this behavior undermined plaintiff's contention that it was unsafe and improper for her to cohabit with defendant, and the Appellate Division agreed with that determination. Moreover, plaintiff testified that when she did return on occasion, defendant scolded and berated her.

Appellate Division Affirms Order Denying Counsel Fee to Attorney Who Agreed to Accept Litigation Assignment with No Guarantee of Compensation

In Moccia v Moccia, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1088033 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant wife in this divorce action was unable to afford counsel. The Supreme Court assigned the nonparty-appellant, Eric Ole Thorson (appellant), to represent the wife without compensation from her, "without prejudice to [a] motion by counsel for compensation pursuant to CPLR 1102(d), DRL Section 237, Judiciary Law Section 35 or as otherwise provided by law." The parties engaged in discovery, prepared for trial, and successfully negotiated a settlement agreement. The Supreme Court denied the appellant's motion for an award of an attorney's fee to be paid by the plaintiff husband. The Appellate Division affirmed. It pointed out that a court may award an attorney's fee in a divorce action to a spouse to enable that spouse to carry on or defend the action or proceeding as, in the court's discretion, justice requires, having regard to the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties (Domestic Relations Law s 237[a]). While the husband's income from the Yonkers Parking Authority was greater than the wife's income, his earnings were nevertheless modest and they were expended, in large part, on the wife and their children, as he paid, among other things, the mortgage and home equity loan, plus utilities on the marital home. In this regard, the Supreme Court properly considered the terms of the parties' settlement agreement and statements of net worth, which reflected the husband's income and expenses, limited assets, outstanding mortgage, the absence of savings, and debt to his own counsel, in determining that the parties' financial circumstances were "not that disparate so as to warrant an award of counsel fees." The Appellate Division commended any attorney who, as here, agrees to accept a litigation assignment with no guarantee of compensation, but held that the denial of an award of an attorney's fee in this case was not an improvident exercise of the Supreme Court's discretion. Judges Austin and Belen dissented.

Supreme Court Lacked Jurisdiction to Impose Obligations in the Amended Judgment upon the Nonparty-appellant Insurance Company

In Flangos v Flangos, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1088123 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court lacked jurisdiction to impose obligations in the amended judgment upon the nonparty-appellant insurance company. A court has no power to grant relief against an entity not named as a party and not properly summoned before the court (Riverside Capital Advisors, Inc. v. First Secured Capital Corp., 28 AD3d 457, 460). Accordingly, the Supreme Court should have granted that branch of the nonparty-appellant's motion which was to vacate so much of the amended judgment as directed it to make certain payments. Similarly, the Supreme Court erred to the extent that it, sua sponte, in effect, amended a provision in the amended judgment directing the nonparty-appellant to give notice of stated proposed changes in the payments. Contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the amended judgment itself was not a proper income execution order under CPLR 5241, nor is it a proper income deduction order under CPLR 5242.

Supreme Court Erred in Directing Husband to Transfer to Wife Title to Property Owned by a Corporation over Which the Supreme Court Lacked Jurisdiction.

In Manning v Manning, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 1088041 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that in order to sustain a finding of civil contempt under Judiciary Law 753 based on a violation of a court order, it is necessary to establish by clear and convincing evidence that a lawful court order clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate was in effect, that the person alleged to have violated the order had actual knowledge of its terms, and that the violation has defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced the rights of a party. Here, the evidence was sufficient to establish that the defendant knowingly disobeyed the Supreme Court's order directing him to pay an expert to ascertain the value of his business and also failed to comply with the pendente lite support order. Consequently, the Supreme Court properly adjudicated the defendant in contempt of court. It noted that a court is not required to rely upon a party's account of his or her finances in determining that party's income. It agreed with the defendant that the Supreme Court erred in directing him to transfer title to certain commercial real property to the plaintiff. The commercial property at issue was owned by a corporation over which the Supreme Court lacked jurisdiction.

Child Support Payments May Be Waived Prospectively

In Stevens v Stevens, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 833962 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that child support payments may be waived prospectively, before the obligation to make such payments has accrued (citing Matter of O'Connor v Curcio, 281 A.D.2d 100). The party claiming a waiver must come forward with evidence of a voluntary and intentional relinquishment of a known and otherwise enforceable right to child support. It agreed with the Supreme Court that while the evidence supported a finding that the plaintiff waived her right to child support for the parties' son, upon their agreement for the defendant to take physical custody of him, the plaintiff did not waive her right to child support for their daughter, who continued to live with her. It affirmed the order modifying the judgment by vacating the provision obligating him to pay child support for the parties' daughter.

Reimbursement Required Where One Party Pays Marital Debt

In Le v Le, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 834198 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded custody of the parties' three children to the plaintiff, awarded the plaintiff a two-thirds share of the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence with a credit for "the difference between the princip[al] balance of the mortgage as of March 22, 2007 and the amount due at closing, ... after payment of closing costs and joint liens, as long as there are monies available from the proceeds," directed that the plaintiff was not required to pay maintenance to the defendant for the months that he resided in the marital residence, and awarded the plaintiff child support in the sum of $50 per month and arrears totaling $988.33. The Appellate Division held that the plaintiff was entitled to receive a credit against the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence for the money that she paid to reduce the balance of the mortgage during the pendency of the divorce action. She made these payments without any contribution from the defendant. Where, as here, a party has paid the other party's share of what proves to be marital debt, such as the mortgage, taxes, and insurance on the marital residence, reimbursement is required. However, the plaintiff was entitled to only a 50% of the reduction in mortgage principal because generally it is the responsibility of both parties to maintain the marital residence during the pendency of a matrimonial action. Therefore, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff a credit for 100% of the payments she made on the marital residence during the divorce proceedings.

Not Error to Exclude Parents from Courtroom During Child's Testimony in Neglect Case Where Attorney Present.

In the Matter of Deshawn D.O. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 668113 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which found that the appellants neglected the subject child. The evidence established that the appellants engaged in a pattern of conduct which included the infliction of excessive corporal punishment, domestic violence in the child's presence, and punishment of the child by, inter alia, restricting his food intake and making him sleep on the floor. As a result, the child ran away from home numerous times, was afraid and refused to return home, and was so frustrated that he felt he might hurt himself or someone else. The petitioner established by a preponderance of the evidence that the child's physical and emotional condition was impaired, or was in imminent danger of becoming impaired, as a result of the appellants' conduct. The record demonstrated that the Family Court did not err in excluding the appellants from the courtroom during the child's testimony. Under the circumstances, the Family Court properly balanced the respective interests of the parties and reasonably concluded that the child would suffer emotional trauma if compelled to testify in the appellants' presence (citing Matter of Q.-L.H., 27 A.D.3d 738, 815 N.Y.S.2d 601). Because the appellants' attorneys were present during the child's testimony and cross-examined him on the appellants' behalf, the appellants' constitutional rights were not violated by their exclusion from the courtroom.

Challenge to Child Support in Surviving Stipulation Must Be By Plenary Action

In Brody v Brody, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 834544 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) The Appellate Division affirmed an order motion which denied the former wife's motion to set aside the child support provisions of a stipulation of settlement entered into by the parties on September 13, 2002, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, on the ground that those provisions did not comply with Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(h), and to recalculate child support de novo. It held a postjudgment motion in a matrimonial action is not the proper vehicle for challenging the propriety of child support provisions contained in a stipulation of settlement incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce. A challenge to such a stipulation must be made by the commencement of a separate plenary action to set aside the stipulation.

Validity of Same Sex Canadian Marriage Upheld

In re Estate of Ranftle,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 650739 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Surrogate's Court issued an opinion finding that respondent was "decedent's surviving spouse and sole distributee" (EPTL 4- 1.1) and thus, citation of the probate proceeding need not issue to anyone under SCPA 1403(1)(a). The court found that the decedent's same-sex marriage to respondent was valid under the laws of Canada, where it was performed, and did not fall into either of the two exceptions to the marriage recognition rule, as the marriage was not affirmatively prohibited or proscribed by natural law. Accordingly, the Surrogate's Court found that the marriage was entitled to recognition. Appellant petitioned the Surrogate's Court for vacatur of the probate decree and permission to file objections, alleging that the court was without jurisdiction to grant probate without citation having been issued on the decendent's surviving siblings. Appellant argued that the recognition of the decedent's same-sex marriage violated public policy in New York and that he should have been cited in the probate proceeding and provided with an opportunity to file objections thereto as a distributee. In denying the instant petition, the Surrogate found that appellant's position that same-sex marriage violated public policy had been "specifically addressed and rejected by the Appellate Division in Martinez v. County of Monroe (50 AD3d 189 [2008], lv dismissed 10 NY3d 856 [2008]) and is patently without merit." The Appellate Division agreed. It observed that New York's long-settled marriage recognition rule affords comity to out-of-state marriages and "recognizes as valid a marriage considered valid in the place where celebrated". This rule does not extend such recognition where the foreign marriage is "contrary to the prohibitions of natural law or the express prohibitions of a statute". Same-sex marriage does not fall within either of the two exceptions to the marriage recognition rule. The failure of the Legislature to enact a bill affords the most dubious foundation for drawing positive inferences. Thus, the Legislature's failure to authorize same-sex couples to enter into marriage in New York or require recognition of validly performed out-of-state same-sex marriages, cannot serve as an expression of public policy for the State. In the absence of an express statutory prohibition legislative action or inaction does not qualify as an exception to the marriage recognition rule.

Family Court Abused its Discretion in Awarding the Father Sole Legal Custody of the Child, Relief He Did Not Request.

In Matter of Joseph A. v Jaimy B, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 651298 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the parties, who never married, had a son (born in 2004). Pursuant to an order of custody entered in November 2009, the parties were awarded joint legal custody of their son with primary physical custody to respondent (mother), and petitioner (father) having parenting time. As is relevant to this case, the order provided that for the Christmas holiday, the father was granted parenting time with the child from 3:00 P.M. on December 23 until 3:00 P.M. on Christmas eve, and the mother was granted parenting time with the child from 3:00 P.M. on Christmas eve until 3:00 P.M. on Christmas day during even-numbered years, and the reverse would occur during odd-numbered years. Less than one month after the November 2009 order was entered, a physical altercation occurred between the parties on Christmas day, as a result of which the father filed a police report and obtained an order of protection. He also commenced this modification proceeding seeking physical custody of the child. The mother then petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus based on allegations that the father violated the November 2009 order by failing to abide by the holiday schedule and by failing to return the child to her on Sunday evening, December 27, 2009. In January 2010, the mother cross-petitioned for a temporary modification of custody, requesting that "the child exchange not take place at the police station" based on the father's insistence that the custody exchange take place under police supervision. Family Court conducted a hearing in May 2010, at which the mother testified that, on Christmas day, when she attempted to retrieve the child at 3:00 P.M., the father and the child were not home. After driving to the homes of the father's relatives, she eventually returned to his grandmother's house, where the father arrived with the child shortly thereafter. The father testified that, as he attempted to pick up the child out of the car, the mother ran up the driveway, began to scream at him, jumped on his back and grabbed the child's arm. The father further testified that he handed the child to his cousin and called the police, and the child wet his pants as a result of the incident. The mother testified, however, that she attempted to greet the child, whereupon the father grabbed the child and pulled him; as a result, the mother's finger got caught in his grip. After the hearing, Family Court found that the father had violated the November 2009 custody order, but that the violation was not willful or intentional. Family Court also determined that the father should have sole legal and physical custody of the child commencing June 25, 2010, with the mother having parenting time on alternate weekends and each Wednesday afternoon, and holiday parenting time to follow the November 2009 order. The Appellate Division agreed with the mother that Family Court abused its discretion in awarding the father sole legal custody of the child, relief he did not request. Where, as here, neither the petition nor the father's testimony provided the mother with notice that he sought to modify the existing order of joint legal custody it was improper for Family Court to make such a modification. Family Court also failed to make a finding that a change in circumstances had occurred since entry of the November 2009 order and, thus, Family Court erred in modifying that order. Notwithstanding the failure of Family Court to make the threshold determination of a change in circumstances, it was not necessary to remit the matter to Family Court because the courts independent review of the record revealed insufficient evidence to support such a change. Accordingly, Family Court erred in modifying the custody order and the father's petition should have been dismissed.

Award of Maintenance Properly Made Taxable to Wife and Tax Deductible for Husband Where No Rationale Exists "For a Departure from the Norm Envisioned by Current Internal Revenue Code Provisions

In Girgenti v Girgenti, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 668280 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married on October 21, 1989. They had three children. At the time of the marriage, the defendant (husband) was the sole owner of AVA Pork Products, Inc., a company which distributed meat. Over the years, the husband's business grew. By 2005, the year this action was commenced, he owned several companies bearing the AVA name. At the time of the marriage, the plaintiff (wife) worked as a substitute teacher. Approximately one year later she obtained a full-time teaching position. However, she stopped working in December 1991, shortly before the birth of the parties' first child. Since that time, her teaching license expired. During the marriage, the husband acquired four parcels of real property and placed them under the ownership of several separate corporate entities in which he was the sole shareholder. He sold two of those parcels in 2007, for $535,000 and $300,000, respectively. His corporations continue to own the other two parcels and lease them out. They were appraised at $2,050,000 and $5,900,000. The wife commenced this action for a divorce on November 18, 2005. Prior to the trial, the parties stipulated as to the prices of the parcels which had been sold, as well as to the appraised value of the other two parcels. They also stipulated that, after the commencement of the divorce action, the husband withdrew the sums of $320,000 from the home equity line of credit account (HELOC) and $424,925 from his life insurance policy. Furthermore, the parties stipulated that the wife's position at trial regarding distribution of the husband's business would be that "the value of the AVA business should not be separately distributed," as she was seeking maintenance. After a two-day hearing, the parties were divorced by judgment entered December 22, 2009. The Supreme Court found that the four parcels of real property acquired by the husband during the marriage were not marital property, but were part of the AVA business, and, since the wife had waived her interest in the husband's business, she was not entitled to distribution of these assets. The Supreme Court also found that the money withdrawn from the HELOC and the life insurance policy was subsequently put into the business and, thus, the wife had no claim to these amounts. The wife was awarded, inter alia, 50% of the proceeds from the sale of the marital residence, and approximately $158,223 in cash, retirement accounts, and proceeds from the life insurance policy. She also was awarded maintenance in the sums of $20,000 per month for seven years and $10,000 per month thereafter for four years. The Appellate Division observed that a stipulation entered into by spouses in contemplation of divorce is a contract subject to general principles of contract construction. Where possible, a contract should be interpreted to avoid inconsistencies and to give meaning to all of its provisions, giving a practical and reasonable interpretation to the language employed and the parties' reasonable expectations with respect thereto. The stipulation should be read as a whole to determine its purpose and intent. Here, the Supreme Court erred in determining that, in the stipulation of facts, the parties intended that the four parcels of real property acquired by the husband during the marriage were part of the AVA business. If the parties had intended that the four parcels of real property should not be distributed to the wife, there would have been no need for them to stipulate as to their respective value. Moreover, had the parties intended to exempt the four parcels from equitable distribution, they could have explicitly said so, just as they had done with regard to the husband's business. Therefore, the wife was entitled to 50% of the proceeds of the two parcels that were sold by the husband, and 50% of the appraised value of the properties currently owned by the husband. This amount included 50% of the proceeds of a mortgage which the husband took out on one of the parcels after the commencement of this action. The wife correctly contended that she was entitled to 50% of the amount that the husband withdrew from the home equity line of credit after the commencement of this action and 50% of the amount that the husband withdrew from his life insurance policy. Since this matrimonial action was commenced on November 18, 2005, $371,519.30 of the 2005 federal and state income tax refunds should have been deemed marital property. The award of maintenance was properly made taxable to the wife and tax deductible for the husband because no rationale exists "for a departure from the norm envisioned by current Internal Revenue Code provisions" (citing Grumet v. Grumet, 37 AD3d 534, 536; see also Markopoulos v. Markopoulos, 274 A.D.2d 457, 459). The Court pointed out that in light of its determination as to equitable distribution, the wife's maintenance award may have to be recalculated but took no position on this issue.

Motions to Enforce the Terms of a Stipulation of Settlement Are Not Subject to Statutes of Limitation

In Bayen v Bayen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 668354 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were divorced by judgment entered September 10, 1999. The judgment incorporated, but did not merge, the parties' stipulation of settlement. The parties' stipulation provided that the former husband would pay the former wife one half of the present value of his 401(k) pension as of the date of the stipulation, or the sum $41,144.15, pursuant to a Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO). In 2001 the former wife submitted a proposed QDRO to the Supreme Court, but the Supreme Court did not sign it, finding that it was inconsistent with the terms of the stipulation of settlement. In January 2009 the former wife moved, inter alia, to enforce the provision in the stipulation referable to the former husband's pension, to the extent of directing him to pay her the sum of $41,144.15, plus interest, for her share of his retirement pension or, alternatively, that she be awarded her marital share of the pension pursuant to the Majauskas formula (Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481). The Supreme Court denied that branch of the motion, finding that it was time-barred by virtue of the six-year limitations period set forth in CPLR 213(6), applicable to an action based upon a mistake. The Appellate Division affirmed, but on different grounds. It pointed out that an action to enforce a distributive award in matrimonial action is governed by the six-year statute of limitations set forth in CPLR 213(1) and (2). Contrary to the plaintiff's contention, however, motions to enforce the terms of a stipulation of settlement are not subject to statutes of limitation (citing Fragin v. Fragin, 80 AD3d 725, 2011 N.Y. Slip Op 00485, *1 [2d Dept 2011]; Cotumaccio v. Cotumaccio, 171 A.D.2d 723; but cf. Patricia A.M. v. Eugene W.M., 24 Misc.3d 1012). Nonetheless, the former wife was not entitled to the relief sought, but only to the entry of a QDRO, in compliance with the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (29 USC 1001 et seq), that accurately incorporates the terms of the stipulation. In interpreting the stipulation of settlement in a manner so as to give full meaning and effect to its material terms the court should arrive at a construction which will give fair meaning to all of the language employed by the parties to reach a practical interpretation of the expressions of the parties so that their reasonable expectations will be realized. Here, a plain reading of Article V of the stipulation of settlement yields the inescapable conclusion that the former wife agreed to accept, as part of her equitable distribution, the sum of $41,144.15 pursuant to the terms of a QDRO, when the former husband retires from his teaching position. The former husband has yet to retire. Accordingly, the former wife's right to receive this portion of equitable distribution remained inchoate and has not yet vested. Thus, while a request to compel the equitable distribution of the agreed-upon percentage of the former husband's pension pursuant to an ERISA-compliant QDRO was not time-barred, the former wife was not entitled to a present payment of $41,144.15.

"Home State", When Applied to a Child less than Six Months Old, Is Defined as "The State in Which the Child Lived from Birth with Any of the Persons Mentioned

In B.B. v A. B., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 679324 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married on August 18, 2007 in South Lake Tahoe, California. Thereafter, they resided together in Orange County, New York. On November 28, 2010, respondent moved out of the marital residence. She was approximately seven months pregnant at the time. On December 2nd, she filed a family offense petition in Family Court, Orange County and was granted an ex parte Temporary Order of Protection against petitioner. On December 7th, through her attorney, she notified the Family Court that she was withdrawing the family offense petition which had not as yet been served upon plaintiff, and that she was "leaving for the holidays with her family." That same day, she left New York and returned to her parents' home in Alexandria Minnesota. She wrote to plaintiff she would be back by January 1st or 2nd with her parents. Respondent did not return home to the marital residence after the holidays as she had previously indicated. Plaintiff thereupon commenced an action for divorce in this court on January 4, 2011 by filing a Summons with Notice stating "Action for Divorce". Included in the items of relief was an adjudication of custody and visitation as to the yet unborn child. The infant child, F.B. was born on January 29, 2011 in Douglas County Hospital in Alexandria, Minnesota. The Writ of Habeas Corpus was issued by the court on February 1, 2011, and made returnable on February 15th. The writ was adjourned on consent to February 17th, on which date both counsel and plaintiff appeared and oral argument was held. The court waived the appearance of the infant who was only several days old when the writ was issued, and had developed some health issues. In the meanwhile, on February 11th, respondent filed a petition in District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Douglas County, Minnesota, for legal and physical custody, child support, and to schedule parenting time for petitioner. Supreme Court held that a petition for a writ of Habeas Corpus confers subject matter jurisdiction upon this Court to adjudicate the parties' custody dispute when the child is outside the State of New York when the petition was filed. the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act provides that its provisions are the exclusive jurisdictional basis for making a child custody determination by a court of this state and that physical presence of, or personal jurisdiction over, a party or a child is not necessary or sufficient to make a child custody determination. DRL 76 (subds.2, 3). The court then had to determine whether New York or Minnesota the "home state", as that term is defined in 75-a (7) of Article 5-A of the Domestic Relations Law, popularly known as the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act. The Court noted that DRL, 75-a (7) defines "home state" as follows: "Home state" means the state in which the child lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding. In the case of a child less than six months of age, the term means the state in which the child lived from birth with any of the persons mentioned. A period of temporary absence of any of the mentioned persons is part of the period." The court could not overlook the clear and unambiguous language in DRL 75-a (7) that "home state", when applied to a child less than six months old, is defined as "the state in which the child lived from birth with any of the persons mentioned." The court found, based upon the totality of the circumstances, the infant's "home state" was Minnesota. Petitioner's application for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, requiring the return of the parties' infant child, F.B., born January 29, 2011, from the State of Minnesota to the State of New York, was denied, and the petition dismissed.

Appellate Division Affirms Family Court's Determination That Child's Best Interests Would Be Served by Awarding Sole Custody to Father and Permitting Him to Return with the Child to Their Native Country of Peru

In Matter of Ortega-Bejar v Morante, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 668110 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the mother and the father were married in 2000, and after the birth of the child later that year, they lived together in their native country of Peru. After an altercation with the father in January 2006, the mother left the marital home with the child. In May 2006, during the pendency of a custody proceeding commenced by the father in Peru, the mother took the child to the United States and settled on Long Island with her boyfriend and his family, without informing the father of their whereabouts. In March 2008, after discovering the whereabouts of the mother and the child, and after learning that the mother had, in May 2007, obtained an order from the Family Court, Queens County, awarding her custody of the subject child upon the father's default, the father commenced this proceeding in the same court, seeking custody of the subject child. The Family Court conducted a hearing on the father's petition, at which it heard testimony from the father and the mother, as well as a court-appointed forensic psychologist who, inter alia, interviewed the parties and the subject child and rendered a comprehensive evaluation specifically addressing the impact on the subject child of a change in custody. After the hearing, the Family Court granted the father's petition and, inter alia, awarded him sole custody of the child. The Appellate Division affirmed. By removing the child from the marital home and relocating to a distant foreign country without informing the father of the subject child's whereabouts, the mother severely interfered with the relationship between the subject child and the father, and thus committed 'an act so inconsistent with the best interests of the child as to per se raise a strong probability that the offending party is unfit to act as a custodial parent. In addition, the parties' testimony-- viewed in light of the Family Court's assessment of their credibility, which is entitled to deference --as well as the testimony of the forensic psychologist, amply supported the Family Court's finding that the father is "far superior [to the mother] as a parent." Accordingly, the Family Court's determination that the subject child's best interests would be served by awarding sole custody to the father and permitting him to return with the child to their native country of Peru was supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record. The portion of the order appealed from addressing the issue of visitation provides that the mother "shall have actual visits as she and the father agree," with such visits to be "therapeutic, supervised, or unsupervised as they agree." Based on the evidence presented at the hearing, including the recommendations of the forensic psychologist, the subject child's best interests would be better served by the establishment of a detailed visitation schedule. It remitted the matter to the Family Court for determination of a visitation schedule including, if necessary, a hearing.

Family Court Has the Authority to Modify an Existing Permanency Goal Absent a Specific Request by a Party

In Matter of Jacelyn TT, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 240161 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept) the Appellate Division observed that at the conclusion of a permanency hearing, Family Court is required to make findings and enter an order of disposition "upon the proof adduced ... and in accordance with the best interests and safety of the child" (Family Ct Act 1089 [d]). Where the court determines that the child is not to be immediately returned to the parent, it must indicate whether the permanency goal for the child "should be approved or modified " (Family Ct Act 1089[d][2][i]) and may select among various alternatives including, among others, the child's eventual return to the parent or placement for adoption (see Family Ct Act 1089 [d][2][i][A]-[E]). Notably, Family Ct Act 1089(c)(5)(i) characterizes petitioner's proposed permanency goal as a "recommendation." While the statute does not explicitly permit the court to modify a permanency goal in the absence of an application by one of the parties, it suggests such authority and does not expressly constrain the court from doing so . It concluded that Family Court has the authority to modify an existing permanency goal absent a specific request by a party.

Right to Receive Child Support Belongs to the Custodial Parent, Not to the Child

In Miller v Miller, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 781377 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that the 1975 stipulation pursuant to which plaintiffs claimed entitlement to their deceased father's pension death benefits was superseded by the stipulation entered into between their parents in 1990. The 1990 stipulation was expressly intended "to settle all of the demands, claims, counterclaims, set-offs and defenses in the above-captioned matter [the divorce action], and to settle all disputes, claims, and agreements between the parties, and to once and for all put this matter to rest," and therefore encompassed the parents' ongoing dispute over the father's obligation to name plaintiffs as irrevocable beneficiaries under his pension. Furthermore, the 1990 stipulation provided that it "contain[ed] the entire agreement of the parties and supersede[d] and replace[d] any and all prior agreements or Court Orders previously entered in the above captioned matter." Thus, it was clear that the parents intended to replace the 1975 stipulation with the 1990 stipulation. It noted that in any event, the pension death benefits that the father promised plaintiffs when they were young children were his active service benefits, which would have been payable only if he had died before retiring. When he retired in 2001, he applied for "Option II" post-retirement death benefits, which entitled him to reduced payments during his lifetime and payments in the same amount for his designated beneficiary after his death for the remainder of the beneficiary's life (see Administrative Code of City of N.Y. 13-558). The Teachers Retirement System was obligated by law to honor his choice of beneficiary (see id.; see generally Matter of Creveling v. Teachers' Retirement Bd., 255 N.Y. 364, 372-373 [1931]). Plaintiffs contended that their parents had no authority to extinguish the father's obligation, originally agreed to in the 1975 stipulation, to name them as irrevocable beneficiaries without their consent. To the extent they claimed entitlement to the benefits as third-party beneficiaries of a child support obligation embodied in the 1975 stipulation, their argument failed because the right to receive child support belongs to the custodial parent, not to the child (citing Kendall v. Kendall, 200 App.Div. 702 [1922]). To the extent they claimed entitlement to the benefits as third-party beneficiaries of non-support obligations under the 1975 stipulation, their argument failed because they had no right to enforce a superseded agreement--even one superseded without their consent--when the benefit they seek to enforce had not yet vested before the agreement was modified and the superseded agreement did not prohibit its modification.

Cruel and Inhuman Treatment Divorce Affirmed Based upon Pattern of Emotional Neglect, Dominion and Control Which Endangered Plaintiff's Mental Well-being

In Bennett v Bennett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 722261 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1980 and had six children. Plaintiff left the marital residence in May 2004 and commenced this action for divorce in October 2006. Following a bench trial, Supreme Court granted plaintiff a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that action for divorce on the basis of cruel and inhuman treatment requires a showing of serious misconduct and, with a long-standing marriage, a high degree of proof showing a pattern of cruel and inhuman treatment affecting the plaintiff's physical or mental health such that continued cohabitation would be unsafe or improper. Supreme Court, as the trier of fact, has broad discretion in determining whether a spouse's conduct rises to the level of cruel and inhuman treatment and its factual determinations and assessment of witness credibility are entitled to great deference. As such, the court's determination will not be lightly overturned on appeal. The credible evidence adduced at trial revealed that plaintiff was subjected to authoritarian, demeaning and controlling treatment by defendant throughout their 26-year marriage. According to plaintiff's detailed and uncontradicted testimony, defendant enforced a strict, hierarchical structure of the household and expected her to be fully submissive to him. Defendant's conduct also included calling plaintiff names, isolating her from family and friends, undermining her authority as a parent, ridiculing and making disparaging comments about her and her physical appearance in front of the children, and preventing her from leaving the marital residence by, among other things, disabling the family vehicle. Moreover, defendant refused to engage in sexual relations with plaintiff for several years prior to her leaving the marital residence in 2004. Plaintiff offered evidence, which Supreme Court deemed credible, that defendant's conduct caused her to feel disrespected, emotionally broken-down, depressed and to have suicidal thoughts. She also vacated the marital residence on more than one occasion due to defendant's conduct and, ultimately, sought counseling. In light of this proof, there was a sufficient basis for Supreme Court's conclusion that defendant engaged in a pattern of emotional neglect, dominion and control which endangered plaintiff's mental well-being, thereby rendering it improper for her to continue to cohabit with him.

Failure to File a Current Statement of Net Worth Does Not Render Cross Motion for Enforcement Defective as Determination of Arrears Does Not Implicate Plaintiff's Financial Circumstances

In Shachnow v Shafer, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2011 WL 722403 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied defendant wife's application for an upward modification of basic child support under the parties' settlement agreement, reallocated the parties' future responsibilities for certain add-on expenses, denied defendant's request for child support arrears and attorney's fees, and granted plaintiff husband's cross motion for child support arrears to the extent of directing defendant to pay plaintiff the sum of $48,445.41 for tuition payments made by plaintiff on defendant's behalf. It held that the court properly granted plaintiff's cross motion for arrears for the child's private school tuition owed by defendant under the separation agreement. Plaintiff's failure to file a current statement of net worth did not render the cross motion defective as determination of the amount of arrears does not implicate plaintiff's financial circumstances. In addition, defendant's admitted receipt of multiple notices of default sent by plaintiff contradicted her claim that plaintiff waived his right to defendant's contribution of 50% toward the child's private school tuition. It also found that Defendant had not demonstrated that the child's diagnosis of attention deficit hyperactivity disorder following execution of the parties' separation agreement resulted in medical and educational expenses that impacted defendant's ability to meet the needs of the child, and defendant failed to make a prima facie showing that a substantial, "unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances had occurred resulting in a concomitant need" such that an upward modification in child support is warranted (citing Merl v. Merl, 67 N.Y.2d 359, 362 [1986]). In the absence of evidence that the child's needs are not being met, a hearing is unnecessary.

Support Magistrate Has No Authority to Hear Case When Respondent Raised Visitation as a Defense

In Matter of Barney v Van Auken, 916 N.Y.S.2d 533 (3d Dept 2011) Petitioner and respondent were the parents of a daughter. Upon turning 18 in November 2008, the child left respondent's home where she had resided as per a 2004 custody order and moved in with petitioner. Her reasons for leaving respondent's home included his disapproval of her 26-year-old boyfriend. In May 2009, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking child support. Respondent asserted as defenses that petitioner had acted to alienate the child from him, the child was emancipated, and the child had abandoned her relationship with him. The Support Magistrate rejected respondent's defenses and directed that he pay $170 biweekly child support. Family Court denied respondent's objections. The Appellate Division reversed. One of the issues that [Support Magistrates] are not empowered to hear and determine is contested visitation, which includes visitation as a defense, alleged here as an abandonment. Although the Support Magistrate had authority to issue a temporary order of support (see Family Ct. Act 439[c]), when respondent raised visitation as a defense, the matter should have been immediately referred to Family Court for resolution of such issue

Fourth Department Holds That Matter of Oswego County Support Collection Unit v. Richards Should No Longer Be Followed.

In Matter of Huard v Lugo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 455295 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Respondent father appealed from an order confirming the determination of the Support Magistrate that he willfully violated an order of child support and sentencing him to a term of incarceration of 90 days. The father contended that the Support Magistrate erred in allowing him to proceed pro se at the fact-finding hearing. The Appellate Division noted that the father did not file any objections to the Support Magistrate's order. In Matter of Oswego County Support Collection Unit v. Richards (305 A.D.2d 1101, lv denied 100 N.Y.2d 637), it determined that, because the respondent failed to file objections to the Hearing Examiner's order finding willfulness and recommending commitment pursuant to Family Court Act 439 (former [e]), he "waiv[ed] his right to appellate review of the finding of a willful violation. Section 439(e), however, was revised in 2004 by providing that a determination of willful violation of a support order where commitment is recommended does not constitute a final order. A determination by a support magistrate that a person is in willful violation of a support order and recommending commitment has no force and effect until confirmed by a Judge of the Family Court Such a determination by a support magistrate does not constitute a final order to which a party may file written objections. A party's "sole remedy" is to appeal from the final order of Family Court (Dakin, 75 AD3d at 640). It held that to the extent that Matter of Oswego County Support Collection Unit v. Richards required a party to file objections in order to preserve a contention regarding such a determination, it should no longer be followed. The Court concluded however, that the father failed to preserve his contention for review under the "normal rules of preservation" because he failed to raise it before Family Court at the confirmation proceeding, where he was represented by counsel. In any event, it found that the father's contention lacked merit.

Equitable Distribution Law (Domestic Relations Law 236[B]) Not Applicable to a Stipulation of Settlement Entered During Proceedings Pursuant to MHL Article 81

In Matter of Donald LL,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 458711 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Equitable Distribution Law (Domestic Relations Law 236[B]) is not applicable to a stipulation of settlement, entered during proceedings pursuant to article 81 of the Mental Hygiene Law, that divides property in a manner similar to equitable distribution but does not involve the dissolution of a marriage. Donald L.L. (defendant) and his wife, the person for whom plaintiff was, inter alia, appointed guardian (defendant's wife), were married in 1966. In May 2005, defendant's wife suffered a stroke that caused severe brain damage and left her unable to care for herself. Defendant was also in poor health and not capable of caring for his wife. Thus, defendant's wife lived in the home of plaintiff, who provided 24-hour care for defendant's wife. In October 2007, defendant commenced a proceeding pursuant to Mental Hygiene Law article 81, seeking, inter alia, an order naming the Catholic Family Center as the guardian of his wife's person and property. Plaintiff cross-petitioned for an order naming himself as guardian of defendant's wife and her property. During proceedings in Supreme Court on January 24, 2008, plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral stipulation of settlement whereby plaintiff would be named the guardian of the person and property of defendant's wife, which the court converted into an order naming plaintiff as the guardian. With plaintiff acting as guardian of defendant's wife, plaintiff and defendant immediately entered into a second oral stipulation of settlement whereby defendant and his wife would live separately, with defendant having the right to visitation. Plaintiff and defendant further stipulated, inter alia, that the marital property of defendant and his wife would be divided between them and that defendant would make weekly "maintenance and support" payments to his wife. The second stipulation included the following statement: "[Plaintiff and defendant] would like to stipulate to settle issues of property settlement and spousal support in the nature of an opting[-]out agreement as the same is provided for under the Domestic Relations Law. [They] do not intend to make this a divorce proceeding but would like [the stipulation] to serve as their agreement as to the issues ... set forth [herein] and to that extent would also like to sign a written adoption of the oral stipulation." After the terms of the second oral stipulation were read into the record, plaintiff and defendant signed a written adoption of the oral stipulation. In an order and judgment entered April 21, 2008, the court, inter alia, determined that defendant's wife was an incapacitated person, appointed plaintiff as the guardian of the person and property of defendant's wife and incorporated by reference the terms of the stipulation of settlement. In September 2008, plaintiff commenced an action seeking to enforce the stipulation of settlement with respect to the "maintenance and support" payments by defendant and to void various allegedly fraudulent transfers between defendant and defendant Patricia Fitzgerald. Plaintiff moved for, inter alia, a preliminary injunction enjoining defendants from "dealing" with any of their property pending resolution of the action. Defendants cross-moved for, inter alia, an order vacating and setting aside the stipulation of settlement. In an order entered January 28, 2009, the court denied the motion and cross motion. On Appeal the Defendants contended that the court erred in granting relief in the form of equitable distribution without conducting a hearing on the economic issues between defendant and his wife. The Appellate Division rejected that contention inasmuch as those economic issues were resolved by the stipulation of settlement. Furthermore, the record demonstrated that the stipulation of settlement was the product of extensive negotiations conducted after full disclosure of economic information. Therefore, there was no need to remit the matter for the resolution of economic issues. It held that the Equitable Distribution Law does not require a different result. Domestic Relations Law 236(B) is "applicable to actions for an annulment or dissolution of a marriage, for a divorce, for a separation, for a declaration of the nullity of a void marriage" and other similar actions (236[B][2][a]). Thus, the concept of equitable distribution is written into the laws of the State so as to apply only in certain cases involving the abrogation of the marital status.. In the absence of an action for the abrogation of the marital status, a court cannot "hold [a party] liable to [another party] ... solely on the basis of equitable distribution" (Yedvarb, 92 A.D.2d at 592). Here, however, the court did not hold any party liable solely on the basis of equitable distribution because plaintiff, as the guardian of defendant's wife, and defendant resolved all economic issues through a negotiated settlement agreement that included an explicit statement that defendant and his wife were not divorcing. Therefore, the Equitable Distribution Law was not applicable to this case. In light of the determination, it did not address defendants' contention that the written adoption of the stipulation of settlement did not meet the requirements of Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(3).

To Establish That an Family Offense Has Occurred Does Not Require Proof Beyond a Reasonable Doubt Unless the Remedy to Be Imposed Is Punitive

In Matter of Schneider v Arata, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 337962 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that Family offense proceedings, in general, provide for remedies that are civil in nature and to establish that an offense has occurred does not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt unless the remedy to be imposed is punitive. The respondent's acquittal of the criminal charge related to the same conduct alleged in the family offense petition does not have res judicata effect with respect to the family offense proceeding, as the acquittal did not decide an identical issue material to the petition. Accordingly, the Family Court erred in dismissing the petition on this basis. Likewise, the constitutional protection against double jeopardy presents no bar to the family offense proceeding, as no punitive remedy is sought therein. As the record was insufficient to permit the Court to determine whether the parties had an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act 821(1)(e) the matter was remitted to the Family Court for a hearing to determine whether the Family Court has subject matter jurisdiction under Family Court Act 812(1)(e) and, if so, whether a family offense had been committed.

Family Ct Act 413(1)(G) Does Not Limit the Accrual of Arrears During Relevant Period Absent Respondent's Affirmative Request for and Successfully Obtaining Relief from Original Order

In Matter of Madison County Commissioner of Social Services v Felker, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 240138 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Pursuant to a May 2007 order Respondent father was obligated to pay the child's mother, Mary Chafee, $25 per week in child support. The order noted that respondent, though unemployed at that time, had held full-time employment in the past and was "healthy and capable of working." Since entry of that order, respondent never paid support as required therein. In December 2008, petitioner commenced a violation proceeding on behalf of Chafee. A Support Magistrate found respondent in willful violation of the support order and recommended a sentence of incarceration be imposed if he did not begin to make regular payments in accordance with the May 2007 order. The Support Magistrate entered a money judgment directing payment of $3,325 in arrears. Following a confirmation hearing held in accordance with Family Ct Act 439(a), Family Court confirmed the finding that respondent had willfully failed to obey the support order and ordered that respondent be incarcerated for 180 days unless he purged himself of the contempt by payment of the arrears--which then totaled $3,650--in their entirety. The Appellate Division affirmed. While respondent testified that he was indigent and earned no income since the issuance of the May 2007 order due to his inability to obtain work, he did not provide any competent evidence of either a physical or mental condition prohibiting him from earning income. Although he also claimed that he had unsuccessfully applied for numerous jobs since entry of the May 2007 order, he failed to provide documentation of his alleged job search and his testimony was not credited. Respondent also admitted that, although he was ordered to attend the career center and the Worker Parents Initiative, he failed to follow-up with attendance after his initial meeting. The Appellate Division rejected Respondent's contention that Family Court erred in failing to cap his arrears at $500 pursuant to Family Ct Act 413(1)(g) because his income was below the federal poverty guidelines. While respondent testified that he continued to be unemployed and was attempting to apply for public assistance, if he wished to "invoke the cap on arrears provided by Family Ct Act 413(1)(g), his remedy was to make an application to modify, set aside or vacate the earlier order". Respondent admitted that he has never sought a modification of the May 2007 order of support. Thus, inasmuch as Family Ct Act s 413(1)(g) will not limit the accrual of arrears during the relevant period absent respondent's affirmative request for and successfully obtaining relief from the original order (Matter of Cortland County Dept. of Social Servs. v. VanLoan, 77 AD3d at 1136; see Family Ct Act s 451; see also Matter of Moore v. Abban, 72 AD3d at 973; Matter of Martinez v. Torres, 26 AD3d 496, 497 [2006]), the court did not err in confirming the Support Magistrate's determination.

Absent Amendment Order of Protection May Not Be Based Upon Post-Petition Incidents

In Matter of Ungar v Ungar, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 256559 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) petitioner (son) filed a family offense petition dated September 19, 2008, against the appellant (father). The petition alleged harassment and that the most recent incident had occurred on September 11, 2008. The Family Court issued a temporary order of protection and thereafter denied the father's motion to dismiss the petition. On February 9, 2010, a fact-finding hearing was held and the Family Court heard testimony from both the son and the father. The Family Court granted the petition and issued an order of protection against the father, based, in part, upon a post-petition incident purportedly occurring in October 2008. The Appellate Division held that as the son specifically acknowledged that the petition had not been amended, the Family Court improperly issued the order of protection based, in part, upon allegations of acts that occurred in October 2008 (citing Matter of Czop v. Czop, 21 AD3d 958, 959; Matter of Cavanaugh v. Madden, 298 A.D.2d 390; Matter of Whittemore v. Lloyd, 266 A.D.2d 305). Considering the other allegations set forth in the petition, the testimony proffered at the hearing before the Family Court failed to establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, the necessary elements of the offenses of harassment in the first degree or harassment in the second degree. Since the record did not support the Family Court's determination that the father committed family offenses warranting the issuance of the order of protection, the order of protection was reversed, the petition denied, and the proceeding dismissed (see Family Ct Act § 841).

Supreme Court Grants Declaratory Judgment Dissolving Vermont Civil Union

In Parker v Waronker, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5653528 (N.Y.Sup.) the matter was commenced as an action for divorce on April 16, 2010. The defendant filed and served an affidavit consenting to the relief requested. After reviewing the submissions of the parties, the Court, on its own motion, elected to convert the action to one for declaratory relief and the defendant submitted written consent to such relief. The Court found that the parties were two female adults who entered into a civil union in the State of Vermont on June 18, 2004. Such civil unions are authorized in that State under Vt Stat Ann, Tit 15, s 1201. In the years that followed, their relationship deteriorated to the point that the defendant left their mutual residence on June 30, 2007, and the parties have lived apart since that time. The plaintiff was a resident of the State of New York. The defendant was a resident of the State of Ohio. The resumption of their relationship as a civil union was not reasonably probable. The parties were precluded from obtaining a dissolution of their civil union in the State of Vermont because neither party was currently a resident of Vermont as required by Vermont Law. See Vt Stat Ann, Tit 15, s 592. There were no children born of this relationship. Both parties waived any claims for any ancillary relief. The Court pointed out that in Dickerson v. Thompson, 73 AD3d 52 (3d Dept 2010), the Court held that the Supreme Court has subject matter jurisdiction over an action for declaratory and equitable relief seeking dissolution of a civil union validly entered into in another state. The decision was based on principles of comity and the emerging public policy of the State of New York to protect the rights of individuals in same sex relationships in a variety of contexts. The Court in Dickerson v. Thompson, supra, left undecided, however, the issue of what relief could be afforded to the litigants in such an action, concluding its opinion with the comment that "our conclusion that subject matter jurisdiction exists does not in any way determine the ultimate question of what, if any, relief is available on the merits." Having concluded that it had jurisdiction to determine whether this civil union should be dissolved, the court found that plaintiff demonstrated grounds for such dissolution under the applicable Vermont Statutes. Vt Stat Ann, Tit 15, s 1206 provides, inter alia, that "the dissolution of civil unions shall follow the same procedures and be subject to the same substantive rights and obligations that are involved in the dissolution of marriage in accordance with chapter 11 of this title...." Vt. Stat Ann, Tit 15 s 551 provides that "(a) divorce from the bond of matrimony may be decreed: ... (7) When a married person has lived apart from his or her spouse for six consecutive months and the court finds that the resumption of marital relations is not reasonably probable. As this Court made a finding that the parties lived apart for a period of more than six consecutive months and that the resumption of this civil union was not reasonably probable, as a matter of law the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment dissolving the civil union entered into by the parties on June 18, 2004.

Family Court Has Authority to Modify an Existing Permanency Goal Absent Specific Request by a Party

In Matter of Jacelyn TT,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 240161 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner initiated proceedings seeking continuation of placement. Family Court held a permanency hearing at which petitioner and the mother agreed that placement of the children should continue, with a goal of return to a parent. Carlton TT. (the father) appeared but presented no evidence and did not seek custody. In two subsequent permanency hearing orders pertaining solely to Jacelyn TT. and Sasha TT., the court continued placement of the children but modified the goal of their permanency plans from reunification to placement for adoption. The mother appealed from both orders and the father appeals only from the order relating to Jacelyn TT. (the child). The father argues that Family Court abused its discretion by modifying the permanency goal without any request from the parties. The Appellate Division disagreed. It observed that at the conclusion of a permanency hearing, Family Court is required to make findings and enter an order of disposition "upon the proof adduced . . . and in accordance with the best interests and safety of the child" (Family Ct Act 1089 [d]). Where the court determines that the child is not to be immediately returned to the parent, it must indicate whether the permanency goal for the child "should be approved or modified " (Family Ct Act 1089[d][2][i]) and may select among various alternatives including, among others, the child's eventual return to the parent or placement for adoption (see Family Ct Act 1089 [d][2][i][A]-[E]). Notably, Family Ct Act 1089(c)(5)(i) characterizes petitioners' proposed permanency goal as a "recommendation." While the statute does not explicitly permit the court to modify a permanency goal in the absence of an application by one of the parties, it suggests such authority and does not expressly constrain the court from doing so. It concluded that Family Court has the authority to modify an existing permanency goal absent a specific request by a party. It also concluded that Family Court's determination was supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record.

Whether a Breakdown of a Marriage Is Irretrievable Is a Question to Be Determined by the Finder of Fact

In Strack v Strack, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 356058 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married on May 25, 1963 and plaintiff sought a divorce based upon the no fault grounds contained within Domestic Relations Law § 170(7). This was the third divorce action plaintiff has commenced. She commenced divorce actions in 1986 and 1990, respectively, both of which were voluntarily discontinued. In lieu of an answer, defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, contending (1) that the complaint lacks specificity (see CPLR 3016[c]); (2) that the conduct alleged in the complaint was barred by the five-year statute of limitations (see Domestic Relations Law § 210[a]); and (3) that the complaint failed to state a cause of action for divorce under Domestic Relations Law § 170(7). The Supreme Court observed that Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) permits divorce where "[t]he relationship between husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months, provided that one party has so stated under oath." The allegations in the complaint were as follows: "The relationship between husband and wife has broken down such that it is irretrievable and has been for a period of at least six months. For a period of time greater than six months, Defendant and Plaintiff have had no emotion in their marriage, and have kept largely separate social schedules and vacation schedules. Each year Plaintiff and Defendant live separately throughout most of the winter months. Though they share the residence for several months out of the year, Plaintiff and Defendant have not lived as husband and wife for a period of time greater than six months. Plaintiff believes the relationship between she and Defendant has broken down such that it is irretrievable and that the relationship has been this way for a period of time greater than six months." The Court found that the allegations were specific and met the additional pleading requirement of having been "stated under oath" (Domestic Relations Law § 170[7]). With reference to defendant's claim that the statute of limitations had run against plaintiff's cause of action, Domestic Relations Law § 210(a) provides that "[n]o action for divorce ... may be maintained on a ground which arose more than five years before the date of the commencement of that action for divorce ...except where ... the grounds therefor are one of those specified in Domestic Relations Law § 170, (4), (5) or (6)...." The grounds specified in Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) are absent from Domestic Relations Law § 210(a), which absence allows no conclusion other than it was the Legislature's intent to exclude it. The Court therefore found that the grounds set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) were subject to the five-year statute of limitations. As the record revealed several instances of matrimonial discord that occurred within the past five years, the Court found that plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the applicable statute of limitations. Additionally, to the extent that some instances of matrimonial discord occurred more than five years ago, the Court found such instances to be part of a continuing course of conduct. The Court observed that the legislative history pertaining to Domestic Relations

Law § 170(7) contains a wide ranging catalogue of submissions from numerous private individuals, organizations, legislators, and agencies throughout New York State. It appeared that Domestic Relations Law s 170(7) was simply a new cause of action subject to the same rules of practice governing the subdivisions which have preceded it. Specifically, Domestic Relations Law § 173 provides that "[i]n an action for divorce there is a right to trial by jury of the issues of the grounds for granting the divorce" and, here, the Legislature failed to include anything in Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) to suggest that the grounds contained therein are exempt from this right to trial. Had it intended to abolish the right to trial for the grounds contained within Domestic Relations Law § 170(7), it would have explicitly done so. Insofar as the phrase "broken down such that it is irretrievable" is nowhere defined in the statute, the determination of whether a breakdown of a marriage is irretrievable is a question to be determined by the finder of fact. The Court held however, that whether a marriage is so broken that it is irretrievable need not necessarily be so viewed by both parties. Accordingly, the fact finder may conclude that a marriage is broken down irretrievably even though one of the parties continues to believe that the breakdown is not irretrievable and/or that there is still some possibility of reconciliation. Having found that Domestic Relations Law § 173 was applicable to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7), the Court ordered that there be an immediate trial on the issue raised in defendant's motion, namely whether "[t]he relationship between husband and wife has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months."

Mandatory Pendente Lite Maintenance Guidelines and Pendente Lite Counsel Fee Statutes Should Be Deviated from Where Calculations Result in the Payee Spouse Having More Monies Available than the Payor Spouse

In Scott M v Ilona M., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 285640 (N.Y.Sup.) Supreme Court found that the new mandatory pendente lite maintenance guidelines and pendente lite counsel fee statutes enacted by the legislature should be deviated from where the calculations will result in the payee spouse having more monies available than the payor spouse as a result of the calculation. The Court also determined that the shift in financial resources that results from the guideline calculation rebuts the presumption of the payor spouse being the "monied" spouse. The Court performed a number of calculations in order to explain the options and consequences of the calculation (see DRL 236 B[5-a]). The husbands gross income was $155,590.00 and the wife's gross Income was $33,705.36. The court noted that the new statute changes the philosophy and purposes of pendente lite support. No longer is the standard to tide over the "more" needy spouse. The standard is a shift in resources pre-trial by automatic calculation. After considering the statutory factors, the Court found that the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance of $37,016.14 (which was $3,097.00 per month) would be unjust and inappropriate because (1) the Court must consider the existence and duration of the pre-divorce joint household of both parties and (2) the child care expense obligation of the parties. This determination cannot be made in a vacuum. In the case at bar and under the formula enunciated by the recent legislation, the shift in resources from the payor spouse to the payee spouse resulted in the payor spouse having a substantial reduction in resources and thus, could not maintain his pre-separation household. The Court recognized that the purpose of a pendente lite award is no longer to "tide over the more needy party", and deviated and determined that temporary maintenance in the amount of $24,667.42 per annum pendente lite implemented the intent and language of the new law. The court deviated in order for the plaintiff to meet his pre-divorce household expenses and taking into account the parties expenses, child care costs and net available resources. The wife requested an award of interim counsel fees in the amount of $10,000.00. The Court noted that the legislation also changed the methodology for the ordering of counsel fees pendente lite. DRL 237 has been amended to provide that: "[t]here shall be rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse. The husband earned $155,590.00 and the wife earned $33,705.36. The husband was the monied spouse. In accordance with the new statutory scheme there is a rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse, the wife. However, based upon the temporary maintenance and child support award, even with the deviation, the court could no longer consider the husband as a "monied spouse". Even with the deviation, there was a substantial shift in actual financial resources. The re-allocation of financial resources articulated in the decision shifted the burden from the husband from being considered the monied spouse, and rebutted the presumption. There was no doubt that the plaintiff earned more than the defendant, and there was a disparity in gross income, but under the financial shift as a result of the mandatory Child Support Standards Act and Maintenance guidelines, even with the maintenance deviation of one-third, the defendant would have more available resources for her and the child than plaintiff. The Court could not hold that just because one party "earns more" than the other that they automatically become the "monied spouse".

Supreme Court May Use its Contempt Powers to Enforce Automatic Orders

In P.S. V R.O., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2011 WL 322465 (N.Y.Sup.) the Supreme Court held that it may use its contempt powers to enforce the automatic orders set forth in DRL§ 236(B)(2)(b) and 22 NYCRR 202.16-a, rejecting the one reported case on point, Buoniello v. Buoniello (5/7/10 NYLJ 28, col. 3 [Sup Ct Suffolk Co]). Nonetheless, it denied the motion because the movant, defendant Husband, had not proven that plaintiff Wife in fact violated the orders. The Wife commenced the divorce action on October 13, 2010 by filing a Summons with Notice, along with a "Notice of Automatic Orders," which sets out the statutory automatic orders verbatim, refers to the section of the Domestic Relations Law establishing the automatic orders, and notifies the recipient that the orders are effective as to the plaintiff (the Wife in this case) upon her filing of the Summons, and that they are effective as to the defendant (the Husband) upon service of the Summons and the Notice of Automatic Orders upon him. The Summons with Notice and the Notice of Automatic Orders were subsequently served on the Husband. The parties jointly owned a vacation home in Vermont (the Vermont House). They had a joint bank account with HSBC (the Joint Account), which they used during the marriage to pay joint expenses. After they separated, they continued to deposit rental income from the Vermont House into the Joint Account and to pay expenses for the Vermont House from it. On or about December 15, 2010, the rental broker for the Vacation House deposited rental income of $6,000 into the Joint Account. On the same day, the Wife transferred these funds into a bank account in her sole name. On or before January 4, 2011, she transferred those funds back to the Joint Account. The Husband claimed in his affidavit in support of his motion that, since May 2009, he has only used funds in the Joint Account for Vermont House expenses. However, the Wife pointed out, and the Husband did not deny, that in June 2009 he spent approximately $500 from the Joint Account at the Borgata Casino Hotel in Atlantic City, New Jersey, and transferred an additional $10,000 from the Joint Account to an account in his sole name. From May 2009 until her withdrawal of $6,000 in December 2010, the Wife made one deposit into the Joint Account of $5,000, and did not make any withdrawals. The Wife claimed that she transferred the $6,000 out of the Joint Account on December 15, 2010 because she feared that the Husband would not spend the funds on the Vermont House expenses and would dissipate them. She claimed that she moved them into her separate account in order to preserve them. The Wife cited to Buoniello v. Buoniello (5/7/10 NYLJ 28, col. 3 [Sup Ct Suffolk Co]), in which the court found that "the directive in the Summons does not constitute a clear and unequivocal order" and that the automatic orders set forth in Domestic Relations Law Section 236(B)(2)(b) "are statutory mandates and do not constitute orders issued by a Court". Based on that reasoning, the court held that contempt was not an appropriate remedy for Mr. Buoniello's withdrawal of $180,000 of retirement funds in his name the day after he had been served with the divorce summons. The Court noted that Buoniello was the only reported decision dealing with the automatic orders cited by the parties or located by the court. However, Buoniello was not binding on the court, and this court declined to follow it because the Buoniello decision did not describe the form of the notice of the automatic orders served upon Mr. Buoniello. It may well be that the court in that case perceived that he had not been given adequate notice of the existence and enforceability of the automatic orders. In contrast, in this case, it was the Wife who served the notice of the automatic orders, and she could not be heard to complain that she herself was not on adequate notice. In any event, the notice she served was complete and tracked the statutory language. Moreover, while the court in Buoniello correctly pointed out that the Domestic Relations Law section dealing with automatic orders is not a "lawful mandate of the court," the Court Rule (22 NYCRR 202.16-a), which requires service of a copy of the "automatic orders" on defendant, and contains language identical to that found in DRL 236(B)(2)(b), certainly is. The Court Rules are promulgated by the Chief Administrator of the Courts on behalf of the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals under the authority vested in them by Judiciary Law Sections 211(1)(b) and 212(2)(b), and by Article Six, Section 30, of the New York State Constitution, to adopt rules to regulate practice and procedure in the courts. Thus, the court rules constitute lawful mandates of the court. Furthermore, the legislative history of Domestic Relations Law Section 236(B)(2)(b) made it clear that the legislature intended that a violation of the automatic orders would be redressed by the same remedies available for violations of any order signed by a judge. The New York State Assembly Memorandum in Support of the legislation states that the statute was intended: to place upon the plaintiff a duty to serve upon the defendant automatic orders which would bind both parties from the commencement of a matrimonial action. The Chief Judge effectuated these legislative goals by promulgating and publishing the Court Rule. Accordingly, the court found that civil contempt is available as a remedy for violation of the automatic orders, provided that the plaintiff has served the defendant with adequate notice of the automatic orders, as has been done in this case. In relevant part, the first paragraph of the automatic orders states: ... neither party shall sell, transfer, encumber, conceal, assign, remove or in any way dispose of, without the consent of the other party in writing, or by order of the court, any property ... individually or jointly held by the parties, except in the usual course of business, for customary and usual household expenses or for reasonable attorney's fees in connection with this action..... It was undisputed that the Wife did not spend any of the withdrawn funds, and the Husband had not shown that she intended to or did spend them for any purpose prohibited by the automatic orders. The automatic orders specifically permit the expenditure of assets during matrimonial litigation in the ordinary course of business and on "household" expenses. The Wife claimed that she moved the funds to preserve them and to prevent the Husband from dissipating them, and she replaced them without spending any of them. Therefore, the Husband had not shown that she violated the automatic orders. In addition, the Husband fails to show that his rights were "defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced" (DRL 753[A]) by the brief removal from the Joint Account of the funds which were withdrawn, and promptly replaced, by the Wife. Consequently, the Husband failed to make out his claim for contempt.

Prohibition Against Double Counting Did Not Apply to the Distribution of a Tangible, Income-producing Asset

In Weintraub v Weintraub, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5094373 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the maintenance award to the defendant of $3,000 per month until the plaintiff retires was a provident exercise of the Supreme Court's discretion . The award of an attorney's fee to the defendant was likewise proper. Contrary to the plaintiff's argument, the prohibition against double counting did not apply to the distribution of the parties' plumbing and fire sprinkler contracting company, which was a tangible, income-producing asset (see Keane v. Keane, 8 NY3d 115, 119) The Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff's contention that he overpaid pendente lite support in a prior action for a divorce which was dismissed, should have been raised and resolved in that action, and therefore, that he was not entitled to a credit for the purported overpayment. It agreed with the Supreme Court's determination that the defendant did not wastefully dissipate assets by paying the parties' daughter's graduate school expenses from marital funds (citing Raynor v. Raynor, 68 AD3d 835). It declined to disturb the Supreme Court's determination not to credit the plaintiff for his withdrawal from marital funds of $100,000 paid to his mother. That determination was expressly based upon the finding that the plaintiff's unsubstantiated testimony that it was repayment of a loan used to pay a marital debt lacked credibility. It agreed with the plaintiff, however, that the Supreme Court erred in determining that the Jefferson Life Insurance Policy on the defendant's parents, of which the defendant is the beneficiary, was the defendant's separate property. The policy was purchased during the marriage and the premiums were paid, in part, with marital funds; it was, therefore, marital property. It modified the judgment accordingly and awarded the plaintiff a credit of $35,359.23, representing 50% of the net value of the policy.

Not Necessary to Conduct a Hearing When Court Possesses Sufficient Relevant Information to Render an Informed Determination in the Child's Best Interest

In Feldman v Feldman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5095332 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that generally, visitation should be decided after a full evidentiary hearing to determine the best interests of the children. However, it is not necessary to conduct such a hearing when the court already possesses sufficient relevant information to render an informed determination in the child's best interest. Here, the parties were divorced in 2003 by a judgment which incorporated, but did not merge, the terms of a stipulation providing that the father would have visitation with the children. In 2009, the father commenced an enforcement proceeding in the Family Court, alleging that the mother was interfering with his visitation. On the date scheduled for trial, the parties informed the Family Court that they had come to an agreement regarding the father's visitation. The agreement was read into the record and the parties waived their right to a hearing. The Family Court permitted the attorney for the children to elicit testimony from the mother and the father. The Family Court had already interviewed the children in camera, and had a forensic evaluation conducted of the parties and the children. It held that under these circumstances, the Family Court had adequate information before it to determine that it was in the children's best interests to have visitation with the father as outlined in the parties' agreement. Accordingly, contrary to the contention of the attorney for the children, the Family Court did not err in failing to conduct an evidentiary hearing.

Attorney Not Entitled to Charging Lien if Bills Not Sent Every Sixty Days

In Hovanec v Hovanec, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5095419 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that the court rules imposing certain requirements upon attorneys who represent clients in domestic relations matters (see 22 NYCRR part 1400) were designed to address abuses in the practice of matrimonial law and to protect the public. The failure to substantially comply with those rules will preclude an attorney's recovery of a legal fee. Here, Supreme Court correctly determined, upon reargument, that there was no basis to change the original determination that the appellant had failed to make a prima facie showing, by submitting the requisite documentary evidence, that it substantially complied with the requirement of providing itemized bills for legal services to its client at least every 60 days (see 22 NYCRR 1400.2, 1400.3). Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly adhered to its original determination that the appellant had failed to establish its entitlement to a charging lien.

Order of Protection Issued for Lurching Car toward Father

In Matter of Kobel v Holiday, 910 N.Y.S.2d 752 (4th Dept, 2010) the Appellate Division concluded that the court properly found that petitioner father met his burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that the mother committed the family offense of reckless endangerment in the second degree (see Family Ct. Act § 812[1]; Penal Law § 120.20), thus warranting the issuance of an order of protection, by lurching her car forward and stopping within inches of the father and the parties' child.

Support Magistrate Required to Provide Clear Record of Source from Which Income Is Imputed and Reasons for Imputation

In Matter of Rohme v Burns, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5021330 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that a court need not rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated future potential earnings. The court may impute income to a party based on the party's employment history, future earning capacity, educational background, or money received from friends and relatives. Where a party's account is not credible, the court may impute an income higher than claimed. However, "in exercising the discretion to impute income to a party, a Support Magistrate is required to provide a clear record of the source from which the income is imputed and the reasons for such imputation". Where the Support Magistrate fails to specify the sources of income imputed and the actual dollar amount assigned to each category, the record is not sufficiently developed to allow appellate review. The Court agreed with Family Court that the father's testimony regarding his income and earning capacity was not credible. However, the Support Magistrate failed to state how he arrived at the imputed income figure of $100,000 per year. It therefore remitted the matter to the Family Court for a report from the Support Magistrate on the issues of the specific sources of income imputed to the father, the actual dollar amounts assigned to each category, and the resultant calculations pursuant to Family Court Act § 413(1)(c), and thereafter a new determination of the objections.

Defendant Not Entitled to Maintenance Retroactive to the Date of Her Pendente Lite Application Where Her Applications for Pendente Lite Relief Were Denied and Only Request for Maintenance Was Made at Trial

In Massirman v Massirman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4807680 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which, inter alia, awarded the wife five years of maintenance, awarded her a distributive share of 25% of the plaintiff's interest in a business, and awarded her an attorney's fee of $20,000. It found no basis to disturb the Supreme Court's conclusion that the defendant's credibility was "diminished by her failure to produce business records, and her failure to list significant assets on her initial net worth statement," including any mention of her business, Alchemy Fashions. Moreover, the paucity of information provided and the minimal efforts expended by the defendant in attempting to provide documentation of her finances, clearly displayed a lack of good faith on her part. The defendant contended that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to either award her maintenance for life or for a duration longer than five years. However, the Supreme Court found that the defendant offered no evidence of ill health and that there was no evidence that she "reduce[d] or [lost] lifetime earning capacity as a result of having foregone or delayed education, training, employment, or career opportunities during the marriage" . Except for several years before and after the parties' son was born, the defendant continuously worked in the field of high-end clothing retail, operating her own businesses for most of the marriage. Supreme Court credited the plaintiff's testimony regarding the declining state of his business, and rejected the defendant's testimony that her business did not yield any profits in light of her failure to provide the requisite documentation. Under all of the circumstances, the maintenance award was proper. Contrary to the defendant's contention, she was not entitled to maintenance retroactive to the date of her pendente lite application. The purpose of a maintenance award is distinct from that of pendente lite relief. The record indicated that the defendant's applications for pendente lite relief were denied and that no appeals were taken therefrom. Although an award of maintenance can be made retroactive "as of the date of the application therefor", since the defendant did not commence this divorce action, her only request for maintenance was made at the trial. Therefore, the Supreme Court properly directed that its maintenance award to the defendant would commence as of April 23, 2008, the date of the decision after trial (see DRL 236[B][6][a]). The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant a distributive award of only 25% of the plaintiff's interest in a business. The evidence adduced at trial demonstrated that the defendant's role in the plaintiff's career was minimal, that she continued her own career, and that she made only indirect contributions to the plaintiff's business.

Voluntary Discontinuance with Prejudice Should Be Granted in Custody Case to Prevent Plaintiff from Harassing Defendant with Further Litigation.

In Matter of Fiacco v Engler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4903886 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the father filed a petition seeking full custody of the child, claiming that the mother had unreasonably restricted his contact and communication with the child. At the first appearance on this petition in June 2009, the father notified Family Court that he had filed complaints against his assigned counsel, as well as against the court and the attorney for the child. As a result, his counsel sought, and was permitted, to be relieved of the assignment. The father failed to appear at the next two scheduled court appearances and newly assigned counsel moved, by order to show cause, to be relieved. A third attorney was assigned to represent the father and a trial date of January 22, 2010 was set. Before the trial date, Family Court conducted a Lincoln hearing with the child. However, the day before trial, the father's counsel sent a letter on the father's behalf indicating that he wished to withdraw the custody petition. The mother, as well as the attorney for the child, advised that they would consent to a dismissal of the petition, but only on the condition that it be entered with prejudice. The court dismissed the petition without prejudice. The Appellate Division modified on the facts by dismissing the petition with prejudice. It held that generally, a voluntary discontinuance is without prejudice, unless the order, notice, or stipulation of discontinuance states otherwise. An order of discontinuance with prejudice is appropriate where such is necessary to prevent the plaintiff from harassing the defendant with further litigation. Since the Family Court Act does not address voluntary discontinuances, the Court held that the provisions of the CPLR must govern this aspect of the proceeding (Family Ct Act 165[a]). Whether an application to discontinue an action pursuant to CPLR 3217(b) should be granted lies within the sound exercise of the court's discretion, and such should be entered "upon terms and conditions, as the court deems proper" (CPLR 3217[b]; see Siegel, N.Y. Prac 298 [4th ed]). Here, the father's request to discontinue this proceeding came on the eve of trial and only after the child had been compelled to participate in a Lincoln hearing . The attorney for the child reported that the child suffered a "panic attack" as a result of the Lincoln hearing. Moreover, the father's persistent failure to appear as required at regularly scheduled court appearances provided ample support for the mother's contention that this petition was filed by him principally as a means by which he could harass and annoy her. As a result, it found that the discontinuance should have been with prejudice.

Right to Exclusive Occupancy and Restriction on Partition Must Be Reasonable.

In Pando v Tapia, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5187739 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant, Maria Theresa Tapia, and her husband, as tenants by the entirety, purchased certain real property. There were no children of the marriage and, in 1979, they were divorced. The judgment of divorce awarded exclusive possession of the subject property to the defendant. In 2005 the defendant's former husband died. His sole surviving heirs were a son and a daughter from a prior marriage who inherited his interest in the subject property. On April 29, 2008, they sold their interest in the property to the plaintiff, Thanas Pando. In February 2009 the plaintiff commenced an action for partition. The Appellate Division pointed out that as a result of the 1979 divorce, the defendant and her former husband owned the subject property as tenants in common, since their ownership as tenants by the entirety was extinguished as a matter of law. After the death of the defendant's former husband in 2005, his interest in the subject property passed to his two surviving heirs, and they, in turn, sold their interest to the plaintiff. Thus, the plaintiff and the defendant became owners of the subject property as tenants in common, with each owning a one-half undivided interest. Pursuant to Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law 901(1), a tenant in common may maintain an action for the partition of real property and for a sale if a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners (see RPAPL 901[1]). While partition is governed by statute, the actual remedy is subject to the equities between the parties. In a partition action where, as here, one of the tenants in common was previously awarded exclusive possession pursuant to a judgment of divorce, the right of exclusive occupancy and the restriction on partition which results therefrom, must be deemed limited to a reasonable duration absent an express or implied agreement to the contrary. Here, the plaintiff made a prima facie showing of entitlement to judgment as a matter of law on the complaint and dismissing the first and second counterclaims by submitting a duly executed deed demonstrating his ownership and the right to possession of the subject property as a tenant in common and evidence that the defendant's right to exclusive possession under the judgment of divorce had expired with the passage of a reasonable period of time. In opposition, the defendant failed to raise a triable issue of fact rebutting the plaintiff's prima facie showing or as to the merit of the affirmative defense of laches and the first and second counterclaims. She failed to raise a triable issue of fact as to whether partition was barred by express or implied agreement or as to whether her right to exclusive possession, which had no stated duration in the judgment of divorce, had not expired after the passage of approximately 30 years (citing Sherman v. Sherman, 168 A.D.2d 550, 551; Surlak v. Fulfree, 145 A.D.2d at 81; Luvera v. Luvera, 119 A.D.2d at 812). Accordingly, Supreme Court should have granted plaintiff's motion for summary judgment.

Court of Appeals Amends Rules to Reduce Number of Briefs and Require Submission of Records, Appendices and Briefs in Text Searchable Portable Document Format (Pdf) on Compact Disc (Cd) or Digital Video Disc (Dvd)

The Court of Appeals amended its Rules of Practice effective December 8, 2010. Former section 500.2 was repealed in its entirety and a new section 500.2 was substituted for it. Sections 500.11, 500.12, 500.14 and 500.23 were amended. The number of paper copies of records, appendices and briefs has been reduced to 20 instead of the current 25 for normal coursed appeals and certified question reviews. In addition, parties are required to file on disk digital versions of each paper filing. Appeals to be considered under section 500.11 of the Rules are subject to a similar digital filing requirement. The companion briefs and record material in digital format must comply with the current “technical specifications” available from the clerk’s office. The requirements regarding submission in digital format apply to all appeals for which the preliminary appeal statement is filed on or after the December 8, 2010 effective date

Policy Implications Fraud Being Perpetrated on the Court Warrants a Hearing

In Augustin v Augustin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5292609 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified an order which denied plaintiff’s motion to vacate a judgment of divorce entered by the Clerk of the court in 1985. It pointed out that a motion to vacate a judgment upon the ground of fraud pursuant to CPLR 5015(a)(3) must be made within a reasonable time. The IAS court found that the wife was aware of the defendant husband’s alleged misconduct by July 1990, and that she waited until 2008 to move to vacate the judgment. It determined that the wife’s 18-year delay was unreasonable. The Appellate Division pointed out that although the wife never argued in the Court below that the 1985 judgment should be vacated for lack of jurisdiction pursuant to CPLR 5015(a)(4) it may review that argument since it is a legal argument which appears upon the face of the record and could not have been avoided if brought to the husband’s attention at the proper juncture. The wife’s argument, however, lacked merit. Although a motion to vacate a judgment for lack of jurisdiction may be made “at any time”, such a motion should be denied if the movant acted as if the judgment were in effect before moving to vacate it. Here, the IAS court determined that because the wife did not deny that she submitted the 1985 divorce judgment to the Queens County Family Court in 1992 to obtain support for herself and her children, she waived any objection to the court’s jurisdiction over her. However, inasmuch as each party contended that the other surreptitiously procured the 1985 judgment by some form of deceit, and given the policy implications of a fraud being perpetrated on the court, it exercised its independent discretion and remanded for an evidentiary hearing. It stated that if it is found that it was the wife who wrongfully obtained the divorce, her motion to vacate the judgment should be denied. If, however, it was the husband who was fraudulent, then Supreme Court can reach the issue of whether the wife’s delay in seeking to vacate the judgment was reasonable, or whether she waived any challenges to the validity of the judgment by relying on it in seeking maintenance and support in Family Court in 1992. The need for an evidentiary hearing was manifest by the IAS’s court characterization of the wife’s lack of “credibility and bona fides” and the concurrence’s assertion that “there is a substantial basis for believing that the husband fraudulently obtained the divorce”.

Appellate Division Holds that Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Termination Proceeding Requires Reversal and Cites Examples of Why Counsel Was Ineffective

In Matter of Eileen R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5185802 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner commenced an abandonment proceeding in January 2009. Respondent was unable to attend the proceedings because he was incarcerated in Pennsylvania, so Family Court assigned counsel who provided representation throughout the hearing. Petitioner presented proof establishing that respondent had made no attempt to contact the children, petitioner or the foster parents during the relevant six-month period and had not been prevented from doing so. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court found that the children were abandoned and terminated respondent's parental rights.

Respondent appealed, arguing that his counsel was ineffective and that his right to due process of law was violated because he was prevented from participating in the termination hearing. The Appellate Division agreed with him, in a unanimous opinion written by Justice McCarthy. He pointed out that the Due Process Clauses of both the U.S. and N.Y. Constitutions protect a parent's right to be present throughout a proceeding implicating the termination of parental rights. This right to be present is not absolute and must be balanced with the child's right to a prompt and permanent adjudication. Due process considerations are relevant to protecting the rights of parents who are unable, because of their incarceration, to personally attend proceedings concerning parental rights. Some examples of steps that courts have taken to protect the due process rights of unavoidably absent parents include permitting telephonic testimony or attendance, testimony by other means such as depositions, periodic adjournments to permit the incarcerated parent to review transcripts of testimony, and appointing counsel who can fully participate in the proceeding on behalf of the parent. If such alternative means of participation can be implemented without unduly delaying the proceeding, the court is able to simultaneously protect a parent's right to be present and the child's right to a prompt and permanent adjudication. Family Court assigned counsel to represent respondent. Indigent parents facing termination of parental rights are entitled to the assignment of counsel and such counsel must provide effective assistance comparable to that afforded to criminal defendants (see Matter of Brenden O., 20 A.D.3d 722, 723 [2005]). Once counsel is assigned, it is the duty of that attorney to protect the client's rights, but the court is obliged to ensure that the proceeding is fair and that due process is afforded to an individual whose parental rights may be terminated. While there is no due process violation in a case where the parent "was represented at the hearing by counsel who fully participated therein" (citing Matter of Keyanna AA., 35 A.D.3d 1079, 1081 [2006]), respondent's counsel did not meet that standard, resulting in a violation of respondent's due process rights. Before counsel was assigned, Family Court had predetermined that respondent could not testify telephonically. The court allowed respondent to make an initial appearance by telephone for arraignment on the petition, when he was unrepresented, but informed respondent that the court did not "allow testimony over the telephone" and would therefore proceed in his absence and "make a decision based on the testimony presented by [petitioner]." Such an announcement by the court--that it would make a decision based on petitioner's evidence alone--indicated that respondent would not be permitted to present any evidence; this was improper and contrary to the fundamental aspects of our adversary system. Although the court made these determinations before counsel's assignment, counsel did not later object or request that respondent be able to present evidence or his own testimony, either by telephone, deposition or any other means. Counsel also did not attempt to utilize other permissive alternatives designed to reduce the prejudice caused by respondent's absence, such as requesting adjournments to permit counsel to review transcripts of testimony with respondent prior to cross-examining petitioner's witnesses. Counsel attempted to cross-examine the witnesses, but he was apparently unable to comprehensively do so without respondent's input. Had counsel requested adjournments or other opportunities to confer with respondent during the hearing, counsel may have been better equipped to conduct cross-examination. Although Family Court granted two adjournments, under the circumstances here those breaks were insufficient to protect respondent's rights. The first adjournment was granted before the hearing even began because respondent's counsel was recently assigned, was unaware that his client was still incarcerated and expected respondent to be present; he therefore needed time to prepare for the hearing. The second adjournment was granted because, during disclosure, petitioner did not supply certain records; this adjournment should have been granted even if respondent was present at the hearing. While one witness had given direct testimony prior to the second adjournment, counsel did not request that transcripts be supplied so that respondent could review that testimony. The remaining testimony was given without further adjournments. Other than for the one witness, counsel was unable to discuss the direct testimony with respondent to prepare for cross-examination of petitioner's witnesses. Not only was respondent prevented from adequately defending himself by effectively cross-examining witnesses, he was also prevented from putting on a case. Counsel did not present any evidence on respondent's behalf. Respondent's unsworn statements at arraignment and some of counsel's questions demonstrate that respondent may have been the only witness who could support his defense that he had attempted to contact the children. Yet respondent was unable to present that defense due to Family Court's apparent blanket policy and counsel's failure to challenge that policy or advocate for respondent's right to present his case in some feasible manner.

The Appellate Division pointed out that contrary to Family Court's blanket policy against telephonic testimony, it is permitted under the Family Ct Act in both child support and paternity proceedings where an incarcerated parent cannot be present (see Family Ct Act 433[c][ii]; 531-a [ii]; 580-316[f]; see also 22 NYCRR 205.44). Even though these statutes do not apply to the type of hearing held in this matter, and do not mandate such accommodations, but are only permissive, in proceedings where they do apply, courts have similarly authorized the use of testimony by telephone, where available and feasible, to protect the due process rights of parents who are physically absent from termination proceedings. While Family Court is not required to permit testimony by telephone or other electronic means in any particular case, it stated that it did not condone any court implementing a blanket policy against such a practice rather than carefully considering the available options based upon the circumstances of each individual case. Unfortunately, counsel acquiesced in this policy. Counsel not only failed to object or make a request for some accommodation, he essentially waived his client's right to be present, stating, "I've had contact with [respondent] and he understands, judge, that this matter is going forward without his participation." Had counsel objected and provided some argument against the blanket policy, Family Court would have had an opportunity to reevaluate its policy and work with counsel to implement a reasonable method to accommodate respondent's participation despite his physical absence. By not objecting or seeking some accommodation, counsel failed to protect respondent's rights. It went on to find that Counsel missed another opportunity to protect his client's rights by ignoring Family Court's actions in response to its own prior order. The court not only allowed respondent to appear by telephone initially--establishing the availability and feasibility of that option--but also issued an order authorizing respondent to appear by telephone on the first day scheduled for the hearing. On that date, however, Family Court abruptly changed its position, stated that the order was "inadvertently unfortunately" issued, failed to contact respondent at the scheduled time and made no further efforts to comply with the order. The court did not explain why the order was initially issued, why its issuance constituted a mistake or why the court was not going to comply with its own order. Despite being aware of this order, counsel did not ask the court to comply with it, seek another order for his client's testimony or even object to the court's unexplained treatment of its own order. Again, counsel's inaction deprived respondent of an opportunity to participate in the hearing.

The Court noted that appellate courts have denied due process violation claims in Family Court proceedings only where the hearing court ensured that an unavoidably absent parent had some opportunity to participate in a meaningful way. Despite Family Court's assignment of counsel, respondent did not enjoy a meaningful opportunity to participate in this case. By neglecting to seek any accommodations to protect respondent's right to be present or participate in some way, counsel's representation was less than meaningful and respondent was prejudiced by counsel's ineffectiveness (see Matter of Templeton v. Templeton, 74 A.D.3d 1513, 1513-1514 [2010]; Matter of Martin v. Martin, 46 A.D.3d 1243, 1246-1247 [2007]). Because respondent's counsel cannot be deemed to have "fully participated" in the hearing under the circumstances here, the assignment of counsel was insufficient to protect respondent's due process rights. Accordingly, respondent was entitled to a new hearing, with new counsel assigned to represent him. The order was reversed, on the law, and the matter remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

Finding of Wilfulness Not Supported by Record Where Respondent Lost His Business, Had Been Evicted from His Offices and Had Qualified for Food Stamps

In Matter of Davis-Taylor v Davis-Taylor, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4977769 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order, which granted petitioner's application, in a proceeding pursuant to Family Ct Act article 4, to hold respondent in willful violation of a prior order of support. The parties were the parents of three children (born in 1993, 1996 and 1997). When they divorced in 2002, respondent was directed to pay $850 per week in child support. At that time, respondent owned and operated an ostensibly financially successful investment company and had annual income of approximately $185,000. It was undisputed that starting prior to the divorce and continuing through August 2008, respondent met his child support obligation. With the nationwide financial downfall in 2008, respondent lost his business and, by late 2008, he had been evicted from his offices and he (and his current spouse) had qualified for food stamps. His failure to make child support payments after August 2008 resulted in this violation petition. Respondent cross-petitioned for modification of his child support obligation. Following a hearing, a Support Magistrate dismissed respondent's modification petition, found that he had willfully violated the support order and, among other things, recommended a 30-day jail sentence. Family Court directed entry of a judgment of $85,100 for arrears and, confirming the finding of willfulness, imposed a 90-day suspended jail sentence. The Appellate Division pointed out that the failure to pay support as ordered provides prima facie proof of a willful violation (FCA 454[3][a]; Matter of Powers v. Powers, 86 N.Y.2d 63, 69 [1995]). The burden then shift[s] to respondent to rebut the evidence of willfulness by 'offering some competent, credible evidence of his inability to make the required payments. A finding of willfulness, which can result in incarceration, must be supported by clear and convincing evidence. Here, respondent had made the required child support payments for over six years and had paid $338,650 toward such obligation during those years. He presented uncontroverted proof that his business failed during the economic downturn of 2008 and that, thereafter, he pursued numerous job possibilities, but was only able to obtain a commission position that had resulted in very low income. His educational background is a high school graduate, and the area in which he had developed an expertise was particularly hard hit during economic decline that commenced in 2008. He looked for jobs both in his field and in other areas. There was no proof that his loss of income was self-imposed in any fashion. He produced documentary proof that, as of September 2009, his household was receiving food stamps and there was a past due payment amount of over $45,000 on the mortgage on the house where he resided. He owned a 10-year-old vehicle that was inoperable because of needed repairs. There was no evidence that he had other assets or income from any other sources. In light of his fairly lengthy history of consistently making all of his considerable child support payments, which were interrupted at a time when uncontroverted and documentary proof substantiated a significant loss of income, the Appellate Division was not persuaded that the record established by clear and convincing evidence the willful nonpayment of his obligation. The order was modified, on the law by reversing so much thereof as found respondent in willful violation of a prior order of support and imposed a suspended jail sentence.

On Motion to Dismiss for Failure to Establish a Prima Facie Case, the Petitioner's Evidence must Be Accepted as True

In Matter of Awoleke v Awoleke, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 5022580 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), On April 12, 2007, Salimata Awoleke (petitioner) filed a family offense petition against Samuel Awoleke (respondent) alleging, that on April 11, 2007, he had followed and verbally threatened her after the parties left the Supreme Court, Queens County, upon settling their divorce action. After the petitioner concluded her testimony, she rested her case. The Family Court granted the respondent's motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that the petitioner failed to establish a prima facie case. The Appellate Division reversed. It pointed out that on a motion to dismiss for failure to establish a prima facie case, the petitioner's evidence must be accepted as true and afforded the benefit of every reasonable inference which may be drawn from it. Moreover, such a motion should not be granted merely because there is an issue of credibility or there are inconsistencies in the proof. Here, the Family Court failed to properly apply this standard in dismissing the petition for failure to establish a prima facie case. Viewing the petitioner's testimony and other evidence in a light most favorable to her, and accepting all the evidence she presented as true, she established a prima facie case (citing Matter of Ramroop v. Ramsagar, 74 AD3d 1208). Accordingly, the Family Court should have denied the respondent's motion. Therefore, it reinstated the petition and remitted the matter to the Family Court, for a new fact-finding hearing and determination of the petition before a different Judge.

Family Court Has Jurisdiction to Award Attorneys Fee Pursuant to DRL 237

In Dempsey v Dempsey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4909629 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which directed the father to pay the mother an attorney's fee in the sum of $13,000. It held that Family Court has the power to award an attorney's fee in a custody matter pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237(b). Note: Family Court Act § 651 grants the Family Court the same powers possessed by the Supreme Court in custody and visitation matters.

Error to Admit Evidence at Family Offense Dispositional Hearing Concerning Incident Not "Relatively Contemporaneous"

In Matter of Pearlman v Pearlman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4366900 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a family offense must be established by a fair preponderance of the evidence (Family Ct Act 832) and the evidence adduced at the fact-finding hearing proved by the requisite preponderance of the evidence that the appellant committed acts constituting disorderly conduct. However, it agreed with the appellant that the Family Court erred in admitting evidence at the dispositional hearing concerning an incident that was not "relatively contemporaneous". However, its finding of aggravating circumstances was based on numerous other factors, including its own observation of the appellant's "wildly erratic and inappropriate behavior and affect in the courtroom," that were sufficient to support the finding, even without the incident of domestic violence that occurred three or five years prior to the filing of the family offense petition (Family Ct Act 827 [a][vii]). It found no merit to the appellant's argument that he was subjected to double jeopardy because the petitioner filed a criminal complaint regarding an alleged violation of the temporary order of protection issued by the Family Court, and was then permitted to testify about the alleged violation during the dispositional hearing. While double jeopardy concerns may come into play where a person allegedly wilfully violates an order of protection, those considerations are not relevant where, as here, the petitioner is merely seeking an order of protection, a remedy which is not punitive and does not involve, at this stage, incarceration. Contrary to the appellant's contention, the Family Court properly permitted the petitioner to testify, during the dispositional hearing, regarding incidents that had been alleged in violation petitions not then before the court. "A broader standard of admissibility of evidence is available on the dispositional hearing than at the fact-finding hearing, and evidence may be admitted as long as it is 'material and relevant' (Family Ct Act 834), including hearsay and other evidence otherwise incompetent.

Conduct So Inconsistent with the Child's Best Interests Raises Strong Probability That Parent Unfit

In Matter of McClurkin v Bailey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4366912 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that Family Court's determination that there had been a sufficient change in circumstances since the issuance of its prior custody order such that it would be in the best interests of the child to award the father sole custody had a sound and substantial basis in the record. Although the prior custody order awarded the mother sole custody of the child, the Family Court had warned her that continued attempts to prevent the father from fostering a relationship with the child could result in a change of custody. The hearing testimony demonstrated that after the issuance of the prior order, the mother interfered with the father's visitation rights by repeatedly failing to bring the child to scheduled visitations and to accommodate court-ordered phone contact between the father and the child. There was also evidence that the mother made unfounded reports of child abuse against the father, and that she continued to be uncooperative and unsupportive of his efforts to foster a relationship with the child. This conduct was so inconsistent with the child's best interests that it per se raised a strong probability that the mother was unfit to act as a custodial parent.

Defendant Wastefully Dissipated Marital Assets by Engaging in Excessive Spending, Making Various Unsecured Loans and Investing in Businesses That Resulted in No Economic Benefit Parties.

In Noble v Noble, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4643080 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1986 and had two children (born in 1988 and 1991). In July 2008, plaintiff commenced this action for divorce. Supreme Court, in adopting specific proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law submitted by the parties, ordered an equal division of the marital equity in the marital residence and the value of the real estate owned by defendant's businesses, distributed the debt associated with those businesses to defendant and classified the remaining assets as separate property. The court also directed defendant to pay both child support and nondurational maintenance and granted plaintiff's application for counsel fees.

The Appellate Division pointed out initially, that "it is well established that the trial court must hear sufficient evidence in order to intelligently make the necessary findings and must state the reasons therefore in accordance with Domestic Relations Law 236(B). Here, the parties submitted nearly 100 pages of proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, each of which cited to the record for support and was marked "found" or "not found" by Supreme Court. It held that the court did not abdicate its responsibilities by adopting the parties' findings and conclusions wholesale, but rather edited them by deleting, adding or modifying language and inserting additional reasoning and awards. Although the statutory factors were not specifically cited to, the court's factual findings revealed that it did consider the relevant factors and adequately set forth the reasons for its decision . Under these circumstances, it found that Supreme Court's decision sufficiently complied with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law s 236(B). It stated that while Supreme Court did not violate the statute in this case, the practice of editing and then adopting proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law is not recommended. Particularly when utilized in the context of an equitable distribution determination, the practice has the potential to create confusion and inconsistencies within the overall decision--as it did here with respect to the distribution of plaintiff's personal account with RBC Wealth Management. Specifically, the court's conclusions of law state that plaintiff's RBC account is separate property associated with "significant debt[]" and not subject to equitable distribution while, at the same time, also state that the RBC account is subject to 50% distribution. Inasmuch as it was unclear as to how the court intended to distribute that asset, it remitted for clarification.

Supreme Court's finding that defendant wastefully dissipated marital assets, a factor which it was entitled to consider in equitably distributing the marital property (see DRL 236[B][5][d][12]), was amply supported by evidence that defendant engaged in excessive spending, made various unsecured loans without plaintiff's knowledge and invested in two businesses that resulted in no economic benefit to the parties. Defendant had been employed with NBT Bank earning an annual income in excess of $80,000, but he resigned in 2007 after being faced with dismissal for simultaneously operating businesses that acted in direct competition with his employer. Defendant then liquidated his 401(k) account, invested the approximately $110,000 into his two businesses and borrowed over $700,000 to cover start-up and other business costs. While obligated on these debts and with the businesses operating at a loss, he made unsecured loans to friends and business associates in amounts totaling over $165,000, none of which had been repaid. Moreover, at a time when it was clear that his businesses were suffering and notwithstanding his court-imposed restrictions on spending, defendant spent an inordinate amount of money. He engaged in extensive travel-- funded by proceeds he received through an insurance settlement involving one of his companies--in the months preceding the trial, spent nearly $10,000 in country club dues in 2009 and thousands of dollars on restaurants, additional golf expenses, hotels, furnishings for his apartment and Internet Web sites, all while failing to pay the mortgage on the marital home, court-ordered child support and maintenance and notwithstanding his court-imposed restriction on spending. Thus, it could not say that the finding of wasteful dissipation was improper or that the court abused its discretion in apportioning all debt associated with defendant's businesses to defendant and declining to credit him with an equitable share of the marital home furnishings as a consequence.

It rejected the defendant's argument that Supreme Court erred in refusing to impute as income to plaintiff the monthly sums of money that she received from her mother during the two years preceding the trial. These funds were given to plaintiff to assist with her day-to-day needs and payment of bills during the time when defendant left his employment at NBT and, subsequently, the marital home, as well as during the pendency of this action when defendant failed to provide support for plaintiff and the children. Moreover, plaintiff testified that there was no agreement that her mother continue to give her such sums of money. Considering the timing and discretionary nature of the gift-giving, the decision not to impute these funds as income was not an abuse of discretion.

Similarly unavailing was defendant's assertion that Supreme Court improperly gave plaintiff a separate property credit for funds used to make the down payment on the marital home. The trial evidence established that plaintiff was given $200,000 from her mother, in the form of two $100,000 checks made out to her only, as a gift for use as a down payment on the marital home. Plaintiff then deposited these funds into the parties' joint account and they were subsequently used for that purpose. Defendant did not dispute that the money was a gift to plaintiff that constituted her separate property when given, but claimed that the funds were converted to marital property when they were deposited into the parties' joint checking account. Although the transfer of separate property into a joint account raises a presumption that the funds are marital property, "this presumption may be rebutted by proof that such deposits were made 'as a matter of convenience, without the intention of creating a beneficial interest' ". To that end, plaintiff testified that she did not have a traditional individual checking account, and Supreme Court credited her testimony that she deposited the moneys into the joint checking account because this was the only account she readily had access to for this purpose. Furthermore, the funds were transferred into the joint account for a mere six weeks in anticipation of the closing on their home. It found no basis to disturb its conclusion that plaintiff overcame the presumption that she intended to commingle her funds by depositing them in the parties' joint account. Accordingly, plaintiff was entitled to this credit reflecting the investment of her separate funds into the marital residence.

The court found no error with regard to the counsel fee award. Considering the income imputed to defendant as a result of his earning potential and his interests in real property, he was in a better financial position than plaintiff who, having not been employed for more than 20 years while raising the children, just began a new job and has not yet realized any income additional to that which she receives from her trust accounts. Furthermore, defendant failed to pay court-ordered support and maintenance during the seven months leading up to the trial, thereby leaving plaintiff to bear the burden of all household, child and living expenses. Contrary to defendant's contention, the mere fact that plaintiff may have been able to pay her own fees is but one factor to be considered.

Once "A Court Converts a Specific Stream of Income into an Asset, That Income May No Longer Be Calculated into the Maintenance Formula and Payout"

In Haspel v Haspel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4676468 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff former wife and the defendant former husband were married on May 16, 1982. There were two children of the marriage. During the course of the marriage, the defendant obtained various professional licenses, including, inter alia, several securities dealer's licenses and a real estate broker's license. The defendant left the marital residence on January 29, 2005. In March 2005 the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce and ancillary relief. At the time of trial, the plaintiff was 52 years old and the defendant was 49 years old. Supreme Court determined that the plaintiff was entitled to a 50% share of the defendant's enhanced earnings. It accepted the conclusion of the plaintiff's expert that the defendant's enhanced earnings were $75,000 per year and then awarded the plaintiff $37,500, representing her 50% share. For purposes of determining child support and maintenance, the Supreme Court imputed an income of $180,000 to the defendant. The Supreme Court then reduced the defendant's imputed income by the $37,500 enhanced earning award, leaving $142,500 as the defendant's net income. The Supreme Court then awarded the plaintiff $2,500 in maintenance per month. In its decision, the Supreme Court explained that it intended to deny the plaintiff's application for an award of an attorney's fee, but, in the judgment appealed from, the Supreme Court did not expressly address that issue.

The Appellate Division modified. It pointed out that enhanced earnings from degrees and professional licenses attained where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. However, the record did not support an award to the plaintiff of 50% of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity. An award to the plaintiff of 25% of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity was equitable. The plaintiff correctly contended that the Supreme Court improperly calculated the total amount of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity from which her share derived. The plaintiff's expert, as credited by the Supreme Court, calculated that the defendant, in obtaining his various professional licenses, enhanced his earnings by the sum of $75,000 per year. In awarding the plaintiff a share of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity, the Supreme Court used this $75,000 sum as the total enhanced earning capacity from which the plaintiff's share would derive. Instead, the Supreme Court should have determined the value of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity over the 15-year period preceding his attainment of the age of 65. According to the expert evidence at trial, such sum would equal $1,125,000, or $75,000 multiplied by 15 years. The Supreme Court should thereafter have reduced this $1,125,000 sum to its net present value after taxes (citing O'Brien v.

O'Brien, 66 N.Y.2d at 588), which comes to $484,000. The plaintiff's equitable share of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity should then have been derived from this net present value. It concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to an award of 25% of $484,000, or $121,000, as her share of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity.

The Supreme Court properly determined the duration of the defendant's maintenance obligation and properly determined that the amount representing her share of the defendant's yearly enhanced earning capacity should be excluded from his income for the purpose of calculating her yearly award of maintenance. This is so because once "a court converts a specific stream of income into an asset, that income may no longer be calculated into the maintenance formula and payout" (Grunfeld v. Grunfeld, 94 N.Y.2d 696, 705). In light of this the plaintiff's share of the defendant's yearly enhanced earning capacity, which sum was $75,000 per year, had to be reduced from 50% to 25% of $75,000, or $18,750. Thus, for the purpose of determining the plaintiff's yearly award of maintenance, the defendant's income had to be recalculated in order to exclude 25% (or $18,750) of his yearly enhanced earning capacity of $75,000. The defendant's imputed income of $180,000 had to thus be reduced to a net income of $161,250. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the plaintiff's award of maintenance.

Given the disparity between the incomes of the parties in this case, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying the plaintiff's request for an award of an attorney's fee. It remitted the matter for a determination of a proper award of an attorney's fee. It pointed out that "[I]n evaluating what constitutes a reasonable attorney's fee, factors to be considered include the time and labor expended, the difficulty of the questions involved and the required skill to handle the problems presented, the attorney's experience, ability, and reputation, the amount involved, the customary fee charged for such services, and the results obtained" (Matter of Massey, 73 AD3d 1179, 1179, quoting Matter of Goliger, 58 AD3d 732, 732 [internal quotation marks omitted]; see Matter of Potts, 213 App.Div. 59, 62, affd 241 N.Y. 593).

Mother Held In Contempt for Violating Anti-Alienation Provision of Judgement.

In Rubin v Rubin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4539522 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties October 30, 2003 stipulation of settlement was incorporated, but not merged, into their judgment of divorce dated March 26, 2004. With respect to custody and visitation, the stipulation of settlement provided that the parties would share legal custody of the two children, that the mother would have sole physical custody of the children, and that the father would have certain visitation. In addition, pursuant to those provisions, each party was specifically prohibited from doing anything that would have the effect of alienating the children from the other party. The Appellate Division affirmed an order which held the mother in contempt for failure to comply with this provision. It held that to prevail on a motion to punish a party for civil contempt, the movant must demonstrate that the party charged with contempt willfully violated a clear and unequivocal mandate of a court's order, with knowledge of that order's terms, thereby prejudicing the movant's rights. Where, a period of incarceration is imposed to vindicate the authority of the court or to compel respect for the court's mandate, the contemnor's willful violation of the court's mandate must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. The father met this burden. At the hearing it was established, among other things, that the mother violated the custody and visitation provisions of the stipulation of settlement by intentionally doing certain things which would have the natural effect of "turn [ing]" the children "away from" the father, and which actually had that effect. However, under the particular facts of this case, a sentence directing the mother's immediate incarceration "would serve no purpose" and the court held that it was appropriate to suspend the sentence subject to the mother's future compliance with the custody and visitation provisions of the stipulation of settlement.

Child Support Payments May Be Suspended Where Noncustodial Parent Establishes Right of Reasonable Access to Child Unjustifiably Frustrated by Custodial Parent

In Thompson v Thompson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4540329 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the father's petition alleging a violation of a previous order of visitation and suspended the father's obligation to pay child support and related expenses regarding the child, nunc pro tunc from December 24, 2008, unless and until a determination was made that visitation between the father and the child has resumed. In January 2004 the father commenced a proceeding seeking visitation with the parties' who was born in 1996. After a hearing, by order entered January 11, 2006, the Family Court granted the father's petition for therapeutic visitation. On appeal, the Appellate Division modified that order by adding a directive that the father and the child submit to individual therapy (Matter of Thompson v. Yu-Thompson, 41 AD3d 487). Soon after the Family Court entered its order, the father filed a petition alleging violation of the order by the mother. Visits finally commenced in December 2006 and went well, but one month later, the father filed this petition alleging that the mother was not responding to repeated requests to schedule further visitations. During the proceedings on the petition, visitations resumed, but interactions between father and son became progressively more strained, with the child refusing to visit with his father at all or to engage with his father when visits did occur. After a hearing, the Family Court found that the child was so closely allied with his mother and her negative view of the father that "it appears that the hoped-for reconnection between [the child] and his father" was unlikely at that time. Finding that the mother had failed to encourage, and had interfered with, visitation, the Family Court granted the father's violation petition and suspended the father's child support payments until visitation resumes. The Appellate Division held that where the noncustodial parent establishes that his or her right of reasonable access to the child has been unjustifiably frustrated by the custodial parent, child support payments may be suspended. Such suspension of child support is warranted only where the custodial parent's actions rise to the level of 'deliberate frustration' or 'active interference' with the noncustodial parent's visitation rights. The evidence at the hearing supported the Family Court's finding that the mother deliberately frustrated the child's court-ordered visitation with his father such that suspension of child support payments until visitation resumed was warranted. There was evidence that the mother communicated her enmity towards the father to the child, made inappropriate disclosures concerning the parties' history, and failed to encourage and facilitate regular visitation, missing numerous scheduled visitations and ultimately supporting the child's decision to refuse visitation. The evidence supported the finding that the mother, by her example, her actions, and her inaction, deliberately frustrated visitation by manipulating the child's loyalty and orchestrating and encouraging the estrangement of father and son.

Abuse of Discretion to Make Awards of Maintenance and Child Support Retroactive to the Date of Commencement Where Defendant Never Requested Pendente Lite Relief, and the Plaintiff for the Needs During the Pendency of the Action

In Hendry v Pierik, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4540546 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the defendant nondurational maintenance of $2,150 per month until the later of either the plaintiff reaching the age of 62 or permanently retiring, retroactive to the filing of the complaint on August 3, 2007, set the valuation date of the parties' pension and retirement accounts for equitable distribution purposes as the date of commencement of the action, and awarded the defendant 50% of the proceeds of his stock options. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, including the parties' ages, respective earning potentials, pre-divorce standard of living, relative incomes and available assets, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in awarding nondurational maintenance to the defendant. However, it agreed with the plaintiff that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in making the defendant's awards of maintenance and child support retroactive to the date of the commencement of the action. The defendant never requested any pendente lite relief, and the plaintiff voluntarily and adequately provided for the needs of the defendant and the parties' children during the pendency of the action. Under these circumstances, it did not appear that the parties contemplated a retroactive award of maintenance or child support. (Citing Northway v. Northway, 70 AD3d 1347, 1348; quoting Grumet v. Grumet, 37 AD3d 534, 536; Lobotsky v. Lobotsky, 122 A.D.2d 253, 255; see also Fleischmann v. Fleischmann, 24 Misc3d 1225[A]). It held that Supreme Court properly valued the parties' pension and retirement accounts as of the date of commencement of the action, despite their physical separation almost two years prior. In the absence of a separation agreement, the commencement date of a matrimonial action demarcates the termination point for the further accrual of marital property and the valuation date must be between the date of commencement of the action and the date of trial. Moreover, under the circumstances, in which the plaintiff received the subject stock options during the marriage and exercised them eight months after the commencement of the action as a result of the termination of his employment, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in distributing the proceeds equally between the parties .

Wife Awarded Zero Percent of the Marital Residence Where She Contributed Little Financial Support to the Marriage

In Alper v Alper, 909 N.Y.S.2d 131 (2d Dept, 2010) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court which awarded the wife zero percent of the marital residence and certain other marital assets. It saw no basis for disturbing the Supreme Court's determinations regarding the equitable distribution of the parties' property. The record supported the Supreme Court's determination that, although both parties worked throughout the marriage, the plaintiff contributed little, if any, financial support to the marriage, and did not contribute at all to the purchase, and only minimally to the maintenance, of the marital home, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying her any interest in the marital residence. Likewise, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in rejecting the plaintiff's claim that she was entitled to equitable distribution of the appreciation in value of the marital residence and the defendant's country home, bought prior to the marriage. In order to obtain equitable distribution of the appreciation in value of the defendant's interest in the property, the plaintiff was required to demonstrate the manner in which her contributions resulted in the increase in value and the amount of the increase which was attributable to her efforts. The parties' conflicting testimony as to the plaintiff's direct contribution of time and labor toward the improvements made to these assets presented a question of credibility which the Supreme Court resolved in favor of the defendant. Such a credibility determination is afforded great weight on appeal. With regard to the defendant's cash and securities, the Supreme Court properly found that the plaintiff had failed to proffer any documentary or testimonial proof regarding whether these assets were separate or marital. In any event, the Supreme Court concluded, and the record showed, that the plaintiff made little or no financial contribution to the marriage, but rather, spent all her money on herself and her daughter from a prior marriage. Under these circumstances, and where both parties worked throughout the marriage, there were no children of the marriage, and the parties were separated for 10 of their 20 years of marriage, to award the plaintiff any equitable share in the defendant's cash and securities would provide her with an economic advantage merely by virtue of the fact that she was married to the defendant. With regard to the vacant land in Greene County, while it was undisputedly marital property, the plaintiff, as the nontitled spouse, had the burden of proving the asset's value so as to afford the court a sufficient basis upon which to make a distributive award. As the plaintiff failed to meet her burden, the Supreme Court properly declined to make a distributive award regarding the property.

Objections Deemed Filed When Received and "Date Stamped" by the Family Court.

In Matter of Bruckstein v Bruckstein, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4367015 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that pursuant to Family Court Act 439 (e), objections to an order of a Support Magistrate must be filed within 35 days after the mailing of the order to the aggrieved party and that the objections are deemed filed when received and "date stamped" by the Family Court. The father established that, although the March 11, 2009, order of the Support Magistrate stated that it was mailed to him on March 12, 2009, it was not actually mailed until March 13, 2009. However, the objections were date stamped as received by the Family Court on April 20, 2009, which is more than 35 days after March 13, 2009. Accordingly, the Family Court properly denied the objections as untimely.

Family Court Has Subject Matter Jurisdiction over Family Offense Proceedings Where Alleged Acts Occurred Outside State

In Matter of Richardson v Richardson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4366892 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division, in an opinion by Judge Levanthal, held that the Family Court has subject matter jurisdiction over family offense proceedings where the alleged acts occurred outside of the state and even outside of the country. It held that Family Court Act §812 grants the Family Court subject matter jurisdiction to hear such proceedings and that the Family Court properly exercised jurisdiction over the parties' petitions, despite the fact that the acts alleged occurred on the island territory of Anguilla. On March 4, 2009, Annette P. Richardson and her sons Aaron J. Hourie and Andrew G. Hourie (respondents) filed three separate family offense petitions seeking the entry of orders of protection in favor of them and against Dorothy E. Richardson (appellant), Annette's mother, and her sons' grandmother. The alleged family offenses included, inter alia, assault, harassment, and menacing. In their respective petitions, the respondents described how they were related to the appellant and asserted that the parties all resided together in a home in Elmont, Nassau County. The petitions detailed certain incidents which allegedly occurred on February 19, 2009, on the island of Anguilla. According to the respondents, the appellant pushed Annette to the floor twice, causing her to hurt her back and hit her head. The appellant allegedly was screaming, yelling, and cursing at Annette during the assault. In addition, the appellant allegedly used a glass bowl to strike Andrew on the head, causing injuries. Further, the appellant allegedly chased Aaron with a meat cleaver and threw an ashtray at him, which hit him in the back. On March 6, 2009, the appellant filed three of her own family offense petitions seeking orders of protection in her favor and against the respondents. The appellant alleged that on or about February 14, 2009, also in Anguilla, the respondents committed the family offenses of, inter alia, aggravated harassment in the second degree, harassment in the first degree, attempted assault, and menacing in the third degree. During an initial appearance before the Family Court, the appellant's counsel objected to the court's exercise of subject matter jurisdiction because the alleged offenses occurred in Anguilla. The Family Court held that "the fact that this took place in the West Indies is no different from it taking place in Pennsylvania, Virginia, or Vermont. They're [all residents] of Nassau County and they're entitled to protection from future occurrences. Family Orders of Protection... are to prevent further hostility and further assault, attempted assault,... et cetera." On June 24, 2009, after a hearing, the Family Court found that the respondents proved by clear and convincing evidence that the appellant had committed certain family offenses against them and granted the respondents' respective petitions. The Family Court also entered three two-year orders of protection on behalf of the respondents and against the appellant. The orders of protection directed the appellant to stay away from each of the respondents and to refrain from assaulting, stalking, and similar conduct. In addition, the Family Court issued three orders of dismissal which dismissed the appellant's three petitions. As a threshold matter, the court held that Family Court acquired personal jurisdiction over the appellant, as she appeared before the Family Court without challenging personal jurisdiction. Additionally, the appellant affirmatively sought the entry of orders of protection against the respondents (citing Family Ct Act §167; CPLR 320; cf. Matter of El-Sheemy v. El-Sheemy, 35 AD3d 738 [by appearing in article 6 proceeding and seeking custody, the mother waived her claim that the Family Court did not acquire personal jurisdiction over her]). It indicated that appellant's contentions provided the Court with an opportunity to address an issue which did not appear to have been previously addressed by an appellate court in this state: the limits of the subject matter jurisdiction of the Family Court with respect to family offenses which occurred outside of the state, and even outside of the country. In its analysis the court started with the proposition that the Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction constrained to exercise only those powers conferred upon it by the state Constitution or by statute. Family Court Act §812(2)(b) provides: "[t]hat a family court proceeding is a civil proceeding and is for the purpose of attempting to stop the violence, end the family disruption and obtain protection." Here, the plain language of Family Court Act §812 provides that the Family Court has jurisdiction over family offense proceedings where the petitions allege the commission of certain proscribed acts that occur between spouses or former spouses, or between parent and child or between members of the same family or household. There is no geographic limitation in Family Court Act §812, or elsewhere in the Family Court Act, as to where a family offense is to have occurred in order to confer subject matter jurisdiction upon the Family Court. The next issue was whether the geographic or territorial limitation on the jurisdiction of the criminal court (see generally People v. McLaughlin, 80 NY2d 466, 472 [stating that "for the State to have criminal jurisdiction, either the alleged conduct or some consequence of it must have occurred within the State"]) also limits the jurisdiction of the Family Court. Criminal Procedure Law §20.40(1)(a) provides, in pertinent part, that "[a] person may be convicted in an appropriate criminal court of a particular county, of an offense... when [c]onduct occurred within such county sufficient to establish [a]n element of such offense." The Appellate Division pointed out that Family Court is not a criminal court. Whereas the criminal court's subject matter jurisdiction over family offenses is limited by geography, there is no statutory provision which states that such a geographic limitation also applies to the Family Court. Nothing in the state Constitution, Family Court Act §812, or the legislative history of Family Court Act article 8 requires the predicate acts of a family offense to have occurred in a particular county, state, or country in order for the Family Court to possess subject matter jurisdiction. It noted that its decision was generally consistent with various decisions of the Family Court. However, it held that to the extent that those cases relied upon a "minimum contacts analysis," or suggest that a residual injury within this state is necessary in order to confer subject matter jurisdiction upon the Family Court pursuant to New York's long arm statute (see CPLR 302), such reasoning should not be followed.

Since it Was Petitioner's Burden to Establish Change in Circumstances, Family Court Erred in Taking Judicial Notice of Financial Disclosure Affidavits in Family Court file in 1999, Which Were Neither Offered Nor Admitted into Evidence

In Grange v Grange, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4342101 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1958, but had been living apart since about 1990. In March 1999, petitioner was awarded spousal support of $500 per month. In 2007, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking an upward modification in spousal support. In September 2008, Family Court vacated the Support Magistrate's decision (for the third time) finding that petitioner established a sufficient change in circumstances of both her and respondent's financial situations to warrant an increase in respondent's monthly spousal support obligation to $800. The Appellate Division reversed. The Court pointed out that the provisions of Family Ct Act 412 require a delicate balancing of each party's needs and means taking into consideration the duration of the marriage, income disparity and the ability of a petitioner to support himself or herself. In order to obtain modification of such an award, the moving party must establish that there has been a substantial change in circumstances since the prior award (Domestic Relations Law 236[B][9][b]). It agreed with respondent that, since it was petitioner's burden to establish a change in circumstances, Family Court erred in taking judicial notice of the contents of financial disclosure affidavits filed with Family Court in 1999, which were neither offered nor admitted into evidence at any of the hearings. The mere presence of those documents in the court file does not mean that judicial notice properly can be taken of any factual material asserted therein (see Walker v. City of New York, 46 A.D.3d at 282, 847 N.Y.S.2d 173; Weinberg v. Hillbrae Bldrs., 58 A.D.2d 546, 546 [1977]). The Appellate Division found that petitioner failed to establish that either her or respondent's financial situation has significantly changed since the date of the prior award so as to warrant a change in spousal support. Petitioner testified that she had increased medical expenses and her monthly debts, of $1,300, exceed her monthly income by approximately $200, thus requiring her to borrow an additional $400 per month from her two daughters. Yet, there was no indication that petitioner's current financial hardship is any different than the hardships that she may have faced in 1999. Furthermore, there was an indication that some of petitioner's listed medical expenses are temporary and may be reduced by medical benefits made available to petitioner through respondent's pension. The record also reflected that, while respondent's 2007 pension and Social Security income (in the amount of $40,000) increased slightly (by approximately $4,000) from his 1999 income, his monthly expenses, including his monthly spousal support obligation and payments for federal and state back taxes owed, total approximately $3,100. As the Support Magistrate found in its September 2008 determination, this essentially equalized the parties' disposable income. The record also reflected that, although respondent was self-employed as a computer consultant in 2007, and Family Court imputed additional income to him of $12,000, his business expenses (in the amount of $16,366) that year exceeded his reported business income of $15,918. It noted that while Family Court took into consideration certain assets acquired by respondent prior to the 1999 award of spousal support, including a 1997 Lincoln car with 212,000 miles (worth an estimated $2,700), a 1995 BMW motorcycle with 100,000 miles (worth an estimated $1,500) and a 1989 Catalina sailboat (worth an estimated $20,000), it failed to consider the value of petitioner's ownership interests in certain parcels of real property-one parcel owned jointly by the parties and estimated to be worth $300,000 and the second parcel owned solely by petitioner, which respondent valued at $15,000. Accordingly, petitioner failed to establish her entitlement to an upward modification in spousal support.

Husband Denied Order of Protection Prohibiting Paramour From Sleeping with Wife While Child in House

In Dodd v Colbert, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 4008533 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties physically separated in October 2005, and plaintiff commenced an action for divorce in February 2008. In August 2009, plaintiff sought an order prohibiting defendant from permitting her alleged paramour, or any other unrelated adult male, to reside or sleep in the former marital residence or elsewhere during such time when the parties' minor child was in her physical custody. Defendant oppose plaintiff's application contending that the child had a positive relationship with her male friend and that plaintiff engaged in similar behavior when the child was in his physical custody. Family Court denied plaintiff's application and the Appellate Division affirmed. It pointed out that Domestic Relations Law 240(3)(a)(5) permits a court to issue an order of protection directing a party to refrain from any act that creates an "unreasonable risk to the health, safety or welfare of a child." Although plaintiff's affidavit was replete with allegations of defendant's purported misdeeds, only two of the cited incidents, one where the child apparently reported to plaintiff that "there was a strange man in Mommy's bed" and one where the child expressed some hesitancy at being transported from a visitation by defendant's male friend, in any way related to the alleged paramour and, hence, had any relevance to the sought-after prohibition. Although the child's pediatrician recommended that the child receive counseling, she in no way attributed the child's need for therapy to the alleged paramour and/or his admitted presence in the former marital residence. Plaintiff's dire predictions of trauma to the child were significantly undercut by the fact that he became aware of the alleged paramour's presence in the former marital home within weeks of moving out in October 2005 and yet did not seek injunctive relief until nearly four years later. As plaintiff's proof fell far short of establishing or even alleging an unreasonable risk to the child's health, safety or welfare, his application for injunctive relief was properly denied.

Loss of Income for Reasons Beyond Control, Increased Expenses Due to an Uninsured Hospital Stay, and Change in Custody Is an Unanticipated Change in Circumstances for Downward Modification Purposes.

In Matter of Elegante v Elegante, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3910568 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed, on the law an order which denied the fathers application for a downward modification of child support, and remitted to Family Court for further proceedings. It held that a court may modify the child support provisions of a separation agreement incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce when a party has alleged and proven an unanticipated change in circumstances since entry of the judgment. Family Court erred in concluding that the father's loss of income for reasons beyond his control, increased expenses due to an uninsured hospital stay, and the change in the custody arrangement from the mother having primary residential custody of the parties' two children to split residential custody, was not an unanticipated change of circumstances creating the need for modification of his child support obligation.

For Purposes of UIFSA a Person Is a "Resident" of New York State When He or She Has a Significant Connection with Some Locality in the State as the Result of Living There for Some Length of Time During the Course of a Year

In Matter of Deazle v Deazle, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3910573 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother, who at the time resided in Ithaca, filed a petition for child support in December 1998 in the Family Court, Tompkins County, for child support. At the time, the father resided out of state. Pursuant to an order dated November 22, 1999, the Family Court, Tompkins County, directed the father to pay the mother certain child support. On November 23, 2005, the mother, who stated that she was residing in Brooklyn, filed a petition in the Family Court, Kings County, for an upward modification of child support against the father, who continued to live outside of New York State. The Support Magistrate dismissed the mother's petition on the ground that Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to modify the child support order because New York had not remained the "residence" of the mother and/or the parties' child for purposes of Family Court Act 580-205(a). Family Court granted the mother's objections to the extent of remitting the matter to the Support Magistrate to issue supplemental written findings of fact and a new determination on the issue of subject matter jurisdiction. The Appellate Division agreed with the Family Court that the Support Magistrate's order was not supported by the evidence presented at the hearing, but the Family Court erred in not granting the mother's objection in its entirety since the record was sufficiently developed to establish the existence of subject matter jurisdiction. The Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, adopted in New York as article 5-B of the Family Court Act, grants "continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over" a child support order to the state that issued the order (Family Ct Act 580-205[a]). The issuing state loses such jurisdiction where none of the parties or children continue to reside in that state. Here, New York was the issuing state for the child support order. As such, New York had continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over that order. Although the father did not reside in the state, New York would retain continuing, exclusive jurisdiction if New York continued to be the residence of the mother and/or the subject child at the time she commenced this proceeding for a modification of child support. The Court held that although the UIFSA does not define the terms "reside" or "residence", it has been determined that a person is a "resident" of New York State when he or she has a significant connection with some locality in the State as the result of living there for some length of time during the course of a year (citing Antone v. General Motors Corp., Burick Motor Div ., 64 N.Y.2d 20, 30; Wittich v. Wittich, 210 A.D.2d 138, 139). An individual may establish his or her residency with documentary evidence, such as a lease, rent receipts, phone bill, utility bills, voter's registration card, or driver's license (citing Ellis v. Wirshba, 18 AD3d 805, 805; Schaefer v. Schwartz, 226 A.D.2d 619, 620; McKenzie v. MAJ Tr., 204 A.D.2d 154, 154). Despite the fact that the mother also maintained a residence in Philadelphia where she worked and where the parties' child attended school, she submitted documentary evidence that supported her testimony that Brooklyn had been and continued to be her place of residence at the time the proceeding was commenced. She presented, among other things, a lease for a Brooklyn apartment which listed herself and the child as tenants during the relevant time period; a check for partial payment of the monthly rent payable from her bank account held at a New York credit union, which listed her address as being in Brooklyn; New York driver's licenses issued to her in 2002 and in 2008; and New York Voter Registration Card indicating that she had been registered to vote in Kings County since April 1996. In view of the documentary evidence, the mother demonstrated that New York remained her residence, allowing New York to retain continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over the child support order.

Error to Find "Double Counting" Where Defendant's Wages Not Capitalized

In Ripka v Ripka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3818500 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) on appeal from a judgment of divorce, the Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff's contention that Supreme Court erred in determining that it would be "double counting" to award a portion of defendant's businesses to plaintiff where, as here, defendant's wages had not been capitalized in the valuation of those businesses (citing Grunfeld v. Grunfeld, 94 N.Y.2d 696). It concluded, however, that the court rectified that error by awarding maintenance based solely upon defendant's income. Property distribution and maintenance should not be treated as two separate and discrete items, but rather should each be considered with a view toward the other in an effort to arrive at a fully integrated and complete financial resolution that is best suited to the parties' particular financial situation. Although plaintiff was correct that her overall award would have been greater had she received both maintenance and a portion of defendant's businesses, it concluded that, in that event, the amount of her award of maintenance would be insufficient to enable her to maintain her standard of living. Based on the impropriety of treating a distributive award as an additional source of maintenance, rather than as a division of marital property it concluded that the court properly awarded maintenance to plaintiff based on defendant's income. Contrary to plaintiff's contention, the court was not required to explain the reasons for its discretionary application of the $80,000 cap pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(c), particularly in light of its finding that defendant's pro rata share of child support was appropriate and plaintiff's failure to contend that the amount of child support awarded was insufficient. It concluded, however, that the court erred in failing to order that child support be adjusted upon the termination of maintenance, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(C). It modified the order and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine, following a hearing if necessary, the proper amount of the upward adjustment of child support. Also contrary to plaintiff's contention, it concluded that the court properly determined the values of defendant's businesses and the marital assets. The court accepted the valuation of the businesses provided by defendant's expert, with which plaintiff's expert agreed, and the court was not required to accept plaintiff's unsupported allegations that the businesses were worth more than the amounts reported by defendant. Similarly, the court properly accepted defendant's valuation of the vehicles, where plaintiff presented no expert testimony that would support a different valuation. Finally, the court was entitled to credit the valuation of defendant's expert over that of plaintiff's with respect to the marital residence, using the "as repaired" valuation of the marital residence. Plaintiff admittedly used nearly $13,000 out of a $20,000 pendente lite award made specifically for house repairs and real property taxes for other personal expenses.

Mothers Acts of Domestic Violence Supported Custody Award to Father

In Costigan v Renner--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3786101 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the father custody of the parties' two children, did not award the wife maintenance and pendente lite arrears of maintenance and child support, directed the wife to pay child support of $303 per week and a pro rata share of the children's private school tuition, directed that all property subject to equitable distribution be distributed in accordance with the parties' stipulation of settlement, failed to award the wife counsel fees and expert fees, and denied the husbands request to reallocate expert fees and fees for the attorney for the children. The Appellate Division affirmed. It pointed out that there is overwhelming authority that a child living in a home where there has been abuse between the adults becomes a secondary victim and is likely to suffer psychological injury. Moreover, that child learns a dangerous and morally depraved lesson that abusive behavior is not only acceptable, but may even be rewarded. The trial court credited the father's allegations of abuse by the mother and found that the mother's denials thereof lacked veracity. The acts of domestic violence committed by the mother against the father demonstrated that the mother was ill-suited to provide the children with moral and intellectual guidance. The Court also held that Supreme Court did not err in declining to award her maintenance. Although the mother argued that the Supreme Court's decision failed to discuss the parties' pre-divorce standard of living, under the circumstances of this case, such consideration was of little determinative value, especially in light of the fact that the parties only lived together for less than three years after their marriage in 1999. Considering that the mother had the ability to be self-supporting and was not the custodial parent, the record supported the Supreme Court's decision to deny an award of maintenance to the mother. In determining child support, a court need not rely upon the party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential. Supreme Court properly imputed income to both the father and the mother based upon the past income of the father and the earning potential and extrapolated past annual earnings of the mother.

Supreme Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Awarding Counsel Fees Without Conducting a Hearing.

In Sharlow v Sharlow, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3820035 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Defendant appealed from a judgment of divorce that directed him to pay $825.90 per month in child support and $650 per month in maintenance for a period of 36 months, distributed the parties' debts and assets and ordered him to pay counsel fees to plaintiff in the amount of $1,000. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in imputing income of $45,000 to defendant for the purposes of calculating his maintenance and child support obligations. Contrary to defendant's contention, a court is not required to find that a parent deliberately reduced his or her income to avoid a child support obligation before imputing income to that parent, and a court may properly find a true or potential income higher than that claimed where the party's account of his or her finances is not credible. The record established that defendant consistently underreported his income as a plumber, and the testimony of defendant and documentary evidence presented at trial concerning his income was less than credible. For example, defendant failed to list any income on his 2007 Statement of Net Worth, despite the fact that he earned wages and collected employment benefits during that year. The $45,000 in imputed income was based upon the average salaries of plumbers as reported by the New York State Department of Labor, defendant's history of earnings, and the evidence that defendant worked "under the table." Inasmuch as the record supported the court's imputation of $45,000 in income to defendant, there was no basis to disturb that determination. It also concluded that the maintenance award did not constitute an abuse of discretion. The record established that the court considered the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a) and based its award on the length of the marriage, the age of the parties, the disparate incomes of the parties and defendant's superior earning capacity as compared to that of plaintiff. Plaintiff, who was 44 years old at the time of the trial, had been out of the workforce for more than a decade because of a disability and her responsibilities as caretaker of the parties' children. In 2006 plaintiff obtained a job as a clerk at a rate of $10 per hour, but she testified that it was difficult to work full-time because of her child care responsibilities and her inability to afford daycare. The monthly expenses of plaintiff exceed her monthly income, and she had substantial debts, including approximately $7,000 to $10,000 in medical bills from periods when she and the parties' children were uninsured. Defendant's contention that the court erred in its valuation of real property located at West Court Street in Utica was without merit. Marital assets may be valued at "anytime from the date of commencement of the action to the date of trial , and the appropriate date for measuring the value of marital property is left to the sound discretion of the ... court. The court properly exercised its discretion in valuing the property as of approximately two months before trial. The court properly valued the property at $24,900 in accordance with the testimony of plaintiff's expert, a licensed real estate agent with over 20 years of experience, who based her valuation on comparable sales over a six-month period and a visual inspection of the property. It concluded that the court did not abuse its discretion in requiring defendant to pay a portion of plaintiff's counsel fees . Defendant contended that the court erred in awarding counsel fees without conducting a hearing because the parties did not consent to a determination of that issue upon written submissions. That contention was not preserved for our review inasmuch as defendant failed to request a hearing with respect to the ability of plaintiff to pay her own counsel fees or the extent and value of the legal services rendered to her (citing Petosa v. Petosa, 56 AD3d 1296, 1298). In any event, defendant's contention lacked merit. Unlike the case relied upon by defendant (citing Redgrave v. Redgrave, 304 A.D.2d 1062, 1066-1067), the court awarded counsel fees in this case after a trial in which the financial condition of the parties was amply explored and documented. Moreover, it concluded that the evidence presented by the parties concerning their respective financial conditions supported the award of counsel fees to plaintiff.

Summary of 2010 Family Law Legislation

Chapter 446

Amends Family Court Act 153-b; amends Domestic Relations Law 240 (3-a) in relation to service of orders of protection including applications to extend and petitions for violations of orders of protection and temporary orders of protection in family court.

Clarifies that litigants have the same options of peace and police officer service for orders and temporary orders and legal papers issued in later stages of family offense proceedings including service of extended orders and for petitions alleging violations of orders of protection as they have for original orders and accompanying pleadings. Makes it clear that such service must be available without fee to the litigants. The provision prohibiting fees from being charged by police and peace officers for service of all orders of protection, whether issued upon default, temporary, modified, final, or extended as well as associated petitions and summonses, emphasizes legislation enacted in 2007. That statute amended section 8011 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules to prohibit sheriffs from charging the statutory $45 fee and any mileage fees for service of orders of protection and related orders or papers when service has been directed by the court. See L. 2007, c. 36. The statute is essential to ensure compliance by New York State with The Federal Violence Against Women Act. 42 U.S.C.A. S3796hh(c)(4). Effective August 30, 2010.

Chapter 509

Amends Domestic Relations Law 110 to permit two adult unmarried intimate partners to adopt a child together. It also clarifies that all married couples may adopt a child together. In Matter of Jacob and Matter of Dana, the Court of Appeals ruled that the unmarried partner of a child's biological mother, whether heterosexual (Jacob) or homosexual (Dana), who is raising the child together with the child's biological parent, has standing to become the child's second parent by means of adoption. The decision of the court stated that the statute uses the word "together" simply to insure that one spouse does not adopt a child without the other spouse's knowledge or over the other's objection. The court determined that the statute does not preclude an unmarried second parent from adopting his or her partner's children and that this principal applies regardless of the couple's marital status or sexual orientation. See Matter of Jacob, 86 N.Y.2d 651 (1995). This legislation codifies the Court of Appeal's decision in Matter of Jacob and Matter of Dana, and will help ensure that unmarried adult couples may jointly adopt a child together where neither is the biological parent of the child - a question that was not addressed by the court of appeals decision. See In re Adoption of Carolyn B., 774 N.Y.S.2d 227 (N.Y. App, Div. 2004). Effective September 17, 2010

Exclusive Occupancy Modified to Balance the need of the custodial parent to occupy the marital residence against the financial need of the parties

In Gahagan v Gahagan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3155342 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1986 and had four daughters: the oldest, Katherine, born October 2, 1994; Elaine, born September 11, 1995; Elizabeth, born June 26, 1997; and Allaire, born July 22,

1998. The plaintiff commenced this matrimonial action on January 15, 2003. At the time of the trial in May 2008, Katherine was in the eighth grade, Elaine was in the seventh grade, Elizabeth was in the fifth grade, and Allaire was in the fourth grade, all attending a private school. Pursuant to a so-ordered stipulation the defendant was awarded residential custody with liberal visitation to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division noted that the parties had enjoyed a relatively lavish lifestyle during their marriage. The proof at trial showed that this lifestyle was supported mainly by the plaintiff's income from his family trust funds as well as payments, gifts, or forgiven loans from his mother, all continuing regularly throughout the course of the marriage. This enabled the parties, inter alia, to send their children to private school, to renovate and keep the marital residence, and to enjoy vacations at the family compound in Cape Cod and the family home in Delaware. While there was some additional income from the plaintiff's architectural practice, it was clearly insufficient to allow the parties to live in the style to which they had become accustomed. The defendant did not have a full-time job during the marriage, nor did she earn more than $5,000 per year since the children were born. Supreme Court, inter alia, (a) awarded monthly maintenance to the defendant of $4,533, (b) directed him to pay monthly carrying costs for the marital residence of $10,467, and (c) awarded the defendant exclusive occupancy of the marital residence, with all three of these awards to continue, in effect, until the last of the parties' children reached her majority or was sooner emancipated, (d) awarded the defendant annual child support of $24,800, (e) awarded the defendant an attorney's fee, and (f) equitably distributed the marital property. The Appellate Division found that the initial award of maintenance, as well as the award to the defendant of the exclusive occupancy of the marital residence and the direction to the plaintiff that he pay all the carrying costs for the marital residence, in effect, until at the latest, the marital residence was sold, was a provident exercise of discretion. However, under the circumstances of this case, it was an improvident exercise of discretion to delay the sale of the marital residence until the parties' youngest child reached her majority or was sooner emancipated. Instead, an appropriate point to balance the disruption that a move would inevitably cause with the financial needs of the parties was to direct that the marital residence be sold by December 31st of the year the parties' second oldest daughter, Elaine, graduated from high school. At that time, the two oldest children should have graduated from high school and the two youngest children will have at least graduated from grammar school. Therefore, a sale at that point would appropriately balance "the need of the custodial parent to occupy the marital residence ... against the financial need of the parties" . It also held that a more appropriate distribution of the net proceeds of the sale would be 60% to the defendant and 40% to the plaintiff, if the defendant fully cooperated in effectuating the sale. If not, the distribution of the net proceeds would be split equally. In either instance, the defendant would remain obligated to pay $84,854 to the plaintiff from her share of the net proceeds for her failure to cooperate with regard to the filing of a prior tax return. The Appellate Division held that after the marital residence was sold an adjustment in the maintenance to $7,500 per month, to be paid to the defendant until the parties' youngest child, Allaire, reached the age of 21 on July 22, 2019, was appropriate. Additionally, after the sale of the marital residence, the child support payable by the plaintiff had to be adjusted to reflect the fact that a portion of the prior payment for housing costs was, in effect, child support. Accordingly, it directed that after the sale of the marital residence, the plaintiff must pay the defendant child support in accordance with the Child Support Standards Act. If the parties could not agree as to what the proper amount of child support required thereunder is, it provided that either or both of them may apply to the appropriate court for the recalculation of that obligation. The plaintiff still remained responsible for payment of 100% of various expenses of the children including, inter alia, their tuition through college. That also included, among other things, payment of room and board, and other college expenses.

Summary of Laws of 2010 Family Law Legislation

Chapter 421

Amends Family Court Act 352.3 to add (1-a).

Authorizes family courts to issue orders of protection for the protection of witnesses. Provides that upon the issuance of an order pursuant to Family Court Act 315.3 or the entry of an order of disposition pursuant to Family Court Act 352.2, a court may, for good cause shown, enter an order of protection against any respondent requiring that the respondent refrain from engaging in conduct, against any designated witness specifically named by the court in the order, that would constitute intimidation of a witness pursuant to section 215.15, 215.16 or 215.17 of the penal law or an attempt thereof provided that the court makes a finding that the respondent did previously, or is likely to in the future, intimidate or attempt to intimidate such witness in such manner. Effective November 28, 2010

Third Department Holds Retainer Fee May Be Restrained

In Potter v MacLean,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2606315 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), after the parties separation, a court order was issued in 2005 requiring defendant to pay $800 per month in child support, plus $200 in monthly maintenance to plaintiff. He was ultimately found to have willfully violated that order and, in 2007 when a divorce action was commenced, defendant was found to owe more than $20,000 in arrears on this obligation. Defendant subsequently retained the law firm of Thaler & Thaler to represent him in the divorce action and paid them a $15,000 advance on their fee. Later, the amount that defendant owed on his support and maintenance obligation had increased to $33,000 and, in an effort to satisfy that arrearage, the Tompkins County Support Collections Unit served a restraining notice and an information subpoena on Thaler & Thaler in regard to the $15,000 retainer fee (see CPLR 5222, 5224). Defendant moved to quash the subpoena and vacate the restraining notice on the retainer fee. Supreme Court denied defendant's motion, and the Appellate division affirmed. The Appellate Division rejected Defendant's argument that the retainer fee held by Thaler & Thaler was not subject to restraint because these funds were used to ensure that he has legal representation in the divorce action. However, CPLR 5222(a) provides that a restraining notice may be issued upon any person, except for a judgment debtor's employer, and funds held in escrow for the purpose of retaining an attorney are not included in the statutory list of money and property exempt from such restraint. Moreover, funds held by an attorney as a retainer for legal services to be rendered have been found to be subject to a preattachment restraining order. Such funds, even if deposited in an escrow account, may be attached as long as they are subject to the judgment debtor's "present or future control," or are required to be returned to the judgment debtor if not used to pay for services rendered. Defendant retained an interest in the funds that were not used to pay for the legal services rendered by Thaler & Thaler, and the retainer agreement governing the disposition of such a fee specifically provided that such funds would ultimately be returned to defendant. Defendant also claimed that the funds used for the retainer were borrowed from family and friends and, therefore, should not be subject to a restraining notice. The Appellate Division held that any any legal right to the return of any portion of the retainer fee belonged to defendant--and not to his family or friends--and it is that interest that provides a legal basis for restraint of the funds. While not unmindful of the impact this decision may have on defendant's ability to retain counsel, it noted that a party in a matrimonial proceeding does not have a constitutional right to counsel (Matter of Smiley, 36 N.Y.2d 433, 438 [1975]). Moreover, it reached this conclusion solely upon the factual circumstances presented in this case, as well as the longstanding significance and emphasis placed upon a parent's duty to provide child support for his or her children. Therefore, under the circumstances presented here, specifically the fact that defendant has willfully violated his obligation to provide financial support for his children and the retainer fee was paid to Thaler & Thaler in a manner in which defendant has access to any unused funds, the Court concluded that the restraining order was properly placed on the retainer funds. The Court rejected defendant's claim that the information subpoena was "totally inappropriate and serves no useful, justifiable purpose,". It noted that the details regarding a client's fee arrangement with his or her attorney "is a collateral matter which, unlike communications which relate to the subject matter of the attorney's professional employment, is not privileged" (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, 51 N.Y.2d 62, 69 [1980])

Court May Grant Relief Not Requested in Motion Papers Under Limited Circumstances

In Matter of Myers v Markey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2606507 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) on September 18, 2007, when the child was three years old, the parties consented to the entry of an order which awarded joint legal and residential custody of the child and provided for equal residential parenting time. The order did not contain a provision regarding the school district where the child would eventually attend kindergarten. When the parties could not agree as to which school the child would attend, the father filed a petition seeking an order "grant[ing] petitioner's school district-RVC [Rockville Centre]." The petition specifically stated that all parts of the prior order were to "remain intact." In response, the mother filed a petition requesting an emergency hearing to prevent the father from taking the child on September 8, 2009, to the school of the father's choice. Neither petition sought a modification of the prior order. Nevertheless Family Court modified the prior order by changing the child's legal residence, limiting the father's residential parenting time, and carving out specific areas of decision-making authority. The Appellate Division vacated the order. It held that generally, a court may grant relief that is warranted by the facts plainly appearing on the papers on both sides, if the relief granted is not too dramatically unlike the relief sought, the proof offered supports it, and there is no prejudice to any party. The relief directed by the Family Court was completely different from the relief requested by the parties. Moreover, since no request was made to modify the prior order, the parties had no notice and were not afforded an opportunity to address the necessity of such modification. Under these circumstances, the Family Court erred in, sua sponte, granting such relief as was not requested by the parties.

The 2010 Divorce Reform Amendments by Joel R. Brandes, Bari Brandes Corbin and Evan B. Brandes

The 2010 Session of the legislature has resulted in legislation that is intended to bring significant reform New York's divorce process, increase the amount of temporary maintenance awards, and compel New York courts to promptly make counsel and expert fee awards to the non-monied spouse. The purpose of this article is to provide the reader with a clear and concise explanation of the 2010 Divorce Reform Amendments, including the new Temporary Maintenance Guidelines which are codified in new Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5-a]. (See separate article included with this issue of Bits and Bytes™ which requires Adobe Acrobat Reader to view)

Summary of Laws of 2010 New York Family Law Legislation

Chapter 32

Amends Domestic Relations Law §236

Grants an exemption to provisions prohibiting transfer of any retirement plan upon commencement of a matrimonial action when the retirement plan is already paying benefits. Effective date March 30, 2010

Chapter 41

Amends CPLR 1101; Amends Domestic Relations Law §§ 236 75-f, 76-f, 112-b, 113, 115-b, 240 & 254, ; Amends Executive Law §§ 503 & 508; Amends Judiciary Law §§ 35 & 35-a; Amends Family Court Act, generally; Amends Public Health Law §§ 2306 & 2782; Amends Social Services Law §§ 358-a, 372, 383-c, 384, 384-a, 384-b, 409-e, 409-f & 422.

Replaces the term "law guardian" with the term "attorney for the child" to more accurately reflect the attorney's role. Effective date April 14, 2010.

Chapter 325

Family Court Act § 842

Authorizes the family court in family offense proceedings to extend an order of protection upon the showing of good cause or consent of the parties. Effective date August 13, 2010. (§ 3.This act shall take effect immediately, and shall apply to all orders entered prior to such effective date, and to all actions and proceedings pending on or commenced on or after such effective date.) Laws of 2010, Ch 325 (8.13.10)

Chapter 329

Amends Domestic Relations Law §§ 237 & 238.

Laws of 2010, Ch 329, as amended by Laws of 2010, Ch 415, effective October 12, 2010, amended Domestic Relations Law §§ 237 and 238 to create a rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse. It adds actions to obtain maintenance or distribution of property after a foreign judgment of divorce to the actions for which such fees shall be awarded. In exercising the court's discretion, the court is required to seek to assure that each party is adequately represented and that where fees and expenses are to be awarded, they shall be awarded on a timely basis pendente lite, so as to enable adequate representation from the commencement of the proceeding. In addition the court is authorized to order expert fees to be paid by one party to the other to enable the party to carry on or defend the action. The parties and their attorneys are also required to submit an affidavit to the court with financial information to enable the court to make its determination. The monied spouse is now required to disclose how much he has agreed to pay and how much he has paid his attorney. The affidavit must include the amount of any retainer, the amounts paid and still owing thereunder, the hourly amount charged by the attorney, the amounts paid, or to be paid, any experts, and any additional costs, disbursements or expenses. In addition, Domestic Relations Law § 238 was also amended to add to the actions for which such fees shall be awarded "actions to enforce a court order".

Chapter 341

Amends Family Court Act §§ 446, 551, 656, 759, 812, 842 & 1056; Amends Domestic Relations Law §240.

Provides that orders of protection shall not be denied, in support proceedings, paternity proceedings, termination of parental rights proceedings, person in need of supervision proceedings, family offense proceedings and child protective proceedings, solely on the basis that the events alleged are not contemporaneous with the application therefor or the conclusion of the action. Effective date August 13, 2010. Laws of 2010, Ch 341 (8.13.10)

Chapter 341 was designed to overturn a series of Appellate Division court rulings that appeared to impose a statute of limitations on the filing of domestic violence claims. Sponsors said the rulings, including Yoba v. Yoba , 183 AD2nd 418 (1992), and Loriann Q. v. Frank R. , 53 AD3d 735 (2008), impose no such limitations on the filing of suits based on past abuse.

Chapter 342

Amends Family Court Act §§1055, 1087, 1088, 1089 & 1090; Adds Article 10-B, Section 109; Amends Social Services Law §§ 371 & 409-a.

Relates to trial discharges of children in foster care and voluntary re-placements of older adolescents in foster care; amends the provisions of Articles 10 and 10-A of the Family Court Act to extend trial discharges at court permanency hearings for successive periods of up to six months until a child turns 21. The trial discharges require the consent of the child. The law also adds a new Article 10-B to permit youths between 18 and 21 who have opted to leave state care within the past 24 months to seek to return voluntarily. In such cases, the court must find that the youth has no reasonable alternatives to foster care, that he or she consents to an appropriate vocational or educational program and that a return would be in his or her best interests. Attorneys who previously represented the youths would continue to do so.

Chapter 343

Adds Family Court Act Article 6 Part 1-A, Sections 635 - 637; Amends Family Court Act §1089; Amends Social Services Law §384-b.

Provides a process for a petition to restore previously terminated parental rights under certain circumstances. Effective date November 11, 2010 (§ 4. This act shall take effect on the ninetieth day after it shall have become a law. Laws of 2010, Ch 343).

Chapter 363

Repealed & Added Judiciary Law §212 sub 2 P(n).

Extends for two years authorization of courts to designate referees to determine order-of-protection applications by Family Courts based, in part, on ex parte conversations. The state empowered the referees to issue the orders when first approving their use against non-family members in 2008. Grants the chief administrator of the courts the authority to allow referees to determine applications to a family court for an order of protection when such application is made ex parte or without the presence of all the parties except the applicant; specifies that such provisions shall only apply during those hours that the family court is in session and after 5:00 p.m. Effective date August 13, 2010. (Laws of 2010, Ch 363 effective 8.13.10 (This act shall take effect immediately; provided that paragraph (n) of subdivision 2 of section 212 of the judiciary law, as Added by section one of this act, shall expire and be deemed repealed September 1, 2012.)

Chapter 371

Amends Domestic Relations Law § 236.

Laws of 2010, Ch 371, effective October 12, 2010, amends Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][6] to add a subdivision 5-a which revises the process for setting awards of temporary maintenance during the pendency of a matrimonial action, by creating a formula and list of factors that presumptively govern such awards. It amends Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][1][a] to update the definition of "maintenance" by cross-referencing it to Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [6] subdivision 5-a. It also amends Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][6] to add 5 new factors for the court to consider in determining the amount and duration of maintenance. Subdivision 3 directs the law revision commission to study the effects of divorce and maintenance. Effective date August 13, 2010. (Laws of 2010, Ch 371 (8.13.10) (§ 6. This act shall take effect immediately; provided, however, that sections one, two and four of this act shall take effect on the sixtieth day after this act shall have become a law and shall apply to matrimonial actions commenced on or after the effective date of such sections.)

Chapter 384

Amends Domestic Relations Law 170 to add subdivision 7.

Provides that spouses may be granted a judgment of divorce in a timely fashion provided the relationship between husband and wife is irretrievably broken” for a period of at least six months, provided that one party has so stated under oath. No judgment of divorce may be granted unless and until the economic issues of equitable distribution of marital property, the payment or waiver of spousal support, the payment of child support, the payment of counsel and experts' fees and expenses as well as the custody and visitation with the infant children of the marriage have been resolved by the parties, or determined by the court and incorporated into the judgment of divorce. Effective date October 12, 2010. Laws of 2010, Ch 384, (8.13.10) (§ 2. This act shall take effect on the sixtieth day after it shall have become a law and and shall apply to matrimonial actions commenced on or after such effective date.)

Chapter 415

Amends Chapter 329 of the Laws of 2010 to change its effective date from 120 days after it shall have become a law to 60 days after it shall have become a law. Effective date August 13, 2010. Laws of 2010, Ch 415. (8.13.10)

Governor Signs Sweeping Bills into Law.

According to a Press Release issued by his office on August 15, 2010 New York Governor Paterson signed into law a package of four bills that would bring significant reform to New York's outdated divorce laws. The Governor signed into law A.9753A/S.3890, which would make New York the last State of the fifty to adopt no-fault divorce. The bill would end the requirement that a party seeking a divorce had to claim one of a limited set of reasons as the basis for doing so, a rule that forced parties to invent false justifications, and that prolonged and aggravated the painful divorce process. The reform package also included legislation that would revise the process for setting awards of temporary maintenance while a divorce is pending, by creating a formula and list of factors that would presumptively govern such awards (A.10984/S.8390 and A11576/S.8391). This would allow for speedy resolution of the maintenance issue, and prevent less well-off parties to divorce proceedings from falling into poverty during litigation, because they lack the resources to obtain a temporary maintenance order. Another bill (A7569-A/S4532-A) would create a presumption that a less monied spouse in a divorce case is entitled to payment of attorneys' fees. Under current law, a party that cannot afford to secure representation in a divorce proceeding must make an application for fees at the end of the process, which can force a poor individual to proceed without a lawyer, or to surrender on important issues due to lack of means. Note that (S8391/A 11576:) amends S. 4532-A and A. 7569-A, relating to counsel and expert fees in matrimonial actions, to change the effective date to 60 days after enactment.

Second Department Applies "Implied Promise-equitable Estoppel Approach" to Support Cause of Action for Child Support Where Same-sex Partner and Mother Bring Child into the World Through Aid.

In Matter of H.M. v E.T.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 3023919 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the petitioner, H.M., a Canadian citizen, and the biological mother of the subject child, filed a petition pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (Family Ct Act art 5-B), seeking to obtain child support from E.T., her former same-sex partner with whom she allegedly agreed to conceive a child through artificial insemination by donor (AID), and upon whose promise of support she allegedly relied in so conceiving the child. The allegations of the petition, which in the present procedural posture had to be accepted as true were set forth in the opinion of the Court of Appeals in Matter of H.M. v. E.T. (14 NY3d 521). In its prior decision, the Appellate Division concluded that the Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to entertain H.M.'s petition, reversed the order of the Family Court, denied H.M.'s objections, reinstated the order of the Support Magistrate, and vacated two subsequent orders of the Family Court dated March 25, 2008, and February 9, 2009, which had invoked equitable estoppel and imposed a support order payable by E.T. to H.M. for child support, respectively (see Matter of H.M. v. E.T., 65 AD3d 119, revg 16 Misc.3d 1136[A]).

By opinion dated May 4, 2010 (Matter of H.M. v. E.T., 14 NY3d 521), the Court of Appeals reversed the determination that the Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction, and remitted the matter to the Appellate Division for consideration of the question, raised but not determined upon appeal to the Appellate Division, of whether H.M.'s petition sufficiently stated a cause of action for child support pursuant to Family Court Act articles 4 and 5-B . The Appellate Division noted that H.M.'s petition sought an order of support predicated upon a determination, through the application of the doctrines of equitable estoppel and implied contract, that E.T. was chargeable with the support of the child, and was not entitled to disclaim that obligation. The Appellate Division evaluated this claim for relief in accordance with the Court of Appeals' holding that such a claim lies within the Family Court's "article 4 jurisdiction," pursuant to which the "Family Court also has the inherent authority to ascertain in certain cases whether a female respondent is, in fact, a child's parent" . It concluded that H.M. stated a viable cause of action for the invocation of equitable estoppel to determine whether her former same-sex partner should be compelled to pay child support pursuant to Family Court Act articles 4 and 5-B. The Court pointed out that the doctrine of equitable estoppel has long been invoked to prevent a putative father, who has established a relationship with a child, from denying paternity in order to avoid paying support (citing, inter alia, Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 NY3d 320, 326). The paramount concern in such cases has been and continues to be the best interests of the child. Consistent with this principle, the Court had previously acknowledged that application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel would be appropriate, if determined to be in the best interests of the child, even under circumstances in which the child's "true paternity was not in issue" (citing Matter of Charles v. Charles, 296 A.D.2d at 549).

The Court noted that it and other courts have employed the doctrine of equitable estoppel, sometimes in conjunction with that of implied contract, to hold parties responsible for paying child support, not only in the absence of a biological or adoptive connection to the subject child, but in the absence of an established parent-child relationship, where those parties agreed either to adopt the child or to cause the child's conception through AID (citing Laura WW. v. Peter WW., 51 AD3d 211, 218; Wener v. Wener, 35 A.D.2d 50, 53; Matter of Karin T. v. Michael T., 127 Misc.2d 14; Gursky v. Gursky, 39 Misc.2d 1083, 1088). Its decision in Wener, holding that a husband could be required, under the "dual foundation" of equitable estoppel and implied contract, to support a child whom he had neither fathered nor adopted, was later sanctioned by the Court of Appeals in Matter of Baby Boy C. (84 N.Y.2d 91, 101-103). In permitting a husband to revoke his consent to joint adoptions of children already taken into his wife's care, the Court of Appeals, relying upon Wener, reasoned that "denial of the adoptions by [the husband] [would] not leave the children or [the wife] as their guardian without recourse to an appropriate economic remedy".

The Appellate Division pointed out that it had previously employed the "implied promise-equitable estoppel approach" (Wener, 35 A.D.2d at 53) to preclude a man with no biological or adoptive connection to a child from disavowing a relied-upon, implied promise to support the child, thus preventing the man from leaving the child without the support of two parents, as originally contemplated. By parity of reasoning, it held that where the same-sex partner of a child's biological mother consciously chooses, together with the biological mother, to bring that child into the world through AID, and where the child is conceived in reliance upon the partner's implied promise to support the child, a cause of action for child support under Family Court Act article 4 has been sufficiently alleged. In accordance with the foregoing, it concluded that sufficient allegations had been raised in H.M.'s petition, warranting a hearing in the Family Court on the issue of whether E.T. should be equitably estopped from denying her responsibility to support the subject child. Therefore, it affirmed the order entered September 11, 2007, and reinstated the two subsequent orders dated March 25, 2008, and February 9, 2009.

Third Department Holds that Lincoln Rule Does Not Apply to Article 10 Fact Finding Hearing

In Matter of Justin CC, 903 N.Y.S.2d 806 (3d Dept, 2010) the Appellate Division held that testimony taken from a child during the fact-finding stage of a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding, outside the presence of the respondent, but with counsel present, is not entitled to the same protections of confidentiality afforded to Lincoln testimony in a Family Ct. Act article 6 proceeding. Petitioner commenced neglect and abuse proceedings alleging that respondents subjected the children to corporal punishment and the father had sexual intercourse with the daughter on at least 20 occasions. Prior to the fact-finding hearing, the attorney for the daughter requested that a "modified Lincoln hearing" be held with the daughter in the presence of all counsel, but outside the presence of respondents, citing to the Third Department's decision in Matter of Randy A., 248 A.D.2d 838 [1998] as authority for such a procedure. Respondents consented to their exclusion while the daughter testified. Thereafter, in what was termed a "Lincoln hearing," the daughter provided sworn testimony; respondents were excluded but their attorneys were permitted to be present and afforded a full opportunity to cross-examine her. At the conclusion of the fact-finding hearing, Family Court found that the father abused the daughter and derivatively abused the sons, and that both the mother and the father neglected all four children. The transcript of the daughter's testimony was marked confidential by Family Court and was forwarded under seal to the Appellate Division for purposes of the appeal. While the appeal was being perfected, appellate counsel for the father moved for, among other things, an order unsealing the transcript of the daughter's testimony for inclusion in the record on appeal and for purposes of reference in counsel's brief and appendix. In that motion, counsel asserted that, inasmuch as this is not a custody proceeding and all counsel were present during the daughter's testimony and permitted to cross-examine her, the daughter's testimony was not in fact obtained during the course of a true Lincoln hearing and, consequently, is not confidential. Counsel also argued that her inability to reference and make fact-specific arguments based upon that testimony hampered her ability to adequately represent the father on appeal. The Appellate Division denied the motion to unseal the daughter's testimony. On appeal, appellate counsel for the father again asserted that the daughter's testimony should not be maintained confidential since it was not obtained during the course of a true Lincoln hearing and that she could not effectively represent her client without the ability to specifically challenge such testimony. Finding that this type of testimony taken at the fact-finding stage of a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding is fundamentally different from Lincoln testimony and is not entitled to the protections afforded by Lincoln, the Appellate Division, upon reconsideration, vacated its prior decision on the motion and granted the motion to unseal.

In explaining its rationale for the decision the Appellate Division noted that in Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d 270,[1969], the Court of Appeals held that a court deciding the issue of custody has the right to conduct a confidential interview with the child, outside the presence of the parents and their attorneys, because its first responsibility is and must be the welfare and interests of the child. In so concluding, the Court emphasized the importance of protecting the child from having to choose openly between parents or publicly relate his or her difficulties with them. Although there are sound reasons for maintaining confidentiality of a child's testimony in a custody proceeding, the court found no basis for providing such a protection at the fact-finding stage of a neglect/abuse proceeding. While the issue at the fact-finding stage of a custody proceeding is what custodial arrangement is in the best interest of the child, the issue at the fact-finding stage of a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding is whether the petitioner has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the child is neglected and/or abused and that the respondent is responsible for the neglect and/or abuse. Most significantly, unlike a custody proceeding, the position of the allegedly neglected or abused child in an article 10 proceeding may be adverse to the respondent. The Court pointed out that a litigant does not have an absolute right to be present at all stages of a civil proceeding, such as a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding. As such, in the context of a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding, this Court had concluded that, in balancing the due process right of the accused with the mental and emotional well-being of the child, a court may exclude the respondent during the child's testimony but allow his or her attorney to be present and question the child. It is only after such a balancing of these interests-- a respondent's right to be present/confront the victim and the psychological danger to the child of testifying in the respondent's presence--that a court may properly exclude a respondent from such testimony. This balancing procedure, or the reasons obviating the need to engage in it (for example, the parties consent to their exclusion), should be performed on the record so as to permit adequate appellate review. In its view, the underlying purpose for excluding a respondent during the testimony of a child victim in a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding is to ensure the child's ability to testify accurately and without inhibition, thus fostering open and truthful testimony. Unlike a custody proceeding, where the purpose of a Lincoln hearing is to corroborate information acquired through testimonial or documentary evidence adduced during the fact-finding hearing, it has been held that the testimony of a child--sworn or unsworn--taken outside the presence of the respondent in a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding can, by itself, support a finding of neglect or abuse. Although neither this Court nor the Court of Appeals has spoken on that issue, and it did not now pass on it, it is well settled that such testimony can, at a minimum, provide the requisite corroboration of a child's out-of-court statements (Family Ct. Act s 1046[a][vi]). To then drape such testimony with the veil of confidentiality, thus precluding appellate counsel from both referring to that testimony by specific reference and making legal arguments based upon it, raises fundamental due process concerns for the purposes of an appeal. Furthermore, if such testimony were to remain confidential, appellate counsel's ability to effectively represent his or her client would be even more constrained than that of trial counsel. The Court held that "where a child provides testimony during the fact-finding stage of a Family Ct. Act article 10 proceeding, outside the presence of the respondent but with all counsel present and afforded a full opportunity to cross-examine the child, the child's testimony may not be sealed. If an appeal is taken, the transcript of the child's testimony shall be provided to all counsel, and counsel may refer to the child's testimony in both the brief and at oral argument. In light of its determination, it held the appeal in abeyance and permitted the parties to rebrief the issues raised in their initial briefs on appeal in accordance with the conditions set forth in the decision.

Additional Expenses for Child Care and Medical Expenses Which must Be Awarded When Child Support Is Determined Pursuant to FCA413(1)(C), Need Not Be Awarded If Child Support Is Determined Pursuant to FCA 413(1)(g)

In Matter of Hudgins v Blair, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2510985 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father was married, and had two children of that marriage. At issue was the father's obligation to support his child with the petitioner mother, born February 21, 2008 (subject child). The mother worked 30 hours per week. After deducting social security and medicare taxes from the annual income of the mother and the father, the Family Court determined that the combined parental income for the subject child was $37,844.45, the basic child support obligation of both parents was 17% of $37,844.45, or $124 per week, and the father's share of the basic child support obligation was 55% of $124, or $136 every two weeks. The father also was directed to pay 55% of the mother's child care expenses, which constituted an additional $220 every two weeks. In determining whether the father's child support obligation was unjust or inappropriate in light of his obligation to support his other two children, the Support Magistrate concluded that the father's wife's annual gross income was $12,747.28. Adding that figure to the father's annual gross income of $22,649.58, the Support Magistrate concluded that the father's annual household income was $35,396.86, while the annual household income of the subject child was the annual gross income of the mother of $18,330. Since the household income of the children of the father and his wife, as determined by the Family Court, exceeded the household income of the subject child, the father was denied any adjustment for his obligations to his other two children. Thereafter, in written findings of fact, the Support Magistrate stated that she denied the father any "deviation from the presumptively correct amount" of child support based upon his obligations to his other two children, on the ground that the father failed to present evidence that he had a legal obligation to support those children, and failed to submit proof that he was, in fact, providing support for them. The Support Magistrate issued an order dated January 29, 2009. The father filed timely objections to the Support Magistrate's order, claiming, inter alia, that the Support Magistrate did not take into consideration his obligation to support his other two children. In the order appealed from, the Family Court stated that these objections were without merit. The Appellate Division stated that one of the factors to consider in determining whether the basic child support obligation pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(c) is unjust or inappropriate, is: "The needs of the children of the non-custodial parent for whom the non-custodial parent is providing support who are not subject to the instant action and whose support has not been deducted from income pursuant to subclause (D) of clause (vii) of subparagraph five of paragraph (b) of this subdivision [child support actually paid pursuant to a court order], and the financial resources of any person obligated to support such children, provided, however, that this factor may apply only if the resources available to support such children are less than the resources available to support the children who are subject to the instant action" (Family Ct Act s 413[1][f][8]). If the basic child support amount computed pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(c) is unjust or inappropriate, child support is to be determined pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(g), based upon "such amount of child support as the court finds just and appropriate." Further, additional expenses for child care and medical expenses which must be awarded when child support is determined pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(c), need not be awarded if child support is determined pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(g) (see Callen v. Callen, 287 A.D.2d 818, 820). The Appellate Division held that the Family Court could only take the needs of the father's other two children into account if the resources available to support them were less than the resources available to support the child who was the subject of the proceeding. However, in reaching this threshold determination as to how the father's resources should be utilized, the Support Magistrate should not have considered the father's resources in determining the resources of either his intact family or the subject child's family. Since the father's wife's income was less than the income of the mother, the resources available to support the children of the marriage were less than the resources available to support the subject child. In her written findings of fact, the Support Magistrate made what was, essentially, a finding contrary to her prior conclusion that the father's income constituted resources of the children of the marriage, when she found that their needs could not be considered because the father failed to establish that he was, in fact, providing support for them. Since these children were the children of his marriage, he clearly had a legal obligation to support them. Further, the father stated in open court that he gave his wife $150 biweekly in cash for their support. It reversed the order and sustained the father's objections to the extent that the provisions of the order dated January 29, 2009, directing the payment of basic child support, child care expenses, and arrears, were vacated, and remitted the matter to the Family Court, for a new hearing and determination, and for findings of fact as to whether the child support obligation imposed was unjust or inappropriate in light of the father's obligation to support the children of his marriage.

An Order Directing Genetic Testing Should Not Be Entered Prior to a Hearing on the Child's Best Interests

In Andrew T v Yana T, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2572407 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) The Appellate Division reversed an order which granted plaintiff former husband's motion to the extent of ordering genetic marker testing be performed on defendant and her child. The parties were granted an uncontested divorce on the grounds of constructive abandonment, based on the plaintiff's sworn statement that defendant refused to have sexual relations with him for a period of one year prior to commencement of the divorce action. Just over a year after the divorce judgment was entered, plaintiff brought the an application seeking to establish his paternity of defendant's child, alleging that he was unaware that she was pregnant when he commenced the divorce proceeding and that she had given birth some time during their separation. Plaintiff claimed he did not know the child's date of birth and made no affirmative allegations contradicting the affidavit he submitted in support of the divorce petition. Defendant opposed what she characterized as plaintiff's effort to undermine the divorce judgment and establish paternity, stating that she has remarried and established a happy home for the child with her second husband. The Appellate Division held that the order was granted prematurely, based on an inadequate record and without representation of the child's interests. In all cases involving the issue of paternity, the "paramount concern" is the child's best interests, and an order directing genetic testing therefore should not be entered prior to a hearing on the child's best interests, at which the child should be represented by a legal guardian.

Court Authorized to Modify Maintenance Obligations Even after Term for Durational Maintenance in Agreement Has Expired

In Rockwell v Rockwell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2403071 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) The Appellate Division affirmed an order which, without a hearing, denied the former wife's motion for an upward modification of the plaintiff former husband's maintenance obligation pursuant to the parties' separation agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce. It held that in circumstances where a separation agreement has been incorporated, but not merged, into a judgment of divorce, a court is authorized to modify maintenance obligations even after the term for durational maintenance in the agreement has expired (citing Domestic Relations Law 236[B][9][b]; Malaga v. Malaga, 17 AD3d 642, 643; Sass v. Sass, 276 A.D.2d 42, 43). However, a court may only grant such a modification upon the movant's showing of "extreme hardship". The defendant did not make the required showing of extreme hardship. Her net worth statement, provided in support of her motion for an upward modification, showed that she has no debt, her monthly income exceeded her monthly expenses, and she had significant savings in her bank account. Thus, the defendant failed to justify a resumption of the plaintiff's obligation to pay her maintenance in any amount, which obligation expired. It also noted that a court is required to conduct a hearing to determine whether a modification is warranted only when the movant presents genuine issues of fact. Absent a prima facie showing of entitlement to a modification, the party seeking modification has no right to a hearing.

Family Court Orders Are Different from Appeals of Other Civil Orders Because Family Court Act 1113 Does Not State That Service of a Notice of Entry Is Necessary to Start the Appeal Time Running

In Matter of Miller v Mace, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2196005 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Family Court continued joint legal custody, but awarded primary physical custody to the father, with visitation to the mother. The mother appealed and the Appellate Division dismissed her appeal. It found that her notice of appeal was not timely filed. Pursuant to Family Ct Act 1113, an appeal from a Family Court order "must be taken no later than thirty days after the service by a party or the law guardian upon the appellant of any order from which the appeal is taken, thirty days from receipt of the order by the appellant in court or thirty-five days from the mailing of the order to the appellant by the clerk of the court, whichever is earliest." Additionally, when service of the order is made by the court, the time to take an appeal shall not commence unless the order contains a statutorily required statement and there is an official notation in the court record as to the date and the manner of service of the order (Family Ct Act 1113). The Court pointed out that the statute was specifically amended to include time periods for serving a notice of appeal if service of the order was made by the court, either in person or by mailing, rather than requiring service by a party. The mother's principal argument on the timeliness issue was that her time to appeal did not start to run because she was never served with notice of entry of the order. The Appellate Division pointed out that aside from permitting the time for appeal to begin running upon service by the court, appeals from Family Court orders are different from appeals of other civil orders because Family Court Act 1113 does not state that service of a notice of entry is necessary to start the appeal time running. Because the Family Court Act fully addresses the process of appealing from that court, other provisions from the CPLR need not be consulted (citing Family Ct Act 165[a] [stating that where Family Ct Act does not include procedure, CPLR applies to extent appropriate]; 1118 [same for appeals]). Accordingly, contrary to the mother's contention, service of the Family Court order alone, without notice of entry, was sufficient to start the appeal time running. Family Court's order, entered on July 20, 2009, contained the statutory statement concerning appeals. A notation in the court's database dated July 20, 2009 indicated that the order was signed by the court, "entered, conformed and mailed." In addition, the record contained an August 7, 2009 cover letter transmitting the signed and entered order from the father's counsel to the father, the mother's counsel and the attorney for the child. As the mother was served with the order by the court on July 20 and by opposing counsel on August 7 (see CPLR 2103[b][2] [permitting service of papers on a party by mailing them to counsel]), her September 23, 2009 notice of appeal was untimely. It dismissed for lack of jurisdiction to consider her appeal a parent's inability to secure new work after losing employment may constitute an unanticipated and unreasonable change of circumstances where the award of support was premised upon a particular amount of income.

Parent's Inability to Secure New Work after Losing Employment May Constitute an Unanticipated and Unreasonable Change of Circumstances Where the Award of Support Was Premised upon a Particular Amount of Income

In Silver v Reiss, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2196000 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in November 2005, the parties stipulated that the child support obligation of petitioner (father) would be based upon imputed annual income of $28,667. Although the father was then essentially unemployed, two years earlier his income from a business of respondent (mother) had been approximately $60,000. Based on that prior income and the father's hopes for future employment, the parties agreed to his annual income and the corresponding child support amount. This agreement was later incorporated, but not merged, into a judgment of divorce. In 2007, after the father's attempts to obtain steady employment failed, he petitioned for a downward modification of child support. The Support Magistrate dismissed the petition for the father's failure to show a sufficient change in circumstances, but Family Court reversed that determination and reduced the amount of child support after finding a sufficient change in circumstances in the father's unsuccessful efforts to obtain employment and the depletion of his other financial resources. The mother appealed, arguing that because the father had been unemployed when he stipulated to the amount of child support, his continued unemployment did not constitute an unanticipated change in circumstances. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that a parent's inability to secure new work after losing employment may constitute an unanticipated and unreasonable change of circumstances where the award of support was premised upon a particular amount of income. Although the father was not employed when the amount was agreed upon, the record showed that the child support amount was based upon his agreed-upon imputed income and his expectation that he would soon secure employment. He was only able to meet his support obligations, however, by exhausting the $35,000 distributive award that he had received upon the divorce.

Family Court's Production of its Own Exhibit and Then Relying On It In Disregard to Every Witness and All the Parties Was Improper

In Matter of Blaize F., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2196067 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Family Court granted petitioner's application, in a proceeding pursuant to Family Ct Act article 10, to extend the supervision of respondent. (See Matter of Blaize F., 64 AD3d 936 [2009]; Matter of Blaize F., 55 AD3d 974 [2008]; Matter of Blaize F., 50 AD3d 1182 [2008]; Matter of Blaize F., 48 AD3d 1007 [2008]). Petitioner brought a proceeding to extend supervision regarding respondent's two stepdaughters and, in that petition, it also requested that respondent be granted unsupervised visitation with his son, Blaize F. At the ensuing hearing, both petitioner and the attorney for Blaize advocated for unsupervised visitation. Petitioner's witnesses unequivocally supported permitting respondent to have unsupervised visitation with Blaize and described in detail the positive interaction between respondent and Blaize as well as respondent's successful completion of pertinent programs. With no proof having been presented opposing unsupervised visitation, Family Court nonetheless produced and admitted into evidence its own exhibit, a Canadian study entitled "A Meta-Analysis of the Effectiveness of Treatment of Sexual Offenders: Risk, Need and Responsibility." Subsequently, in the closing statement, petitioner stated that it had erred in including Blaize in the petition and acknowledged that the petition should be dismissed as to him. However, Family Court rendered a decision (that included a lengthy quote from its exhibit) in which it granted the petition as to Blaize and extended the existing requirement for supervised visitation. The Appellate Division reversed as to Blaize. It pointed out that "Family Court is authorized to make successive extensions of supervision 'upon a hearing and for good cause shown' " (Family Ct Act 1054[b]) it generally does not disturb such an extension "unless it lacks a sound basis in the record". All the witnesses and all the parties supported unsupervised visitation.

Petitioner acknowledged that it should not have even brought the proceeding as to Blaize and agreed with respondent that the petition should be dismissed. Family Court's production of its own exhibit and then relying thereon in disregard to every witness and all the parties was improper (see generally People v. Arnold, 98 N.Y.2d 63, 67-69 [2002]). The court's determination that the witnesses were unreliable and lacked credibility--one of whom it had characterized in an earlier matter involving these parties as "credible and highly reliable"--was unsupported by the record.

Defense of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Available In Civil Contempt Proceedings

In Matter of Templeton, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 2302373 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Respondent (father) allegedly sustained injuries in a car accident in May 2008 and, shortly thereafter, ceased making child support payments and sought downward modification of his child support obligation claiming that he was unable to work. Petitioner (mother) commenced an enforcement proceeding. A Support Magistrate found the father in willful violation and assessed arrears. Following a hearing before Family Court, the court did not find credible the father's contention that he could not work because of injuries related to the car accident. Family Court ordered, among other things, that the father reimburse the mother pursuant to Judiciary Law 773 for costs she had incurred in pursuing the violation, including her expense for private investigators as well as her lost wages and travel expenses to attend the hearing. The Appellate Division accepted the father's contention that he did not receive the effective assistance of counsel. To succeed on his claim, he must demonstrate that, viewed in its entirety, his counsel did not provide meaningful representation (Matter of Hurlburt v. Behr, 70 AD3d 1266, 1267 [2010]; Matter of Martin v. Martin, 46 AD3d 1243, 1246 [2007]). Here, it was undisputed that the father received injuries in a car accident, and his sole defense to the willful violation proceeding was that he was unable to work because of the extent of his injuries. His counsel, despite repeated attempts, failed to procure certified medical records, which were apparently extensive. Hence, the father's medical records were not received into evidence and no other competent proof was presented regarding the father's medical condition. Family Court found the lack of such proof fatal to the father's defense. Under these circumstances, the court found merit to the father's ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Although this rendered academic the father's further contention regarding the penalty, the court noted that, in the event a willful violation is found following a new hearing, the specific remedies for a violation of a support order are set forth in Family Ct Act 454. The order and judgment were reversed, on the law and the matter remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the decision. Editors Note: In Matter of Martin v. Martin, 46 A.D.3d 1243, 848 N.Y.S.2d 433 (3d Dept 2007) the parties were the parents of two children (born in 1990 and 1995). In 2002, petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were divorced and stipulated to a joint custody arrangement, whereby the father would pay child support of $200 per week. In 2004, the parties each filed petitions on the same day in Family Court, the mother seeking a finding that the father had willfully violated the order of support and the father seeking a modification of his support obligation. In his petition, the father listed verbal agreements and health as the change in circumstances justifying modification. In June 2005, while the trial was in progress, the father filed a second petition seeking modification of child support based on his incarceration in the Albany County Jail. A three-day trial, covering all three petitions, was held before a Support Magistrate on January 11, 2005, February 4, 2005 and June 28, 2005. On the first day of trial, the father's attorney attempted to introduce medical records but, after the mother objected, the Support Magistrate refused to receive the records "at this time," apparently in the absence of proper authentication. The father testified that in the spring and summer of 2003 his business collapsed, he was diagnosed with an illness which crippled his ability to work until approximately January 2005 and, between September 2003 and May 2004, he lived with the mother and their children under an agreement that he would perform the duties of a "stay-at-home parent" in lieu of support payments. On the second day of trial a month later, the father attempted to introduce the testimony of his therapist who was apparently prepared to testify that during an addiction counseling session the parties had "agreed to have [the father] provide services instead of providing child support dollars." However, the mother objected to such testimony on the ground that it was privileged. The Support Magistrate adjourned the trial for research on the issue of whether the mother was entitled to assert a therapist/social worker-client privilege. Thereafter, by written decision, the Support Magistrate determined that the mother was involved in the counseling only for the purpose of assisting with the father's therapy and, therefore, the therapist would be permitted to testify as a fact witness regarding the alleged agreement. On the date of that decision, May 5, 2005, the Support Magistrate set June 28, 2005 as the next date for trial. On June 28, 2005, almost eight weeks after her decision, the Support Magistrate was prepared to accept the therapist's testimony. The father's attorney, however, reported to the court that the therapist was not available and requested that another date be set for the therapist's testimony or, in the alternative, that the mother consent to the receipt in evidence of the therapist's affidavit, which had been submitted previously in support of the father's earlier assertion that the therapist should be allowed to testify. The mother objected to both of these options, and the Support Magistrate agreed. The father's testimony resumed and it was revealed that he had recently been incarcerated on pending criminal charges. He also restated or elaborated on much of his earlier testimony regarding his health problems, work history, and the alleged agreement with the mother to temporarily suspend payments in return for his childcare assistance. The mother testified that the father had resided with her and the children at times and that she had attended therapy sessions with him, but she asserted that they had not entered into any agreement to suspend child support. After again denying the father's requests for an opportunity to call the therapist or introduce the therapist's affidavit, the Support Magistrate ruled from the bench dismissing both modification petitions based on the father's failure to establish a change in circumstances and finding that he had willfully violated a support order. In her ruling, the Support Magistrate noted that no medical evidence of the father's alleged inability to work due to diminished health was introduced, incarceration is not a basis to modify an order of support, and no credible evidence supported his claims regarding the alleged arrangement between the parties. She ultimately issued an order crediting various payments to the father, but finding that he willfully violated an order of support. Family Court subsequently affirmed the findings of the Support Magistrate and directed that, given the finding of willfulness, an award of counsel fees be determined. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate awarded $2,500 in counsel fees to the mother, which was then affirmed by Family Court. The Appellate Division rejected the father's contention that the Support Magistrate's refusal to adjourn the trial so that a key witness could be located amounted to an abuse of discretion and that the decision to not consider the therapist's affidavit in place of his testimony was error. " Here, it was clear that the father's inability to produce the therapist "resulted from his counsel's lack of due diligence in preparing for the hearing. Notably, his counsel conceded that he never spoke directly with the therapist-simply asserting that a letter was sent and it never came back so "he expected him to be there"and there was no indication in the record that any pretrial attempt was made to obtain a continuance or to reschedule. As for the refusal to admit the therapist's affidavit into evidence, the father failed to suggest any basis on which admission of that hearsay document would have been permissible. However, the court was persuaded by the father's ineffective assistance of counsel claim based upon his attorney's failure to present sufficient evidence regarding his medical condition and to ensure that a key witness was present at trial. Under Family Ct Act 262 (a) (vi), a person has the right to the assistance of counsel 'in any proceeding before the court in which an order or other determination is being sought to hold such person in contempt of the court or in willful violation of a previous order of the court'. The standard for effective assistance of counsel here is whether, viewed in its totality, the representation was meaningful and whether actual prejudice was suffered as a result of claimed deficiencies. In this case, the father's initial modification petition and his defense to the willful violation allegations turned on his health-related inability to work due to his treatment for a serious illness and an alleged agreement with the mother to suspend his support payments, and his counsel did not get important evidence admitted that would have advanced these assertions. Specifically, counsel failed to properly obtain authentication for the father's medical records, call any witnesses to testify as to the effects of the father's illness, subpoena the therapist, or otherwise ensure his availability as a witness on the trial date. Family Court made specific reference to the lack of medical evidence in its decision, finding that the father had not refuted the mother's prima facie showing of willfulness, and affirmed the specific finding that no credible proof was offered to support the father's assertions of an agreement between the parties-the precise issue on which the therapist was to testify. Had this proof been admitted into evidence, the father would have had independent verification for his assertions which may have relieved him of several months worth of support obligations and may have undermined the allegation of willfulness. Taken together, the omissions constituted a failure to meaningfully represent the father, and he was entitled to a new hearing on his initial modification petition and the mother's violation petition.

Second Department Disapproves of Requirement of Showing Existence of "Special Circumstances" Warranting Discovery from a Nonparty in Order to Successfully Oppose a Motion to Quash a Subpoena Duces Tecum Served on That Nonparty

In Kooper v Kooper, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 1912142 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the appeal considered the principles governing the discovery of documents from nonparties pursuant to CPLR 3101(a)(4). It provides that the party seeking disclosure must give notice stating "the circumstances or reasons such disclosure is sought or required" from the nonparty. The question before the court was whether a party must establish the existence of "special circumstances" warranting discovery from a nonparty in order to successfully oppose a motion to quash a subpoena duces tecum served on that nonparty? Justice Angiolillo, in the opinion for the court, noted that many of the cases of the Second Department continued to apply that standard after CPLR 3101(a)(4) was amended to remove the requirement that discovery from a nonparty be obtained only "where the court on motion determines that there are adequate special circumstances." and concluded: "We hereby disapprove the further application of the "special circumstances" standard in this context." On July 18, 2008, the defendant served subpoenas duces tecum on five nonparty financial institutions, demanding production of documents related to any accounts held by the plaintiff, and on July 21, 2008, the defendant served an amended subpoena on one of the five institutions. The following notice appeared on the face of each subpoena: "The circumstances or reasons said disclosure is sought or required are to identify and value certain marital property, which is material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of this action." Copies of the six subpoenas were served on the plaintiff. After the wife refused to withdraw the six subpoenas duces tecum served on nonparty financial institutions, the husband moved to quash the subpoenas, and the wife filed a cross-motion to compel the husband to comply with discovery demands, for an award of interim counsel fees, and to direct the husband to pay the wife one-half of the proceeds from the rental of the parties' vacation home. The Supreme Court granted the husband's motion to quash on the ground that the defendant had failed to tender a sufficient explanation why the discovery from nonparties was necessary and denied wife's cross-motion in its entirety. On appeal the Appellate Division noted that subsequent document production by three of the five nonparty financial institutions rendered part of defendant's appeal academic. It turned to defendant's contention that the Supreme Court improperly granted plaintiff's motion to quash the subpoenas she served on the two remaining nonparty financial institutions, American Express and Principal Trust Company, f/k/a Delaware Charter Guarantee & Trust Company. The court pointed out that disclosure in New York civil actions is guided by the principle of "full disclosure of all matter material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action." (CPLR 3101). The phrase "material and necessary" is "to be interpreted liberally to require disclosure, upon request, of any facts bearing on the controversy which will assist preparation for trial by sharpening the issues and reducing delay and prolixity. The test is one of usefulness and reason" (citing Allen v. Crowell-Collier Publ. Co., 21 N.Y.2d 403). The Court of Appeals' interpretation of "material and necessary" in Allen has been understood "to mean nothing more or less than 'relevant'. To withstand a challenge to a discovery request, therefore, the party seeking discovery must first satisfy the threshold requirement that the disclosure sought is "material and necessary," whether the request is directed to a party or non-party. If a request for discovery from a nonparty is challenged solely on the ground that it exceeds the permissible scope of matters material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of the action, a motion to quash is properly denied if that threshold requirement is satisfied, or properly granted if the discovery sought is not material and necessary. The Court held that in this action for a divorce and ancillary relief in which the parties seek, inter alia, the equitable distribution of marital assets, "the entire financial history of the marriage is open for examination," and "[broad pretrial disclosure enabling both spouses to obtain necessary information regarding the value and nature of the marital assets is deemed critical if the trial court is to properly distribute the marital assets." The two subpoenas at issue sought financial records including periodic statements for any accounts in the plaintiff's name for the time period of "January 1, 2002 to the present." The court found that this information was material and necessary as an aid to the parties in determining the value and nature of the marital assets and an aid to the trial court in properly distributing those assets. Since the defendant met the threshold requirement, an order quashing the subpoenas could not be premised on the ground that the requested disclosure was not material or necessary to the prosecution or defense of this action. Beyond the requirement of materiality and necessity which defines the scope of permissible discovery, a disclosure request directed to a nonparty implicates considerations in addition to those governing discovery from a party. The Court noted that CPLR 3101, entitled "Scope of Disclosure," sets forth general requirements applicable to all discovery. At one time, CPLR 3101 allowed disclosure as against a nonparty only "where the court on motion determines that there are adequate special circumstances. In 1984, the Legislature amended CPLR 3101(a)(4) to eliminate the "on motion" and "special circumstances" language, substituting therefor the requirement that such disclosure be obtained "upon notice stating the circumstances or reasons such disclosure is sought or required." The 1984 amendment, however, did not change the requirement that a party obtain "[a] court order upon a showing of special circumstances" when further disclosure is sought concerning the expected testimony of an expert witness; this is the sole remaining subsection with the "special circumstances" language. After the 1984 amendment, CPLR 3120, which specifically governs document production, continued to require a court order for discovery from a nonparty. Subdivision (b) of that Rule required the party seeking disclosure to obtain the order upon motion with notice to adverse parties and the nonparty from whom disclosure was sought. In 2002, the Legislature amended CPLR 3120, dispensing with the need to make a motion and requiring CPLR

3120, as amended in 2002, requires only service of a subpoena duces tecum for the production of documents in the custody and control of a nonparty witness. The 2002 amendment brought nonparty document production into line with the procedure for compelling a nonparty witness to produce documents during the nonparty's deposition, which requires service of a subpoena without a motion or court order. Justice Angiolillo noted that the Second Department has adhered to the view that a subpoena duces tecum served on a nonparty is "facially defective" and unenforceable if it neither contains, nor is accompanied by, a CPLR 3101(a)(4) notice stating the circumstances or reasons such disclosure is sought or required. However, it has indicated, in dicta, that such a facial defect might be remedied and in a case involving facially defective subpoenas that allegedly, dehors the record, were reissued with the required notice, it considered the merits of the showing in opposition to a motion to quash and found it lacking. The Second Department has not had occasion to consider whether a motion to quash for lack of the required notice may be successfully defeated upon an adequate showing of circumstances and reasons for the requested disclosure. In this case the two subpoenas at issue contained a notice with a statement of circumstances and reasons why the defendant sought the disclosure. The question was whether the "circumstances and reasons" proffered by the defendant were sufficient to withstand the plaintiff's motion to quash. The Court noted that after the 1984 amendment eliminating the "special circumstances" language, the departments of the Appellate Division differed in their interpretations of the "circumstances and reasons" requirement and the sufficiency of the showing necessary to withstand a challenge to disclosure from a nonparty. In 1988, the Second Department held, in a case involving a nonparty deposition, that the "special circumstances requirement survived the 1984 amendment to CPLR 3101(a)(4)". In light of the elimination from CPLR 3101(a)(4) in 1984 of the "special circumstances" language, the Second Department disapproved of further application of the "special circumstances" standard in its cases, except with respect to the limited area in which it remains in the statutory language, i.e., with regard to certain discovery from expert witnesses. It held that on a motion to quash a subpoena duces tecum or for a protective order, in assessing whether the circumstances or reasons for a particular demand warrant discovery from a nonparty, those circumstances and reasons need not be shown to be "special circumstances." Looking to the reasoning in its cases to find guidance with respect to the circumstances and reasons which it considered relevant to the inquiry with respect to discovery from a nonparty, the court noted that since Dioguardi, the Court has deemed a party's inability to obtain the requested disclosure from his or her adversary or from independent sources to be a significant factor in determining the propriety of discovery from a nonparty. A motion to quash is, thus, properly granted where the party issuing the subpoena has failed to show that the disclosure sought cannot be obtained from sources other than the nonparty, and properly denied when the party has shown that the evidence cannot be obtained from other sources. The cases have not exclusively relied on this consideration, however, and have weighed other circumstances which may be relevant in the context of the particular case in determining whether discovery from a nonparty is warranted such as a conflict in statements between the plaintiff and nonparty witness; unexplained discontinuance of the action against the witness, formerly a party; and previous inconsistencies in the nonparty's statements. The Court declined to set forth a comprehensive list of circumstances or reasons which would be deemed sufficient to warrant discovery from a nonparty in every case. Circumstances necessarily vary from case to case. The particular circumstances of each case must always weigh in the trial court's consideration of a discovery request and in our review of the trial court's exercise of its discretion. The Court emphasized that its cases have consistently adhered to the principle that "[more than mere relevance and materiality is necessary to warrant disclosure from a nonparty". Applying these principles to the case at hand, the Court found that the defendant proffered circumstances and reasons in her notice on the face of each subpoena which amounted to no more than a statement that the information would be relevant and material and necessary to the prosecution or defense of the action. In opposition to the plaintiff's motion to quash, the defendant failed to add to this showing, arguing only generally that neither the plaintiff nor the nonparty financial institutions had affirmatively shown prejudice or inconvenience. This proffer was insufficient in the context of this case. The defendant sought discovery from the nonparties prior to expiration of the plaintiff's time to respond to her discovery demands. The defendant conceded that she has since received the plaintiff's voluminous response to her demands, consisting of approximately 27,000 pages of documents. The defendant should have reviewed the material received from the plaintiff to ascertain whether the information sought from the various nonparties was supplied by the plaintiff in his discovery responses. Had that procedure been followed, it may have obviated the need for, or significantly narrowed and focused, the subpoenas served on the nonparties. Accordingly, as the defendant did not make a sufficient showing of the circumstances and reasons discovery from the nonparties was warranted, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in granting the plaintiff's motion to quash the subpoenas served on American Express and Principal Trust Company, f/k/a Delaware Charter Guarantee & Trust Company. The court also found merit, however, in that branch of the defendant's cross motion which was for an award of an interim counsel fee. It held that given the significant disparity in the parties' financial circumstances, the Supreme Court should have granted the defendant's request for counsel fees and directed the plaintiff to pay the defendant an interim counsel fee in the sum of $100,000.

Nonmonied Spouse Not Required to Demonstrate a Likelihood of Success as a "Strict Predicate" to an Award of an Attorney's Fee for Appeal

In Cohen v Cohen, 900 N.Y.S.2d 460 (2 Dept, 2010) the defendant moved in the Supreme Court, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 237(a), for an award of an attorney's fee and the costs associated with producing an appellate record, so that she could afford to perfect and prosecute three appeals relating to this matrimonial action. Supreme Court granted the defendant's motion and directed the plaintiff to pay the sum of $25,000 as a prospective attorney's fee, and to pay the costs of producing an appellate record. In addition, the Supreme Court awarded the defendant's attorney the sum of $3,000 as a fee for making the motion. The plaintiff moved for leave to reargue and, upon reargument, Supreme Court vacated its original order, finding that there was no reasonable ground to believe that the defendant would be successful on her appeals, and denied the defendant's motion in its entirety. The Appellate Division reversed the order made upon reargument. It held that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff's motion for leave to reargue, since the plaintiff failed to demonstrate that the Supreme Court overlooked or misapprehended the facts or law, or for some other reason mistakenly reached its earlier decision (see CPLR 2221[d]). It pointed out that Domestic Relations Law 237(a) permits an award of an attorney's fee and the costs of producing an appellate record so that a spouse may prosecute an appeal. An award of an attorney's fee will generally be warranted where there is a significant disparity in the financial circumstances of the parties". The purpose of Domestic Relations Law 237(a) is to redress the economic disparity between the monied spouse and the non-monied spouse. In determining whether to award fees, the court should 'review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions. However, the nonmonied spouse is no longer required to demonstrate a likelihood of success as a "strict predicate" to an award of an attorney's fee. It found that an award of an attorney's fee and payment of the costs of producing an appellate record were appropriate in this case, given the significant economic disparity between the parties. The defendant was unemployed and had no independent source of income, while the plaintiff earned approximately $450,000 per year as a partner in a large law firm. Furthermore, the award of $3,000 to the defendant's attorney for making the motion for an award of appellate counsel fees was appropriate.

Family Court In New York Metropolitan Area Allows Internet Check in The Family Court in the New York Metropolitan area now allows attorneys to check in by the Internet rather than in person. An electronic check-in system has been introduced in Brooklyn, Manhattan, the Bronx, Staten Island, Queens and Westchester County. It can be accessed at <http://www.nycourts.gov/familycourtcheckin/>. The electronic check in system allows attorneys to list their schedule of appearances through the court system web site between 5 p.m. the night before they are due in court and 9:30 a.m. the day of their appearance. The instructions indicate that the system may not be used after 9:30 AM. After 9:30 AM, go to the parts to check in. This application is only for informing the court on the day of your appearances that you expect to be present at your scheduled appearances. If you will not be present you must contact the court in person or by fax or e-mail to the judge's court attorney.

Court of Appeals Holds that the Initial Determination of Whether a Particular Asset Is Marital or Separate Property Is a Question of Law, Subject to Plenary Review on Appeal, and DRL 236 Creates a Presumption That All Property, Unless Clearly Separate, Is Deemed Marital Property' and the Burden Rests with the Titled Spouse to Rebut That Presumption.

In Fields v Fields, __NY3d ____, 6/11/2010 NYLJ 36, (col. 3) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Graffeo, observed that, although the manner in which marital property is distributed falls within the discretion of the trial court, 'the initial determination of whether a particular asset is marital or separate property is a question of law, subject to plenary review on appeal' (DeJesus v. DeJesus, 90 NY2d 643, 647 [1997])." Here, the Court concluded that the value of the husband's one-half interest in the parties' residence, a Manhattan townhouse that the husband purchased during the marriage and where the parties had lived for nearly thirty years, was marital property and affirmed the order of the Appellate Division. At the outset Judge Graffeo set forth the applicable principals of law that applied to this case. She pointed out that Domestic Relations Law §236 defines 'marital property' as 'all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held, and the definition of marital property includes a 'wide range' of tangible and intangible interests. She indicated that "it is telling that the Legislature chose to initially categorize all property, of whatever nature, acquired after parties marry as marital property." The Equitable Distribution Law 'recognizes that spouses have an equitable claim to things of value arising out of the marital relationship and classifies them as subject to distribution by focusing on the marital status of the parties at the time of acquisition. This marital property designation is in keeping with the fundamental purpose of the Equitable Distribution Law, the recognition of marriage as an economic partnership, in which 'both parties contribute as spouse, parent, wage earner or homemaker. The Legislature did provide for several exceptions to this general classification. Section 236 specifies that marital property does not include 'separate property' and the statute sets forth four categories of property that constitute separate property: '(1) property acquired before marriage or property acquired by bequest, devise, or descent, or gift from a party other than the spouse; (2) compensation for personal injuries; (3) property acquired in exchange for or the increase in value of separate property, except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse; (4) property described as separate property by written agreement of the parties pursuant to subdivision three of this part'. When the Legislature enacted Domestic Relations Law §236, it sought 'to recognize the direct and indirect contributions of each spouse. Hence, the Court has stressed that marital property should be 'construed broadly in order to give effect to the 'economic partnership' concept of the marriage relationship'. By contrast, separate property, denoted as an exception to marital property, should be construed 'narrowly'. The structure of section 236 therefore creates a statutory presumption that 'all property, unless clearly separate, is deemed marital property' and the burden rests with the titled spouse to rebut that presumption. The Husband and the wife, who were 60 and 69 years old, respectively, were married in 1970 and had a son who was born in 1973. In 1978, the parties decided to purchase a home on the Upper West Side of Manhattan, selecting a five-story townhouse with ten apartments and a basement. The Wife agreed to the acquisition of the townhouse only if the husband consented to certain preconditions because she believed that working outside the home and caring for their son, together with maintaining the townhouse, would be too burdensome. Because of the wife's reticence, the husband decided to purchase the townhouse with his mother's assistance. The husband paid $130,000 for the townhouse, making a $30,000 down payment. The down payment came from funds the husband received from his grandparents--half in lieu of a bequest and half on loan, which his mother agreed to repay. The balance of the purchase price was paid through two mortgages held jointly by the husband and his mother. The Husband took title solely in his name but later conveyed a one-half interest in the building to his mother. From 1982 to 2001, the husband and his mother managed the townhouse as a formal partnership. They deposited rent proceeds into a partnership bank account and made mortgage payments from that account. But the partnership bank account was not used exclusively for the building's income and expenses; the husband acknowledged that he commingled marital funds in the account. In September 1978, husband and the Wife moved into the townhouse, initially residing in apartment 2. In 1979, the couple converted the basement into an apartment where they lived together for five months until the wife became ill and moved into apartment 3. In 1983, after apartment 3 was burglarized, the wife relocated to apartment 2. The husband remained in the basement apartment and the couple shared occasional meals until 1997. The husband paid rent to the partnership for the basement apartment until 2002; he used his income from employment to make rental payments. The Wife also paid rent using her wages while she was living in apartment 3. The husband's mother and stepfather resided in the building as well and paid rent for three apartments that they combined into a single residence. The remaining apartments were leased to various tenants. and the Wife were continuously employed outside of the home, although they each took periods of parental leave to care for their son. The couple shared child care expenses and responsibilities as parents. The Husband commenced this divorce action in February 2005 and Supreme Court referred the matter to a Special Referee. After a hearing on issues of equitable distribution, the Referee found that both parties contributed to the long-term marriage, their son's upbringing and the townhouse. Included in his findings, the Special Referee determined that wife decorated the basement apartment, purchasing a carpet, a Formica counter top, couches, a linen closet, bathroom cabinets, a chandelier, curtains, and rugs. She installed a door in the basement apartment, wallpapered the bathroom and paid for flooring and a mirror for the foyer outside the apartment. The Wife also helped with the townhouse's day-to-day maintenance. She cleaned the basement apartment and purchased the vacuum used to clean the lobby. The wife cleaned the mailbox vestibule, swept the interior and exterior steps, periodically cleaned the sidewalk, raked and bagged leaves in the backyard and planted a garden. She also cleaned lobby windows and washed the curtains, polished the lobby mirror and, during times when the husband was away, disposed of the townhouses refuse. The Referee recommended that the husband's one-half interest in the townhouse be classified as marital property, less the $30,000 down payment, which the Referee deemed as the husband's separate property because those funds had been received from the husband's grandparents. He also found that the husband's one-half interest in the partnership bank account was marital property. The Referee awarded the Wife 35 percent of the value of all marital assets because he concluded that the Wife had made direct and indirect contributions to the townhouse, including services as a spouse and mother. Supreme Court confirmed the Referee's Report and directed entry of a judgment of divorce. The Appellate Division, with two Justices dissenting, affirmed (65 AD3d 297 [1st Dept 2009]). The court held that the husband's interest in the townhouse, less the $30,000 down payment, was properly categorized as marital property subject to equitable distribution. The majority emphasized that the husband purchased the townhouse during the parties' marriage, that the couple continuously lived in the townhouse and raised their son in the home, and that the Wife made direct and indirect contributions to the upkeep of the townhouse. Rejecting the husband's assertion that his interest in the townhouse should be viewed as separate property, the court explained that '[t]he fact that the marital residence can also be used to generate income... does not therefore reclassify marital property into separate property' (id. at 304). The husband argued in the Court of Appeals that his one-half interest in the townhouse was separate property because he owned and managed the building with his mother and because the Wife did not contribute to its purchase or its appreciation in value. The Court of Appeals disagreed and concluded that the value of the husband's one-half interest in the townhouse was marital property subject to equitable distribution. Judge Graffeo wrote that this case involved the application of the well-settled statutory presumption that all property acquired by either spouse during the marriage, unless clearly separate, is deemed marital property (see DeJesus, 90 NY2d at 652). Here, the husband purchased the townhouse in 1978, approximately eight years into the marriage, and therefore, on the date of acquisition, the presumption of marital property arose. Even where one spouse contributed monies derived from separate property toward the acquisition of the marital residence, this has not precluded its classification as marital property where the other spouse made economic or other contributions to the residence and the marriage; the contributing spouse generally has received a credit for that contribution. Here, the property was purchased eight years into the parties' marriage with the intent that it would be used as the marital residence where the parties would live and raise their son. In fact, that is precisely what occurred, the parties resided in the home with their son and other family members for nearly 30 years. Thus, the statutory presumption that a residence acquired during the marriage is marital property clearly applied in this case. Once the statutory presumption was triggered, the burden shifted to the husband to rebut that presumption (DeJesus, 90 NY2d at 652). The Husband relied on the fact that he used monies derived from separate property, the $30,000 down payment, to acquire the townhouse. But the townhouse was not 'acquired in exchange for' the $30,000 down payment (Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [1] [d] [3]). Instead, the husband's $30,000 separate property contribution covered only a fraction of the purchase price. While the down payment facilitated the acquisition, the use of a 'separate property' down payment does not, in and of itself, establish the property's character as separate property. The remaining $100,000 of the purchase price was paid through two mortgages and, despite the husband's claim that he made mortgage payments solely from rental proceeds, he failed to substantiate that allegation. The husband testified that he commingled marital assets in the partnership bank account from which mortgage payments were made. Specifically, he acknowledged that he would sometimes deposit his paychecks, which were marital property, into the account. Funds from other sources of marital income were also placed into the account, such as the husband's earnings from his tax preparation and video businesses and wife's paychecks. The fact that the husband would later transfer funds or give cash to the Wife does not alter the commingled nature of the funds. Finally, both the husband and the Wife paid rent to the partnership using income from their outside endeavors, which was a partial source of the mortgage payments. The Court found that the husband therefore failed to establish that the mortgages, which were used to pay the majority of the townhouse's purchase price, were paid using monies derived exclusively from separate property, much less that all of the expenses associated with the property were covered by segregated funds. Judge Graffeo noted that there is no single template that directs how courts are to distribute a marital asset that was acquired, in part or in whole, with separate property funds. In these situations, courts have usually given the spouse who made the separate property contribution a credit for such payment before determining how to equitably distribute the remaining value of the asset. In distributing any appreciation in value, courts may consider any of the factors listed in Domestic Relations Law §236 (B) (5) (d) or any other relevant considerations, including the respective contributions of each spouse and the effect of market forces. In this case, the courts below properly considered the spectrum and quantity of contributions made by each spouse to the management and maintenance of the townhouse and the extent to which market factors enhanced the value of the property. Under these circumstances, the Court declined to disturb the determination below that the husband failed to rebut the statutory presumption that his interest in the townhouse is marital property subject to equitable distribution and that the Wife was entitled to 35 percent of the husband's interest in that asset. In reaching this conclusion, the Court emphasized that the husband purchased the townhouse eight years into the 35-year marriage and that the family maintained their living arrangement since 1978. It is not for the courts to dictate what type of lifestyle a 'normal' marriage should reflect or how married couples should structure their marital relationships. That the husband and the Wife in this case maintained separate apartments in the building did not change the character of the property from marital to separate, especially since they both made economic and noneconomic contributions to their marriage and the upbringing of their son. Many married couples sleep in different bedrooms for a variety of reasons and such arrangements do not affect the 'marital property' status of their homes if they divorce. The fact that the husband took title to his one-half interest in the townhouse in his name alone is irrelevant under the statute's express language, nor does the fact that the husband acquired title with his mother interfere with the marital character of his interest in the property. That portions of the townhouse were used as an income-generating business does not transform the building into separate property. The Wife's lack of an initial monetary investment and involvement in the management activities pertaining to the townhouse do not preclude a holding that the husband's interest in the building is marital property. These were factors properly considered by the trial court in determining the extent of wife's distributive award (see Domestic Relations Law §236 [B] [5] [d]). Judge Graffeo pointed out that the dissent failed to recognize the statutory presumption that property acquired during a marriage is marital property; instead, the dissent begins with the assumption that the building was separate property at the time of its acquisition. The majority did not view the husband's interest in the townhouse as property 'acquired in exchange for' his separate property contribution toward the down payment. Under the dissent's analysis, any time a married couple purchases a marital residence using 'separate' funds contributed by one spouse towards the down payment, the entirety of the marital home would be classified as separate property. This approach is not consistent with relevant precedent, does not heed Domestic Relations Law's statutory presumption in favor of marital property and is contrary to the very purpose underlying the statute in recognition of an 'economic partnership.' The husband also claimed that his one-half interest in the partnership bank account was separate property because the account was created solely to manage funds relating to the townhouse. But, he commingled marital assets in the partnership bank account and he could not sufficiently delineate any of the funds in the account as separate property. Thus, the husband's interest in the partnership bank account was marital property that should be allocated between the parties. The husband also challenged the trial court's distribution of the marital property, arguing that the court abused its discretion by awarding the Wife 35 percent of the value of the marital assets. The Court of Appeals disagreed. In recognizing marriage as an economic partnership, Domestic Relations Law §236 mandates that the equitable distribution of marital assets be based on the circumstances of the particular case and directs the courts to consider a number of statutory factors. (Domestic Relations Law 236 [B] [5] [d]). Absent an abuse of discretion, this Court may not disturb the trial court's distributive award. Here, Supreme Court issued a comprehensive decision addressing all relevant factors, including that the husband and the Wife were married for 35 years; that both maintained employment and made economic and noneconomic contributions to the marriage, their son and the townhouse; that they had equal parenting responsibilities; that the Wife did not invest in the purchase of the townhouse; and that the couple maintained separate units in the building for approximately 28 years. In light of these considerations, particularly the length of the marriage, the age of the parties and wife's contributions to the marriage, the Court could not conclude that Supreme Court abused its discretion in awarding the Wife 35 percent of the value of the husband's half interest in the townhouse and other marital assets. Judge Smith dissented in an opinion in which Judge Read concurred.

US Supreme Court Holds "Ne Exeat Right" Granted by Chilean Law Was a "Right of Custody," under Hague Convention

In Abbott v Abbott, --- S.Ct. ----, 2010 WL 1946730 (U.S.) the U.S. Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held that father's ne exeat right granted by Chilean law was a "right of custody," under the Hague Convention, abrogating Croll v. Croll, 229 F.3d 133, Fawcett v. McRoberts, 326 F.3d 491, and Gonzalez v. Gutierrez, 311 F.3d 942.

Timothy Abbott and Jacquelyn Abbott married in England in 1992. He was a British citizen, and she was a citizen of the United States. Their son A.J. A. was born in 1995. The Abbotts moved to La Serena, Chile, in 2002. There was marital discord, and the parents separated in March 2003. The Chilean courts granted the mother daily care and control of the child, while awarding the father "direct and regular" visitation rights, including visitation every other weekend and for the whole month of February each year. Chilean law conferred upon Mr. Abbott what is commonly known as a ne exeat right: a right to consent before Ms. Abbott could take A.J. A. out of Chile. See Minors Law 16,618, art. 49 (Chile), (granting a ne exeat right to any parent with visitation rights). Justice Kennedy noted that in effect a ne exeat right imposes a duty on one parent that is a right in the other. After Mr. Abbott obtained a British passport for A.J. A., Ms. Abbott grew concerned that Mr. Abbott would take the boy to Britain. She sought and obtained a "ne exeat of the minor" order from the Chilean family court, prohibiting the boy from being taken out of Chile. In August 2005, while proceedings before the Chilean court were pending, the mother removed the boy from Chile without permission from either the father or the court. A private investigator located the mother and the child in Texas. In May 2006, Mr. Abbott filed an action in the United States District Court seeking an order requiring his son's return to Chile pursuant to the Convention and enforcement provisions of the ICARA.

In July 2007, after holding a bench trial during which only Mr. Abbott testified, the District Court denied relief. The court held that the father's ne exeat right did not constitute a right of custody under the Convention and, as a result, that the return remedy was not authorized. (495 F.Supp.2d 635, 640.)

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed on the same rationale. The court held the father possessed no rights of custody under the Convention because his ne exeat right was only "a veto right over his son's departure from Chile.". The court expressed substantial agreement with the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Croll v. Croll, 229 F.3d 133 (2000). Relying on American dictionary definitions of "custody" and noting that ne exeat rights cannot be "actually exercised" within the meaning of the Convention, Croll held that ne exeat rights are not rights of custody. A dissenting opinion in Croll was filed by then-Judge Sotomayor. The dissent maintained that a ne exeat right is a right of custody because it "provides a parent with decision making authority regarding a child's international relocation." The Courts of Appeals for the Fourth and Ninth Circuits adopted the conclusion of the Croll majority. See Fawcett v. McRoberts, 326 F.3d 491, 500

(C.A.4 2003); Gonzalez v. Gutierrez, 311 F.3d 942, 949 (C.A.9 2002). The Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit followed the reasoning of the Croll dissent. Furnes v. Reeves, 362 F.3d 702, 720, n. 15 (2004). Certiorari was granted to resolve the conflict. 557 U.S. ----, 129 S.Ct. 2859, 174 L.Ed.2d 575 (2009).

Justice Kennedy noted that the provisions of the Convention of most relevance at the outset of the discussion are as follows: "Article 3: The removal or the retention of the child is to be considered wrongful where— "a it is in breach of rights of custody attributed to a person, an institution or any other body, either jointly or alone, under the law of the State in which the child was habitually resident immediately before the removal or retention; and "b at the time of removal or retention those rights were actually exercised, either jointly or alone, or would have been so exercised but for the removal or retention.

"Article 5: For the purposes of this Convention— "a 'rights of custody' shall include rights relating to the care of the person of the child and, in particular, the right to determine the child's place of residence; "b 'rights of access' shall include the right to take a child for a limited period of time to a place other than the child's habitual residence.

He also noted that the Convention's central operating feature is the return remedy. When a child under the age of 16 has been wrongfully removed or retained, the country to which the child has been brought must "order the return of the child forthwith," unless certain exceptions apply. A removal is "wrongful" where the child was removed in violation of "rights of custody." The Convention defines "rights of custody" to "include rights relating to the care of the person of the child and, in particular, the right to determine the child's place of residence." Art. 5(a). A return remedy does not alter the pre--abduction allocation of custody rights but leaves custodial decisions to the courts of the country of habitual residence. Art. 19. The Convention also recognizes "rights of access," but offers no return remedy for a breach of those rights. Arts. 5(b), 21.

The parties agreed that the Convention applied to this dispute. A.J. A. was under 16 years old; he was a habitual resident of Chile; and both Chile and the United States are contracting states. The question was whether A.J. A. was "wrongfully removed" from Chile, in other words, whether he was removed in violation of a right of custody.

The Court's inquiry was shaped by the text of the Convention; the views of the United States Department of State; decisions addressing the meaning of "rights of custody" in courts of other contracting states; and the purposes of the Convention, which were all discussed in the opinion. After considering these sources, the Court determined that Mr. Abbott's ne exeat right is a right of custody under the Convention.

The Court consulted Chilean law to determine the content of Mr. Abbott's right, while following the Convention's text and structure to decide whether the right at issue is a "right[t] of custody." Chilean law granted Mr. Abbott a joint right to decide his child's country of residence, otherwise known as a ne exeat right. Minors Law 16,618, art. 49 (Chile), provides that "[o]nce the court has decreed" that one of the parents has visitation rights, that parent's "authorization ... shall also be required" before the child may be taken out of the country, subject to court override only where authorization "cannot be granted or is denied without good reason." Mr. Abbott had "direct and regular" visitation rights and it followed from Chilean law, that he had a shared right to determine his son's country of residence under this provision.

To support the conclusion that Mr. Abbott's right under Chilean law gave him a joint right to decide his son's country of residence, it was notable that a Chilean agency had explained that Minors Law 16,618 is a "right to authorize the minors' exit" from Chile and that this provision means that neither parent can "unilaterally" "establish the [child's] place of residence." (Citing Letter from Paula Strap Camus, Director General, Corporation of Judicial Assistance of the Region Metropolitana, to National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (Jan. 17, 2006), App. to Pet. for Cert. in Villegas Duran v. Arribada Beaumont, No. 08-775, pp. 35a-37a, cert. pending.)

Justice Kennedy stated that the Convention recognizes that custody rights can be decreed jointly or alone, see Art. 3(a); and Mr. Abbott's joint right to determine his son's country of residence was best classified as a joint right of custody, as the Convention defines that term. The Convention defines "rights of custody" to "include rights relating to the care of the person of the child and, in particular, the right to determine the child's place of residence." Art. 5(a). Mr. Abbott's ne exeat right gave him both the joint "right to determine the child's place of residence" and joint "rights relating to the care of the person of the child." Mr. Abbott's joint right to decide A.J. A.'s country of residence allowed him to "determine the child's place of residence." The Convention's protection of a parent's custodial "right to determine the child's place of residence" includes a ne exeat right. Mr. Abbott's joint right to determine A.J. A.'s country of residence also gives him "rights relating to the care of the person of the child." The Court of Appeals described Mr. Abbott's right to take part in making this decision as a mere "veto," 542 F.3d, at 1087; but even by that truncated description, the father had an essential role in deciding the boy's country of residence. For example, Mr. Abbott could condition his consent to a change in country on A.J. A.'s moving to a city outside Chile where Mr. Abbott could obtain an astronomy position, thus allowing the father to have continued contact with the boy.

Justice Kennedy indicated that it was "is beside the point" whether a ne exeat right does not fit within traditional notions of physical custody. The Convention defines "rights of custody," and it is that definition that a court must consult. This uniform, text-based approach ensures international consistency in interpreting the Convention. It forecloses courts from relying on definitions of custody confined by local law usage, definitions that may undermine recognition of custodial arrangements in other countries or in different legal traditions, including the civil-law tradition. The Court of Appeals' conclusion that a breach of a ne exeat right does not give rise to a return remedy would render the Convention meaningless in many cases where it is most needed. Any suggestion that a ne exeat right is a "right of access" is illogical and atextual.

Ms. Abbott contended that the Chilean court's ne exeat order contained no parental consent provision and so awarded the father no rights, custodial or otherwise). Justice Kennedy responded that even a ne exeat order issued to protect a court's jurisdiction pending issuance of further decrees is consistent with allowing a parent to object to the child's removal from the country. The Court did not decide the status of ne exeat orders lacking parental consent provisions, however; for here the father relied on his rights under Minors Law 16,618. Mr. Abbott's rights derived not from the order but from Minors Law 16,618. That law requires the father's consent before the mother can remove the boy from Chile, subject only to the equitable power family courts retain to override any joint custodial arrangements in times of disagreement. Minors Law 16,618; The consent provision in Minors Law 16,618 confers upon the father the joint right to determine his child's country of residence. This is a right of custody under the Convention.

Justice Kennedy noted that the "Perez-Vera Report", was cited by the parties and by Courts of Appeals that have considered this issue. (See 1980 Conference de La Haye de droit international prive, Enl & egrave; vement d'enfants, E. Perez-Vera, Explanatory Report (Perez-Vera Report or Report), in 3 Actes et Documents de la Quatorzi & egrave;me session, pp. 425- 473 (1982). Justice Kennedy stated that the Court need not decide whether this Report should be given greater weight than a scholarly commentary. He pointed out that the Hague International Child Abduction Convention; Text and Legal Analysis, 51 Fed.Reg. 10503-10506 (1986) identifying the Report as the "official history" of the Convention and "a source of background on the meaning of the provisions of the Convention", indicates that the Report had not been approved by the Conference, and it is possible that, despite the Rapporteur's [sic] efforts to remain objective, certain passages reflect a viewpoint which is in part subjective".

Justice Kennedy pointed out that while a parent possessing a ne exeat right has a right of custody and may seek a return remedy, a return order is not automatic. Return is not required if the abducting parent can establish that a Convention exception applies. One exception states return of the child is not required when "there is a grave risk that his or her return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation." Art. 13(b). If, for example, Ms. Abbott could demonstrate that returning to Chile would put her own safety at grave risk, the court could consider whether this is sufficient to show that the child too would suffer "psychological harm" or be placed "in an intolerable situation." The Convention also allows courts to decline to order removal if the child objects, if the child has reached a sufficient "age and degree of maturity at which it is appropriate to take account of its views." Art. 13(b). The proper interpretation and application of these and other exceptions are not before the Court. It stated that these matters may be addressed on remand. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed, and the case was remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion. Chief Judge Roberts and Justices Scalia, Ginsburg, Alito, and Sotomayor joined. Justice Stevens, with whom Justice Thomas and Justice Breyer joined, dissented in a separate opinion.

First Department Holds Prenuptial Agreement May Contain Enforceable Waiver of Interest in Retirement Assets.

In Strong v Dubin,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 1905004 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department found, in an opinion by Justice Andrias, that the parties' prenuptial agreement contained an enforceable waiver of defendant wife's interest in the marital portion of plaintiff husband's retirement assets. In analyzing this issue it revisited its determination in Richards v. Richards (232 AD2d 303, 303 [1996]), where the court had found that under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act 'only a spouse can waive spousal rights to employee plan benefits, that a fiancée is not a spouse, and that such rights, therefore, cannot be effectively waived in a prenuptial agreement.'

After entering into a prenuptial agreement, the parties were married on April 6, 1992. In 2005, plaintiff commenced this matrimonial action and defendant moved to have the prenuptial agreement set aside. The trial court denied defendant's motion. Defendant appealed and the Appellate Division affirmed (48 AD3d 232, 233 [2008]), finding, among other things, that '[d]efendant admitted that she read the agreement before signing it, and while she did not understand the 'legalese' (i.e., statutory references), she did understand that the parties' properties would remain separate.

While the prior appeal was pending, defendant moved for a declaratory judgment, or alternatively, discovery and a hearing, on her entitlement to certain assets, including plaintiff's retirement assets and the marital apartment. The motion court, relying on Richards v. Richards (232 AD2d 303 [1995], supra), found that there was no enforceable waiver of defendant's interest in the retirement assets and granted defendant's motion to the extent of ordering discovery and, if necessary, a hearing to determine (a) the value of the marital-property portion of plaintiff's retirement funds, to be divided among the parties by the percentages laid out in the prenuptial agreement; and (b) whether marital assets were used to purchase the apartment, rendering it marital property. The Appellate Division modified finding that contrary to the motion court's holding, the prenuptial agreement contained a valid waiver of defendant's interest in the marital portion of plaintiff's retirement assets.

Judge Andrias pointed out that Prenuptial agreements addressing the ownership, division or distribution of property must be read in conjunction with Domestic Relations Law 236(B), which provides that, unless the parties agree otherwise in a validly executed prenuptial agreement pursuant to section 236(B)(3), upon dissolution of the marriage, marital property must be distributed equitably between the parties, while separate property shall remain separate (see Domestic Relations Law 236[B] [5][a]-[c]). He also pointed out that as with all contracts, prenuptial agreements are construed in accord with the parties' intent, which is generally gleaned from what is expressed in their writing. The intent to override the rules of equitable distribution, whether by express waiver, or by specifically designating as separate property assets that would otherwise be considered marital property under New York law, must be clearly evidenced by the writing. When interpreting a prenuptial agreement 'the court should arrive at a construction that will give fair meaning to all of the language employed by the parties to reach a practical interpretation of the expressions of the parties so that their reasonable expectations will be realized. 'Particular words should be considered, not as if isolated from the context, but in the light of the obligation as a whole and the intention of the parties as manifested thereby. A contract should not be interpreted in such a way as would leave one of its provisions substantially without force or effect.

The court found that the parties' prenuptial agreement, read as a whole and giving effect to all provisions, expressed an intent to opt out of the statutory scheme governing equitable distribution, which encompassed plaintiff's retirement funds, pointing to the recitals to the prenuptial agreement and the various provisions of the agreement, which indicated their intention that the property owned by each of them shall remain separate. The Court noted that the agreement reflected an intent to opt out of equitable distribution 'with respect to the division of all marital and separate property either now in existence or which is hereafter acquired ' which encompassed the retirement funds at issue. To hold otherwise would render the reference to property that is 'hereafter acquired' meaningless, leaving that provision without force or effect.

Justice Andrias wrote that insofar as the Court's determination in Richards v. Richards (232 AD2d 303 [1996]) would preclude the waiver of pension rights in the event of divorce in a prenuptial agreement, it should not be followed in that it failed to recognize the distinction between waivers of survivor benefits and other pension benefits. For purposes of equitable distribution, a waiver of any interest in a pension as marital property by an otherwise valid prenuptial agreement is not prohibited by The Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) (29 USC 1001 et seq.), as amended by the Retirement Equity Act of 1984 (REA) (citing Moor-Jankowski, 222 AD2d at 423; Edmonds v. Edmonds, 184 Misc 2d 928 [Sup Ct, Onondaga County 2000]).

Court of Appeals Reaffirms Alison D, and Rejects Parenthood by Equitable Estoppel But Recognizes Partner As Parent By Giving Full Faith and Credit to Vermont Civil Union

In Debra H v Janice R, ___NY3d___, 2010 WL 1752168 (N.Y.) the Court of Appeals reaffirmed its holding in Alison D v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991]), that only a child's biological or adoptive parent has standing to seek visitation against the wishes of a fit custodial parent. It rejected the argument that Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D. (7 N.Y.3d 320 [2006]) endorsed a nonbiological or nonadoptive parent's right to invoke equitable estoppel to secure visitation or custody notwithstanding Alison D and held that Alison D., in conjunction with second-parent adoption, creates a bright-line rule that promotes certainty in the wake of domestic breakups. However, because Debra H. and Janice R. entered into a civil union in Vermont before M.R.'s birth, it reversed the Appellate Division's for reasons of comity, holding that Debra H. was M.R.'s parent under Vermont law and, as a matter of comity she was his parent under New York law as well, thereby conferring standing for her to seek visitation and custody in a best-interest hearing. The Court limited its ruling, which did not resolve whether New York extends comity to the civil union for other purposes. It decided only that New York will recognize parentage created by a civil union in Vermont.

Respondent Janice R. was the biological mother of M.R., a six-year old boy conceived through artificial insemination and born in December 2003. Janice R. and petitioner Debra H. met in 2002 and entered into a civil union in the State of Vermont in November 2003, the month before M.R.'s birth. Janice R. repeatedly rebuffed Debra H.'s requests to become M.R.'s second parent by means of adoption. After the relationship between Janice R. and Debra H. soured and they separated in the spring of 2006, Janice R. allowed Debra H. to have supervised visits with M.R. each week. After a while Janice R. began scaling back the visits and then cut off all communication between Debra H. and M.R. Debra H. brought a proceeding against Janice R. in Supreme Court for joint legal and physical custody of M.R., restoration of access and decision making authority with respect to his upbringing, and appointment of an attorney for the child. At the hearing Debra H. acknowledged the decision in Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991]), which held that only a child's biological or adoptive parent has standing to seek visitation against the wishes of a fit custodial parent, but contended that Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D. (7 N.Y.3d 320 [2006]) endorsed a nonbiological or nonadoptive parent's right to invoke equitable estoppel to secure visitation or custody notwithstanding Alison D. In support of this interpretation of our precedents, Debra H. emphasized that Shondel J. cited Jean Maby H. v. Joseph H. (246 A.D.2d 282, 676 N.Y.S.2d 677 [2d Dept 1998]), a divorce proceeding in which the husband successfully invoked equitable estoppel to seek custody and visitation with a child born to the wife prior to the marriage, whom he neither fathered nor adopted. Debra H. also urged Supreme Court to consider the effect of the parties' civil union, and alluded to the Vermont Supreme Court's decision in Miller-Jenkins v. Miller-Jenkins (180 Vt. 441, 912 A.2d 951 [2006], cert denied 550 U.S. 918 [2007]). Janice R. stressed that she had always spurned Debra H.'s entreaties to permit a second-parent adoption. She argued, among other things, that Alison D., which interpreted Domestic Relations Law 70, was not eroded or overruled by Shondel J.

Supreme Court ruled in Debra H.'s favor. The judge reasoned that "it [was] inconsistent to estop a nonbiological father from disclaiming paternity in order to avoid support obligations, but preclude a nonbiological parent from invoking [equitable estoppel] against the biological parent in order to maintain an established relationship with the child" since, in either event, "the court's primary concern should be furthering the best interests of the child". Supreme Court concluded that the facts alleged by Debra H., if true, "establish[ed] a prima facie basis for invoking the doctrine of equitable estoppel." In this regard, the judge considered the parties' civil union to be "a significant, though not necessarily a determinative, factor in [Debra H.'s] estoppel argument" because, under Vermont law, "parties to a civil union are given the same benefits, protections and responsibilities . . . as are granted to those in a marriage," which "includes the assumption that the birth of a child during a couple's legal union is 'extremely persuasive evidence of joint parentage' " (quoting Miller-Jenkins, 180 Vt. at 466, 912 A.2d at 971). Because of the many contested facts, however, Supreme Court ordered another hearing to resolve whether Debra H. stood in loco parentis to M.R., as she asserted, and therefore possessed standing to seek visitation and custody.

Janice R. appealed, and obtained a stay of the equitable-estoppel hearing ordered by Supreme Court, pending disposition of the appeal. On April 9, 2009, the Appellate Division unanimously reversed on the law, vacated Supreme Court's order, denied the petition, and dismissed the proceeding. The court acknowledged that while the "record indicate[d] that [Debra H.] served as a loving and caring parental figure during the first 2 ½ years of [M.R.'s] life, she never legally adopted [him]" and, in accordance with Alison D., "a party who is neither the biological nor the adoptive parent of a child lacks standing to seek custody or visitation rights under Domestic Relations Law 70" (61 AD3d 460, 461 [1st Dept 2009]). The Appellate Division commented that, to the extent that denial of any right to equitable estoppel in this case might be considered inconsistent with Shondel J. and Jean Maby H., its own "reading of precedent was such that the doctrine of equitable estoppel may not be invoked where a party lacks standing to assert at least a right to visitation".

The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Read, reaffirmed its holding in Alison D., but reversed the Appellate Division's order in this case for reasons of comity in light of Debra H.'s status as M.R.'s parent under Vermont law. She pointed out that in Alison D., the court decided that DRL section 70 does not confer standing on a biological stranger to seek visitation with a child in the custody of a fit parent. Domestic Relations Law § 70(a) provides, in part, that "[w]here a minor child is residing within this state, either parent may apply to the supreme court for a writ of habeas corpus to have such minor child brought before such court; and on the return thereof, the court, on due consideration, may award the natural guardianship, charge and custody of such child to either parent for such time, under such regulations and restrictions, and with such provisions and directions, as the case may require, and may at any time thereafter vacate or modify such order.

The Court rejected Debra H.'s argument that the court should exercise what she characterized as longstanding common law and equitable powers to recognize the parentage of a nonbiological, nonadoptive individual on a theory of equitable estoppel and in the child's best interest. She asked the court to revisit and either distinguish or overrule Alison D., a case that closely resembled this one factually.

Judge Read explained that in that case Alison D., the former romantic partner of Virginia M., petitioned for visitation with Virginia M.'s child under Domestic Relations Law s 70. According to Alison D., she and Virginia M. established a relationship, began living together, and decided to have a child whom Virginia M. would conceive through artificial insemination. They agreed to share all parenting responsibilities, and continued to do so for the first two years of the child's life. When the child was about 2 ½ years old, however, the parties ended their relationship and Alison D. moved out of the family home. The parties adhered to a visitation schedule for a time, but Virginia M. at first restricted and eventually stopped Alison D.'s contact with the child. In that case the Court rejected Alison D.'s argument that she "acted as a 'de facto' parent or that she should be viewed as a parent 'by estoppel' " (Alison D., 77 N.Y.2d at 656, 569 N.Y.S.2d 586, 572 N.E.2d 27). The rationale of the Court in Alison D was that "[t]raditionally, in this State it is the child's mother and father who, assuming fitness, have the right to the care and custody of their child, even in situations where the nonparent has exercised some control over the child with the parents' consent ... To allow the courts to award visitation--a limited form of custody--to a third person would necessarily impair the parents' right to custody and control" (id. at 656-657, 569 N.Y.S.2d 586, 572 N.E.2d 27). Because Alison D. conceded that Virginia M. was a fit parent, she had no right to petition the court to displace the choice made by the fit parent in deciding what is in the child's best interests. The Court emphasized that where the Legislature deemed it appropriate, it gave other categories of persons standing to seek visitation and it gave the courts the power to determine whether an award of visitation would be in the child's best interests" . Thus, it refused to read the term parent in section 70 to include categories of nonparents who have developed a relationship with a child or who have had prior relationships with a child's parents and who wish to continue visitation with the child. Judge Read noted that the in its decision in Alison D., the Court cited Matter of Bennett v. Jeffreys (40 N.Y.2d 543 [1976]) and Matter of Ronald FF. v. Cindy GG. (70 N.Y.2d 141 [1987]), cases which set forth bedrock principles of family law. In Bennett, the Court held that the State "may not deprive a parent of the custody of a child absent surrender, abandonment, persisting neglect, unfitness or other like extraordinary circumstances". Where extraordinary circumstances are present, the court determines custody based on the child's best interest. Concomitantly, in Ronald FF., it held that "[v]isitation rights may not be granted on the authority of the ... Bennett ... extraordinary circumstances rule, to a biological stranger where the child, born out of wedlock, is properly in the custody of his mother"; and further noted that the mother possessed a fundamental right "to choose those with whom her child associates," which the State may not "interfere with ... unless it shows some compelling State purpose which furthers the child's best interests".

Judge Read rejected Debra H.'s argument that the Court implicitly departed from Alison D. in Shondel J., where there were affirmed findings of fact that Mark D. had held himself out as the child's biological father, and had treated her as his daughter for the first 4 ½ years of her life. When Shondel J. sought orders of filiation and support, Mark D. requested DNA testing. The Family Court hearing examiner ordered genetic marker tests, which revealed that Mark D. was not the child's biological father. Shondel J. was an unusual case because "the process was inverted": "The procedure contemplated by sections 418(a) and 532(a) of the Family Court Act is that Family Court should consider paternity by estoppel before it decides whether to test for biological paternity". The Court held in Shondel J. that "a man who has mistakenly represented himself as a child's father may be estopped from denying paternity, and made to pay child support, when the child justifiably relied on the man's representation of paternity, to the child's detriment". The Court premised its decision on "our precedents, the affirmed findings of fact and the legislative recognition of paternity by estoppel". On the latter point, it highlighted that although paternity by estoppel for purposes of child support "originated in case law," it was "now secured by statute in New York"; namely, sections 418(a) and 532(a) of the Family Court Act.

Judge Read pointed out that the Court did not mention Alison D. in Shondel J. Nor did it intend to signal disaffection with Alison D. by citing Jean Maby H., one of a handful of lower court decisions applying equitable estoppel to custody and visitation proceedings despite Alison D., where it considered and explicitly rejected this approach. The holding in Shondel J. was limited to the context in which that case arose--the procedure for determining the paternity of an "alleged father." The Court saw no inconsistency in applying equitable estoppel to determine filiation for purposes of support, but not to create standing when visitation and custody are sought. The Legislature has drawn the distinction in sections 418(a) and 532(a) of the Family Court Act which direct the courts to take equitable estoppel into account before ordering paternity testing, while section 70 of the Domestic Relations Law does not even mention equitable estoppel.

The Court rejected Debra H.'s request to replace the bright-line rule in Alison D. with a complicated and non-objective test for determining so-called functional or de facto parentage. The Court stated that the flexible type of rule championed by Debra H. threatens to trap single biological and adoptive parents and their children in a limbo of doubt. These parents could not possibly know for sure when another adult's level of involvement in family life might reach the tipping point and jeopardize their right to bring up their children without the unwanted participation of a third party. It found significant that the interest of parents in the care, custody, and control of their children is perhaps the oldest of the fundamental liberty interests recognized by" the United States Supreme Court (citing Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 65 [2000]). Courts must be sensible of "the traditional presumption that a fit parent will act in the best interest of his or her child" and protect the parent's "fundamental constitutional right to make decisions concerning the rearing of" that child. In the Courts view, this fundamental right entitled biological and adoptive parents to refuse to allow a second-parent adoption, as Janice R. did, even if they have permitted or encouraged another adult to become a virtual parent of the child, as Debra H. insisted was the case here.

The Court of Appeals agreed with Janice R. that any change in the meaning of "parent" under our law should come by way of legislative enactment rather than judicial revamping of precedent. Whether to expand the standing to seek visitation and/or custody beyond what sections 70, 71 and 72 of the Domestic Relations Law currently encompass remains a subject for the Legislature's consideration. The Courts reaffirmation of Alison D. did not dispose of this case, because Debra H. and Janice R. entered into a civil union in Vermont before M.R.'s birth. This circumstance presented two issues: (1) whether Debra H. was M.R.'s parent under Vermont law and, (2) in the event that she is, whether as a matter of comity she is his parent under New York law as well, thereby conferring standing for her to seek visitation and custody in a best-interest hearing.

Judge Read explained that Vermont's civil union statute provides that parties to a civil union shall have "all the same benefits, protections and responsibilities under law ... as are granted to spouses in a marriage" (Vt Stat Ann tit 15, 1204[a]); and that they shall enjoy the same rights "with respect to a child of whom either becomes the natural parent during the term of the civil union," as "those of a married couple" (Vt Stat Ann tit 15, 1204[f]). In Miller-Jenkins, the Vermont Supreme Court relied upon these provisions to hold that a child born by artificial insemination to one partner of a civil union should be deemed the other partner's child under Vermont law for purposes of determining custodial rights following the civil union's dissolution (Miller-Jenkins, 180 Vt. at 464-465, 912 A.2d at 969-970). The court concluded that in the context of marriage, a child born by artificial insemination was deemed the child of the husband even absent a biological connection. In light of section 1204 and by parity of reasoning, the court decided that the same result pertained to the partner in the civil union with no biological connection to the child.

Judge Read noted that the potential legal ramifications in New York of entering into a civil union in Vermont were uncertain in 2003, and remain unsettled except to the extent the Court resolves the specific issue--i.e., parentage--presented by this case. Whatever her motivation or expectation, Janice R. chose to travel to Vermont to enter into a civil union with Debra H. In light of the Miller-Jenkins decision, the Court concluded that Debra H. was M.R.'s parent under Vermont law as a result of that choice.

The next question was whether New York courts should accord comity to Vermont and recognize Debra H. as M.R.'s parent under New York law as well. Judge Read explained that the doctrine of comity "does not of its own force compel a particular course of action. Rather, it is an expression of one State's entirely voluntary decision to defer to the policy of another. Such a decision may be perceived as promoting uniformity of decision, as encouraging harmony among participants in a system of co-operative federalism, or as merely an expression of hope for reciprocal advantage in some future case in which the interests of the forum are more critical" (citing Ehrlich-Bober & Co. v. University of Houston, 49 N.Y.2d 574, 580 [1980]). New York's "determination of whether effect is to be given foreign legislation is made by comparing it to our own public policy; and our policy prevails in case of conflict". The court locates the public policy of the state in "the law as expressed in statute and judicial decision" and also considers "the prevailing attitudes of the community". Even in the case of a conflict, however, New York's public policy may yield "in the face of a strong assertion of interest by the other jurisdiction" . The Court noted that New York will accord comity to recognize parentage created by an adoption in a foreign nation (citing see L.M.B. v. E.R.J., 2010 N.Y. Slip Op 01345, *4-5 [2010] [comity may be extended to a Cambodian adoption certificate so that an individual who is a child's father under Cambodian law is also his father under New York law]). It saw no reason to withhold equivalent recognition where someone is a parent under a sister state's law. Janice R., as was her right as M .R.'s biological parent, did not agree to let Debra H. adopt

M.R. But the availability of second-parent adoption to New Yorkers of the same sex negates any suggestion that recognition of parentage based on a Vermont civil union would conflict with our State's public policy. Nor would comity undermine the certainty that Alison D. promises biological and adoptive parents and their children: whether there has been a civil union in Vermont is as determinable as whether there has been a second-parent adoption. And both civil union and adoption require the biological or adoptive parent's legal consent, as opposed to the indeterminate implied consent featured in the various tests proposed to establish de facto or functional parentage. The Court commented that the decision does not lead to protracted litigation over standing and is consistent with New York's public policy by affording predictability to parents and children alike. The Court limited its ruling, which did not resolve whether New York extends comity to the civil union for other purposes. It decided only that New York will recognize parentage created by a civil union in Vermont. The determination that Debra H. was M.R.'s parent allowed her to seek visitation and custody at a best-interest hearing. There, she will have to establish facts demonstrating a relationship with M.R. that warrants an award in her favor.

The order of the Appellate Division was reversed, and the case remitted to Supreme Court for a best-interest hearing in accordance with this opinion.

Judge Graffeo concurred with Judge Read's analysis as well as the result she reached in a separate concurring opinion in which Judge Jones concurred. She wrote separately to explain why she believed the decision in Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991]) must be reaffirmed. Judge Ciparick, concurred in the result in an opinion in which Chief Judge Lippman concurred. She agreed with the majority that principles of comity require the recognition of Debra H.'s parentage of M.R. because of the Vermont civil union between the parties, but wrote separately to set forth her view that Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991] should be overruled as outmoded and unworkable. Judge Smith concurred in the result in an opinion.

Court of Appeals Holds Equitable Estoppel May Be Used by Biological Father to Prevent Child's Mother from Asserting Biological Paternity, When Mother Has Acquiesced in the Development of a Close Relationship Between the Child and Another Father Figure, and it Would Be Detrimental to the Child's Interests to Disrupt That Relationship.

In Matter of Juanita A, v Kenneth Mark N., ___NY3d___, 2010 WL 1752194 (N.Y.) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Pigott, held that under the circumstances of this case, where another father-figure is present in the child's life, a biological father may assert an equitable estoppel defense in paternity and child support proceedings. The doctrine of equitable estoppel may be used by a purported biological father to prevent a child's mother from asserting biological paternity, when the mother has acquiesced in the development of a close relationship between the child and another father figure, and it would be detrimental to the child's interests to disrupt that relationship.

On June 25, 1994, the child, A., was born. At the time, mother was unmarried, but living with Raymond S., who was listed as A.'s father on her birth certificate. The Mother and Raymond had a previous child together and, after the birth of A., had another child. When A. was seven years old, during a family dispute, she became aware that Raymond may not be her biological father. At that time, the mother called Kenneth at his home in Florida and had him speak with A. The conversation lasted less than ten minutes, during which time A. asked questions concerning his physical characteristics. Kenneth's attempt to speak with A. a second time was rebuffed by Raymond, who warned Kenneth not to speak to A. again. Kenneth had no further contact with A. In 2006, when A. was approximately twelve years old, the mother filed a petition against Kenneth, seeking an order of filiation and child support. Kenneth appeared before Family Court for the first time by way of telephone. Kenneth agreed to the ordered genetic marker testing, which indicated a 99.99% probability that Kenneth was A.'s biological father. When the issue of equitable estoppel was raised by Kenneth, the Magistrate, lacking the authority to hear that issue, transferred the case to a Judge of the Family Court. That court, determining the issue on motion papers and oral argument, held that Kenneth was the father of A. and entered an order of filiation.

The Appellate Division affirmed, holding that the doctrine of equitable estoppel is applicable in paternity proceedings only where it is invoked to further the best interests of the child, and "generally is not available to a party seeking to disavow the allegation of parenthood for the purpose of avoiding child support" (63 AD3d 1662 [4th Dept 2009]). Judge Pigott pointed out that in Shondel J. v. Mark D. (7 N.Y.3d 320 [2006]), the Court set forth the law applicable to equitable estoppel in paternity and child support proceedings. The Court noted there that the "purpose of equitable estoppel is to preclude a person from asserting a right after having led another to form the reasonable belief that the right would not be asserted, and loss or prejudice to the other would result if the right were asserted. The law imposes the doctrine as a matter of fairness. Its purpose is to prevent someone from enforcing rights that would work injustice on the person against whom enforcement is sought and who, while justifiably relying on the opposing party's actions, has been misled into a detrimental change of position." It concluded that the "paramount" concern in such cases "has been and continues to be the best interests of the child".

Judge Pigott stated that equitable estoppel has been used, as it was in Shondel J., to prevent a man from avoiding child support by claiming that he is not the child's biological father. In such a case, the man has represented himself to be the child's father and the child's best interests are served by a declaration of fatherhood. The doctrine in this way protects the status interests of a child in an already recognized and operative parent-child relationship. Here, Kenneth sought to invoke the doctrine against mother, who led Kenneth to form the reasonable belief that he was not a father and that Raymond was A.'s father. He argued that it was not in A.'s best interest to have her current, child-father relationship with Raymond interrupted.

At the time the petition was brought, A. was 12 years old and had lived in an intact family with Raymond and her mother. His name appeared on her birth certificate and he was the biological father of her older and younger siblings. For most of A.'s life, she referred to Raymond as father. Thus, Kenneth appropriately raised an issue as to whether it was in A.'s best interest to have someone besides Raymond declared her father this late in her childhood.

The Court concluded it was proper for him to assert a claim of estoppel to, among other things, protect the status of that parent-child relationship. The Court disagreed with the Law Guardian's position that a person who has already been determined to be a child's biological father cannot raise an equitable estoppel argument. The doctrine has been used to prevent a biological father from asserting paternity rights when it would be detrimental to the child's interests to disrupt the child's close relationship with another father figure. The same best-interests considerations that justify estopping a biological father from asserting his paternity may justify preventing a mother from asserting it. Whether it is being used in the offensive posture to enforce rights or the defensive posture to prevent rights from being enforced, equitable estoppel is only to be used to protect the best interests of the child. Therefore, the Court held that the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be used by a purported biological father to prevent a child's mother from asserting biological paternity, when the mother has acquiesced in the development of a close relationship between the child and another father figure, and it would be detrimental to the child's interests to disrupt that relationship.

The Court concluded that a hearing was needed to decide the merits of Kenneth's claim. At that hearing, Raymond had to be joined as a necessary party, so that Family Court may consider the nature of his relationship with the child and make a proper determination of A.'s best interests. It remitted the matter to Family Court for such a hearing and determination.

In a footnote Judge Pigott pointed out that Family Court should have addressed the equitable estoppel issue prior to directing that Kenneth undergo genetic marker tests. The fact that testing was conducted, however, does not bar the court from thereafter deciding the estoppel issue, as Shondel itself held.

Court of Appeals Holds Family Court Has Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Adjudicate Support Petition Brought Pursuant to "UIFSA" by Biological Parent Seeking Child Support from Former Same-sex Partner.

In the Matter of H.M. v. E.T. ___NY3d___, 48 opn 10 (2010) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Ciparek, held that the Family Court has subject matter jurisdiction to adjudicate a support petition brought pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act ("UIFSA") (Family Ct Act art 5-B) by a biological parent seeking child support from her former same-sex partner. The Court concluded that because H.M. asserted that E.T. was the child's parent, and was chargeable with the child's support, the case was within the Family Court's Article 4 jurisdiction. It did not decide whether it was also, as the Support Magistrate and the Appellate Division dissent concluded, within that Court's Article 5 jurisdiction. Nor did it decide the merits of H.M.'s support claim.

H.M. sought child support from E.T. According to H.M.'s allegations, which the court took as true for present purposes, the parties were involved in a romantic relationship in New York from 1989 through 1995, and cohabited during much, if not all, of that period. During the first year of their relationship, they planned to conceive and raise a child together, discussing available methods of conception, child-rearing practices, and whether the child would be raised as a sibling of E.T.'s children from a prior relationship. In 1993, after many failed attempts, H.M. became pregnant by artificial insemination. E.T. performed the procedure by which H.M. was inseminated. H.M. gave birth to a son in September 1994. E.T. was present at the delivery and cut the umbilical cord, and the parties shared the expenses associated with the conception and birth of the child. After the child's birth, both parties participated in his care. However, four months after the child was born, E.T. ended the relationship. H.M., a Canadian citizen, moved into her parents' residence in Montreal with the child. An attempted reconciliation in 1997 failed, although E.T. continued to provide H.M. with gifts for the child and monetary contributions for the child's care at unspecified times after the parties' separation.

In 2006, H.M. filed an application in Ontario, Canada, seeking a declaration of parentage and an order of child support establishing monthly payments retroactive to the child's birth. Pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), H.M.'s application was transferred to Family Court, Rockland County.

At an appearance before a Family Court Support Magistrate, E.T. moved to dismiss the petition on jurisdictional grounds. The Support Magistrate dismissed the petition, agreeing with E.T. that no legal basis for jurisdiction existed. H.M. filed written objections to the Support Magistrate's order, and Family Court subsequently reversed the order of dismissal and ordered a hearing to determine whether E.T. should be equitably estopped from denying parentage and support obligations. E.T. appealed. The Appellate Division, with two Justices dissenting, reversed and reinstated the Support Magistrate's order dismissing the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction (see Matter of H.M. v E.T., 65 AD3d 119 [1st Dept 2009]). H.M. appealed as of right pursuant to CPLR 5601 (a) from the Appellate Division order reinstating the Support Magistrate's order of dismissal, and the Court of Appeals reversed.

Judge Ciparek pointed out that in 1996, the United States Congress required each state to enact the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), to ensure uniformity in interstate actions for the establishment, enforcement, and modification of spousal and child support orders (see 42 USC § 666 [f]; Matter of Spencer v Spencer, 10 NY3d 60, 65 [2008]). New York adopted UIFSA in 1997, designating Family Court as our UIFSA "tribunal" (see Family Ct Act § 580-102 ["The family court is the tribunal of this state."]).

With respect to the law to be applied by Family Court, UIFSA states that "Except as otherwise provided by this article, a responding tribunal of this state: (1) shall apply the procedural and substantive law, including the rules on choice of law, generally applicable to similar proceedings originating in this state and may exercise all powers and provide all remedies available in those proceedings; and (2) shall determine the duty of support and the amount payable in accordance with the law and support guidelines of this state"(Family Court Act § 580-303).

Article VI of the state Constitution establishes "[t]he family court of the state of New York" (NY Const., art VI, § 13 [a]). Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction, constrained to exercise only those powers granted to it by the state Constitution or by statute (see Matter of Johna M.S. v Russell E.S., 10 NY3d 364, 366 [2008]). Thus, in addition to establishing Family Court, the Constitution enumerates the powers thereof. Among the "classes of actions and proceedings" over which the Constitution grants Family Court jurisdiction are proceedings to determine "the support of dependents except for support incidental to actions and proceedings in this state for marital separation, divorce, annulment of marriage or dissolution of marriage" (NY Const., art VI, § 13 [b] [4]).

Article 4 of the Family Court Act more specifically defines Family Court's role with respect to support. Family Court Act § 413 [1] [a] provides, among other things, that "the parents of a child under the age of twenty-one years are chargeable with the support of such child and, if possessed of sufficient means or able to earn such means, shall be required to pay for child support a fair and reasonable sum as the court may determine".

Judge Ciparek held that Family Court indisputably has jurisdiction to determine whether an individual parent, regardless of gender, is responsible for the support of a child (see Family Court Act § 413 [1] [a]). Moreover, statutory jurisdiction, as Family Court has, carries with it such ancillary jurisdiction as is necessary to fulfill the court's core function. Thus, because Family Court unquestionably has the subject matter jurisdiction to ascertain the support obligations of a female parent, Family Court also has the inherent authority to ascertain in certain cases whether a female respondent is, in fact, a child's parent. Article 4 of the Family Court Act establishes the public policy of the State in favor of obligating individuals, regardless of gender, to provide support for their children.

The dissent argued that such relief can be afforded only in Supreme Court, a court of original trial jurisdiction. However, family Court and Supreme Court have co-extensive authority, concurrent jurisdiction, in relation to child support matters. The Domestic Relations Law and the Family Court Act are identical in the establishment of statewide child support guidelines applicable to all child support proceedings, whether brought initially in Family Court or brought in Supreme Court as ancillary to a matrimonial action or custody proceeding. Moreover, under the guidelines adopted in New York as the Child Support Standards Act (L 1989, ch 567), both parents have an obligation to contribute to the economic well-being of their children. The relevant co-extensive statutes, Family Court Act § 413 and Domestic Relations Law § 240, are capable of being enforced in a fashion that does not disadvantage a litigant in Family Court.

The Court concluded that because H.M. asserted that E.T. was the child's parent, and was chargeable with the child's support, this case was within the Family Court's Article 4 jurisdiction. It did not decide whether it was also, as the Support Magistrate and the Appellate Division dissent concluded, within that Court's Article 5 jurisdiction. Nor did it decide the merits of H.M.'s support claim.

Chief Judge Lippman and Judges Smith and Pigott concurred, Judge Smith in a separate concurring opinion. Judge Jones dissented and voted to affirm in an opinion in which Judges Graffeo and Read concurred.

Court of Appeals Holds Egregious Misconduct Must Be an Exceptional Situation, Due to Outrageous or Conscience-shocking Conduct. Absent Those Circumstances, Liberal Discovery on Issues of Marital Fault, Should Not Ordinarily Be Permitted.

In Howard S v Lillian S, ___NY3d ___, No. 71 (2010) the plaintiff husband and defendant wife were married in May 1997. Defendant had one child from a previous relationship, who was later adopted by plaintiff. Three other children were born during the marriage. The youngest child, born in 2004, was the product of an extramarital affair between defendant and an unidentified man. Plaintiff, unaware of his wife's infidelity until the child was over three years old, raised that child as his own. Plaintiff alleged that, although defendant knew or should have known that the child was not plaintiff's, she withheld that information from him. In 2007, defendant allegedly commenced another extramarital affair with an individual who was initially named as a co-respondent in this action. Plaintiff confronted defendant with his suspicions of her infidelity, but she denied that she was unfaithful. Defendant maintained that there were no grounds for divorce and the parties entered into the collaborative law process at her suggestion. Several months later, plaintiff obtained the results of a DNA marker test revealing that he was not the biological father of the youngest child. Soon thereafter, plaintiff commenced an action for divorce, based on cruel and inhuman treatment and adultery, and he interposed a cause of action for fraud. The fraud allegations stated that defendant represented that she had been faithful to plaintiff and that he continued to participate in the marriage in reliance upon those representations to his financial detriment. He sought to recover damages under the fraud claim based upon costs he incurred due to defendant's failure to disclose her adultery. Plaintiff sought equitable distribution of the marital property, alleging that the bulk of the property should be awarded to him due to defendant's egregious fault. Defendant moved to dismiss or sever the fraud cause of action and plaintiff cross-moved for liberal discovery relating to his fraud claim and to the issue of defendant's egregious fault for purposes of equitable distribution. Supreme Court denied defendant's motion to dismiss and found that the complaint stated a cause of action for fraud, but limited plaintiff's available damages to his pecuniary loss in the form of collaborative law process fees. The court also denied plaintiff's cross motion for liberal discovery, finding that defendant's actions did not rise to the level of egregious fault. A majority of the Appellate Division affirmed, agreeing that defendant's behavior did not constitute egregious fault such that it could be considered for purposes of equitable distribution (62 AD3d 187 [1st Dept 2009]). The Court further found that plaintiff could only pursue his claims of actual pecuniary loss under the fraud cause of action and rejected the claims for lost profits, child support and punitive damages.

The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Lippman, affirmed noting that Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (5) (d) sets forth the factors a court must consider when making an equitable distribution award. The statute does not specifically provide for consideration of marital fault, but does contain a catch-all provision that allows a court to consider "any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper" (Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5][d][14]). He explained that in O'Brien v O'Brien, 66 NY2d 576, 589-590 [1985] the Court had previously rejected the notion that marital fault is a "just and proper" factor for consideration, except in egregious cases which shock the conscience of the court, This rule is based, in part, upon the recognition that marriage is, among other things, an economic partnership and that the marital estate should be divided accordingly. In O'Brien the Court also observed that "fault will usually be difficult to assign and that introduction of the issue may involve the courts in time-consuming procedural maneuvers relating to collateral issues. Judge Lippman observed that although the Court of Appeals had not had occasion to further define egregious conduct, courts have agreed that adultery, on its own, does not ordinarily suffice. This makes sense because adultery is a ground for divorce, a basis for ending the marital relationship, not for altering the nature of the economic partnership.

The Court of Appeals held that, at a minimum, in order to have any significance at all, egregious conduct must consist of behavior that falls well outside the bounds of the basis for an ordinary divorce action. This is not to say that there can never be a situation where grounds for divorce and egregious conduct will overlap. However, it should be only a truly exceptional situation, due to outrageous or conscience-shocking conduct on the part of one spouse, that will require the court to consider whether to adjust the equitable distribution of the assets. The Court cited, as examples, a case involving the attempted bribery of the trial judge and a case involving a vicious assault of spouse in presence of the children. Absent these types of extreme circumstances, courts are not in the business of regulating how spouses treat one another. In a footnote the Court pointed out that to the extent that the Appellate Division opinion can be read to limit egregious conduct to behavior involving extreme violence, the definition should not be so restrictive.

The majority opinion appears to have adopted the rule of the First and Second Departments that a party is not entitled to discovery on the issue of fault. Judge Lippman pointed out that although CPLR 3101 provides for "full disclosure of all matter material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action," Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B)(5)(d) is the specific statutory provision that governs equitable distribution in marital actions. He explained despite the general policy in favor of liberal discovery, the Court has interpreted the more specific section of the Domestic Relations Law to allow for consideration of marital fault in only a limited set of circumstances involving egregious conduct. In the absence of those circumstances, liberal discovery on issues of marital fault, at variance with O'Brien, should not ordinarily be permitted, though there may be exceptions in rare circumstances. The rationale behind this conclusion was that despite the availability of protective orders, if courts were to consider these matters on a case by case basis, there remains significant potential for abuse and harassment as a result of such discovery, as well as the possibility that parties will be induced to enter into disadvantageous settlements rather than litigate these types of intensely personal issues.

Judge Pigott dissented in an opinion. In his view it was premature to rule that wife's behavior did not, as a matter of law, constitute egregious misconduct for purpose of equitable distribution under the Domestic Relations Law. Therefore, the husband was entitled to discovery on his claim. He commented that the majority had implicitly accepted the view of the First and Second Departments that a party is required to make a motion for discovery on the issue of fault, and that he (citing Ginsberg v Ginsberg, 104 AD2d 482 [2d Dept 1984] and McMahan v McMahan, 100 AD2d 826 [1st Dept 1984]) disagreed with this approach. He took the view of the Third and Fourth Departments which have no general prohibition of pretrial discovery on fault, relying on a liberal discovery rule (citing Nigro v Nigro, 121 AD2d 833 [3d Dept 1986] and Lemke v Lemke, 100 AD2d 735 [4th Dept 1984]). Under that rule, the husband would be entitled to discovery on the issue of fault, with the court overseeing and preventing abuses by asserting its protective power in CPLR 3101 authorizing the court to issue a protective order to prevent unreasonable annoyance, expense, embarrassment, disadvantage, or other prejudice to any person or the courts.

Physician's Office Records, Supported by the Statutory Foundations Set Forth in Cplr 4518(a), Are Admissible in Evidence as Business Records

In Matter of Fortunato v Murray, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 1498628 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother filed a petition claiming that the father was willfully in arrears of child support and the father filed a petition for a downward modification. At a hearing before a Support Magistrate, the father sought to admit certified medical records in support of his contention that he was medically disabled and could not work. The Support Magistrate refused to admit any medical records on the ground that such documents were hearsay. Thereafter the Support Magistrate dismissed the petition with prejudice. The Family Court denied his objection, stating "[the father] objects to the Support Magistrate's order on the grounds that the doctor's records dated July 8, 2008, which the Support Magistrate did not allow into evidence should have been admitted into evidence. The Support Magistrate denied petitioner's request based on the fact that the records are hearsay as they deprive respondent of the right to confront the witness. This Court agrees. The [father] refers to CPLR 4518(a). This section refers to business records, not doctors office records or notes." The Appellate Division held that contrary to the Family Court's general statement of the applicable law, "[a] physician's office records, supported by the statutory foundations set forth in CPLR 4518(a), are admissible in evidence as business records. However, medical reports, as opposed to day-to-day business entries of a treating physician, are not admissible as business records where they contain the doctor's opinion or expert proof" (Matter of Bronstein-Becher v. Becher, 25 AD3d 796, 797 [internal quotation marks and citations omitted]; see Batts v. Rutrick, 298 A.D.2d 417; Napolitano v. Branks, 141 A.D.2d 705, 705-706). Moreover, a physician's office records "may be received as evidence despite the fact that a physician is available to testify as to the substance and contents of the records" (Napolitano v. Branks, 141 A.D.2d at 705-706; see Clarke v. New York City Tr. Auth., 174 A.D.2d 268). It remitted the matter to the Family Court, for a review by the Support Magistrate of the subject medical documents in light of and pursuant to the aforementioned standard as to admissibility.

Third Department Distinguishes Bush and Finds Exception to Rule That Absent Stipulation No Pendente Lite Counsel Fee Award Without A Hearing

In Lang v Lang, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 1375285 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1991 and had two minor children. Plaintiff commenced a divorce action in 2003. In 2004 and 2007, plaintiff was awarded interim counsel fees from defendant in the total amount of $50,000. In May 2008, plaintiff moved, in part, seeking an upward modification of pendente lite maintenance and support and also sought an additional award of interim counsel fees in the amount of $50,000. Without conducting a hearing, Supreme Court denied all relief sought, but granted plaintiff interim counsel fees in the amount of $25,000. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that in support of her application, plaintiff argued that additional counsel fees were required as a result of defendant's lack of cooperation in providing discovery, and the additional amount would be sufficient to take the case through the trial of this action. Plaintiff provided Supreme Court with counsel's billing history. Defendant took issue with certain fees charged by plaintiff's counsel, and disagreed with the assertion that he failed to provide discovery. He asserted that plaintiff, who was college-educated, chose to remain underemployed. The Appellate Division found that in granting plaintiff an award of interim counsel fees of $25,000, without a hearing, Supreme Court was familiar with this "highly contentious action for divorce" since 2004, and the court had a sufficient evidentiary basis to assess plaintiff's application. The court distinguished this case from Bush v. Bush, 46 A.D.3d 1140, 1141 [2007], noting that the proof submitted concerning the financial circumstances of the parties was limited to written submissions by respective counsel. The record contained information regarding the assets and liabilities of each party, including affidavits from each party and their statements of net worth. In addition to the procedural posture of the case, Supreme Court acknowledged and took into consideration the disparity of income and financial circumstances of the parties--plaintiff's annual income was approximately $77,000 ($59,280 of which was child and spousal support) and defendant's annual income was $286,000. Supreme Court noted that plaintiff had expended more than $100,000 on counsel fees from an advance on her equitable distribution and from borrowed funds and, at the time of her application, owed her attorneys $19,000 in legal fees. The court also noted that defendant's net worth increased from $5 million when the action commenced to approximately $8 million in 2008. It held that while it is true that a final award of counsel fees cannot be made "without a hearing in the absence of a stipulation consenting to a determination upon written submissions" (citing Redgrave v. Redgrave, 304 A.D.2d 1062, 1066 [2003]), the court pointed out that it had previously permitted interim counsel fee awards without a full evidentiary hearing (citing Dane v. Dane, 260 A.D.2d 817, 819 [1999]). It found that the Third Department cases cited by defendant were inapposite since, procedurally, those cases did not contemplate any further proceedings to address claimed inequities with the interim award (citing Bush v. Bush, 46 A.D.3d at 1141, 848 N.Y.S.2d 721; Yarinsky v. Yarinsky, 2 A.D.3d 1108, 1110 [2003]; Redgrave v. Redgrave, 304 A.D.2d at 1066). Significantly, it indicated that in this case "the ultimate amount of counsel fees awarded plaintiff, and if needed, any adjustment, can be resolved at the trial of the underlying divorce action (see Coons v. Coons, 161 A.D.2d 924, 924 [1990])". In keeping with the legislative intent of Domestic Relations Law 237(a) it concluded that, in this case, Supreme Court did not err in awarding interim counsel fees without first conducting an evidentiary hearing.

Child Support Order Improper Where Pro Se Respondent Does Not Receive Copy Child Support Standards Chart

In Matter of Grey v Whitford, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 1173063 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) Whitford objected to the child support determination of the support magistrate on the grounds that, among other things he did not, as a pro se litigant, receive a copy of the Child Support Standards Act chart prior to the entry of the child support order, pursuant to FCA 413[1][i]. The Family Court found that the record did not reveal that a copy of the child support standards chart was provided to Whitford. Family Court Act 413[1][i] provides that "[w]here either or both parties are unrepresented, the court shall not enter an order or judgment other than a temporary order pursuant to section two hundred thirty-seven of this article, that includes a provision for child support unless the unrepresented party or parties have received a copy of the child support standards chart promulgated by the commissioner of social services pursuant to subdivision two of section one hundred eleven-i of the social services law." Notwithstanding that the application of FCA 413(1)(i) to the facts here creates an absurd result, because "Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction that cannot exercise powers beyond those granted to it by statute, the court was court constrained to grant the objection, by the clear language of the statute, even though the substance of the chart was reviewed on the record and no deviation therefrom was made. The order of support dated February 9, 2009 was converted to temporary order, and the matter was remanded to the support magistrate for a de novo support hearing.

Fourth Department Affirms Child Support Award Based Upon Mother's Current Salary

In Eberhardt - Davis v Davis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 988486 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of divorce that directed the father to pay child support to the mother of $100 per week. It held that contrary to the contention of the father, Supreme Court properly determined that the parties had a shared custody arrangement and that he was the noncustodial parent. It pointed out that where "the parents' custodial arrangement splits the child's physical custody so that neither can be said to have physical custody of the child for a majority of the time, the parent having the greater pro rata share of the child support obligation should be identified as the noncustodial parent for the purpose of child support regardless of the labels employed by the parties. In light of the parties' agreement to maintain shared, equal custody of the child, the father failed to establish that he would maintain physical custody of the child for a majority of the time. The Appellate Division held that the court properly calculated the amount of child support and the parties' respective shares thereof. In calculating the parties' income for child support purposes, "a court is not required to use reported income but, rather, may base its determination on [the parties'] actual income and ability to support the child []" (Stanley v. Hain, 38 A.D.3d 1205, 1206, 833 N.Y.S.2d 344). Inasmuch as the mother was receiving a higher salary at the time of the hearing than she had received the previous year, the court was not required to determine her income based on her federal tax return for the previous year.

Fourth Department Holds that In Calculating Income For Child Support Purposes Court is not required to use reported income but, rather, may base its determination on parties actual income and ability to support the child

In Eberhardt - Davis v Davis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 988486 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of divorce that directed the father to pay child support to the mother of $100 per week. It held that contrary to the contention of the father, Supreme Court properly determined that the parties had a shared custody arrangement and that he was the noncustodial parent. It pointed out that where "the parents' custodial arrangement splits the child's physical custody so that neither can be said to have physical custody of the child for a majority of the time, the parent having the greater pro rata share of the child support obligation should be identified as the noncustodial parent for the purpose of child support regardless of the labels employed by the parties. In light of the parties' agreement to maintain shared, equal custody of the child, the father failed to establish that he would maintain physical custody of the child for a majority of the time. The Appellate Division held that the court properly calculated the amount of child support and the parties' respective shares thereof. In calculating the parties' income for child support purposes, a court is not required to use reported income but, rather, may base its determination on the parties' actual income and ability to support the child (Stanley v. Inasmuch as the mother was receiving a higher salary at the time of the hearing than she had received the previous year, the court was not required to determine her income based on her federal tax return for the previous year.

Court Applies Rule of Johnson v Chapin and Reimburses Defendant for Excess Temporary Maintenance Payments from Sums Awarded to the Plaintiff in Equitable Distribution

In Poberesky v Poberesky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 910466 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division increased the maintenance awarded from $3,700 per month to $4200 a month, and affirmed the direction that defendant be credited for pendente lite maintenance overpayments. It found that in concluding that "[t]here is no life style that must be maintained here," the Special Referee focused disproportionately on the parties' standard of living during the first eight years following their immigration to this country from the Soviet Union and failed to give due consideration to their standard of living during the seven years before the commencement of this action. It agreed with Supreme Court that the defendant should be reimbursed for any excess temporary maintenance payments from the sums awarded to the plaintiff in equitable distribution (citing Johnson v. Chapin, 49 AD3d 348, 350 [2008] ["equity requires that the husband be awarded a distributive credit for ... the amount that his pendente lite support payments exceeded what he would have been required to pay consistent with the final maintenance award"]). In determining defendant's maintenance obligations, the Special Referee properly considered his primary salary only, crediting defendant's testimony that he had worked overtime and taken on additional jobs to enable his daughter to graduate from private college without debt and thereafter continued to support her for a time, that he had planned to reduce his workload but was under financial pressure supporting two families, and that he was 60 years old. However, it found the monthly maintenance award of $3,700 inadequate and increase the award as indicated. It also held that Plaintiff, who was now eligible for Medicare, failed to identify any special medical needs requiring an additional award for medical expenses or health insurance coverage.

Not A Family Offense Where Child's Caretaker Uses Reasonable Physical Force for the Purpose of Discipline

In the Matter of Anthony J. v David K. 70 A.D.3d 1220, 895 N.Y.S.2d 245 (3 Dept 2010) Petitioner, who was incarcerated, was the biological father of two of the three children in this proceeding (born 1999 and 2001). Respondent Denise K. (mother) was the mother of all three children and married to respondent David K. (stepfather), who was the biological father of the third child (born in 2006). Petitioner filed a family offense petition alleging that the stepfather had choked and assaulted one of petitioner's children (child). After a fact-finding hearing, Family Court found that the stepfather had acted "in a harassing manner" and that a family offense had occurred. The court issued an enabling order and an order of protection directing the stepfather to refrain from using corporal punishment directed toward petitioner's children. The stepfather, supported by the mother, appealed both orders. The Appellate Division reversed. It found that the stepfather and the mother testified without contradiction that, after being sent to his room, the child became upset and swore at the stepfather. In response, the stepfather "grabbed" or "squeezed" the child's shoulder and told him to stay in his room. The mother and stepfather testified that the child was not bruised or otherwise injured. The incident was investigated by local police, who filed no charges, and by the local Department of Social Services DSS), which concluded that there was no credible evidence of abuse or neglect Family Court made a factual finding that, after the child "got a little bit out of control [and] used some very inappropriate language," the stepfather "sought to try and get him under control by grabbing his shoulder." A respondent's conduct forms the basis for a family offense predicated on harassment in the second degree when "with intent to harass, annoy or alarm another person ... [he or she] strikes, shoves, kicks or otherwise subjects such other person to physical contact" (Penal Law 240.26[1]; see Family Ct. Act 812[1]). The court found the proof of intent insufficient and, thus, petitioner did not meet his burden of establishing by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the stepfather's conduct constituted this offense (Family Ct. Act 832). The Court pointed out that a child's caretaker may use reasonable physical force for the purpose of discipline (see Penal Law 35.10[1]; see generally Matter of Collin H., 28 A.D.3d 806, 809, 812 N.Y.S.2d 702 [2006]). The proof did not establish that the stepfather used unreasonable force or that his conduct was undertaken for any purpose other than discipline. In the absence of proof revealing the requisite intent, no family offense was established, and the order of protection was improperly issued.

Distributive Award Is Not a Money Judgement. Claim to Enforce it Is Governed by Six Year Statute of Limitations

In Woronoff v Woronoff, 70 A.D.3d 933, 894 N.Y.S.2d 529 (2 Dept 2010) the parties 1988 judgment provided that the plaintiff would pay the defendant $87,500 for her share of his businesses. In 1990 the parties entered into an agreement which modified this portion of the judgment so as to set forth a different payment schedule for the distributive award.

This agreement was not reduced to a court order. The defendant never entered her distributive award as a money judgment nor sought to enforce collection thereof until 2007, when she obtained a clerk's judgment against the plaintiff. The plaintiff successfully moved to vacate the clerk's judgment and then commenced this action to recover damages for wrongful procurement of the clerk's judgment including the counsel fees he expended in moving to vacate the clerk's judgment. The defendant's first counterclaim asserted that the plaintiff had failed pay her the full amount of her distributive award for her share of his business, and alleged damages resulting therefrom in excess of $150,000. The Supreme Court granted the plaintiff's motion to dismiss this counterclaim as time-barred. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that contrary to the defendant's contention, the distributive award made in the divorce judgment for her share of the plaintiff's business was not a "money judgment" subject to a 20-year statute of limitations. Instead, her claim to enforce this award was governed by the six-year statute of limitations set forth in CPLR 213(1) and (2). Since the defendant did not seek to enforce her distributive award nor reduce it to a money judgment until well beyond six years after the divorce judgment was entered, and even well beyond six years after the parties entered into their modification agreement, the Supreme Court properly dismissed this counterclaim as time-barred.

Third Department Declines to Follow its Previous Decisions Which Required Showing of Actual Prejudice as Part of the Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Analysis

In Matter of Hurlburt v Behr, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 653028 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) after a hearing Family Court continued joint custody of the parties' child (born in 2005), but changed primary physical custody from respondent (mother) to petitioner (father). On appeal the mother contended that she received ineffective assistance of counsel. The Appellate Division stated that to establish this claim, the mother must demonstrate that she was deprived of meaningful representation as a result of her lawyer's deficiencies (see Matter of Hudson v. Hudson, 279 A.D.2d 659, 661-662 [2001]; Matter of Thompson v. Jones, 253 A.D.2d 989, 990 [1998]). The Court first held that to the extent that previous decisions of the Court required a showing of actual prejudice as part of the ineffective assistance of counsel analysis under the N.Y. Constitution, it declined to follow them (citing e.g. People v. Roberts, 63 AD3d 1294, 1295 [2009]; Matter of Chaquill R., 55 AD3d 975, 977 [2008], lv denied 11 NY3d 715 [2009]; Matter of Matthew C., 227 A.D.2d 679 [1996]; People v. Frascatore, 200 A.D.2d 860, 861 [1994]). The Court held that her allegations that her attorney should have objected to the amendment of the father's petition to seek custody, that he was unprepared to proceed with a hearing on custody, and that he should have called her and other witnesses on her behalf fail to meet that standard. In response to the amendment of the father's petition, the mother's attorney acknowledged that he was not surprised, and the record did not suggest that more time was needed to prepare for the hearing. Nor was it necessary for him to call the mother as a witness because the father had called her to testify and her attorney fully explored the relevant issues during cross-examination. In addition, on appeal, the mother conceded that her attorney's cross-examination of the father was well done and merely speculated that other evidence would have supplemented the case against a change in custody. As for the fact that the mother's attorney did not call the child's maternal grandmother or the caseworker who conducted home studies of the parties' residences, the mother failed to show that those omissions were the result of any neglect on counsel's part. While the child's grandmother likely could have provided relevant evidence, she had left the jurisdiction and was not available to testify. In any event, it was mere speculation that the grandmother's testimony would have been more helpful than harmful to the mother. Since the home study report found the mother's home to be in poor condition with half of it uninhabitable, a leaky roof, an unguarded wood stove and holes in its foundation, the court could not say that her attorney's decision not to call the caseworker to testify about the report was anything other than a legitimate trial strategy. The Court affirmed Family Court's decision to change physical custody of the child. The mother's neglect of this four-year-old child's dental health, which resulted in severe tooth decay requiring root canal procedures and caps, and the mother's absence from the child's home for roughly seven months prior to the hearing amounted to a substantial change in circumstances warranting Family Court to consider the child's best interests. The evidence established that the mother had neglected the child's dental health, was cavalier about the child's risk of being burned by an unguarded wood stove, and had allowed the child to be dirty and suffer from a burn, lice infestation and urinary tract infections. The mother had regularly entrusted the care of the child to her boyfriend and the grandmother, with the grandmother unilaterally denying the father visitation on some occasions. The mother was overwhelmed and could not properly care for all three of her children at the same time, and she had no viable plan to support them. There was evidence that the mother and her boyfriend spent significant amounts of money on cigarettes even though she was only occasionally employed and their household was on the brink of financial disaster. By contrast, the evidence showed that the father had a stable and suitable home and an adequate income, and he engaged in positive educational and social activities with the child.

Proper Vehicle to Challenge Child Support Agreement Provision is Plenary Action or Motion in Enforcement Proceeding.

In Barany v Barany, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2010 WL 733133 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) following almost seven years of marriage, the plaintiff and the defendant were divorced by judgment entered May 5, 2003, which incorporated, but did not merge with, the parties' separation agreement, whereby, among other things, the plaintiff retained custody of the parties' daughter, and the defendant was directed to pay child support in the sum of $250 per week. As a result of the defendant's allegedly sporadic payments of child support, the plaintiff moved to hold the defendant in contempt of court pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 245 and Judiciary Law 753, for his contumacious failure to pay child support, thus accumulating arrears of $52,155. Although the defendant failed to bring a cross motion or plenary action to vacate or set aside the separation agreement, he nonetheless asserted in his opposition papers that the separation agreement's child support provisions were invalid and unenforceable for failure to comply with the recitation requirements of the Child Support Standards Act. The Supreme Court denied the plaintiff's contempt motion and sua sponte vacated the child support provisions as unenforceable, setting the matter of child support, childcare expenses, and health care expenses down for a de novo hearing. The plaintiff unsuccessfully moved for reargument and renewal of that order. These appeals ensued from the resulting orders. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances, the Supreme Court erred in sua sponte vacating the child support provisions of the parties' separation agreement. The proper vehicle for challenging the propriety of child support provisions contained in a separation agreement or stipulation of settlement incorporated, but not merged, into a divorce judgment is by either commencing a separate plenary "action in which such relief is sought in a cause of action" or by motion within the context of an enforcement proceeding. Here, the defendant neither interposed a cross motion, nor commenced a separate plenary action, seeking to vacate or set aside the purportedly unenforceable child support provisions. Thus, the Supreme Court erred in sua sponte vacating the child support provisions in the separation agreement and denying the plaintiff's contempt motion. The matter was remitted to the Supreme Court, for a determination of the plaintiff's motion on the merits.

Where Plaintiff Chose Not to Realize Profits from His Business That Were Earned Years Before the Commencement of Action, Deferred Fees Constituted Marital Property

In Wyser-Pratte v Wyser-Pratte, 68 A.D.3d 624, 892 N.Y.S.2d 334 (1 Dept, 2009) the Appellate Division found that the proportional division of the assets of plaintiff's brokerage and investment management companies was based on the lower court's assessment that when plaintiff married, he already possessed substantial business assets, as well as the skills that allowed him to earn the "extraordinary" income the parties enjoyed during the marriage. While defendant contributed to the further development of the business by, among other things, decorating and renovating the parties' residences to create impressive surroundings in which to entertain plaintiff's clients and potential investors, the 35% allocation was reasonable under all the circumstances. Supreme Court properly treated the couple's trading accounts with plaintiff's brokerage business as business assets. The accounts were managed solely by plaintiff, who invested the funds in a manner intended to improve his companies' returns. As such, the accounts were an integral part of the business. However, it disagreed with Supreme Court's treatment of the deferred incentive fees owed to the investment management company as business assets subject to the 65%/35% division, and modified accordingly to equalize each party's share of this item at 50%. Although these fees, which totaled $31,020,400, were earned by plaintiff's company for managing a hedge fund during 1996 through 2000, plaintiff caused the company to defer receipt of payment from the fund, and they remained unpaid. Upon their payment to the company, which was a Subchapter S corporation, the fees would be taxable to plaintiff as income, and as plaintiff acknowledged, he deferred their receipt to postpone paying personal income tax. Plaintiff also claimed that the deferral was intended to benefit the fund's performance by increasing the amount available for investment. However, under the circumstances, where plaintiff chose not to realize profits from his business that were earned years before the commencement of this action, the deferred fees constituted marital property to be divided equally. The Supreme Court correctly recognized that defendant's share of the deferred fees had to be reduced by 48.77%, which the parties stipulated would be the applicable tax rate for the fees. These incentive fees were not intangible assets whose valuation depended on the occurrence of a contingent event; rather, they constitute earned income in a definite amount whose receipt will lead to certain tax liability. Accordingly, in connection with the deferred fees, defendant was awarded 50% of their post-tax value of $15,896,135, which equals $7,948,067, or an increase of $2,384,420 from the lower court's award of $5,563,647. The Supreme Court rejected defendant's claim that a $1 million note on the couple's Bedford property was a fiction after weighing the credibility of conflicting testimony, and accordingly reduced the in-kind distribution to plaintiff by the amount of the note. It was also reasonable for the court to take into account that defendant's father prepared the note, yet she did not call him to testify. The Supreme Court appropriately concluded that defendant had only presented evidence that plaintiff had used $74,000 of marital property to satisfy premarital tax liens, and so denied her claim that he had used greater sums. While plaintiff had deposited sale proceeds of separately owned properties into the couple's brokerage accounts, from which other marital assets were purchased, the court appropriately credited him for the purchase price (but not the increased sale value) of these separate properties (see Domestic Relations Law s 236[B][5][d][13]). The Appellate Division found that it was reasonable for Supreme Court to find that the value of certain artwork would be shared equally. While the Supreme Court rejected plaintiff's testimony that this art belonged to a third party, there was no credible evidence that plaintiff had acted improperly so as to justify an unequal award. Moreover, defendant offered no proof of her claim that the artwork was worth more than the court's valuation. It was reasonable for Supreme Court to deny defendant's request for counsel fees since the equitable distribution would provide her with adequate funds to pay her attorney. The court's denial of prejudgment interest under CPLR 5001 recognized that plaintiff had been paying pendente lite maintenance totaling more than $3 million, and was within its discretion. While interest from the decision to the entry of final judgment is mandatory (CPLR 5002), the court continued the pendente lite award in lieu of interest. Since defendant conceded that the judgment awarded her $17,645 more than the court intended, it reduced the increased judgment to her by that amount.

Court Properly Imputed Income Based on Evidence Husbands Businesses Paid for Virtually All Personal Expenses

In Beroza v Hendler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 733036 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) at the time of the parties' marriage on April 21, 1990, the plaintiff was a licensed veterinarian who specialized in the treatment of horses, and the defendant was a licensed anesthesiologist at the Long Island Jewish Medical Center. Throughout the marriage, the defendant worked full-time and the plaintiff operated his private veterinary practice and a related business which boarded horses and held polo matches on a five-acre property in Huntington Station. The plaintiff purchased this property before the marriage. At the beginning of their marriage, the parties agreed that they would save the defendant's income for a down payment on a home, and rely on the plaintiff's income to pay their expenses through one or both of his businesses. In 1993 the defendant and her mother purchased a home in Laurel Hollow in which the parties lived for the duration of the marriage. The defendant and her mother held title as joint tenants with the right of survivorship, for the ostensible purpose of shielding the home from the husband's potential creditors. The defendant and her mother assumed a $300,000 mortgage to purchase the home, which the defendant paid throughout the marriage, and satisfied during the pendency of the action with a final payment of $30,248. At the time the plaintiff commenced this action for divorce on October 12, 2001, the parties had a son who was approximately 4 ½ years old, and twins who were approximately 18 months old. After trial, the parties were divorced by judgment dated August 13, 2008, which, inter alia, directed the plaintiff to pay monthly child support of $4,833.33; awarded the plaintiff one half of the defendant's one half-interest in the marital residence after crediting the defendant with certain sums and one half of $440,000, which the defendant transferred to the children's custodial accounts without the plaintiff's permission, awarded the defendant 25% of the appreciated value of the plaintiff's veterinary practice and the related business, declined to award the plaintiff a percentage of the defendant's increased earnings, and declined to award the plaintiff a 50% credit for unaccounted-for funds in the joint accounts the defendant held with her mother at Chase Bank, deposited from October 14, 1997, to October 12, 2001. For purposes of its child support award, the Supreme Court imputed income to the plaintiff in the sum of $259,100. The Appellate Division held that the plaintiff's challenges to this imputation was without merit. In determining a party's child support obligation, a court need not rely upon the party's ... account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential. The Supreme Court properly imputed an annual income to the plaintiff based, inter alia, on undisputed evidence that his businesses paid for virtually all of his personal expenses, so that his actual earnings greatly exceeded the amount of income which he reported on his tax returns. However, in determining the amount of child support, the Supreme Court failed to set forth the parties' pro rata shares of child support, and to adequately explain the application of the "precisely articulated, three-step method for determining child support" pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act, so it remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, for a recalculation of the plaintiff's child support obligation. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was entitled to one half of the defendant's half-interest in the marital residence, which was marital property and subject to equitable distribution. However, the Supreme Court erred in deducting the amount of the outstanding mortgage from the stipulated gross value of the home to determine the available amount for equitable distribution since the mortgage was already satisfied at the time of distribution, and the Supreme Court additionally credited the defendant for one half the amount of the $30,248 payment. The Supreme Court also erred in determining the amount of marital funds which was subject to equitable distribution with respect to transfers the defendant made from her personal bank account into the children's custodial accounts without the plaintiff's permission. The evidence conclusively established that the defendant transferred the sum of $605,848 in marital funds.

Agreement Is Not Unconscionable Merely Because, in Retrospect, Some of its Provisions Were Improvident or One-sided

In Label v Label--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 552606 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in 2004, the plaintiff wife commenced an action for a divorce and she retained an expert evaluator to value the husband's business. On January 12, 2007, the expert issued a "preliminary appraisal" estimating the value of the business as of 2004 to be $1,042,890. The expert acknowledged that since discovery was incomplete, he had not been able to evaluate the "intangible value or goodwill" of the business. In August 2007, the parties entered into an oral stipulation of settlement on the record, which, inter alia, settled the custody and visitation issues between the parties, awarded the wife the marital residence, durational maintenance, child support, and a cash distributive award of $120,000, and provided that the wife waived equitable distribution of the husband's ownership interest in his business. In April 2008, after the wife surreptitiously discovered a 2007 offer by the husband's business partner to purchase the husband's share of the business for the sum of $1,820,000, the expert completed a second appraisal of the business at the wife's request, whereupon he assigned a value of $3,640,000 to the business as of 2004. Based on this new information, the wife moved to vacate so much of the stipulation of settlement as provided that she waived equitable distribution of the husband's ownership interest in the business as having been induced by fraud. The Supreme Court granted the motion. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that an agreement between spouses which is fair on its face will be enforced according to its terms unless there is proof of fraud, duress, overreaching, or unconscionability (Christian v. Christian, 42 N.Y.2d 63, 73). However, an agreement is not unconscionable merely because, in retrospect, some of its provisions were improvident or one-sided. Supreme Court erred in partially vacating the stipulation of settlement. The wife was represented by independent counsel and received meaningful and bargained-for benefits under the agreement, including generous maintenance and equitable distribution, based on the financial information made available to the wife's independent accountant and legal counsel, who negotiated on her behalf over the course of several months. Although the husband retained business property which was apparently now substantially more valuable than it was appraised for at the time of the agreement, courts will not set aside an agreement on the ground of unconscionability simply because it might have been improvident' " or one-sided. The wife failed to demonstrate that the agreement, which was fair on its face, was the result of fraud. She was fully aware of the parties' assets, cognizant that the expert evaluation of the business was preliminary and had not assessed goodwill, and she waived further discovery upon entering into a stipulation of settlement without a final independent evaluation. Under these circumstances, the husband's failure to disclose the 2007 offer did not render the stipulation of settlement so patently unfair as to require its vacatur. Accordingly, the court should have denied the wife's motion to vacate so much of the stipulation of settlement as provided that she waived equitable distribution of the husband's ownership interest in his business.

Husbands Manner of Engaging in Sexual Relations Deemed Cruel and Inhuman Treatment

In Kung v Kung, 69 A.D.3d 1295, 893 N.Y.S.2d 391 (3 Dept, 2010) the parties were married in May 1991 and had two children. In September 2007, plaintiff commenced this action for divorce. The evidence adduced at trial established that during the five years prior to the commencement of this action, defendant would normally come home after 1:00 A.M., many times intoxicated, from the restaurant he managed and wake up plaintiff insisting that they have sexual relations against her wishes. According to plaintiff, if she refused, defendant would begin yelling and would go "ahead with it anyway." Defendant's conduct continued despite plaintiff resorting to sleeping on the couch for over a year. Plaintiff testified that defendant's conduct, as well as the overall demeaning manner in which he treated her, made her feel scared, disrespected and nervous. She also claimed to suffer from sleeplessness and headaches. Furthermore, plaintiff testified that defendant came home on June 21, 2006 smelling of alcohol and again insisted on having sexual relations. According to plaintiff, when she refused, defendant became upset. When he continued to persist, plaintiff bit him in order to get away. She indicated that he then pushed her causing her to hit her head on the coffee table. Plaintiff then called the police. Although defendant denied some of plaintiff's allegations, he does not deny the manner in which he routinely engaged in sexual relations with plaintiff, explaining that plaintiff never said "no," either in English or their native language. Rather, she would cross her arms and put a pillow over her head while he continued to have sexual relations with her. The Appellate Division concluded that there was sufficient basis for Supreme Court's determination that defendant engaged in a course of conduct that endangered plaintiff's mental well-being rendering it improper for her to cohabit with him. Furthermore, a finding of cruel and inhuman treatment is not negated by plaintiff's continued residence in the marital home, given her inability to speak English, the presence of her daughters at the house and her total reliance on defendant for financial assistance. Nor did the lack of medical proof require dismissal under the particular facts of this case.

Where There Is Inconsistency Between Specific Provision and General Provision of a Contract, Specific Provision Controls

In Andersen v Andersen, 69 A.D.3d 773, 892 N.Y.S.2d 553 (2 Dept, 2010) plaintiff former husband and the defendant former wife divorced after 30 years of marriage. To settle their matrimonial action, they signed a stipulation of settlement, section 14 thereof providing for the equitable distribution of marital property. Section 14(a) of the stipulation provided that "[a]ll of the personalty in the possession of the Husband, including bank accounts, Bonds, and/or Individual Retirement Accounts, Annuity contracts, any pension rights he may have, now or in the future, his personal effects and clothing, shall be deemed the Husband's property, pursuant to a distribution of marital property and/or designation of separate property". However, section 14(f) thereof provided that "[a]ll pension rights that the husband has acquired with the Port Washington School District, including any defined benefit plan, 457K, or separate annuity, during the marriage are to be divided equally by a Qualified Domestic Relations Order, to be prepared by the wife's attorney, pursuant to the 'Maj[a]uskas' formula." The plaintiff brought an action, inter alia, to declare section 14(f) null and void, arguing that it was in conflict with section 14(a) and that he did not intend for his pension to be considered in the division of marital property. After a hearing, the Supreme Court found that section 14(f) of the agreement should remain in full force and effect. The judgment appealed from declared that section 14(f) of the stipulation of settlement remains in full force and effect as an accurate reflection of the parties' intent. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that a stipulation of settlement which is incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce retains the character of an independent contract and survives as a basis for suit. As such, it is a subject to general principles of contract construction. Where there is an inconsistency between a specific provision and a general provision of a contract, the specific provision controls. Here, the Supreme Court properly found that section 14(a) of the stipulation was a general provision, while section 14(f) was a specific provision, which accurately reflected the parties' intent, and therefore, remained in full force and effect.

Judgment Which Is Paid and Satisfied of Record Ceases to Have Any Existence

In Samuel v Samuel, 69 A.D.3d 835, 893 N.Y.S.2d 250, (2 Dept 2010) the Appellate Division pointed out that a judgment which is paid and satisfied of record ceases to have any existence since a defendant, by paying the amount due, extinguishes the judgment and the obligation thereunder. Here, after extensive negotiations between the parties, the defendant signed a stipulation of settlement, which stated, in relevant part: "The parties acknowledge that the [defendant] owes the [plaintiff] temporary support and maintenance arrears pursuant to the pendente lite Order ...Upon the execution of the Stipulation of Settlement, the [defendant] shall pay the [plaintiff] the sum of SEVENTY-FIVE HUNDRED ($7,500) DOLLARS in full satisfaction of any and all arrears owed to [the plaintiff] pursuant to the ... pendente lite Order." On February 13, 2008, the defendant signed an affidavit stating that he had read the stipulation of settlement, fully understood its contents, and agreed to it after "mature and careful deliberation" and, on that same date, wrote a check to the plaintiff for the agreed upon amount of $7,500. Thereafter, on May 20, 2008, the plaintiff, as required by CPLR 5020, filed a satisfaction of the relevant judgment, which had been entered on November 7, 2007 (see CPLR 5020[a], [c]). Since the stipulation of settlement and the satisfaction of judgment extinguished the defendant's obligations under that judgment, his appeal therefrom was rendered academic. Accordingly, by reason of the stipulation of settlement and the satisfaction of judgment, the Supreme Court correctly denied defendant's motion which was to vacate the judgment.

In Limine Determination Does Not Preclude Trial Evidence of Efforts Affecting Value

In Morton v Morton, 69 A.D.3d 693, 892 N.Y.S.2d 518 (2d Dept, 2010) at issue on this appeal was the proper valuation date for marital assets consisting of multiple business entities which own commercial real estate properties and act as the landlord for industrial and manufacturing tenants, many of which are located in the Detroit, Michigan, area. The Appellate Division noted that defendant proffered evidence that a decrease in the value of these assets since the date of commencement of this action was attributable to market forces and, thus, was passive in nature. There was no evidence that a decline in the value of these assets during this period of time was due to dissipation or wasteful conduct on the part of the defendant. Thus, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in valuing these assets as of the date of commencement of the action rather than as of the date of trial. (see McSparron v. McSparron, 87 N.Y.2d 275, 287-288) The court pointed out that his determination did not preclude either party from presenting evidence at trial for the purposes of equitable distribution of any efforts which he or she alleges affected the value of the subject assets.

Inappropriate for the Plaintiff to Continue as a Joint Owner with the Defendant of Their Closely-held Corporation

In Bricker v Bricker, 69 A.D.3d 546, 893 N.Y.S.2d 128, (2d Dept 2010) the Appellate Division held there is no uniform rule for fixing the value of a going business and the valuation of a business for equitable distribution purposes is an exercise properly with the fact-finding power of the trial court, guided by expert testimony. The factfinder's determination of the value of a business, if it is within the range of the expert testimony presented, is entitled to deference on appeal where the valuation rests primarily on the credibility of the expert witnesses and their valuation techniques. Similarly, the court did not err in valuing the marital residence based upon the appraisal thereof that was admitted into evidence, rather than upon the testimony of the defendant's neighbor that he was willing to purchase it for considerably more than the appraised value, which the trial court expressly found lacked credibility. However, it was error for the court to award 100% of JCB Holdings to the plaintiff, and it modified the judgment by awarding each party a 50% share of that marital asset. It declined to disturb the trial court's award to the plaintiff of a 60% interest in Bricker's, Inc. However, it agreed with the defendant that it was inappropriate for the plaintiff to continue as a joint owner with the defendant of this closely-held corporation, and that, instead, a distributive award should be made to the plaintiff for her share. Based on the evidence that Bricker's, Inc., was the owner and lessor of the real property where the auto repair shop which the defendant operated was located, that the appraised value of that real property of $535,000, and the trial court's determination that the plaintiff was entitled to a 60% share of this marital asset, it modified the judgment so as to award the plaintiff a distributive award of $321,000 for her share of Bricker's, Inc. In view of the defendant's lack of liquid assets, it directed that he pay the plaintiff her distributive award for this asset over a period of 14 years, in annual installments of $24,000 per year for 13 years, and a final installment of $9,000 in the 14th year, with the proviso that, if he should sell the real property owned by Bricker's, Inc., within that time period, he shall pay any remaining balance due on the award to the plaintiff upon that sale.

Where Tenancy by Entirety Not Altered by Judicial Decree, or by a Written Instrument Satisfying GOL 3-309 upon Wife's Death, Husband Became Seized of the Whole Property.

In Beudert-Richard v Richard, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 157221 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Pamela and Adam purchased the cooperative apartment in 1978, while they were married. They took title to the co-op shares as joint tenants with rights of survivorship rather than as tenants by the entirety. [Prior to the amendment of EPTL 6-2.1 and 6-2.2 on January 1, 1996 (L 1995, ch 480), co-op shares were treated as personalty rather than realty, and a married couple's ownership interest in such shares could be as joint tenants or as tenants in common, but could not be as tenants by the entirety (see EPTL 6- 2.1; Stewart v. Stewart, 118 A.D.2d 455, 457 [1986])]. On April 12, 1989, Pamela and Adam entered into a separation agreement which provided for distribution of the marital property. The paragraph of the separation agreement concerning the apartment erroneously stated that the couple owned the apartment "as tenants by the entirety," and gave Pamela exclusive possession during their child's minority, after which the apartment was to be sold and the net proceeds split. Their December 1989 divorce judgment, which incorporated but did not merge their separation agreement, stated that the marital property was to be distributed pursuant to the separation agreement. Adam thereafter married plaintiff Michele. Adam died on September 23, 1999, and his will bequeathed to Michele his ownership interest in the apartment. At the time of Adam's death, the obligation to sell the apartment under the separation agreement had not yet been triggered because his child with Pamela was then 16 years old. After Adam and Pamela's son completed college and became emancipated, Michele and Pamela entered into an agreement dated November 21, 2007, which provided that Pamela was the owner of a one-half interest in the apartment and Michele was the beneficiary of Adam's one-half interest in the apartment, and both agreed to sell the apartment and split the net proceeds. In January 2008, Michele and Pamela, as sellers, entered into a contract to sell the apartment for $1,385,000. However, in February, 2008, the managing agent of the cooperative insisted that the contract be amended to omit Michele's name from the contract. Pamela then filed an application seeking a determination that the estate did not have a legal right or interest in the apartment or the proceeds of its sale, while Michele commenced this action seeking enforcement of the separation agreement and the November 2007 contract. The Supreme Court granted Pamela's motion, directing that Michele was not entitled to share in any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the apartment, rescinding the 2007 agreement and dismissing the complaint. Relying on Matter of Violi (65 N.Y.2d 392 [1985]), the motion court reasoned that at the time of Adam's death the relevant provision of the separation agreement was merely an executory contract to divide the proceeds when a sale occurred that did not alter the form of its ownership, and since Adam's contract right to the sale of the co-op was not enforceable at the time of his death, his estate could not claim it (citing Brower v. Brower, 226 A.D.2d 92 [1997]). The First Department, in an opinion by Justice Saxe, reversed. He noted that Matter of Violi involved a situation where spouses who owned their residence as tenants by the entirety entered into a separation agreement pursuant to which they agreed to sell their residence within four years and split the net proceeds, but the wife died a year later, before the parties were divorced, with the residence still unsold. Since the parties had not altered their tenancy by the entirety either by a judicial decree such as a divorce judgment, or by a written instrument satisfying General Obligations Law 3-309 by clearly expressing an intent to convert the form of tenancy in which the property was held, the tenancy had continued to be held by the entirety; so, upon the wife's death, the husband became seized of the whole property. Had the parties in Violi actually gotten the divorce before the wife's death, the property would have automatically been held as a joint tenancy and the wife's estate would have been entitled to her share. In Brower v. Brower (226 A.D.2d 92 [1997], supra), a small but important difference in the facts led to a different result from that in Violi. Like Violi, the parties held the marital residence by the entirety, and, like Violi, they entered into a separation agreement providing for its sale, but one party died before either the sale or the divorce. However, unlike Violi, in Brower, "[t]he date prescribed in the agreement for defendant [wife] to vacate the property so that it could be sold preceded decedent's death," and therefore the husband in Brower had a viable breach of contract claim against the surviving wife at the time of his death, which viable right entitled his estate to seek specific performance of the agreement after his death. Justice Saxe stated that in the present case, unlike either Violi or Brower, the parties actually obtained a final judgment of divorce, incorporating the separation agreement in which they expressed their mutual belief that they held the co-op shares by the entirety and the concomitant, if implicit, expectation that upon the divorce their tenancy would be automatically converted into a tenancy in common. While a married couple's tenancy by the entirety automatically converts into a tenancy in common upon entry of a divorce judgment, the same does not hold true for a married couple's joint tenancy. However, General Obligations Law 3-309 allows a married couple to freely "convey or transfer real or personal property directly, the one to the other, without the intervention of a third person." Therefore, as the court observed in Matter of Violi, a married couple may convert the form of tenancy in which they hold property by expressing in a writing an intent to do so. While Adam and Pamela did not specifically state in their separation agreement an intent to convert their ownership of the co-op from joint tenancy to a tenancy by the entirety, as they had a right to do, their failure to do so appeared to be based on their (albeit incorrect) understanding that their ownership already took that form. There was little doubt from the language of their separation agreement that Adam and Pamela intended, and assumed, that upon entry of their divorce judgment they would automatically become tenants in common without any right of survivorship. Not only was there no indication that Adam intended to waive his (or his estate's) property interest in the co-op, or that Pamela thought he had done so, but the record contained numerous indications to the contrary. The spouses' mutual expectation that entry of the divorce judgment would result in a tenancy in common was apparent from the language of their separation agreement. That Pamela and Adam both proceeded in the belief that the divorce would convert their ownership of the apartment into a tenancy in common was established by Pamela's entry into the 2007 agreement to sell the apartment, which stated "Michele is the Executrix of the Estate of Adam Richard who died owning the other one-half (½) interest in said apartment." Pamela did not claim the sole right of survivorship until after the managing agent of the cooperative insisted that the contract of sale be amended to provide that Michele's name be omitted from the contract. Moreover, Adam's will, where he stated, "I give, devise and bequeath to my wife, Michele F. Beudert, my entire ownership interest in [the apartment], to be hers outright," reflected his understanding that upon his divorce from Pamela the form of their ownership of the co-op would leave them each with an ownership interest in the event of his death. There was substantial evidence that the parties intended that following the divorce, their ownership of the co-op would automatically become a tenancy in common. At a minimum, the record evidence raised issues of fact as to whether the language of the separation agreement demonstrated an understanding that the ownership of the apartment was intended to be altered upon their divorce so as to eliminate any existing right of survivorship. This issue alone precluded the entry of final judgment declaring that Adam's estate was not entitled to share in any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the apartment. The order and judgment which rescinded the 2007 agreement to sell the cooperative apartment and share equally in the proceeds and dismissed the complaint seeking to enforce that agreement, was reversed on the law, the rescission of the agreement vacated, the complaint reinstated, and the matter remanded for further proceedings. Justice Moskowitz dissented.

Ritz v. Ritz Does Not Shift Burden to Party Asserting That the Property Is Separate to Show the Effect of Market Forces.

In Karas-Abraham v Abraham, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 27034 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the award of four years' maintenance and the amount of child support were properly premised on the imputation of income to defendant based on the report of the neutral forensic accountants and the referee's credibility findings. It was clear that defendant was the monied spouse who had been hiding income through his family's companies, his own business in which he was the sole shareholder, and illusory undocumented loans that he used to support a standard of living that would have been impossible to maintain on the income he claimed in the divorce proceeding and on his personal income tax returns. The referee properly considered plaintiff's ability to be self-supporting and the parties' standard of living in determining the duration and amount of maintenance, which was further justified by defendant's lack of candor with respect to his income. The amount of support was also properly based on the parties' life style, the custodial parent's financial resources and the needs of the children. Plaintiff was properly awarded half the proceeds from the sale of the cooperative apartment upstairs from the marital residence, which amounted to more than $600,000, rather than solely her contribution of about $43,000 to its purchase. However, the Appellate Division held that plaintiff was not absolved of her responsibility for capital gains taxes on her share of the proceeds merely because the stipulation with respect to the sale proceeds did not provide for the allocation between the parties of capital gains taxes and the court had declined to direct her to pay such taxes pendente lite, especially since defendant was held responsible for all of the other expenses paid out of the escrowed proceeds. Notably, plaintiff's objection was based only on these procedural grounds, not on any claim of substantive fairness because of the disparate economic status of the parties. Plaintiff was properly awarded expenses for the New Jersey residence to which she and the children had moved. The only reasons that the court had denied her earlier request to have defendant pay these housing costs were that the trial was imminent and that plaintiff had failed to document her claim that her mother had paid for the house with the understanding that plaintiff would pay the carrying charges until she was able to buy it. Neither of these reasons remained viable after plaintiff documented her claim at trial. Defendant had been previously obligated to pay carrying charges on the marital residence, and the New Jersey home was functioning as the marital residence. It rejected defendant's procedural claim that, by including the New Jersey housing costs in the judgment, the referee improperly modified her decision since it did not mention such costs; procedure is more flexible in nonjury matters. The court held that the counsel fee award was proper. Defendant failed to object to any specific charge, and, in any event, it found the amount appropriate under the circumstances. However, the referee should not have awarded plaintiff all of the appreciation of the marital residence, since she failed to carry her burden to demonstrate the amount of the increase in value that was the result of her contributions to the renovations and not of market forces. Contrary to plaintiff's contention, Ritz v. Ritz (21 AD3d 267 [2005]) does not shift the burden to the party asserting that the property is separate to show the effect of market forces.

Constructive Abandonment Divorce to Husband Does Not Bar Him from Attempt to Establish Paternity of Child Conceived During Period of Constructive Abandonment

In Andrew T v Yana T, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 5226917 (N.Y.Sup.) the Supreme Court pointed out that the lack of a true no-fault basis for granting a divorce poses significant problems. Not only does it often force the person obtaining the divorce to swear to things that everybody knows are untrue, but it forces judges and special referees who preside over these cases to in effect turn a blind eye, or at least a myopic one, to what is technically perjury. In this case, plaintiff-husband was granted an uncontested divorce from defendant-wife on the ground of constructive abandonment. . As part of pleading his claim of sexual abandonment, plaintiff had to swear to the fact that he and defendant did not have sexual relations for over a year. Defendant sought to that statement to prevent plaintiff from seeking to establish that a child born during the course of the marriage, but conceived well after the date on which the parties allegedly stopped having sex, was actually his son. Plaintiff contended that irrespective of what he stated in the divorce pleadings, the child in question, a baby boy named Ethan, was his child. He moved for an order directing that genetic marker testing be done so as to conclusively determine paternity, and upon such determination, plaintiff sought a declaration of paternity and the amendment of the divorce judgment to reflect that Ethan was the child of the marriage. Defendant opposed plaintiff's motion pointing out that in his verified complaint for divorce, he alleged that from August 1, 2006, onward she refused to have sexual relations with him. Thus, based on plaintiff's own sworn statements, defendant contends that the child, who was not born until March 19, 2008, could not possibly be his. Defendant further submitted that if plaintiff was taking the position that Ethan was his child, this meant that the sworn statements in his verified complaint concerning the lack of sexual relations must be untrue. As a result, defendant cross-moved for an order finding that plaintiff violated Penal Law section 210.10, perjury in the second degree. The Supreme Court took the view that although perjury of any kind is not to be condoned, the context in which it arises must be taken into consideration. The sad truth is that New York's insistence on fault-based divorce ends up promoting a disregard for the truth by fostering and encouraging the embellishment of a spouse's wrongdoing as to grounds, often with immeasurable effects upon a divorcing household. Here, the divorcing household included an infant boy who, according to his birth certificate, was essentially fatherless. Under the circumstances, the question of whether plaintiff embellished the truth or even told outright lies in order to obtain the parties' uncontested divorce was far less important than resolving the issue of Ethan's parentage, something that was in his best interests. An additional factor to be considered was the role defendant played in the divorce proceeding. While defendant was quick to claim that "plaintiff's perjury to the court is blatant, obvious and must be punished," she failed to address her own complicity and lack of truthfulness in the matter. It appeared that at no time during the pendency of the divorce action did defendant ever inform plaintiff or the court that she was pregnant or had given birth. Moreover, defendant expressly consented to plaintiff obtaining the divorce based on the allegation that she had refused to have sex with him. Thus, the granting of the divorce was facilitated by defendant's acquiescing in what plaintiff alleged. If plaintiff's sworn statement that he and the defendant did not have sexual relations after August 2006 was a lie, then defendant joined in that lie and benefitted from it when the divorce was granted. Being in pari delicto, defendant did not come before this court with "clean hands," and she was scarcely in the position to seek to have plaintiff punished as a perjurer or even to have his words used against him. In this case, the presumption of legitimacy, the child's best interests and plaintiff's request for paternity testing went hand-in-hand. Plaintiff was already presumed to be Ethan's father by virtue of having been married to Ethan's mother when the child was born. See David L. v. Cindy L., 208 A.D.2d 502, 503 (2d Dept 1994).

Ethan's best interests lie in having his parentage confirmed, his father's name listed on his birth certificate, and his rights and status attendant to the father-son relationship fully established, so the court granted the motion. However, it denied Defendant's Cross-Motion for an order finding that plaintiff has violated Penal Law section 210.10, which makes it a crime to make a false statement under oath that is material to the proceeding involved. This offense, perjury in the second degree, is a class E felony punishable by up to four years in prison. It found the application without merit as the examination of witnesses to ascertain whether a basis exists for prosecution is the province of the District Attorney's Office and the Grand Jury, not a civil trial court and referring the matter to the District Attorney for investigation or prosecution would serve no purpose.

22 NYCRR 202.5(d)(1) Specifies Limited Circumstances under Which Court Clerks Can Reject Papers.

Section 202.5(d)(1) was added to the Uniform Civil Rules for Supreme and County Courts to specify the limited circumstances under which court clerks can reject papers. They may reject papers that do not have an index number, documents commencing or concluding a lawsuit that do not list the names of all parties, filings offered in the wrong county, or documents not signed as required by court rules authorizing sanctions for frivolous contentions. 22 NYCRR 202.5(d)(1) also requires clerks to date-stamp papers they reject and to write the reason for the rejection on the papers themselves. In addition, the rule tracks the provisions of CPLR 2102(c). CPLR 2102(c) which was added effective January 1, 2008 (See Laws of 2007, Ch 125, §4), provides that a clerk shall not refuse to accept for filing any paper presented for that purpose except where specifically directed to do so by statute or rules promulgated by the chief administrator of the courts, or order of the court. The 2008 amendment to CPLR 2102(c) was intended to make it clear that the clerk of the court is not authorized to make a determination as to the legal sufficiency of any legal filings, and that such a determination was the province of the court, rather than the clerk.

Filing Child Support Petition constitutes Valid Withdrawal from Invalid Child Support Agreement

In Matter of Savini v. Burgaleta, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 114546 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that as the child support provisions in the parties' judgment of divorce dated August 22, 1997, were vacated by an order of the Supreme Court, which was affirmed, (Burgaleta v. Burgaleta, 51 AD3d 842), so much of the mother's petition as sought to enforce the child support provisions in the parties' judgment of divorce had to be dismissed. In a handwritten agreement dated April 19, 1997, the parties agreed, that starting with the January 28, 1998, payment the mother would accept $200 per week as child support. The agreement provided that the mother would not "file suit for any monies that would make up the difference between the child support percentage of 29% of [the father's] weekly income and the two hundred dollar weekly payment." The Appellate Division held that this agreement was a valid waiver by the mother of her right to file suit to recover child support above the sum of $200 per week while the waiver was in effect. Since the father complied with the agreement, no arrears accrued while it was in effect. The Appellate Division held that the mother validly withdrew from the agreement by filing her child support petition dated August 11, 2004.

Attorneys Fee Request Must Be Sufficiently Supported

In Filiaci v Filiaci,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 5128542 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff that the court erred in directing him to pay defendant's attorney's fees and expenses in its interim orders and in the supplemental judgment. The court issued an interim order on May 15, 2007 that, inter alia, directed plaintiff to pay the Law Guardian a retainer of $1,000 and defendant's attorney $4,000 from an escrow fund. The court issued a second order on October 24, 2007 that, inter alia, directed plaintiff to pay defendant's attorney $6,972.53 and to pay the court reporter deposition fees $1,451.60 from the escrow fund. The court issued a third order on November 30, 2007 that directed plaintiff to pay an additional $2,800 to the Law Guardian from the escrow fund. The supplemental judgment directed plaintiff to pay defendant's attorney $8,203.05 from the escrow fund, as well as an additional sum of $13,206.05. The three orders and supplemental judgment were not supported by affidavits from which the court could determine the nature, quality and reasonableness of the services rendered. Although defendant's attorney submitted an affidavit in support of defendant's order to show cause seeking, inter alia, the attorney's fees awarded in the May 15, 2007 interim order, that affidavit merely alleged in a conclusory manner the total numbers of hours that the attorney had expended to date, and defendant failed to submit any other affidavits concerning attorney's fees. It remitted the matter to Supreme Court for a hearing to determine the reasonable amount of fees and expenses to be awarded to defendant's attorney, the Law Guardian and the court reporter.

Proper to Deny Wife Maintenance Because of Lack of Proof

In Wanker v Samitz, 67 A.D.3d 1135, 889 N.Y.S.2d 705 (3 Dept, 2009) the parties married in July 1998 and had one child (born in 1999). Plaintiff commenced the divorce action in March 2006. Following a bench trial in April 2008, Supreme Court granted plaintiff a divorce on the grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment and abandonment and denied defendant's request for maintenance. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly granted plaintiff a divorce based on cruel and inhuman treatment. The record established that throughout the marriage, defendant used heroin and other drugs, despite multiple incidents of overdose, at least one of which occurred in the presence of the parties' son, and she was admitted to several rehabilitation programs. Defendant was verbally and physically aggressive toward plaintiff whenever he attempted to confront her about her addiction or whenever he attempted to take the heroin away from her. Plaintiff became depressed over the situation, often crying and feeling physically sick, and sought counseling with a number of therapists. Even assuming this to be a marriage of long duration necessitating a high degree of proof, defendant engaged in a course of conduct that endangered plaintiff's mental well-being such that it was improper for plaintiff to cohabit with defendant. Supreme Court erred, however, in granting plaintiff a divorce on the basis of abandonment because, at the time the complaint was filed, defendant had not been absent from the home for a period of one year or more, nor was there any evidence presented at trial that could establish constructive abandonment. It held that Supreme Court did not err in denying the wife's request for maintenance. While there was some general testimony at trial regarding plaintiff's financial situation, defendant did not present evidence of her own income, assets or her ability to be self-supporting. There was a similar lack of proof with respect to the other statutory factors, which precluded the Appellate Division from exercising its factual review power to determine the maintenance issue.

Failure to Comply with Diligent Efforts Requirement Renders Petition Jurisdictionally Defective

In Re Jahad R., 890 N.Y.S.2d 44 (1 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order that adjudicated appellant a person in need of supervision and placed him in the custody of the Commissioner of Social Services for 12 months, and the petition was dismissed. In its report accompanying the petition to have appellant adjudicated to be a person in need of supervision, the Administration for Children's Services stated that "diligent efforts" have been made, that services have been "exhausted," that appellant is "resistant to services," and that there is "no substantial likelihood that the family will benefit from diversion services." However, ACS failed to clearly document any diligent attempts it made to provide appropriate services to appellant and his family before it was determined that it was substantially unlikely they would benefit from further attempts, as required by Family Court Act 735. The report did not identify the services that allegedly were offered. The failure to comply with this statutory requirement rendered the petition jurisdictionally defective (Matter of Leslie H. v. Carol M.D., 47 A.D.3d 716, 849 N.Y.S.2d 612 [2008]).

Equitable Does Not Mean Equal

In Kelly v Kelly, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2010 WL 28203 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) an action for a divorce Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff a divorce, awarded the plaintiff an equitable share of 60% of the marital assets, and directed the defendant to pay 60% of the plaintiff's reasonable medical and dental insurance benefit costs, to the extent that such insurance benefits were not available to her through her anticipated future employment, until Medicare becomes effective, and denied the wife's requests for lifetime maintenance and an award of an attorney's fee, and awarded her maintenance only until December 31, 2008. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff 60% of the marital assets. When both spouses equally contribute to a marriage of long duration, the division of marital property should be as equal as possible. However, there is no requirement that the distribution of marital property be made on an equal basis. In making the division of property in this case, the court took into account, among other things, the property held by each party at the commencement of the action, the length of the marriage, the limited award of maintenance to the wife, and the husband's more recent work experience and greater earning potential. Contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying her request for lifetime maintenance. However, in light of the award of limited maintenance, the court should have determined that the defendant's obligation to pay the plaintiff's reasonable medical and dental insurance benefit costs also should end on December 31, 2008. Considering the parties' relative circumstances and all of the relevant factors, including the pendente lite award of attorney's fees to the plaintiff in the amount of $7,500, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in denying the plaintiff's request for an award of an attorney's fee.

Hearing Need Not Follow Any Particular Form, but must Consist of Adducement of Proof Coupled with Opportunity to Rebut

In Matter of Nuesi v Gago, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4985551 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that father's contention that the Support Magistrate failed to conduct a proper hearing on the issue of emancipation was without merit. The father and mother were sworn and examined, and findings of fact were made regarding emancipation. A hearing need not follow any particular form, but any meaningful hearing must, at least, consist of an adducement of proof coupled with an opportunity to rebut it (Waby v. Waby, 143 A.D.2d 506; see Matter of Thompson v. Thompson, 59 AD3d 1104). The father was given an opportunity to provide the court with proof as to the child's emancipation, but failed to do so. However, the Support Magistrate erred in failing to permit the father to submit evidence regarding his current financial situation. The father was not given an opportunity to provide proof that he was unable to pay the current amount of child support. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a new hearing on the issue of the father's ability to pay support, followed by a new determination of the petition for a downward modification.

Boden Does Not Apply to Application to Modify Child Support Where, Judgment of Divorce and Stipulation of Settlement Are Silent as to the Costs of Private Secondary Education

In Matter of Durso v Durso, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4985467 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) petitioner (mother), and respondent (father), were divorced by judgment in 2002. In 2007, the mother commenced a proceeding to modify the father's child support obligation by requiring him to pay a share of the tuition for the parties' daughter Concetta for the parochial high school she was attending. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate determined that the father was required to pay for 50% of Concetta's tuition. The Family Court vacated the order. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the Family Court's conclusion, the mother was not required to demonstrate "an unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances" (Matter of Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 213) to support her application to modify the father's child support obligation. Where, as here, the parties' judgment of divorce and stipulation of settlement are silent as to the costs of private secondary education, the appropriate standard for determining the mother's application is found in the Child Support Standards Act, pursuant to which a court may award educational expenses if it determines that a private school education is appropriate for the child, "having regard for the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties and in the best interests of the child, and as justice requires" (DRL 240[1-b][c][7]). Under this standard, a court may, in its discretion, direct a parent to pay the educational expenses of a child, even in the absence of special circumstances or a voluntary agreement. The evidence presented at the hearing established that the father had ample financial resources, far exceeding those of the mother, enabling him to contribute to the cost of Concetta's parochial high school tuition without impairing his ability to support himself and maintain his own household. The fact that Concetta enrolled in the parochial high school as a freshman, with the father's approval and with initial financial support from him, and performed well at that school, warrants a finding that it was in her best interests to remain at that school, rather than having her academic and social life disrupted by a transfer to a different high school. Thus, the Support Magistrate properly determined that the father should be directed to pay 50% of Concetta's private secondary school tuition, and the father's objection to that determination should have been denied.

Improper to Impute Income Without Factual and Legal Basis

In Mongelli v Mongelli, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4985685 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the defendant 50% of the appreciation of the marital residence from the date of the marriage, awarded him a separate property credit of $48,000 for the marital residence, imputed income to him of $100,000, directed him to pay child support of $1,924 per month for the parties' two minor children until the emancipation of the older of those children and, upon emancipation of the older minor child, to pay child support in the sum of $1,308 per month until the emancipation of the younger of those children, and awarded the defendant an attorney's fee in the sum of $15,000. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in determining the plaintiff's child support obligation, and otherwise affirmed. While a court may depart from a party's reported income and impute income based on the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential the court failed to properly consider that the plaintiff's opportunities to earn overtime compensation at his job had lessened in recent years, and that the home improvement jobs that he performed on the side were for family and friends, with no showing that he profited therefrom. Thus, the plaintiff's child support obligation, as determined by the Supreme Court based upon income imputed to the plaintiff, had to be modified. It recalculated the plaintiff's child support obligation based on his total annual income of $70,254, on his 2007 federal tax return and defendant's relevant annual income which was $32,322 after the FICA deduction. The plaintiff's pro rata share was 67%. Applying the statutory percentage of 25% to the entire $97,201.57 in combined parental income, resulted in a basic child support obligation of $24,300.50. Therefore, the plaintiff's child support obligation was 67% of that amount, or $1,356.77 monthly. The Appellate Division held that the court properly determined that the defendant was entitled to an equitable share of the appreciation in the value of the marital residence over the course of the marriage, notwithstanding that the residence was the separate property of the plaintiff until 1999, when the property was transferred into the names of the plaintiff and the defendant as tenants by the entirety. The increase in the value of separate property remains separate property "except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse", at which point the increase in value becomes marital property, in accordance with the rule that the definition of marital property is to be broadly construed, given the principle that a marriage is an economic partnership. The record established that the appreciation in the value of the marital residence was attributable to the joint efforts of the parties. Thus, the defendant was entitled to share equitably in that increased value. In addition, the court's award of a separate property credit to the plaintiff in the sum of $48,000 for the value of the marital residence at the time the parties were married was proper.

Where Parties Maintained Separate Finances, and Filed Separate Tax Returns, Not Error to Direct Husband Bear Responsibility for Paying Income Taxes, Interest, and Penalties.

In Frey v Frey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4986166 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, where the parties, for the most part, maintained separate finances, and determined from the start of the marriage to file separate tax returns, the trial court providently exercised its discretion in directing that the defendant, who failed to file tax returns throughout the duration of the marriage, bear the responsibility for paying income taxes, interest, and penalties. The plaintiff had no role whatsoever in the operation of the defendant's business, and she did not learn that he failed to file tax returns until after she commenced the action. The husband's conduct constituted economic fault, justifying the trial court's determination. It also held that

Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion, after examining the circumstances of the case and the pertinent statutory factors, in distributing the value of the marital home, the plaintiff's pension, and the plaintiff's investments, equally between the parties. However, Supreme Court erred in awarding the plaintiff $8,800 representing her 20% share of the value of the defendant's business. Under the circumstances of this case, in order that the parties' property be equitably distributed to achieve the ultimate goal of fairness, the award to the plaintiff of 20% of the value of the defendant's business, which was separate property, was not warranted.

Court May Not Substitute by Reformation Agreement Which it Thinks Is Proper but to Which the Parties Had Never Assented

In Walker v Walker, 67 A.D.3d 1373, 888 N.Y.S.2d 823, 2009 N.Y. Slip Op. 08301 the Appellate Division noted that when the case was previously before it (Walker v. Walker, 42 A.D.3d 928) defendant moved for an order that, inter alia, directed plaintiff to comply with an oral stipulation of the parties made in open court concerning the division of a parcel of real property. The stipulation was incorporated but not merged in the parties' judgment of divorce. On the prior appeal, the Appellate Division concluded that Supreme Court erred in ordering the parcel to be divided in accordance with a survey map procured by plaintiff inasmuch as the stipulation was ambiguous, and it therefore reversed the order and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for a hearing to determine the intent of the parties at the time of the stipulation with respect to the division of the parcel in question. On remittal, the court determined, inter alia, that the oral stipulation did not express the true intent of the parties, and the court "again implement[ed]" the order that was the subject of the prior appeal. The Appellate Division rejected defendant's contention that the oral stipulation was clear on its face. To the contrary, the court properly determined that there was no meeting of the minds, inasmuch as the parties introduced conflicting evidence with respect to their intended division of the property at the time they entered into the stipulation and thereby established that there was a mutual mistake. It agreed with defendant that the court abused its discretion in dividing the parcel in accordance with the survey map procured by plaintiff. The court, in effect, reformed the parties' oral stipulation by adopting plaintiff's interpretation of the stipulation based on the survey map, despite the fact that defendant rejected that interpretation. It held that it is well established that in order to reform a written agreement, it must be demonstrated that the parties came to an understanding but, in reducing it to writing, through mutual mistake or through mistake on one side and fraud on the other, omitted some provision agreed upon or inserted one not agreed upon. Reformation is not a mechanism to interject into the writings terms or provisions not agreed upon or suggested by one party but rejected by the other, and a court may not substitute by reformation an agreement which it thinks is proper but to which the parties had never assented. Where, as here, the parties lack the requisite meeting of the minds when they enter into an oral stipulation, the appropriate relief is rescission of the stipulation and restoration of the parties to their pre-stipulation positions. In the absence of a valid agreement concerning the division of the parcel in question, such division must be based upon the equitable consideration and application of the factors enumerated in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(d). It therefore reversed the order and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for equitable distribution of the parcel in accordance with Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(d).

Adverse Inference for Missing Witness Not Appropriate Where Testimony Cumulative

In Matter of Spiegel v Spiegel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4679182, 2009 N.Y. Slip Op. 09236 (NYAD 2 Dept) the Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate properly declined to draw an adverse inference against the mother for her failure to produce her current child care worker to testify, as testimony from that witness would have been cumulative. (see e.g. Austin v. Carstens-Elliot, 39 A.D.3d 443, 831 N.Y.S.2d 734; Clements v. Lindsey, 237 A.D.2d 557, 655 N.Y.S.2d 987).

Taking Child to Philippines Is Not "Unjustifiable Conduct" Where There Is No Custody Order Preventing it

In Sanjuan v Sanjuan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4981840 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff mother and the defendant father were married in the Philippines, and their daughter was born there. They emigrated to the United States and lived together from August 2005 until late June 2007, when the father took the child back to the Philippines. On July 24, 2008, the father filed a petition in the Philippines Regional Trial Court to annul the marriage and for custody of the child. The next day, the mother filed a summons with notice in the Supreme Court for a divorce and ancillary relief, seeking custody of the child. The father moved to dismiss, for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, so much of the complaint as sought custody of the child, and the court granted the motion. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly adhered to the original determination upon granting reargument. At the time the proceeding was commenced in the Philippines, the child's "home state" was the Philippines, as she had been living there with the father for a period of approximately 13 months (DRL 75-a[7], 76[1][a]). By taking the child to the Philippines, the father did not engage in "unjustifiable conduct" such that the Philippines should have declined jurisdiction (DRL 76-g[1]). There was no custody order that prevented the father from taking the child to the Philippines. While the mother initially indicated to the Supreme Court that she had no knowledge of their whereabouts, she later stated that several days after the father left with the child, she learned that they were in the Philippines, and the mother's family visited with the child there on several occasions. Since the mother knew of the child's whereabouts, and there was no existing custody order in place preventing the father from taking the child to the Philippines, the father's conduct was not unjustifiable. Even if the father's conduct had been unjustifiable, the mother acquiesced to the jurisdiction of the Philippines (DRL 76-g[1][a]). According to the mother, she filed a summons with notice about a month after the father left for the Philippines, but that action "expired" because she was unsuccessful in effecting service. The mother did not recommence her action until almost one year later. By waiting, the mother acquiesced to the jurisdiction of the Philippines.

No Requirement That Movant Identify Specific Statute or Rule in Notice of Motion. Must Be Pattern of Wilful Failure to Justify Preclusion

In Matter of Blauman-Spindler v Bauman,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4985472 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that contrary to the father's contention, there is no requirement that a movant identify a specific statute or rule in the notice of motion, only that the notice "specify ... the relief demanded and the grounds therefor" (CPLR 2214 [a]). Even though the mother's notice of motion and supporting affirmation did not formally and specifically request relief pursuant to CPLR 3126, where, as here, there is no misunderstanding or prejudice, "a court may grant relief that is warranted by the facts plainly appearing on the papers on both sides". Here, the mother's notice of motion clearly sought the relief of preclusion based upon the father's alleged willful failure to respond to her discovery demands. Accordingly, because the father was adequately apprised of the relief sought and the grounds therefor, there was no prejudice, and the Support Magistrate did not err in treating the motion as one made pursuant to CPLR 3126. Nevertheless, the Support Magistrate improvidently exercised her discretion in granting that branch of the mother's motion which was to preclude evidence of the father's finances. While the nature and degree of the penalty to be imposed pursuant to CPLR 3126 is a matter within the discretion of the court in order "[t]o invoke the drastic remedy" of preclusion for failure to disclose pursuant to CPLR 3126(2), the court "must determine that the offending party's lack of cooperation with disclosure was willful, deliberate, and contumacious". The father served responses and objections to the mother's discovery demands. While the mother was clearly dissatisfied with the objections and responses to her demands, there was no showing of a pattern of willful failure to respond to discovery demands or comply with disclosure orders, so as to justify an order of preclusion. Moreover, the mother's motion was unsupported by an affirmation of a good faith effort to resolve the purported discovery dispute as required by 22 NYCRR 202.7(a)(2) .

His or Her Driver's License

In Circe v Circe, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4348396 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) after the father failed to make court-ordered support payments for a period of five months, the County Support Collection Unit notified him that his driver's license would be suspended based upon his failure to make support payments. The father filed petitions against the mother for modification of support and a violation petition naming both the mother and SCU as respondents, alleging that SCU intended to wrongfully suspend his driver's license. Following a hearing, a Support Magistrate dismissed all petitions but, in light of the father's recent support payment, recommended that SCU refrain from suspending his driver's license as long as he continued making payments. The father commenced a proceeding, alleging that SCU was garnishing more of his income than directed under the current order of support, and requesting a refund. Upon consent of the father and the mother, the Support Magistrate issued an amended order of support, modifying the amount to be paid by the father toward arrears, which totaled approximately $82,000. Although the record contained no request for such relief in connection with the proceeding on appeal the Support Magistrate directed that SCU was not to impose any administrative orders or any driver's license suspension, and that any suspension in effect must be vacated. The Department of Social Services filed objections which Family Court denied. The Appellate Division agreed with DSS that Family Court erred in terminating the suspension of the father's driver's license because the father failed to exhaust his administrative remedies. It held that subject to certain exceptions not relevant here, SCU has the authority to enforce child support orders by suspension of a support obligor's driver's license when, among other things, the obligor has accumulated at least four months of arrears (Social Services Law 111-b [12]; 18 NYCRR 346.12). There was no dispute that the father received the required notice that his continued refusal to pay support would result in suspension of his driver's license or that he thereafter failed to follow any of the alternative procedures set forth in the regulation or statute for administratively challenging SCU's determination or avoiding suspension of his license. It concluded that the statutory scheme requires a support obligor to exhaust administrative remedies prior to seeking court review of SCU's determination to suspend his or her driver's license. Family Court's power to review ... SCU's determination in this regard is limited by statute. While the court may, in its discretion, rescind a court-imposed driver's license suspension after payment of arrears (Family Ct Act 458-a [a]), review of objections to an SCU determination to suspend an obligor's driving privileges must follow an administrative challenge, is limited to "the record and submissions of the support obligor and SCU, and must be denied unless SCU's determination is based upon a clearly erroneous determination of fact or error of law (Family Ct Act 454[5]). As petitioner failed to exhaust his administrative remedies or make any administrative record upon which SCU's determination could be reviewed, Family Court lacked the authority to revoke SCU's suspension of his driver's license or to direct that SCU impose no further administrative orders absent court order. (Family Ct Act 458-a [a], [d]).

FFCCSOA and UIFSA Does Not Apply to Original Support Petition Brought by Child Against Mother Where Sister State Support Order in Existence

In Matter of Clarke v Clarke,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4348948 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) a 1997 a support order issued by Superior Court in California directed respondent Michael Clark (father) to pay child support to respondent Connie Clark (mother) for their three children, including petitioner, their 17-year-old daughter, until each reached the age of majority or became emancipated. The mother and her children, including petitioner, moved to New York while the father remained in California. In 2008, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking an order directing both of her parents to pay directly to her any moneys that were tendered for her support. The father and the mother both moved to dismiss the petition, with the father specifically alleging that Family Court lacked personal jurisdiction over him. After the Support Magistrate ordered that the petition be dismissed, petitioner filed objections, claiming that the Support Magistrate erred by dismissing the petition against the mother, essentially conceding that the court lacked personal and subject matter jurisdiction over the father. Family Court disagreed with petitioner, and affirmed the decision of the Support

Support Obligor must Exhaust Administrative Remedies Prior to Seeking Court Review of Scu's Determination to Suspend Magistrate dismissing the petition as to both respondents. The Appellate Division reversed in part. It pointed out that Family Court concluded, among other things, that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction to grant the relief sought by the petition because FFCCSOA and UIFSA vest the issuing state with "continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over its child support orders so long as an individual contestant continues to reside in the issuing state. (42 USC 1738B [d]; 42 USC 654; Family Ct Act 580- 205). Here, the father remained a resident of California and, therefore, California retained exclusive jurisdiction over the child support order that obligated the father to pay child support. However, the Appellate Division agreed with petitioner that, with respect to the mother, the provisions of the FFCCSOA and UIFSA did not apply to this proceeding because her petition against the mother was not an attempt to modify the California support order but, rather, an original petition that, for the first time, sought an award of child support from her mother. A tribunal of this state may not modify any aspect of a child support order that may not be modified under the law of the issuing state (Family Ct Act 580-611[c]), and a modification is defined as "a change in a child support order that affects the amount, scope, or duration of the order and modifies, replaces, supercedes, or otherwise is made subsequent to the child support order" (28 USC 1738B [b] [B]). However, the Court did not view the petition against the mother and a resulting order against her as one that would result in a modification of any aspect of the California order or would otherwise disturb the continuing, exclusive jurisdiction that the California Superior Court had over its order directing the father to pay child support for his children to the mother. Rather, an order imposed in New York against the mother would, for the first time, establish the parameters of her obligation to support her children. The California order contained no direction with respect to an obligation on the part of the mother to pay child support. As such, the petition, as it had been filed against the mother, was a de novo application for child support and not directly or indirectly a modification of a prior, out-of-state order. The Appellate Division disagreed with Family Court that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hear an application of petitioner, who resided in New York, to seek an order obligating her mother, who was also a resident of this state, to provide for her support, where no order had been previously issued establishing the existence of such an obligation. The order was modified, on the law, by reversing so much thereof as granted respondent Connie Clarke's motion to dismiss the petition against her.

Support Obligation of a Parent of a Child Receiving Public Assistance Is Measured by Child's Needs and Parent's Means

In Matter of Gregory v Gregory, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 4447898 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept) the parents physically separated and the mother retained custody of the children. At some unspecified time, the parents agreed that the father would have primary custody of their two sons, and the mother would have primary custody of their daughter. Although there was no written agreement or court order concerning child support, the father claimed that he and the mother agreed that each parent would support the child or children in her or his custody, respectively. Thereafter, the mother applied for and was awarded public assistance. The mother received public assistance from August 1, 2004, until May 31, 2007, of $26,830.67, of which $13,415.44 was attributable to the support of the parties' daughter, who was the child in her custody. In May 2007 the mother commenced a proceeding seeking child support for the parties' daughter. The Department of Social Services (DSS) intervened in the proceeding, seeking payment of child support from the father, which sum included the money it had paid to the mother on behalf of the parties' daughter. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate calculated the father's support obligation for his daughter for the period to be $26,006.26, and directed him to pay that amount to the DSS. The Appellate Division held that Family Court's directive that the father pay the DSS the sum of $26,006.26 was proper. Since the support obligation of a parent of a child receiving public assistance is measured by the child's needs and the parent's means, not by the amount of public assistance paid on behalf of the child, the Family Court acted properly in declining to limit the amount required to be paid by the father to the DSS to the child's share of the public assistance grant (Matter of Commissioner of Social Servs. v. Segarra, 78 N.Y.2d 220). Contrary to the father's contention, he was not entitled to offset alleged unpaid child support from the mother against the amount he owed to the DSS. During the relevant time period, there was no support obligation imposed upon the mother for the children who were in the custody of the father.

Statement of Intention in Antenuptial Agreement Does Not Create Enforceable Right

In Smith v Smith, 66 A.D.3d 584, 888 N.Y.S.2d 14 (1 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order of the Supreme Court which awarded plaintiff a sum equal to 50% of the value of the apartment owned by defendant prior to the marriage upon a finding that defendant breached the terms of an antenuptial agreement. At issue was the meaning of a provision in an antenuptial agreement providing that defendant "shall cause the cooperative or condominium which he intends to purchase, with his funds, as the primary residence of the parties to be held in joint names of the parties with right of survivorship." The court determined that it was unable to give effect to this provision as written, and that it required extrinsic evidence of the parties' intentions on this issue. After holding a non-jury trial, the court found that the provision imposed an affirmative duty on defendant's part to fulfill his stated intention of buying a new apartment in the parties' joint names, that defendant had breached that duty, and, as a remedy for the breach, the court awarded plaintiff a sum equal to 50% of the value of the apartment owned by defendant prior to the marriage. The Appellate Division disagreed with the trial court's conclusion that the provision was ambiguous. A contract is unambiguous if the language it uses has "a definite and precise meaning, unattended by danger of misconception in the purport of the [agreement] itself, and concerning which there is no reasonable basis for a difference of opinion" (Breed v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 46 N.Y.2d 351, 355 [1978]). Here, the intent to purchase clause did not create an enforceable obligation, as a mere statement of an intention, even if expressed unconditionally and unequivocally does not, on its own, give rise to a binding contract. This reading of the provision was consistent with other terms of the agreement, specifically D(ii) of Article 8, which provided that if no jointly owned marital residence was held at the termination of the parties' marriage, defendant was required to pay to plaintiff $500,000, if such termination occurs within the first five years of the marriage and $1,000,000 if such termination occurs after the fifth anniversary of the marriage. There was no basis to deviate from the agreement as written. Given this bargained for payment, as well as the other financial provisions included in the agreement for the benefit of plaintiff in the event the marriage terminated, there was no basis for the court's conclusion that plaintiff's waiver of spousal support or maintenance must have been premised on a guarantee of a joint share in a marital residence. Nor did plaintiff provide any other basis for a contractual right to half the equity in defendant's pre-marital apartment.

Provision for Counsel Fees for Services Rendered does not Bar Future Counsel Fee Application

In McMahan v McMahan, 66 A.D.3d 969, 888 N.Y.S.2d 133 (2 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division held that since the provision of the parties stipulation of settlement providing that each party was responsible for his or her own counsel fees was drafted in the past tense, referring to fees for "services rendered," such provision did not bar her request for an award of interim counsel fees for litigation between the parties which post-dated the agreement.

Second Department Holds Cause of Action for Social Abandonment Does Not State a Cause of Action

In Davis v Davis, ___AD3d ___, 11/23/2009 NYLJ 17, (col. 3) (2d Dept 2009) the Second Department, in an opinion by Justice Dillon, held that the 'social abandonment' of a spouse may not qualify as 'abandonment' and provide a ground for the dissolution of marriage under Domestic Relations Law 170(2). The plaintiff, Novel Davis, commenced this action for a divorce against her husband. Shepherd Davis, by the filing of an amended summons with notice and a verified complaint alleging two causes of action, one asserting constructive abandonment under Domestic Relations Law s170(2). The complaint alleged that the husband refused to engage in social interaction with the wife by refusing to celebrate with her or acknowledge Valentine's Day, Christmas, Thanksgiving, and the wife's birthday, by refusing to eat meals together, by refusing to attend family functions or accompany the wife to movies, shopping, restaurants, and church services, by leaving her once at a hospital emergency room, by removing the wife's belongings from the marital bedroom, and by otherwise ignoring her. The parties had been married for 41 years and resided at the same address. The husband filed a pre-answer motion pursuant to CPLR 3211(a) (7) to dismiss the constructive abandonment cause of action. The husband argued that the wife's factual allegations of 'social abandonment failed to state a cause of action for a divorce based on 'constructive abandonment. Supreme Court granted the husband's motion pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7) to dismiss the second cause of action for a divorce on the ground of social abandonment. The Appellate Division affirmed. Justice Dillon noted that Domestic Relations Law 170 sets forth six statutory grounds on which a spouse may seek to divorce another. The abandonment ground for divorce, set forth in Domestic Relations Law 170(2), provides that an action for a divorce may be maintained based upon '[t]he abandonment of the plaintiff by the defendant for a period of one or more years.' Abandonment was recognized as a statutory ground for divorce in the Domestic Relations Law in 1966 but had also been recognized in earlier statutes, CPA 1147 and 1156. The essence of abandonment is the refusal of one spouse to fulfill 'basic obligations springing from the marriage contract' (Schine v. Schine, 31 NY2d 113, 119; see Mirizio v. Mirizio, 242 NY 74, 81). A viable cause of action under Domestic Relations Law s170(2) has been recognized in three different factual forms. The first, not applicable here, involves a defendant spouse's actual physical departure from the marital residence that is unjustified, voluntary, without consent of the plaintiff spouse, and with the intention of the departing spouse not to return. The second, also not applicable here, exists when the defendant spouse locks the plaintiff spouse out of the marital residence, absent justification or consent. The third is based on 'constructive abandonment,' which has been routinely defined as the refusal by a defendant spouse to engage in sexual relations with the plaintiff spouse for one or more years prior to the commencement of the action, when such refusal is unjustified, willful, and continual, and despite repeated requests for the resumption of sexual relations. The earliest interpretation by the Court of Appeals that arguably extended the notion of 'abandonment' beyond its plain dictionary meaning arose in the 1926 case of Mirizio v. Mirizio (242 NY 74). Mirizio involved a wife's refusal to consummate a civil marriage with her husband pending the conduct of a religious ceremony in which the husband refused to partake. The Court of Appeals held in Mirizio that a spouse's refusal to consummate a marriage constitutes a breach of the marriage contract, permitting the dissolution of the marriage itself. The 1960 case of Diemer v. Diemer (8 NY2d 206) involved a refusal by one spouse to continue sexual relations with the other spouse as a result of newly discovered religious concerns. The Court of Appeals noted that marriage 'involves something far more fundamental than mere physical propinquity and, as a consequence, abandonment is not limited to mere technical physical separation'. The criterion for abandonment, the Court continued, is how fundamentally the denial of a marital right strikes at the institution of marriage (id. at 210). The Court of Appeals concluded in Diemer that a refusal of one spouse to engage in sexual relations with the other spouse undermines the central structure of marriage, and qualifies as an abandonment that is constructive, rather than actual, in nature. Constructive abandonment, therefore, was cognizable when a plaintiff spouse could prove that the abandoning spouse unjustifiably and continually refused to fulfill this basic obligation arising from their marriage contract for a period of at least one year. The wife argued, nonetheless, that her complaint stated a cause of action for a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment based upon the authority of C.P. v. G.P. (6 Misc 3d 1034[A]), and Michaelessi v. Michaelessi (10 Misc 3d 1067[A]). The amended complaint in C.P. v. G.P. alleged a cause of action for constructive abandonment based upon allegations that the defendant husband continually refused to engage in sexual relations, despite demands, and without justification, for the requisite year. An additional cause of action, denominated as one for cruel and inhuman treatment, contained allegations remarkably similar to those at issue here; namely, that the husband refused to celebrate various family events and holidays with his wife, refused to eat meals with her, refused to attend social events with her, and maintained a separate bedroom. The Supreme Court held, in C.P. v. G.P., that while the second cause of action did not adequately state grounds for cruel and inhuman treatment, the same allegations did state a cause of action for a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment based upon the absence of conjugal relations. The court also noted that a defendant spouse who has refused to engage in any family interaction with his plaintiff spouse for more than one year, without cause or condonation, has failed to fulfill a basic obligation of the marriage contract, no less so than the obligation of engaging in sexual relations. The Supreme Court thus recognized social abandonment allegations as sufficient to withstand the husband's dismissal motion brought under CPLR 3211 and Domestic Relations Law 170 (2). Similarly, Michaelessi v. Michaelessi involved allegations by the plaintiff wife that she was socially abandoned by the defendant husband as a result of his refusal for several years to attend any social, recreational, or family functions as a couple, by the maintenance of a separate bedroom, and by the separate purchases and preparation of their daily meals. The parties disputed whether the husband had refused to engage in sexual relations. After a trial on grounds that included sharp questions of fact and an assessment of the parties' credibility, the court found that the plaintiff wife established a constructive abandonment 'under any reasonable construction of the term, suggesting, without necessarily stating, a sexual and/or social abandonment.

The Appellate Division found, that there is no cognizable cause of action for 'social abandonment' in New York, and that, consequently, the plaintiff's second cause of action was properly dismissed. The determination was based upon five factors, any one of which supported the conclusion that 'social abandonment' is not a recognized ground for divorce in this State. First, our State Legislature has chosen to include in Domestic Relations Law 170 (2) mere reference to 'abandonment' which, in addition to its plain dictionary meaning regarding physical departure, has been expanded by the Court of Appeals only so far as its current constructive form. The plaintiff's allegations of social abandonment may appropriately be viewed as merely another way of claiming 'irreconcilable differences' between spouses, that do not constitute a cognizable ground for divorce, or of claiming the existence of a 'dead marriage.' which also is not a cognizable ground. The second reason it did not recognize social abandonment as a cognizable ground for divorce involved the longevity of the current definitional understanding of constructive abandonment. Since 1960, every constructive abandonment case reported from appellate courts, without apparent exception, has applied the concept of constructive abandonment solely to the denial of sexual relations. The third reason, related to the second, was that a judicial recognition of social abandonment, where none is supported in the statute, would constitute a judicial usurpation of legislative authority. Fourth, the court did not accept the argument that a social abandonment of one spouse by another is a provision of the marriage contract that necessarily equates with a spouse's refusal to engage in sexual relations. Fifth, there were practical difficulties associated with trying to define a social abandonment cause of action. 'Social abandonment' eludes clear or easy definition..

Greater Economic Contributions to Marriage Doesn't Mean Entitlement to Greater Percentage of Marital Property.

In Wasserman v Wasserman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3380654 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the plaintiff and the defendant were married on July 6, 1979. The plaintiff was 65 years old and the defendant is 57 years old. During the course of their marriage, the parties had two children, who were emancipated. In 1979, shortly before the birth of their first child, the plaintiff became the sole source of financial support for the family. The defendant was a stay-at-home mother prior to the commencement of this divorce action. In 2002 the defendant graduated from SUNY Purchase with a BA degree. In November 2003 she became a licensed real estate broker. The parties were divorced by judgment dated May 22, 2008. The defendant was awarded, inter alia, 50% of the value of the plaintiff's businesses and 50% of the value of the marital premises, and maintenance in the sum of $10,000 per month for the two years immediately following the judgment of divorce, the sum of $7,500 per month for the next three years, and the sum of $5,000 per month for three years after that. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly relied upon the opinion of the defendant's expert regarding the value of the plaintiff's business interests. In a nonjury trial, evaluating the credibility of the respective witnesses and determining which of the proffered items of evidence are most credible are matters committed to the trial court's sound discretion. There is no uniform rule for fixing the value of a business for the purpose of equitable distribution. Valuation is an exercise properly within the fact-finding power of the trial court, guided by expert testimony. The determination of the fact finder as to the value of a business, if within the range of the testimony presented, will be accorded deference on appeal if it rests primarily on the credibility of expert witnesses and their valuation techniques. The record supported the Supreme Court's determination as to the value of the plaintiff's business. Considering the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant 50% of the value of the plaintiff's businesses. The fact that the plaintiff may have made greater economic contributions to the marriage than the defendant did not necessarily mean that he was entitled to a greater percentage of the marital property. The plaintiff's financial statements indicated that he could not pay the distributive award in only three installments, six months apart, without liquidating his assets. Therefore, it modified to direct that he make six equal installment payments to the defendant, each six months apart, with interest at the rate of 9% from the date of the judgment until the balance is paid. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in determining an appropriate maintenance award. In determining the appropriate amount and duration of maintenance, the court is required to consider, among other factors, the standard of living of the parties during the marriage and the present and future earning capacity of both parties. While the Supreme Court properly found that the defendant was capable of earning a living, "the wife's ability to become self-supporting with respect to some standard of living in no way ... obviates the need for the court to consider the predivorce standard of living" (Hartog v. Hartog, 85 N.Y.2d 36, 52). The maintenance award of $10,000 per month for the two years immediately following the judgment of divorce, of $7,500 per month for the next three years, and of $5,000 per month for three years after that, would permit the defendant to maintain the pre-divorce standard of living while allowing her a reasonably sufficient time to become self-supporting. The Court held that Supreme Court properly declined to direct the plaintiff to pay her health insurance premiums, where she had been awarded a substantial distributive award and maintenance (see Atwal v. Atwal, 270 A.D.2d 799).

Appreciation Remains Separate Property If it Resulted Purely from Market Forces

In Zaretsky v Zaretsky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3380620 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff husband and the defendant wife were married on May 29, 1994, and had three unemancipated children. Both parents were born deaf. For most of the marriage, the defendant was a stay-at-home mother. Throughout the marriage, the plaintiff worked for Maxi-Aids, Inc. (Maxi-Aids), a company established by his father, to which the plaintiff was gifted a one-third interest prior to his marriage. In 2004 and 2005, the plaintiff's gross income exceeded $500,000, and he received substantial additional funds from both parents. Since 1994, the plaintiff has held a one-half interest in M & H Realty, Inc., which owned the building from which Maxi-Aids operates (M & H property). Following trial, the court awarded the defendant 100% of the equity in the marital residence, as well as sole title and a cash award of $258,527. On appeal the plaintiff contended that he was entitled to a $400,000 separate property credit for the marital residence, which was purchased in 2000. That figure represented a $150,000 down payment provided by the plaintiff's father, as well as $250,000 in renovation expenses purportedly paid by the father. The Appellate Division held that while a separate property credit may be warranted when a marital asset is purchased with property that was gifted to only one spouse the record reflected that any moneys associated with the home purchase and renovations were gifts to both parties. Accordingly, the plaintiff was not entitled to a separate property credit. The Appellate Court agreed with the plaintiff's contention that the award to defendant of 100% of the equity in the marital residence was improper. The defendant was entitled to 40% of the plaintiff's one-half interest in the M & H property, as well as a 40% share of the total appreciated value of the plaintiff's one-third interest in Maxi-Aids. The defendant was not entitled to any share of the plaintiff's interest in the M & H property. The plaintiff acquired the property very shortly after the parties' May 1994 wedding. Property acquired during the marriage is presumed to be marital property and the party seeking to overcome such presumption has the burden of proving that the property in dispute is separate property. Plaintiff met his burden. The plaintiff demonstrated that the M & H property was purchased with an $80,000 down payment from the plaintiff's father and brother. The evidence revealed that, in contrast to the money given for the marital residence, the down payment was intended as a gift to the plaintiff, rather than to both parties. The defendant never had title to the property. The defendant also was not entitled to any share of the appreciated value of the M & H property. The appreciation remains separate property if it resulted purely from market forces, as opposed to the titled spouse's efforts. The record reflected that no efforts on the plaintiff's part resulted in the appreciation of value of the M & H property; rather, that property appreciated solely due to market forces. With respect to the plaintiff's one-third interest in Maxi-Aids, although the plaintiff and his father attempted to downplay the plaintiff's efforts, the record revealed that the appreciation of Maxi-Aids during the marriage was due, at least in part, to the plaintiff's active participation, which was facilitated by the defendant's indirect contributions as a homemaker. Accordingly, the defendant was entitled to a share of the appreciated value of that asset. The Supreme Court failed to articulate fully its basis for awarding the defendant 40% of the total appreciated value of the plaintiff's interest in Maxi-Aids, as opposed to a portion thereof. Before making the distributive award, the court should have considered the extent and significance of the plaintiff's efforts in relation to the active efforts of others and any additional passive or active factors, and determined what percentage of the total appreciation constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution. In light of the foregoing, the entire distributive award had to be reconsidered and recalculated. Therefore, the matter was remitted to Supreme Court for a new determination on the issue of equitable distribution. The plaintiff's contention that the seven-year duration of the maintenance award was excessive was without merit. In light of, inter alia, the duration of the parties' marriage, the defendant's limited education, the years she devoted to child-rearing, and the parties' standard of living, a period of seven years was entirely appropriate.

Basic Military Allowances for Housing and Subsistence, Received as a Member of the United States Army, Constitute "Income" for the Purposes of Calculating a Parent's Child Support Obligation

In Matter of Massey v Evans,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3153251 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the father contended that Family Court erred in determining that his basic military allowances for housing and subsistence (BAH and BAS), which he received as a member of the United States Army constitute "income" for the purposes of calculating a parent's child support obligation. The Fourth Department, in an opinion by Justice Peradatto, rejected that contention and affirmed the order of the Family Court. Petitioner mother commenced a proceeding seeking a determination that respondent was the father of her then-two-year-old child and seeking an award of child support. After an order of filiation was entered, the parties stipulated that the mother earned $14,226 per year and that the father receives base pay from the military in the amount of $22,186.80 per year. The parties further stipulated that, in addition to his base pay, the father received BAH in the amount of $10,776 per year and BAS in the amount of $3,533.16 per year. BAH is a monthly sum paid to members of the military who do not reside in government-supplied housing (see 37 USC 403[a][1]; Army Regulation 37-104-4, s 12-1). The amount of BAH, which is intended to offset the cost of civilian housing, varies according to the member's pay grade, geographic location, and dependency status (see 37 USC 403[a][1]; Army Regulation 37-104-4, s 12-2). BAS is an additional monthly sum paid to active duty members to subsidize the cost of meals purchased for the benefit of the individual member on or off base (see 37 USC 402[a][1]; Army Regulation 37-104-4, s 11-3). The amount of BAS is based upon average food costs as determined by the federal government (see 37 USC 402[b]). Justice Peradatto pointed out that the specific question of whether military allowances may be included in a parent's income for child support purposes has never been addressed by a New York court. Family Court Act 413(1)(b)(5) provides that a parent's "income" includes, but is not limited to, gross income as reported on the most recent federal income tax return and, to the extent not reflected in that amount, "income received" from eight enumerated sources such as workers' compensation, disability benefits, unemployment insurance benefits, and veterans benefits. The statute also affords courts considerable discretion to attribute or impute income from "such other resources as may be available to the parent" (Family Ct Act 413[1][b][5][iv]; see also Irene v. Irene [appeal No. 2], 41 AD3d 1179, 1180; Matter of Hurd v. Hurd, 303 A.D.2d 928; Matter of Klein v. Klein, 251 A.D.2d 733, 735). Such resources include, but are not limited to, "meals, lodging, memberships, automobiles or other perquisites that are provided as part of compensation for employment to the extent that such perquisites constitute expenditures for personal use, or which expenditures directly or indirectly confer personal economic benefits [and] ... fringe benefits provided as part of compensation for employment" (413[1][b][5] [iv]). In the Courts view the allowances that the father received from the military fell within the CSSA's broad definition of income. Pursuant to the plain language of the statute, parental income "shall not be limited to " taxable income or to the specifically enumerated sources of compensation (Family Ct Act 413[1] [b][5] The legislative history of the statute further supported the conclusion that the definition of "income" should be broadly construed to include the allowances at issue. The father contended that BAH and BAS did not constitute "income" within the meaning of Family Court Act 413(1)(b)(5) because the allowances are excluded from income for federal income tax purposes (see Internal Revenue Code [26 USC] 134[a]). The Court rejected that contention. As courts in other states have noted in rejecting similar contentions, the purposes underlying the federal tax code and child support statutes are different. The objective of the former is to calculate an individual's taxable income, while the objective of the latter is to determine the amount that a parent can afford to pay for the support of his or her child, and the CSSA does not limit a parent's income to the amount reported on the parent's income tax return (see Family Ct Act 413[b][5][i]). To the contrary, the statute gives courts the "discretion to look beyond tax returns to determine actual expenses and income" Notably, veterans benefits are specifically included in the Family Court Act's definition of income, notwithstanding the fact that such benefits are excluded from taxable income under federal law (see 413[1][b][5][iii] [E]).

The father contended that BAH and BAS should be excluded from income for child support purposes because a military member's "pay" does not include military allowances pursuant to 37 USC 101(21). The court found no merit to that contention. The federal statutory definition of "pay" is not relevant to the issue whether military allowances constitute income for purposes of calculating a member's child support obligation under New York law. In any event, federal law defines "regular compensation" or "regular military compensation" as "the total of the following elements that a member of a uniformed service accrues or receives, directly or indirectly, in cash or in kind every payday: basic pay, basic allowance for housing, basic allowance for subsistence; and Federal tax advantage accruing to the aforementioned allowances because they are not subject to Federal income tax" (37 USC 101[25]. Various federal regulations also supported the conclusion that BAH and BAS are part of a member's compensation for military service (see e.g. 33 CFR 55.7 ["[t]otal family income" for purposes of child development services includes "incentive and special pay for service or anything else of value, even if not taxable, that was received for providing services," e.g., BAH and BAS]; 32 CFR 54.4 [allowances for subsistence and housing are included within a member's "disposable earnings" pursuant to 42 USC 665 for purposes of calculating child support allotments]). Federal law thus recognizes that BAH, BAS and the associated tax advantages of such allowances provide members of the military with a valuable employment benefit that is not reflected in their base pay. The father also contended that BAH and BAS are not "perquisites" within the meaning of Family Court Act 413 because the allowances are not for his "personal use" and confer no "personal economic benefits" upon him (413[1][b][5][iv][B]). In support of that contention, the father relied on federal tax regulations for the proposition that the value of meals or lodging furnished to an employee for the convenience of his or her employer is excluded from gross income (see 26 CFR 1.61-21[a][2]). Even assuming, arguendo, that such regulations were relevant to the issue whether military allowances should be imputed as income for child support purposes under New York law, the court noted that meals and lodging furnished to an employee or his or her dependents are excluded from income only if "the meals are furnished on the business premises of the employer ... [and] the employee is required to accept such lodging on the business premises of his [or her] employer as a condition of his [or her] employment" (Internal Revenue Code [26 USC] 119[a]). Here, the father received BAS in the form of additional cash in his paycheck, which can be used to purchase meals or groceries at establishments of his choice, and BAH is applied to the father's choice of dwellings. There was no question that the food and housing allowances "directly or indirectly confer personal economic benefits" upon the father (Family Ct Act 413[1][b][5][iv][B]).

The Court also reject the alternative contention of the father that the higher housing allowance he received because he has a wife and a second child should be attributed to his wife and thus excluded from the calculation of his child support obligation for the child in question. The father received that allowance as additional compensation for his military service (see 37 USC 101[25]). The fact that he receives the greater "with dependents" BAH rate (403[a][2]) to accommodate the higher costs associated with housing a family does not mean that the difference between the basic rate and the "with dependents" rate is income earned by his wife rather than him. A "dependent" is defined as, inter alia, a spouse or a minor child, including an "illegitimate child" (401[a], [b][1][C]). The Court noted that the CSSA "is based on the principle that children are entitled to share in the income and standard of living of their parents, whether or not the parents are living together". If the child who is the subject of the instant proceeding resided with the father and his new family, she would share in the benefits conferred by the higher BAH that he received as a result of his dependency status. It held that the parties' daughter should not be deprived of the benefit of that allowance simply because her parents did not live together.

Error to Require Attorney for Child to Offer Expert Testimony on Issues of Child's Capacity to Articulate Her Desires

In Matter of Krieger v Krieger, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3135655 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were awarded joint custody of their adolescent daughter, on consent, with residential custody to the father. In May 2007, the father filed a petition to modify the order so as to allow him to relocate with the child to the State of Ohio. Upon the mother's default in personally appearing on scheduled hearing dates, the Family Court granted the father's petition, and awarded sole custody of the child to the father. The attorney for the child appealed from the order asserting that a number of errors were committed by the Family Court which require reversal of the award of sole custody to the father and the grant of permission for him to relocate with the child to the State of Ohio. The Appellate Division noted that the appointment of an attorney to represent a child in Family Court proceedings, whether the appointment is required by statute or, as in this case, the appointment is made in the court's discretion, is based on the legislative determination "that counsel is often indispensable to a practical realization of due process of law and may be helpful in making reasoned determinations of fact and proper orders of disposition" (Family Court Act 241). The right to counsel has been held to imply that the court will afford a respondent and his or her attorney a reasonable opportunity to appear and present evidence and arguments. An attorney appointed to represent a child in a Family Court proceeding should be accorded the same reasonable opportunity to appear and present evidence and arguments on behalf of the child as is accorded the child's mother or father, or other interested party. Under the circumstances of this case, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to adjourn the hearing to provide the attorney for the child with a reasonable opportunity to present additional witnesses. The rules applicable to the representation of a child in a Family Court proceeding require that the attorney adhere to the same ethical requirements applicable to all attorneys: that the attorney zealously advocate the child's position; that the attorney have a thorough knowledge of the child's circumstances; and that the attorney consult with and advise the child, consistent with the child's capacities, in ascertaining the child's position (see 22 NYCRR 7.2[b][c][d][1]). In addition, the attorney for the child must follow the child's wishes to refrain from taking a position for or against requested relief where the child has the capacity to take such a position and is not at imminent risk of harm, regardless of whether the attorney believes that the grant or denial of the requested relief would be in the child's best interest (see 22 NYCRR 7.2[d][2]). The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred, however, in requiring the attorney for the child to offer expert testimony on the issues of the child's capacity to articulate her desires and whether the child would be at imminent risk of harm if she moved with the father to the State of Ohio, prior to the attorney advocating a position that could be viewed as contrary to the child's wishes. The Rules of the Chief Judge do not impose such a requirement (see 22 NYCRR 7.2). The Family Court also erred in awarding sole custody of the child to the father, as the father did not request such relief in his modification petition. It remitted for a new hearing on the father's modification petition. Upon remittal, the hearing on the father's petition shall be conducted before a different judicial officer; and given the intemperate remarks made by the attorney for the child, and the attorney's confrontational approach toward the court, the Family Court may consider whether it is appropriate to appoint a new attorney for the child or continue the representation.

Testimony of Custody Expert Admissible Since Expert Opinion Primarily Based upon Direct Knowledge

In Lubit v Lubit, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3029647 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed Supreme Court's determination awarding custody to the mother with liberal visitation to the father. The evidence demonstrated that the acrimony and mistrust that marked the parties' relationship made joint custody a nonviable option. An attempt at joint custody that the parties negotiated failed when appellant unreasonably insisted that the parties share custody on such a strictly equal basis that for several months the three children, ages 2 to 8, alternated daily between their parents' residences. A detailed alternative worked out with a law guardian also failed. The parties were unable to co-parent because they were openly hostile to each other and, without drawn-out negotiations, could not reach agreement on any decisions with respect to their children, including important matters involving education, extra-curricular activities and medical care. The court properly found that the interests of the children would best be served by awarding sole custody to the mother because her style of parenting was more nurturing and conducive to the children's emotional and intellectual development, and because she was the children's primary caretaker before the litigation commenced. The father demonstrated excessive anxiety about the children's physical well-being, and was inflexible in his response to the children's needs. The Appellate Division held that the testimony of the expert was admissible since the expert opinion was primarily based upon direct knowledge derived from the expert's psychiatric interviews of the parties and their children, alone and in combination (Balsz v. A & T Bus Co., 252 A.D.2d 458 [1998]). To the extent that the expert's report and testimony may have incorporated inadmissible hearsay, the court found that the admissible evidence in the record, including the portion of the expert's report that did not include hearsay, was sufficient to support the trial court's conclusion. Although the court should have stricken the hearsay aspects of the expert's written report, admitting it did not constitute reversible error. It also found that the court did not treat the law guardian as an unsworn witness by briefly referring to her opinion as to custody and her basis for it. The court appropriately took notice of the position that the law guardian had taken as an advocate on the children's behalf.
