In Friedman v Roman, 65 A.D.3d 1187, 885 N.Y.S.2d 740 (2 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division held that generally, courts will enforce a choice-of-law clause so long as the chosen law bears a reasonable relationship to the parties or the transaction. (Welsbach Elec. Corp. v. MasTec N. Am., Inc., 7 N.Y.3d 624, 629, 825 N.Y.S.2d 692, 859 N.E.2d 498). Here, the Supreme Court properly determined that the New Jersey choice-of-law provision contained in the parties' marital agreement would be enforced. Accordingly, the matter had to be analyzed pursuant to New Jersey law. It held that under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court erred in concluding, as a matter of law, that the parties' marital agreement was an invalid and unenforceable "mid-marriage" agreement (Pacelli v. Pacelli, 319 N.J.Super. 185, 185, 725 A.2d 56). Although the agreement was executed shortly after the parties' marriage, the record revealed triable issues of fact as to whether it constituted a valid and enforceable "premarital agreement" (NJSA 37:2-38; see Harrington v. Harrington, 281 N.J.Super. 39, 656 A.2d 456). Accordingly, the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, for further proceedings on the complaint.

November 2, 2009

Former Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (c) (5), and Family Court Act § 413, subdivision 1 (c) (5), which were amended in 2009, required the court to prorate each parent's share of the reasonable health care expenses of the child, where such expenses are not covered by insurance, in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income. They provided that the noncustodial parent's pro rata share of such health care expenses was to be paid in a manner determined by the court, including direct payment to the health care provider. Laws of 2009, Ch 215 § 2. (See also Family Court Act 413, subdivision 1 (c) (5), Laws of 2009, Ch 215 § 1). Former Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b), subdivision (c) (5) was repealed and a new Domestic Relations Law §240 (1-b) (c) (5) was added. It provides, in part, that:

"The court shall determine the parties' obligation to provide health insurance benefits pursuant to this section and to pay cash medical support as provided under this subparagraph."

"Cash medical support" means an amount ordered to be paid toward the cost of health insurance provided by a public entity or by a parent through an employer or organization, including employers or organizations which are self insured, or through other available health insurance or health care coverage plans, and/or for other health care expenses not covered by insurance.

It also provides, in part:

(v) In addition to the amounts ordered under clause (ii), (iii), or (iv), the court shall pro rate each parent's share of reasonable health care expenses not reimbursed or paid by insurance, the medical assistance program established pursuant to title eleven of article five of the social services law, or the state's child health insurance plan pursuant to title one-A of article twenty-five of the public health law, in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income, and state the non-custodial parent's share as a percentage in the order. The non-custodial parent's pro rata share of such health care expenses determined by the court to be due and owing shall be support arrears/past due support and shall be subject to any remedies provided by law for the enforcement of support arrears/past due support. In addition, the court may direct that the non-custodial parent's pro rata share of such health care expenses be paid in one sum or in periodic sums, including direct payment to the health care provider.

(vi) Upon proof by either party that cash medical support pursuant to clause (ii), (iii), (iv), or (v) of this subparagraph would be unjust or inappropriate pursuant to paragraph (f) of this subdivision, the court shall:

(A) order the parties to pay cash medical support as the court finds just and appropriate, considering the best interests of the child; and

(B) set forth in the order the factors it considered, the amount calculated under this subparagraph, the reason or reasons the court did not order such amount, and the basis for the amount awarded.

Former Domestic Relations Law § 240(1)(d) and Family Court Act § 416(f), which provided for the proration of costs between the parties where private health insurance is ordered, were amended at the same time to provide that the cost of private health insurance, or the cost of any premium, family contribution, or health expense incurred as a result of enrollment in the State Child Health Insurance Program or Medical Assistance program shall be deemed "cash medical support." Each parent's contribution to the cost of such coverage is to be determined under the amended provisions of and Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (c) (5) and Family Court Act § 413, subdivision 1 (c) (5). Laws of 2009, Ch 215 § 7 & 8.

Family Court Act §§ 514 and 545, respectively, were amended to provide that the necessary expenses incurred by or for the mother in connection with her pregnancy, confinement and recovery shall be deemed a cash medical support obligation and the court must determine the obligation of either or both parties to contribute to the cost pursuant to Family Court Act § 413. Laws of 2009, Ch 215, §§ 7 & 8.

CPLR 5241 was amended to provide that a Deductions to satisfy current support obligations shall have priority over deductions for the debtor's share of health insurance premiums which shall have priority over any additional deduction authorized by CPLR 5241 (g). Civil Practice Law and Rules 5241 (h) as amended by Laws of 2009, Ch 215, § 12, effective Oct. 9, 2009.

Second Department Holds Despite Lack of Evidence. Disability Portion of Fireman Pension Can Be Determined by Pension Administrator Pursuant to QDRO. Rejects Rule That Economic Component of Personal Injury Award Is Separate Property.

In Howe v Howe, __AD3d__, 10/5/2009 NYLJ 17, (col. 3) the plaintiff became a New York City firefighter soon after the parties were married, and remained in that employment until approximately 16 months prior to the commencement of this action. He was disabled as a result of his service during the period immediately following September 11, 2001, and retired with a disability pension. The Supreme Court, reasoning that the plaintiff had failed to satisfy his burden of establishing the separate nature of the pension, found the entire pension to be a part of the marital estate and awarded the defendant 'her Majauskas' share (see Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 NY2d 481, 490). The plaintiff argued that the lack of expert testimony or evidence in the record by which the nondisability portion of the pension can be distinguished from the disability portion was not fatal to his separate property claim, since that distinction can be made by the pension administrator in the same manner as it makes the familiar calculation of the marital pension share under Majauskas. The husband appealed from so much of the judgment as awarded the defendant her 'Majauskas' share of the plaintiff's entire New York City Fire Department pension and directed that the plaintiff pay (a) 100 percent of the unreimbursed medical expenses of the parties' children and 100 percent of the reasonable child care expenses incurred by the defendant while she is attending school until she begins receiving her equitable share of the pension, at which time the plaintiff shall pay 64 percent and the defendant 36 percent of those expenses, and (b) 100 percent of the private school tuition of the parties' middle child until the child graduates from that school. The wife cross appealed from that part of the judgement that awarded the plaintiff 100 percent of the remaining funds from his September 11th Victim Compensation Fund award. The Court noted that Pension benefits or vested rights to those benefits, except to the extent that they are earned or acquired before marriage or after the commencement of a matrimonial action, constitute marital property'. Thus, 'to the extent that the disability pension represents deferred compensation, it is subject to equitable distribution. However to the extent it represents compensation for personal injuries, that compensation is 'separate property' which is not subject to equitable distribution. The burden of distinguishing the marital property portion of a disability pension from the separate property portion has been placed on the recipient of the pension who is resisting equitable distribution. In other words, until the contrary is demonstrated, the presumption is that the entire disability pension is marital property ' (Palazzolo v. Palazzolo, 242 AD2d 688, 689). The Court pointed out that despite the clarity of the language by which it imposed this burden, its in the full and just distribution of the marital estate has tempered the harshness of its application where the evidence is weak but some other method of defining the disability portion of the pension is available. Justice Spolzino, writing the ground breaking opinion for the court, pointed out that in Palazzolo v. Palazzolo (242 AD2d at 689), the Court defined the methodology by which the disability and nondisability portions of a public employee's pension are defined by approving, as 'fundamentally sound,' the approach taken by the plaintiff's expert. That approach has three steps. First, the pensioner's hypothetical nondisability pension is determined by multiplying the pensioner's final average salary by the percentage of that salary to which the pensioner would likely have been entitled upon retirement had the disability not cut short his or her employment. Second, the coverture fraction is applied to determine the marital portion of the hypothetical nondisability pension. Third, the actual nondisability portion of the pension is determined by reducing the hypothetical nondisability pension by the percentage of the years of service that the pensioner actually served. Here, the record was insufficient for the court to make this calculation. While the factors necessary to employ the Palazzolo formula were not on the record here, however, they were necessarily known to the plan administrator when it calculated the plaintiff's disability pension. The administrator knew the terms of the plaintiff's pension plan, the plaintiff's final average salary, and the percentage of that salary by which the pension is determined. The Palazzolo calculation requires nothing more. The Court held that just as the Majauskas formula is routinely incorporated into a qualified domestic relations order to satisfy this requirement the Palazzolo formula can be incorporated as well. The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Spolzino, held that despite the lack of evidence in the record by which the disability and nondisability portions of the husband's Fireman pension can be distinguished, the disability portion of the plaintiff's pension and, consequently, his separate property interest in that pension, could be determined by the appropriate pension administrator pursuant to a properly-drawn order. Therefore, it modified the judgment accordingly.

In addition to his disability pension, the plaintiff received an award from the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund as a result of injuries he suffered in the aftermath of that tragedy. The administrator of that fund specifically designated a portion of that award, in the amount of $127,571, as compensation for economic loss. The Supreme Court held that the economic component of the award constituted 'compensation for personal injuries' within the meaning of Domestic Relations Law 236(B) (1)(d)(2) and, on that basis, treated the award as the separate property of the plaintiff. The Appellate Division agreed with that determination, because, inter alia, the legislative history of the Equitable Distribution Law compelled it. The Second Department rejected the rule in the other departments that the economic component of a personal injury award is separate property, which is derived from the holding of the Appellate Division, Third Department, in Fleitz v. Fleitz (200 AD2d 874) and the decisions of the Appellate Division, First Department and the Appellate Division, Fourth Department, that have followed it (see Gann v. Gann, 233 AD2d 188; Solomon v. Solomon, 206 AD2d 971). Justice Spolzino wrote that while the logic of the Equitable Distribution Law suggests the conclusion that the economic portion of a personal injury award should be marital property, the legislative history compelled the contrary result. He pointed out that the exclusion from marital property of 'compensation for personal injuries' was not in the original equitable distribution proposal. As Professor Henry H. Foster, who was actively involved in drafting of the equitable distribution law, explains in his treatise, the '[e]xemption (2) in Domestic Relations Law 236(B) (1)(d) was added belatedly at the request of legislative counsel, shortly before the enactment of the Equitable Distribution Law' (3 Freed, Brandes and Weidman, Law and the Family New York, 2.6, at 69-70) and 'was accepted in order to obtain additional and important backing for the new law' (Henry H. Foster, Commentary on Equitable Distribution, 26 NY Law Sch L Rev 1 [1981]; see also Henry H. Foster, Jr., and Doris Jonas Freed, Family Law, 32 Syracuse L Rev 335, 344-345). Professor Foster bemoans this compromise as 'highly questionable both as a matter of logic and in view of the [premise] behind the new law' (Foster, Commentary on Equitable Distribution, at 9), and concludes that 'it would have been better to separate items for mental pain and anguish from other items in compensation and to treat damages for loss of income and bills incurred as marital property' (Foster, at 10). Foster's analysis, however, recognizes that the statute's purpose was to exclude from marital property both the economic and the noneconomic portion of a personal injury award. Justice Spolzino concluded that the circumstances in which the intent of the Legislature may be gleaned from a commentary that is critical of the Legislature's action are rare. This, however, is such a case. Professor Foster was the author of the original bill, and the bill jacket establishes that he was active throughout the Legislature's consideration of the bill. His commentary criticizing the exclusion clearly implied that it encompasses the economic component of a personal injury award. His explanation of the manner in which the exclusion came to be included in the legislation, published shortly after the law's enactment, is compelling proof that the proponents of the bill reluctantly acquiesced in the inclusion of the provision, despite its inconsistency with what was otherwise the intent of the legislation. Since the legislative intent must control (see People v. Santi, 3 NY3d 234, 243), the inescapable conclusion was that the Supreme Court was correct in determining that the portion of the Victim Compensation award received by the plaintiff that constitutes compensation for economic loss during the marriage is the plaintiff's separate property.

October 16, 2009

Award of Child Support on Parental Income in Excess of $80,000 Should Be Based on Child's Actual Needs and the Amount That Is Required for the Child to Live an Appropriate Lifestyle, Rather than the Wealth of One or Both Parties.

In Erin C v Peter H, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3255773 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified an order directing respondent to pay petitioner mother basic child support of $ 3053.67 per month, plus $ 1732.75 for child care and insurance, modified, to reduce the award for basic child support to $ 2740.44 per month. Petitioner commenced a proceeding in Family Court against respondent for child support for the parties' child several months after the child's birth. The parties were both successful professionals. By order dated December 17, 2004, the Support Magistrate directed the father to pay $4,044 per month in basic child support. The Support Magistrate rejected the father's claim that the mother had failed to demonstrate the actual needs of the child and rejected the father's argument that the parties' combined income should be capped for the purpose of determining the basic award. He based the basic award on 17% of the parties' total combined income of $375,619.21. The father was also directed to pay $1,732.75 per month in mandatory add-ons. The father's total monthly child support payment under the December 17, 2004 order was $5,776.75. The Appellate Division reversed the order, vacated the support award and remanded the matter for further proceedings, including a further hearing, if necessary, to determine the father's past and prospective child support obligations (28 AD3d 251 [2006]). It determined that the Magistrate erred in applying the 17% statutory rate to the entire portion of the parties' combined income in excess of $80,000 without considering the actual needs of the two-year-old child. While the Magistrate stated, in conclusory fashion, that the award conformed with the child's needs, in reality he appeared to have merely allocated 50% of the mother's expenses to the child without any analysis of whether that approach was appropriate. It held that in high income cases, the appropriate determination under Family Ct Act 413(1)(f) for an award of child support on parental income in excess of $80,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and the amount that is required for the child to live an appropriate lifestyle, rather than the wealth of one or both parties. It directed that on remand, "Family Court should consider the appropriate level of child support in light of the child's actual needs. As part of its analysis, the court should consider whether a cap on combined income subject to child support is warranted".

The Appellate Division modified the award made after remand to reduce the award for basic child support to $ 2740.44 per month. It noted that the decision of the Support Magistrate only considered the child's needs to determine the child support amount, and that he did not apply the statutory formula. It held that Family Court appropriately allocated 50% of petitioner's household and car expenses to the child based on evidence that the child equally benefitted from these expenditures. In calculating a basic child support obligation in an amount equal to the child's needs, and respondent's share thereof, Family Court, inter alia, appropriately considered that petitioner was responsible for all nonmonetary contributions toward the child's care and well-being. Evidence of changes in the child's needs, based on petitioner's early-June 2007 remarriage, was properly rejected as speculative at the time of the late-June 2007 hearing, and as beyond the scope of the proceeding, which was limited to determining the actual needs of the child in accordance with the Court's April 2006 remand order. It modified Family Court's findings as to the amount of basic child support attributable to the child's clothing and toys. Although petitioner documented average monthly payments of $ 496.91 for clothing and $ 391.32 for toys, and Family Court found petitioner's testimony about her expenses to be credible, such spending exceeded the actual needs of the child (Matter of Michele M. v. Thomas F., 42 AD3d 882, 883-884 [2007]; cf. Anonymous v. Anonymous, 286 A.D.2d 585, 586 [2001], lv denied 97 N.Y.2d 611 [2002]). It could not be said that the child needs the number of items that were purchased. For example, respondent purchased 10 bibs, ranging in price from $ 4.49 to $ 11.99, at one store on one day. On another day, respondent purchased 18 items from an on-line toy store at a total price of $ 231.32. Accordingly, it reduced the child support attributable to clothing to $ 375 per month and the support attributable to toys to $ 200 per month. Justice Saxe concurred in part and dissented in part, and Justices Sweeny and McGuire, JJ. dissented in part.

In High Income Cases child Support on Parental Income in Excess of $80,000 Should Be Based on the Child's Actual Needs

In Matter of Jackson v Tompkins, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 2960716, 2009 N.Y. Slip Op. 06550 (2 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division reiterated the rule it enunciated in Matter of Brim v. Combs, (25 A.D.3d 691, 693, 808 N.Y.S.2d 735) that "in high income cases, the appropriate determination under Family Court Act 413(1)(f) for an award of child support on parental income in excess of $80,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and that amount that is required for the child to live an appropriate lifestyle, rather than the wealth of one or both parties". In this case, the Support Magistrate discredited most of the evidence adduced by the mother of the child concerning the child's actual expenses, and endeavored to make a fair determination of how much the child would need for his expenses to be covered and for him to live comfortably. It found no basis to disturb the Support Magistrate's determination.

Court Not Bound to Apply the Statutory Percentage in FCA 413(1)(C). It May Determine Child Support Through Application of the Percentage Set Forth in FCA 413(1)(C), Factors Delineated in FCA 413(1)(F), or a Combination of Both .

In Irkho v Irkho, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3208729 , 2009 N.Y. Slip Op. 07256 (2d Dept 2009) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly, in effect, denied the father's objections to the order of the Support Magistrate, which departed from the numerical guidelines of the Child Support Standards Act and directed him to pay 50% of the child's regular monthly expenses. It held that a hearing court is not bound to apply the statutory percentage established in Family Court Act 413(1)(c), but may determine the child support obligation through the application of the percentage set forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(c), the factors delineated in Family Court Act s 413(1)(f), or a combination of both (see Matter of Cassano v. Cassano, 85 N.Y.2d 649, 628 N.Y.S.2d 10, 651 N.E.2d 878; Matter of Schmitt v. Berwitz, 228 A.D.2d 604, 605, 644 N.Y.S.2d 760). Family Court providently exercised its discretion in departing from the prescribed percentage.

Parents May Not, by Written Agreement, Terminate the Child Support Obligation Because of the Child's Full-time Employment, Without a Simultaneous Showing of the Economic Independence of the Child

In Thomas B v Lydia B.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 3127737 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department, in an opinion by Justice Sweeny, held that two parents may not, by written agreement, terminate the child support obligation because of the child's full-time employment, without a simultaneous showing of the economic independence of the child. Pursuant to a stipulation of settlement entered into as part of the parties' judgment of divorce, petitioner father was obligated to pay annual child support until the parties' child reached the age of 21 or was otherwise "emancipated." The stipulation defined emancipation as, inter alia, "the Child's engaging in fulltime employment; fulltime employment during a scheduled school recess or vacation period shall not, however, be deemed an emancipation event." Justice Sweeny wrote that although petitioner relied on the definition of emancipation in the separation agreement that he drafted to support his claim, the agreement purported to do exactly what is prohibited by public policy and case law. The parties cannot contract away the duty of child support. When children's rights are involved the contract yields to the welfare of the children' " (Pecora v. Cerillo, 207 A.D.2d 215, 218 [1995], quoting Maki v. Straub, 167 A.D.2d 589, 590 [1990]). The duty of a parent to support his or her child "shall not be eliminated or diminished by the terms of a separation agreement" (Pecora, at 218), nor can it be abrogated by contract (Cellamare, 36 AD3d at 906). Economic independence from the child's parents is not established by merely working a standard, full-time work week. It was clear, that although he was working 35 hours per week during the period of time in question, the child was not economically independent of his parents, and thus was not emancipated during that period of time.

Petitioner sought termination of his child support obligations on the grounds of, inter alia, the child's "emancipation. Petitioner moved for summary judgment on the issue of emancipation. He argued that under the terms of the stipulation of settlement, the child became emancipated by reason of his full-time employment at a music store from July through December 2005. Respondent opposed the motion, arguing that during the time in question, the child was living in a halfway house as part of his treatment for substance abuse. His employment at the music store was one of the conditions of that treatment. She also argued that the child was not economically independent, as he received financial support from her in addition to her payment of 100% of his unreimbursed medical expenses.

The Support Magistrate granted petitioner's motion, finding that the child's full-time employment as of July 2, 2005 was an emancipation event pursuant to the stipulation of settlement and directed a full refund of all child support.

The Appellate Division reversed. Justice Sweeney pointed out that a parent's duty to support his or her child to the age of 21 is a matter of fundamental public policy in this State and is currently embodied in statutory law. (Family Court Act 413[1][a]; see Matter of Roe v. Doe, 29 N.Y.2d 188, 192-193 [1971]). The concept of parental financial responsibility has been expanded to include both parents and is found in 413 and Domestic Relations Law 240. Parental-child support obligations continue until the child attains the age of 21 (Family Court Act 413[1][a]), unless the child is sooner emancipated. Emancipation of the child suspends or terminates this duty to support. He noted that McKinney's Practice Commentaries for 413 summarize the case law defining emancipation in these terms: "Emancipation is also automatic when the child marries or enlists in the military service. A gainfully employed child who is fully self-supporting and economically independent from the parents may also be deemed to be emancipated. Or the parties may provide for emancipation contingencies in a written agreement or stipulation" (emphasis added). Additionally, a child may self-emancipate prior to age 21 where he or she willingly abandons the parent. This implies that the child has become independent, that he or she has willfully abandoned the parent by refusing to abide by reasonable instructions or demands of the parent, and that such abandonment was not the result of actions on the part of the parent.

The Court stated that the issue of emancipation is significant because a finding of emancipation terminates the parental obligation of support. "[C]hildren are deemed emancipated if they attain economic independence through employment, entry into military service or marriage and, further, may be deemed constructively emancipated if, without cause, they withdraw from parental supervision and control" (Matter of Bogin v. Goodrich, 265 A.D.2d 779, 781 [1999]).

In determining whether this child was emancipated, the Court noted that all of the cases that have addressed this issue use the child's "economical independence" as the test (citing Matter of Alice C. v. Bernard G.C., 193 A.D.2d 97[1993]; Matter of Fisher v. Fritzch, 35 AD3d 1146, 1148 [2006]; Matter of Reigada v. Rinker, 30 AD3d 716 [2006]; Matter of Holscher v. Holscher, 4 AD3d 629, [2004]; Matter of Bogin, 265 A.D.2d at 781). Thus, even where a child is working but still relies on a parent for significant economic support such as paying for utilities, food, car insurance, medical insurance and the like, the child cannot be considered economically independent, and thus is not emancipated. This is true even where the child is residing with neither of the parties, so long as the child is still dependent on one of the parties for a significant portion of his or her support. (Matter of Cellamare v. Lakeman (36 AD3d 906 [2007]), Moreover, the parties cannot contract away the duty of child support. The court found insufficient evidence in the record to support a finding that the child was economically independent of his parents as a result of his working 35 hours per week while living in a halfway house. The child's employment was one of the requirements of participation in the halfway house substance abuse program.

Proper to Impute Income Where Failure to Produce Documentary Evidence of Income and Expenses

In Matter of Sena v Sena, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2009 WL 3048370 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a Support Magistrate may properly impute income in calculating a support obligation where he or she finds that a party's account of his or her finances is not credible or is suspect. Here, the Family Court providently exercised its discretion in imputing income to the father for the purpose of calculating his child support and child care obligations. Although the father testified at the hearing that he earned a salary of $350 per week, he did not submit a pay stub and testified that he was paid in cash. The father also claimed that he paid various business expenses, including a "commission" to an assistant, from his gross business income. Although he submitted a copy of his 2006 federal income tax return which listed certain business expenses, he did not detail those expenses nor submit any proof of payment of those expenses. The father's 2006 federal income tax return indicated that he was an independent contractor and paid business expenses from gross business receipts of more than $28,000 for a 10-month period, which was inconsistent with his claim that he was paid a salary of $350 per week as an employee.

Under these circumstances, the Family Court did not err in basing its award on the father's gross business income as reported on his 2006 federal income tax return, and sufficiently articulated a basis for the source of the imputed income.

October 1, 2009

Judges Required to Make Additional Findings Where Domestic Violence Found

Laws of 2009, Ch 476, § 2 amended Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1)(a), effective December 15, 2009 to require judges to state on the record how their findings with regard to the effect of domestic violence factored into their custody determination. Where the court finds, by a preponderance of the evidence that there is domestic violence the court has been required to consider the effect of domestic violence upon the best interests of the child, together with such other facts and circumstances as the court deems relevant in making a direction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1)(a). The amendment requires the Court to state on the record how such findings, facts and circumstances factored into the direction for custody or visitation. If an allegation that a child is abused is supported by a preponderance of the evidence, then the court has been required to consider such evidence of abuse in determining the visitation arrangement that is in the best interest of the child, and the court may not place a child in the custody of a parent who presents a substantial risk of harm to that child. The amendment requires the court to state on the record how such findings were factored into the determination.

Attorney For Child Will be Required to Take Domestic Violence Training

Laws of 2009, Ch 476, § 1 amended Family Court Act 249-b to require the Chief Administrator of the Courts to provide for the development of training programs which include the dynamics of domestic violence and its effect on victims and on children, and the relationship between such dynamics and the issues considered by the court, including, but not limited to, custody, visitation and child support and requires that all attorneys for children, including new and veteran attorneys, receive initial and ongoing training as provided for in this section.

Additional Crimes that Constitute a Family Offense Added

Laws of 2009, Ch 476, § 3 and 4, amended Criminal Procedure Law 530.11, and Family Court Act 812 (1) to add the crimes of sexual misconduct, forcible touching, sexual abuse in the third degree, and sexual abuse in the second degree as set forth in subdivision one of section 130.60 of the penal law to the crimes which constitute a "family offense". Family Court Act 821 (1) (a) was amended accordingly.

Return of Parent from Military Automatically Considered 'Substantial Change in Circumstance For Seeking Reconsideration of Custody or Visitation Order.

Laws of 2009, Ch 473, effective November 15, 2009, amended the Domestic Relations Law, the Family Court Act and the Military Law to provide that the return of a parent from activation or deployment by the military will automatically be considered a 'substantial change in circumstance' for seeking reconsideration of a custody or visitation order. The amendment changes the law enacted last year which requires that all child custody orders issued when a parent is on active military duty be deemed temporary and subject to revision when the parent returns to civilian life.

Laws of 2009, Ch 473, § 1 amended Domestic Relations Law § 75-l (entitled Military service by parent; effect on child custody orders) to provide unless the parties have otherwise stipulated or agreed, if an order was issued under Domestic Relations Law § 75-l, the return of the parent from active military service, deployment or temporary assignment shall be considered a substantial change in circumstances. Upon the request of either parent, the court shall determine on the basis of the child's best interests whether the custody judgment or order previously in effect should be modified.

Laws of 2009, Ch 473, § 2 amended Domestic Relations Law 240, subdivision 1 to add a new paragraph (a-2) to read as follows:

(a-2) Military service by parent; effect on child custody orders.

(1) During the period of time that a parent is activated, deployed or temporarily assigned to military service, such that the parent's ability to continue as a joint caretaker or the primary caretaker of a minor child is materially affected by such military service, any orders issued pursuant to this section, based on the fact that the parent is activated, deployed or temporarily assigned to military service, which would materially affect or change a previous judgment or order regarding custody of that parent's child or children as such judgment or order existed on the date the parent was activated, deployed, or temporarily assigned to military service, shall be subject to review pursuant to subparagraph three of this paragraph. Any relevant provisions of the Service Member's Civil Relief Act shall apply to all proceedings governed by this section.

(2) During such period, the court may enter an order to modify custody if there is clear and convincing evidence that the modification is in the best interests of the child.

An attorney for the child shall be appointed in all cases where a modification is sought during such military service. Such order shall be subject to review pursuant to subparagraph three of this paragraph. When entering an order pursuant to this section, the court shall consider and provide for, if feasible and if in the best interests of the child, contact between the military service member and his or her child, including, but not limited to, electronic communication by e-mail, webcam, telephone, or other available means. During the period of the parent's leave from military service, the court shall consider the best interests of the child when establishing a parenting schedule, including visiting and other contact. For such purposes, a "leave from military service" shall be a period of not more than three months.

(3) Unless the parties have otherwise stipulated or agreed, if an order is issued pursuant to this paragraph, the return of the parent from active military service, deployment or temporary assignment shall be considered a substantial change in circumstances. Upon the request of either parent, the court shall determine on the basis of the child's best interests whether the custody judgment or order previously in effect should be modified.

(4) This paragraph shall not apply to assignments to permanent duty stations or permanent changes of station.

Laws of 2009, Ch 473, § 3 amended Family Court Act § 651 to add a new subdivision (f) which reads exactly the same as Domestic Relations Law 240, subdivision 1 (a-2).

Laws of 2009, Ch 473, § 4 amended Section 253 of the military law to read as follows:

§ 253. Military service by parent; effect on child custody proceedings. Notwithstanding any law, rule or regulation to the contrary, child custody proceedings filed in a court of competent jurisdiction in this state, involving a parent who is activated, deployed, or temporarily assigned to military service shall be governed by subdivision (f) of section six hundred fifty-one of the family court act, section seventy-five-I or paragraph (a-2) of subdivision one of section two hundred forty of the domestic relations law.

Where Both Parties Wage Earners Each Should Claim One Dependency Exemption

In Skladanek v Skladanek, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 880784 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court directed the husband to pay the plaintiff maintenance of $690 per week for four years and $540 per week for two years thereafter, directed him to pay retroactive maintenance and child support arrears, and awarded the plaintiff $5,280, representing the appreciation of the marital portion of property held jointly by the parties with the defendant's mother, awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee of $41,217 .83. The Appellate Division held that in light of the defendant's greater financial resources, the Supreme Court properly awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee. However, Supreme Court erred in failing to include a provision that the award of maintenance shall terminate upon the death of either party or the plaintiff's remarriage. It held that in directing defendant to pay maintenance and child support arrears, the Supreme Court erred in failing to credit him with sums he paid for the carrying costs on the marital home during the pendency of the action. It also held that under the circumstances of this case, both parties should have shared equally in the appreciation of the marital portion of the property held jointly by them with the defendant's mother. Finally, it found that since both parties were wage earners who contributed toward the support of their two children, the defendant could claim one of the children as a dependent on his income tax returns.

September 16, 2009

Only 10% of Appreciation of Corporation is Marital Property Where Contributions of Wife Minimal

In Smith v Winter, 64 A.D.3d 1218, 883 N.Y.S.2d 412 (4 Dept 2009) defendant appealed from a supplemental judgment issued in a divorce action that distributed marital assets and ordered plaintiff to pay maintenance to defendant. The parties were married in 1996 and had no children. Prior to the marriage, plaintiff was the sole shareholder, chief executive officer, and president of American Wire Tie, Inc. (American Wire), which acquired 100% of the stock in Permanban North America (PNA). The evidence adduced at trial established that, during the marriage, plaintiff was substantially responsible for the day-to-day management and operation of American Wire. He had no involvement in the day-to-day operations of PNA. With respect to American Wire, Supreme Court found that the value of the company did not change during the course of the marriage. The court further found, however, that plaintiff's American Wire 401K had appreciated in value during the marriage, and thus the court awarded defendant half of the value of that appreciation by way of a Qualified Domestic Relations Order. With respect to PNA, the court found that the value of PNA appreciated by $20 million during the course of the marriage but that the increase in value attributable to plaintiff was minimal when compared to the increase attributable to those hired by plaintiff to run the company. The court thus determined that only 10% of the appreciation in value of PNA was marital property subject to equitable distribution and that defendant was entitled to 40% of the appreciated value based on her contributions as a homemaker. The court made additional awards with respect to life insurance policies, an art collection, and bank accounts, resulting in a total distributive award to defendant of $556,611.82. The court awarded defendant $1,700 per week as maintenance for a period of approximately 17 months. The Appellate Division held that the court properly determined that only 10% of the appreciation of the value of PNA, a wholly owned subsidiary of American Wire, was marital property subject to distribution. Plaintiff was the sole shareholder of American Wire prior to the marriage, and thus American Wire remained plaintiff's separate property. PNA appreciated in value by over $20 million during the course of the marriage but that plaintiff's contributions to that appreciation were minimal. The Court pointed out that it is well settled that an increase in the value of separate property of one spouse, occurring during the marriage and prior to the commencement of matrimonial proceedings, which is due in part to the indirect contributions or efforts of the other spouse as homemaker ... should be considered marital property. "When a nontitled spouse's claim to appreciation and the other spouse's separate property is predicated solely on the nontitled spouse's indirect contributions, however, some nexus between the titled spouse's active efforts and the appreciation in the separate property is required" (Hartog v. Hartog, 85 N.Y.2d 36, 46, 623 N.Y.S.2d 537, 647 N.E.2d 749). Here, the court properly considered the "active efforts of others and any additional passive or active factors" in determining the percentage of total appreciation that constitutes marital property subject to distribution. The award of maintenance was not an abuse of discretion.

Court Equitably Distributes Homestead Exemption on Marital Residence

In Tarone v Tarone, -- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 260949 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of divorce, which, inter alia, directed that the wife be awarded $25,000, representing her equitable share of the $50,000 homestead exemption of the marital residence, and maintenance of $20,000 per year for three years, The husband reported earning up to $300,000 per year during the marriage, and the wife testified that she was attempting to revive her opera career, after having taken significant time off during the marriage. Under these circumstances, the court's award of maintenance in the sum of $20,000 per year for three years was a provident exercise of its discretion.

CPLR 2102 (c) Strips Clerk of Authority to Reject Copies of Papers for Filing Unless Directed by Law, Rule, or Court Order

In Gehring v Goodman, 8/31/2009 NYLJ 18, (col. 1) Sup Ct N.Y. Co (Braun, J.), an article 78 proceeding, the court granted the petitioner attorney an 'order' directing respondent the County Clerk to accept for filing copies of affidavits confessing judgement that petitioner wanted to file pursuant to CPLR 3218 (b). Respondents did not submit any papers in opposition. According to petitioner, respondent, in interpreting CPLR 3218 (b), took the position that because the statute says 'the affidavit', that means the original affidavit must be filed, and thus he would not accept a copy thereof for filing.

CPLR 3218 (b) provides in part: " At any time within three years after the affidavit is executed, it may be filed with the clerk..." It also noted that CPLR 2101 (e) states in pertinent part: Except where otherwise specifically prescribed, copies, rather than originals, of all papers, including orders, affidavits and exhibits may be served or filed. And CPLR 2102 (c) provides: A clerk shall not refuse to accept for filing any paper presented for that purpose except where specifically directed to do so by statute or rules promulgated by the chief administrator of the courts, or order of the court. Justice Braun held that since CPLR 3218 (b) does not specify that only the original of the affidavit must be accepted for filing and does not proscribe the filing of a copy of the affidavit, a copy may be filed. There is neither a statute nor rule of the chief administrator of the courts that directs respondent to refuse to accept for filing a copy of an affidavit under CPLR 3218 (b), nor had respondent shown that there is any court order that so directs him. He noted that Professor Alexander comments that the purpose of CPLR 2102 (c) is to strip clerks of any authority to reject papers offered for filing unless the refusal is directed by law, rule, or court order (Alexander, Supp Practice Commentaries, McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 7B, Civil Practice Law and Rules 2102, 2009 Pocket Part, at 283).

No Offset Against Child Support Obligations For Overpayments of Child Support, Extracurricular Activities and College Costs

In Mairs v Mairs, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1011101 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1981 and had seven children. Plaintiff (husband) was an ophthalmologist with his own private practice while defendant (wife) was a tenured math professor. In 2002, the husband commenced the action for divorce. Supreme Court granted the husband a divorce and ordered the husband to pay the wife 15% of the value of his medical license and medical practice, finding that the value of the marital portion of the wife's Master's degree was $56,000 while the marital portion of the husband's Bachelor's degree and medical license had a total value of $1,493,000. The court then determined that each party was entitled to 15% of the value of these assets, resulting in a net award to the wife of $215,550. It also directed the husband to pay $400 per week in maintenance for seven years, child support of $1,260 per week, $18,000 of the wife's counsel's fees, 50% of the expert witness fees, and a portion of the college expenses incurred by the parties' eldest child. It required the husband, as a guarantee against his obligations under the judgment, to maintain a $200,000 life insurance policy with the wife listed as the primary beneficiary. The Appellate Division held that the wife was entitled to more than 15% of the value of the husband's license to practice medicine and his medical practice, noting that during this long-term marriage, the husband successfully completed his undergraduate studies and attended medical school, he also earned his medical degree and completed both his internship and residency, after which he was able to establish a successful medical practice. While the husband pursued his medical career, the wife gave birth to the parties' seven children, cared for them, managed the household and earned a salary that, for a time, was the principal source of the family's income. She relocated the family from Utah to Philadelphia and later to New York for the express purpose of allowing the husband to pursue his medical studies and obtain his medical license. When the husband entered private practice, the wife, in addition to her maternal obligations, continued to work, commuting on a regular basis to Philadelphia, and managed the practice, assuming the responsibility for the preparation of all invoices and the payment of all bills. The wife's contributions to her husband's medical career were both meaningful and significant and she was entitled to 25% of the value of his medical license, as well as his medical practice. While Supreme Court placed a value on the husband's educational degrees at $1,493,000, it adopted the opinion of the expert retained by the parties that the practice had a value of $12,000 and that the wife's distributive share amounted to $1,800. The expert, while acknowledging that the practice annually had gross revenues in excess of $500,000, initially placed its value at $93,000, after allowing for a full discount on the total amount alleged by the husband to be owed on a loan made to the practice by a local hospital. The expert then reduced that amount to account for the tax implications that would occur if the practice were sold. While accepting Supreme Court's determination that the tax impact generated by the sale of the practice was fairly considered in this valuation, the court did not agree that the full amount of the loan, $190,830, should be included in determining the practice's fair market value. It noted that in the 12 years that this debt had been in existence, not one payment has been made against its principal and the promissory notes evidencing the existence of this legal obligation only amount to $104,000. As a result, while it was appropriate to consider this loan as a liability to be counted against the value of the practice, the amount used to discount its value should be that represented by the face value of the promissory notes, $104,000. Given that the expert acknowledged reducing his estimate of the practice's value by the full amount claimed to be owed on this loan, the value of the practice for distributive purposes was increased by $86,830 to $98,830, with the wife receiving a 25% distributive share. The Court found no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court's imposition of a 4.2% interest rate imposed on the amount the husband owed the wife for her share of the marital assets. The manner in which a distributive award is to be paid is discretionary and the imposition of interest on an outstanding debt as a result of equitable distribution is equally within a court's discretion. Supreme Court failed to explain its deviation from the statutory 9% interest rate imposed by CPLR 5004 and the court noted that its decision should not be read as an approval of such an omission. Supreme Court directed that the husband pay the wife $400 per week maintenance for seven years, or $20,800 annually. The husband earned, on average, $300,000 per year, was in good health and enjoyed a significant earning potential for the foreseeable future. In comparison, the wife suffered from chronic asthma, had an annual salary that, in the past, rarely exceeded $50,000 and was not likely to earn significantly more income in the future. Given the length of the marriage, the wife's age and the fact that a substantial portion of the distributive award for her share of the marital assets was deferred, it increased the maintenance obligation to $500 per week for seven years. The Court noted that in determining each party's annual gross income for child support purposes, the trial court neglected to add any income that had been deferred by the parties (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][b][5][iii]) or deduct all the payments made by them for FICA and Medicare taxes (Domestic Relations Law 240 [1-b][b][5][vii][C], [H]) and there was no indication that Supreme Court, prior to making this computation, deducted the amount that the husband was paying in maintenance from the total of his gross income (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][b][5][vii][C]). In calculating child support Supreme Court used 35% as the percentage to be applied against the first $80,000 of combined income, but reduced the percentage to 25% for any income over $80,000. The husband's pro rata share of child support was 83% and the wife's pro rata share was 17%. Supreme Court found that applying the statutory percentage to all of the parties' income, including that in excess of $80,000, would result in an "unjust or inappropriate" award. Since the husband's child support obligation will be substantially reduced once his maintenance payments are deducted from his gross income and, as a result of Supreme Court's decision, he was no longer required to contribute to the payment of the children's extracurricular activities, a financial burden borne entirely by the wife, there was no justification for deviating from the statutory percentage. Therefore the 35% figure was applied against the entire combined parental income used to calculate child support. It recalculated child support finding the husband's pro rata share of the combined obligation was $71,025 annually, or $1,365 per week. This obligation was to be adjusted to take into account that period of time that the husband had custody of one child and the wife did not pay child support. Further, this amount of child support was to be adjusted upon the termination of the maintenance obligation to the wife (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][b][5][vii][C]). It vacated Supreme Court's determination that the husband should receive a $250 weekly credit against his child support obligations "for overpayments of child support, extracurricular activities and college expenses" The court noted that there can be no such offset and that this part of the order must be vacated. Because the husband would be required to pay additional maintenance, as well as a significant sum for the wife's distributive share of the marital assets, the Appellate Division refused to revisit Supreme Court's decision that the husband was no longer required to contribute towards the payment of the children's extracurricular activities or that he pay any more of the expert witness fees or the wife's counsel fees. Supreme Court's only required the husband to pay half of a loan taken by the wife to defray expenses incurred by their oldest daughter for her first two years in college. This finding, which also served to absolve the husband from any responsibility for any college expenses incurred by any of the remaining six children, appeared to be at odds with the court's own observation of the "high value [the parties] place upon learning and knowledge," and the "ambitions and hopes" they have for their children. Given that the evidence presented at trial focused almost exclusively on the oldest child, it found that Supreme Court did not adequately account for the needs of the other children or give appropriate consideration to expectations that appear to have existed within the family unit as to their pursuit of a higher education. Its decree that the husband had no financial responsibility for the payment of college expenses incurred on behalf of the remaining children, per the wife's request, was stricken. Supreme Court, other than acknowledging that the insurance was to secure the husband's obligation to pay maintenance and the wife's distributive share of the marital assets, failed to set forth any rationale for establishing the face value of the life insurance policy at $200,000. The Court found that given that the obligations it was intended to secure easily exceed $200,000, such a policy would not serve its intended purpose. The order was modified to the extent that the husband was required to obtain a declining term life insurance policy with an initial face value of $500,000.

September 1, 2009

CSSA Cap on Combined Parental Income Raised to $130,000 effective January 31, 2010

Laws of 2009, Chapter 343 enacted the "child support modernization act" which amended the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act to raise the cap on combined parental income to $130,000 effective January 31, 2010, and to provide for the adjustment of the $130,000 cap every two years to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index. The child support percentages of payments that non-custodial parents are obligated to make toward child support remains the same. Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (2) and Family Court Act § 413 (1) (c) (2) were each amended to provide that the court shall multiply the combined parental income up to the amount set forth in Social Services Law 111-i, (2) (b). Social Services Law 111-i (2)(b) provides that the combined parental income amount to be reported in the child support standards chart and utilized in calculating orders of child support in accordance with Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (2) and Family Court Act § 413 (1) (c) (2) shall be one hundred thirty thousand dollars; and that beginning January 31, 2012 and every two years thereafter, the combined parental income amount shall increase by the product of the average annual percentage changes in the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) as published by the United States department of labor bureau of labor statistics for the two year period rounded to the nearest one thousand dollars. These amendments take effect on January 31, 2010.

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-b) (2) and Family Court Act § 413 (1) (c) (2) were each amended to read as follows:

(2) The court shall multiply the combined parental income up to the amount set forth in paragraph (b) of subdivision two of section one hundred eleven-i of the social services law by the appropriate child support percentage and such amount shall be prorated in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income.

Social Services Law 111-i (2) was amended to read as follows:

2. (a) The commissioner shall publish a child support standards chart. The child support standards chart shall include: (i) the revised poverty income guideline for a single person as reported by the federal department of health and human services; (ii) the revised self-support reserved as defined in section two hundred forty of the domestic relations law; (iii) the dollar amounts yielded through application of the child support percentage as defined in section two hundred forty of the domestic relations law and section four hundred thirteen of the family court act; and (iv) the combined parental income amount.

(b) The combined parental income amount to be reported in the child support standards chart and utilized in calculating orders of child support in accordance with subparagraph two of paragraph (c) of subdivision one of section four hundred thirteen of the family court act and subparagraph two of paragraph (c) of subdivision one-b of section two hundred forty of the domestic relations law shall be one hundred thirty thousand dollars; provided, however, beginning January thirty-first, two thousand twelve and every two years thereafter, the combined parental income amount shall increase by the product of the average annual percentage changes in the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) as published by the United States department of labor bureau of labor statistics for the two year period rounded to the nearest one thousand dollars.

(c) The commissioner shall publish the child support standards chart on an annual basis by April first of each year and in no event later than forty-five days following publication of the annual poverty income guideline for a single person as reported by the federal department of health and human services.

"Lure and Attraction of a Paramour" in Not an Affirmative Defense to Cruel and Inhuman Treatment.

In Dodd v Colbert, 881 N.Y.S.2d 711 (3 Dept 2009) plaintiff's amended complaint included allegations, under the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, that defendant entered into an illicit sexual relationship with a named individual. Defendant served an unverified amended answer with five affirmative defenses. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly denied plaintiff's motion to dismiss the affirmative defense regarding specificity of the complaint on the cause of action alleging cruel and inhuman treatment. A complaint in a divorce action must particularize the nature and circumstances of the other party's alleged misconduct "and the time and place of each act complained of" (CPLR 3016 [c]). Exact dates need not be furnished to comply with this statute, as long as the allegations sufficiently inform the defendant of the misconduct which will be addressed at trial. However, plaintiff's allegations covering the entire period of the marriage or the previous five years, without any attempt at further specificity, were too vague to apprise defendant of the accusations being leveled against her. The Appellate Division held that because only one paragraph of the complaint's cause of action alleging cruel and inhuman treatment contained a date (with month and year) and the remaining allegations were merely alleged to have occurred "[d]uring the course of the marriage and especially within five (5) years prior to the date of commencement," this affirmative defense should not have been dismissed as to that cause of action. As to the constructive abandonment cause of action, the Court held that complaint was sufficiently particularized so as to render this affirmative defense inapplicable. Plaintiff was entitled to dismissal of the affirmative defense that "the lure and attraction of a paramour" was the basis for the divorce. The Legislature has not provided any defenses to a divorce action based on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. Despite the absence of a defense, "defendant may show that misconduct by plaintiff, such as the lure and attraction of a paramour, is the reason for plaintiff seeking a divorce rather than the alleged cruel and inhuman treatment". While evidence related to this topic is relevant to the cause of action, it does not constitute an affirmative defense. Supreme Court should have dismissed the affirmative defense that any abandonment was justified. To establish abandonment as a ground for divorce, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant refused to fulfill the basic marital obligations for a period of one year or more, without consent by the abandoned spouse and without justification. Because the lack of justification is an element the plaintiff must prove to establish abandonment, the issue of justification would not take a plaintiff by surprise or raise issues not appearing in the complaint; thus, it is not an affirmative defense (see CPLR 3018[b]). Accordingly, plaintiff was entitled to dismissal of the affirmative defense of justification. The Appellate Division also held that Plaintiff was entitled to receive a verified answer to all allegations except those relating to adultery. Upon receiving the unverified answer, plaintiff immediately informed defendant of that defect, thus preserving the objection to lack of verification (see CPLR 3022). All pleadings in matrimonial actions must be verified, unless they are in response to charges of adultery (see DRL 211). Even where adultery is not alleged as a ground, portions of a pleading are not required to be verified if they concern matters that the party would be privileged from testifying about as a witness. (see CPLR 3020[a]). As adultery is still a crime (Penal Law 255.17), defendant would not be required to testify concerning allegations of an illicit affair (CPLR 4501). While a defendant need not verify the privileged portion of the answer, the remainder of the answer must be verified. Thus, defendant was required to verify all but her response to the allegations implicating her in adulterous conduct.

Proponent of Claim of Separate Property Required to Demonstrate Portion of Disability Pension Considered Separate.

In Rosenberger v Rosenberger, 63 A.D.3d 898, 882 N.Y.S.2d 426 (2 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in concluding that the parties' stipulation of settlement entitled the defendant to receive a share of his entire accident disability pension. The stipulation by which the parties agreed that the defendant would receive her "marital coverture portion" of the plaintiff's pension pursuant to a Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO) was clear and unambiguous, and did not on its face reflect an intent to draw a distinction between the portion of the pension which would be considered marital property, and the portion which would be considered separate property, if this matter had been adjudicated pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(b). Furthermore, although a retiree spouse is entitled to treat, as separate property, that portion of an accident disability pension which constitutes compensation for personal injury, where that issue is adjudicated pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(b) "[t]he proponent of the claim of separate property is required to demonstrate the portion of the disability pension which is to be considered separate" (see Palazzolo v. Palazzolo, 242 A.D.2d 688, 663 N.Y.S.2d 58). Here, the plaintiff, a former New York City firefighter, suffered a line-of-duty injury and applied for an accident disability pension before entering into the subject stipulation. Thus, he clearly was aware of or chargeable with knowledge of the prospect of his eventual disability retirement when he entered into the stipulation" (Pulaski v. Pulaski, 22 A.D.3d at 821, 804 N.Y.S.2d 404). Although the plaintiff acknowledged in the stipulation of settlement that he had been advised of and understood his rights pursuant to the equitable distribution provisions of the Domestic Relations Law, the stipulation of settlement nevertheless provided for a division of his pension without reference to whether the pension was based on accident disability or referable to ordinary service retirement. Moreover, the QDRO authorizing the defendant to receive a share of the plaintiff's entire pension in accordance with the Majauskas formula (see Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15) was entered upon the plaintiff's consent after his application for an accident disability pension had been approved. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court properly denied the plaintiff's motion, in effect, to amend the QDRO.

August 17, 2009

Loss of Health Insurance Benefits Added as Factors in Equitable Distribution and Maintenance Awards

Laws of 2009, Ch 229 amends the domestic relations law, in relation to maintenance and equitable distribution of marital property, effective September 14, 2009 to add "the loss of health insurance benefits upon dissolution of the marriage as a factor to be considered by the court in making a maintenance award and in making a property distribution.

Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5][d], subparagraphs 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 were renumbered subparagraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14, and a new subparagraph 5 was added to read as follows: (5) the loss of health insurance benefits upon dissolution of the marriage. Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][6][a][10] was amended to read as follows: (10) any transfer or encumbrance made in contemplation of a matrimonial action without fair consideration. Domestic Relations Law 236 [B][6][a][11] was renumbered subparagraph 12 and a new subparagraph 11 was added to read as follows: (11) the loss of health insurance benefits upon dissolution of the marriage. The amendments apply to any action or proceeding commenced on or after the effective date of September 14, 2009. See Laws of 2009, Ch 229, § 4.

Spouse Seeking Pendente Lite Counsel Fees May Not Press Claim after the Spouse from Whom Such Relief Was Sought Dies.

In King v Kline, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 2431950 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a spouse seeking pendente lite counsel fees may not continue to press such a claim in a divorce action after the spouse from whom such relief was sought dies. In February 2008, the wife moved for omnibus pendente lite relief. The resulting order directed the husband, among other things, to pay accrued professional fees to the wife's outgoing attorneys, her incoming attorneys, and her accountants. In September 2008, the wife moved by order to show cause to compel the husband and his employer to comply with outstanding discovery or, in the alternative, for various sanctions. In addition to that relief, the wife sought $200,000 in additional interim counsel fees, "virtually all of [which]" she argued "were made necessary by plaintiff's dilatory behavior and litigation strategy." The motion court, inter alia, awarded the wife $25,000 in counsel fees, "subject to reallocation at trial." The wife perfected an appeal of the order on February 23, 2009. On March 18, 2009, before his brief was due, the husband died. An estate representative was substituted as plaintiff and the parties stipulated that the discovery issues addressed in the wife's brief were moot. The wife disagreed with the estate that the issue of counsel fees was also academic. The estate moved to dismiss the appeal, arguing that, upon the husband's death, the divorce action ended. The Appellate Division pointed out that it is well settled that "a suit for divorce abates at the death of either party, because the marriage relation sought to be dissolved no longer exists" (Cornell v. Cornell, 7 N.Y.2d 164, 169 [1959]). As the wife's claim for interim counsel fees was necessarily dependent on the existence of a divorce action in which to make the claim, it was extinguished along with the litigation. The death of the husband precluded the wife from seeking counsel fees because "it is only where the parties to the action stand in the relation of husband and wife that the latter is entitled to" such fees (Farnham v. Farnham, 227 N.Y. 155, 158 [1919]). The wife argued, relying on the holding in Peterson v. Goldberg (180 A.D.2d 260 [1992], lv dismissed 81 N.Y.2d 835 [1993]), that her claim may proceed because her right to an award of interim counsel fees is "vested." However, that case was distinguishable because that was an action for equitable distribution following a foreign judgment of divorce. The court noted that there is no reason for a rule providing that the right to seek pendente lite counsel fees survives the death of a party to a divorce action. The purpose of pendente lite relief counsel fees is to level the playing field, to sustain the nonmonied spouse pending resolution of a divorce action so a fair result can be reached. Once, as here, the action abates, any concerns about the nonmonied spouse's ability to litigate on a level playing field no longer exist. Accordingly, there was no reason for the court to retain jurisdiction over the application for interim counsel fees, notwithstanding the abatement of the action.

Provision Imposing Interest as a Consequence of a Payment less than 30 Days Late Constituted Unenforceable Penalty.

In Chumsky v Chumsky, 881 N.Y.S.2d 774 (4 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order granting defendant's motion to enforce that part of a post-judgment order requiring plaintiff to pay defendant a distributive award in monthly installments pursuant to the terms of the parties' stipulation that was incorporated but not merged in the post-judgment order. The stipulation provided that, in the event that any installment payment was more than 15 days overdue, plaintiff was obligated to pay 9% interest on the balance due at the time of the late payment, calculated from the initial payment due date. In addition, the stipulation provided that, if any payment was more than 30 days late, the entire unpaid balance was immediately due and payable. Plaintiff's installment payments exceeded the 15-day grace period on several occasions, over a 16-month period. The Appellate Division held that the provision of the post-judgment order imposing interest as a consequence of a payment less than 30 days late constituted an unenforceable penalty. Whether a contractual provision 'represents an enforceable liquidation of damages or an unenforceable penalty is a question of law, giving due consideration to the nature of the contract and the circumstances. Where, as here, a stipulation provides for an amount to be paid as a consequence of a breach that is " 'plainly or grossly disproportionate to the probable loss, the provision calls for a penalty and will not be enforced' " (JMD Holding Corp., 4 N.Y.3d at 380). The Court found that the imposition of interest on the unpaid balance of the distributive awards pursuant to the post-judgment order would nearly double the original amount agreed upon. Given that disproportionate consequence, it concluded that enforcement of that part of the post-judgment order providing for the imposition of interest as a result of payments overdue by more than 15 days but less than 30 days constituted an unenforceable penalty.

To Be Entitled to Reformation Mistake Must Vitally Affect a Fact on the Basis of Which The Parties Contracted

In True v True, 63 A.D.3d 1145, 882 N.Y.S.2d 261 (2 Dept 2009) the parties were married on May 26, 1991, and divorced by judgment dated March 28, 2005, which incorporated the parties' February 2, 2005 stipulation of settlement, which provided, in Article XIII, that the plaintiff's stock awards from his employer, Goldman Sachs, would be "divided 50-50 in kind." To that end, the agreement specified that 3,655 shares of the stock awards were available for division and provided, based on a formula created by the plaintiff, that the defendant would receive 1,894 of those shares. The defendant thereafter redeemed 1,894 shares and later, the plaintiff learned that only 150 shares remained. After the defendant rejected the plaintiff's demand that she remit to him the shares or the value thereof in excess of her 50% share, the plaintiff commenced an action for reformation. The plaintiff moved for summary judgment and argued that a mutual mistake led the parties to erroneously use the gross number of shares, 3,655, which were the number of delivered and outstanding shares available prior to the payment of taxes, fees, and other withholdings, instead of the net number of shares. The plaintiff accordingly sought reformation of the agreement to reflect the net number of shares actually available for division. The defendant argued that the only mistake was made by the plaintiff and, in any event, even if her receipt of 1,894 shares did not result in a 50- 50 division of the shares, she specifically agreed to receive those shares in return for forgoing additional maintenance and health insurance. The Appellate Division held that for a party to be entitled to reformation of a contract on the ground of mutual mistake, the mutual mistake must be material, i.e., it must involve a fundamental assumption of the contract . A party need not establish that the parties entered into the contract because of the mutual mistake, only that the material mistake vitally affects a fact or facts on the basis of which the parties contracted. Proof of mistake must be of the highest order and must 'show clearly and beyond doubt that there has been a mistake' and it must show with equal clarity and certainty 'the exact and precise form and import that the instrument ought to be made to assume, in order that it may express and effectuate what was really intended by the parties'. Since the thrust of a reformation claim is that a writing does not set forth the actual agreement of the parties, both the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds are inapplicable. Thus, a party seeking to reform a contract based on, for example, mutual mistake, may rely on extrinsic evidence even if the agreement is not ambiguous. The Court found that the plaintiff established, prima facie, that Article XIII of the agreement contained a mutual mistake. First, both the final agreement and all five prior drafts thereof refer to the gross number of shares, as set forth in Goldman Sachs equity award summaries, as being available for division between the parties. Although an equity award summary dated January 25, 2005, was generated by the plaintiff in his capacity as a Goldman Sachs employee, he immediately shared that summary with the defendant and the defendant did not dispute the plaintiff's contention that the parties and their counsel each relied on the summary during the final negotiation session on February 2, 2005. Although footnotes 3 and 4 on page 4 of that summary explain the distinction between gross and net shares, neither the parties nor their counsel apparently realized that the "3,655" number of shares they were using, based on page 2 of the summary, represented the gross shares, not the net shares that would actually be delivered after Goldman Sachs paid taxes and fees, and made other withholdings. As such, the reference in Article XIII to the defendant receiving 1,894 shares was erroneously based on one-half of the gross shares, as the parties did not consider that upon the defendant's redemption of 1,894 shares, Goldman Sachs would use a significant number of the total number of gross shares to pay taxes and fees, and make other withholdings. Accordingly, the plaintiff established, prima facie, that the parties' use of 3,655 gross shares was a mutual mistake because it undermined their intent to divide the net shares available for division, 50-50 in kind, and she was entitled to summary judgment. Turning then to the remedy to which the plaintiff was entitled, the Appellate Division held that "in kind" division does not indicate the parties' intent to "bear any burden upon the shares resulting from their redemption." Rather, a practical interpretation of Article XIII supported the conclusion that the parties intended "in kind" to mean actual shares or their equivalent monetary value. Accordingly, it reformed Article XIII to refer to the net shares available for division, and to provide that each of the parties were to receive one-half of those net shares or their equivalent monetary value.

August 3, 2009

Domestic Relations Law § 177 has been repealed, and replaced by Domestic Relations Law § 255, which was signed into law on July 11, 2009. It becomes effective 90 days after the date it was signed into law and applies to all actions in which judgment has not been entered as of the effective date. (See Laws of 2009, Ch 143)

Domestic Relations Law § 255, subdivision 1 provides that prior to signing a judgment of divorce or separation, or a judgment annulling a marriage or declaring the nullity of a void marriage, the court must ensure that both parties have been notified, at such time and by such means as the court determines, that once the judgment is signed, a party thereto may or may not be eligible to be covered under the other party's health insurance plan, depending on the terms of the plan. In the case of a defaulting defendant, service upon the defendant, simultaneous with the service of the summons, of a notice indicating that once the judgment is signed, a party thereto may or may not be eligible to be covered under the other party's health insurance plan, depending on the terms of the plan, shall be deemed sufficient notice to a defaulting defendant. (Go to <http://www.nysdivorce.com> to download a suggested Notice of Possible Loss of Eligibility For Health Care Coverage)

Domestic Relations Law § 255, subdivision 2 provides that if the parties have entered into a stipulation of settlement or agreement, on or after the effective date of Section 255, resolving all of the issues between the parties, the stipulation of settlement or agreement must contain a provision relating to the health care coverage of each party. The provision must either: (a) provide for the future coverage of each party, or (b) state that each party is aware that he or she will no longer be covered by the other party's health insurance plan and that each party shall be responsible for his or her own health insurance coverage, and may be entitled to purchase health insurance on his or her own through a COBRA option, if available. The requirements subdivision 2 may not be waived by either party or counsel. In the event that it is not complied with, the court must require compliance and may grant a thirty day continuance to afford the parties an opportunity to procure their own health insurance coverage. (Go to <http://www.nysdivorce.com> to download a suggested Agreement-Stipulation Provision for Compliance with Domestic Relations Law § 255)

Attorney Removed as Counsel to 11-year-old in Paternity and Visitation Case Because He Had Not Ascertained and Followed Wishes of the Child.

In Matter of Mark T. v. Joyanna U., __AD2d__, __NYS2d__, No. 504630 (3 Dept 2009) the mother moved to dismiss the paternity and visitation petition based on the ground of equitable estoppel. After a hearing, Family Court dismissed the petitions. Petitioner appealed. No appeal has been taken on behalf of the child. The child was represented by a different attorney on the appeal, who filed a brief in support of an affirmance of Family Court's order, which was a position counter to that taken by the attorney representing the child in Family Court. The child's appellate attorney appeared at oral argument of the appeal and, in response to questions from the Court, revealed that he had neither met nor spoken with the child. He explained that, while he did not know the child's position on the appeal, he was able to determine his client's position at the time of the trial from his review of the record, and he decided that supporting an affirmance would be in the 11½-year-old child's best interests. The Appellate Division relieved that attorney, assigned new counsel and held the decision in abeyance. It pointed out that the Family Court Act identifies, as one of the primary obligations of the attorney for the child, helping the child articulate his or her position to the court (see Family Ct Act § 241). As with the representation of any client this responsibility requires consulting with and counseling the client. Expressing the child's position to the court, once it has been determined with the advice of counsel, is generally a straightforward obligation, regardless of the opinion of the attorney. It noted that the Rules of the Chief Judge (22 NYCRR § 7.2) direct that in all proceedings other than juvenile delinquency and person in need of supervision cases, the child's attorney "must zealously advocate the child's position" and that, in order to determine the child's position, the attorney "must consult with and advise the child to the extent of and in a manner consistent with the child's capacities". The rule also states that "the attorney for the child should be directed by the wishes of the child, even if the attorney for the child believes that what the child wants is not in the child's best interests" and that the attorney "should explain fully the options available to the child, and may recommend to the child a course of action that in the attorney's view would best promote the child's interests" . The rule further advises that the attorney representing the child would be justified in advocating a position that is contrary to the child's wishes when he or she "is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent serious harm to the child". In such situations the attorney must still "inform the court of the child's articulated wishes if the child wants the attorney to do so". In October 2007, the Administrative Board of the Courts of New York issued a policy statement, entitled "Summary of Responsibilities of the Attorney for the Child," which outlines the necessary steps that form the core of effective representation of children. These enumerated responsibilities, which apply equally to appellate counsel, include – but are not limited to – the obligation to: "(1) [c]ommence representation of the child promptly upon being notified of the appointment; (2) [c]ontact, interview and provide initial services to the child at the earliest practical opportunity, and prior to the first court appearance when feasible; (3) [c]onsult with and advise the child regularly concerning the course of the proceeding, maintain contact with the child so as to be aware of and respond to the child's concerns and significant changes in the child's circumstances, and remain accessible to the child." The Appellate Division concluded that the child in this proceeding had not received meaningful assistance of appellate counsel. He was, at the least, entitled to consult with and be counseled by his assigned attorney, to have the appellate process explained, to have his questions answered, to have the opportunity to articulate a position which, with the passage of time, may have changed, and to explore whether to seek an extension of time within which to bring his own appeal of Family Court's order. The child was entitled to be appraised of the progress of the proceedings throughout. It appeared that none of these services was provided to the child . There was nothing in the record to indicate that the child suffered from any infirmity which might limit his ability to make a reasoned decision as to what position his appellate attorney should take on his behalf. The Appellate Division held that absent any of the extenuating circumstances set forth in 22 NYCRR 7.2 (d) (3), the appellate attorney should have met with the child and should have been directed by the wishes of the child, even if he believed that what the child wanted was not in the child's best interests. By proceeding on the appeal without consulting and advising his client, appellate counsel failed to fulfill his essential obligation.

If Credit for Increase in Equity Attributable to Payment of Mortgage Principal Is Given, That Return of Equity Should Be Subtracted from the Increased Value of Marital Residence to Arrive at Net Increased Value.

In Kost v Kost, 63 A.D.3d 798, 881 N.Y.S.2d 141 (2 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division held that the husband was entitled to an equitable share in the increase in the value of the marital residence over the course of the marriage, notwithstanding that the residence was the separate property of the wife. The increase in the value of separate property remains separate property "except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse", at which point the increase in value becomes marital property. The record established that the appreciation in the value of the marital residence was attributable to the joint efforts of the parties. The husband was, thus, entitled to share equitably in that increased value. Accordingly, the Supreme Court should have awarded the parties equal shares in the increase in the value of the marital residence. The Supreme Court determined that the husband was entitled to a credit representing his 50% share of the reduction in the principal of the mortgage obligation referable to the residence. The Appellate Division held that if that credit for the increase in equity attributable to the payment of mortgage principal is made, however, that return of equity should be subtracted from the increased value of the marital residence to arrive at the net increased value. Moreover, the husband was entitled to a return of the total contribution he made toward the purchase of the marital residence from his separate property.

Unnecessary for Supreme Court to Provide in Judgment That Maintenance Shall Terminate upon the Death of Either Party or Plaintiff's Valid or Invalid Marriage

In Lorenz v Lorenz, 63 A.D.3d 1361, 881 N.Y.S.2d 208 (3 Dept 2009) after more than 33 years of marriage, plaintiff commenced a divorce action. There were two emancipated children of the marriage. After a bench trial, at which time both parties were 54 years of age, Supreme Court, equally distributed the marital property and awarded maintenance to plaintiff of $500 per week, retroactive to September 4, 2007 and until such time as plaintiff can draw full Social Security benefits, apparently when she becomes 66. Defendant asserted that the court abused its discretion in awarding maintenance because plaintiff was capable of being self-supporting and, in the alternative, that the amount and duration were excessive. The Appellate Division modified the duration to reflect that maintenance shall terminate when plaintiff begins to draw Social Security benefits, or when she reaches full Social Security age, whichever occurs first. It rejected defendant's assertion that Supreme Court erred in failing to order that maintenance shall terminate upon the death of either party or plaintiff's valid or invalid marriage. Such language is unnecessary because the Domestic Relations Law, in more than one place, provides for the termination of any order of maintenance "upon the death of either party or upon the recipient's valid or invalid marriage.

July 16, 2009

Domestic Relations Law 236 [B] [2] was amended, by Laws of 2009, Chapter 72, § 1, effective September 1, 2009, to add a subdivision b, which provides for automatic restraining orders that come into effect upon the commencement of a matrimonial action and bind both parties.

Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (2) (b) provides that the plaintiff shall cause to be served upon the defendant, simultaneous with the service of the summons, a copy of the automatic orders set forth in subdivision (b). This paragraph places upon the plaintiff a duty to serve upon the defendant automatic orders which bind both parties. The automatic orders are binding upon the plaintiff upon the commencement of the action by the filing of the summons or summons and complaint. They are binding upon the defendant upon service of the Summons or 'Summons and Complaint. The automatic orders remain in full force and effect during the pendency of the action, unless terminated, modified or amended by further order of the court, upon motion of either of the parties, or upon written agreement between the parties duly executed and acknowledged. The automatic orders are as follows: (1) Neither party shall sell, transfer, encumber, conceal, assign, remove or in any way dispose of, without the consent of the other party in writing, or by order of the court, any property (including, but not limited to, real estate, personal property, cash accounts, stocks, mutual funds, bank accounts, cars and boats) individually or jointly held by the parties, except in the usual course of business, for customary and usual household expenses or for reasonable attorney's fees in connection with this action.(2) Neither party shall transfer, encumber, assign, remove, withdraw or in any way dispose of any tax deferred funds, stocks or other assets held in any individual retirement accounts, 401K accounts, profit sharing plans, Keough accounts, or any other pension or retirement account, and the parties shall further refrain from applying for or requesting the payment of retirement benefits or annuity payments of any kind, without the consent of the other party in writing, or upon further order of the court. (3) Neither party shall incur unreasonable debts hereafter, including, but not limited to further borrowing against any credit line secured by the family residence, further encumbering any assets, or unreasonably using credit cards or cash advances against credit cards, except in the usual course of business or for customary or usual household expenses, or for reasonable attorney's fees in connection with this action. (4) Neither party shall cause the other party or the children of the marriage to be removed from any existing medical, hospital and dental insurance coverage, and each party shall maintain the existing medical hospital and dental insurance coverage in full force and effect. (5) Neither party shall change the beneficiaries of any existing life insurance policies, and each party shall maintain the existing life insurance, automobile insurance, homeowners and renters insurance policies in full force and effect. (Go to <http://www.nysdivorce.com> to download a suggested form notice of automatic restraining orders)

Mailing Notice of Appeal Requires Deposit in a Post Office or Official Depository Within the State

In M Entertainment, Inc. v. Leydier, 62 A.D.3d 627, 880 N.Y.S.2d 40 (1 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division dismissed an appeal for failure to obtain appellate jurisdiction, where the notice of appeal was mailed from New Jersey. It pointed out that an appeal as of right must be taken within 30 days after service by a party upon the appellant of a copy of the judgment or order appealed from, with notice of entry (CPLR 5513 [a]). An appellant takes such an appeal by serving upon adverse parties a notice of appeal, and filing same with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order has been entered (CPLR 5515 [1]). Where applicable, CPLR 2103 (b) (2) provides for service of papers upon an attorney by mailing to the address designated for that purpose. "Mailing," under the statute, requires the deposit of those papers "in a post office or official depository under the exclusive care and custody of the United States Postal Service within the state" (CPLR 2103 [f] [1]). It was undisputed that plaintiffs, who opted for service by mail, did not place the notice of appeal it sent to one of the defendants in a post office or depository within this State. It held that the notice of appeal was of no effect because service was not completed within the meaning of CPLR 2103. The Court noted that the Third Department had excused late service of a notice of appeal upon a showing of mistake or excusable neglect (Peck v Ernst Bros., 81 AD2d 940 [1981]), but the Court of Appeals has categorically held that "[t]he power of an appellate court to review a judgment is subject to an appeal being timely taken" (Hecht v City of New York, 60 NY2d 57, 61 [1983]). Thus, plaintiffs' improper service of their notice of appeal was a fatal jurisdictional defect.

Error to Award a Counsel Fee Without Application or Documentation

In Horowitz v Horowitz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1797864 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that Supreme Court awarded the wife's attorney a $10,000 fee without an application from either the wife or her attorney, and without any supporting documentation or other evidence demonstrating the propriety of such an award. Accordingly, the award was an improvident exercise of discretion. It also held that the court erred in directing that $10,000 from the husband's Interactive Brokers, LLC account be paid to the wife following its deposit into the escrow account of her attorney. The court indicated that this money was to be paid as "past due maintenance" pursuant to a prior order of the court, and as a "temporary distributive award." However, the record disclosed that, in requesting the funds from the subject brokerage account, the wife was not seeking maintenance or a distributive award. Rather, she alleged that the husband had "fled the jurisdiction with the parties' children." She claimed that by "cutting off" the husband's "supply of funds," the court might induce him to return to New York and that, if the funds were in her possession, she would make sure they were not "dissipated" and would be held for the benefit of the children. The Court held that these concerns were adequately addressed by the provisions of an order restraining the account and directing that a portion of it be transferred to the escrow account of the wife's attorney.

Error to Award Pendente Lite Relief Sua Sponte

In Clair v Fitzgerald, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1798127 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) between December 24, 2007, and February 25, 2008, the husband made three motions primarily seeking either temporary custody of the parties' five-year-old daughter, or enforcement of an oral agreement to share physical custody of the child. The wife opposed the husband's motions, but did not cross-move for any affirmative relief. Supreme Court resolved the issues raised by the husband's motions by directing the parties to comply with their oral visitation agreement. Although not requested by the wife, the court also directed the husband to pay pendente lite child support, to continue to maintain medical insurance for the wife and the child, and to pay 75% of unreimbursed medical expenses. The Appellate Division reversed. It stated: "Generally, a court may, in its discretion, 'grant relief that is warranted by the facts plainly appearing on the papers on both sides, if the relief granted is not too dramatically unlike the relief sought, the proof offered supports it, and there is no prejudice to any party' (Frankel v. Stavsky, 40 AD3d 918, 918; see HCE Assoc. v. 3000 Watermill Lane Realty Corp., 173 A.D.2d 774). Here, however, the pendente lite relief directed by the court was completely different from the relief requested by the husband in his three motions, which raised issues relating to custody of and visitation with the child. In opposing the husband's motions, the wife did not indicate that she had any need for pendente lite child support, and there was nothing in the record to suggest that the husband intended to discontinue medical coverage for the wife and child. Since no request for pendente lite relief was made by the wife, the husband was not afforded an opportunity to address the necessity for such relief. Under these circumstances, the court erred in, sua sponte, awarding the wife pendente lite relief.

4% Annual Increase in Maintenance is Inappropriate

In Quinn v Quinn, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 857603 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1991 and had two children (born in 1993 and 1996). In December 2005, plaintiff commenced this divorce action. Following a bench trial, Supreme Court awarded maintenance to plaintiff of $10,000 per month for 12 years and set defendant's monthly child support obligation at $8,058. The parties' marital assets were distributed equally, with the exception of defendant's medical business, of which plaintiff was awarded 30% of the stipulated value. The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court properly decided to distribute to plaintiff 30% of the value of defendant's interest in the medical business. The court recognized that, prior to the marriage, defendant obtained his medical degree and license, and was also an established orthopedic surgeon. Although plaintiff indirectly contributed to the medical business as a parent and homemaker, she made no direct contributions, financial or otherwise, to defendant's business. In addition she received a substantial award of maintenance. The Appellate Division found that in permitting defendant, the noncustodial parent, to declare the tax exemptions, Supreme Court reasoned that defendant was the sole source of income for the children and that allowing him to take the full benefit of the tax exemptions would "maximize the total available income to implement [the court's] decision." It recognized that where a noncustodial parent meets all or a substantial part of a child's financial needs, a court may determine that the noncustodial parent is entitled to declare the child as a dependent. Here, defendant was unable to take advantage of the benefits of the tax exemptions because his income exceeded the threshold set forth in 26 USC 151(d)(3). While defendant correctly replied that such provision contained a sunset clause causing it to expire in 2010 (see 26 USC 151[d][3][F]), the court found no reason to deprive the parties of the opportunity to realize any tax benefit for the 2008 and 2009 taxable years. Accordingly, it held that plaintiff could claim the parties' children as dependants for income tax purposes for the 2008 and 2009 tax years, and for such further time until defendant was no longer precluded from the benefit of such dependency tax exemption. The parties were married for 14 years and, at the time of trial, defendant was 50 years old and earning over $1.1 million per year as a partner in a lucrative orthopedic practice. Plaintiff was 52 years old at the time of trial and, while gainfully employed prior to the marriage, sacrificed a career in retail management in order to undertake the role of a full-time wife and mother. Her prolonged absence from the retail market and lack of a college degree made it highly unlikely that she will ever be able to achieve reasonable parity with the marital standard of living through her own employment. Further, the parties' lifestyle prior to their divorce was lavish. Plaintiff would now be responsible for her own health insurance, property taxes, homeowner's insurance, and automobile expenses. In light of these facts, the monthly maintenance award was reasonable. However, its duration was reduced to eight years to encourage rehabilitation and self-sufficiency. Mindful that the primary purpose of maintenance is to encourage self-sufficiency by the recipient it found that the 4% annual increase in the amount of maintenance was inappropriate. Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in setting the child support obligation at $8,058 per month. Supreme Court specifically found that strict application of the statutory figure of 25% to all income in excess of $80,000- which would yield a monthly child support obligation of $21,642-would be inappropriate.. The court then properly considered the factors listed in Domestic Relations Law s 240(1- b)(f), including the financial resources of the parents, the children's lavish predivorce standard of living, as well as the cost of the children's numerous after-school activities, including piano, skiing, tennis and horseback riding, and determined that a reduced percentage of 8% to all remaining income over $80,000 would be appropriate.

While a distributive award to be paid by one parent to the other is a factor that the trial court may consider in awarding child support Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in failing to reduce the child support obligation due to the size of plaintiff's distributive award.

Proper to Direct Recalculation of Child Support Payments in Future

In Ansour v Ansour, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2009 WL 1046552 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that income was properly imputed to defendant from her interest in a limited partnership, which she reported on her federal income tax return as tax-exempt. This was appropriate in light of the court's finding that defendant was not forthcoming about this interest (cf. Brenner v. Brenner, 52 AD3d 322 [2008]). As to Supreme Court's direction that child support be recalculated in 2008 to include defendant's income from maintenance, the Appellate Division held that such maintenance payments received and reported on a party's most recently filed income tax return should be included as income for purposes of calculating child support. It noted that upon expiration of the maintenance payments in 2010, defendant could seek to modify the child support award accordingly. In light of the considerable distributive award and defendant's conduct unnecessarily protracting and complicating this action, the trial court providently exercised its discretion in awarding defendant only a portion of her counsel and expert fees.

July 1, 2009

Townhouse is Marital Property Even Though Wife Did Not Contribute To Down payment or Its Management

In Fields v Fields, 2009 NY Slip Op 05274 (1st Dept 2009) the parties were married in 1970, and had a son on March 19, 1973. The wife worked outside the home until February 1973, and returned to work outside the home six months after the birth. In 1978, the couple decided to purchase a house and found a five-story townhouse with 10 apartments on the Upper West Side of Manhattan. The purchase price was $130,000, with $30,000 down and the balance made up through two mortgages. The husband's mother arranged for her son to get the down payment from his grandparents; $15,000 represented a bequest that he would have gotten, and $15,000 that his mother agreed to repay to the grandparents. At the time of trial, the townhouse was appraised at $2,625,000. The husband closed on the townhouse on August 31, 1978 and conveyed a one-half interest to his mother, as a joint owner, on September 6, 1978. From 1982 to 2001, the husband and his mother managed the townhouse as a formal partnership. The mortgages, as well as the maintenance and most renovations, were satisfied through rents and refinancing. Certain renovations were made and paid for by the husband's mother. The couple and their five-year-old child moved into apartment 2 until apartment 1 was turned into a duplex with the basement apartment in 1979. The husband and his parents each paid rent to the partnership, of $1,100 per month, for their respective apartments, until 2002. The couple lived in apartment 1 for five months, until the wife became ill. She ultimately moved into apartment 2, but returned to apartment 1 to practice piano and take baths. The wife purchased some furniture for apartment 1 and "occasionally" swept and vacuumed the hall in front of the apartment entrance. She testified that she would clean up the lobby during renovations. She also purchased a $600 vacuum cleaner to clean the lobby three times a week, cleaned the mailbox vestibule, swept the interior and exterior steps, used bleach to clean dog excrement from the sidewalk, and raked leaves from a maple tree in the backyard. In the summers, when the husband would go to France to spend time with his mother, the wife took responsibility for disposing of the building's refuse. She washed lobby curtains, cleaned lobby windows and polished the lobby mirror. She also decorated apartment 1, planted and maintained the backyard, and bought patio furniture. In addition to these services, the wife purchased a carpet, and a $500 Formica counter top for the marital apartment, as well as paying $700 for flooring in the foyer. She paid $400 for a [*3]foyer mirror, and paid for couches, a basement door installation, linen closet, bathroom cabinets and a chandelier. Citing to Maczek v Maczek (248 AD2d 835, 837 [1998]) ["A party is entitled to a return of the total contribution he [or she] made toward the purchase of the marital residence from his [or her] separate property", the Special Referee found that the $30,000 down payment to be the husband's separate property, and a baby grand piano and an oak table owned by the wife to be her separate property. The Special Referee found that the wife was entitled to 35% of the marital property. With respect to the townhouse, he found that the wife "participated in and made countless contributions to the building, both directly and indirectly" even though she "was not interested in the investment," and that the "building expenses were paid from rent proceeds." The special referee also found that the wife contributed to the building indirectly as spouse and mother. Supreme Court confirmed the Special Referee's report in the judgment of divorce, entered June 22, 2007. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the fact that the husband used separate property for the down payment and that the property was titled in his and his mother's name did not change the fact that his half interest in the property was bought during the marriage and was a marital asset. These circumstances merely entitled the husband to a credit for his contribution of separate property toward the purchase of the marital residence, which was accounted for by the Referee. The husband asked the Appellate Court to deem 100% of his half interest in the increase in the property's value as his separate property because his 69-year-old wife did not contribute to the down payment or to the management of the property. The Court held that this position was inconsistent with Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(1)(c), which defines marital property as "all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held". Although the wife was not involved in the renovations of the property to the extent that the wife was in Heine v Heine, it was clear that the property's appreciation in value, as in Heine v Heine (176 AD2d 77 [1992]) had nothing to do with the husband's down payment. The appraiser testified that market forces accounted for the greatest increase in value. The parties treated the property as their marital residence. They lived in it since 1978, raised their child there, and the wife maintained the property by vacuuming, raking leaves, cleaning up after workers, as well as by doing many other chores typical of a person living in a marital residence. To deprive the wife of her equitable share of the value of this property was not only contrary to settled precedent, but also against public policy. The husband's half interest in the townhouse was therefore marital property subject to distribution.

Enhanced Earning Capacity Valuation Based upon Husband's Base Salary and Bonuses and 7% Discount Rate.

In Jayaram v Jayaram, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1478006 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), an action for a divorce, Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff former wife $1,053,500 as her 35% share of the husband's enhanced earning capacity, prejudgment interest on her distributive award of $432,954.85, child support of $1,654 per week, and counsel fees of $125,000. The parties were married on April 20, 1992, and had two children. Prior to the marriage, the husband earned a Masters in Science Degree and a Ph.D in mechanical and aerospace engineering. At the time of their marriage, both the husband and wife were employed by IBM. At the beginning of 1995 the husband entered a Columbia University program to earn a Masters in Business Administration and he earned that degree in 1996. The husband then embarked on a career in finance, obtaining a position as an investment banker at a brokerage firm with earnings that far exceeded his earnings at IBM. After obtaining his position at the brokerage firm, the husband also obtained certain licenses issued by the National Association of Securities Dealers. On appeal, the husband contended that the Supreme Court erred in concluding that his MBA degree and NASD licenses provided him with an enhanced earning capacity subject to equitable distribution. The Appellate Division disagreed holding that an academic degree may constitute a marital asset subject to equitable distribution, even though the degree may not necessarily confer the legal right to engage in a particular profession. While the husband presented some evidence that an MBA degree was not an actual prerequisite to his employment at the brokerage firm, there was also ample evidence, including expert testimony, to support the court's finding that the attainment of this degree made the husband a more attractive candidate for a position in investment banking. The knowledge of financial products, including options and derivatives, which the husband acquired during his MBA studies, assisted in his advancement at the firm. Although the wife did not make direct financial contributions to the husband's attainment of his MBA degree and NASD licenses, she made substantial indirect contributions by supporting the husband's educational endeavors, working full-time and contributing her earnings to the family, being the primary caretaker of the couple's children, cooking family meals, and participating in housekeeping responsibilities. It held that the court should not have relied solely upon the wife's expert in valuing the husband's enhanced earnings capacity at $4,300,000. The methodology employed by the expert essentially consisted of deducting the husband's baseline earnings from his topline earnings, and projecting this differential over his expected work life. This methodology resulted in overstating the husband's enhanced earning capacity, because it failed to adequately account for the fact that the MBA degree was only one factor in the husband's employment and advancement at the brokerage firm. The wife's expert employed only a risk free 3% discount rate in projecting the likelihood that the husband would achieve his projected earnings. The court attempted to arrive at a more accurate valuation of the husband's enhanced earnings by applying a 30% coverture fraction to account for the husband's premarital educational achievements. In view of the strong evidence that the mathematical skills which the husband honed prior to the marriage during his engineering studies made him a highly desirable employee at the brokerage firm, application of the coverture fraction was insufficient to arrive at an equitable determination of the wife's share of enhanced earnings. The Appellate Division adopted the $2,100,000 enhanced earning capacity valuation recommended by the court-appointed neutral accountant, which considered both the husband's base salary and bonuses in determining his topline salary, and reflected a more conservative 7% discount rate. Applying a 30% coverture fraction to $2,100,000, it found that the wife's 35% share of the husband's enhanced earning capacity was $514,500. The Appellate Division held that the court should not have awarded the wife prejudgment interest on her distributive award. The distributive award was largely comprised of the wife's interest in the husband's enhanced earning capacity, which was not fixed until after trial. Thus, this was not a tangible asset which the wife was deprived the use of during the pendency of the litigation.

Maintenance Payments Received Should Be Included as Income for Purposes of Calculating Child Support.

In Ansour v Ansour, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2009 WL 1046552 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which, inter alia, imputed income to defendant from her interest in a limited partnership, which she reported on her federal income tax return as tax-exempt. The Court held that this was appropriate in light of the court's finding that defendant was not forthcoming about this interest (cf. Brenner v. Brenner, 52 AD3d 322 [2008]). As to the court's direction that child support be recalculated in 2008 to include defendant's income from maintenance, it held that such maintenance payments received and reported on a party's most recently filed income tax return should be included as income for purposes of calculating child support. It noted that upon expiration of the maintenance payments in 2010, defendant could seek to modify the child support award accordingly.

June 15, 2009

Error to Permit "Licensed Mental Health Counselor" To Offer Opinion Based in Part upon Interviews with Collateral Sources Who Did Not Testify

In Matter of Murphy v Woods,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1565164 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in permitting a "licensed mental health counselor," who examined the parties' child and was called as a witness by the mother, to offer an opinion that was based in part upon his interviews with collateral sources who did not testify at trial. There are two exceptions to the general rule requiring that opinion evidence be based on facts in the record or on facts personally known to the witness: if the opinion is based upon out-of-court material "of a kind accepted in the profession as reliable in forming a professional opinion or if it comes from a witness subject to full cross-examination on the trial" (Hamsch v. New York City Tr. Auth., 63 N.Y.2d 723, 726, 480 N.Y.S.2d 195, 469 N.E.2d 516). Neither exception applied in this case. At the fact-finding hearing, the expert testified that material portions of his opinion were based not only upon his interviews with the parties, but also were based on his interviews with collateral sources. The Appellate Division was unable to determine the extent to which the expert relied on those collateral source interviews in forming his opinion. Furthermore, the collateral sources did not testify at trial, and there was no evidence establishing their reliability. The court could not conclude that the admission of the expert's opinion was harmless error because, without the admission of that opinion or the testimony of the collateral sources, there was insufficient evidence in the record to support the court's determination. It reversed the order and remitted the matter to Family Court for a new hearing before a different adjudicator.

Laws of 2009, Ch 32, repealed Family Court Act 516 Relating to Compromise Agreements in Paternity Proceedings, effective May 19, 2009.

Custody Stipulation Entitled to Little If Any Weight Where it Was Based upon Parties' Stipulation Without a Hearing When Father Was 19 Years Old, Having Been the Victim of Mother's Sexual Abuse

In Matter of Timothy V v Renee W,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1544388 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were parents of a son born in 1994, just after the father turned 16 years of age and the mother was 28 years of age. The father, who had absconded from a social services' placement at the age of 14 and commenced living with the mother as her boyfriend, continued to reside with her and her two young children until he was 18 years old. In 1997, when the father was 19 years old, the parties, acting pro se, entered into a stipulated custody order in Family Court which granted the mother sole legal and physical custody of the son, and provided the father with three weekends of parenting time per month. In 2007, the then 29- year-old father filed this petition for modification of custody seeking sole legal and physical custody alleging that the mother had failed to adequately provide for the son's educational, counseling, and medical/dental needs. Following fact finding, including a Lincoln hearing with the parties' then 13- year-old son, Family Court made lengthy findings and issued an order of modification awarding the parties joint legal custody, continuing the mother's primary physical custody until the end of the 2007-2008 (eighth grade) school year, and awarding the father primary physical custody thereafter. The Appellate Division affirmed. Family Court's determination to change primary physical custody to the father was supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record. Although this was an established custody arrangement of some 10 years, presumably requiring a substantial change in circumstances analysis, it was based upon the parties' stipulation without a hearing when the father was 19 years old, having been the victim of the mother's sexual abuse. It held that under these extraordinary circumstances, the parties' stipulation was entitled to little, if any, weight .

Fivefold Increase in Earnings Is Substantial Change in Circumstances Warranting Downward Modification of Support.

In Vincent Z v Dominique K, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1181913 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Respondent's fivefold increase in earnings constituted a substantial change in circumstances warranting a downward modification of petitioner's child support obligations.

Not Error to Decline to Award Temporary Child Support Where Parties Reside Together and Children Supported

In Mueller v Mueller, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 943725 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an award of pendente lite maintenance of $650 per week, which directed the defendant to pay the carrying charges on the marital residence, including mortgage payments, taxes, utilities, pool maintenance, and other household expenses. Moreover, the defendant was directed to maintain various types of insurance coverage for the plaintiff and the parties' children, and to pay reasonable expenses associated with the parties' vehicles. Under these circumstances, the temporary maintenance award was sufficient to meet the plaintiff's reasonable needs during the pendency of this action. It held that the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court erred in declining to award her pendente lite child support for the parties' two children was without merit. "Both the plaintiff and the children continued to reside with the defendant in the marital residence, and there was no evidence that the children were not being properly cared for by the defendant (cf. Cataldi v. Shaw, 101 A.D.2d 823, 824)."

Issue of reconciliation irrelevant in face of the contract language requiring a written termination of the separation agreement

In Sifre v Sifre, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1150156 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) concluding that plaintiff substantially complied with the parties separation agreement, Supreme Court denied defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint and partially denied plaintiff's cross motion for summary judgment dismissing the defense of reconciliation finding questions of fact with respect to said defense. The Appellate Division modified. It stated that a plaintiff may obtain a conversion divorce when the parties have lived separate and apart pursuant to a written separation agreement for more than one year and the plaintiff has substantially complied with the terms of the agreement (DRL 170[6]). While reconciliation is a defense, mere sporadic cohabitation and sexual relations are not enough to vitiate a separation agreement; there must be intent to reconcile and intent to abandon the agreement. The parties 2002 separation agreement stated that none of its provisions "shall be changed or modified, nor shall this Agreement be discharged or terminated in whole or in part, except by an instrument in writing." The parties therefore required that a termination of the separation agreement--i.e., an abandonment of it--must be in writing. While the parties' affidavits raised questions of fact concerning whether they reconciled, that issue was irrelevant in the face of the contract language requiring a written termination of the agreement. Nothing in the record raised questions concerning fraud, coercion or anything else that would affect the validity of the agreement or that provision. Based upon the language of the agreement and the lack of any writing evidencing the parties' intent to abandon or terminate the agreement, plaintiff was entitled to dismissal of the reconciliation defense. Once that defense was removed, he was also entitled to summary judgment granting him a divorce.

Family Court Lacks Jurisdiction to Apply Doctrine of Equitable Estoppel to Adjudicate Paternity of Female Partner of Mother

In Matter of H.M. v E.T. , --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1477264 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the child's birth mother sought to have another female, lacking legal ties to her, and lacking biological and legal ties to the child, adjudicated a parent of the child and required to pay child support. Justice Covello, In an opinion for the majority held that because the application was not of a type that the Family Court, a court of limited jurisdiction, has been specifically authorized to entertain, the Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the action. He noted that the dissent concluded, as the Family Court did, that the availability of the doctrine of equitable estoppel, applicable in a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 5 (see Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 NY3d 320, 326; Matter of Sharon GG. v. Duane HH., 95 A.D.2d 466, 468, affd 63 N.Y.2d 859, 862), warranted the denial of E.T.'s motion to dismiss. However, although the doctrine of equitable estoppel can be applied in a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 5, when the Family Court applies the doctrine, the Family Court is merely precluding a party from "denying a certain fact" because equitable considerations so warrant. This is not the same thing as the Family Court granting equitable relief, something the Family Court lacks the power to do. Hence, when the Family Court applies the doctrine, the Family Court is doing so as a means of granting relief specifically authorized by the Constitution or statute. That is, the Family Court is applying the doctrine as a means of adjudicating a "male" "the father" of a child, or as a means of declaring that a "male" is "not the father" of a child. Here, however, H.M. demanded certain relief the Family Court is not specifically authorized by the Constitution or statute to grant. Under these circumstances, the Family Court could not apply the doctrine, and necessarily cannot reach the issues of whether E.T. should be estopped from denying her parentage of the subject child, and whether estopping E.T. from denying her parentage of the child would be in the child's best interests. If the Family Court applied the doctrine as a means of granting relief not specifically authorized by the Constitution or statute, that would be tantamount to the Family Court granting equitable relief.

June 1, 2009

Non-custodial Parent Does Not Retain Decision-making Authority Pertaining to Education of Child Where Custodial Parent Granted Exclusive Custody of the Child and Decree and Custody Order Are Silent as to Right to Control Such Decisions.

In Fuentes v Board of Educ. of City of New York, --- NY3d ----, 2009 WL 1148636 (2009) Plaintiff Jesus Fuentes and his wife were divorced in 1996. Family Court entered an order granting the wife exclusive custody of the three children, including a son, M.F., who, due to a genetic disorder, was legally blind. M.F. attended public school in New York City and received special education services to accommodate his disability. In 2000, plaintiff believed that M.F.'s special education services and accommodations were inadequate and requested a reevaluation. When the Committee on Special Education for the Hearing, Handicapped, and Visually Impaired responded that M.F.'s services were adequate, plaintiff requested a hearing from the Impartial Hearing Office of the New York State Department of Education to review that determination. In 2001, plaintiff's request for a hearing was denied based on his status as the non-custodial parent of M.F. The Office concluded that because plaintiff was not the "person in parental relation" (Education Law 3212), he did not have the right to make educational decisions pertaining to M.F. and, consequently, did not have a right to request a hearing. Plaintiff then commenced an action in the United States District Court, alleging, among other things, that he was denied his right under the federal Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) to a hearing to review the determinations of the Board of Education. After a dismissal, appeal, and remand on issues not pertinent to the certified question, the district court dismissed plaintiff's case for lack of standing under the IDEA. On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit found that no precedent from the Court of Appeals directly addressed the dispositive issue and certified a question, which the Court of Appeals reformulated: " Whether, under New York Law, the non-custodial parent of a child retains decision-making authority pertaining to the education of the child where (1) the custodial parent is granted exclusive custody of the child and (2) the divorce decree and custody order are silent as to the right to control such decisions. “ As reformulated the certified question was answered in the negative. The Court of Appeals noted that it is well settled in the Appellate Division that, absent specific provisions in a separation agreement, custody order, or divorce decree, the custodial parent has sole decision-making authority with respect to practically all aspects of the child's upbringing. It declined to recognize an implied right of non-custodial parents to exercise decision-making authority with respect to their child's education notwithstanding the custody order's silence on this subject and emphasized the importance of parties determining these issues at the time of separation or divorce. The Court noted the distinction between a non-custodial parent's right to "participate" in a child's education and the right to "control" educational decisions. Generally, there is nothing which prevents a non-custodial parent (even one without any decision making authority) from requesting information about, keeping apprised of, or otherwise remaining interested in the child's educational progress. However, unless the custody order expressly permits joint decision-making authority or designates particular authority with respect to the child's education, a non-custodial parent has no right to "control" such decisions. This authority properly belongs to the custodial parent.

Not Necessary to Plead Justification as Defense to Abandonment Where Not a Claim That Would Be Likely to Take the Plaintiff by Surprise, and Does Not Raise Issues of Fact Not Appearing on the Face of the Complaint

In Gulati v Gulati, 60 A.D.3d 810, 876 N.Y.S.2d 430 (2 Dept 2009) the Appellate Division pointed out that pursuant to DRL 170(2), an action for a divorce on the ground of abandonment may be maintained when the defendant abandons the plaintiff for a period of one or more years. To establish entitlement to a divorce on this ground, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant unjustifiably and without the plaintiff's consent abandoned the plaintiff for a period of one or more years. Here, the plaintiff made a prima facie showing of her entitlement to summary judgment on the ground of abandonment by submitting evidence that the defendant moved out of the marital residence in April 2003 without her consent, and without justification. In opposition, the defendant submitted evidentiary proof sufficient to raise triable issues of fact as to whether an abandonment occurred. The submissions raised issues of fact as to whether the plaintiff consented to his initial departure from the marital residence and to his continued absence from the home, and whether his actions were justified. Accordingly, plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on her cause of action for a divorce based on abandonment should have been denied. The Court rejected plaintiff's contention that the defendant waived the right to argue that he was justified in leaving and remaining away from the marital residence because he did not plead justification as an affirmative defense in his answer. Since abandonment cannot be established merely by evidence of a separation, a plaintiff seeking a divorce on this ground has an obligation to prove, as an element of his or her prima facie case, that the defendant unjustifiably left and remained away from the marital residence for a period of more than one year. Although the Court has recognized that it is permissible to plead justification as an affirmative defense (see Del Galdo v. Del Galdo, 51 A.D.2d 741, 379 N.Y.S.2d 479), it held that it is not necessary that it be so pleaded where, as here, it is not a claim that would be likely to take the plaintiff by surprise, and does not raise issues of fact not appearing on the face of the complaint (see CPLR 3018[b]). In this regard, the Court noted that the plaintiff alleged in her complaint that the defendant had abandoned the marital residence without cause or provocation, and the defendant denied these allegations in his answer. Under these circumstances, the defendant, who has not defaulted, should not be precluded from arguing that he was justified in leaving and remaining away from the marital residence.

Failure to Substantiate Testimony by Submission of Documentary Evidence Warrants Denial of Downward Modification

In re Virginia S. v Thomas S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 36601 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that the party seeking modification of a support award bears the burden of proving a substantial change in circumstances, and that in a prior order in 2005 (22 A.D.3d 415, 803 N.Y.S.2d 54), it had rejected respondent's submission of an unattested financial disclosure affidavit and a single pay stub as warranting such a reduction, while noting evidence of respondent's considerable financial resources and earning capacity. At the new hearing held on remand, respondent again failed to provide documentation of his income and assets sufficient to justify a modification of his scheduled payments. Although his testimony supported his claim of a substantial change of circumstances, he failed to provide any documentation to substantiate it. His evidence consisted of an unsigned and unattested financial affidavit, and unsigned tax returns from 2004 and 2005. He produced no other tax returns, nor any verification that he was receiving public assistance or any evidence of good faith efforts to obtain employment commensurate with his experience and qualifications. In a related enforcement proceeding, it was undisputed, that respondent had failed to make any support payments since 2005. The only question that remained was whether this violation was willful. Failure to pay support as ordered constitutes prima facie evidence of a willful violation (Family Ct Act 454[3][a]). The burden then shifts to the supporting party, who must offer some competent, credible evidence of his inability to make the required payments. Only when such evidence is presented does the burden shift back to the recipient to contradict that proof. At the violation hearing, respondent offered only his own testimony regarding his income and assets, his health status, and his inability to find work. However, he again failed to substantiate his claims with documentation, such as signed tax returns, a completed and attested financial affidavit, or the testimony of his doctors regarding his alleged disabilities. Nor did he provide any documentation about his efforts to obtain employment, such as a resume, job applications, or a job search diary. Notably, respondent even admitted that although he had applied for social security disability, his application was rejected because he was not deemed to be disabled. He had a potentially high earning capacity as a stockbroker and holder of a commercial driver's license. Respondent failed to overcome the prima facie evidence that his violation was willful. That being the case, petitioner was not required to come forward with evidence to contradict respondent's assertions.

When Child Support Ordered for More than One Child, Emancipation of Oldest Child Does Not Automatically Reduce Amount of Support Owed under Order for Multiple Children In Matter of Wrighton v Wrighton, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 1153590 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) on October 18, 2005, approximately 15 months after the older of the two children attained the age of 21, the father filed a petition for a downward modification of child support. The father's petition was dismissed after he failed to serve it on the mother. Thereafter, the father continued paying support for the older child. On May 23, 2007, the father filed a petition to terminate the order of support based on both children having attained the age of 21 and requested that any overpayment be applied to arrears. The Support Magistrate granted his petition to terminate the order of support, but did so without prejudice to the payment of arrears. The Family Court denied the father's objection to that part of the Support Magistrate's order. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that when child support has been ordered for more than one child, the emancipation of the oldest child does not automatically reduce the amount of support owed under an order of support for multiple children. In addition, a credit should not be allowed for any alleged overpayments made on behalf of such emancipated child, absent or prior to a parent's legal action for a downward modification of support. The father's October 18, 2005, petition to modify the order of support, based on the older child attaining the age of 21, was dismissed after he failed to serve the mother with the petition. Thus, the father failed to meet his burden of proving that the amount of unallocated child support was excessive based on the needs of the remaining child. As such, the father was not entitled to a credit toward arrears for the alleged overpayments made on behalf of the oldest child after her emancipation.

May 18, 2009

Court of Appeals Holds Payments Made to a Former Spouse And/or Children of an Earlier Marriage, Even If Made Pursuant to Court Order, Are Not Type of Liabilities Entitled to Recoupment. A Student Loan, Which Is Both Incurred and Fully Paid for During Marriage, Is a Marital Obligation for Which Responsibility Is to Be Shared Between the Parties. As a Matter of Public Policy, a "Party to Litigation May Not Take a Position Contrary to a Position Taken in an Income Tax Return."

In Mahoney-Buntzman v Buntzman, --- N.Y.3d ----, 2009 WL 1227875 (2009) the Court of Appeals established the general rule that "where payments are made before either party is anticipating the end of the marriage, and there is no fraud or concealment, courts should not look back and try to compensate for the fact that the net effect of the payments may, in some cases, have resulted in the reduction of marital assets. Nor should courts attempt to adjust for the fact that payments out of separate property may have benefitted both parties, or even the non-titled spouse exclusively. The parties' choice of how to spend funds during the course of the marriage should ordinarily be respected. Courts should not second-guess the economic decisions made during the course of a marriage, but rather should equitably distribute the assets and obligations remaining once the relationship is at an end." Thus, the Court held that payments made to a former spouse and/or children of an earlier marriage, even if made pursuant to court order, are not the type of liabilities entitled to recoupment. And, a student loan, which was both incurred and fully paid for during the marriage, was a marital obligation for which responsibility was to be shared between the parties. The Court also held that, as a matter of public policy, a "party to litigation may not take a position contrary to a position taken in an income tax return."

The parties were married in New York in 1993 and had two daughters. The wife had an adult child from a previous relationship. The husband was married once before, and had two adult children from that marriage. Pursuant to a divorce judgment, the husband was obligated to pay his first wife maintenance. During the present marriage, the husband and another individual formed Educational Video Conference Inc. (EVCI), a New York Corporation that went public in 1999. At the time of the action, the husband owned a number of shares and options of EVCI stock, all of which were acquired during marriage. Prior to his marriage to plaintiff, the husband had an interest in Arol Development Corporation (ADC), a real estate development company he founded with his father in 1971. In 1983, the husband founded another company, Big Apple Industrial Buildings, Inc., 80% of which he sold to ADC in 1989. In 1998, the husband entered into an agreement with his father whereby he agreed to relinquish his stock ownership in both corporations in exchange for a lump sum payment. The agreement provided that the payment would be reported on a "1099" form issued to him by the purchasing company. In order to account for the increased tax liability that the husband would incur as a consequence of treating the payment as ordinary income rather than as a sale of stock, the payment was increased by 17 percent. This money, amounting to $1.8 million was received by the husband during the marriage and reported on the parties' joint income tax return as self-employment business income. In May 1996, the husband obtained a doctorate in education from Fordham University for which he had taken out a student loan that was repaid two years later. On May 19, 2003, the wife commenced the divorce action.

Supreme Court granted wife a divorce on the grounds of abandonment and distributed the various assets and debts of the parties' marriage (13 Misc.3d 1216A [Sup Ct Westchester Co 2006]). As it pertained to the EVCI stock and options, the court found that the husband played a substantial role in changing the direction of the company and in its expansion. Nevertheless, the court rejected the husband's claims that the appreciation in the value of the EVCI's stock was due solely to his efforts, holding that there were significant contributions of others to the operations of EVCI and no evidence directly linking the increase in the value of its stock solely to husband. Consequently, the court used the date of trial for valuation purposes of the EVCI stock and options. The court declined to give wife credit for one-half of the maintenance paid by husband to his first wife during the marriage. It noted that both parties had used marital assets to assist other relatives. For instance, the wife had used marital sums to provide support for her daughter and her father. The court stated "neither party may be heard to complain about the other's use of marital funds to pay for their own obligations or to aid other family members, when that approach was evidently an accepted part of their lifestyle." For the same reasons, the court declined to give the wife a credit for monies used to repay the student loan. Supreme Court also held that the husband was estopped from arguing that the funds received from the sale of his corporate interests to his father were the proceeds from the sale of stock and thus, separate property, because he had reported the funds as business income on the parties' joint tax returns. The court also noted that in his 1993 Judgment of Divorce from his first wife, the husband represented that he owned no stock at the time.

The Appellate Division modified the judgment of Supreme Court by holding that wife was entitled to an equitable distribution credit of one-half of the amount of court-ordered maintenance paid by husband to his former wife from marital funds (51 AD3d 732). It held that the maintenance obligation to his first wife constituted debt incurred by him prior to the parties' marriage and was therefore his sole responsibility. It also awarded wife a 50% credit, $24,081.45, for the student debt incurred by husband during the marriage to attain his degree, concluding that because a court-appointed expert had determined that husband's advanced degree did not enhance his earnings, the wife received no benefit from it, and therefore, the student loan was incurred to satisfy husband's separate property interest making the loan his sole obligation. As modified, the Appellate Division affirmed.

The Court of Appeals modified the order of the Appellate Division in an opinion by Judge Pigott. He pointed out that the Domestic Relations Law recognizes that the marriage relationship is an economic partnership. As such, during the life of a marriage spouses share in both its profits and losses. When the marriage comes to an end, courts are required to equitably distribute not only the assets remaining from the marriage, but also the liabilities. A trial court considering the factors set forth in the Domestic Relations Law has broad discretion in deciding what is equitable under all of the circumstances. Indeed, when it comes to the equitable distribution of marital property, Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(5)(d)(13) authorizes the trial court to take into account "any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper". Consequently, the trial court has substantial flexibility in fashioning an appropriate decree based on what it views to be fair and equitable under the circumstances. However, during the life of any marriage, many payments are made, whether of debts old or new, or simply current expenses. If courts were to consider financial activities that occur and end during the course of a marriage, the result would be parties to a marriage seeking review of every debit and credit incurred.

Judge Pigott stated the "...general rule, that where the payments are made before either party is anticipating the end of the marriage, and there is no fraud or concealment, courts should not look back and try to compensate for the fact that the net effect of the payments may, in some cases, have resulted in the reduction of marital assets. Nor should courts attempt to adjust for the fact that payments out of separate property may have benefitted both parties, or even the non-titled spouse exclusively. The parties' choice of how to spend funds during the course of the marriage should ordinarily be respected. Courts should not second-guess the economic decisions made during the course of a marriage, but rather should equitably distribute the assets and obligations remaining once the relationship is at an end.”

With this holding in mind, the Court reviewed the four issues raised on the appeal. The wife sought to recoup money that was expended during the marriage to pay husband's obligation to his former spouse for maintenance. It held that the wife was not entitled to such recoupment. Expenditures made during the life of the marriage towards maintenance to a former spouse, as well as payments made pursuant to a child support order, are obligations that do not enure solely to the benefit of one spouse. Payments made to a former spouse and/or children of an earlier marriage, even if made pursuant to court order, are not the type of liabilities entitled to recoupment. The Court cautioned that this is not to say that every expenditure of marital funds during the course of the marriage may not be considered in an equitable distribution calculation. Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(5)(d)(13) expressly and broadly authorizes the trial court to take into account "any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper" in determining an equitable distribution of marital property. There may be circumstances where equity requires a credit to one spouse for marital property used to pay off the separate debt of one spouse or add to the value of one spouse's separate property (citing e.g. Micha v. Micha, 213 A.D.2d 956, 957-958 [3d Dept 1995]; Carney v. Carney, 202 A.D.2d 907 [3d Dept 1994]). Further, to the extent that expenditures are truly excessive, the ability of one party to claim that the other has accomplished a "wasteful dissipation of assets" (DRL 236[B][5][d][11]) by his or her expenditures provides protection. The payment of maintenance to a former spouse, however, does not fall under either of these categories.

The Court also held that the wife was not entitled to a credit for payments made during the marriage towards husband's student loan. The husband incurred the student loan during the parties' marriage, and had his degree conferred an economic benefit, wife would have been entitled to a share in its value (see O'Brien v. O'Brien, 66 N.Y.2d 576 [1985]). Thus, the loan, which was both incurred and fully paid for during the marriage, was a marital obligation for which responsibility was to be shared between the parties. The Court noted in a footnote that if the student loan debt was still outstanding, however, it may have been appropriate for the trial court to conclude that defendant alone was required to bear the obligation of repayment of the balance of his student loan.

The Court of Appeals also held that the trial court providently exercised its discretion by setting the valuation date for the EVCI stock and options as the date of trial (citing generally McSparron v. McSparron, 87 N.Y.2d 275 [1995]). Similarly, it found that the trial court properly exercised its discretion when it classified the money received by husband pursuant to the settlement agreement as marital property, given the fact that husband made representations that the money was business income for tax purposes. The Court held that a "party to litigation may not take a position contrary to a position taken in an income tax return." The husband did not dispute that, in accordance with his settlement agreement, he reported the $1,800,000 in settlement proceeds as business income on his federal income tax return, in which he swore that the representations contained within it were true. The Court could not, as a matter of policy, permit parties to assert positions in legal proceedings that are contrary to declarations made under the penalty of perjury on income tax returns.

Court of Appeals Holds When Pendente Lite Award of Maintenance Is Found at Trial to Be Excessive or Inequitable Court May Make an Appropriate Adjustment in Equitable Distribution Award. However, There Is "Strong Public Policy Against Restitution or Recoupment of Child Support Overpayments".

In Johnson v Chapin, - N.Y3d -, 2009 WL 1227869 (2009) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Pigott, held that when a pendente lite award of maintenance is found at trial to be excessive or inequitable, the Court may make an appropriate adjustment in the equitable distribution award. However, it rejected the husband's claim that he should be entitled to a credit for excess child support payments pointing out that it has long been held that there is a "strong public policy against restitution or recoupment of support overpayments".

The Husband and wife were married in 1991 and had one child. The husband had four children from a previous marriage and was required to pay both maintenance and child support. At the time the parties married, both were working attorneys. The Wife stopped working outside the home when the parties' son was three years old. The Husband was a partner at a law firm from 1968 until 1999, and thereafter became a managing director at a major investment banking firm until 2001. Prior to the marriage, the husband owned a home on approximately 160 acres of land in Claverack, New York. During the marriage the parties spent approximately $2 million to renovate and improve the property. While the husband played a larger role in these improvements, the wife also participated in some of the project's details. In November 2001, the wife commenced an action for divorce after discovering husband was having an extramarital affair. Prior to trial, she made an application for interim maintenance and child support. Supreme Court imputed an average annual income of $2,273,680 to the husband and ordered him to pay $18,465 monthly maintenance to wife and child support of $10,625 per month. The Husband was also ordered to pay the wife interim counsel fees of $100,000.

A judgment of divorce on the grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment was awarded to the wife. The Trial court recognized that the Claverack property was the husband's separate property, but held the funds spent on the renovations to be marital property subject to equitable distribution. The court awarded 50% of the appreciation of the Claverack estate to the wife. It also credited the wife with 50% of the marital property the husband used to pay the maintenance and child support obligations to his first wife. After considering that the wife had not worked outside the home for nine years and that it would take six years to develop her career, the court awarded the wife durational maintenance of $6,000 per month for six years. It also awarded wife legal fees and expert fees to be determined by a referee due in part to the fact that wife and her son "have suffered day to day crises resulting from the [husband's] harassment of them."

The Appellate Division modified the judgment by reducing the wife's share of the enhanced value of the Claverack property to 25% and by crediting the husband for his pendente lite maintenance obligations (49 AD3d 348). The majority noted that the husband had consistently been less than forthcoming regarding his income and that Supreme Court had found him incredible in the reporting of his income and assets. The majority therefore upheld the imposition of legal and expert fees on husband, noting that he "engaged in a pattern of obstructionist conduct which unnecessarily delayed and increased the legal fees incurred in the litigation".

The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Pigott, held that when a pendente lite award of maintenance is found at trial to be excessive or inequitable, the Court may make an appropriate adjustment in the equitable distribution award. Thus, Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in giving husband a credit representing the amount of the pendent lite maintenance he paid that exceeded what he was required to pay under the final maintenance award. In determining the temporary maintenance award, Supreme Court imputed an average salary in excess of $2 million to husband. However, at trial, it was established that his income was significantly lower. Given the disparity in the maintenance amounts, under the circumstances of this case, it was appropriate for the husband to receive a credit.

The Court of Appeals rejected the husband's claim that he should have been entitled to a credit for excess child support payments, pointing out that it has long been held that there is a "strong public policy against restitution or recoupment of support overpayments" and nothing in this record showed it was error to deny that relief.

Judge Pigott noted that under the equitable distribution statute any appreciation in the value of separate property due to the contributions or efforts of the nontitled spouse will be considered marital property (Price v. Price, 69 N.Y.2d 8 [1986]). This includes any direct contributions to the appreciation, such as when the nontitled spouse makes financial contributions towards the property, as well as when the nontitled spouse makes direct nonfinancial contributions, such as by personally maintaining, making improvements to, or renovating a marital residence. Thus, Supreme Court properly held that the improvements were marital, since the increase in the property was a result of both parties' efforts. He found that the Appellate Division did not abuse its discretion in reducing the award to wife from 50% to 25% of the property appreciation. The husband's income was the sole source of the funds expended on the property and, the husband's involvements in the renovations were far more extensive. The Court noted that it had held that when "exercising its discretionary power to award counsel fees, a court should review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions" (citing DeCabrera v. Cabrera-Rosete, 70 N.Y.2d 879 [1987]). Here, when awarding the fees, the court considered the parties' financial positions as well as the delay incurred as a result of husband's obstructionist tactics. Thus, it declined to disturb those awards. Finally, the Court held that the wife was not entitled to the 50% credit representing the money paid during the marriage towards husband's pre-marital obligations to pay his first wife maintenance and child support (citing "Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman, NY3d", which it decided the same day).

May 1, 2009

Husband's Admission in Bank Loan Application Provides Basis for Valuation of His Company

In Steinberg v Steinberg, 59 A.D.3d 702, 874 N.Y.S.2d 230 (2 Dept 2009) the defendant husband appealed from a judgement of Supreme Court, after trial, which awarded the plaintiff one half of the marital assets, imputed income to him of $300,000, awarded the plaintiff nondurational maintenance, and awarded the plaintiff $200,000 in attorney's fees, and the plaintiff cross-appealed from portions of the judgment which awarded the defendant a separate property interest in his JP Morgan Chase investment account in the amount of $276,724, his interest in Phoenix Capital & Management Company in the amount of $333,333, and a note payable to him by Phoenix Capital & Management Company in the amount of $173,167. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in dividing the marital assets equally between the parties. When both spouses equally contribute to a marriage of long duration, as here, the division of marital property should be as equal as possible. However, Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant a separate property interest with respect to his JP Morgan Chase investment account. Property acquired during the marriage is presumed to be marital property and the party seeking to overcome such presumption has the burden of proving that the property in dispute is separate property. Here, the assets in question were acquired during the marriage, and the defendant's testimony that the source of the assets could be traced to premarital property, unsupported by documentary evidence, was insufficient to overcome the marital presumption. Also, the defendant's JP Morgan Chase investment account, as well as the parties' AB Watley account, both active assets, should have been valued at $351,724.35 and $6,152.97 respectively, which was their value as of the date of commencement of this action. Supreme Court also should have awarded the plaintiff a marital share of Phoenix Capital & Management Company and a note payable to the defendant by Phoenix. Although Phoenix was created two years prior to the parties' marriage, the defendant could not recollect what Phoenix did during the time that preceded the marriage. Instead, the defendant testified that Phoenix acquired an office building two years after the marriage, which was its only asset, and that he and other partners contributed money to Phoenix to manage the property after its purchase. The defendant did not trace the source of his portion of the building's acquisition costs to separate pre-marital funds and likewise did not establish that his actual financial contributions to the building's acquisition and management costs were not derived from marital funds. Marital property is to be viewed broadly, while separate property is to be viewed narrowly. Where, as here, a party fails to trace sources of money claimed to be separate property, a court may treat it as marital property. By extension, the note payable to the defendant as a result of his financial contributions to Phoenix during the marriage should have been considered marital property as well. The Supreme Court valued the defendant's one-third interest in Phoenix at $333,000, based on the defendant's testimony that the property was worth $3 million and was subject to a $2 million mortgage. However, in a prior sworn bank loan application dated May 12, 2005, the defendant estimated the value of the office building to be $4 million. Given the credibility problems that pervaded the defendant's testimony generally, the court's discretion in valuing the property should have been exercised in favor of the defendant's most recently documented admission that the property was valued at $4 million. Accordingly, it set the value of the defendant's interest in Phoenix at $666,666 rather than $333,333, subject to the plaintiff's 50% equitable distributive share. The defendant's contention that the Supreme Court improperly imputed income to him in determining his maintenance obligation was without merit. A court need not rely upon a party's own account of his finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated future potential earnings. Supreme Court properly imputed an annual income of $300,000 to the defendant given his employment history and his current ownership of a successful, growing business. In light of the plaintiff's age, health, and history of low earnings over the course of a 23-year marriage, the Supreme Court properly found it to be unlikely that she would become self-supporting and, consequently, providently exercised its discretion in awarding her nondurational maintenance.

Failure to Provide "Paper Trail" Documenting Source of Money Used to Purchase Marital Residence Not Fatal to Separate Property Claim. Court Did Not Violate DRL 248 by Ordering That Maintenance Would Terminate in the Event That Wife Resided with an Unrelated Adult Male for More than 30 Days

In Juhasz v Juhasz, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2009 WL 281303 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the parties were married in 1990 and had three minor children. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly determined that a brokerage account with Julius Baer (JB account) was defendant's separate property inasmuch as it was funded entirely from defendant's premarital sale of stock in a family business. The court erred in failing to credit defendant for his contribution of separate property toward the purchase of the marital residence. A spouse is entitled to a credit for his or her contribution of separate property toward the purchase of the marital residence, including any contributions that are directly traceable to separate property. Before the marriage, defendant purchased a home for $240,000 with funds that he derived from his sale of the stock. During the marriage, defendant contributed $200,000 from the JB account to purchase a vacation home for approximately $450,000, and he secured a mortgage for the balance. That mortgage was also paid with funds from the JB account. The parties subsequently sold both homes and purchased the marital residence for $216,000. The Appellate Division concluded that defendant was entitled to a credit of $216,000 for his contribution of separate property to purchase the marital residence, and modified the amended judgment accordingly. While defendant did not provide a paper trail documenting the source of the money used to purchase the marital residence, nothing in either party's testimony suggested that any other possible source for the money existed. In view of its determination concerning defendant's entitlement to a credit for separate property with respect to the marital residence, the Appellate Division rejected the contention of plaintiff on her cross appeal that she should have been awarded title to the marital residence as a matter of equity. It also rejected defendant's contention that he was entitled to a credit for separate property that he contributed for renovations to the marital residence. Although the marital residence was appraised for $420,000 four months prior to the trial, defendant failed to establish that the separate property funds spent on renovations added value to the residence apart from the appreciation in value resulting from market forces over the period of ownership and, if so, the amount by which the value of the property was increased. It also held that Supreme Court properly imputed income to defendant of $180,000 per year. The record established that defendant derived substantial income from his investments. The amount awarded for child support was vacated because the court failed to articulate any basis for that portion of the award based on the parental income exceeding $80,000. It modified the amended judgment by vacating that amount, and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine defendant's child support obligation in compliance with the Child Support Standards Act. It concluded that the court properly ordered defendant to continue to pay for the private school education of the children. It also rejected the contention of plaintiff on her cross appeal that the court violated Domestic Relations Law § 248 by ordering that maintenance would terminate in the event that she resided with an unrelated adult male for more than 30 days. That section, entitled "Modification of judgment or order in action for divorce or annulment," provides in relevant part that a husband may apply for modification of a judgment of divorce if the wife remarries or if she is "habitually living with another man and holding herself out as his wife, although not married to such man." The court held that here it was concerned with an initial award of maintenance and not an application to modify an existing judgment or order. Inasmuch as courts have the discretionary power to "fashion a fair and equitable maintenance award" it concluded under the circumstances of this case that the condition imposed by the court is not improper (cf. Florio v. Florio, 25 AD3d 947, 950).

Direction to Pay College Expenses for Seven Year Old is Premature

In Bogannam v Bogannam, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 884937 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the defendant durational maintenance in the sum of $3,000 per month for 10 years, directed him to pay the college expenses of the parties' younger child, directed him to pay child support, specified the terms by which child support would be reduced upon emancipation of each child, awarded the defendant an attorney's fee in the sum of $40,000, and directed the parties to share equally the payment of the remaining expert fees. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in imputing income to defendant of $200,000 per year for the purpose of calculating his child support and maintenance obligations. It also providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant durational maintenance of $3,000 per month for 10 years. This award allowed her an opportunity to become self-supporting, after almost 20 years of marriage in which she was the stay-at-home parent. The plaintiff correctly contended that the Supreme Court erred in directing him to pay college expenses for the parties' younger child, who was only seven years old at the time of the entry of judgment. The court may direct a parent to contribute to a child's college education pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(c)(7). However, when college is several years away, and no evidence is presented as to the child's academic interests, ability, possible choice of college, or what his or her expenses might be, a directive compelling the plaintiff to pay for those expenses is premature and not supported by the evidence. The Supreme Court properly provided for a method of reducing the plaintiff's child support obligation, in accordance with the required statutory percentages, upon the older child attaining 21 years of age or emancipation, whichever is earlier, since more than one child was the subject of the order. Considering the parties' relative financial positions, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant an attorney's fee in the sum of $40,000, and directing the parties to share equally the payment of the remaining expert fees. It found that the plaintiff waived his right to a hearing to determine the amount of the attorney's fee, since he never requested a hearing, the parties' finances were explored at trial, and they agreed that the issue would be determined upon the submission of papers.

April 16, 2009

Pendente Lite Child Support Properly Denied Where Plaintiff and Children Continued to Reside with Defendant in Marital Residence, and No Evidence That Children Not Being Properly Cared for by Defendant

In Mueller v Mueller, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 943725 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an award of pendente lite maintenance of $650 per week, which directed the defendant to pay the carrying charges on the marital residence, including mortgage payments, taxes, utilities, pool maintenance, and other household expenses. The defendant was also directed to maintain various types of insurance coverage for the plaintiff and the parties' children, and to pay reasonable expenses associated with the parties' vehicles. It held that the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court erred in declining to award her pendente lite child support for the parties' two children was without merit: "Both the plaintiff and the children continued to reside with the defendant in the marital residence, and there was no evidence that the children were not being properly cared for by the defendant (cf. Cataldi v. Shaw, 101 A.D.2d 823, 824)." Given the disparity in the parties' financial circumstances, it held that Supreme Court should have granted plaintiff's motion for an award of interim counsel fees of $25,000 (see Prichep v. Prichep, 52 AD3d 61, 65-66), rather than only $10,000.

Equitable Estoppel May Not Be Invoked to Create Custody Standing in Favor of Party to Vermont Civil Union

In Debra H. v. Janice R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 943772 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Petitioner sought joint legal and physical custody of respondent's biological child, born approximately one month after the parties entered into a civil union in the State of Vermont, and more than two months after they registered as domestic partners in New York City. Although the record indicated that petitioner served as a loving and caring parental figure during the first 2 ½ years of the child's life, she never legally adopted the child. The Appellate Division held that the matter was governed by the Court of Appeals decision in Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991]), which provides that a party who is neither the biological nor the adoptive parent of a child lacks standing to seek custody or visitation rights under Domestic Relations Law 70, even though that party may have developed a longstanding, loving and nurturing relationship with the child and was involved in a prior relationship with the biological parent. It noted that Supreme Court concluded that denial of petitioner's right to invoke equitable estoppel herein would be inconsistent with the application of that doctrine in similar proceedings (citing e.g. Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 NY3d 320 [2006]; Jean Maby H. v. Joseph H., 246 A.D.2d 282, 285 [1998]). However, to the extent such inconsistencies exist, its reading of precedent was such that the doctrine of equitable estoppel may not be invoked where a party lacks standing to assert at least a right to visitation (citing see Anonymous v. Anonymous, 20 AD3d 333 [2005]; Matter of Multari v. Sorrell, 287 A.D.2d 764 [2001]).

Separation Agreement Survives Judgement of Divorce Without Non-merger Clause Where That Was Parties Intent

In Makarchuk v Makarchuk, 59 A.D.3d 1094, 874 N.Y.S.2d 649 (4 Dept 2009) Plaintiff commenced an action in 2006 seeking to enforce defendant's obligation to pay carrying costs on the marital residence pursuant to a separation agreement (agreement) executed by the parties in 1970. The carrying costs consisted of taxes, insurance and most of the maintenance costs. The agreement further provided that it would "survive any decree of divorce ... [and would] not merge in[] nor be superseded by any divorce decree or judgment." A decree of divorce was entered in 1971 and, although the decree expressly incorporated the agreement, it did not contain a nonmerger clause. In 1975 Supreme Court modified the decree by ordering that defendant was no longer responsible for paying the carrying costs on the marital residence. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting that part of defendant's motion seeking to dismiss the complaint. It is well settled that a separation agreement that is incorporated into but not merged with a divorce decree is an independent contract binding on the parties unless impeached or challenged for some cause recognized by law. Furthermore, such an agreement cannot be modified by a change to the divorce decree absent a clear expression by the parties of such an intent. Here, the parties expressed no such intent. It is of no consequence that the decree did not contain a nonmerger clause inasmuch as the parties' intent to incorporate and not merge the agreement in the decree was clear from the language of those instruments. It concluded that plaintiff retained the right to enforce the agreement notwithstanding the 1975 order modifying the decree. Contrary to the contention of defendant, the action was not time-barred. Plaintiff was seeking to enforce a continuing obligation under a contract, and she therefore could seek damages for those breaches that have occurred within the six years prior to the commencement of the action. (see CPLR 213[2]). The court further erred in determining that dismissal of the complaint was warranted based on the theory of laches inasmuch as laches is inapplicable in actions at law.

Agreement Not Properly Reviewed for Compliance with FCA 516, May Not Be Used to Preclude Later Proceeding to Modify

In re Barbara N. v James H.N.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 824731 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.)
Petitioner became pregnant after a brief relationship with respondent and gave birth in September 1991. In 1992, the parties negotiated a child support agreement which was conditioned upon positive blood test results establishing respondent's paternity. The agreement provided, among other things, for respondent to pay a total of $126,050 in installments over a period of nine years, to cover support, child care, education, medical (past and future) and all other expenses of the child until she reached age 21, and was submitted to the Family Court for approval as required by Family Court Act 516(a). Notice of the petition for approval of the agreement was served on the Commissioner of Social Services pursuant to Family Court Act 516(b). The parties, each represented by counsel, along with a representative from Social Services, appeared before a Hearing Examiner who reviewed the agreement. The Hearing Examiner requested that the guideline calculation of the Child Support Standards Act (CSSA) be added to the agreement. At that point, the parties exchanged financial disclosure affidavits for the first time. Respondent's annual child support obligation under the guidelines was calculated to be $21,052. The parties agreed, however, that in lieu of the support provisions required by CSSA, respondent would make certain lump sum payments and payments for medical coverage, and that these would best serve the interests of the child. Petitioner specifically agreed that the agreement was in compliance with CSSA, and waived any right to future child support under that statute. The Hearing Examiner reviewed the changes to the agreement made by the representative from Social Services, and the CSSA child support calculation, and then made a brief inquiry of the parties as to whether they understood the changes and their obligations under the agreement. After the parties answered in the affirmative, he then approved the agreement. Shortly thereafter, respondent acknowledged paternity and an order of filiation was entered by the court. The order incorporated by reference the support agreement. Respondent made all payments required under that agreement. In January 2007, petitioner commenced a proceeding to vacate the 1992 order and conduct a new hearing for purposes of issuing a new support order. She claimed that the 1992 support agreement did not comply with the provisions of Family Court Act 516 and also argued that the statute was unconstitutional because it discriminates between children born in wedlock and outside wedlock, in that a child born to married parents is eligible for an upward modification of child support under the formula set forth in Family Court Act 413(c), but section 516(c) bars such re-evaluation for nonmarital children where a support agreement approved by the court under 516(a) is completely performed. Prior to serving his answer, respondent moved to dismiss the petition on the grounds that he had completely performed his obligations under the agreement. The matter was referred to a Support Magistrate, who directed the petition be dismissed "due to no prima facie change of circumstances." Since review of the record led to the conclusion that the hearing examiner failed to comply with the requirements of section 516 in approving the 1992 agreement, the Appellate Division reversed and directed a new hearing, at which the burden will be upon the petitioner to establish that the support obligations no longer provide for the best interests of the child. The Court pointed out that Section 516 of the Family Court Act allows a mother and putative father of a nonmarital child to settle a paternity proceeding by entering into a binding support agreement, but only when the court determines that adequate provision has been made for the support of the child, and it approves the agreement. Even though the statute does not outline any particular line of inquiry for determining the adequacy of the support provisions, "courts have generally considered the parties' financial positions, the child's support and education needs throughout childhood and the interests of the State" (see Matter of Clara C. v. William L., 96 N.Y.2d 244, 250 [2001]). Although the Hearing Examiner purportedly reviewed the agreement and the CSSA calculations, it was evident that the agreement did not provide for adequate support for the child for 21 years. Conceitedly, there is no requirement that the agreement provide for support in accordance with the amount set forth in the CSSA guidelines. Nevertheless, the lump sum payment of $126,050 (to be paid over a period of nine years), averaged out to approximately $6,000 per year for 21 years, while the calculation under the CSSA would have provided for $21,054 in annual basic child support, even without factoring in any statutory add-ons. The Court held that the gross disparity between the two figures should at least have prompted the Hearing Examiner to conduct further inquiry. While the agreement may have been in the best interests of the parents, it clearly was not in the best interests of the child, whom the Hearing Officer was obligated to protect. As was noted by the Court of Appeals, where there has not been proper judicial review and approval of an agreement for compliance with the provisions of section 516, the agreement may not be used to preclude a later proceeding to modify the support provisions (Clara C. at 250). Accordingly, the matter was remanded for further proceedings on petitioner's application for modification of the 1992 child support agreement. The Court observed that, to the extent the statute precludes attempts to reverse support agreements for nonmarital children, its constitutionality is questionable.

April 1, 2009

Adverse Party Called As a Witness May Be Treated As a Hostile Witness

In Ferri v Ferri, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 564624 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff $2,000 per month maintenance through September 2010 and $3,260 per month child support, valued his ownership of four businesses at $953,641 and awarded the plaintiff 30% of that value. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly permitted the defendant to be treated as a hostile witness at the trial. Where, as here, an adverse party is called as a witness, it may be assumed that such adverse party is a hostile witness, and, in the discretion of the court, direct examination may assume the nature of cross-examination by the use of leading questions. Moreover, the general rule prohibiting a party from impeaching his or her own witness does not preclude a hostile witness from being impeached by prior statements made either under oath or in writing. The Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in allowing the plaintiff's counsel to question the defendant, who was an adverse party, in the nature of cross-examination, and to impeach him with alleged inconsistencies in his prior statements. It rejected the defendant's contention that the amount and duration of the maintenance award was excessive.

Misrepresentation That Husband Was Biological Father Did Not Constitute "Egregious Fault"

In Howard S. v. Lillian S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 674133 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Freedman, held that defendant-wife's alleged misrepresentation to her husband that he was the biological father of one of their children, when in fact the child was conceived during her adultery and fathered by her lover, did not constitute "egregious fault" sufficient to be considered in equitably distributing the marital property. According to the verified complaint plaintiff married defendant in May 1997 and they had four children. In February 2004, defendant had an extramarital affair with an unnamed man and became pregnant with a child, Charles, who was born in December 2004. Plaintiff contended that defendant knew or should have known that plaintiff was not Charles's biological father, but concealed that information from him. Plaintiff stated that he

"raised Charles as his own child, nurturing him and providing the same financial and emotional support as all his other children." The complaint alleged that in February 2007 defendant began another affair with the named co-respondent which "continues to this day." Defendant also concealed this second adulterous relationship from plaintiff, but in the spring of 2007, she suggested that they separate and enter into a collaborative law process. During this period plaintiff had become suspicious about Charles's parentage, allegedly "due to all the jokes within his and [defendant's] circle of family and friends that Charles looked nothing like him." Without telling his wife, plaintiff in February 2008 arranged for a DNA test of himself and Charles. The test confirmed that plaintiff was not Charles's biological father. Defendant acknowledged that plaintiff was not Charles's biological father, but claims that she learned this from the DNA test results and denied that she deliberately concealed the truth about Charles's parentage from plaintiff. The complaint asserted causes of action for divorce based on both cruel and inhuman treatment and adultery, and asserts a separate claim based on fraud. As damages for the fraud claim, plaintiff sought to recover his child support expenses for Charles, the fees for the parties' collaborative law process, and profits from the couple's investments "from the time of Charles's conception until the commencement of this action." Defendant answered and counterclaimed for divorce on the ground of abandonment. Defendant moved for an order dismissing or severing the fraud claim; plaintiff cross-moved for "expanded discovery" to prove "defendant's egregious fault," the fraud claim, and her lack of contribution to and dissipation of the marital property. The motion court denied the motion to dismiss or sever the fraud claim, but limited the recoverable damages to plaintiff's share of the fees for the collaborative law process. The court also denied plaintiff's cross motion for expanded discovery as to defendant's marital fault on the ground that defendant's alleged misconduct did not constitute egregious fault and had no bearing on prospective spousal maintenance and equitable distribution. The Appellate Division pointed out that marital fault may be considered pursuant to clause (d)(13) of DRL 236 (B)(5), the "catchall" provision that allows the court to take "any other factor" which may be "just and proper" into account. Marital fault can only be considered where the misconduct "is so egregious or uncivilized as to bespeak of a blatant disregard of the marital relationship-misconduct that shocks the conscience' of the court, thereby compelling it to invoke its equitable power to do justice between the parties. In Havell v. Islam, 301 A.D.2d 339, 344 [2002], the Court adopted the analysis set forth in McCann v. McCann (156 Misc.2d 540 [1993]), and concluded that to be deemed egregious, the conduct must callously imperil the value our society places on human life and the integrity of the human body. It noted that the only cases in which reprehensible behavior has been deemed to constitute egregious fault sufficient to affect equitable distribution have involved extreme violence. It noted that egregious fault had also been found in instances of rape, and protracted and severe physical abuse. Conversely, conduct that courts have found not to be egregious include adultery, alcoholism, abandonment , and verbal harassment coupled with several acts of minor domestic violence. Here, defendant's alleged misconduct did not rise to the level of egregious fault, since defendant neither endangered the lives or physical well-being of family members, nor deliberately embarked on a course designed to inflict extreme emotional or physical abuse upon them. The court held that given the absence of egregious fault, the motion court correctly precluded any disclosure in connection with defendant's marital fault. Justice Nardelli dissented in an opinion.

Secreting Assets Supports Finding of Economic Fault

In Michaelessi v Michaelessi, 59 A.D.3d 688, 874 N.Y.S.2d 207 (2 Dept 2009) the plaintiff admitted that she did not truthfully fill out her net worth statement, and failed to provide an adequate explanation as to how she was able to afford to pay for a significant elective-surgical procedure with her claimed level of assets. The Appellate Division held that secreting assets in order to prevent the trial court from making an equitable distribution of property supports a finding of economic fault. Once such a finding is made, the trial court must consider the missing assets in making its distributive award. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in taking the missing assets into account and limiting the plaintiff's share of the value of the defendant's pension to 25%. The remainder of the marital property distributed was distributed on a 50/50 basis.

Transferring Assets to Joint Account Investment or Brokerage Account Raises Presumption that Funds Are Marital Property

In Fehring v Fehring, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 139488 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties, married in 1990. Plaintiff received a $50,000 payment in August 2005 after having surgery for a condition covered by a previously purchased "specified disease coverage" insurance policy. He deposited the check in a brokerage account that was held and used jointly by the parties. In January 2006, plaintiff used $50,000 from that account to purchase (with another individual) real property on River Road in Esopus, Ulster County. Supreme Court determined that the proceeds from plaintiff's half interest in the River Road property, which was in the process of being sold, would be divided equally between the parties. The court further determined that a First Investors account, which was valued at about $38,800 when the divorce action was commenced in December 2006 and $26,000 at the time of trial in June 2007 (with defendant making all withdrawals during such time), should be valued as of the trial date and split equally. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that transferring assets that were separate property into a joint account raises a presumption that the funds are marital property to be disbursed among the parties according to the principles of equitable distribution. This presumption may be rebutted by proof that such deposits were made as a matter of convenience, without the intention of creating a beneficial interest. The fact that the deposit is not made into a traditional banking account, but instead into a joint brokerage or investment account, does not change the application of this well-established principle. There was evidence that the account was used by both parties. After the subject deposit and before the withdrawal to purchase the real property, there was proof that further deposits were made into the account by the parties and withdrawals were made for payments toward items such as credit card bills. Given this commingling, plaintiff failed to rebut the presumption and Supreme Court properly treated the funds as marital property. Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in distributing equally the value of the interest in real property purchased with the funds from the joint account rather than awarding him substantially more of the value. Supreme Court's award was equitable in light of the overall distribution of marital property reflected in the record, including, the fact that the division of other marital real property resulted in plaintiff receiving property valued about $20,000 more than defendant. The Appellate Division held that although marital property is generally valued at the time the action is commenced, valuation at the time of trial is justified where valuation on the date of the action would be inequitable. Supreme Court explained that defendant, who did not earn a salary during the marriage and received no maintenance award, used the funds in the First Investors account between the date of commencement and date of trial to make expenditures for items such as mortgage payments, car payments, maintaining the home, and other household expenses. The court also noted that, during this time, plaintiff was receiving income from the family business while making no payments to defendant. There was no evidence that defendant wastefully dissipated the assets. It was unpersuaded that Supreme Court erred in valuing the account as of the time of trial.

March 16, 2009

Defendant Entitled to Recoup Share of Marital Funds Expended in Connection with Separate Property Condominium

In Bonanno v Bonanno, 57 A.D.3d 1260, 870 N.Y.S.2d 551, (3 Dept 2008) the parties were married in February 1998 and had three children. In September 2005, plaintiff commenced the action for divorce. Supreme Court denied defendant any interest in the appreciation of plaintiff's separate property, a condominium, and determined that plaintiff was entitled to retroactive credit for certain pension benefits. The Appellate Division rejected the defendant's contention that Supreme Court abused its discretion in not equitably distributing the appreciated value as marital property. The condominium, having been purchased by plaintiff prior to the marriage, was clearly separate property and, therefore, any increase in value remains separate property "except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse" (Domestic Relations Law s 236[B][1][d][3]). Defendant, as the nontitled spouse claiming such interest, bore the burden of establishing that the increased value was due in part to his efforts as opposed to market forces or other unrelated factors. Defendant testified regarding the general maintenance that the parties performed at the condominium, which included painting, caulking, arranging for carpet installation and replacement of appliances, and also his dealings with the Boston Housing Authority in regard to tenant matters. No renovations or structural changes to the condominium were made during the course of the marriage. Plaintiff's testimony established that property values had increased dramatically as a result of revitalization of the neighborhood due in large part to the recent construction of luxury condominiums across the street from the condominium. Under all the circumstances, it could not say that Supreme Court abused its discretion in finding that the increase in value resulted from market forces. It did find merit in defendant's contention that he was entitled to recoup his share of the marital funds expended in connection with the condominium. The rents from the condominium were deposited into a joint account and reported on the parties' joint tax returns. Once the rents were commingled in the parties' joint account, that money presumptively became marital property. The record established that $112,570 was expended during the course of the marriage to pay the mortgage and other expenses associated with the condominium. The rental income totaled $76,718, and all of this amount could be traced to paying expenditures associated with the condominium. Therefore, to that extent, plaintiff overcame the presumption that the rents, once deposited, became marital property. After the rents were applied to the $112,570 total costs, that left the amount of $35,852 in condominium expenses that were paid using marital funds. Accordingly, it found that defendant was entitled to recoup his equitable share of that amount, less any tax savings received as a result during the course of the marriage. Because defendant testified that the tax rate changed from year to year during the course of the marriage, the matter had to be remitted for a determination of the sum of the tax savings to be factored into the amount due defendant.

No Hearing Required Where Court Possesses Adequate Information to Make Informed Determination on Temporary Visitation

In Rosenberg v Rosenberg, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 563527 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order that denied the mothers motion for an evidentiary hearing on the issue of interim visitation and directed certain visitation between the father and the parties' child. It held that a hearing is not necessary where, as here, the court possesses adequate relevant information to enable it to make an informed and provident determination as to the child's best interests. Supreme Court examined the parents over several court appearances and conducted an in camera interview of the child to ascertain her wishes. These actions were sufficient to enable the Supreme Court to make an informed and provident determination on the issue of interim visitation.

Parenting Coordinator to Resolve Visitation Issues Between the Parties Is Improper Delegation of Courts Authority

In Matter of Edwards v Rothschild, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 564430 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Family Court denied both parents' requests for sole custody, and instead awarded joint custody. The Appellate Division modified to award the father sole custody. It reversed that portion of the order which directed that, on the alternate weekends that the mother does not have the children, she shall, unless the father made plans with the children, have parenting time on those Sundays from 10:00 A.M. until 7:00 P.M. This provision unfairly infringed upon the father's parenting time. It deleted the provision thereof the Parenting Coordinator to resolve issues between the parties, since this constituted an improper delegation of the court's authority to determine issues relating to visitation.

Family Court Has Jurisdiction to Direct Judgment for Cost of Forensic Evaluations Conducted by Court-appointed Agency

In Matter of Donohue v MacIssaac--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 564436 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Family Court had the jurisdiction to direct the issuance of a money judgment against the parties for the cost of forensic evaluations conducted by a court-appointed agency, which it had previously directed them to pay (citing Sciacca v. Sciacca, 173 Misc.2d 756, 758 n). However, Family Court erred in directing the issuance of the money judgment in the absence of an application for such relief from the court-appointed agency and notice to the parties. It reversed the money judgment insofar as entered against the father.

Appellate Divisions Construes Child Support Provision that "Child Support Paid Shall Be Reduced Proportionately"

In Kosnac v Kosnac, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 564534 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the stipulation of settlement in which the father agreed to pay support for the parties' five children in a sum which exceeded his statutory obligation under the Child Support Standards Act provided that as each child becomes emancipated, "support for such child shall cease and the child support paid shall be reduced proportionately." The Appellate Division held that this provision was clear and unambiguous, and reflected an intent to reduce the father's support obligation by one fifth of the original amount as each child becomes emancipated. It also held that under the circumstances of this case, it was also proper for the Supreme Court to deny the mother's request for an audit of the corporate books and records of the father's business. The parties' stipulation directed the father to pay additional child support if his annual income exceeds the sum of $100,000, but provided a mechanism for verifying his income by requiring him, inter alia, to give the mother copies of his annual income tax returns. The father provided the mother with copies of his federal tax returns, and the mother had not demonstrated an evidentiary basis for her contention that the these returns did not reflect his true income.

Income Derived From Separate Property Not Immune from Consideration in Calculating a Maintenance Obligation.

In Karl v Karl, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 137336 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married for 33 years, After a nonjury trial, Supreme Court distributed the husband's pension pursuant to the formula set forth in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481, 494 [1984]) and concluded that the payments he received from his private disability insurance policy were separate property not subject to equitable distribution. The court awarded the wife $800 a month in maintenance for 10 years, with the proviso that this figure would be reduced by the amount that she received as her Majauskas share of the husband's pension ($523 per month), resulting in a final maintenance award of $277 per month. The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected the husband's argument that any calculation of maintenance should not include the income that he received for his disability. It held that among the factors to be considered in determining maintenance is the total amount of each party's income, including that which each receives from separate property that is not otherwise subject to equitable distribution. The fact that a portion of that income is derived from an asset determined to be separate property not subject to equitable distribution does not render that income immune from consideration in calculating a party's maintenance obligation. The disability benefits were not the result of a veteran's disability which would otherwise be precluded from consideration with respect to maintenance (see 10 USC 1408; Hoskins v. Skojec, 265 A.D.2d 706, 707 [1999], lv denied 94 N.Y.2d 758 [2000]). It also rejected the husband's argument that the Supreme Court erred when it failed to impute to the wife income that she could have earned. At the time of trial, the wife was 51 years old and, other than providing child care, had not worked outside the home in over 10 years. She did not attend college and had no vocational training that would have enhanced her employment skills. While the parties were married, the wife did not work and did not develop any meaningful employment skills that would have enhanced her earning capacity because the husband had requested that she devote all of her time to the family home. After the husband left the marital home, the wife began a day care business that she operated out of her home and, while her income at the time of trial had been significantly reduced, this reduction was due in large part to the fact that she was no longer being reimbursed for care that she provided for two children that had been adopted by her daughter. The Supreme Court did not abuse its "considerable discretion" in finding that it was inappropriate to impute income to the wife. The husband, a former correction officer, while disabled, had a total monthly income from Social Security disability and private disability of approximately $2,800, in addition to his pension. In contrast, the wife, while gainfully employed early in the marriage as a switchboard operator, stopped working in 1995 when the husband asked her to devote herself full time to the upkeep of the parties' home and her present income was approximately $1,000 per month, plus her share of the husband's pension, out of which she had to pay $470 per month for health insurance. The court directed that maintenance would cease before the husband stopped receiving income from his private disability policy. These factors provided ample support for the maintenance determination.

March 2, 2009

Second Department Disagrees With First Department Holding No Appeal lies from Maintenance and Property Distribution Granted on Default in Appearing for Trial.

In Sarlo-Pinzur v Pinzur, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 387201 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme granted the husband's attorney's motion to withdraw as counsel and refused to adjourn the trial further following counsel's withdrawal. Upon his subsequent default in appearing at the trial able distribution, Supreme Court awarded the wife maintenance of $500 per month for four years and equitably distributed the marital property. The Appellate Division dismissed the appeal from the judgment, except insofar as it brought up for review the granting of the husband's attorney's motion to withdraw as counsel and the denying of the husband's request to adjourn the trial, in effect, pursuant to CPLR 321(c). It held that the judgment from which the husband appealed was entered on default, since he left the courtroom as the trial commenced. Although no appeal lies from a judgment entered on the default of the appealing party (CPLR 5511), an appeal from such a judgment does bring up for review those 'matters which were the subject of contest' before the Supreme Court. Here, those matters consisted of the granting of the motion of the husband's attorney to withdraw as counsel and the Supreme Court's denying of the husband's request to adjourn the trial, in effect, pursuant to CPLR 321(c). It pointed out that as a general rule, CPLR 321(c) requires that there be a 30-day stay of all proceedings after counsel is permitted to withdraw over the client's objection. Where, however, the attorney's withdrawal is caused by a voluntary act of the client, the court has the discretion to permit the matter to proceed without such a stay. The husband's counsel moved for leave to withdraw on the ground that the husband had refused to provide financial information necessary to the trial of the case. The motion was properly granted on the basis of the husband's failure to cooperate with his counsel. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in refusing to adjourn the trial further. COMMENT: In Warner v Houghton, 43 A.D.3d 376, 841 N.Y.S.2d 499 (1st Dept., 2007), affirmed 10 N.Y.3d 913, 862 N.Y.S.2d 321 (2009) defendant did not appear at a compliance conference and the matter was set down for an inquest on the issue of equitable distribution. After the inquest, at which he did not appear, the court granted a divorce, and made awards concerning the request for equitable distribution and counsel fees. The Appellate Division held that while the issue of whether the divorce was properly granted may not be reviewable, the distribution award was a separate issue, and was still subject to review, even after a default. It found that the defendant was improperly precluded and modified the awards. On review of submissions pursuant to 22 NYCRR 500.11 the Court of Appeals held that CPLR 5511 does not bar review of the equitable distribution components of a divorce judgment where, as here, defendant was improperly precluded from contesting the awards. It held that the Appellate Division did not abuse its discretion as a matter of law in vacating Supreme Courts preclusion order.

Waiver of Right to Counsel in Neglect Proceeding Requires Searching Inquiry By Court

In Matter of Casey N, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 387635 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a party in a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 10 has both a constitutional right and a statutory right to be represented by counsel. A party may waive the right to counsel and opt for self-representation. Before permitting a party to proceed pro se, the court must determine that the party's decision to do so is made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. To ascertain whether a party's waiver of the right to counsel meets these requirements, the court must conduct a "searching inquiry" of that party. While there is no "rigid formula" to the court's inquiry, there must be a showing that the party was aware of the dangers and disadvantages of proceeding without counsel. For example, the court may inquire about the litigant's age, education, occupation, previous exposure to legal procedures and other relevant factors bearing on a competent, intelligent, voluntary waiver. Denial of the right of self-representation is not subject to harmless error analysis. Family Court failed to sufficiently advise the mother of the risks of self-representation. The only inquiry the Family Court conducted was to ask the mother twice whether she wanted Mr. Eisenberg to represent her. Otherwise, it made only one declaratory statement to the mother that generally cautioned her against self-representation, without detailing the dangers and disadvantages of doing so, and informed her that she would have to follow the same legal rules as the other parties. Family Court failed to conduct a sufficiently searching inquiry of the mother to be reasonably certain that she understood the dangers and disadvantages of giving up the fundamental right of counsel. Also absent was any inquiry by the Family Court to evaluate the mother's competency to waive counsel and her understanding of the consequences of self-representation. To the extent the colloquy could be read to indicate that the court delegated its duty to conduct a searching inquiry to the mother's counsel, there is no authority for the court to have done so, nor was there any evidence that counsel conducted a searching inquiry. Because the court did not ensure that the mother's waiver of her right to counsel was made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily, it reversed the order of disposition relating to the mother without regard to the merits and remitted the matter to the Family Court for a new hearing and determination.

Failure to Recoup Value from Unprofitable Business Operated During Marriage Constitutes Wasteful Dissipation of That Asset

In Scala v Scala, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 281681 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Plaintiff appealed from a judgment of divorce that confirmed the report of the Matrimonial Referee appointed to hear and report and ordered plaintiff husband to pay maintenance to defendant wife. Plaintiff contended that the Referee erred in precluding him from testifying concerning the nature of his alleged physical injuries based on his willful failure to furnish requested medical authorizations. The Appellate Division rejected that contention, and concluded under the facts and circumstances of this case that the Referee neither abused nor improvidently exercised his discretion in precluding that testimony. Plaintiff further contended that Supreme Court erred in confirming the Referee's report both to the extent that the Referee found that the closure by plaintiff of his masonry business constituted a wasteful dissipation of assets and to the extent that the Referee valued the business. With respect to wasteful dissipation, the Court pointed out that it had previously stated that the failure to recoup value from an unprofitable business operated during the marriage constitutes wasteful dissipation of that asset (see Baker v. Baker [appeal No. 2], 199 A.D.2d 967, 968). Thus, it necessarily is a wasteful dissipation of assets to fail to recoup the value of a profitable business, such as plaintiff's masonry business. It also rejected the contention with respect to the valuation of the masonry business. The determination of a fact-finder as to the value of a business, if it is within the range of the testimony presented, will not be disturbed on appeal where valuation of the business rested primarily on the credibility of expert witnesses and their valuation techniques. The Referee, whose report was adopted by the court, credited the conclusion of defendant's expert with respect to the value of the business, and plaintiff presented no expert testimony that would support a different valuation. It agreed with plaintiff, however, that the court erred in awarding nondurational maintenance to defendant. Based on the statutory factors, including the parties' respective ages and financial circumstances, it concluded that defendant was entitled to maintenance for 12 years from the date of the judgment.

Nontitled Party Seeking a Distributive Share of Enhanced Earnings Resulting from Law Degree and License must Demonstrate That They Made a Substantial Contribution to the Titled Party's Acquisition of That Marital Asset

In Kriftcher v Kriftcher, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 262707 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff wife $828,699.20 as her 40% share of the husband's enhanced earning capacity, an attorney's fee of $30,000, declined to award her maintenance, awarded her $1,229.71 per week in child support, and failed to award her equitable distribution of the husband's bonus for the calendar year 2005, which the husband received in 2006. The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court correctly concluded that the enhanced earnings resulting from the law degree and license obtained by the husband during the marriage were marital property subject to equitable distribution. Nevertheless, it is incumbent upon the nontitled party seeking a distributive share of such assets to demonstrate that they made a substantial contribution to the titled party's acquisition of that marital asset and where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. Here, the wife's minimal contributions to the husband's obtaining of his degree and license entitled her to a share of only 10% in the enhanced earnings that have resulted. Supreme Court also erred in failing to distribute the husband's bonus for the calendar year 2005, which he received in March 2006 and was in the gross sum of $360,000. Based upon the un rebutted testimony of the forensic expert, the husband's effective income tax rate was 38.25%, and, therefore, the net amount of the husband's bonus was the sum of $222,300. Since the divorce action was commenced on June 28, 2005, the marital portion of that asset was 50% of its net value, or $111,150. Considering all of the statutory factors the wife's equitable share of that marital asset was fixed at 50%, or $55,575. In determining the appropriate amount and duration of maintenance, the court is required to consider, among other factors, the standard of living of the parties during the marriage and the present and future earning capacity of both parties. (Haines v. Haines, 44 A.D.3d 901, 902, 845 N.Y.S.2d 77). Although the wife earned a teaching license during the course of the marriage, she was, at present, primarily a homemaker, who worked only part-time as a substitute teacher earning approximately $10,000 per year. In sharp contrast, the husband was an attorney making approximately $500,000 per year. It held that a maintenance award of $1,000 per week for 10 years was appropriate.

February 16, 2009

Family Court May Not "Bootstrap" PINS Adjudication onto One for Juvenile Delinquency by Using its Inherent Contempt Power

In Matter of Daniel I, 57 A.D.3d 666, 871 N.Y.S.2d 183 (2 Dept 2008) the appellant originally was brought before the Family Court on a petition to adjudicate him a person in need of supervision pursuant to Act article 7. After he was adjudicated a PINS, he allegedly violated certain electronic monitoring conditions of probation, imposed as part of the disposition of that proceeding, by damaging the strap of his electronic monitoring device and breaking curfew. The presentment agency then commenced juvenile delinquency proceedings pursuant to Family Court Act article 3, alleging that the appellant committed acts which, if committed by an adult, would have constituted the crimes of criminal mischief in the fourth degree and obstruction of governmental administration in the second degree. After fact-finding and dispositional hearings, he was adjudicated a juvenile delinquent on both charges, and ultimately placed in a secure facility with the Office of Children and Family Services for a period of 12 months. The Appellate Division reversed and dismissed. It pointed out that a PINS is one who is, inter alia, "incorrigible, ungovernable or habitually disobedient and beyond the lawful control of a parent or other person legally responsible for such child's care". PINS behavior includes running away from home, breaking curfew, and truancy. The placement of a child in a secure facility is not permitted in a PINS proceeding. In situations where a PINS absconds from placement, the Family Court may not "bootstrap" the PINS adjudication onto one for juvenile delinquency by using its inherent contempt power to punish a runaway status offender with criminal consequences. The act of eloping from a treatment facility, although violative of the Family Court's orders, is nevertheless an act consistent with PINS behavior, not with juvenile delinquency. This is so even when the court is faced with a situation where the PINS respondent persistently absconds from every nonsecure placement facility in which he or she has been placed. The Court noted that it had previously determined that the Family Court may not "bootstrap" a PINS adjudication onto one alleging juvenile delinquency by charging a PINS who absconds from a nonsecure facility with conduct that, if committed by an adult, would constitute escape (see Matter of Sylvia H., 78 A.D.2d 875, 433 N.Y.S.2d 29). Here the appellant's acts were consistent with PINS behavior, not with juvenile delinquency, and were more harmful to him than to society. Thus, by finding that he committed acts which, if committed by an adult, would have constituted the crimes of criminal mischief in the fourth degree and obstruction of governmental administration in the second degree, the Family Court improperly bootstrapped the PINS adjudication onto one for juvenile delinquency.

Maintenance Provisions and Interest on Promissory Note Provided in Separation Agreement Set Aside as Unconscionable

In Santini v Robinson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 5376525 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1973, and had three children. Their principal assets included their approximately $100,000 equity interest in the marital residence, their Individual Retirement Account and joint bank accounts, the plaintiff's deferred compensation plan, and his future retirement pension, valued at more than $242,000. The plaintiff left the marital residence in July 1991, and in November 1991 the defendant commenced the underlying action for a divorce. The parties entered into a separation agreement dated January 9, 1992. The defendant was represented by an attorney in connection with the negotiation of the separation agreement, while the plaintiff represented himself. At that time, the plaintiff was 42 years old and employed by the County sheriff's Department, while the defendant was 41 years old, unemployed, and legally blind, albeit able to work part-time and receiving Social Security disability benefits. The parties visited the defendant's attorney twice in connection with the separation agreement, and the attorney advised the plaintiff repeatedly, both in writing and orally, that he should retain separate counsel. The plaintiff testified that he voluntarily signed the agreement on January 9, 1992, although he merely "scanned" the agreement and had not understood the provisions that he read. The agreement prepared by counsel contained the general terms previously agreed upon between the parties during their own negotiations. The separation agreement provided that the marital residence subject to the mortgage, the IRAs and joint bank accounts, and the plaintiff's deferred compensation plan in the form of promissory notes would be distributed to the defendant and that she would receive child support and lifetime maintenance even upon remarriage. Further, the agreement provided that the maintenance payment would be increased by a percentage each time one of the children was emancipated and by an additional 4% per annum. The plaintiff retained his pension, his automobile, some bank accounts, and certain furniture. The agreement was incorporated, but not merged, into a 1992 judgment of divorce. In 1998 the defendant remarried. In March 2000, the plaintiff commenced the action to set aside the separation agreement as unfair, inequitable, and unconscionable. After the Appellate Division reversed an order granting summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the issues of unconscionability and ratification (see Santini v. Robinson, 306 A.D.2d 266), and following that hearing, the Supreme Court, set aside the provisions of the parties' separation agreement awarding the defendant 100% of the plaintiff's deferred compensation and the parties' IRAs, terminated the defendant's exclusive possession of the marital home, limited the plaintiff's obligation for college expenses of the parties' three children to $15,000 per year, terminated the defendant's lifetime maintenance as of the date of her 1998 remarriage, awarded a money judgment to the defendant for all interest payable on a $19,000 promissory note dated January 9, 1992, and awarded a credit of $33,488 to the plaintiff for his maintenance payments after the defendant's remarriage.

The Appellate Division modified. It held that Supreme Court erred in setting aside the parties' entire separation agreement as unconscionable since the equitable distribution of the marital property was not manifestly unjust. Pursuant to the separation agreement, the defendant was awarded, inter alia, the marital residence and most of its contents, the IRAs and the payment of certain promissory notes by the plaintiff, while the plaintiff retained his pension, his car, and some furniture. The plaintiff acknowledged at trial that he was willing to give the defendant everything as long as he retained his pension. Any inequity in this property division was not "so strong and manifest as to shock the conscience and confound the judgment" of this Court (Christian v. Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 71) Accordingly, these provisions of the separation agreement were reinstated, except as provided in the decision. The Appellate Division agreed with the Supreme Court that the interest provision in the promissory note and the lifetime escalating maintenance provisions were unconscionable (citing Tartaglia v. Tartaglia, 260 A.D.2d at 629; Yuda v. Yuda, 143 A.D.2d at 659). The plaintiff executed a promissory note for $19,000 in the defendant's favor with an annual interest rate of 9%, which represented her one-half portion of the plaintiff's unused vacation and sick time. Although the unused vacation and sick time were not in "Pay Out" status until the plaintiff's future retirement, the note provided that the annual 9% interest would accrue immediately upon execution. This interest provision was manifestly unjust. Furthermore, the plaintiff was obligated to pay child support and all college expenditures for three children, as well maintenance payments which increased each year during the defendant's lifetime. The lifetime nature of the maintenance and its 4% increase each year for the rest of the defendant's life, on top of a percentage increase following the emancipation of each of their children, represented a sum far in excess of the value of the plaintiff's marital distribution. Testimony elicited at trial revealed that by the time the plaintiff was 65 years of age, he would be exhausting his primary marital asset by giving the defendant almost one half of his yearly pension. This Court found "that no reasonable and competent person would have consented to" this lifetime escalating maintenance provision. Contrary to the Supreme Court's termination of the defendant's maintenance upon her remarriage, a maintenance period of 16 years, from the 1991 commencement of the matrimonial action to the 2007 order and judgment appealed herein, was more appropriate under the extant circumstances and in accordance with Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a). Given this determination, the plaintiff was not entitled to any recoupment of maintenance he paid between 1998 and 2007.

In Light of Parties Long Separation Prior to Divorce, Standard of Living Not a Consideration in Awarding Maintenance.

In Dowd v Dowd, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2009 WL 139210 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1976, separated in 1999 and divorced in 2007. During the lengthy separation, defendant was ostensibly supported, in part, by her live-in boyfriend. Her sporadic employment history involved low-wage jobs. Of their four children, only a 17-year-old daughter remained unemancipated at the time of divorce and she resided with plaintiff. Neither party graduated from high school. At the time of trial, plaintiff earned roughly $60,000 per year working for a manufacturer of heavy equipment. Supreme Court directed plaintiff to pay maintenance of $500 per month until defendant is eligible for Social Security retirement benefits at age 62 in 2019 and, thereafter, at a reduced rate of $250 per month until she is eligible for health care through Medicare at age 65 in 2022, at which time maintenance ceases. The Appellate Division modified by reversing so much of the judgment as awarded defendant monthly maintenance of $500 until 2019, when she reaches age 62, and $250 until 2022, when she reaches age 65. Defendant was awarded monthly maintenance of $500 for a period five years from the date of entry of Supreme Court's judgment. It held that the purpose of maintenance is to provide financial support for the recipient spouse while he or she gains the skills and employment necessary to become self-sufficient. It noted that in light of the long separation of the parties prior to the divorce action, the standard of living during the marriage was not a consideration. The marital residence was the only property of significant value and it was essentially divided equally, with defendant receiving a distributive award of $100,000. Plaintiff was 50 years old, healthy and had a job that he would likely be able to continue for the rest of his working life. Defendant was 49 years old and had a similar educational background as plaintiff. While she had a sporadic employment history, there was no reason that she shouldn't be able to obtain a modest and sustainable level of income within a reasonable time. Her purported health problems were not supported by competent medical proof. She had no responsibility for any unemancipated children and had lived independently of plaintiff for a considerable period of time. During the long separation, plaintiff provided the primary support to the children and also dealt with the marital debt. Two Justices Dissented.

February 1, 2009

New Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR Part 1200) Replace Existing Disciplinary Rules, Effective April 1, 2009.

The New Rules of Professional Conduct, which are based on the American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, introduce a number of important ethics changes for New York lawyers. They are intended to ease ethical research and guidance by New York lawyers, and are in addition to the Rules in 22 NYCRR Parts 1210, 1215, 1230 and 1400.

Some of the rules impose new ethical obligations on New York lawyers. One rule obligates a lawyer to act with reasonable diligence and promptness' in representing a client (22 NYCRR Part 1200, Rule 1.3[a]). Another rule requires a lawyer to keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter, and to promptly comply with a client's reasonable requests for information' (22 NYCRR Part 1200, Rule 1.4[a][3], [4]). In some cases, the new rules liberalize a former New York rule. For example one rule sets forth a lawyer's duty and obligation to a "prospective client," including a client with whom the lawyer never enters into an attorney-client relationship. It expressly exempts from the benefit of the rule's protections potential clients who consult with a lawyer merely for the purpose of disqualifying the lawyer from representing an adverse party. Another rule allows attorneys to disclose confidential information to advance the best interests of the client when it is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community (22 NYCRR Part 1200, Rule 1.6(a)(2)). In our special supplement Joel R. Brandes discusses the rules that particularly effect New York Matrimonial and Family law attorneys.

Maintenance Provisions and Interest on Promissory Note Provided in Separation Agreement Set Aside as Unconscionable

In Santini v Robinson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 5376525 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1973, and had three children. Their principal assets included their approximately $100,000 equity interest in the marital residence, their Individual Retirement Account and joint bank accounts, the plaintiff's deferred compensation plan, and his future retirement pension, valued at more than $242,000. In November 1991 the defendant commenced the underlying action for a divorce. The parties entered into a separation agreement dated January 9, 1992. The defendant was represented by an attorney, while the plaintiff represented himself. At that time, the plaintiff was 42 years old and employed by the County Sheriff's Department, while the defendant was 41 years old, unemployed, and legally blind, albeit able to work part-time and receiving Social Security disability benefits. The parties visited the defendant's attorney twice in connection with the separation agreement, and the attorney advised the plaintiff repeatedly, both in writing and orally, that he should retain separate counsel. The plaintiff testified that he voluntarily signed the agreement on January 9, 1992, although he merely "scanned" the agreement and had not understood the provisions that he read. The agreement contained the general terms previously agreed upon between the parties during their own negotiations. It provided that the marital residence subject to the mortgage, the IRAs and joint bank accounts, and the plaintiff's deferred compensation plan in the form of promissory notes would be distributed to the defendant and that she would receive child support and lifetime maintenance even upon remarriage. The agreement provided that the maintenance payment would be increased by a percentage each time one of the children was emancipated and by an additional 4% per annum. The plaintiff retained his pension, his automobile, some bank accounts, and certain furniture. The agreement was incorporated, but not merged, into a 1992 judgment of divorce. In 1998 the defendant remarried. In March 2000, the plaintiff commenced the action to set aside the separation agreement as unfair, inequitable, and unconscionable. After a hearing Supreme Court set aside the provisions of the parties' separation agreement awarding the defendant 100% of the plaintiff's deferred compensation and the parties' IRAs, terminated the defendant's exclusive possession of the marital home, limited the plaintiff's obligation for college expenses of the parties' three children to $15,000 per year, terminated the defendant's lifetime maintenance as of the date of her 1998 remarriage, awarded a money judgment to the defendant for all interest payable on a $19,000 promissory note dated January 9, 1992, and awarded a credit of $33,488 to the plaintiff for his maintenance payments after the defendant's remarriage. The Appellate Division modified. It held that Supreme Court erred in setting aside the parties' entire separation agreement as unconscionable since the equitable distribution of the marital property was not manifestly unjust. Pursuant to the separation agreement, the defendant was awarded, inter alia, the marital residence and most of its contents, the IRAs and the payment of certain promissory notes by the plaintiff, while the plaintiff retained his pension, his car, and some furniture. The plaintiff acknowledged at trial that he was willing to give the defendant everything as long as he retained his pension. Any inequity in this property division was not "so strong and manifest as to shock the conscience and confound the judgment" of this Court (Christian v. Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 71) Accordingly, these provisions of the separation agreement were reinstated, except as provided in the decision. The Appellate Division agreed with the Supreme Court that the interest provision in the promissory note and the lifetime escalating maintenance provisions were unconscionable. The plaintiff executed a promissory note for $19,000 in the defendant's favor with an annual interest rate of 9%, which represented her one-half portion of the plaintiff's unused vacation and sick time. Although the unused vacation and sick time were not in "Pay Out" status until the plaintiff's future retirement, the note provided that the annual 9% interest would accrue immediately upon execution. This interest provision was manifestly unjust. Furthermore, the plaintiff was obligated to pay child support and all college expenditures for three children, as well maintenance payments which increased each year during the defendant's lifetime. The lifetime nature of the maintenance and its 4% increase each year for the rest of the defendant's life, on top of a percentage increase following the emancipation of each of their children, represented a sum far in excess of the value of the plaintiff's marital distribution. Testimony elicited at trial revealed that by the time the plaintiff was 65 years of age, he would be exhausting his primary marital asset by giving the defendant almost one half of his yearly pension. This Court found "that no reasonable and competent person would have consented to" this lifetime escalating maintenance provision. Contrary to the Supreme Court's termination of the defendant's maintenance upon her remarriage, a maintenance period of 16 years, from the 1991 commencement of the matrimonial action to the 2007 order and judgment appealed herein, was more appropriate under the extant circumstances and in accordance with Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a). Given this determination, the plaintiff was not entitled to any recoupment of maintenance he paid between 1998 and 2007.

Assuming Judicial Estoppel Applied Appropriate Remedy Is Not to Transform Separate Assets into Marital Assets.

In Rachimi v Rachimi, 869 N.Y.S.2d 414 (1 Dept 2008) the action for a divorce in this 20-year marriage was commenced in 2003, when the parties were in their sixties. At the outset, the Appellate Division held that the Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(d) factors do not have to be specifically cited by the trial court when the factual findings of the court otherwise adequately articulate that the relevant statutory factors were considered especially where a comprehensive record and extensive factual findings provide a basis for informed review. The Referee set forth all his factual findings, indicated which testimony he found credible and which was not, cited the appropriate factors to be considered in making an equitable distribution award, and ultimately identified the facts he was relying on in making his award. That he did not specifically state which 236(B)(5)(d) factor he was relying on regarding each individual component of the equitable distribution award was not fatal. The relevance of each pertinent factor was clear from the extensive record. Given all the circumstances and its award of one-third of the marital apartment to plaintiff, the Appellate Division rejected plaintiff's contention that the Referee erroneously awarded 100% of FCC Corp to defendant. It found that the Referee erroneously concluded the Cedarhurst apartment was a marital asset subject to equitable distribution. While property acquired during the marriage is presumed to be marital in nature plaintiff's testimony and documentary evidence that she scrupulously maintained the proceeds from the sales of three properties she owned prior to the marriage separate and apart from marital assets, and traced those funds to the subsequent purchase of the Cedarhurst apartment, successfully rebutted the presumption that the apartment was marital property. It also found that the Referee improperly awarded defendant 100% of the marital apartment on Manhattan's Upper East Side. Considering the relevant 236(B)(5)(d) factors, it found that a distributive award to plaintiff of one-third (33 1/3%) of the fair market value of that apartment, determined as of the time of trial would be equitable under the circumstances. She was entitled to at least some portion of the marital apartment because of her advancing age, poor health, and absence from the work force for most of her adult life, with little prospect of finding employment to generate enough money for her own support. Contrary to the Referee's conclusion, plaintiff did contribute, financially and otherwise, to the household throughout the course of the marriage. A one-third share was sufficient given that plaintiff had other funds and property in her own name and was awarded $1,500 per month in maintenance until either of the parties dies or she remarried, and the Referee's finding that she did not contribute equally to the marriage. The Appellate Division held that the Referee correctly awarded the Bank Hapoalim account to defendant as his separate property. Even assuming the doctrine of judicial estoppel applied with respect to the contrary position taken by defendant in his prior divorce proceeding that he had no assets, the appropriate remedy is not to transform his separate assets into marital assets. Plaintiff's invocation of the doctrine of unclean hands was similarly misplaced. She did not argue that defendant deliberately committed perjury in an effort to place assets out of her reach in this action, which would preclude him, as a matter of public policy in order to protect the integrity of the court, from claiming rightful ownership of that property. Rather, she argued that his alleged perjury in the prior divorce action was an effort to place assets out of the reach of his former wife, and thus the doctrine was inapplicable here.

January 16, 2009

No Share of Enhanced Earning Capacity to Wife Where Her Contributions Modest

In Evans v Evans, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4659439 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Plaintiff and defendant were married in 1985 and had two children. Plaintiff claimed on appeal that Supreme Court erred by determining that defendant's engineering degree did not enhance his earning capacity and that, even if it had, plaintiff did not make a substantial contribution toward his efforts in obtaining it, and was not entitled to a distributive share of it. The Appellate Division held that while the parties agreed that much of the work put forth by defendant to earn this degree occurred during the marriage, to be entitled to a share of its value plaintiff had to demonstrate that the degree enhanced defendant's earning capacity and that she, in a meaningful and substantial way, contributed to his efforts in obtaining it. Approximately 68% of the value of this degree was earned during the marriage and was a marital asset. Supreme Court found that "the value of [defendant's] enhanced earnings are zero as a result of having attained an engineering [d]egree, because the testimony established that he could have attained the position of Manager of Global Sourcing without his engineering [d]egree." In support of this conclusion, it accepted the testimony of defendant's expert, a certified public accountant, who concluded that whatever promotions defendant obtained during his employment were likely the product of his professional competence and would have occurred "even if [defendant] had not obtained the [d]egree." There was no basis to conclude that the court's resolution of this issue was an abuse of its discretion. Supreme Court also found that, even if defendant's degree enhanced his earning capacity, plaintiff failed to demonstrate that she made any meaningful contributions that assisted defendant in earning it. Where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. Plaintiff's contributions, while significant, "can be seen more as overall contributions to the marriage rather than an additional effort to support defendant in obtaining his license". It found that no error in the court's conclusion that plaintiff was not entitled to share in the value of this degree. Plaintiff claimed that Supreme Court erred in its calculation of maintenance because, in arriving at its final figure, the court appeared to reduce the amount of defendant's annual pretax income by a portion of the value it placed on his engineering degree as a marital asset, yet, in its final decision, failed to award plaintiff any part of the value of that degree. Supreme Court found that "[i]n an effort to avoid duplication between any maintenance award and distribution as property of the marital portion of [defendant's] [d]egree I find that the total pre-tax income available from him for maintenance is $77,520.00." The court also found that "[t]here is a permanent disparity in the earnings and earning potential of the parties here in favor of [defendant], even after taking into account any [Grinfeld] duplication analysis." Considering the fact that Supreme Court did not distribute any portion of the value of defendant's degree to plaintiff as a marital asset, it erred by calculating maintenance based upon an annual income figure of $77,520, after a Grinfeld duplication analysis. Rather, the award for maintenance should have been, in part, based upon defendant's annual income of $93,500. Therefore, the basis upon which Supreme Court issued its maintenance award was improper and had to be modified. This was a long-term marriage with two children, one of whom had special needs. Plaintiff's annual income as a self-employed hairstylist was $17,047, as opposed to defendant's annual salary of $93,500, and a permanent disparity, as noted by Supreme Court, existed in the parties' respective earning potential. The Appellate Division found that defendant should pay maintenance to plaintiff of $1,000 per month until plaintiff was eligible to receive Social Security benefits.

Award of Counsel Fees in Custody Proceedings "In Nature of Support" and Not Discharged in Bankruptcy

In Matter of Ross v Sperow, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 5352258 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in 2005, a petition for violation of a prior order of custody and visitation was filed by the mother and, in response, multiple cross petitions were filed by the father alleging violations by the mother and seeking modification of custody. In an August 2006 order resolving the parties' petitions, Family Court sustained the mother's motion for counsel fees and ordered that the father pay $5,000 of her counsel fees. The father subsequently filed for bankruptcy under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code and listed the award of counsel fees as an unsecured debt. The father was discharged by the Bankruptcy Court in January 2007 and, the mother commenced a proceeding in Family Court for the violation of a court order based upon the father's failure to pay the counsel fees. Family Court concluded that the counsel fees were a nondischargeable domestic support obligation, denied the father's motion and found the father to be in violation of a prior order. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that state and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction over the issue of the dischargeability of a particular debt following the discharge of the debtor in bankruptcy. Under the Bankruptcy Code, "domestic support obligation[s]" are exempt from discharge in bankruptcy. As was relevant here, a domestic support obligation is a debt owed to or recoverable by a child of the debtor or such child's parent in the nature of support of the child of the debtor or such child's parent, without regard to whether such debt is expressly so designated, ... established by ... an order of a court of record. (11 USC 101[14A][A][i]; [B], [C][ii]). When determining the effect of a debtor's discharge in bankruptcy on a particular debt, the Court began with the well-established principle of bankruptcy law that dischargeability must be determined by the substance of the liability rather than its form. Here, while the award of counsel fees was not explicitly characterized as a support obligation in Family Court's order, family court judges cannot reasonably be expected to anticipate future bankruptcy among the parties to a custody [or visitation] proceeding, and the inquiry into whether the debt at issue is in the nature of support is undertaken without regard to whether such debt is expressly so designated. It looked to not only to Family Court's order, but also to the record of the proceedings in determining the actual nature of the obligation. With this in mind, a review of the record revealed that the mother's initial petition commencing the proceeding clearly raised issues of financial need and hardship. Similarly, the mother's motion for counsel fees, which was sustained by Family Court in the August 2006 order, proposed consideration of her circumstances as one basis for an award of counsel fees. Also informing its conclusion was Family Court's acknowledgment in its order that Domestic Relations Law 237(b), which provides for consideration of "the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties" when awarding counsel fees to a parent in custody or visitation matters, furnished a basis for its award of fees. In light of the foregoing, and mindful that the term "in the nature of support" is to be given a broad interpretation in the context of the discharge of debt obligations in bankruptcy, it agreed with Family Court's determination that the award of counsel fees in its prior order was, in part, "in the nature of support" and, therefore, excepted from discharge in bankruptcy.

Appellate Review and Review By Family Court Not Precluded by Failure to Timely File Objections. Strict Adherence to the Deadlines of Family Court Act 439(e) is not required

In Matter of Latimer v. Cartin,-- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 5352279 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the father filed a petition for downward modification of his child support obligation on the basis of the surrender of his medical license and a subsequent loss of income and earning capacity. Following a hearing, the Support Magistrate concluded that the father had failed to meet his burden of proving an involuntary and unavoidable change in financial circumstances or that he made reasonable and diligent efforts to obtain employment, and declined to downwardly modify his support obligation on these grounds. Family Court denied the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order. The Appellate Division considered the father's appeal, rejecting the mother's contention that appellate review was precluded due to the father's failure to timely file objections to the Support Magistrate's order. It held that strict adherence to the deadlines of Family Court Act 439(e) is not required and it did not find Family Court's decision to review the merits of the father's objections, which were filed one day after the statutory deadline, to have been an abuse of discretion.

Wife's Inability to Testify with Specificity as to How She Spent the Proceeds of Loan Suggested She Dissipated Marital Assets in Contemplation of Divorce.

In Abrams v Abrams, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 5376644 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that "The overriding purpose of a maintenance award is to give the spouse economic independence, and it should be awarded for a duration that would provide the recipient with enough time to become self-supporting". It held that the trial court properly awarded the former wife maintenance, but it improvidently exercised its discretion in extending the duration of the maintenance award beyond five years, and concluded that an award of $2,500 per month for five years was appropriate. It also found that the former husband correctly contended that he was entitled to a portion of the proceeds of a home equity loan that the wife obtained with respect to certain investment residential property, especially in light of the wife's inability to testify with specificity as to how she spent the proceeds of that loan. This suggested that the wife dissipated these marital assets in contemplation of divorce. The judgment was modified to award the husband a credit which represented his share of the proceeds of that loan, after accounting for the taxes paid by the wife on both the marital residence and the investment residential property. It noted that a parent has no legal obligation to provide for or contribute to the support of a child over the age of 21. Therefore, the court erred in failing to direct that the husband need only maintain the child as a beneficiary on his life insurance policy until the child reached the age of 21 or was sooner emancipated.

January 1, 2009

New Rules of Professional Conduct Effective April 1, 2009

The Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR Part 1200) replace the existing Part 1200 of the Disciplinary Rules, effective April 1, 2009, and introduce many ethics changes for New York lawyers. The Rules are based on the American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which has generated a national body of ethics law. Their adoption will ease ethical research and guidance by lawyers seeking to research and follow New York's ethics rules. The Rules are in addition to the Rules in Part 1210 (Statement of Clients Rights), Part 1215 (Written Letter of Engagement Rule), Part 1230 (Fee Arbitration), and Part 1400 (Procedure for Attorneys in Domestic Relations Matters). Rule 1.18 governs a lawyer's duties to a prospective client when that person and the lawyer ultimately do not form an attorney-client relationship. It applies the same duty of confidentiality owed to former clients. However, a lawyer or law firm may nonetheless oppose a former prospective client if the lawyer's current client and former prospective client give informed written consent, or the law firm may do so if certain conditions are met, including timely screening of the disqualified lawyer and prompt written notice to the former prospective client. The protections of Rule 1.18 are expressly denied to a prospective client who communicates with a lawyer in order to disqualify the lawyer from handling a materially adverse representation in the same or a substantially related matter. The new Rules of Professional Conduct are available at <http://www.nycourts.gov/rules/jointappellate/>

Improper to Include Future Maintenance Payments as Part of Defendant's Income for Purposes of Calculating Child Support

In Simon v Simon, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4736658 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division deleted the award of child support and included an award of health insurance coverage separate from plaintiff's other maintenance obligations, and remanded the matter to the trial court for a recalculation of the parties' respective child support obligations, and for a finding as to the cost of health insurance for defendant at the predivorce level of coverage. The Appellate Division held that while no basis existed to disturb the trial court's crediting of plaintiff's testimony regarding the reduction in his income and its resulting finding that the parties' predivorce lifestyle cannot be supported by their present combined income, under the circumstances, including the disparity in the parties' future earning capacity and defendant's ongoing health problems, the court should have directed that plaintiff pay defendant the cost of private health insurance, in addition to his regular nondurational maintenance obligation of $10,000 per month. As the record did not permit a finding as to the cost of such health insurance, it remanded for a determination thereof and for a recalculation of child support, required because the court improperly included future maintenance payments as part of defendant's income (see Huber v. Huber, 229 A.D.2d 904 [1996]). It directed that upon recalculation, the trial court should deduct from the plaintiff's income the amount he pays in maintenance, but should not add the same amount to defendant's income (see Tryon v. Tryon, 37 A.D.3d 455 [2007]).

Where Mutual Mistake Rendered Portion of Agreement Impossible Relevant Provision Was Reformed

In Banker v Banker, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4999166 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties oral stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into their 2005 divorce judgment, provided that the parties would subdivide a parcel of property located in Delaware County. In response to a motion by plaintiff to enforce the stipulation, Supreme Court, in February 2006, ordered defendant to, obtain subdivision approval from the Town. The Planning Board denied defendant's subsequent subdivision application upon discovering that the property was encumbered by a restrictive covenant against further subdivision. In March 2006, defendant moved to reargue and/or renew Supreme Court's February 2006 order and requested a hearing to determine equitable distribution. Supreme Court reserved decision on all pending matters pertaining to the parties until an appraisal of the property was completed. Because the parties could not agree on an appraiser, the court appointed one and challenged the parties, once the appraisal was complete, to settle the matter in a private auction or buyout. The appraiser completed two appraisals in June 2006. By letter dated October 4, 2006, defendant requested the opportunity to offer further proof of value. Defendant made a similar request and explained that the parties had not been able to settle the matter or agree on a private auction. Plaintiff responded with a motion seeking that the parties' interests in the property be declared in conformance with the terms set forth in the stipulation and the values established in the appraisal, as well as an order allowing her to buy out defendant's share of the property. Defendant opposed the motion, arguing that the appraisal should not be adopted without an opportunity by the parties to cross-examine the appraiser and submit other evidence of valuation. Supreme Court ordered a hearing to permit the parties to cross-examine the appraiser, but made it clear that no other testimony or evidence of valuation would be permitted. Following the hearing, at which Supreme Court again denied defendant's request to submit further evidence, the court determined the interests of the parties in the property to be 83% for plaintiff and 17% for defendant. The court, fixed the parties' interests as indicated above, appointed a receiver, and ordered the public sale of the property. Defendant appealed. The Appellate Division rejected defendant's argument that Supreme Court exceeded its authority by reforming the parties' stipulation of settlement. Where, as here, a mutual mistake rendered a portion of the parties' settlement agreement impossible or impracticable, "the relevant settlement provision was properly set aside" (Brender v. Brender, 199 A.D.2d 665, 666 [1993]). No dispute existed that the parties' agreement to physically divide the property cannot occur given the restrictive covenant; indeed, defendant was not attempting to have the parties' stipulation enforced. Thus, after giving the parties ample opportunity to reach a new agreement, there was no error in Supreme Court's decision to move forward by appointing an appraiser so that an equitable distribution of the property, in as close accordance as possible with the intent of the parties as expressed in their settlement, could be achieved. The Court noted that to achieve reformation or rescission of the stipulation of settlement, one of the parties should have commenced a plenary action, rather than proceeding by motion (see Brender v. Brender, 199 A.D.2d at 666 n. 2, 605 N.Y.S.2d 411) but, in the context of this matter, concluded the defect to be nonfatal. There was merit, however, in defendant's argument that the issue should not have been resolved without a full hearing permitting the parties to offer proof of valuation. The court is authorized to appoint an independent appraiser in a matrimonial action (Domestic Relations Law 237; 22 NYCRR 202.18) but, unless the parties have stipulated otherwise, the court must afford the parties the opportunity to review the appraisal, cross-examine the appraiser and offer additional evidence on valuation. Although the record contained evidence that the parties consented to Supreme Court's appointment of the appraiser, it did not suggest that the parties agreed to be bound by the resulting appraisal. The order was reversed, on the law, and matter remitted to the Supreme Court for a full evidentiary hearing to determine the valuation of the parcels identified in the parties' stipulation of settlement.

No Authority to Order Sale of Separate Property Marital Residence

In Kilkenny v Kilkenny, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4260834 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held as the marital residence was the separate property of the wife, not subject to the imposition of a constructive trust, there was no authority to order its sale for the purpose of equitably distributing the proceeds. The husband was entitled to 50% equitable share in the increase in the value of the marital residence over the course of the marriage attributable to the parties joint efforts. Supreme Court also properly determined the husband was entitled to an award of $30,269.50, representing his 50% share of the reduction in the principal of the mortgage obligation referable to the residence, until the date of the commencement of the action. However, if that credit for the increase in equity attributable to the payment of mortgage principal was made, that return of equity should have been subtracted from the increased value of the marital residence to arrive at the net increased value. The Supreme Court properly determined that the husband was entitled to credit for 50% of the reduction in the principal remaining on the mortgage debt, in order to account for the mortgage and real property tax payments he made from the commencement of the action, until the termination date of the pendente lite order because those payments were not made with marital funds. The husband, in light of the modification made on appeal to the award of maintenance, was also entitled to a credit for all of the mortgage and real property tax payments he made pursuant to the pendente lite order. However, the credit was limited to the principal portion of the mortgage payments plus the real property tax payments, since the husband's mortgage interest payments was taken into consideration in determining that aspect of the appeal related to arrears for "utility" payments. Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in limiting the duration of the award of maintenance so as to terminate on September 1, 2007. The Appellate Division extended the duration of the award to provide the wife with sufficient time to become self-supporting. Considering the wife's education and age, the number of years she had been out of the work force raising the parties' two minor children, the standard of living of the parties during the marriage, and the present and future earning capacities of both parties, the duration of the award was extended to the earlier of February 1, 2012, the death of either party, or the wife's remarriage. The parties' younger child would be 14 years old on that date and no longer in need of child care. The Appellate Division found that the amount of the unpaid balance of a loan that the husband obtained in connection with the college education of the second of his two daughters from his prior marriage, in the sum of $32,000, should not have been included in the calculation of marital debt.

December 16, 2008

Valuation of Enhanced Earning Capacity from MBA's was "fatally flawed" Post-divorce Severance Package Not Marital Property

In Wiener v Wiener, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 5083800 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held Plaintiff's expert's valuation of the enhanced earning capacity (EEC) from plaintiff's MBA was "fatally flawed" because he used the base line earnings of actuaries having 11 years of experience, when plaintiff was never an actuary. However, defendant's expert's final report was also flawed: he used one anomalously high year of plaintiff's earnings--earned three years before the commencement of this action and five years before trial--as the top line earnings. The most reasonable evidence in the record of plaintiff's EEC was defendant's expert's alternative calculation based on top line earnings of $177,000. This calculation resulted in an EEC of $1,111,000. The Court declined to disturb the percentage of EEC (10%) awarded by the Special Referee. It rejected plaintiff's argument on her cross appeal that she was entitled to part of defendant's post-divorce severance package because the first, originally offered $180,000 of the package was in exchange for defendant's years of service. Olivo v. Olivo (82 N.Y.2d 202 [1993]) rejected a " 'length of service' test for marital property". "Instead, the test ... is whether the compensation in question is a form of deferred compensation" . As defendant was not entitled to even the original $180,000 severance package unless he signed, and did not revoke, a separation agreement and general release, the original $180,000 severance offer was akin to the "separation payment" that Olivo deemed not to be marital property.

Absent Express Finding of Willfulness Prejudgment Interest Improperly Imposed. When Findings of Support Magistrate Are Insufficient Family Court May Consider Affidavits and Other Submissions Without Holding a Hearing

In Matter of Regan v Zalucky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4809541 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the Family Court fixed the father's liability for arrears of child support and awarded interest at 9% per annum on each of his obligations. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for further proceedings. It pointed out that once a money judgment has been ordered and entered, interest accrues until the judgment has been paid. Prejudgment interest can be ordered only after a finding of a willful disregard of a lawful court support order. Despite the statutory mandate directing that a money judgment shall be ordered when any amount of child support arrears are established (Family Ct Act § 454[2][a]) it appeared that no money judgment had been ordered or entered. It did not appear that Family Court made any express finding of willfulness before imposing prejudgment interest. Absent such a determination, prejudgment interest was improperly imposed. In a footnote the Appellate Division rejected the father's contention that Family Ct Act § 439(e) precludes Family Court, when it has concluded that the findings of the Support Magistrate are insufficient to render a final determination, from considering evidence in the form of affidavits and other submissions without holding a hearing. Where the court is endeavoring to fix amounts due on liability already established, and submissions are made on notice and with opportunity to respond, it found nothing to preclude Family Court, where possible, from rendering a final order based upon submissions.

Court Cannot Issue QDRO Encompassing Rights Not Provided in Underlying Stipulation. Absent Provision in Stipulation Specifically Awarding Plaintiff Accident Disability Benefits Supreme Court Could Not Issue More Expansive QDRO.

In Berardi v Berardi, 54 A.D.3d 982, 865 N.Y.S.2d 245 (2 Dept 2008) the original QDRO was inconsistent with the parties stipulation, which was incorporated into their judgment of divorce, insofar as it did not include any provision for a disability pension or incorporate the phrase "applicable formula" as the means of distributing the defendant's pension. When the defendant retired on December 31, 2002, after more than 20 years of service, he applied for accident disability retirement benefits in light of his disability for injuries. On October 13, 2004, the defendant's application for accident disability retirement benefits was approved, and his entitlement thereto became effective in April 2005, retroactive to his original retirement date. His pension benefits were increased by 25% in accordance with Administrative Code of the City of New York § 13-258. The plaintiff's allocable share of the defendant's variable supplement benefits was eliminated as a result of the defendant's eligibility for accident disability benefits. The plaintiff contacted the Police Pension Fund of the City of New York (PPF) seeking her allocable share of the increase of the pension benefits derived from the defendant's accident disability retirement. After being advised by the PPF that her share of the defendant's accident disability pension would not attach without a modification of the original QDRO, the plaintiff moved to amend the original QDRO to include the defendant's disability payments payable pursuant to the applicable formula embodied in Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 490, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15. Supreme Court granted the motion and upon reargument adhered to the original determination. The defendant appealed and the Appellate Division modified the order. It stated that inasmuch as a portion of a spouse's ordinary disability pension represents deferred compensation related to length of employment occurring during the marriage, it constitutes marital property subject to equitable distribution. However, to the extent that a disability pension constitutes compensation for personal injuries, that compensation is separate property which is not subject to equitable distribution. Such is the case with an accident disability pension under the Administrative Code of the City of New York § 13-258 which is based on physical or mental incapacity proximately resulting from city service, not length of service. Applying these principles to the matter at bar, the Supreme Court's adherence, upon reargument, to its original determination granting the plaintiff's motion, was only partially correct. Although the court properly granted the plaintiff's motion to amend the original QDRO to conform to the stipulation by adding a provision for a disability pension and reflecting the parties' agreement to apply the "applicable formula" under Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15, the court should not have made such amendment without differentiating between ordinary disability and accident disability. When the distribution of pension benefits between former spouses is accomplished through a QDRO obtained pursuant to a stipulation, such QDRO can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. Where a QDRO is inconsistent with the provisions of a stipulation or judgment of divorce, courts possess the authority to amend the QDRO to accurately reflect the provisions of the stipulation pertaining to the pension benefits. A court cannot issue a QDRO more expansive or encompassing rights not provided in the underlying stipulation. While it was clear from the stipulation that the plaintiff was entitled to receive a percentage of the defendant's ordinary disability benefits for the relevant period, there was no provision for entitlement to accident disability benefits, which represented compensation for personal injuries and remained the defendant's separate property not subject to equitable distribution. Absent a provision in the stipulation specifically awarding the plaintiff accident disability benefits, the Supreme Court could not issue a more expansive QDRO. Since the original QDRO was inconsistent with the stipulation upon which it was based, the stipulation controls and the original QDRO had to be modified accordingly. Therefore, a hearing by, and/or further submissions to, the Supreme Court, was required for purposes of determining the nature and status of the defendant's pension and the plaintiff's allocable share thereof, and the Supreme Court was directed to thereafter enter an appropriate amended QDRO in accordance with the determination.

Failure to Establish Value of Business When Acquired Renders it Marital Property

In Petosa v Petosa, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4952770 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly valued and distributed the assets of plaintiff's tax accounting business. The determination of a fact-finder as to the value of a business, if it is within the range of the testimony presented, will not be disturbed on appeal where valuation of the business rested primarily on the credibility of expert witnesses and their valuation techniques. Inasmuch as plaintiff failed to establish what the value of the business was at the time that he acquired it, the court was justified in treating the entire business as marital property. Plaintiff contended that the court abused its discretion in granting the application of defendant for counsel fees because her attorney failed to provide her with the requisite itemized bills at least every 60 days (see 22 NYCRR 1400.2, 1400.3). It rejected that contention holding that it is the right of the client, not the adversary spouse, to be billed at least every 60 days, and the client may waive that right. By providing defendant with the requisite statement of rights and responsibilities and executing the requisite written retainer agreement, her attorney complied with 22 NYCRR part 1400 (see Winkelman, 281 A.D.2d 908). Plaintiff failed to preserve for review his contention that the court abused its discretion in awarding defendant counsel fees in view of her distributive and support awards, inasmuch as he failed to request a hearing with respect to the ability of defendant to pay her own counsel fees.

Proper to Limit Juveniles "My Space" Use

In Matter of Ashley D., 55 A.D.3d 605, 866 N.Y.S.2d 222 (2 Dept 2008) the appellant admitted that she had committed an act which, if committed by an adult, would have constituted the crime of assault in the third degree. At the time of the allocution, the Family Court was presented with documents establishing that the appellant had violated a condition imposed on her interim release by using "MySpace" and attempting to change her photo and location to avoid discovery. In addition, the presentment agency demonstrated during the dispositional hearing that the appellant had bragged of her conduct on her "MySpace" site and had placed a link on that site to a video of the assault that had been posted by a third party on "YouTube," all in violation of the Family Court's earlier order.

The Appellate Division held that the Family Court has the authority to impose conditions of probation that are reasonably related to rehabilitation (Family Ct. Act 353.2[2][h]). In the circumstances presented here, the Family Court providently exercised that discretion in adjudicating the appellant a juvenile delinquent and then placing her on probation for a period of 15 months, subject to certain conditions, including a prohibition on computer use for other than educational purposes.

December 1, 2008

Failure to Establish Value of Business at Time Acquired Justifies Finding it to Be Marital Property. Client May Waive Right to Bills Every 60 Days For Purposes of Counsel Fee Award

In Petosa v Petosa, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4952770 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that as plaintiff failed to establish what the value of the business was at the time that he acquired it, the court was justified in treating the entire business as marital property. Plaintiff contended that the court abused its discretion in granting the application of defendant for counsel fees because her attorney failed to provide her with the requisite itemized bills at least every 60 days (see 22 NYCRR 1400.2, 1400.3). It rejected that contention holding that it is the right of the client, not the adversary spouse, to be billed at least every 60 days, and the client may waive that right. By providing defendant with the requisite statement of rights and responsibilities and executing the requisite written retainer agreement, her attorney complied with 22 NYCRR part 1400. Plaintiff failed to preserve for review his contention that the court abused its discretion in awarding defendant counsel fees in view of her distributive and support awards, inasmuch as he failed to request a hearing with respect to the ability of defendant to pay her own counsel fees.

Preclusion of Expert Reports Rarely Warranted

In Nathel v Nathel, 55 A.D.3d 434, 866 N.Y.S.2d 153, (1 Dept 2008) the Appellate Division held that the referee properly exercised her discretion in denying plaintiff's application to preclude defendant from introducing two expert reports that were served after the deadline set by the court. Preclusion of expert reports on the ground of failure to comply with the rules governing exchange of reports is generally unwarranted, absent a showing that the noncompliance was willful or the party seeking preclusion was prejudiced by the lateness of the exchange. Here, defendant believed that the deadline for exchange of all expert reports had been extended one week. Even assuming defendant was mistaken, plaintiff did not show any prejudice resulting from the claimed one-week delay in service of the two expert reports. However, it found that the referee improvidently exercised her discretion in precluding plaintiff from using a real estate appraisal of the marital residence prepared or to be prepared pursuant to a court-ordered stipulation. Such a stipulation generally will be enforced unless the parties' agreement is shown to have been the product of fraud, overreaching or duress. Since no date was ever set for completion of the appraisal, there was no basis for precluding it on the ground of lateness, especially since preclusion would result in a lack of evidence on a key issue to be determined at trial. It held that upon remand, the trial court should set a date for the appraisal to be completed and furnished to the parties in advance of the expert's testimony.

Court Cannot Issue QDRO Encompassing Rights Not Provided in Underlying Stipulation. Absent Provision in Stipulation Specifically Awarding Plaintiff Accident Disability Benefits Supreme Court Could Not Issue More Expansive QDRO.

In Berardi v Berardi, 54 A.D.3d 982, 865 N.Y.S.2d 245 (2 Dept 2008) the original QDRO was inconsistent with the parties stipulation, which was incorporated into their judgment of divorce, insofar as it did not include any provision for a disability pension or incorporate the phrase "applicable formula" as the means of distributing the defendant's pension. When the defendant retired on December 31, 2002, after more than 20 years of service, he applied for accident disability retirement benefits in light of his disability for injuries. On October 13, 2004, the defendant's application for accident disability retirement benefits was approved, and his entitlement thereto became effective in April 2005, retroactive to his original retirement date. His pension benefits were increased by 25% in accordance with Administrative Code of the City of New York § 13-258. The plaintiff's allocable share of the defendant's variable supplement benefits was eliminated as a result of the defendant's eligibility for accident disability benefits. The plaintiff contacted the Police Pension Fund of the City of New York (PPF) seeking her allocable share of the increase of the pension benefits derived from the defendant's accident disability retirement. After being advised by the PPF that her share of the defendant's accident disability pension would not attach without a modification of the original QDRO, the plaintiff moved to amend the original QDRO to include the defendant's disability payments payable pursuant to the applicable formula embodied in Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 490, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15. Supreme Court granted the motion and upon reargument adhered to the original determination. The defendant appealed and the Appellate Division modified the order. It stated that inasmuch as a portion of a spouse's ordinary disability pension represents deferred compensation related to length of employment occurring during the marriage, it constitutes marital property subject to equitable distribution. However, to the extent that a disability pension constitutes compensation for personal injuries, that compensation is separate property which is not subject to equitable distribution. Such is the case with an accident disability pension under the Administrative Code of the City of New York § 13-258 which is based on physical or mental incapacity proximately resulting from city service, not length of service. Applying these principles to the matter at bar, the Supreme Court's adherence, upon reargument, to its original determination granting the plaintiff's motion, was only partially correct. Although the court properly granted the plaintiff's motion to amend the original QDRO to conform to the stipulation by adding a provision for a disability pension and reflecting the parties' agreement to apply the "applicable formula" under Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15, the court should not have made such amendment without differentiating between ordinary disability and accident disability. When the distribution of pension benefits between former spouses is accomplished through a QDRO obtained pursuant to a stipulation, such QDRO can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. Where a QDRO is inconsistent with the provisions of a stipulation or judgment of divorce, courts possess the authority to amend the QDRO to accurately reflect the provisions of the stipulation pertaining to the pension benefits. A court cannot issue a QDRO more expansive or encompassing rights not provided in the underlying stipulation. While it was clear from the stipulation that the plaintiff was entitled to receive a percentage of the defendant's ordinary disability benefits for the relevant period, there was no provision for entitlement to accident disability benefits, which represented compensation for personal injuries and remained the defendant's separate property not subject to equitable distribution. Absent a provision in the stipulation specifically awarding the plaintiff accident disability benefits, the Supreme Court could not issue a more expansive QDRO. Since the original QDRO was inconsistent with the stipulation upon which it was based, the stipulation controls and the original QDRO had to be modified accordingly. Therefore, a hearing by, and/or further submissions to, the Supreme Court, was required for purposes of determining the nature and status of the defendant's pension and the plaintiff's allocable share thereof, and the Supreme Court was directed to thereafter enter an appropriate amended QDRO in accordance with the determination.

Children Not Parties To Stipulation of Settlement

In Baranek v Baranek, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4260896 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding the defendant summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground that the parties' minor children were necessary or indispensable parties who should have been joined in the action. In this plenary action to set aside the stipulation of settlement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the children were not parties to the contract whose rights may be prejudiced by the rescission thereof. It also held that Supreme Court improperly searched the record and awarded the defendant summary judgment dismissing the second, third, and fourth causes of action in the complaint, since the viability of the second, third, and fourth causes of action was not an issue presented in the plaintiff's motion papers. The parties' stipulation of settlement, set forth on the record in open court on October 7, 2004, stated that the parties had been made aware of the Child Support Standards Act and stated the amount of basic child support pursuant to the CSSA was $861 per month, which was less than the $900 per month awarded. However, the stipulation did not recite that the parties were aware that the application of the CSSA guidelines would result in the calculation of the presumptively correct amount of support and the parties' reasons for their departure from the guidelines. Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(h) requires these specific recitals, which were not in the parties' stipulation. The recitals in the findings of fact and conclusions of law and the judgment of divorce cannot rectify these defects since those documents were prepared and submitted by the attorney for the defendant approximately 11 months after the stipulation was entered into. Accordingly, the provision of the stipulation of settlement which awarded basic child support in the sum of $900 per month was not enforceable and was vacated. Similarly, the provision of the parties' stipulation which provided that "[t]he parties will split all future unreimbursed medical expenses for the children" was set aside on the ground that that obligation is "directly connected with the basic child support calculation" (Cimons v. Cimons, 53 AD3d 125). However, it did not appear from the record that the basic child support provision was intertwined with other provisions of the stipulation, which included custody and visitation, equitable distribution of property, and a waiver of maintenance based upon equitable distribution of property. Accordingly, only the provisions awarding the defendant basic child support in the sum of $900 per month, and the provision which stated that "[t]he parties will split all future unreimbursed medical expenses for the children," was set aside.

November 17, 2008

DRL 240 (1-b) Applies Only to Basic Child Support, Which Does Not Include College Expenses

In Colucci v Colucci, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4170019 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff mother and the defendant father, who had two children were divorced in 1997. In their stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce they agreed to be bound by, and for the stipulation to comply with, the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b]; Family Ct Act 413[1][b]). The stipulation provided, under the section entitled "CHILD SUPPORT," that the father must pay the mother a set amount per month in basic child support, which amount was determined in accordance with the CSSA. The stipulation of settlement further provided, in the child support section, that the parties are to share on a pro rata basis any child care expenses incurred by the mother that are necessary for her work or for school leading to work, as well as the costs associated with the children's extracurricular activities. The stipulation of settlement also provided, in the child support section, that the parties are to exchange their federal income tax returns annually in order to make any necessary adjustments to the father's basic child support obligation and to the parties' pro rata basis underlying the amount of child support that would be due under the CSSA. Under a separate section of the stipulation of settlement entitled "COLLEGE EXPENSES," the father agreed to be solely responsible for the children's college education expenses. In June 2007, 10 years after the stipulation was executed and 2 months before the older child was to start college, the father moved, inter alia, for a downward modification of his obligation to pay for the children's college education expenses. Claiming that his income had decreased and the mother's had increased since the divorce, the father asked the Supreme Court to "reallocate" the parties' respective obligations with respect to the children's college education expenses, based on the parties' current incomes, so that he would pay 62% of the expenses, and the mother would pay the remainder. In opposition, the mother contended that, in accordance with the stipulation of settlement, the parties agreed that the father would pay 100% of the children's college education expenses regardless of any change in the parties' income. Concluding that there was a "change in circumstances," and purporting to take into account the best interests of the children, the Supreme Court granted that branch of the father's motion which was for a downward modification of his obligation to pay the children's college education expenses, to the extent of directing the father to pay 75% of those expenses. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the terms of a separation agreement "incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce operate as contractual obligations binding on the parties" (Matter of Gravlin v. Ruppert, 98 N.Y.2d 1, 5). Further, a matrimonial settlement is a contract subject to principles of contract interpretation and a court should interpret the contract in accordance with its plain and ordinary meaning. Where a matrimonial settlement "is clear and unambiguous on its face, the parties' intent must be construed from the four corners of the agreement, and not from extrinsic evidence. Here, the parties' stipulation of settlement expressly obligated the father to pay 100% of the children's college education expenses, in addition to, and separate and apart from, his obligation to pay child support. Notably, the provision in the stipulation requiring the father to pay 100% of the children's college education expenses is set forth in a section of the stipulation separate from the section containing his obligation to pay child support, and the two sections do not reference each other in any manner. Significantly, only the section pertaining to child support contains provisions regarding reallocation of the parties' respective obligations should there be any change in the income of either one. Under the circumstances, it was apparent that the parties agreed that college education expenses would not constitute a component of their obligation to pay basic child support. It was also apparent from the stipulation of settlement that the parties intended that the father's obligation to pay 100% of the children's college education expenses was not subject to modification based on any change in the parties' respective incomes. While Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(h) requires stipulations and agreements to contain a provision that the parties were advised of the CSSA and knowingly "opted-out" of its provisions that provision specifically applies only to "[b]asic child support," which generally does not include college education expenses. Under such circumstances, there was no basis for the court to interfere with the parties' contractual agreement requiring the father to pay 100% of the children's college expenses.

Ability to Become Self-supporting with Respect to Some Standard of Living Does Not Obviate Need to Consider Predivorce Standard of Living. Voluntary Payment of Tuition May Not Be Recouped or Credited Against Pendente Lite Child Support

In Ruanne v Ruanne, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4491472 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1986 and had three children. In May 2003 the plaintiff commenced the action for divorce. The Appellate Division held that in determining the appropriate amount and duration of maintenance, the court is required to consider, among other factors, the standard of living of the parties during the marriage and the present and future earning capacity of both parties. While the Supreme Court properly found that the defendant was capable of returning to work and re-establishing her business, the wife's ability to become self-supporting with respect to some standard of living in no way obviates the need for the court to consider the predivorce standard of living. The maintenance award of $6,000 per month for eight years would permit the defendant to maintain a semblance of the predivorce standard of living while allowing her a reasonably sufficient time to become self-supporting. The Supreme Court properly denied those branches of the plaintiff's motion, made in April 2004 and referred to trial, which were, in effect, for a downward modification of his pendente lite support obligation and for a credit against support arrears for tuition payments made to the school of the two youngest children. Modifications of pendente lite awards should be sparingly made and then only under exigent circumstances such as where a party is unable to meet his or her own needs, or the interests of justice otherwise require relief. While the papers submitted on the motion demonstrated that the plaintiff's salary declined in 2003, the evidence adduced at trial established that he also accumulated over $100,000 in capital gains during that year. Accordingly, the plaintiff had the resources available to sufficiently provide for his family as established in the pendente lite award. Further, the pendente lite order did not address the issue of tuition payments for the children's school. Accordingly, the plaintiff's voluntary payment of tuition may not be recouped or credited against amounts owing under the order (Horne v. Horne, 22 N.Y.2d 219) In distributing the marital assets, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in characterizing a life insurance policy and margin account as active assets and valued them as of the date of commencement of the action. The plaintiff depleted those assets during the pendency of the action, the majority going toward the purchase and furnishing of his new home and the installation of a new driveway and basketball court. Their decrease in value was thus due to the plaintiff's decisions and not mere market fluctuations.

Defendant Wife Awarded $25,000 Counsel Fee Where Complaint Dismissed

In Ciociano v Ciociano, 863 N.Y.S.2d 766 (2 Dept 2008) a matrimonial action in which the complaint was dismissed the Appellate Division reversed an order which denied the wife's motion for an award of an attorney's fee and awarded her an attorney's fee of $25,000. It held that in a matrimonial action, an award of an attorney's fee should be based, inter alia, on the relative financial circumstances of the parties and the relative merit of their positions. It was undisputed that the defendant wife earned approximately $27,000 per year, while the plaintiff husband earned more than $100,000 per year. In light of the great disparity in income between the parties, the lack of merit to the husband's action, and the husband's failure to substantiate his allegations that the wife engaged in tactics to prolong the litigation, it held that the wife should have been awarded an attorney's fee in the sum of $25,000.

Absent Express Finding of Willfulness Prejudgment Interest Improperly Imposed. When Findings of Support Magistrate Are Insufficient Family Court May Consider Affidavits and Other Submissions Without Holding a Hearing

In Matter of Regan v Zalucky, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4809541 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the Family Court fixed the father's liability for arrears of child support and awarded interest at 9% per annum on each of his obligations. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for further proceedings. It pointed out that once a money judgment has been ordered and entered, interest accrues until the judgment has been paid (Family Ct Act § 454[1]; §460[1]; CPLR 5003). Prejudgment interest can be ordered only after a finding of a willful disregard of a lawful court support order (Family Ct Act § 460 [1]; Matter of Kaltwasser v. Kearns, 235 A.D.2d 738, 740 [1997]). Despite the statutory mandate directing that a money judgment shall be ordered when any amount of child support arrears are established (Family Ct Act § 454[2][a]) it appeared that no money judgment had been ordered or entered. It did not appear that Family Court made any express finding of willfulness before imposing prejudgment interest. Absent such a determination, prejudgment interest was improperly imposed. In a footnote the Appellate Division rejected the father's contention that Family Ct Act § 439(e) precludes Family Court, when it has concluded that the findings of the Support Magistrate are insufficient to render a final determination, from considering evidence in the form of affidavits and other submissions without holding a hearing. Where the court is endeavoring to fix amounts due on liability already established, and submissions are made on notice and with opportunity to respond, it found nothing to preclude Family Court, where possible, from rendering a final order based upon submissions.

November 3, 2008

Court of Appeals Holds Rule 202.48 Does Not Apply to Order Granted as Result of Unnecessary Motion Which Results in Order Granting Same Relief Previously Granted.

In Farkas v Farkas, — NY3d —, 10/24/2008 N.Y.L.J. 27, (col. 3) the parties July 17, 1996 judgment of divorce included a decretal paragraph which gave the husband two options with regard to the payment of sums due to Chemical Bank, and provided that "In the event that [the husband] fails to comply with either option within 30 days from the date hereof, [the wife] shall be entitled to enter a money judgment against [the husband] for the total amount due and owing to Chemical Bank without further order ." An amended judgment of divorce entered on April 14, 1999 repeated this provision. In June 2000, the wife sought an 'Order...[p]ursuant to the Order [sic] of this Court dated July 17, 1996, entering a Final Judgment against [the husband] for the sum of $984,401.17. In a 2000 decision and order, Supreme Court granted the wife's application and restated, in its entirety, the relevant decretal paragraph from the 1999 amended judgment. In addition the order provided as follows: 'ORDERED that [the wife's] application...for a money judgment... is granted and [the wife] may settle the judgment thereon. Upon [the wife's] suggestion, such judgment shall contain language staying execution thereon pending determination or other disposition of the Chemical Bank foreclosure action' . In May 2005, the wife served the husband with a notice of settlement and proposed judgment regarding the monies owed Chemical Bank. The proposed judgment stated that the wife and Chemical Bank had settled the foreclosure action for $750,000 in August 2003; the proposed judgment against the husband was in the principal amount of $750,000. The husband opposed entry, citing 22 NYCRR 202.48. Subdivision (a) states that 'Proposed orders or judgments, with proof of service on all parties where the order is directed to be settled or submitted on notice, must be submitted for signature, unless otherwise directed by the court, within 60 days after the signing and filing of the decision directing that the order be settled or submitted.' Subdivision (b) specifies that failure to submit the order or judgment as directed within the 60-day time frame constitutes an abandonment of the motion or action except upon 'good cause' . The Supreme Court signed the judgment. The Appellate Division reversed the judgment on the law, vacated it, and dismissed the underlying claim as abandoned pursuant to Rule 202.48 because the wife failed to provide any explanation for her untimely submission of the proposed judgment other than 'law office failure' (Farkas v. Farkas, 40 AD3d 207, 207, 211 [2007]). The Court of Appeals reversed in an opinion by Judge Read, which found that even though the wife was entitled to enter a judgment against the husband for the Chemical Bank monies, without a limitations period, under the terms of the 1999 amended judgment the wife's attorney unnecessarily moved for an order allowing the wife to enter a judgment against the husband for the Chemical Bank monies. The Court held that Rule 202.48 cannot deprive a party of a judgment where it has been improperly or unnecessarily invoked in the first place. The Court held that the 1996 judgment and the 1999 amended judgment were not subject to Rule 202.48's 60-day requirement. These judgments carried out the 1996 decision, which directed the parties to 'settle judgment.' The decretal paragraph specifically addressing the Chemical Bank monies provided that the wife was 'entitled to enter a money judgment against the husband for the total amount due and owing to Chemical Bank without further order'. The Court held that this paragraph set out a 'simple judgment for a sum of money which speaks for itself,' and therefore fell outside the ambit of Rule 202.48 (citing Funk v. Barry, 89 NY2d 364, 367 [1996]). Judge Read pointed out that the Court emphasized in Funk, that the 'settle' or 'submit' trigger for the 60-day limitation of Rule 202.48(a) 'does not purport to govern the flow of the entry process, which is a ministerial recording function that is separate and distinct from the procedure of obtaining the court's signature on a proposed judgment'. (See www.brandeslaw.com for expanded discussion)

Court of Appeals Rejects Interpretation of Term "Cohabitation" in Parties Separation Agreement as Having Meaning which Contemplates "Changed Economic Circumstances"

In Graev v Graev, —NY3d—, --- N.E.2d ----, 2008 WL 4620698 (N.Y.) the Court of Appeals rejected an interpretation of the term "Cohabitation" in the parties separation agreement as having a meaning which contemplates "changed economic circumstances", or, is necessarily determined by whether a "couple shares household expenses or functions as a single economic unit". It held that no plain meaning could be ascribed to the term in the parties agreement, which provided for the termination of maintenance upon the occurrence of any of four "termination events"; namely, the wife's remarriage or death, the husband's death, or "[t]he cohabitation of the Wife with an unrelated adult for a period of sixty (60) substantially consecutive days." The agreement did not define "cohabitation. The Court referred the matter back to the trial court to determine the meaning of the term after a hearing. Rather than articulating a "clear rule of law", which was hardly fair to those who may have used the word "cohabitation" in an extant separation agreement, intending the meaning ascribed to it by those Appellate Division cases requiring financial interdependence, it stated, in a footnote that the wisest rule is for parties in the future to make their intention clear by more careful drafting. (See www.brandeslaw.com for expanded discussion)

First Department, in Case of First Impression, Holds that Value of Stock Owned By Husband Should Be Reduced By Embedded Taxes. Wife Awarded $27 million in Assets.

In Wechsler v Wechsler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4635832 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) all the shares of a holding company, Wechsler & Co., Inc. (WCI), a Subchapter C corporation, were owned by the husband. The issue was the extent to which the value of the company should be reduced to reflect the federal and state taxes embedded in the securities it owned, which constituted virtually all of its assets, due to the unrealized appreciation of those securities. WCI had ceased trading securities for the accounts of customers and bought and sold securities solely for its own account. All of the experts agreed that WCI should be valued on a net asset basis by determining what a willing buyer would pay a willing seller, with neither being under a compulsion to buy or sell, and with both having reasonable knowledge of the relevant facts. The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice James M. McGuire, modified the judgment. He noted that Supreme Court adopted a "baseline" value of $70,848,107 on the date the action was commenced. That baseline value was determined by the neutral expert before any deduction for embedded taxes and then made adjustments to it that differed in various ways from the adjustments made by the neutral expert. The most significant adjustment was on the issue of the extent of the reduction for embedded taxes. Supreme Court rejected the approach of the Fifth Circuit in Matter of Dunn v Commissioner of Internal Revenue (301 F3d 339 [5th Cir2002]), the approach embraced by the neutral expert. Pursuant to that approach, consistent with the assumption inherent in the net asset valuation methodology, an actual sale of the corporation's assets is assumed to occur on the valuation date. The value of the corporation is reduced on a dollar-for-dollar basis by the full amount of the tax liability that would arise from the sale of the assets by the hypothetical buyer on the valuation date. Both the neutral expert and the husband's expert testified, and the wife's expert did not dispute, that if the securities were sold as of the date of commencement, the effective tax rate would be 41.74% of the baseline value of $70,848,107. Under the valuation methodology adopted in Dunn, the date-of-commencement value of WCI would be reduced by $29,572,000 (41.74% of $70,848,107). Instead, Supreme Court accepted the approach of the wife's expert and reduced the baseline value of WCI by 11% of $70,848,107 ($7,793,292). That percentage approximated what Supreme Court and the wife's expert denominated the "historical" rate of the annual taxes paid by WCI, a rate determined by comparing the average annual taxes paid by WCI to its average annual gross revenue, i.e., its revenue before all applicable deductions for its various costs of doing business (including the salaries of its employees). The Supreme Court adopted a baseline value of the assets as of the commencement date and reduced that value by an "historical" tax rate of the corporation. The Appellate Division rejected this approach because, among other things, it did not accord with common sense, conflicted with the reasoned testimony of both the neutral expert and the husband's expert and was without precedential support. It held that Supreme Court overvalued WCI by $21,778,708 (the difference between the $7,793,292 reduction in value based on the "historical" tax rate methodology and the $29,572,000 reduction that would result under the methodology adopted in Dunn). Supreme Court awarded the wife over $27 million in assets, reflecting approximately 88% of the other marital assets. It awarded conditional, durational maintenance to the wife of $46,666 a month and directed the husband to pay various expenses, including the mortgage and taxes relating to the home awarded to the wife, until the wife received the specific assets awarded to her and the first payment on account of the distributive award. Relying on the decisions in Gad v. Gad (283 A.D.2d 200 [2001]) and Pickard v. Pickard (33 AD3d 2002 [2006], appeal dismissed 7 NY3d 897 [2006]), the husband argued that because Supreme Court did not make a permanent maintenance award he was entitled to a credit against the distributive award in the amount of all the temporary maintenance payments he made. The husband contended that he paid a total of $3,000,987 in temporary maintenance. The Appellate Division held that the husband's reliance on Gad and Pickering was misplaced and that he was not entitled to any credit for the temporary maintenance payments he made, regardless of the amount of those payments, because there was no finding that pendente lite award was excessive. The mere determination by Supreme Court not to award permanent maintenance cannot be equated with a finding that the pendente lite maintenance award was excessive. Supreme Court did not make such a finding either expressly or implicitly. The determination not to award permanent maintenance was based in part on the ground that permanent maintenance was unnecessary given the wife's vastly different economic circumstances as a result of the equal distribution of the marital property. In addition, Supreme Court also based this determination on the consequences of the distribution of the overwhelming preponderance of the liquid marital assets to the wife. (See www.brandeslaw.com for expanded discussion)

October 16, 2008

Strong Public Policy Against Recoupment of Pendente Lite and Permanent Maintenance Paid Pursuant Order or Judgment Set Aside on Appeal

In Rader v Rader, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2008 WL 4354008 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in January 2006 the plaintiff stopped paying the defendant maintenance, contending that the parties' judgment of divorce entered September 18, 1998, required him to pay maintenance only for a period of 10 years, retroactive to the commencement of the divorce action in January 1996. The defendant claimed that she was entitled to maintenance until July 2007--10 years after the date of the decision awarding her maintenance. She thus moved for leave to enter a money judgment for maintenance allegedly accruing after the plaintiff ceased paying maintenance in January 2006. In an order dated July 7, 2006, the Supreme Court granted the defendant's motion, directed the plaintiff to pay the defendant maintenance for a period of 10 years, retroactive to July 1997, when the decision awarding her maintenance was made, and granted the defendant leave to enter a money judgment for maintenance arrears, plus the sum of $1,500 as an attorney's fee. A money judgment was subsequently entered on July 26, 2006. The plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from both the order dated July 7, 2006, and the money judgment, and obtained a statutory stay of enforcement of the money judgment pending appeal by posting an undertaking for the amount of the judgment. Thereafter, the defendant moved to hold the plaintiff in contempt for failing to make maintenance payments that became due, subsequent to entry of the money judgment, as a consequence of the order dated July 7, 2006. In an order dated November 30, 2006, the plaintiff was held in contempt and the defendant was awarded the sum of $2,000 as an attorney's fee. Although the plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from that order, he did not seek a stay of its enforcement. Pursuant to the terms of the order dated November 30, 2006, the plaintiff paid the sum of $54,000 in maintenance for the period from July 2006 until April 2007, plus the sum of $2,000 as an attorney's fee, for a total sum of $56,000. In a decision and order dated April 17, 2007, the Appellate Division reversed the money judgment, and accordingly modified the order dated July 7, 2006, upon finding that the plaintiff's obligation to pay maintenance terminated on January 9, 2006, or 10 years after the divorce action was commenced (see Rader v. Rader, 39 A.D.3d 734, 835 N.Y.S.2d 289). In a decision and order on motion dated August 13, 2007, the Court dismissed the plaintiff's appeal from the order dated November 30, 2006, for lack of prosecution. By notice of motion dated June 20, 2007, the plaintiff moved for reimbursement of the sums of $54,000 in maintenance and $2,000 in attorneys' fees he paid pursuant to the order dated November 30, 2006. In opposition, the defendant noted, inter alia, that the plaintiff never perfected his appeal from the order dated November 30, 2006, and that she already spent the disputed $56,000 on her living expenses and attorneys' fees. The Supreme Court, in an order entered September 20, 2007, denied the plaintiff's motion. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that there is a strong public policy against recoupment of both pendente lite and permanent maintenance paid pursuant to a court order or judgment which is subsequently set aside on appeal. The reason for this policy is that maintenance and child support payments are "deemed to have been devoted to that purpose, and no funds exist from which one may recoup moneys so expended" if the award is thereafter reversed or modified (Coleman v. Coleman, 61 A.D.2d at 757, 402 N.Y.S.2d 6). Although there are exceptions to this general rule (see Arcabascio v. Arcabascio, 48 A.D.3d 606, 852 N.Y.S.2d 352; Vigliotti v. Vigliotti, 260 A.D.2d 470, 688 N.Y.S.2d 198; Samu v. Samu, 257 A.D.2d 656, 684 N.Y.S.2d 295; Stimmel v. Stimmel, 163 A.D.2d 381, 558 N.Y.S.2d 112; Jacobs v. Patterson, 143 A.D.2d 397, 398, 532 N.Y.S.2d 429), such exceptions were not applicable. The Court noted that if there are unpaid arrears of other obligations, such as carrying charges for the marital residence, the payor spouse may be granted a credit against those arrears for maintenance paid pursuant to an order which was reversed on appeal (see Samu v. Samu, 257 A.D.2d 656, 684 N.Y.S.2d 295). The appeal from the order dated November 30, 2006, was dismissed for lack of prosecution, and the court declined to exercise its discretion to consider any issue which could have been raised on appeal therefrom.

Facts That Mother Earned Substantial Income, Parties Never Married, and Father Had Additional Support Obligations Required Court to Reduce Combined Parental Income

In Matter of Gartmond v Conway, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4355410 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father appealed from an order of the Family Court which granted his objections to so much of an order of the same court as, after a hearing, directed him to pay $2,373 in monthly child support, only to the extent of remitting the matter to the Support Magistrate, in effect, to articulate the manner in which the Support Magistrate calculated the amount of child support, and otherwise denied his objections. The Appellate Division found that on review of the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order the Family Court remitted the matter to the Support Magistrate, in effect, to articulate the manner in which the Support Magistrate calculated that sum. At the same time, the Family Court indicated that, on the merits, the father's objections to $2,373 in child support, as fixed by the Support Magistrate, did "not appear to be something that would change the amount of his obligation" once the Support Magistrate articulated her reasons for setting that amount. The Appellate Division agreed that the Support Magistrate should have articulated the manner in which she calculated the amount of the father's child support obligation, and should have explained the application of the "precisely articulated, three-step method for determining child support" pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act (Matter of Cassano v. Cassano, 85 N.Y.2d 649, 652). However, in light of the fact that the record had been sufficiently developed, it deemed it appropriate in the interest of efficiency and judicial economy to avert a remittal to the Support Magistrate, and granted leave to appeal from that part of the Family Court's order which remitted the matter to the Support Magistrate (see Family Ct Act s 1112[a]; Matter of Schmitt v. Berwitz, 228 A.D.2d 604), and conducted its own review of the record. The court recalculated child support. Using the parties' respective gross incomes for the year 2006, as the Support Magistrate it found that the mother earned $182,390 and the father earned $176,333. After making the appropriate deductions for FICA taxes paid by the parties the combined parental income was $341,881. Noting that the Support Magistrate applied the child support percentage to the entire combined parental income in excess of $80,000. While it was a provident exercise of discretion to apply the child support percentage to some of the combined parental income in excess of $80,000, it concluded that under the circumstances presented, which included, inter alia, the facts that the mother earned substantial income, the parties never were married, and the father had additional support obligations, including support obligations for a daughter from a prior marriage, $145,000 represented a more appropriate total combined parental income upon which to apply the child support percentage. Using that total, the father's child support obligation was $1,006 per month, and it modified the order entered September 10, 2007, to sustain the father's objections to that extent. It concluded that, under the circumstances, the father should pay the mother 49% of the expenses for child care, including but not limited to nursery school, day camp, and home child care.

Post Commencement Severance Payments Husbands Separate Property

In Bink v Bink, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4447614 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that held that Supreme Court erred in determining that the husbands severance payments were marital property. Inasmuch as defendant's right to receive those payments did not exist either during the marriage or prior to the commencement of this action, nor did the severance payments constitute compensation for past services, the severance payments were defendant's separate property.

Absent Evidence That Valuation Was Unreasonable or Other Credible Evidence Showing a Different Value, it Should Not Be Disturbed.

In Reed v Reed, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4447646 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the parties were married in 1987 and had three minor children. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly concluded that the trust created by defendant in 1986 prior to the parties' marriage (Quercus Trust) constituted marital property. Defendant "failed to trace the source of the funds in the Quercus Trust with sufficient particularity to rebut the presumption that they were marital property" and, plaintiff established that the entirety of the Quercus Trust was transmuted into marital property as a result of commingling. Nevertheless, the court erred in determining in the alternative that plaintiff was entitled to a portion of the Quercus Trust based on her contributions to its appreciation inasmuch as the alleged contributions of plaintiff to the appreciation of that trust consisted solely of her presence at annual meetings concerning investments. It also held that the court properly determined the value of defendant's business interest in the company in which defendant was a 50% owner. Absent some evidence that the valuation was unreasonable or other credible evidence showing a different value, it should not be disturbed. (Harmon v. Harmon, 173 A.D.2d 98, 107). Supreme Court erred in awarding plaintiff lifetime maintenance, in light of plaintiff's age and work experience. Based on the statutory factors, including plaintiff's education and employment history, as well as the various distributive awards the Appellate Division concluded that plaintiff was capable of future self-support, and thus was entitled only to durational maintenance for 13 years from the date of the amended judgment. It agreed with defendant that the court erred in failing to provide for a reduction in the amount of his life insurance policy as his child support and maintenance obligations decreased and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine the amount of life insurance defendant must maintain to secure his child support and maintenance obligations.

October 1, 2008

DRL 240 (1-b) Applies Only to Basic Child Support, Which Does Not Include College Expenses

In Colucci v Colucci, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4170019 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff mother and the defendant father, who had two children were divorced in 1997. In their stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce they agreed to be bound by, and for the stipulation to comply with, the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act. The stipulation provided, under the section entitled "CHILD SUPPORT," that the father must pay the mother a set amount per month in basic child support, which amount was determined in accordance with the CSSA. It further provided, in the child support section, that the parties are to share on a pro rata basis any child care expenses incurred by the mother that are necessary for her work or for school leading to work, as well as the costs associated with the children's extracurricular activities. It also provided, in the child support section, that the parties are to exchange their federal income tax returns annually in order to make any necessary adjustments to the father's basic child support obligation and to the parties' pro rata basis underlying the amount of child support that would be due under the CSSA. Under a separate section entitled "COLLEGE EXPENSES," the father agreed to be solely responsible for the children's college education expenses. In June 2007, 10 years after the stipulation was executed and 2 months before the older child was to start college, the father moved, inter alia, for a downward modification of his obligation to pay for the children's college education expenses. Claiming that his income had decreased and the mother's had increased since the divorce, the father asked the Supreme Court to "reallocate" the parties' respective obligations with respect to the children's college education expenses, based on the parties' current incomes, so that he would pay 62% of the expenses, and the mother would pay the remainder. The mother contended that, in accordance with the stipulation of settlement, the parties agreed that the father would pay 100% of the children's college education expenses regardless of any change in the parties' income. Supreme Court granted the father's motion to the extent of directing the father to pay 75% of college expenses. The Appellate Division reversed. The parties' stipulation of settlement expressly obligated the father to pay 100% of the children's college education expenses, in addition to, and separate and apart from, his obligation to pay child support. Notably, the provision in the stipulation requiring the father to pay 100% of the children's college education expenses was set forth in a section of the stipulation separate from the section containing his obligation to pay child support, and the two sections did not reference each other in any manner. Only the section pertaining to child support contained provisions regarding reallocation of the parties' respective obligations should there be any change in the income of either one. Under the circumstances, it was apparent that the parties agreed that college education expenses would not constitute a component of their obligation to pay basic child support. It was also apparent from the stipulation of settlement that the parties intended that the father's obligation to pay 100% of the children's college education expenses was not subject to modification based on any change in the parties' respective incomes. While Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h) requires stipulations and agreements to contain a provision that the parties were advised of the CSSA and knowingly "opted-out" of its provisions that provision specifically applies only to "[b]asic child support," which generally does not include college education expenses. Under such circumstances, there was no basis for the court to interfere with the parties' contractual agreement requiring the father to pay 100% of the children's college expenses.

No Authority to Order Sale of Separate Property Marital Residence

In Kilkenny v Kilkenny, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4260834 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded maintenance to terminate on September 1, 2007. The Appellate Division extended the duration of the award of maintenance to provide the wife with sufficient time to become self-supporting. Considering the wife's education and age, the number of years she had been out of the work force raising the parties' two minor children, the standard of living of the parties during the marriage, and the present and future earning capacities of both parties, the duration of the award of maintenance was extended to the earlier of February 1, 2012, the death of either party, or the wife's remarriage. The parties' younger child would be 14 years old on that date and no longer in need of child care. The Supreme Court also erred in determining that the $200-per week maintenance payment should commence as of January 1, 2007. The award of maintenance should have been retroactive to May 2, 2005, the date of the commencement of the action. The husband was given an appropriate credit against the retroactive obligation created by this modification (see Grasso v. Grasso, 47 AD3d 762). The Appellate Division found that the amount of the unpaid balance of a loan that the husband obtained in connection with the college education of the second of his two daughters from his prior marriage, in the sum of $32,000, should not have been included in the calculation of marital debt. The Appellate Division held that the marital residence was the separate property of the wife, and remained her separate property. Since it found that it was the wife's separate property, and not subject to the imposition of a constructive trust, there was no authority to order its sale for the purpose of equitably distributing the proceeds. However, the husband was entitled to an equitable share in the increase in the value of the marital residence during the marriage, where the appreciation in the value of the marital residence was attributable to the joint efforts of the parties. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the parties equal shares in the increase in the value of the marital residence. Supreme Court also determined the husband was entitled to an award of $30,269.50, representing his 50% share of the reduction in the principal of the mortgage obligation referable to the residence, until May 2, 2005, the date of the commencement of the action. Supreme Court also determined that the husband was entitled to 50% of the reduction in the principal remaining on the mortgage debt, in order to account for the mortgage and real property tax payments he made from the commencement of the action on May 2, 2005, until the termination date of the pendente lite order on December 31, 2006. Those payments were not made with marital funds. In light of the further modification made to the award of maintenance, he was also entitled to a credit for all of the mortgage and real property tax payments he made pursuant to the pendente lite order (see Grasso v. Grasso, 47 AD3d 762). However, the credit was limited to the principal portion of the mortgage payments plus the real property tax payments, since the husband's mortgage interest payments was taken into consideration in determining that aspect of the appeal related to arrears for "utility" payments. The husband came into the marriage possessed of certain funds maintained in 401k, Individual Retirement, and Cash Management accounts. The value of those accounts at the commencement of the marriage was $147,139. During the marriage, the husband expended approximately $40,800 from those accounts for the education of one of his daughters from a prior marriage. At the time of the commencement of the action, there was $209,647 in the financial accounts. The husband's separate property interest in the financial accounts was $106,339. There was a significant reduction in the balance of those accounts by the time of trial. It was appropriate to value the accounts as of the time of the commencement of the action. The marital portion of the accounts was $103,308. The wife was thus entitled to, and should have been awarded, a 50% share of that sum, or $51,654.

Children Not Parties To Stipulation of Settlement

In Baranek v Baranek, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 4260896 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding the defendant summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground that the parties' minor children were necessary or indispensable parties who should have been joined in the action. In this plenary action to set aside the stipulation of settlement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the children were not parties to the contract whose rights may be prejudiced by the rescission thereof. It also held that Supreme Court improperly searched the record and awarded the defendant summary judgment dismissing the other causes of action in the complaint, since the viability of those causes of action was not an issue presented in the plaintiff's motion papers. The parties' stipulation of settlement, set forth on the record in open court on October 7, 2004, stated that the parties had been made aware of the Child Support Standards Act and stated the amount of basic child support pursuant to the CSSA was $861 per month, which was less than the $900 per month awarded. However, the stipulation did not recite that the parties were aware that the application of the CSSA guidelines would result in the calculation of the presumptively correct amount of support and the parties' reasons for their departure from the guidelines. Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(h) requires these specific recitals, which were not in the parties' stipulation. The recitals in the findings of fact and conclusions of law and the judgment of divorce cannot rectify these defects since those documents were prepared and submitted by the attorney for the defendant approximately 11 months after the stipulation was entered into. The provision of the stipulation of settlement which awarded basic child support of $900 per month was not enforceable and was vacated. Similarly, the provision of the parties' stipulation which provided that "[t]he parties will split all future unreimbursed medical expenses for the children" was set aside on the ground that that obligation is "directly connected with the basic child support calculation" (Cimons v. Cimons, 53 AD3d 125). However, it did not appear that the basic child support provision was intertwined with other provisions of the stipulation, which included custody and visitation, equitable distribution of property, and a waiver of maintenance based upon equitable distribution of property. Accordingly, only the provisions awarding the defendant basic child support of $900 per month, and the provision which stated that "[t]he parties will split all future unreimbursed medical expenses for the children," was set aside.

Order Directing Counsel Fee Hearing Not Appealable As of Right

In Akerman v Akerman, 53 A.D.3d 633, 862 N.Y.S.2d 383 (2 Dept 2008) the Second Department held that an order which directs a judicial hearing to aid in the disposition of a motion is not appealable as of right because it does not decide the motion, and does not affect a substantial right. Therefore, it dismissed the appeal from the order which directed a counsel fee hearing.

September 15, 2008

Evidence of False Allegations of Physical Abuse Which Interfere with Parental Rights, Is So Inconsistent with the Best Interests of the Child That it Raises, by Itself, a Strong Probability That the Offending Party Is Unfit to Act as a Custodial Parent

In Mohen v Mohen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2609358 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that Supreme Court's award of custody to the mother lacked a sound and substantial basis and had to be set aside. Supreme Court gave insufficient attention to facts and evidence that were of such significant collective magnitude as to warrant a custody determination in favor of the father. The Supreme Court found, with support in the record, that the mother, on at least one occasion, had filed false charges of physical abuse against the father. The mother made numerous false charges against the father. There were four incidents of physical abuse accusations by the mother against the father, in August 2004, December 2004, January 2005, and December 2005. All of the Family Court petitions, when filed, apparently were withdrawn or dismissed. All of the mother's reports to child protective authorities were investigated and determined to be "unfounded." Moreover, expert medical testimony in the record strongly suggested that, regarding the January 2005 alleged incident, the mother manufactured proof of physical injury to herself. She admitted to the forensic examiner, and confirmed at trial, that the January 2005 incident of alleged physical abuse "might have been an accident." As a result of the January 2005 accusations, a temporary order of protection was issued against the father that prevented contact between the father and the child for approximately one month.

The mother accused the father of having physically abused the child in December 2005 after a visitation exchange, and made a report to Child Protective Services. Records from Maimonides Hospital, where the child was examined the day after the exchange, found the child to be physically normal. The mother's manipulative conduct demonstrated a purposeful placement of her self-interest above the interests of others. Evidence of false allegations of physical abuse which interfere with parental rights, is so inconsistent with the best interests of the child that it raises, by itself, a strong probability that the offending party is unfit to act as a custodial parent. By contrast, there was no evidence that any calls the father made to the police against the mother were baseless. Supreme Court failed to attribute adequate significance to the determination that the mother had made at least one false claim, though the record evidences more than one such claim, and improperly equated that evidence with markedly less egregious conduct of the father. The trial court erred in finding that the mother, rather than the father, would better foster the child's relationship with the noncustodial parent. While the parenting skills of both the mother and the father are subject to criticism, there was sufficient evidence from which to conclude that the father demonstrated an ability to foster post-divorce parent-child relationships, having done so with regard to his two older children from an earlier marriage. Moreover, a conclusion that the mother would more successfully foster a child/noncustodial parent relationship was insupportable, in light of her false allegations of physical abuse against the father. The child's best interests were fostered by awarding custody to the father. The father worked from a home office and would be more readily available than the mother to meet the child's daily and immediate needs. The judicial preference of keeping siblings together, where possible, in order to encourage close familial relationships, is firmly established. While there was clearly an age difference between the parties' child and his two half-siblings, the numerous benefits the child could derive from the development of a relationship with the older siblings should not have been summarily disregarded. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in granting the mother maintenance of $3,500 per month for five years. However, it erred in failing to include a provision that the award of maintenance shall terminate upon the death of either party or the mother's remarriage, whichever shall occur sooner.

Where There Is an Inconsistency Between a Judgment and the Decision Upon Which it Is Based, the Decision Controls, and The Inconsistency May Be Corrected on Appeal.

In Charles v Charles, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2609384 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's award of lifetime maintenance to the wife was an improvident exercise of discretion. In view of the wife's age, the sizable distributive award she received, and her equal share of the husband's retirement benefits, the award of lifetime maintenance was inappropriate. It found that an award of $12,500 per month in maintenance for a period of 15 years was appropriate under the circumstances. It agreed with the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court should have directed the defendant to maintain life insurance in her favor to secure his maintenance obligation and the distribution of the plaintiff's share of the value of the defendant's partnership interest. It noted that the judgment appealed from did not contain a provision directing the husband to pay for the college expenses of the children. In the decision upon which the judgment was based, the Supreme Court stated that "the [husband's] income is more than adequate to pay for [the children's] college educations." The Supreme Court also found that the husband should receive a credit against his child support obligation during any period the children attended school away from home. The husband conceded at oral argument that where there is an inconsistency between a judgment and the decision upon which it is based, the decision controls, and such an inconsistency may be corrected on appeal. The Appellate Division, inter alia, modified the judgment by adding provisions directing the defendant to pay the college expenses for each of the parties' children until each child reaches the age of 21, and directing that the defendant shall receive a credit toward his child support obligation during any period the children attend school away from home and by adding a provision directing the defendant to maintain a life insurance policy for the benefit of the plaintiff in an amount not less than $1,500,000 during years 1 through 5 of his maintenance obligation, and during years 6 through 10, in the amount of not less than $750,000, and during years 11 through 15 in an amount not less than $500,000.

An Award of an Attorney's Fee Is Not Authorized in a Proceeding for Grandparent Visitation.

In Gold v Gold, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2609350 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the appellant Florence Gold (grandmother) filed a petition seeking modification of the visitation provisions of a settlement agreement which allowed her supervised visitation with her grandchildren in Dutchess County. Family Court denied her petition without conducting a hearing. Upon the grandmother's appeal the Appellate Division affirmed that order, holding that the grandmother had failed to make a sufficient evidentiary showing of a material change in circumstances which would entitle her to a hearing (see Matter of Gold v. Gold, 47 AD3d 714). While that appeal was pending, the grandmother filed a motion for leave to renew her petition in the Family Court, contending that her health had deteriorated, making it impossible for her to travel from her home in Bronx County for visitation in Dutchess County. The respondents Gene Gold and Leslie Gold (parents) opposed that motion and cross-moved, inter alia, for an award of an attorney's fee pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1, on the ground that the grandmother had engaged in "frivolous conduct" in pursuing litigation meant to harass or maliciously injure them. Family Court denied the grandmother's motion for leave to renew, finding that she had failed to submit new evidence of a deterioration in her health, and granted the cross motion for the award of an attorney's fee of $2,430.34. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that a motion for leave to renew is addressed to the sound discretion of the motion court, and the requirement that a motion for renewal be based upon newly-discovered facts is a flexible one. A court, in its discretion, may thus, in certain situations, grant renewal upon facts known to the moving party at the time of the original motion. Under the circumstances of this case, the Family Court should have exercised its discretion and granted the grandmother's motion for leave to renew. The 93- year-old grandmother averred that she was physically unable to travel to Dutchess County due to a deterioration in her health. She submitted medical test results and unsworn letters from her doctor, stating that the amount of travel required for visitation was not recommended due to her ailments, which included a severe form of arthritis and numerous past orthopedic surgeries. In her reply papers, the grandmother averred that, on June 22, 2007, she fell, fractured her pelvis and reinjured the ligaments in her knee. She submitted another letter from her doctor stating that travel was not recommended. Because the fall occurred after the grandmother filed her initial motion papers, her inclusion of this additional evidence in her reply papers did not preclude its consideration by the court. To establish entitlement to an evidentiary hearing on her petition for modification of the visitation provisions of the settlement agreement, the grandmother was required to make an evidentiary showing of a material change in circumstances sufficient to warrant a hearing. Taken together, the grandmother's submissions met this standard, and her motion to renew should have been granted to the extent of remitting the matter for an evidentiary hearing on her petition solely to determine whether a material change in circumstances warrants modification of the visitation provisions of the settlement agreement so as to provide for supervised visitation with the grandmother at an agency facility in Bronx County. Upon remittal for hearing, the standard to be applied in determining whether a change in location of the visitation is warranted remains the best interests of the children. In light of this determination and the history of the proceedings between the parties, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding an attorney's fee to the parents. An award of an attorney's fee is not authorized in a proceeding for grandparent visitation. Here, although the visitation agreement was included within an order of protection on consent, the grandmother sought modification of the terms of visitation only. Contrary to the parents' contention, the grandmother's conduct was not "frivolous," as that term is defined in 22 NYCRR 130-1.1.

September 1, 2008

Contribution of Separate Property in Order to Reduce Mortgage on Marital Residence and to Pay off Second Mortgage Retains its Separate Character and Thus Is Not Subject to Equitable Distribution

In Mirand v Mirand, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2714085 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly confirmed that part of the Referee's report "recommending" that plaintiff shall have a credit in the sum of $54,770.58, representing his contribution of separate property in order to reduce the mortgage on the marital residence and to pay off a second mortgage in its entirety on the marital residence. That contribution retains its separate character and thus is not subject to equitable distribution. However the court erred in confirming that part of the Referee's report "recommending" a credit to plaintiff in the amount of $220, based on his payment for an appraisal of the marital residence. That amount was merely payment for a service, rather than a contribution to the value of the marital residence that plaintiff was entitled to recover. The court erred in confirming that part of the Referee's report "recommending" that plaintiff be awarded possession of the parties' 2004 Buick as his separate property. That asset was purchased during the marriage and, although plaintiff contributed the majority of its purchase price, defendant transferred title to another vehicle to plaintiff and paid him an additional $2,000. It concluded that the Buick constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution. The value of the Buick was $20,425 at the time of trial, and that amount was distributed equally between them. Inasmuch as possession of the vehicle was awarded to plaintiff, it reduced the amount of his credit by $8,212.50, i.e., one half of the value of the Buick less the $2,000 that the Referee properly determined was contributed by defendant as a down payment for the Buick.

A Credit Against Child Support for College Expenses Is Not Mandatory but Depends upon the Facts and Circumstances in the Particular Case, Taking into Account the Needs of the Custodial Parent to Maintain a Household and Provide Certain Necessaries

In Pistilli v Pistilli, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2713989 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) following the entry of a judgment that, inter alia, granted plaintiff a divorce, plaintiff moved to modify the judgment by "[d]istributing the actual and anticipated college education costs associated with the parties' children," specifically the parties' daughter, between the parties. Defendant cross-moved for an order directing that he pay 60% of the college education expenses of the parties' daughter and reducing his child support obligation accordingly. Defendant appealed from an order requiring him to pay 80% of the daughter's college expenses based on Supreme Court's determination that defendant "shall contribute to college costs 'in accordance with his percentage' " of the parties' combined parental income and denying his cross motion seeking a reduction in his child support obligation. Pursuant to an oral stipulation of the parties that was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, the parties "agreed to contribute to [their children's college expenses] as they are then financially able." The Appellate Division held that the court erred in failing to consider defendant's maintenance obligation in calculating the percentage of defendant's contribution to the daughter's college expenses. After subtracting from defendant's income the amount of taxable maintenance paid to plaintiff as indicated on the parties' respective 2005 tax returns, which were used by the court in determining the parties' respective incomes, it concluded that defendant's percentage of the combined parental income was 64% rather than 80%, and thus defendant's pro rata share of the daughter's college expenses was reduced from 80% to 64%. It rejected defendant's contention that the court erred in determining that he was entitled to a credit against his child support obligation only in the amount of his pro rata share of the daughter's college meal plan. It held that a credit against child support for college expenses is not mandatory but depends upon the facts and circumstances in the particular case, taking into account the needs of the custodial parent to maintain a household and provide certain necessities. Because plaintiff had to maintain a household for the daughter during the daughter's school breaks and weekend visits, it could not be said that defendant was entitled to a credit for the daughter's rooming expenses. Nevertheless, inasmuch as we it reduced defendant's pro rata share of the daughter's college expenses from 80% to 64%, defendant's child support credit based on the college meal plan had to reflect that reduction and it modified the order accordingly.

Proper to Grant Cruelty Divorce in Long Marriage Where Continuous Course of Misconduct. Error Not to Award Custodial Parent Exclusive Occupancy of Home.

In Stacey v Stacey, 52 A.D.3d 1219, 860 N.Y.S.2d 350 (4 Dept 2008) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment that granted defendant wife a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The Court held that defendant was required to establish that the parties suffered from more than strained, unpleasant relations and incompatibility and, in this marriage of long duration, a higher degree of proof was required to establish cruel and inhuman treatment because what could be viewed as substantial misconduct in a marriage of short duration might be only 'transient discord' in a marriage of many years. It noted however, the statement of the Court of Appeals that, "even in [a long-term] marriage 'substantial misconduct' might consist of one violent episode such as a severe beating" (Brady, 64 N.Y.2d at 345, 486 N.Y.S.2d 891, 476 N.E.2d 290). Defendant testified on direct examination concerning an incident that occurred approximately five months before the commencement of the action, during which plaintiff called defendant vulgar names and repeatedly struck her on the side and back of her head. The incident caused defendant to seek medical treatment, and she obtained an order of protection against plaintiff. Defendant also testified that plaintiff verbally abused her before she left for work concerning her appearance and the clothes that she was wearing. On cross-examination, defendant further testified that, throughout the course of the marriage she was hit or slapped by plaintiff "every time the dishes weren't done or the laundry wasn't done. According to defendant, plaintiff's conduct was continuous and not an " 'isolated act of mistreatment'. Thus, the court properly granted defendant a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff that the court erred in directing the immediate sale of the marital residence and in failing to award him exclusive use and occupancy of the marital residence until the parties' youngest child attains the age of 18, and modified the judgment accordingly. Plaintiff was awarded custody of the parties' children and thus, under the circumstances of this case, he was entitled to such exclusive use and occupancy. It stated: "Courts now express a preference for allowing a custodial parent to remain in the marital residence until the youngest child becomes 18 unless such parent can obtain comparable housing at a lower cost or is financially incapable of maintaining the marital residence, or either spouse is in immediate need of his or her share of the sale proceeds". Here, there was no evidence in the record that plaintiff, the custodial parent, could have obtained comparable, less expensive housing in the same area or that he was financially incapable of maintaining the residence, nor was there evidence that defendant was in immediate need of her share of the proceeds from the sale of the marital residence.

Maintenance Payments Mother Received from Father That Year Improperly Excluded from Her Income for Purpose of Calculating Her Child Support Obligation in Modification Proceeding

In the Matter of Kruenkamp v. Kruenkamp, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 3063675 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father, joint custodial parent of the child, filed a petition seeking child support from the mother after the child, who had resided with the mother since the parties' divorce in 1997, began residing with him in January 2005. The mother's child support obligation was initially set, after a hearing, at $325 per week. Upon the mother's objection to this support order, the Family Court vacated the order, determining, inter alia, that the Support Magistrate erred in including in the mother's income the maintenance payments made to her by the father, and reported on the mother's most recent tax return. Upon remittitur, the Support Magistrate rendered a second support order, dated June 1, 2007, this time excluding from the calculation of the mother's income for purposes of awarding child support, the maintenance payments she received, and upon considering the factors set forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(f), set the mother's child support obligation at $100 per week. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court's determination that, for purposes of awarding child support, the Support Magistrate erred in including, as income to the mother, the maintenance payments she received from the father, was incorrect. The Child Support Standards Act requires the court to establish the parties' basic child support obligation as a function of the "gross (total) income" that is, or should have been, reflected on the party's most recently filed income tax return (Family Ct Act 413[1][b][5][i]). Since the total income reported on the mother's most recently filed tax return included the maintenance payments she had received from the father that year, in the amount of $100,000, that sum was improperly excluded from her income for the purpose of calculating her child support obligation. The cases relied upon by the Family Court were inapposite because the maintenance award, in those cases, was made concurrently with the child support award, and thus, the prospective maintenance payments, when viewed at the time of the decision, did not fall within the definition of 'gross (total) income as should have been or should be reported in the most recent federal income tax return. The Appellate Division concluded that in light of the factors set forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(f)(1) through (10), and particularly the ample financial resources of the father, the fact that the gross income of the mother was substantially less than that of the father, and the mother's provision of support for other family members, that it would be inappropriate to apply the statutory percentage to the parents' combined income in excess of $80,000. It thus calculated the mother's child support obligation to be $338 per week.

August 18, 2008

Use of Marital Assets to Pay for "Basic Living Expenses" Did Not Constitute "Wasteful Dissipation"

In Damas v Damas, 51 A.D.3d 709, 858 N.Y.S.2d 716 (2 Dept 2008) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of divorce which equitably distributed the marital assets, awarded the defendant maintenance of $100 per month for 36 months, and awarded an attorney's fee of $2,500. Given the disparity between the parties' incomes, and the fact that the defendant still needed credits to obtain her nursing degree, the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding her maintenance. The defendant's use of marital assets to pay for "basic living expenses" did not constitute "wasteful dissipation".

Not a Dissipation of Assets for Plaintiff to Decide Not to Try to Make Payments on the Marital Home, or Any Other Home, by Using That Home's Line of Credit to Avoid Foreclosure

In Cooper v Cooper, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2521260 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Special Referee properly credited the neutral forensic accountant to the extent he found that the parties lived a lavish lifestyle based on the mortgaging of most of their assets, and that plaintiff had not improperly dissipated marital assets, with one exception. It was uncontested that at the time plaintiff transferred the couple's Guardian Annuity to his father, it had a cash value of $273,000, and there was no evidence of any consideration for this transfer. Therefore, defendant was entitled to half the value of this marital asset. However, it was not a dissipation of assets for plaintiff to decide not to try to make payments on the marital home, or any other home, by using that home's line of credit to avoid foreclosure. These assets were already burdened with debt, and taking on further debt to pay the mortgages would only have put off the inevitable. While the forensic accountant was not able to account for every expenditure, the record supported his conclusion that the parties' expenditures reasonably approximated the consumption of capital assets. Thus, the Special Referee properly concluded that there was no reason to believe plaintiff secreted marital funds or further dissipated marital assets. The Special Referee also properly found that the property at 1200 Broadway in Manhattan was plaintiff's separate property. It is uncontested that this apartment was purchased prior to the marriage. While a mortgage was taken out on the property during the marriage and was repaid with marital assets, there was no evidence that any of the mortgage proceeds were used to enhance the value of the apartment or that defendant contributed to its value in any way. The record supported the conclusion that the proceeds of this mortgage were used to maintain the couple's extravagant lifestyle, and was tantamount to a loan from this separate property to the marriage. It did not convert the property into a marital asset. The Special Referee also properly found that the property at 222 East 80th Street was defendant's separate property. While defendant testified that this property belonged to her parents, her former lawyer testified that defendant had admitted to him the property was, in fact, hers, but kept in her parents' names.

Proper to Impute $ 1 Million Income to Husband Based upon Payment of Personal Expenses from Business Accounts

In Bean v Bean, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2609149 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1991 and had one child born in 1992. Plaintiff commenced the action for divorce in December 2004. Throughout the course of the litigation, defendant continually disobeyed court mandates and failed to appear on multiple occasions. As a result, the court granted his counsel's motion to withdraw, struck his answer and counterclaims and found him to be in default pursuant to 22 NYCRR 202.27.

On the eve of trial, defendant made an oral motion to change the valuation date of the parties' corporation, The Bean Agency, from the date of commencement of the action to the date of trial and requested permission to present an expert as to valuation. Supreme Court denied the motion in its entirety and clarified that, as a result of the prior order finding defendant to be in default, defendant would be permitted to cross-examine plaintiff's witnesses, but would not be allowed to present evidence himself. After trial the court directed an equal distribution of the marital assets, and awarded nondurational maintenance of $25,000 per month and child support of $9,811 per month. On appeal defendant contended that Supreme Court erred in valuing The Bean Agency as of the date of commencement of the action instead of the date of trial.

The Appellate Division noted that as a general matter, courts have tended to value "active" assets-such as a business-as of the date of commencement, while valuing "passive" assets-which may change in value suddenly due to market forces-as of the date of trial. It found that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in valuing The Bean Agency as of the date of commencement and properly determined that fixing the valuation date as of the date of trial, especially at such a late stage in the proceedings, would be prejudicial to plaintiff, as her retained expert had already valued the business as of the date of commencement. It noted that, as a result of defendant's unilateral abandonment of the business, consistent with his threats to deprive plaintiff of the value thereof, and of his failure to comply with discovery, a date of trial valuation would have been negligible and, therefore, inequitable to plaintiff. The Appellate Division found a sound and substantial support in the record for the court's determination of defendant's income. It noted that a trial court may impute income based upon past employment experience, future earning capacity, and/or the payment of personal expenses from business accounts. It declined to disturb Supreme Court's determination that defendant's annual income for purposes of calculating spousal maintenance and child support was $1 million based upon, among other things, the parties' joint income tax returns, defendant's loan application, demonstrated earning potential (including consideration of his apparent decision to relinquish a lucrative position with Time, Inc.), personal expenditures and income imputed from payments of his personal expenses by and through The Bean Agency. It stated that a spouse's ability to become self-supporting with respect to some standard of living in no way obviates the need for the court to consider the predivorce standard of living; and does not create a per se bar to lifetime maintenance. The fact that a spouse will receive assets by way of equitable distribution will not bar a nondurational maintenance award. The parties were accustomed to an extremely affluent lifestyle in that they had substantial real property holdings, enjoyed a country club membership, employed domestic help, traveled extensively and resided in a multimillion dollar mansion. In 2004, the parties' adjusted gross income for federal income tax purposes was $3,266,348. Following the commencement of this action, defendant unilaterally terminated plaintiff's employment with The Bean Agency and evinced an intent to financially strangle plaintiff and to harm her reputation, thus inhibiting her ability to be self-supporting at a level commensurate with the lavish lifestyle that she enjoyed during the marriage and that defendant had continued to enjoy. Moreover, while there was evidence of plaintiff's educational background and employment experience which would suggest an ability to become self-supporting at some level, there was no proof of the extent of her current earning ability, let alone the possibility that her income could approach the couple's multimillion dollar annual income during the marriage, or the time that would be necessary for her to become reasonably gainfully employed. Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in awarding plaintiff nondurational maintenance. However, based upon the substantial award of equitable distribution to plaintiff, much of which would be received in cash capable of generating income, the amount of maintenance awarded was excessive. It noted that the expenses claimed by plaintiff included $4,000 per month in educational expenses for plaintiff's two older children and $5,000 per month in legal fees. Even assuming that these expenses are accurate, they would not be on-going. Inasmuch as the parties' child would turn 16 in a few months, he would presumably require less parenting, which should enable plaintiff to devote more of her energies to finding employment. It found that plaintiff was entitled to receive sufficient support to enable her to afford such expenses as a country club membership and gym membership that she and the child enjoyed during the marriage, but which they were forced to forgo during the pendency of the action. It reduced plaintiff's maintenance award to $20,000 per month until her receipt of her share of the marital assets as set forth in the judgment of divorce and, thereafter, to $15,000 per month until her death or remarriage. Considering the child support award, it found no error in Supreme Court's determination that plaintiff had no income for child support purposes. Of particular relevance was defendant's unilateral termination of plaintiff from her employment with The Bean Agency, together with the lack of evidence of plaintiff's present earning ability. In determining the amount of child support, Supreme Court properly considered the high standard of living that the child would have enjoyed had the parties remained married, the continued high standard of living afforded the child by defendant during the pendency of the action, the income potential and earning capacity of the parties and the considerable disparity between the parties' incomes. These factors all warranted the consideration of defendant's income over the $80,000 "cap" in determining the amount of child support to be awarded. Nevertheless, there was insufficient support in the record to justify application of the statutory child support percentage of 17% to the entire parental income over $80,000. Aside from general living expenses, there was limited evidence of the child's specific "needs," such as expenses related to his sporting activities, hobbies and education. It found that the application of the statutory child support percentage should be limited to the first $500,000 of parental income and, that the child support award should be reduced to $7,083.33 per month. Plaintiff conceded that Supreme Court erred in failing to direct that the life insurance policy to be maintained by defendant be a declining term policy and the judgment was modified accordingly.

Proper to Award Nondurational Maintenance Where it Was Not Likely That Wife Would Become Self-supporting

In Marino v Marino, 52 A.D.3d 585, 860 N.Y.S.2d 170 (2 Dept 2008) Supreme Court, awarded wife nondurational maintenance of $246.15 per week, and awarded wife an attorney's fee of $7,350. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that in light of the defendant's history of low earnings, her age and her health, as well as the length of the marriage, the Supreme Court properly found that it was not likely that she would become self-supporting, and consequently properly awarded her nondurational maintenance .

August 1, 2008

Divorce or Annulment Now Revokes Any Revocable Disposition or Appointment of Property to a Former Spouse

Under former a divorce did not revoke many revocable dispositions ("testamentary substitutes"), such as lifetime revocable trusts (including Totten Trusts), life insurance policies, or joint tenancies (including joint bank accounts). A divorce did not revoke a power of attorney given to a former Spouse under provisions of the General Obligations Law. Existing EPTL 5-1.4 has been repealed and a new EPTL 5-1.4 is added which provides that a divorce or annulment will revoke any revocable disposition or appointment of property to a former Spouse, including a disposition or appointment by will, by beneficiary designation, or by revocable trust (including a bank account in trust form). It also revokes any revocable provision conferring a power of appointment on the former spouse and any revocable nomination of the former Spouse to serve in a fiduciary or representative capacity, such as nomination of the former Spouse as a personal representative, executor, trustee, guardian, agent, or attorney-in-fact. A divorce would sever joint tenancies between former Spouses (including joint bank accounts) and transform them into tenancies in common. According to the Sponsor's Memorandum the new statute does not change the New York case law concerning the effect of divorce on tenancies by the entirety. (See Kahn v Kahn, 43 NY2d 203 (1977); Anello v Anello, 22 AD2d 694 (1964)). Laws of 2008, Chapter 173, § 2, effective July 7, 2008.

Family Court Act 812 Amended to Allow Granting of Order of Protection to Persons Former Spouses, "Regardless of Whether They Still Reside in the Same Household" and Persons Who Have Been in an "Intimate Relationship"

Family Court Act 812 (1) (c) was amended to include in the list of persons who the court has jurisdiction to grant an order of protection, persons formerly married to one another, "regardless of whether they still reside in the same household" and persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity. Subdivision (e) was added to Family Court Act 812 include in the list of persons who the court has jurisdiction to grant an order of protection, "persons who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time". For purposes of subdivision (e), neither a casual acquaintance nor ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts shall be deemed to constitute an "intimate relationship". Factors the court may consider in determining whether a relationship is an "intimate relationship" include but are not limited to: the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship. Laws of 2008,, Ch 325, § 10, effective July 21, 2008).

DRL 111-c Added to Grant Foreign Adoptions Full Faith and Credit in New York State

Section 111-c was added to the Domestic Relations Law. It provides the same rights to foreign adoptions as adoptions in New York State, provided that either adopting parent is a resident of this state and the validity of the foreign adoption has been verified by the granting of an IR-3 immigrant visa, or a successor immigrant visa, for the child by the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services. It grants foreign adoptions full faith and credit by the courts of New York State and provides that they shall be enforced as if the order were rendered by a court within New York, unless the foreign country violates the fundamental principles of human rights. No action is required. An adoption is considered "final" under the laws of New York state upon either adopting parent being a resident of this state and the granting of an IR-3 immigrant visa, or a successor immigrant visa. However, either adoptive parent or a guardian or a guardian ad litem may register the order in this state with the judge or surrogate of the county in which the adoptive parent or parents reside. It appears that a petition must be filed to register the foreign adoption order. If the court finds that the foreign adoption order meets complies with this section, the court must issue an order of adoption to the party who has petitioned for such an order and upon registration a birth certificate shall be issued. Laws of 2008, Ch 329, §1, effective October 19, 2008.

CSSA Not Complied With Where No indication Mother knew Social Security Not Intended to Displace Father's Child Support Obligation

In Matter of Dorosky v Herald --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2521959 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) pursuant to judgment dated May 17, 1999, which incorporated but did not merge an earlier stipulation, "[t]he parties ... voluntarily agreed to child support for the minor issue of the marriage payable ... through [the father's] Social Security Disability to each child in the amount of $172.00 per month, per child." In 2006 the mother filed petitions to enforce the father's child support obligation and for an upward modification of child support. After a hearing, Family Court sustained the father's objections and vacated the Support Magistrate's order. The Appellate Division held that although parties are permitted to "opt out" of the requirements of the Child Support Standards Act that decision must be made "knowingly". Compliance with the CSSA guidelines requires "that the parties have been fully informed of the provisions of the statute, and of how the guidelines would operate in their individual circumstances". Here, there was no indication that the mother knew, inter alia, that "[a] dependent child's Social Security benefits are ... not intended to displace the obligation" of the father to support his children (Matter of Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d 605, 611) or that Social Security benefits would be payable only until the dependent children reached the age of 18. Accordingly, under the facts of this case, the Support Magistrate properly granted the mother's petitions, and the Support Magistrate's order had to be reinstated.

In High-income Cases Child Support with Respect to Parental Income in Excess of $80,000 Should Be Based on the Child's Actual Needs

In Vladlena B., v Mathias G., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2521283 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied petitioner mother's objections to the Support Magistrate's order directing that the child support obligation be shared equally by the parties and that respondent father pay the monthly sum of $1,566.67 to petitioner for child support as well as half of the child's unreimbursed medical expenses. It held that the court's imputation of equal income to both parties was amply supported by the record. The testimony supported the magistrate's findings that petitioner maintained a high standard of living and received regular, consistent and recurring financial support from her ex-husband and family. In high-income cases, the proper determination for an award of child support with respect to parental income in excess of $80,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and the amount required for a lifestyle appropriate for the child, not the wealth of one or both parties (see Matter of Brim v. Combs, 25 AD3d 691, 693 [2006], lv denied 6 NY3d 713 [2006]). Petitioner failed to provide evidence of the child's actual expenses, other than testimony found to be incredible. The court set a fair sum of child support ($3,133.34 per month), of which respondent was ordered to pay half.

Not a Dissipation of Assets for Plaintiff to Decide Not to Try to Make Payments on the Marital Home, or Any Other Home, by Using That Home's Line of Credit to Avoid Foreclosure

In Cooper v Cooper, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2521260 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Special Referee properly credited the neutral forensic accountant to the extent he found that the parties lived a lavish lifestyle based on the mortgaging of most of their assets, and that plaintiff had not improperly dissipated marital assets, with one exception. It was uncontested that at the time plaintiff transferred the couple's Guardian Annuity to his father, it had a cash value of $273,000, and there was no evidence of any consideration for this transfer. Therefore, defendant was entitled to half the value of this marital asset. However, it was not a dissipation of assets for plaintiff to decide not to try to make payments on the marital home, or any other home, by using that home's line of credit to avoid foreclosure. These assets were already burdened with debt, and taking on further debt to pay the mortgages would only have put off the inevitable. While the forensic accountant was not able to account for every expenditure, the record supported his conclusion that the parties' expenditures reasonably approximated the consumption of capital assets. Thus, the Special Referee properly concluded that there was no reason to believe plaintiff secreted marital funds or further dissipated marital assets. The Special Referee also properly found that the property at 1200 Broadway in Manhattan was plaintiff's separate property. It is uncontested that this apartment was purchased prior to the marriage. While a mortgage was taken out on the property during the marriage and was repaid with marital assets, there was no evidence that any of the mortgage proceeds were used to enhance the value of the apartment or that defendant contributed to its value in any way. The record supported the conclusion that the proceeds of this mortgage were used to maintain the couple's extravagant lifestyle, and was tantamount to a loan from this separate property to the marriage. It did not convert the property into a marital asset. The Special Referee also properly found that the property at 222 East 80th Street was defendant's separate property. While defendant testified that this property belonged to her parents, her former lawyer testified that defendant had admitted to him the property was, in fact, hers, but kept in her parents' names.

July 16, 2008

Court of Appeals Holds That Commencement Date of Prior Discontinued Divorce Action May Not Serve as Valuation Date for Marital Property in Later Divorce Action.

In Mesholam v Mesholam, 6/27/2008 NYLJ 30, (col. 1) the Court of Appeals, in an Opinion by Judge Pigott, held that the commencement of a prior, discontinued divorce action may not serve as the valuation date for marital property for purposes of equitable distribution in a later divorce action. Courts must use the commencement date of the later, successful action as the earliest valuation date for marital property. However, the circumstances surrounding the commencement of the earlier action can and should be considered as a factor by the trial court, among other relevant factors, as it attempts to calibrate the ultimate equitable distribution of marital economic partnership property acquired after the start of such an action by either spouse.

The parties were married in 1969. The wife commenced an action for divorce in 1994. The husband answered, but did not counterclaim for divorce. Five years later the Supreme Court granted the wife's motion to discontinue the action. Almost immediately, the husband commenced this action for divorce. After finding that the husband was entitled to a divorce Supreme Court held that the husband's pension must be valued as of the commencement date of the present action, rather than the commencement date of the wife's 1994 action, relying on Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(4)(b). Supreme Court determined that the marital property, including the marital portion of the pension, should be divided equally between the parties. The Appellate Division held Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in valuing the pension as of the commencement date of the present action. It concluded that the 'appropriate valuation date was the commencement date of the 1994 action' because there was 'no evidence that the parties reconciled and continued to receive the benefits of the marital relationship after the prior action was commenced' (25 AD3d 670, 671 [2006]).

The Court of Appeals modified the order of the Appellate Division and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for further proceedings. It pointed out that Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(1)(c) defines marital property as all property acquired 'during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action.' Thus, in the absence of a separation agreement, the commencement date of a matrimonial action demarcates 'the termination point for the further accrual of marital property' (citing Anglin v. Anglin, 80 NY2d 553, 556 [1992]). The Court held that the valuation date must be between 'the date of commencement of the action and the date of trial' (Domestic Relations Law 236 [B][4][b]). In determining whether the commencement of a particular 'matrimonial action' terminates the accrual of marital property, it looked to 'the overall legislative intent of the Domestic Relations Law and the particular application of the equitable distribution regime. In Anglin, the Court held that the commencement of a separation action does not cut off the accrual of marital property because such an action does not, ipso facto, terminate the marital economic partnership. Rather, the economic partnership should be considered dissolved when a matrimonial action is commenced which seeks divorce, or the dissolution, annulment or declaration of the nullity of a marriage, i.e., an action in which equitable distribution is available. It observed that this rule provides internal consistency and compatibility and objective verification, as opposed to uneven, ephemeral, personal interpretations as to when economic marital partnerships end. For similar reasons, it concluded that the value of marital property generally should not be determined by the commencement of an action for divorce that does not ultimately culminate in divorce. Equitable distribution is available 'in an action wherein all or part of the relief granted is divorce. Where there is no divorce, there can be no equitable distribution. Consequently, permitting the commencement date of the prior, unsuccessful divorce action to govern the valuation date of marital property for the purposes of a later, successful action in which equitable distribution is available would be inconsistent with the statutory scheme. The Court found that, as Supreme Court concluded, the pension benefits were marital property to the extent that they were earned prior to the commencement of the present divorce action. As a result, the marital portion of the pension could not be valued at any time earlier than the commencement date.

Because Marital Residence Is Generally Considered a Passive Asset, a Valuation Date as Close to the Trial Date as Practicable Should Be Employed

In Donovan v Szlepcsik, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2390337 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the defendant a 10% interest in the former marital residence and credited him the sum of $2,600, representing 10% of the net equity in the former marital residence as of May 2002, awarded the plaintiff child support of $300 a week, and directed that any unreimbursed or uncovered medical expenses incurred on behalf of the parties' unemancipated child be shared equally between the parties. The Appellate Division held that because a marital residence is generally considered a passive asset, a valuation date as close to the trial date as practicable should be employed. This is especially true where the dramatic increase in the value of real property is attributable to market forces rather than the contributions of either party. Here, the trial court erred in employing a May 2002 valuation for the former marital residence since it had before it a valuation made in August 2005, only three months before the trial, and uncontradicted evidence that the residence's increased market value resulted solely from market forces. Inasmuch as the amount of the outstanding existing mortgage as of August 2005 was not clearly set forth in the record, it remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the net equity in the marital home as of August 2005 and the 10% interest therein to which the defendant was entitled. In awarding the plaintiff child support in the sum of $300 a week, the court did not adhere to the "precisely articulated, three-step method for determining child support" set forth in the Child Support Standards Act. It remitted to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the child care expenses, child support, child support arrears, and unreimbursed or uncovered medical expenses incurred on behalf of the parties' unemancipated child which the defendant is obligated to pay in accordance with the CSSA.

Supreme Court Properly Declined to Consider Tax Consequences in Light of Plaintiff's Failure to Submit Evidence of Tax Consequences.

In Cameron v Cameron, 857 N.Y.S.2d 793 (3 Dept 2008) the parties divorced in 2004 after nearly 50 years of marriage. Upon plaintiff's appeal, the Appellate Division reversed so much of the judgment of divorce as ordered equitable distribution of, among other things, his pension (22 A.D.3d 911, 802 N.Y.S.2d 542 [2005]) and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for distribution of the marital portion of plaintiff's pension, directing the court to give appropriate consideration to any tax consequences, and for redetermination of his maintenance obligation. Upon remittal, Supreme Court noted that an amended qualified domestic relations order had been entered subsequent to the judgment of divorce, which properly recalculated the marital portion of plaintiff's pension in accordance with the formula set forth in Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 490, 494, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15 [1984]. The court directed the parties to submit a proposed distribution of the pension with complete analysis of potential tax consequences. After both parties failed to submit any evidence regarding tax consequences, Supreme Court deemed the argument waived, redistributed the parties' property, and redetermined maintenance accordingly. Plaintiff appealed, arguing that Supreme Court improperly failed to take into account the appropriate tax implications in redistributing his pension, and abused its discretion in awarding defendant permanent maintenance. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that in light of plaintiff's failure to submit a proposed distribution and any evidence of associated tax consequences, Supreme Court properly declined to consider the tax consequences. Inasmuch as Supreme Court gave appropriate consideration to the pertinent factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a) and the redistribution of property upon remittal, it rejected plaintiff's argument that the court abused its discretion in awarding defendant nondurational maintenance of $300 per month.

Consent to Divorce Based on Counterclaim Precludes Review on Appeal

In Dudla v Dudla, 50 A.D.3d 1255, 857 N.Y.S.2d 254 (3 Dept. 2008) the parties were married in October 1987 and had no children. Following a brief separation, they entered into a postnuptial agreement in July 1997 concerning the distribution of certain property, including the marital residence. The parties separated again in 2002. In 2004, plaintiff commenced an action for divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. Defendant served a pro se answer in which he asserted a counterclaim for divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and sought vacatur of the postnuptial agreement. During the course of the proceedings, the parties indicated that they wished to dissolve the marriage. To this end, plaintiff agreed not to pursue her complaint for divorce, but to allow the divorce to proceed on the ground alleged in defendant's counterclaim. Defendant consented to this proposed disposition and a trial was thereafter held on the distribution of the parties' marital property. The defendant appealed from the judgment of divorce and the award. The Appellate Division found that defendant consented to the divorce based on his counterclaim. In view of this, he was not aggrieved by that part of the judgment granting him such relief and, therefore, this issue was not subject to review. It also noted that Supreme Court determined that the marital residence was a marital asset, the value of which was to be distributed equally between the parties. The court valued this asset at $184,500 based upon information contained in plaintiff's testimony, interrogatories and statement of net worth. Defendant contended that a higher value was warranted and that plaintiff fraudulently misrepresented the value. Yet, at trial, he provided no proof regarding the value of the residence, nor did he dispute the value proffered by plaintiff. His statement of net worth, also admitted into evidence, left the section concerning real property blank. He failed to submit a written appraisal of the marital residence at trial even though Supreme Court specifically advised him of his right to do so. He also failed to provide proof that plaintiff engaged in fraud. Defendant neglected to adduce proof of the value of personal property and furnishings acquired after the execution of the postnuptial agreement, which he also claimed should have been part of the distributive award. Based upon the limited proof on the value of the residence and personalty, the court did not err in its valuation and distribution of these assets. Given the parties' respective financial positions and the fact that plaintiff was not awarded any portion of defendant's business, but was partially responsible for the payment of defendant's business debt through the refinancing of the mortgage on the marital residence, there was no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court's exclusion of plaintiff's pension from the distributive award.

Plaintiff Wife Not Entitled To Permanent Maintenance Simply by Reason of Defendant's Imputed High Earnings

In Santana v Santana, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2130315 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded plaintiff child support of $1,666.67 per month, maintenance of $2,000 per month for three years, and $80,000 representing 50% of the appraised value of defendant's business. The Appellate Division modified to vacate the award of child support and extend the duration of maintenance to five years, and remanded for a recalculation of the parties' child support obligations. It found that several errors were made in determining child support. First, the court applied the statutory 25% percentage applicable to two children despite un rebutted testimony that the parties' younger daughter (born July 23, 1990) had been living with defendant. Defendant should not have to pay plaintiff basic child support for this child as of the time the child began living with him. Second, the court incorrectly calculated the parties' total combined income. Plaintiff's annual income was correctly found to be $26,200 based on recent income tax returns, and defendant's annual income could not be ascertained because of his evasive and conflicting testimony and failure to produce appropriate documentation. The court therefore properly imputed income of $118,843.60 to defendant based on the average of his annual deposits into his personal checking account; however, the court apparently overlooked an additional $18,250 per year that the neutral court evaluator found defendant earned from a wire transfer business located in his store. Third, where, as here, the combined parental income exceeds $80,000, the court is required to either apply the statutory percentage to the amount in excess of $80,000 or articulate reasons for not doing so. The court, however, capped defendant's income at $80,000, and then apparently took a straight 25% of $80,000 in arriving at defendant's monthly basic child support obligation of $1,666.67, rather than multiplying combined parental income by the appropriate child support percentage and then prorating the product in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income. The only reasons the court gave for deviating from the statutory method were the parties' "modest" marital lifestyle and the fact that the younger child resided with defendant. The latter fact, while a reason for not awarding plaintiff child support for the younger child, was not a reason for capping defendant's income, and, the record was insufficient to support a finding that the parties' marital lifestyle was modest. Fourth, the court failed to award the children's future reasonable health care expenses not covered by insurance, which award should be made in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income (Domestic Relations Law s 240[1-b][c][5]). Fifth, given the great disparity in the parties' incomes, the court should have directed defendant to pay his pro rata share of the younger child's college tuition and expenses based on the proportion of his income to the total combined parental income, rather than directing defendant to pay only 50% of those expenses. It also held that Plaintiff was not entitled to permanent maintenance, as she claimed, simply by reason of defendant's imputed high earnings. The purpose of maintenance is to give the recipient spouse a sufficient period of time to become self-supporting. However, given the length of the parties' marriage, over 20 years, and the fact that plaintiff needed 12 more credits to complete her master's degree, attainment of which should enable her to earn more income, it modified the maintenance award to extend its duration from three to five years.

Error Not to Credit Wife with 50% of Husband's Pre-marital Debts Paid with Marital Funds During the Marriage

In Mahoney-Buntzman v Buntzman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2066586 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, among other things, fixed the wife's her distributive award at $2,467,151.43, awarded her 35% of the value of certain shares of stock and stock options issued to the defendant by his employer, and awarded her durational maintenance of $2,500 a month for 15 months. During the parties' marriage, the defendant took out a student loan in the amount of $48,162.90 to pay for a doctoral degree in education, which was satisfied with marital funds. The plaintiff contended on appeal that the trial court erred in failing to award her a 50% credit with respect to the student loan. The Appellate Division agreed. The defendant's expert testified that the doctoral degree earned by the defendant during the marriage did not enhance his earnings, and thus, provided no benefit to the marriage, and there was no distributive award of the value of the doctorate degree to the plaintiff in light of its zero enhanced earning capacity value. The student loan debt was incurred to satisfy the defendant's separate interest and therefore was his own separate obligation. Accordingly, the trial court erred in failing to award the plaintiff a 50% credit, or $24,081.45, for the student loan debt incurred by the defendant during the marriage to attain this degree. The Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff's contention that the trial court erred in not crediting her with 50% of the defendant's pre-marital debts paid with marital funds during the marriage: maintenance paid to the defendant's first wife in the total amount of $58,545, and $7,000 paid in 1998 as a settlement of a loan for a boat purchased by the defendant before the marriage but surrendered to the bank in 1993 prior to the marriage for nonpayment of the boat loan. The defendant's maintenance obligation to his first wife and the boat loan constituted debts incurred by him prior to the parties' marriage and were solely his responsibility. Accordingly, the trial court erred in failing to award the plaintiff additional credits of $29,272.50 as to the maintenance payments to the defendant's first wife and $3,500 as to the boat loan. It also agreed with the plaintiff's contention that the trial court improvidently exercised its discretion in declining to direct that the defendant pay the parties' children's college tuition and expenses until they reach the age of 21 upon finding that the children had sufficient resources of their own to pay for their college education from trust funds given to them by their paternal grandfather. In view of the defendant's own significant financial resources in contrast to the plaintiff's limited financial resources, and the defendant's own testimony that the parties agreed not to use the children's trust funds to pay for their college tuition and expenses, as well as giving due consideration to the factors listed in Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(c)(7), the defendant should pay for the children's college tuition and expenses until they reach the age of 21.

Court May Award Maintenance upon Annuling the Marriage on the Ground of Fraud

In Lemieux v Lemieux, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 458497 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) an action to annul a marriage on the ground of fraud, Supreme Court awarded the defendant maintenance of $300 per week commencing on October 4, 2006, and continuing until the defendant reached the age of 66, died, remarried, or cohabitates, whichever is sooner. The Appellate Division affirmed rejecting the plaintiff's argument that Supreme Court was not authorized to make a maintenance award in an annulment action because DRL 141, which provides that maintenance may be awarded in a matter where an annulment has been granted on the ground of the mental illness of one of the parties, limits the court's authority. He contended that since the parties' annulment was based on fraud, the court erred in making an award of maintenance. Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(2), the court has discretion to make a maintenance award in any matrimonial action. DRL 141 simply provides additional procedural and substantive detail with respect to an action to annul a marriage based upon five years' incurable mental illness of one of the parties, to ensure that the disabled spouse is cared for and does not become a public charge. It does not limit the class of annulments in which the court can award maintenance.

Error to Award Share of Enhanced Earning Capacity

In Higgins v Higgins, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1748310 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that although the enhanced earnings from academic degrees and professional licenses attained during the marriage are subject to equitable distribution, it is incumbent upon the nontitled party seeking a distributive share of such assets to demonstrate that they made a substantial contribution to the titled party's acquisition of that marital asset. Moreover, where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. It found that the defendant did not demonstrate that his contributions were substantial. Despite making some efforts to help, there was no evidence that he made career sacrifices or assumed a disproportionate share of household work as a consequence of the plaintiff's education. The record revealed that the defendant made only minor contributions. Moreover, the plaintiff worked full time while attending school, funded some of her own educational costs, and was still the primary caregiver for the parties' children. Consequently, the trial court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant a share of the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity. With respect to child support it held that Supreme Court should not have determined the defendant's obligations by relying upon his posttrial affidavit alleging a change in circumstances and that his earnings for child support purposes should be based on a lower income of approximately $500 per week. The consideration of that material, posttrial, prejudiced the plaintiff (cf. Man Choi Chiu v. Chiu, 38 AD3d 619). Nor should the court have directed counsel for the parties to resolve the issue of the accuracy and authenticity of receipts for child care expenses. The Appellate Division held that defendant should not have been credited for his payments of the carrying costs of the marital residence, as they were not shelter costs for the children. Traditionally, shelter costs, like food and clothing, inhere in the basic child support obligation and, thus, the statute does not contemplate the cost of providing the child's shelter as an extraordinary expense to be added to the support obligation. This determination is based upon the prohibition against a double shelter allowance. The defendant's payment of the carrying costs on the marital residence was not for the benefit of the children, as they lived in their grandparents' home with the mother and not in the marital residence. The court held it would not be unjust or a double shelter allowance to require him to pay both child support and the carrying costs of the marital residence in which he resided.

Responsibility of Both Parties to Maintain Marital Residence During Pendency of Matrimonial Action.

In Judge v Judge, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 331477 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1983 and had two children. In 1989, the defendant stopped working outside the home in order to take care of the parties' first child. She primarily stayed home and took care of the parties' children until the fall of 1993, when she enrolled in a program for a Masters of Business Administration degree at a college where the plaintiff was employed as a professor. In the spring of 1994, the defendant was hired by the Federal Reserve Bank, through the college placement office, and she received her MBA degree in February 1997. The defendant's first job with the FRB was as a Management Information Analyst, and at the time of trial she was an officer at the FRB and vice-president of the FRB's Cash and Custody Division. The defendant moved out of the marital home in 2000 and the plaintiff commenced this action on July 30, 2002. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court improperly determined that the defendant's MBA degree did not enhance her future earnings capacity. An academic degree may constitute a marital asset subject to equitable distribution, even though the degree may not necessarily confer the legal right to engage in a particular profession. While the MBA degree might not actually be a prerequisite to the defendant's employment, the record demonstrated that the degree substantially increased her future earnings, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to an equitable share of its value, with the proper valuation date being the commencement of the action. Based upon the testimony of the parties' experts, it found that the value of the defendants' MBA degree as of that date was $565,000 and that the plaintiff was entitled to 25% thereof, for an award in the sum of $141,250. It also held that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff a credit in the sum of only $6,941 towards the amount he expended on carrying charges related to the marital home after the commencement of the action. "Generally, it is the responsibility of both parties to maintain the marital residence and keep it in good repair during the pendency of a matrimonial action". After the defendant's voluntary departure from the marital residence, the plaintiff resided there and made all payments towards the mortgage and taxes. The plaintiff's undisputed testimony showed that, since the commencement of this action, he paid a total sum of $35,350 in mortgage and tax expenses. Under the circumstances of this case, he was entitled to recover half that amount, or $17,675. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in determining that the plaintiff was entitled to an award of an attorney's fee but that given the equities and circumstances of this case, the relative merits of the parties' positions, and their respective financial circumstances, an award of an attorney's fee to the plaintiff in the total sum of $50,000, rather than $20,000 was appropriate.

Provident to Award Wife Title to Marital Residence While Directing That Husband Retain Business Worth less than Home

In Groesbeck v Groesbeck, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2066613 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff title to the marital premises, directed him to pay the plaintiff maintenance of $1,000 per month for a period commencing on March 1, 2007, and concluding on December 1, 2008, awarded the wife child support of $312 per week. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in distributing marital property by awarding the plaintiff former wife title to the marital residence where she was residing at the time of trial with the parties' young children, while directing that the defendant former husband retain his interest in his home improvement contracting business. Although the net equity in the marital residence exceeded the appraised value of the defendant's interest in his business, equitable distribution does not necessarily mean equal. There was no merit to the defendant's contention that the court's maintenance award was improper because it "double counted" the value of his business in violation of the rule articulated in Grunfeld v. Grunfeld (94 N.Y.2d 696). That rule was inapplicable here because the husband's business was a tangible, income-producing asset (see Keane v. Keane, 8 NY3d 115). It rejected the plaintiff's contention that the amount and duration of the maintenance award was inadequate. The overriding purpose of a maintenance award is to give the spouse economic independence, and it should be awarded for a duration that would provide the recipient with enough time to become self-supporting. The plaintiff, who was studying for a position in the medical field at the time of trial, testified that she anticipated completing her educational program and a required externship by the summer of 2007. The court's award of maintenance of $1,000 per month for 1 ½ years after the plaintiff completed her studies was adequate in amount and duration to allow her to become self-supporting. The court properly calculated the child support obligation based upon a finding that the defendant earned $83,253 in 2004. The court's income determination was supported by the valuation report of a neutral accountant who examined the 2004 income tax return filed on behalf of the defendant's business, and the plaintiff failed to offer sufficient evidence to establish that the defendant's income was greater than reported. As a party's child support and maintenance obligations are retroactive to the date an application for such support was made the court should have awarded child support and maintenance retroactive to October 13, 2004, when the summons with notice requesting such relief was filed.

Not Error to Award Wife Portions of Real Estate Originally Owned by Plaintiff and His Brother Where Partnership Dissolved and New Business Structure Created as Sham to Deprive Defendant of Her Interest in Marital Assets.

In Blay v Blay, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1969734 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in June 1992 and had three children. In 1978, plaintiff and his brother established a partnership which performed landscaping and snow removal services. The brothers each held a 50% interest in the partnership. In 1989, plaintiff and his brother purchased a 16-acre parcel of real estate. Plaintiff renovated the house on the property. This house, which later became the marital residence, was further improved during the marriage. Also during the marriage, a karate studio was built on the property, from which the parties taught karate classes. Shortly after defendant informed plaintiff that she was unhappy with their relationship, plaintiff and his brother dissolved the partnership, formed a corporation in which the brother was the sole shareholder, formed a limited partnership and transferred most of the partnership's assets to the limited partnership, including the land, marital residence and karate studio. The corporation was the general partner in the limited partnership with a 1% interest, plaintiff was a limited partner with a 12.75% interest and his brother was a limited partner with an 86.25% interest. According to plaintiff and his brother, the reorganization was undertaken to protect the partnership's assets and to provide the brother with his fair share of the partnership's value, as he had allegedly contributed all of the initial capital and drew only $50 per week from the business while plaintiff drew $350 per week. Plaintiff never informed defendant of this reorganization, or that he transferred the real property out of his own name. In May 2005, plaintiff commenced this divorce action. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in awarding defendant portions of the real estate originally owned by plaintiff and his brother. The court found, under the circumstances, that the partnership dissolution and creation of the new business structure was invalid for purposes of equitable distribution, concocted as a sham to deprive defendant of her interest in marital assets. The court further found that the mortgage payments on the property, and money to improve the house and build the karate studio, came from partnership funds earned during the marriage, not from plaintiff's brother individually. As plaintiff was a half owner of the partnership, the mortgage was deemed paid with marital funds. Additionally, the marital residence was improved during the marriage through the addition of a basement bedroom and laundry room, new flooring and remodeling in the kitchen, installation of a hot tub and erection of an outdoor deck, presumably with marital funds. Thus, the court properly awarded defendant half the value of plaintiff's one-half interest in the property, after deducting the nonmarital percentage attributable to mortgage payments made prior to the marriage.

Similarly, based upon Supreme Court's finding that the corporate reorganization was invalid as to equitable distribution and considering plaintiff's one-half ownership of the business, the court did not err in awarding defendant half of plaintiff's interest in the corporation's bank accounts.

Defendant was entitled to distribution of the value of the GMC Jimmy vehicle that plaintiff purchased during the marriage. Despite plaintiff's testimony that he purchased the vehicle as a gift for defendant's daughter who resided with him, he purchased it with marital funds and maintained title to it. Although plaintiff testified and provided documentary proof that a 1994 Ford Taurus was titled to his brother, partnership documents listed that vehicle as a partnership asset and plaintiff apparently used the vehicle regularly. Considering the way that plaintiff and his brother loosely adhered to the corporate form, there was no error in Supreme Court's determination to deem this vehicle marital property in plaintiff's possession.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court incorrectly distributed plaintiff's retirement assets. There was no proof that plaintiff or the partnership contributed to plaintiff's IRA account after the marriage. Any passive increase in value to this separate property was also separate property. The court found that the partnership contributed to a Keogh retirement plan during the marriage, making part of the accrued value in that plan marital property. The court also held that the plan was established to benefit both plaintiff and his brother, yet awarded defendant half of the accrued value as if the entire plan was established to benefit plaintiff alone. Accordingly, it reduced defendant's portion of the Keogh plan to $7,196.72 and award her no portion of plaintiff's IRA account.

The award of $300 weekly maintenance to defendant for seven years was excessive. The court appropriately exercised its discretion in imputing income to plaintiff as a result of his failure to disclose all of the business's tax documents, which failure made it impossible to determine whether claimed expenses were legitimate or whether any additional business income existed. The court also imputed income to plaintiff based upon money he received from family members, free rent for the home and karate studio, the numerous personal bills paid by the partnership or corporation and year-end business distributions made to family members. While imputation of income was appropriate, the amount imputed was incorrect. One-time gifts or alleged loans from family members should not have been calculated as part of plaintiff's annual income. The court's figures also contained a mathematical error and double counted some items. Thus, it reduced the amount of imputed income to $65,000, giving plaintiff a total annual income of $83,200 when including his $350 weekly draw. The parties were married for 13 years at the time of commencement of the action and were in good health. During the marriage, plaintiff, who has a 10th grade education, worked in the family business. Defendant stayed home with the children during their formative years and did not begin working outside the home until the children were all in school. At the time of trial, defendant, who is a high school graduate, earned an annual salary of approximately $25,000. She had been working at least part time since 1998 and did not present any proof that she intended to pursue training to increase her skills, or that she lost out on any particular employment opportunities. The parties never lived an extravagant lifestyle, and both lived modestly after separating. While plaintiff's income was considerably higher than defendant's, he is supporting their three children and defendant's daughter without receiving any child support. Under the circumstances, a maintenance award of $200 per week for two years from the date of judgment was appropriate. A retroactive award was required because maintenance shall be awarded from the date of application. That award was also to be in the amount of $200 per week. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should not have ordered plaintiff to maintain a $100,000 life insurance policy and at the same time distribute the marital portion of the cash surrender value of that policy. The court was authorized, in its discretion, to direct plaintiff to pay the premiums and keep the life insurance policy in effect for defendant's benefit until his maintenance obligation is satisfied. The proof supported a determination that a portion of the policy, paid for during the marriage by the business that plaintiff half owned, was marital property subject to equitable distribution. By ordering immediate distribution of the cash surrender value, however, the court was essentially requiring liquidation of that asset at the same time it ordered that the asset be maintained in its present form. Based upon the reduction of the length of the maintenance award, plaintiff's current maintenance obligation was substantially satisfied. Accordingly, it removed the requirement that he maintain the life insurance policy for defendant's benefit, but affirm the court's direction to distribute the marital portion of the policy's cash surrender value.

It held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding counsel fees to defendant, but it reduced reduce the amount of the fee awarded. Some factors to consider include the extent of legal services provided, the complexity of the case and the parties' financial circumstances, taking into account any distributive awards. Considering the income imputed to plaintiff, he was in a better financial position than defendant, but he was also supporting the children without assistance from defendant. Distributive awards to defendant totaled approximately $100,000, many of which plaintiff must pay from nonliquid assets. The counsel fees were partially based upon additional work required to sort out the confusing financial arrangements created by plaintiff and his family business, plaintiff's failure to advise defendant of the business restructuring and the failure to turn over complete financial documents in response to demands. The court parsed counsel's billing statements, deleting items deemed excessive, and awarded plaintiff $24,741.50. The complexity of the case due to the confusing financial situation made an award of counsel fees to defendant appropriate but, when considering the parties' financial circumstances as a whole, it reduced the award to $15,000.

Nondurational Maintenance An Abuse of Discretion in View of Wife's Work Experience and $ 80,000 Salary

In Kaplan v Kaplan,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1990094 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the husband appealed from a judgment which, among other things, directed him to pay maintenance of $ 6,000 per month for a continuous period of 60 months, and then, commencing with the 61st month, $3,000 per month continuing for life. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's award of lifetime maintenance to the wife was an improvident exercise of discretion. In view of the wife's work experience, the fact that she was gainfully employed and earning approximately $80,000 per year, the sizable distributive award she received, and her equal share of the husband's retirement benefits, the award of permanent maintenance was inappropriate .However, the award of $6,000 per month in maintenance for a period of five years was appropriate under the circumstances of this case. The court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the wife 30% of the husband's dental practice and license. The award took into account the limits of the defendant's involvement with the practice and the attainment of the dental license, while not ignoring the direct and indirect contributions that made. However, Supreme Court erred in directing the separate distribution of both the husband's dental practice and the bank accounts of the dental practice. The value of the dental practice, as determined by a neutral business evaluator, already included the value of these accounts. In accordance with the Court's determination that the award of maintenance should be modified to eliminate the award of lifetime maintenance, the Supreme Court's directive was modified so as to provide that the requirement to provide life insurance as security for the maintenance award was coterminous with such award.

Proper to Calculate Child Support Without Credit for Social Security Benefits Children Receive Due to Father's Disability

In Luongo v Luongo--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1748303 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which awarded the plaintiff a divorce, awarded the plaintiff child support of $1,057.15 per month, awarded the plaintiff a share of defendant's pension and variable supplement fund benefits, and awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee of $6,000. It found that plaintiff satisfied her burden of demonstrating that defendant engaged in conduct, including two physical assaults, which was harmful to her physical and mental well-being and made it unsafe or improper for her to cohabit with him. The court properly calculated the defendant's monthly child support obligation without crediting him for Social Security benefits which the children receive due to his disability. "[A]lthough a dependent child's Social Security benefits are derived from the disabled parent's past employment, they are designed to supplement existing resources and are not intended to displace the obligation of the parent to support his or her children" (Matter of Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d 605, 611). The court did not err in directing distribution of the defendant's pension and variable supplement fund benefits in accordance with the equitable distribution formula set forth in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481). Pensions represent a form of deferred compensation paid after retirement in lieu of greater compensation during the period of employment (see Olivo v. Olivo, 82 N.Y.2d 202, 207; Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d at 491-492), and the nonemployee spouse is entitled to share in the pension of the employee spouse as well as supplements to existing pension benefits, such as variable supplement fund benefits. In light of the defendant's greater financial resources, the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff an attorney's fee in the sum of $6,000.

Supreme Court's Reliance on Plaintiff's Vocational Expert Improper Where Expert's Report Contained Critical Flaws.

In Schwab v Schwab, 854 N.Y.S.2d 802, (3 Dept 2008) the parties were married in 1992 and had no children. Plaintiff was licensed to practice medicine in 1990 and certified to practice internal medicine in 1991. Defendant obtained a Master's degree in fine arts in 1991. After living together in New York City, the parties purchased a home in Sullivan County in 1991 because plaintiff was raised there and wished to return. Plaintiff was already employed by Liberty Medical Group, a medical practice owned by his father and Donald Roth. From 1992 to 1995, defendant worked in New York City three days a week and from the parties' Sullivan County home two days a week. In 1995, defendant left her position in New York City so that she could pursue her fine arts career and so that she and plaintiff could start a family. From 1995 on, defendant worked intermittently as an independent contractor, charging $50 per hour for her services. In 2005, defendant earned a degree in landscape design and started her own landscaping business. Plaintiff became an employee of Mary Imogene Bassett Hospital in 1995, when Liberty Medical Group was sold to that entity. In 2001, plaintiff and Roth purchased the practice from the hospital and immediately resold it to Catskill Regional Medical Center. Plaintiff's portion of the proceeds of sale were placed in the parties' joint A.G. Edwards & Sons, Inc. account. Shortly thereafter, plaintiff and Roth formed Addenbrook, LLC, with equal ownership, for the purpose of purchasing the building in which they were practicing. Addenbrook purchased the building in August 2001 for $125,000 using a bridge loan. Addenbrook then took out a $450,000 mortgage in order to pay off the bridge loan and make repairs to the building. When interest rates declined, Addenbrook refinanced the property with a $500,000 mortgage, which was used, in part, to pay off the $450,000 mortgage. After completion of the repairs, $260,000 remained from the mortgage proceeds; plaintiff deposited his half ($130,000) in the parties' joint A.G. Edwards account, which was valued at approximately $179,000 at the time of trial. Plaintiff commenced this action for divorce in September 2004. At or about that time, each party removed $20,000 from the A.G. Edwards account, apparently in order to provide funds for the payment of counsel fees, among other things. By agreement, plaintiff paid maintenance to defendant in the amount of $3,250 per month from October 2004 through March 2005. He also paid the tuition for defendant's studies in landscape design and the rent on the New York City apartment, which the parties had maintained. From April 2005 through July 2006, plaintiff paid maintenance to defendant in the reduced amount of $2,250 per month.

After a trial in January 2006, Supreme Court rendered a judgment of divorce which, among other things, awarded defendant exclusive use and occupancy of the New York City apartment and terminated plaintiff's obligation to pay maintenance. Supreme Court also awarded ownership of all of the parties' jointly owned real property to plaintiff and awarded defendant a distributive award of $224,250 for her half of the value of that property, in addition to approximately $95,000, representing one half of the value of certain deferred compensation accounts. Defendant was awarded only 10% of the value of plaintiff's interest in Addenbrook and nothing for the value of the A.G. Edwards account.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion with regard to the distribution of the value of Addenbrook. Equitable distribution does not necessarily require an equal division of marital property. The testimony demonstrated that defendant had little to do with the acquisition, maintenance or increase in value of the property owned by Addenbrook. Moreover, Supreme Court properly valued Addenbrook as of the date of commencement of the matrimonial action based on its classification as an active asset, rather than a passive one. While there was no proof in the record of any specific benefit to plaintiff in his retaining ownership of the Livingston Manor property, whereas there was some evidence of a possible economic benefit to defendant if she were to retain ownership, Supreme Court's distribution of such property was not a clear abuse of discretion. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in its failure to distribute any of the A.G. Edwards account to her. It is well settled that the transfer of separate property into a joint account raises a presumption that the funds are marital property. Plaintiff "failed to overcome this presumption by demonstrating that the joint account was established for convenience only. Plaintiff testified that marital expenses were paid from the joint account and that both parties deposited their earnings into the account. Thus, the commingling of the $40,000, representing the proceeds from the sale of plaintiff's premarital stock, into the joint A.G. Edwards account transmuted those funds into marital property. Insofar as the funds in the A.G. Edwards account represented proceeds from the purchase and sale of the medical practice, those funds were clearly marital. Therefore, it was not necessary for defendant to specifically demonstrate her involvement in those transactions in order to support an entitlement to equitable distribution of the account in which those proceeds were deposited.

The determination of whether to award maintenance rests in the sound discretion of the trial court. However, there must be some evidence in the record from which a proper evaluation of employability can be assessed. Supreme Court's reliance on plaintiff's vocational expert was improper, as the expert's report contained critical flaws, such as an assumption that defendant had experience in graphic design, rather than accurately reflecting her experience in graphic art. In addition, the report proposed work in management positions in the New York metropolitan area requiring numerous years of experience which defendant did not have. Defendant already obtained further education, for which plaintiff paid, to improve her financial prospects. She elected to start her own business which, once developed, she anticipated would allow her to become self-supporting. Meanwhile, plaintiff continued to earn a substantial salary. The Court found, based upon the duration of the marriage, the age and health of both parties, the income and property of the respective parties, the present and future earning capacity of both parties, defendant's ability to become self-supporting, the training she has already received and the duration of maintenance already paid during the pendency of the matrimonial action and the contributions made by defendant to plaintiff's career or career potential, plaintiff should pay maintenance to defendant of $2,000 per month for a period of two years. Such an award will better serve the primary goal of maintenance, which is to encourage rehabilitation and self-sufficiency to the extent possible, while still accounting for a large discrepancy in earning power between the parties. Likewise, it found that Supreme Court's failure to award any counsel fees to defendant was an abuse of discretion. There was no evidence presented that the services rendered were unnecessary or unreasonable. Those services included negotiation for temporary maintenance, financial discovery and preparation for trial, among other things, and no time was charged for travel from New York City. Considering the parties' respective financial circumstances, including the award of maintenance made herein, as well as the distribution of marital property, it held that an award of $15,000 to be paid by plaintiff to defendant's counsel was appropriate.

Provident Exercise of Discretion in Crediting Defendant for Payments Made to Support Parties Children Who Reached Majority During Pendency of Action

In Milnes v Milnes, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1123469 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court determined that the net proceeds of the sale of the marital residence should be distributed equally. The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court properly declined to treat as marital debt a loan allegedly made by the plaintiff's father to the parties in light of the plaintiff's failure to provide any documentary evidence of the alleged loan to substantiate her own testimony regarding the alleged indebtedness. The Supreme Court also providently exercised its discretion in crediting the defendant for payments he made to support the parties' two children who reached their majority during the pendency of this action, and in declining to award child support arrears in the absence of any proof that the payments made were less than those required under the Child Support Standards Act.

Court Must Consider Prospective Financial Circumstances and Work Life Expectancy of the Payor Spouse

In J.S. v J.S. — N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 747901 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married in 1967. At the time of the commencement of the action, they had been married for almost 38 years. Both parties were 59 years old. They had three emancipated children. The wife was a high school graduate. The husband reported that he did not anticipate working beyond his 65th birthday. The wife was seeking non-durational maintenance based upon her claim of total disability, the duration of the marriage and an inability to meet her reasonable needs due to her deteriorating health. She alleged that she suffered with chronic fatigue syndrome, shingles, sciatica, irritable bowel syndrome, colitis, gastroesophageal reflux disease, depression and also had spinal disc herniation. She received social security disability benefits of either $592.00 or $692.00 a month and Medicare benefits. The husband had been employed by five different Jaguar dealerships in the past two years. According to his Social Security Earning Statement, the husband earned $281,239 in 2000, $297,039 in 2001, $226,712 in 2002, $140,795 in 2003, $137,376 in 2004, $121,724 in 2005 and $101,250 in 2006. Supreme Court held that the wife had the burden of proving that she was permanently disabled from pursuing gainful employment. The receipt by the wife of disability benefits from the Social Security Administration is not binding on this Court, nor dispositive of the issue of her claimed disability and need for an award of maintenance. Other than her own testimony as to the physical limitations she professed to suffer, no medical or other relevant testimony or evidence was offered to support her position that she was currently unable to work and will be so disabled for the foreseeable future. The court found that her contention that she was totally disabled from engaging in gainful employment was not supported by the proof. It noted that for purpose of qualifying for Social Security Disability benefits, the term "disability" is defined as: "inability to engage in any substantial gainful activity by reason of any medically determinable physical or mental impairment (or combination of impairments) which can be expected to last for a continuous period of not less than 12 consecutive months ... taking into account the individual's age, education and work history" (42 USC 423[d], 1382c[a][3][B]; 20 C.F.R. s 404, 416, 905 and 1505). The definition does not engender a determination that a disability is permanent. Further, pursuant to applicable regulations, recipients are permitted to earn restricted amounts of income for limited periods without forfeiting social security disability benefits (see, 20 C.F. R. 404.1574[b]; 416.974[b]). The Court recognized that the wife was a 59 year old high school graduate, with few skills, who had not been gainfully employed for several years. Her historic earnings were modest and it was not likely she can become self supporting through education or training. The Court imputed income to the wife based on her ability to earn of $20,800.00 a year ($400.00 a week). It found that the husband had the ability to earn an annual income of $110,000.00. The Supreme Court held, as a matter of first impression, that a court must consider, not only the aforesaid factors, but also the prospective financial circumstances and work life expectancy of the payor spouse. It found that the husband had the ability to work until his 70th birthday. Additionally, and for the same reasons, the wife would have to engage in at least part time employment through her 70th birthday. The Court found that the husband lacked the ability to pay non-durational maintenance and directed that he pay maintenance of $3000.00 a month to terminate upon the re-marriage of the wife, the death of either party, or ten years from the date of the order. It directed the husband to maintain life insurance naming the wife as irrevocable beneficiary in a face amount sufficient to secure his obligation to pay maintenance and maintain existing health insurance for the wife until her 65th birthday. The wife was awarded counsel fees of $20,000.00.

Husband Awarded 50% Of Appreciation of Value of Marital Residence

In Michelini v. Michelini, 47 A.D.3d 902, 850 N.Y.S.2d 592 (2d Dept.2008) the Supreme Court awarded the husband 50% of the appreciation of the value of the marital residence and the Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the trial court properly awarded the defendant 50% of the appreciation of the value of the marital residence. Although the residence was the separate property of the plaintiff, the defendant established that the subsequent appreciation of the value of the marital residence was attributable to their joint efforts and, therefore, he was entitled to the award by the trial court.

Credit Card Debt Not Properly Divided Equally

In Preisner v Preisner, 47 A.D.3d 695, 850 N.Y.S.2d 492, (2d Dept. 2008) the parties were married in 1975 and had two children, born in 1981 and 1985, respectively. During most of the marriage, the plaintiff worked as a prop master in the film industry to support the family and the defendant stayed at home with the children. The defendant eventually began working part-time as a substitute teacher and, upon the parties' separation, became a full-time teacher. The parties separated in September 1999 and the plaintiff commenced the action in October 2004. At trial, the plaintiff sought reimbursement from the defendant for one-half of the outstanding credit card debt totaling $80,803.00, which he testified he incurred from September 1999 through 2005 for expenses for the marital home and the parties' children. Although the Supreme Court noted that certain expenses were subject to disallowance, it directed the defendant to pay one-half of the outstanding credit card debt. The Appellate Division held that the court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing the defendant to pay one-half of the full outstanding credit card debt, as it failed to make the necessary findings as to the amount of the debt which was incurred to meet the plaintiff's personal, rather than marital obligations. Moreover, a portion of that debt consisted of payments made by the plaintiff on behalf of one of the parties' children after she reached the age of 21 without the prior agreement of the defendant. Under the circumstances of this case, it found it appropriate to reduce the amount of the defendant's liability as to the outstanding credit card debt to $20,000.

Overriding Purpose of Maintenance Is to Give Spouse Economic Independence. It Should Be Awarded for Duration That Would Provide Recipient with Enough Time to Become Self-supporting.

In DiBlasi v DiBlasi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 331693 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff $1,822 per week in child support, directed defendant to pay for the college tuition and room and board for the parties' children "up to a 'SUNY cap,'" awarded the plaintiff a distributive award of $43,537 from his 401k, directed defendant to maintain a term life insurance policy upon his own life in the amount of $2,000,000, and awarded the plaintiff an attorney's fee of $133,101.17. The Appellate Division held that: "The overriding purpose of a maintenance award is to give the spouse economic independence, and it should be awarded for a duration that would provide the recipient with enough time to become self-supporting". Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in determining the monthly amount of maintenance, but improvidently exercised its discretion in limiting the duration of the maintenance award to two years. Taking into consideration all the relevant factors, including the plaintiff's age, education, extended absence from the work force while raising the parties' five children, who were still minors, and the present and future earning capacities of both parties, the duration of the award of maintenance was extended until March 14, 2013. The extension of the defendant's maintenance obligation, until the two youngest boys were college age, was intended to afford the plaintiff a sufficient opportunity to become self-supporting. Given all the circumstances of this case, the attorney's fee was reduced to $100,000.

Property Distributed in Accordance With Prenuptial Agreement

In Kessler v Kessler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 257460 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, directed defendant to pay child support of $3,520 per month and awarded the plaintiff one-half of $492,610, representing income and distributions from his solely-owned corporation, directed that he pay 67.6% of (a) all child care expenses of the plaintiff, retroactive to March 29, 2006, (b) the cost of the health insurance of the parties' children, (c) unreimbursed medical, dental, and related expenses of the parties' children, and (d) the children's extracurricular activities, awarded the plaintiff $278,002.08 as her distributive share (one-half of $556,004.15) of certain real estate accounts, directed him to pay $8,785.03 directly to the plaintiff for certain unpaid child support "add-ons," directed that the defendant pay the plaintiff at a rate of not less than $8,000 per month until $328,877.11 is paid in full. The parties were married in 1996. Four days before their marriage, the parties entered into a prenuptial agreement that essentially left the plaintiff with little or nothing in the event that the parties divorced. Supreme Court refused to void the entire agreement and found that the defendant had not breached the agreement, but voided, as unconscionable, that part of the agreement waiving the right to an attorney's fee. The Appellate Division in an opinion by Justice Ritter (Kessler v. Kessler, 33 AD3d 42), affirmed. In pertinent part, the parties' prenuptial agreement provides that "[a]ny property acquired during the course of the marriage ... with [the defendant's] sole and separate funds and which is owned in his sole name or with other person or persons other than [the plaintiff]" will be deemed the defendant's separate property. Further, in the event of a termination of the marriage other than by death, "[w]hatever property the parties have accumulated during the course of their marriage, excluding separate property as defined herein ... shall be divided between the parties, in equal shares, when practicable." Further, paragraph 6 of the prenuptial agreement obligated the parties, during the marriage, to "pool certain of their income for the benefit of each other and for the maintenance of the household, by making regular deposits to a checking or similar account (hereinafter Household Account). Both parties will make regular and equal deposits to the Household Account." The evidence adduced at trial established that both parties complied with paragraph 6. The Supreme Court categorized, as marital property, the $492,610, representing income and distributions from the defendant's solely-owned corporation, Indoor Courts of America, Inc., that the defendant deposited into his separate so-called "real estate accounts." The Appellate Division held that this was erroneous, as there was no evidence that the defendant deposited those funds into his separate real estate accounts to evade the requirement set forth in the prenuptial agreement that he make "regular and equal deposits" into the joint household account. Instead, the evidence demonstrates that he used this "excess" income to maintain the marital home and to purchase and maintain real property solely owned by him or his closely-held corporations. Accordingly, no ground existed to deem those funds marital property. Supreme Court's calculation of the defendant's adjusted annual gross income was erroneous. It erred in not reducing the defendant's gross rental income by the amount of his expenses for those rental properties (i.e., real estate taxes, out-of-pocket expenses, insurance, etc.

Creation of Joint Account Vests in Each Tenant a Present Unconditional Property Interest in an Undivided One Half of the Money Deposited.

In Bailey v Bailey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 275056 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that although the court properly determined that plaintiff was entitled to retain the amount of $43,000 she had removed from the parties' joint HSBC checking accounts containing $66,000, the court erred in allocating the entire amount as separate property. "The creation of a joint account vests in each tenant a present unconditional property interest in an undivided one half of the money deposited, regardless of who puts the funds on deposit. The creation of a joint account vests in each tenant a present unconditional property interest in an undivided one half of the money deposited, regardless of who puts the funds on deposit" (Parry v. Parry, 93 A.D.2d 989, 990; see Nasca v. Nasca, 302 A.D.2d 906). Thus, each party was entitled to a distributive award of $33,000 from that account. The Appellate Division held that the court properly distributed the various retirement accounts. The appreciation to defendant's Vanguard Money Market Reserves Account was marital property because plaintiff indirectly contributed to the appreciation of this asset by handling the household matters, thereby permitting [defendant] the freedom to devote energy to his financial endeavors. The remaining accounts in question contained commingled marital property and separate property, and defendant failed to trace the source of the funds [that he contended were separate property] with sufficient particularity to rebut the presumption that they were marital property.

Decision Resettled

In Schwartz v Schwartz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 191906 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division granted the Motion by the appellant-respondent, to resettle the decision and order of the Court. The decision and order of the Court dated December 4, 2007, was recalled and vacated, and an identical decision and order was substituted therefor except that the first decretal paragraph was deleted. It had provided: " ORDERED that the judgment is modified, on the law and the facts, by deleting from the third decretal paragraph thereof the words "the then outstanding principal of the mortgage" and substituting therefor the words "one half of the carrying charges". The following was substituted in its place: "ORDERED that the judgment is modified, on the law and the facts, by deleting from the third decretal paragraph thereof the words "all carrying charges " and substituting therefor the words "one half of the carrying charges".

Improper to Fail to Award Credit for Marital Debts Paid By One Spouse

In Grasso v Grasso, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 193262 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, awarded the defendant nondurational maintenance, directed him to pay the defendant retroactive maintenance and child support arrears without a credit to him for mortgage and real estate tax payments he made with respect to the marital residence, pursuant to a pendente lite support order, directed him to pay, in full, the principal and interest on all marital debts bearing the defendant's name, awarded him the sum of $103,000 from the net proceeds of the sale of the marital residence as reimbursement of his contribution of separate property, directed that, after the parties each received reimbursement of their contributions of separate property from the net proceeds of the sale of the marital residence, the remainder of those net proceeds be divided equally between them, refused to award him a credit of $1,700 for expenditures he incurred for the benefit of the defendant's daughter from a prior marriage and, refused to award him a credit of $2,500 for legal fees he expended on behalf of the defendant's son from a prior marriage. The Appellate Division found that that while the husband correctly contended that the court improperly admitted into evidence and relied upon a determination of the Social Security Administration as to the wife's disability, there was other sufficient admissible evidence which supported the finding that the wife was totally disabled. It found that the husband correctly contended that, in directing him to pay maintenance and child support arrears, the Supreme Court erred in failing to credit him for the mortgage and real estate tax payments on the marital residence which he made pursuant to a pendente lite support order. The amounts for which the husband should have been credited, were more than sufficient to offset the maintenance and child support arrears calculated by the Supreme Court. The husband also correctly contended that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion by, in effect, holding him responsible for 100% of the credit card obligations that constituted the parties' marital debt as well as all the marital debt that was solely in the wife's name. The parties' marital debt would have been more appropriately distributed by allocating it equally between them, and offsetting it against the net proceeds of the sale of the marital residence after deduction of their contributions of separate property. The Supreme Court erred in failing to award the husband a credit for the sum of $1,700 in expenses he incurred on behalf of the wife's daughter from a prior marriage and the sum of $2,500 in fees expended from marital funds on behalf of the wife's son from a prior marriage. Since, at this juncture, the marital residence may already have been sold and the proceeds distributed, the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court, for a hearing and determination of the amount of the parties' marital debt, including accrued interest as of the commencement of the action, and the entry thereafter of an amended judgment directing the wife to pay 50% of the entire marital debt, including 50% of that portion of the marital debt previously satisfied by distribution of the parties' properties in this action. The Court noted that at the trial Supreme Court erred in precluding the husband from offering evidence in support of his contention that a loan taken out against his 401(k) account was used to satisfy the marital debt obligation and directed Supreme Court to permit the husband to offer proof as to this at the hearing, and to credit him with the wife's portion of any marital debt which he proves was paid from the proceeds of this loan.

Award of College Expenses Not Premature as One of Children Was 15 Years Old and Approaching College Age

In Costa v Costa, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4531821 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the award to the wife of title to the marital residence and its furnishings was appropriate given her need for a home as the custodial parent of the parties' two children, the availability to the husband of other residences and his use of marital assets to purchase a Park condominium. However, the husband should have been awarded a 100% interest in that condominium. Also, there was no reason for the trial court to depart from the stipulated value for the marital residence or from the husband's claimed value for the condominium. It also directed redistributions of the remaining assets, with the exceptions of the UTMA accounts to be continued to be held and used for each child's college education. The wife was entitled to a total of $515,381.57 from the remaining non-residence assets, which included the individual retirement accounts of both spouses. This 55-45 distribution was equitable under the circumstances, taking into consideration the wife's contributions to the success of the husband's career and her limited earnings prospects. The Appellate Division also held that the maintenance award should be reduced in duration to seven years, granting the wife $5,000 per month for the first five years and $4,000 per month for the next two, taxable to her. This was appropriate for a 16-year marriage in which the wife had the primary homemaking and child-raising responsibilities and had been absent from the workforce since 1990. It properly reflected the parties' respective educational backgrounds and financial positions and was appropriately structured to encourage the wife to become self-supporting. It also took into consideration the parties' marital standard of living. The Court also held that the child support award was appropriate and that the court considered the relevant circumstances and providently exercised its discretion in awarding college expenses . This award was not premature, since one of the children was 15 years old at the time of trial and approaching college age, and it would have been unfair to the wife and would contravene principles of judicial economy to require her to seek an upward modification in only two years. The award of counsel fees was a proper exercise of discretion.

Disparity in Parties' Incomes and Educations Warranted Maintenance Award for Time Necessary for Wife to Complete Education and Receive Teaching Certificate

In Fosdick v Fosdick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4440912 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in December 1999 and had two children. Prior to marriage, defendant earned a Bachelor's degree and a Master's degree. During the marriage, defendant acquired a Certificate of Administration and became employed full time as a school counselor. Defendant also served as a reservist in the U.S. Army. Plaintiff, who prior to marriage was employed and attending business college part time, worked on a part-time basis intermittently during the marriage but essentially deferred her employment and education, apparently at defendant's request, to be the primary caregiver for the parties' minor children. In November 2004, defendant was deployed to Iraq, where he remained stationed until October 2005. Plaintiff commenced this action for divorce in September 2005. Supreme Court awarded the parties joint legal custody with physical custody to plaintiff and visitation to defendant. The court also awarded plaintiff maintenance of $900 per month for 30 months and directed defendant to pay plaintiff's counsel fees of $3,000. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that given the disparity in the parties' respective incomes and educations, the latter of which plaintiff deferred in order to raise the parties' children, and the contributions plaintiff made to the marriage, the amount and duration of the maintenance awarded (the latter of which representing the approximate length of time necessary in order for plaintiff to complete her education and receive a teaching certificate) seemed entirely appropriate. It reached a similar conclusion as to the issue of counsel fees.

Plaintiff's Separate Funds Used for Improvement of Marital Residence or Commingled with Marital Accounts Became Marital Property. Mortgages and Debts Incurred During the Marriage Constitute Joint Obligations Which Are the Responsibility of Both Parties

In Loria v Loria, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4465272 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married for four years when the action was commenced in 2003. At the time of the marriage, the plaintiff, a widower, was the father of four unemancipated children from his previous marriage. The parties did not have children together. Four months after the marriage, the parties purchased the marital residence for $240,000, using $100,000 from the proceeds of the sale of the plaintiff's previous residence, and financing the balance. During the marriage, the defendant was a full-time homemaker and caregiver for the plaintiff's four children, handling all household duties, and supervising extensive renovations of the marital residence. In 2003 the plaintiff heavily refinanced the marital residence, which was worth $450,000 at the time of trial, and used the proceeds to purchase a rent-producing property worth $316,000 at the time of trial. Supreme Court equitably distributed both the marital residence and the rental property, subtracted the plaintiff's separate property contributions and certain mortgage indebtedness, awarded the defendant 40% of the value of the real property, and directed the plaintiff to pay a distributive award to the defendant in the sum of $161,200 in 60 monthly payments of $2,686.67 each. In an order dated August 31, 2006, the Supreme Court directed the plaintiff to pay arrears due under the judgment and awarded an attorney's fee to the defendant. The Appellate Division held that in light of the defendant's significant and undisputed contributions to the marriage, the Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in awarding her 40% of the marital assets after giving certain separate property credits to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's separate funds used for the improvement of the marital residence or commingled with marital accounts lost their character of separateness and became marital property subject to equitable distribution. However, mortgages and debts incurred during the marriage constitute joint obligations which are the responsibility of both parties. It agreed with the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court failed to hold the defendant fully accountable for the mortgage liability in determining her distributive share. Accordingly, after adding the market value of the marital property ($766,000) and deducting therefrom the sum of $436,000 ($350,000 indebtedness on the marital residence plus $86,000 from a line of credit used by the plaintiff to renovate the rental property), and taking into account the plaintiff's separate property credits as found by the trial court ($160,000), the defendant's 40% distributive share with respect to the realty amounted to $68,000, and it modified the judgment accordingly. The Court also held that in light of the plaintiff's admission that he failed to comply with the terms of the judgment until after the motion for enforcement was served, and the evidence that such failure was willful, the Supreme Court properly found that the defendant was entitled to an award of an attorney's fee.

Award of 35% of Value Husband's Interest in Law Firm Proper Where Wife's Conduct Toward Husband Harmed His Status and Reduced His Salary and Profits at Firm

In Schwartz v Schwartz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4246028 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in August 1973 and plaintiff commenced the action in February 2003. The husband had been a partner in a law firm, while the wife had not been employed since 1977, following the birth of the parties' son. In April 2005, the parties entered into a stipulation equally dividing the proceeds of the sale of the marital home, savings accounts, investment accounts, and retirement accounts. Pursuant to this stipulation, each of the parties would receive the sum of approximately $800,000 in liquid assets and retirement accounts. The decision after trial provided that the husband would receive credit, against his retroactive maintenance obligation, for payments he made for "all carrying charges" with respect to the parties' vacation home in Florida. However, because the parties each had a one-half ownership interest in the vacation home in Florida, the Appellate Division reduced the credit awarded to the husband to one-half of the carrying charges he paid, from the commencement of the action to the commencement of the trial in January 2005. Because the wife did not dispute, at trial, the husband's testimony that he had paid $75,140.03 in carrying charges for the vacation home in Florida from the time he commenced the action until the commencement of the trial, the court rejected the wife's contention that a hearing was required on the amount of carrying charges expended by the husband. Given the parties' long marriage and the wife's role during the early years of the marriage as the primary caretaker of the parties' son, which allowed the husband, at one time, to earn the third-highest share of profits at his law firm, and in light of evidence that the wife's conduct toward the husband in the latter years of their marriage harmed the husband's status at the law firm and reduced his salary and profits at the law firm, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the wife 35% of the value of the husband's interest in his law practice. It was not an improvident exercise of discretion for Supreme Court not to award her prejudgment interest on her share of the husband's interest in his law practice, as there was no evidence of misconduct by the husband that deprived her of her use or share of marital property. Moreover, the expert's use of "excess earning methodology" was an acceptable means of valuing a professional partnership. The award of durational maintenance for 10 years, and the $33,838.75 as an attorney's fee was affirmed.

Where Spouse Fails to Offer Evidence That Appreciation in Separate Property Resulted Solely from Passive Market Forces, and it Occurs During Marriage, it Is Presumptively Marital Property.

In Ponzi v Ponzi, 845 N.Y.S.2d 605 (4th Dept.2007) defendant appealed from a judgment and plaintiff cross-appealed from a previously entered "decision and order." The latter document did not actually order anything despite Supreme Court's statement that it "shall constitute the Order of the Court," and no appeal lies from a mere decision. Nevertheless the Appellate Division exercised its discretion to treat the notice of cross appeal as valid and deem the cross appeal as taken from the judgment. It concluded that the court properly determined that the balance of defendant's U.S. Government Thrift Savings Plan (Savings Plan), with the exception of the amount in the Savings Plan at the time of the marriage, was marital property subject to equitable distribution. Here, the parties agreed that the amount in the Savings Plan at the time of the marriage was $9,156.87 and was defendant's separate property. Defendant failed, however, to offer evidence that the appreciation in that separate property resulted solely from passive market forces. Thus, because the appreciation occurred during the marriage, it was presumptively marital property, and defendant failed to overcome the presumption by establishing that the property was separate. The record supported the court's distribution of the pension. It was within the court's discretion to direct defendant to select a 50% survivor pay-out option for her pension and to direct that plaintiff's share of each periodic payment be calculated as though defendant has selected an option providing for the highest periodic payment during her lifetime so that plaintiff's share of that asset would not be impaired. The contention of defendant that plaintiff's share of her pension should be reduced because she was a federal employee and thus ineligible to receive Social Security benefits was not properly before the court because that contention was improperly raised for the first time in defendant's reply brief. The court's award of maintenance to plaintiff of $325 per week for five years, which was determined following a thorough analysis of the parties' finances, was not an abuse of discretion. The record established that defendant was the primary earner throughout the 10-year marriage, that plaintiff was presently unemployed and receiving a disability pension, that there was a large disparity in the parties' incomes, and that the total amount of plaintiff's pension income and the maintenance award was more than adequate to meet the reasonable needs of plaintiff, in view of his predivorce standard of living.

Abuse of Discretion to Award Life Insurance Policies to Wife Where Husband Uninsurable

In Howard v Howard, 845 N.Y.S.2d 503 (3d Dept., 2007) the parties identified and valued their marital assets by stipulation. Supreme Court, in making essentially an equal division of assets, ordered that defendant receive the cash surrender value ($104,565.25) of plaintiff's five whole life insurance policies, making no direction concerning the payment of this sum but apparently awarding ownership of these policies to defendant. Supreme Court directed plaintiff to maintain two term policies, with face amounts of $125,000 and $700,000, for the benefit of defendant until all maintenance and distributive award sums were paid. Plaintiff was also ordered to pay defendant maintenance of $6,000 per month until, absent the death of either party or defendant's remarriage, December 1, 2008, retroactive to January 9, 2004, and $37,294.19 toward defendant's counsel fees of $48,787.31. The Appellate Division found that its review of plaintiff's testimony that he was now uninsurable and wanted to retain ownership of the policies, coupled with the proposal in defendant's statement of proposed disposition that plaintiff retain ownership of these policies, clearly indicated that the parties intended that plaintiff would retain ownership. Further, as the cash surrender value of these policies was listed in the parties' stipulation of marital assets, it is these values which were subject to equitable distribution. The abuse of discretion in awarding ownership of the policies to defendant was evident if plaintiff were to suddenly die, in which event defendant would receive over $961,000 more than her insurable interest (see Insurance Law s 3205[a][1]; [b][2]). While it was possible to resolve this issue by surrendering the policies and paying the cash received to defendant, the more equitable solution under these circumstances was to increase the distributive award by $104,565.25 and direct additional payments to defendant, thus allowing plaintiff to retain ownership of the policies. When this sum is added to the approximate sums owed defendant with respect to the unpaid distributive award and maintenance at the time judgment was entered, there was no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court directing that plaintiff maintain both term policies in full force and effect for defendant's benefit. Nevertheless, defendant's interest should be limited to the amount necessary to pay any unpaid maintenance or distributive award in the event of plaintiff's death. In view of the amount of equitable distribution, the separate property of defendant and her work experience and education, Supreme Court properly acted within its discretion in awarding durational maintenance.

Denial of Counsel Fees Proper Exercise of Discretion

In Cerami v Cerami, 44 A.D.3d 815, 845 N.Y.S.2d 67 (2d Dept. 2007) Supreme Court, Westchester County (Tolbert, J.) declined to award the wife counsel fees, awarded her $3,300 per month for suitable housing for herself and the parties' child, awarded her $2,134.35 per month for child support, and awarded her durational maintenance in the sum of $1,500 per month until the earlier of the closing of the sale of the marital residence or November 30, 2006. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that the husband's retirement accounts constituted voluntarily-deferred income with respect to pension and retirement benefits, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(b)(5)(iii)(F), for purposes of calculating child support. However, since the court properly considered the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(f), in deciding to cap the combined parental income at $225,000, the court declined to disturb the child support determination. Considering, inter alia, that this was a relatively short marriage, and that the wife is capable of re-entering the work force and becoming self-sufficient, the court's limitation on the duration of the husband's maintenance obligation was proper. The denial of the wife's application for counsel fees was a provident exercise of the trial court's discretion. The wife received a $300,000 lump sum payment, as per the prenuptial agreement, as well as an award of $3,300 per month as a tax-free housing allowance to last until the emancipation of the child of the marriage, age four at the time of the judgment.

Maintenance Award Denied

In Zwickel v Szajer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4197482 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1989. At the time of their marriage, plaintiff was 28 years old, had earned a Bachelor's degree in aviation management and flight technology and was employed as a pilot; defendant was 43 years old and also was employed in the aviation field as a first officer (copilot). The parties' first child was born in 1991. Plaintiff was furloughed from her employment from 1993 to 1994, and the parties apparently lived separate and apart in 1995, 1996 and 1997. Following a reconciliation, their second child was born in 1998, and the parties resided together until they separated again in 2001. In the interim, plaintiff was out on disability from 1997 until some point in late 2001 or early 2002, at which time she returned to work as a copilot for American Airlines. Plaintiff commenced this action for divorce in September 2003. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court gave appropriate consideration to each of the enumerated factors in awarding maintenance. It noted that at the time the underlying action was commenced, plaintiff was 42 years old and, thus, was eligible to continue flying as a pilot for another 18 years. Defendant, on the other hand, was then 57 years old and, hence, only three years away from being ineligible to fly. Defendant testified that he had taken a job as a flight training manager in order to avoid mandatory retirement once he turned 60 years old in June 2006. Supreme Court further noted that although the parties married in 1989, their extended periods of separation resulted in them actually residing together as spouses for only roughly 10 years, thereby negating plaintiff's claim that this was a marriage of long duration. As to the issue of predivorce standard of living, the court noted that due to plaintiff's extended absences from work, during which time defendant's income was the parties' sole means of support, their predivorce standard of living was, for a substantial portion of their marriage, based upon only one income. In short, Supreme Court concluded that given the parties' respective educations, training and future employment prospects, as well as the history of their marriage and the remaining statutory factors, an award of maintenance to plaintiff was not warranted. The Appellate Division also held that the approximately $18,000 that plaintiff spent on the parties' daughter's Bat Mitzvah, was expended after the commencement of the matrimonial action and, did not qualify as a marital debt. In any event, given that defendant was neither consulted on nor invited to the celebration, and in the absence of any testimony as to the reasonableness of the sums expended, it could not say that Supreme Court erred in denying plaintiff's request for reimbursement.

Income Properly Imputed to Husband

In Calciano v Calciano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 3318042 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which awarded the plaintiff $175,000, representing one-half of the previously-satisfied mortgage on the marital residence, and imputed an annual income to him of $90,000 for the purpose of its child support calculation. It held that the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the wife one-half of the value of the satisfied mortgage on the marital residence based upon the wife's contributions as a spouse and homemaker and that the court providently exercised its discretion in imputing $90,000 a year in income to the husband based upon his past income and earning potential.

Marital Fault Not Relevant under EDL Except in Rare Instances in Which Misconduct Is Egregious and Shocking

In Kaur v Singh, 843 N.Y.S.2d 350 (2d Dept, 2007) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in taking marital fault into account in awarding the plaintiff 75% of the marital assets. Marital fault is not a relevant consideration under the equitable distribution provisions of the Domestic Relations Law, except in those rare instances in which the misconduct is so egregious and shocking that the court is compelled to invoke its equitable power so that justice may be done between the parties. No such egregious misconduct was established at trial. Nevertheless, upon its independent review of the full trial record, the Appellate Division found that there was ample evidence of economic fault on the part of the defendant to justify the distribution of assets made here (citing Blickstein v. Blickstein, 99 A.D.2d at 293, 472 N.Y.S.2d 110; see also K. v. B., 13 A.D.3d 12, 18-19, 784 N.Y.S.2d 76) and on that basis, it affirmed the equitable distribution award.

Impermissible Double Recovery Reversed on Appeal

In Bozman v Bozman, 43 A.D.3d 1345, 843 N.Y.S.2d 481 (4th Dept.2007) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding a credit of $5,000 to defendant from the proceeds from the sale of a business started up during the marriage in addition to awarding him 50% of the value of that marital property, and modified the judgment accordingly. Defendant testified at the hearing that he received a $5,000 gift from his mother to start up the business, and it concluded that the $5,000 was a "voluntary contribution of [defendant's] separate property to the marital economic partnership which resulted in the creation of a marital asset" (citing Garvey v. Garvey, 223 A.D.2d 968, 971, 636 N.Y.S.2d 893). The court therefore erred in awarding a $5,000 credit to defendant in addition to an equal division of the proceeds derived from the sale of the business inasmuch as defendant thereby received an impermissible double recovery.

Courts Imputing Income must Provide a Clear Record of the Source of the Imputed Income, the Reasons for Such Imputation, and the Resultant Calculations

In Rosenberg v Rosenberg, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 3197021 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1994 and had one child born in 2000. In May 2003 the plaintiff husband commenced this action for a divorce and ancillary relief. On October 16, 2003, the parties stipulated that the husband would have visitation with the child from Sunday mornings through Tuesday evenings and on Thursday evenings. This schedule was subsequently extended and remained in effect throughout the trial. After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court awarded custody of the parties' child to the wife and directed, inter alia, that the husband shall have only supervised visitation for a minimum of three years. The Appellate Division reversed this provision noting that supervised visitation with a child is required only where it is shown that unsupervised visitation would be detrimental to the child". The flaws in the husband's character and judgment cited by the Supreme Court as necessitating supervised visitation were known by the professionals involved in the case, yet not one witness or professional report mentioned concerns with the appropriateness of unsupervised visitation. The forensic evaluator recommended that the unsupervised schedule be continued and the Law Guardian took a similar position. Recommendations of court-appointed evaluators and the position of the Law Guardian are factors to be considered and are entitled to some weight, but are not determinative. The child's therapist of two years recommended one overnight visitation and two daytime visitations per week, with a possibility of increasing visitation as the child aged. Even the wife, who had opposed overnight visitation, did not seek supervised visitation. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court's determination to limit the husband's visitation with the child to supervised visitation in a therapeutic program selected by the wife for a minimum of three years was unsupported by the record and an improvident exercise of discretion. The matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for a new trial on the issue of visitation. The Supreme Court also erred in imputing income in its computation of the husband's child support obligation. In determining a parent's child support obligation, a court need not rely upon the parent's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the parent's past income or demonstrated earning potential. Trial courts are afforded considerable discretion in determining whether to impute income to a parent. However, they must provide a clear record of the source of the imputed income, the reasons for such imputation, and the resultant calculations. The Supreme Court imputed income of $100,000 to the husband based on its finding that the husband lacked credibility regarding his finances and the earnings of his Web site business, his lifestyle, and the implication that he maintained some connection to his formerly owned bakery, which had been foreclosed upon and sold in 2004. The imputation of income for an ongoing connection with his former bakery was unsupported by the record and wholly speculative. Since the Supreme Court failed to "specify the sources of income imputed, the actual dollar amount assigned to each category, and the resultant calculations" the Court was unable to determine what portion of the imputed income resulted from this error and the issue of child support was remitted for a new determination.

Lifetime Maintenance Award Inequitable in View of Sizable Distributive Award.

In Genatowski v Genatowski 842 N.Y.S.2d 550 (2d Dept., 2007) Supreme Court awarded the wife, in effect, the sum of $962,421 as a distributive award, awarded her maintenance for a period of five years, and declined to award her an equitable share in certain stock options. The Appellate Division increased the distributive award to $1,043,923 because of an error in computation. It held that contrary to the defendant's contention, despite the disparity in the parties' incomes, a lifetime award of maintenance would be inequitable in view of her sizable distributive award, and her equal share of the retirement assets.

Husbands Share of Enhanced Earning Capacity Reduced Where No Evidence That He Sacrificed Career Opportunities During Time Wife Was Pursuing Her Degree.

In Midy v Midy, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2007 WL 3317656 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the wife contended on Appeal that the Supreme Court erred in awarding the husband 50% of her enhanced earning capacity as a result of her attainment of a master's degree in speech pathology during the course of the marriage. The wife testified that the husband did not ever look after their child while she was studying for her master's degree, nor did he ever assist her in any way in her attainment of her master's degree. While both parties agreed that they hired a babysitter to care for the child while the wife was in school, the husband testified that, although he continued to work full time while the wife was in school, he cared for the parties' child during the time when he was not working, relieved the wife of her household chores so that she could study, maintained the household, took the child to school and activities, and assisted the wife with her studies, as he had a similar background in special education. There was no evidence that the husband sacrificed any career opportunities during the time the wife was pursuing her degree. The Appellate Division found that the husband's contributions did not warrant an award of 50% of the wife's enhanced earning capacity and that an award of 25% of the wife's enhanced earning capacity was appropriate. The Appellate court also found that property located in Coral Springs, Florida, was purchased by the parties in 1997 for $270,000 subject to a mortgage in the approximate sum of $243,000, which both parties executed. In 1998 the wife received a $500,000 as a gift from her family, which the husband conceded was her separate property. It was deposited in a joint bank account of the parties in January of 1998. On February 2, 1998, $216,238.58 was withdrawn from that account and utilized to pay off the then remaining balance of the mortgage on the Coral Springs property. Since the wife acknowledged that she deposited the funds into this joint account with the specific intention that the funds should belong to the husband in the event of her death, the Supreme Court did not err in concluding that the wife evinced an intent to change the character of such funds from separate to marital property. Since the husband conceded that the monies for the mortgage payoff originally derived from the wife's separate property, and the funds remained in the joint account for an exceedingly brief period of time (i.e., excluding the possibility of significant enhancement due to the economic partnership of the parties), it was an improvident exercise of discretion for the Supreme Court to, in essence, deny the wife a credit of $216,238.58 for her financial contribution to this asset. The Appellate Division modified the judgment of divorce to reflect this credit to the wife, after which the division of the remainder of the net proceeds of the sale was to be divided equally between the parties.

Equitable does not mean equal

In Faello v Faello, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2782997 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court directed that the plaintiff husband receive $200,000 from the net proceeds of the sale of the parties' residence in Florida, with 85% of the remaining balance distributed to the husband and 15% distributed to her, and awarded her maintenance of $600 per month for a period of 54 months. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that contrary to the wife's contention, the court's distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the parties' Florida residence was proper. Equitable does not mean equal. While the Florida residence, purchased in the parties' joint names, was marital property, the husband used proceeds from the sale of his separate property to purchase the residence as well as its furnishings and incidentals. Therefore, there was no basis upon which to disturb the court's finding that the husband was entitled to the sum of $200,000 for the purchase price of the house and its furnishings and incidentals, which were derived from his separate property.

Marital Residence Generally considered Passive Asset Valued as of Date of Trial

In Newman v Newman, 825 N.Y.S.2d 714 (2d Dept, 2007) the Appellate Division pointed out that a marital residence is generally considered a passive asset which is valued as of the date of the trial. This is especially the case where the dramatic increase in the value of real property is attributable to market forces rather than the contributions of either party. It held that in calculating the distributive award, in light of the fact that the defendant was given a credit for the value of his separate property, the plaintiff was entitled to a credit for the defendant's pre-existing debt on that property, which became the marital residence.

Error to Award Retroactive Maintenance Where Not Requested Until Statement of Proposed Disposition

In Jalowiec v Jalowiec, — NYS 2d ---838 N.Y.S.2d 323 (4th Dept, 2007) the defendant contended that, because plaintiff did not request maintenance until she served a "Statement of Proposed Disposition," Supreme Court erred in making the award of maintenance retroactive to the date of commencement of the action. The Appellate Division agreed and modified the judgment accordingly.

Failure to Award Distribution of Marital Residence Remedied By Appellate Division

In O'Donnell v O'Donnell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1631270 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, after a nonjury trial, failed to award equitable distribution of the marital residence, awarded the wife exclusive ownership of the marital residence, directed the husband to pay child support of $2,083 per month, directed him to pay 60% of the children's tuition, school fees, and "extraneous sporting/recreational expenses," and directed him to pay 60% of the wife's attorneys fees. The Appellate Division held that where, as here, both spouses equally contribute to a marriage of long duration, the division of marital property shall be distributed equitably between the parties. The husband was entitled to a 50% share of the value of the marital residence. It directed that upon remittal, the court should also determine the net value of the marital residence, as of the date of trial, crediting the wife for her payments of principal on the mortgage for the property, and that the court should also determine how the marital residence shall be distributed. The Appellate Division held that the trial court improperly found, in effect, that the husband's law degree and license had no value for purposes of equitable distribution. Based on the record, the law degree and license together should have been valued in the amount of $150,000 and the wife should have been awarded 30% of that value to be credited from the husband's share of the proceeds from the equitable distribution of the marital residence. The wife's limited notice of cross appeal precluded review of the issue of the timing of the distribution of her share of the husband's retirement plans and the court's failure to award her 100% of her attorneys' fees. (see Boyle v. Taylor, 255 A.D.2d 411).

Clear and Unambiguous French Prenuptial Agreement Upheld to Deny Wife Equitable Distribution

In Van Kipnis v Van Kipnis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2003419 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Plaintiff wife and defendant husband were married in Paris, France, in 1965. Prior to the ceremony, and at the request of the wife, the parties agreed to execute a "Contrat de Mariage" (Contract), which is a form of prenuptial agreement under the French Civil Code. The expressly stated purpose of the Contract was to opt out of the "community property regime," which is the custom in France, in favor of a "separation of estates" property regime. The first article of the Contract, which is titled "MARITAL PROPERTY SYSTEM," provided: "The future spouses declare that they are adopting the marital property system of separation of estates, as established by the French Civil Code. Consequently, each spouse shall retain ownership and possession of the chattels and real property that he/she may own at this time or may come to own subsequently by any means whatsoever. They shall not be liable for each other's debts established before or during the marriage or encumbering the inheritances and gifts that they receive. The wife shall have all the rights and powers over her assets accorded by law to women married under the separate-estates system without any restriction." Shortly after the marriage the parties moved to New York, where they resided throughout their 38-year marriage. The husband acquired liquid assets of approximately $7 million and the wife of approximately $700,000-$800,000. The parties kept their assets completely separate throughout the course of their marriage. However, the parties jointly owned a country home in Lenox, Massachusetts, valued at $625,000, and a cooperative apartment at 860 Fifth Avenue, in Manhattan valued at $1.8 million. At the hearing, the wife testified that the Contract was executed for the sole purpose of opting out of the community property system of France, and instead adopting a complete separation of estates, whereby each party could not be held liable for the other's debts. She also admitted, however, that the husband executed the Contract at her insistence, that he had no money at the time of the marriage and that she had never moved to set the Contract aside during the marriage. The husband offered a similar understanding of the Contract. Expert testimony established that article 1536 of the French Civil Code provides different choices of matrimonial regimes; that by signing the Contract the parties opted out of France's community property regime and chose a regime of separate property; that the legal effect of this selection was that each spouse retained the unfettered right to administer, enjoy and freely dispose of his or her separate property throughout the marriage and continuing through its dissolution; and that divorce is never mentioned in a marriage contract. The Referee upheld the Contract.,

finding that "it is clear that these parties entered into a prenuptial agreement ... which governed the economics of their 38 year marriage, and is likewise applicable in the circumstances of their divorce." Thus, the Referee determined that the parties were to retain ownership of the assets held in their respective names. With respect to the jointly held properties, the Referee recommended that wife be awarded the co-op apartment and reimbursed $75,000 for repairs and furnishings therein, and that the husband be awarded the Massachusetts country home. The Referee also ruled that the Contract did not constitute a waiver by the wife of the right to receive maintenance. In determining the amount and duration of maintenance, the Referee considered, inter alia, the marital standard of living, which it described as "relatively modest," in arriving at a sum of $7,500 per month, payable until either the husband or wife dies or the wife remarries. In addition, after subtracting the amount of fees allegedly attributable to the wife's challenge to the Contract, which it found were not compensable, the Referee awarded the wife an additional $92,779 in attorneys' fees. On appeal, the wife argued that the enforceability of the Contract was irrelevant since, even if enforceable, it was not applicable to this divorce proceeding, since the intent was to shield each spouse's assets from the other's creditors during the marriage, and not to govern the distribution of property upon divorce. She noted that although the Contract specifically provides that each spouse "shall not be liable for each other's debts established before or during the marriage," it makes no mention of the disposition or distribution of property in the event of divorce, and contains no express waiver of property rights if the parties decided to divorce. She also noted that both parties testified that neither of them understood the Contract as having any relevance to divorce. The First Department held that because the Contract unambiguously provides for separate ownership of property and extrinsic evidence should not have been considered to create an ambiguity or vary its terms, it would affirm that portion of the order which found the contract to be enforceable and applicable. It rejected the wife's argument that the Contract should not be enforced because it is not "an agreement for the disposition of ... property" within the meaning of Domestic Relations Law [DRL] 236(B)(5). Although the wife was correct that the Contract was not an agreement for the disposition of property, DRL

236(B)(3) authorizes enforcement of agreements that include "(2) provision for the ownership, division or distribution of separate and marital property" (emphasis added).

Moreover, DRL 236(B)(1)(d)(4) defines "separate property" as including

"property described as separate property by written agreement of the parties." Thus, the DRL specifically authorizes agreements to treat what might otherwise be marital property as separate property for purposes of equitable distribution. This is precisely what occurred in this case, where the Contract described each spouse's property held at the time of marriage or acquired thereafter as separate property. The court's award of $7,500 per month in maintenance, which would result in an approximate annual pre-tax incomes of $126,000 for the wife and $335,000 for the husband, was a proper exercise of discretion as was the $92,779.57 in attorneys' fees to the wife. Although the wife requested an additional $177,000 in fees (the husband had already paid $160,000), the Referee correctly ruled that under DRL 237 the wife was not entitled to fees incurred in challenging the enforceability of a prenuptial agreement. Moreover, because the legal bills submitted by the wife's attorney failed to clearly delineate those legal services that were unrelated to the wife's challenge to the agreement, and thus compensable under DRL 237, the court properly exercised its discretion in awarding the amount that it did.

No Basis To Disturb Award Based on Credibility and Conduct in Litigation.

In Saleh v Saleh, 836 N.Y.S.2d 201 (2d Dept., 2007) the Appellate Division held that the trial court "is vested with broad discretion in making an equitable distribution of marital property" and unless it can be shown that the court improvidently exercised that discretion, its determination should not be disturbed. Based upon consideration of each party's credibility and the particular facts presented in this case, including the defendant's failure to comply with court-ordered demands for discovery regarding the subject businesses, his failure to pay for a court-appointed neutral appraiser to appraise the businesses, as directed by the court, and his invocation of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination on several occasions in response to questions regarding unreported income and the finances of the businesses, the Appellate Division perceived no basis for disturbing the trial court's equitable distribution.

Spouse Not Entitled to Portion of Equity in Separate Marital Residence Gained Through Reduction in Mortgage Where Rental Income Paid Mortgage. Income Imputed Improperly.

In Burtchaell v Burtchaell,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2050797 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1994 and had one child (born in 1997). Plaintiff commenced the action in 2004. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in determining the amount of maintenance and awarding it for two years. The parties were in their early 40s, plaintiff had prior back problems, defendant was disabled due to seizures, anxiety and depression and their son had multiple disabilities. Plaintiff was employed and also received minimal income from his self-run business, although the court did not quantify the exact amount of such income. Defendant received Social Security disability benefits and rental income from apartments in the marital residence, which the court found to be separate property. Although defendant has been disabled since 1997 and took care of the parties' son, she previously worked full time and she acted as a bookkeeper for plaintiff's business during the marriage notwithstanding her disability and the child's disability. The record did not reveal the extent of her disability, but did demonstrate her ability to work at home as a bookkeeper.

Because it was impossible to determine how much income plaintiff reaped from his business, the court found that the amount was minimal and could be adequately absorbed by simply declining to deduct plaintiff's $200 per week maintenance obligation from his gross income prior to determining the child support award. That maintenance obligation should have been deducted to determine plaintiff's child support income (see Domestic Relations Law s 240[1-b][b][5] [vii][C]). Although the trial court has considerable discretion in fashioning a support award, including the imputation of income to a party for support purposes the court erred in the method of calculating support. While both approaches may appear to result in the same amount of child support, the proper method is to add in $200 per week as income imputed to plaintiff from his business, then subtract his $200 per week maintenance obligation. Plaintiff's 17% basic child support obligation considering his 60% contribution to the combined parental income gave rise to a monthly award of $525.

The Appellate Division held that Plaintiff was not entitled to a portion of the equity in the marital residence gained through a reduction in the mortgage balance. The residence was defendant's separate property, having been acquired prior to the marriage. If marital assets are used to reduce one party's separate indebtedness, the other spouse can recoup his or her equitable share of the expended marital funds. Both parties testified that rental income from apartments on the property produced nearly enough money to pay the mortgage, and there was no proof that any mortgage payments were made using marital funds. Under these circumstances, Supreme Court appropriately refused to allow plaintiff to recoup any portion of the reduction of the mortgage debt.

Supreme Court found that plaintiff's business was marital property. The court found that the business had minimal income, so it awarded the business to plaintiff to offset a $12,000 credit from the marital residence. Neither party submitted an appraisal or valuation of the business. Tax returns showed that the income from the business in the year prior to commencement of the action was basically cancelled out by debts, expenses and depreciation, resulting in no taxable income. The business owned some assets, such as a truck and trailer, but the proof regarding the equity in those assets was slim. Granting deference to the court's analysis of the weight of the evidence, as the trier of fact, the Appellate Division would not disturb its finding that defendant is entitled to $12,000 as her equitable portion of the business.

Obligation to Provide for Future College Expenses Not Subject to Deviation Rules

In Cimons v Cimons, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2457243 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Second Department in an opinion by Justice Angiolillo, held that, under the circumstances presented here, the obligation to provide for the future college expenses of the children was not part of the parties' basic child support obligation and therefore was not subject to the CSSA requirement that any deviation from statutorily-mandated child support obligations must be recited and explained in a stipulation of settlement. Even though the parties violated the CSSA by failing to recite and explain in their stipulation why they deviated from CSSA standards in providing basic child support, and the basic child support provisions were properly vacated as a consequence, the provision concerning future college expenses survived the vacatur, and was enforceable.

The parties entered into a stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged in a judgment of separation. Subsequent to the entry of the judgment, the father moved to vacate the child support and related provisions of the stipulation, alleging that the stipulation failed to comply with the "opt-out/deviation" provisions of the CSSA contained in Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h). The Supreme Court determined, in effect, that the parties' agreement deviated from the provisions of the CSSA with regard to the calculation of "basic child support." Since the parties failed to comply with the provisions of Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h), those basic child support provisions were not enforceable, and the Supreme Court vacated those provisions of the parties' stipulation relating to their basic child support obligation for their three children, ultimately scheduling a hearing for a calculation of basic child support pursuant to the CSSA. However, Supreme Court denied the father's motion to vacate the separate provisions of the stipulation that related to the parties' agreement to provide for their children's future college expenses.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that a parent has an obligation to provide support for his or her child's basic needs, an obligation which is addressed in Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(c)(1), (2). Unlike that basic obligation, support for a child's college education is not mandatory. Absent a voluntary agreement, a parent might be required to provide support for his or her child's attendance at college, but the determination of that obligation is dependent upon the exercise of the court's discretion in accordance with Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(c)(7).

Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h) requires that any agreement or stipulation voluntarily entered into between the parties, and presented to the court for incorporation in an order or judgment, must include provisions: (1) stating that the parties have been advised of the provisions of the CSSA; (2) stating that the basic child support provisions of the CSSA would presumptively result in the determination of the correct amount of child support to be awarded; (3) stating what the amount of basic child support would have been if calculated pursuant to the CSSA, if the parties' stipulation or agreement deviates from the basic child support obligation; and (4) setting forth the parties' reason or reasons for deviating from the CSSA calculation, if they have chosen to deviate. The requirements of Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(h) may not be waived by either party or by counsel.

The Appellate Division noted that in contrast to the add-ons for child care expenses and future reasonable health care expenses, which must be awarded and prorated in the same proportion or percentage as each parent's income bears to the combined parental income, the add-on for educational expenses is within the court's discretion, both as to whether an award of such expenses is to be made in the first instance, and the parties' share of any amount awarded. Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(c)(7).

Where the parties' stipulation or agreement fails to comply with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(h), it is fundamental that the basic child support provisions of the agreement are invalid and cannot be enforced. That portion of the agreement must be set aside and the parties' basic child support obligation must be recalculated through the application of the CSSA. Nonetheless, the invalidity of the basic child support obligation, due to a deviation from the CSSA standards without full compliance with Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h), does not necessarily require that the entire stipulation be vacated. That a portion of an agreement may be invalid and unenforceable does not necessarily preclude the enforcement of other portions of an agreement. (Ferro v. Bologna, 31 N.Y.2d 30).

The Court held that the determination as to which additional aspects, if any, of the parties' stipulation must be vacated along with the basic child support provision depends on the circumstances of the particular case and the nature of the obligations addressed in the other provisions of a stipulation. Some provisions may be so directly connected or intertwined with the basic child support obligation that they necessarily must be recalculated along with the basic support obligation. Unlike child care expenses and unreimbursed health care expenses, education expenses are not directly connected to the basic child support calculation. Initially, education expenses differ from these other expenses in that, in the absence of an agreement to pay education expenses, the determination as to whether or not such expenses will be paid is within the court's discretion (see Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][c][7]), while child care and unreimbursed health expenses are mandatory. Also, education expenses differ in that such expenses are not necessarily prorated in the same proportion or percentage as each parent's income bears to the combined parental income.

The Court held that the entirety of the stipulation should be considered in determining whether the parties' agreement evinces that trade-offs were made which involved the basic child support figure. In such a situation, expenses that are not directly connected to the CSSA calculation, or even to child support, may be so closely intertwined with the basic child support provision as to require vacatur. This case fell within the ambit of cases that have clearly stated that the tuition expense aspect of a college education is distinct from basic child support.

The parties' stipulation, insofar as it pertained to their support for their children's attendance at college, recited as follows: "The parties further acknowledge, each to the other, that it is their anticipation that each of their children attends college. And in this regard, the parties agree to contribute pro rata to income to the minimum of a SUNY education. That is State of New York education for a New York State resident for each child and shall contribute more than that minimum, if possible, based upon their respective financial circumstances at the time each child makes application to college. College expenses with respect to the parties' obligation, to pay for same pro rata to income is defined as including but not limited to tuition, room and board, mandatory books, supplies and fees, pre-college testing classes and actual testing, such as the SATs, scholastic aptitude tests and reasonable number of applications to colleges for purposes of the child or children reviewing campuses for purposes of making a final decision with respect to the selection of college."

The court held that to the extent that the commitment to meet future college expenses addressed room and board, the agreement did not deviate from the CSSA as it provided that the parties will contribute to such expenses pro rata to income. The stipulation also included extensive provisions as to how the parties are to deal with various custodial funds that had been earmarked for college education expenses, including a recital that such funds would be utilized in the first instance before triggering the parties' obligation to contribute to college expenses proportionally based on their income.

There was nothing in the record that would support a finding that the father agreed to pay a share of college expenses as a trade-off against some other expense. When the parties agreed to equitable distribution and traded off certain assets, the stipulation directly addressed those trade-offs. Thus, the wife received sole title to the marital residence in exchange for waiving any claim to the husband's pension, IRA, or deferred-compensation account. Similarly, the wife waived any claim to certain stock in exchange for the husband's waiver of any claim to a joint bank account. Additionally, the provisions of the parties' stipulation regarding college expenses were distinguishable from those provisions of the stipulation based upon the calculation of basic child support. In particular, the stipulation provided: "Mr. Cimons shall pay child support for the benefit of the children and to the age of 21 or 22, if in college." The father's agreement to support his children and contribute to their college education expenses beyond the age of 21 years inured primarily to the benefit of the three children. As it is the intent of the CSSA to protect the children, to the extent possible, from the economic consequences of their parents' divorce or separation, it would seem particularly unjust to allow the father, whose adjusted income, in 2005, after deduction of all mandatory deductions including his maintenance obligation, was reported as $130,000, to wield noncompliance with the CSSA as a sword to eviscerate his commitment to provide his children with support for their college education.

Failure to Raise Defect in Child Support Agreement by Way of a Timely Objection Not Fatal.

In Matter of Usenza v Swift, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2278869 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) by consent order entered in 2001, the parties were awarded joint legal and physical custody of the child. At a support hearing held in March 2005, the parties orally agreed that the father would pay $750 per month in child support to the mother, retroactive to September 2004. A subsequent hearing was held in July 2005 to address an administrative adjustment to the existing support order, which resulted in an amended order of support. In January 2006, the father sought a modification of the July 2005 order on the ground that it failed to comply with the Child Support Standards Act and that a change of circumstances had occurred. A Support Magistrate issued a June 2006 order dismissing the father's modification petition, finding that the father's failure to file written objections from the July 2005 support order precluded his argument that it violated the CSSA and that he failed to establish a change of circumstances. Family Court denied the father's objections and he appealed. The Appellate Division held that the July 2005 order of support had to be set aside because the parties' agreement to deviate from the CSSA failed to comply with the requirements of Family Ct Act 413(1)(h). This provision requires that all such agreements or stipulations contain an acknowledgment that the parties have been advised of the CSSA, a statement "that the basic child support obligation provided for therein would presumptively result in the correct amount of child support to be awarded" and a specification as to what the amount of support would have been under the statute. The requirement that the agreement so provide cannot be waived by either party" and, therefore father's failure to raise this defect by way of a timely objection to the July 2005 order was not fatal. The parties appeared before the Support Magistrate, unrepresented by counsel, and engaged in an oral colloquy whereby the father agreed to pay $750 per month in child support. In so doing, the Support Magistrate advised the father that the amount he would be required to pay under the "[g]uidelines" would be $425 per month. However, in its subsequent findings of fact and order incorporating the oral stipulation, the Support Magistrate correctly found that the father's basic child support obligation under the CSSA was $398 per month. The record of the oral stipulation was devoid of evidence that the parties were advised of the provisions of the CSSA, and the Support Magistrate's mere reference to the "[g]uidelines" was insufficient to satisfy this statutory directive. The stipulation failed to establish that the parties were apprised that the application of the statute "would presumptively result in the correct amount of child support to be awarded". Thus, the omission of these statutory catechisms rendered the stipulation and resulting order unenforceable and the court was required to disregard it and address the support issue de novo. The matter was remitted to Family Court to determine the amount the father must pay in child support pursuant to the provisions of the CSSA. The court noted that while the CSSA prohibits a court from entering a final order of child support unless an unrepresented parent has received a copy of the child support standards chart, the record did not reflect that the father received such chart prior to the entering of the order. Since the July 2005 order of support was invalid since its inception, it vacated Family Court's finding that the father was in willful violation.

Proper to Move to Enforce the Provision of Stipulation Requiring Transfer of IRA Account

In Rawlings v Rawlings, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2278869 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the plaintiff husband and the defendant wife executed a stipulation of settlement on August 3, 2001, settling all issues in the case. With respect to equitable distribution, the stipulation provided, inter alia, that the plaintiff possessed a First Trust IRA account with a stated value of $75,000, but that the assets held therein were subject to change and were expected to be revalued to approximately $45,000 to $50,000. The stipulation further provided that the plaintiff was obligated to transfer the account to the wife "[w]ithin 30 days of the execution of this agreement." The parties' stipulation of settlement was incorporated but not merged in their subsequent judgment of divorce, entered December 13, 2001, which expressly directed them to comply with its terms. However, notwithstanding repeated requests by the wife and her counsel, the plaintiff failed to transfer the subject account. Indeed, he did not tender it to her until several years following the execution of the stipulation, by which time it had become worthless. The defendant subsequently moved, inter alia, to enforce the IRA transfer provision, to recover the reduction in value of the account between the time it should have been transferred by the plaintiff and the time it actually was transferred, and for an award of an attorney's fee. The Supreme Court denied those branches of the defendant's motion. The Appellate Division reversed. It found that the defendant properly moved to enforce the provision of the stipulation requiring the transfer of the subject account. Since the account was now worthless she was also entitled to recover the reduction in value, if any, of the account since the time the plaintiff originally was required to transfer it to her.

On Motion to Dismiss at Close of Petitioner's Proof, Court must Accept Petitioner's Evidence as True, Afford Petitioner Every Favorable Inference and Resolve All Credibility Questions in Petitioner's Favor

In Matter of David WW v Laureen QQ, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2002451 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner filed a custody modification petition as a result of Jacob's unacceptable academic performance, his desire to live with petitioner, his poor relationship with respondent's husband, and an incident where respondent's husband allegedly assaulted Jacob and respondent had Jacob removed from the home by police and taken to the hospital for a mental health evaluation. Respondent filed a cross petition to modify visitation. At a hearing on the petitions, after petitioner presented eight witnesses and two of respondent's witnesses testified out of order, petitioner rested. Respondent moved for a directed verdict. Family Court disregarded Jacob's testimony and any testimony based on information received from him, determining that Jacob was not a reliable witness. Without this testimony, the court determined that petitioner failed to present a prima facie case and dismissed his petition. Respondent then rested. Family Court granted respondent sole legal custody of both children. The Appellate Division reversed on the law. It held that when deciding a motion to dismiss at the close of a petitioner's proof, the court must accept the petitioner's evidence as true and afford the petitioner every favorable inference that could reasonably be drawn from that evidence, including resolving all credibility questions in the petitioner's favor. At the close of petitioner's case the court acknowledged that it was resolving credibility questions in a manner that would require it to disregard large portions of testimony offered on petitioner's case. Thus, the court did not adhere to the proper standard when considering the motion. It found that Family Court should have denied respondent's motion to dismiss the petition because petitioner presented sufficient prima facie evidence of a change in circumstances and a need to modify custody to ensure the child's best interests. It remitted for further proceedings on the custody and visitation petitions before a different judge.

Mother Equitably Estopped From Challenging Surrender in Adoption Proceedings

In Matter of Female Infant B, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1902483 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) then Appellate Division, First Department applied the doctrine of equitable estoppel to prevent the effect of an invalid surrender. Female Infant B., the subject child of this private placement adoption, was born November 9, 2003. The following day, Infant B. was placed in the care of petitioners, the adoptive parents, with whom she has continuously lived since that time. On November 18, 2003, a surrender agreement was executed by respondent, the biological mother, and, on January 30, 2004, petitioners filed a petition for adoption. Respondent was served approximately 26 months later after a search to ascertain her whereabouts. On May 15, 2006, respondent filed a document stating that she was revoking her consent to the adoption, and she subsequently filed a writ of habeas corpus seeking the return of her child, which the court converted into an order to show cause. At a hearing on the order to show cause, respondent and the adoptive mother testified, as did the doctor who delivered Infant B. and the notary public who witnessed the execution of the surrender agreement. A friend of respondent was called as a rebuttal witness. After the hearing, the court credited the adoptive mother's testimony that respondent intended to give up the child for adoption, but found that the surrender agreement was invalid because some of the requirements of Domestic Relations Law 115-b had not been met. These included the absence of 18-point type, which the court deemed insignificant, and, more substantively, the failure to give notice that if petitioners were to contest respondent's revocation, Infant B. would not necessarily be returned to respondent and a hearing could be directed as to the best interests of the child. The court also found a significant defect in the document's failure to advise respondent of her right to an attorney and counseling, as required by Domestic Relations Law 115-b(4)(a)(v). The court concluded, however, that a best interests hearing was not required because there was sufficient credible testimony to make a finding of abandonment pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 111(2)(a). In making that finding the court concluded that respondent's contacts with the child in the months after the delivery were insubstantial and ineffectual, and that she had failed to offer financial support or take timely legal action to oppose the adoption. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that the surrender agreement did not comply with Domestic Relations Law 115-b. Aside from the improper-sized type, which, if it were the only deficiency, could be overlooked, the document failed to advise respondent of her right to an attorney and to counseling, or to notify her that even if she revoked her consent, and petitioners objected, she would not necessarily regain custody of the child. While not every violation of Domestic Relations Law s 115-b will necessarily invalidate a consent the substantial defects here include ones designed to ensure that respondent was fully informed of the consequences of the consent and it was not clear that she also was aware that even a revocation within 45 days would not guarantee the return of her baby, or that she might first have to prevail at a hearing. Nevertheless, it did not need to determine whether these defects rendered the surrender agreement invalid as it concluded that respondent's inactivity for 30 months estopped her from opposing the adoption. Infant B. was born on November 9, 2003. Respondent refused to sign the surrender agreement at that time because she claimed she wished to consult with an attorney. She signed the agreement nine days later. During the intervening time period, the baby had resided with petitioners, and the child lived with them ever since. Respondent made no attempt to have the child returned to her, either during the nine days before she signed the agreement or during the period prior to the date the petition was served on her on April 6, 2006, 2 ½ years after she signed the surrender agreement. Although she testified that she conferred with an attorney, she took no subsequent steps to revoke her consent, or even to seek visitation. Respondent also admitted that she knew she had 40 to 45 days from the signing of the surrender agreement to revoke her consent. The Appellate Division stated that "Equitable estoppel is commonly invoked in matters of paternity, child custody, visitation and support ... [but] will be applied only where its use furthers the best interests of the child or children who are the subject of the controversy" (Matter of Charles v. Charles, 296 A.D.2d 547, 549 [2002]). It is clearly not in the child's best interests to be removed from the only parents she has ever known. As has been observed, "[t]he Legislature enacted Domestic Relations Law 115-b to provide a legal framework within which future adoptions can be undertaken with reasonable guarantees of permanence and with the humane regard for the rights of the child, the biological parents and the adoptive parents" (De Filippis, 217 A.D.2d at 147). Although the surrender agreement is not in compliance with all of the statutory requirements, the same public policy concerns are no less applicable. Permitting respondent, who has not contributed any support for the child, to seek a revocation at such a late date does not further these policy goals. Furthermore, as in De Filippis, the surrender agreement here was executed after the birth of the child, when respondent had sufficient opportunity to reflect on whether she wished to cede her parental rights. As was noted in De Filippis, a prebirth consent is less likely to be the result of a fully deliberative act." The court held that the 30 month hiatus in seeking a revocation, the failure to provide support and the best interests of the child, compelled the conclusion that respondent was estopped from challenging the surrender agreement.

Provisions in Settlement Agreement Which Govern Award of Attorney's Fees, Rather than Statutory Provisions, Control.

In Berns v Halberstam, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4465050 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties settlement agreement was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce. The judgment of divorce stated that the father would have scheduled visitation with the parties' two daughters pursuant to the agreement. Article XXIV of the agreement provided that each party would pay his or her respective attorney for the rendition of services in connection with the agreement and the representation of him or her in "any lawsuit pending or to be commenced by and between the parties." Article XXVI set forth two specific circumstances where one party must pay for the other party's attorney's fees. The mother commenced proceedings for modification of the visitation provision, seeking to suspend the father's right to alternate weekend visitation. The parties settled these proceedings on the record, whereby the father's visitation rights were modified. The mother moved for an award of an attorney's fee, not pursuant to Article XXVI of the agreement, but rather pursuant to Family Court Act 651 and Domestic Relations Law 237(b). Family Court granted the mother's motion for fees related to legal work performed on two dates where the father caused unnecessary delay in the proceedings. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that where the parties have agreed to provisions in a settlement agreement which govern the award of attorney's fees, the agreement's provisions, rather than statutory provisions, control. Viewing Articles XXIV and XXVI in conjunction with each other, the agreement was clear and unambiguous. Article XXIV was a general waiver of attorney's fees, each party accepting responsibility to pay their respective counsel, and Article XXVI set forth two specific exceptions to the general waiver. The modification petition did not give rise to one of the two specific instances where an award of attorney's fees would be contractually required under Article XXVI. The modification petition was subject to the general waiver provisions of Article XXIV, which precluded an award of attorney's fees.

Court Had Discretion to Admit Expert's Testimony and Consider One-sidedness of Evaluation When Determining Weight to Accord Testimony

In Matter of Stellone v Kelly, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4197379 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the mother petitioned seeking termination of the grandmother's visitation and, soon thereafter, the grandmother filed a violation petition. The Appellate Division held that Family Court did not err in considering the testimony of the grandmother's expert witness. The grandmother's disclosure responses included the witness, the basic area of her testimony and the general basis for that testimony. Based upon the failure to disclose the expert's report, the court precluded that document. While opinions and conclusions of a psychologist may be discounted or rendered valueless if all involved parties are not interviewed or evaluated, here, the mother was given an opportunity, but declined, to meet with the psychologist or allow the child to do so. The expert, who acknowledged the limitations of her opinions and recommendations due to her inability to meet with the mother or child, relied not only upon her evaluation of the grandmother, but also a review of voluminous court filings and transcripts, correspondence between the mother and grandmother, and approximately seven hours of taped telephone conversations between the grandmother and child. The court had the discretion to admit the expert's testimony and consider the one-sidedness of the evaluation when determining what weight to accord that testimony. Family Court properly continued the grandmother's visitation, with the addition of counseling. Even in a grandparent visitation case, when a prior order has been entered and a party is seeking to modify it, that party bears the burden of proving a change in circumstances sufficient to warrant a modification of the visitation order.

Error to Award Joint Custody of Son From Previous Marriage. Equitable Estoppel Not Applicable

In Gulbin v Moss- Gulbin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4197590 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred by awarding plaintiff joint custody of her son from a previous relationship. When the parties married, defendant was already the biological mother of two sons, one of whom was now emancipated. The parties were the biological parents of two more sons. Supreme Court, in reliance upon a long-standing parent/child relationship between plaintiff and defendant's second son, awarded joint custody to the parties with the children's principal residence being with defendant, subject to scheduled visitation rights for plaintiff. Notwithstanding a close and loving relationship, a nonbiological parent does not have standing to request custody or visitation when a biological parent is fit and opposes shared custody or visitation (see Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M., 77 N.Y.2d 651, 655-657 [1991]; Matter of Multari v. Sorrell, 287 A.D.2d 764 [2001]; Matter of Rose v. Walrad, 278 A.D.2d 537, 538 [2000]; Matter of Cindy P. v. Danny P., 206 A.D.2d 615, 616 [1994], lv denied 84 N.Y.2d 808 [1994]). Despite these cases, plaintiff, in reliance upon Jean Maby H. v. Joseph H. (246 A.D.2d 282 [1998]), asserted that defendant was equitably estopped from asserting that he lacked standing to seek custody of and visitation with her second son. The Third Department held that "The purpose of equitable estoppel is to preclude a person from asserting a right after having led another to form the reasonable belief that the right would not be asserted, and loss or prejudice to the other would result if the right were asserted" (citing Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 N.Y.3d 320, 326 [2006]). Here, the doctrine was inapplicable. The record revealed that shortly after the parties married, and while this son was only three or four years of age, defendant informed him that plaintiff was not his biological father. Moreover, defendant refused to consent to his adoption by plaintiff precisely for the reason that it would impact on the issue of custody and visitation in the event of a divorce. Under these circumstances, it could not be concluded that defendant led plaintiff to form a reasonable belief that her claim to custody of her second son would not be asserted. Because defendant refused to stipulate as to the custody of this child and plaintiff admitted that defendant was a fit parent, Supreme Court erred in reaching this issue.

Failure of Employee of Husband's Attorney's Law Firm to Serve and File Papers Which Were Timely Prepared Constituted Reasonable Excuse for His Default

In De Bartolo v De Bartolo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4465526 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept). pursuant to a stipulation the wife submitted her application for an attorney's fee on or about August 14, 2005. In her application, she claimed that she had paid her former attorney the sum of $7,770, and her appellate attorney the sum of $3,000, and still owed that attorney the sum of $4,000 and her former attorney an unspecified amount. She provided no records of her alleged payments or dates of her alleged payments. She submitted an affirmation from the former attorney dated November 16, 2000, and no affirmation from her appellate attorney. On August 30, 2005, the parties stipulated to extend the time for the husband to respond to the wife's application until September 14, 2005. In an affidavit sworn to on August 31, 2005, the husband claimed that the wife "failed to provide this Court with credible proof of her legal fees" on the ground that she failed to provide itemized bills from her former attorney or appellate attorney or other credible proof of payment. He noted that the wife had filed for bankruptcy in or about 2003, and that her debts to her former attorney and her appellate attorney therefore may have been discharged. The husband claimed he could not afford to pay the wife's attorneys' fees since he still owed his own attorney the $4,000 and paid the wife $12,000 per year in child support. In an order dated December 8, 2005, the Supreme Court granted the wife's application for an attorney's fee of $19,570, holding that the husband "never submitted opposition to the motion and is in default." The husband moved to vacate the order entered upon his default based upon law office failure, i.e., that a paralegal in the husband's attorney's law firm failed to properly diary the date for submission of the opposition papers completed on August 31, 2005, and thereafter left the firm's employ. In support of his motion the husband submitted the opposition papers that had been completed and notarized on August 31, 2005, and reiterated that "there is reason to believe that the wife discharged all of her debts to her prior attorneys when she filed for bankruptcy several years ago." In opposition to the motion, the wife's attorney stated that the plaintiff's claim of law office failure "strains credulity." The wife's attorney did not address the merits of the husband's contentions or the alleged discharge in bankruptcy. Supreme Court denied the husband's motion. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the husband's claim of law office failure was detailed and corroborated by the fact that the husband's opposition papers were completed and notarized on August 31, 2005. The failure of an employee of the husband's attorney's law firm to serve and file papers which were timely prepared constituted a reasonable excuse for his default. Further, the default was an isolated instance at the conclusion of a lengthy matrimonial action. Moreover, the husband's claim that the wife's debts to her former attorney and her appellate attorney were discharged in bankruptcy was not denied by her, and her proof was plainly insufficient. The affirmation from the wife's former attorney was dated nearly five years prior to her application for counsel fees, and no affirmation whatsoever was submitted by her appellate attorney. It reversed the order remitted for a new determination of the issue of an award of an attorney's fee.

June 16, 2008

Not Improper to Impute Income Based upon Father's Self-reported Financial Affidavit

In Barnett v Ruotolo, 851 N.Y.S.2d 519 (2d Dept. 2008) the Appellate Division held that in exercising the discretion to impute income to a party, a Support Magistrate is required to provide a clear record of the source from which the income is imputed and the reasons for such imputation. The father did not testify and chose to rely on the financial documentation he had submitted, which contained considerable discrepancies. The father's financial documentation indicated that his monthly income was only approximately one-third of his stated monthly expenses, and no evidence was submitted to show that these monthly expenses were not being paid in a timely manner. Accordingly, the Family Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in imputing income based upon the father's self-reported financial affidavit for the purpose of calculating his child support obligation.

Proper to Impute Income by Averaging What Was Reported on Most Recent Individual Tax Returns

In re Y.W., v. T-T.J., --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2008 WL 222339 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed a child support order of $3,288 per month and remanded for recalculation of the basic child support obligation. It held that since each party claimed that the income as reflected on the other's tax return was not accurate, and the parties were unable to produce sufficient evidence to otherwise convince the support magistrate about their respective incomes, the magistrate properly decided to impute income to the parties by averaging what was reported on their most recent (2004 and 2005) individual tax returns. The magistrate used income figures net-of-deductions to calculate petitioner father's average income, but relied on respondent mother's gross income to calculate her average income, without taking into consideration her business deductions. The figure supposedly representing the average of respondent's 2004 and 2005 gross income was actually the gross income from her 2001 income tax return, adjusted upward by 2% to reflect additional cash receipts. Although respondent was unable to substantiate her business deductions at trial, the magistrate specifically found that respondent was able to prove that numerous entries on petitioner's tax returns were unaccounted for, and that his income was also possibly more than reflected on the tax returns. Given these circumstances, the magistrate should have compared gross income to gross income, or net income to net income, and not gross income to net income, in calculating child support. This was a high-income case. The magistrate applied a rate of 5% to the parties combined adjusted gross income over $80,000, without establishing the basis for applying such a rate, and without considering the appropriate level of support in light of the child's actual needs. Petitioner failed to offer any evidentiary support for his claim that his monthly expenses for the child were over $9,000 without add-ons. Without any supporting documentation, petitioner simply allocated 50% of his monthly expenses to the child, and the magistrate erroneously accepted his figures. It held that on remand, the court should consider the actual needs of the child, and rather than using an arbitrary percentage, should consider whether a cap on combined income over $80,000 subject to child support is warranted and apply the statutory percentage of 17% to that capped amount.

Error for Referee to Base Decision on Parties Unsworn Statements During Settlement Negotiations.

In Passalacqua v Passalacqua, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2008 WL 1838011 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that, apart from those parts of the judgment granting the parties mutual divorces, the remainder of the judgment had no evidentiary basis in the record. The matter was referred to a Matrimonial Referee, who attempted to negotiate a settlement. No testimony was presented by either party. The Matrimonial Referee was unable to negotiate a settlement, and he then based his determination of the issues upon the unsworn statements of the parties during the settlement negotiations, which he deemed to be testimony. Although no exhibits were introduced by either party, the Matrimonial Referee relied upon the parties' descriptions of several prior orders in determining the issues before him. The Appellate Division was unable to review the propriety of the judgment with respect to the issues before the Matrimonial Referee inasmuch as the record was confusing and incomplete, and the 'contentions of the parties differed very sharply. It was unclear whether the Matrimonial Referee relied upon documents not admitted in evidence and it noted the well-established principle that, with exceptions not relevant here, unsworn testimony is inadmissible in a civil case . It concluded that the errors of the Matrimonial Referee rendered the matter inherently flawed and remitted to Supreme Court for a new hearing on all issues with the exception of the mutual divorces granted to the parties.

Error to Impose Cost-of-living Adjustment of Basic Child Support. Pendente Lite Support Can Not Be Paid out of Marital Property.

In Azizo v Azizo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1946665 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Supreme Court directed, inter alia, that defendant pay basic child support of $4,168 per month (with an annual cost of living adjustment) and 100% of reasonable add-on expenses until emancipation, plus spousal maintenance of $6,125 per month for 84 months (subject to certain limitations), awarded 70% of marital assets to plaintiff, and found that defendant wastefully dissipated $779,000 of marital assets, thus entitling plaintiff to a credit of 70% therefor. The Appellate Division modified to reduce basic child support to $2,834.39 a month once the parties' older child is emancipated, deleted the cost-of-living adjustment to basic child support and modified the distribution of marital assets to 55% for plaintiff and 45% for defendant to be used in adjusting all payments and calculating all credits. It also affirmed an order which awarded plaintiff attorneys' fees of $664,538 and expert fees of $57,142. It held that the trial court erred when it averaged defendant's income for the four years preceding commencement of the divorce action. However, it did not accept defendant's claim that his income was only $63,800 per year and imputed income to him as follows: in fiscal year 2001 (the most recent undistorted year), his income represented 20.7% of the gross revenue of Azizo Imports; in fiscal year 2005, the gross revenue of the business was $1.25 million; 20.7% of $1.25 million amounts to $258,750 per year. Given that defendant's income did decline, he was paying the children's private school tuition and medical costs, all carrying costs on the marital residence, and premiums for life insurance policies on which plaintiff was the beneficiary, some of the expenses on plaintiff's net worth statement (i.e., the statement underlying the pendente lite order) turned out to be exaggerated, and plaintiff's pendente lite award was actually greater than her final award after taking into account the carrying costs of the marital residence, the temporary monthly awards of $4,134 for child support and $5,000 for spousal maintenance were excessive. The Appellate Division held that more reasonable monthly figures would be $1,666.67 for pendente lite child support (25% of $80,000), and $2,500 for pendente lite maintenance. Since defendant paid $9,134 per month for 46 months but should have paid only $4,166.67 per month, he overpaid by $228,497.18. Accordingly, since the pendente lite support was paid out of marital assets, it held that defendant should receive a credit of 45% of his overpayment of $228,497.18, amounting to $102,823.73. Given that plaintiff had only two years of college education and did not work outside the home for most of the parties' marriage, and given their pre-divorce standard of living, the trial court properly awarded plaintiff $6,125 per month in maintenance. In light of the large financial disparity between the parties and the family's pre-separation standard of living, the trial court properly went above the $80,000 Child Support Standards Act cap. The Appellate Division held that the trial court should have directed the payment to be reduced to $2,834.39 per month (17%) when the older child becomes emancipated. It also held that the court should not have imposed a cost-of-living adjustment of basic child support on the parties absent their agreement. The Appellate Division held that Defendant's claims that the judgment varied from the court's decision in certain respects were not properly raised on appeal; instead, he should have moved below to correct the judgment. Since defendant was the only wage earner at the time of the judgment, he was properly ordered to pay 100% of add-on expenses. Defendant was guilty of some economic fault. However, his fault was less than in Maharam v. Maharam (245 A.D.2d 94 [1997]), where the wife was awarded 65% of marital assets, and Davis v. Davis (175 A.D.2d 45 [1991]), where the wife was awarded 60% of the marital estate. The award of 70% to plaintiff was excessive, and the Appellate Division reduced it to 55%. Since pendente lite payments should not be made from marital property the trial court properly required defendant to reimburse the marital estate for marital assets he liquidated in order to comply with the pendente lite order. In light of the economic disparity between the parties and defendant's conduct during the action, the trial court providently exercised its discretion in awarding plaintiff counsel and expert fees.

June 2, 2008

Where Court Never Indicated it Was Imputing Income to Plaintiff it Was Required to Consider Plaintiff's Latest Income Tax Return in Determining the Child-support Award, Rather than Income-averaging His Reported Income.

In Healy v Healy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 2130379 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which denied plaintiff husband's motion for a downward modification of his spousal maintenance and child support awards. Following a trial in August of 2005, judgment was entered in February 2007, awarding defendant wife, among other things, a divorce on her counterclaim, custody of the couple's five children, $2,750 in spousal maintenance per month and $2,631 in child support per month. Plaintiff was represented by counsel at trial, and he promptly moved pro se for a downward modification after entry of judgment. At trial, his 2005 income tax return was admitted into evidence, indicating a substantial decrease in earnings. The court never indicated it was imputing income to plaintiff based on an attempt to avoid obligations or hide income. Accordingly, it was required to consider plaintiff's latest income tax return in determining the child-support award, rather than income-averaging his reported income from 2001 to 2004. Plaintiff's most recent tax return should also have been considered in determining the appropriate award for spousal maintenance.

Husband Deemed Legal Parent of Child Born to Wife Conceived as Result of AID Where Consent Not Obtained in Writing

In Laura WW v Peter WW, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 991130 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Third Department held that a husband can be deemed the legal parent of a child born to his wife, where the child was conceived as a result of artificial insemination by donor during the marriage, but where the husband's consent to the AID was not obtained in writing. Plaintiff wife became pregnant again, as a result of AID, with a third child. A few months into the wife's pregnancy, the parties separated pursuant to an agreement which provided, among other things, that the husband would not be financially responsible for the child. In her subsequent complaint for divorce, the wife alleged that the child was born to the marriage. The parties then entered a settlement agreement which reaffirmed the terms of the separation agreement and calculated the husband's support obligation based on two children. Thereafter, Supreme Court found that the provision in the separation agreement absolving the husband of his support obligation for the child was void as against public policy. Following a hearing on the issue of paternity, Supreme Court held that the husband was the child's legal father and modified the parties' stipulation by increasing the husband's child support obligation based upon three children, instead of two. The Appellate Division affirmed. It agreed with Supreme Court that the provision of the settlement agreement absolving the husband of any support obligation with respect to the child was unenforceable. The parties' agreement, which preceded any determination of legal paternity, to leave the child without the husband's support could not stand (Matter of Gravlin v. Ruppert, 98 N.Y.2d 1, 5 [2002]; see Harriman v. Harriman, 227 A.D.2d 839, 841 [1996]). The Court rejected the husband's attempt to invoke noncompliance with Domestic Relations Law 73 as a bar to a finding that he was, legally, the child's father. Consistent with our state's strong presumption of legitimacy, as well as the compelling public policy of protecting children conceived via AID, the Court followed the lead of other jurisdictions that impose a rebuttable presumption of consent by the husband of a woman who conceives by AID, shifting the burden to the husband to rebut the presumption by clear and convincing evidence. It was not disputed that the husband was fully aware that his wife was utilizing AID to get pregnant. He proffered no evidence that he took any steps before the AID was performed to demonstrate that he was not willing to be the child's father. Under these circumstances, the court found that that the husband failed to rebut the presumption that he consented to bringing a third child into the marriage through AID. The evidence supported Supreme Court's conclusion that the husband consented to his wife's decision to create the child and that he was the child's legal father. Pursuing an alternative avenue, the Court reached the same result, finding that the facts also warranted application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel to preclude the husband from "seeking to disclaim paternity of the parties' child, whose best interest is paramount".

Error to Decide Custody Without Forensic Report Where Conflicting Testimony Regarding Parties Conduct, and Evidence Suggesting Children Exhibiting Behavioral Problems

In Ekstra v Ekstra, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 669895 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court appointed psychologist Lobel as a neutral forensic expert to conduct evaluations and submit a written forensic report on the custody issue. The appointment order provided that "[t]he neutral forensic evaluator's final report shall be admitted as evidence-in-chief without the necessity for independent foundation testimony or evidence, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 202.16(g)." The order further provided that "[a]ny party who wishes to cross-examine the neutral [forensic] evaluator, as permitted by the Uniform Rules, shall bear the cost of the neutral [forensic] evaluator's services in preparing such testimony, travel and testifying unless the Court directs otherwise." After Dr. Lobel's report was submitted, the father's counsel expressed an intention to cross-examine him and asked the court whether the father would be required to bear the costs of his appearance. The court responded that the father would not be required to bear that expense, but made no other provision for payment. As a consequence of not receiving his fee, Lobel did not appear, and the court granted the father's application to preclude the forensic report. Relying largely on its evaluation of the credibility of the witnesses, the court awarded sole custody of the parties' two children to the father. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that in light of the sharply conflicting testimony regarding the conduct of the parties, and evidence suggesting that the children were exhibiting behavioral problems, the court should not have rendered a custody determination without first receiving the report of the neutral forensic expert it had appointed. Moreover, inasmuch as the father had the right to cross-examine the expert (see 22 NYCRR 202.16[g][2]), and the expert could not have been compelled to testify without appropriate compensation the court should have made provision for payment to Lobel as it indicated that it would in the order appointing him. It reversed and remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, to reopen the custody hearing, at which time Lobel's report should be received in evidence and, should either party wish to cross-examine him, the court should make provision for the payment of his fee and expenses in accordance with the order appointing him.

Father Can Not Avoid Obligation to Pay College Expenses by Ignoring Written Communications

In Heinlein v Kuzemka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 660010 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties agreed to contribute to the children's college expenses, provided that their then-financial circumstances permitted them to do so and that both parents "approve of the educational institution, course of study and living arrangements." The father sought relief from this obligation, asserting that since the mother did not consult him regarding his son's attendance at RPI, he did not approve of that school or any of the child's college-related expenses. The Appellate Division found that his protests were unavailing since, while aware of the child's aspirations to attend RPI, he failed to make any inquiries of the mother and consistently declined to accept registered mail sent by her. Moreover, once the father became aware that his son was attending RPI, he took no action to object to the choice of school or apply to be relieved of his obligations, thus signifying his acquiescence and implicit approval of the decision. The Appellate Division held that the father could not avoid his contractual obligations to pay his son's college expenses, which were imposed by separation agreement that was incorporated, but not merged, into divorce decree, by ignoring the mother's written communications and remaining silent in the face of his admitted knowledge that his son was attending college.

In Absence of Other Evidence Value of Vehicle in Net Worth Statement Should Have be Adopted by Court

In Winter v Winter, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1722288 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Supreme Court set spousal maintenance, child support and defendant husband's share of add-on child expenses, allocated marital property and assets subject to certain credits including accounting for wasteful dissipation, denied defendant credit for pendente lite mortgage payments on the marital residence, and ordered defendant to pay 40% of plaintiff's legal fees. The Appellate Division modified, to reduce defendant's obligation with respect to plaintiff's legal fees to 30%, and to reduce the value assigned to the parties' Jeep Cherokee from $15,000 to $11,000. The Appellate Division found that in determining the value of the Jeep Cherokee, the court used the vehicle's 2004 purchase price of $15,000. In her September 30, 2005 net worth statement, plaintiff valued that asset at $11,000. In the absence of any other evidence as to the vehicle's worth, plaintiff's valuation should have been adopted by the court.

May 16, 2008

Court of Appeals Holds Family Court Lacked Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Entertain Wife's Application for Increased Spousal Maintenance Despite "De Novo" Provision of Separation Agreement

In Matter of Johna M.S. v Russell E.S., --- N.Y.3d ----, 2008 WL 1860165 (N.Y.) Petitioner wife and respondent husband executed a written separation agreement in 2003. No divorce action was commenced. The agreement provided that the husband would pay the wife $100 per week in spousal maintenance and $250 per week in child support. The section of the agreement pertaining to maintenance stated: "while this agreement will resolve these issues for the present time, the Wife shall not be foreclosed from seeking additional maintenance in negotiation with the Husband, or failing such negotiation, then filing in a court of appropriate jurisdiction for a modification of the present provisions concerning the payment of maintenance. Any application by the Wife shall be treated as a 'de novo' application to the court, since it is not possible to set future maintenance at this time because it is impossible to forecast the Wife's needs or the Husband's income/earning capacity."

The wife commenced a Family Court Act article 4 proceeding seeking an upward modification of maintenance and child support. The Support Magistrate dismissed that portion of the wife's application seeking additional spousal maintenance for lack of jurisdiction. The court noted that no proof was offered that the wife was likely to become a public charge (see Family Court Act 463); thus, the parties were bound by the terms of the separation agreement on the issue of spousal maintenance. Family Court affirmed, as did the Appellate Division. The Court of Appeals affirmed. It held that Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction that cannot exercise powers beyond those granted to it by statute. It generally has no subject matter jurisdiction to reform, set aside or modify the terms of a valid separation agreement. Nor can an agreement of the parties confer on Family Court the power to modify the terms of a separation agreement. A statutory exception to the rule prohibiting the modification of separation agreements, not applicable here, exists where a spouse "is likely to become in need of public assistance or care" (Family Court Act 463). Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the wife's application for increased spousal maintenance. Although the parties' separation agreement purported to permit Family Court to treat any application by the wife as "de novo," such language cannot confer jurisdiction upon Family Court. The wife's petition to Family Court for increased maintenance expressly stated that it was "an application to the Court for an upward modification of spousal support," premised on the insufficiency of current maintenance due to a loss of certain Social Security benefits. In practical terms, the wife was not presenting a new, or "de novo," application for maintenance to Family Court. She was seeking increased maintenance from that provided under the separation agreement. Thus, because the wife was seeking a modification of a spousal maintenance award set forth in a separation agreement, Family Court was without jurisdiction to entertain the petition and grant the requested relief. Justice Smith dissented in an opinion

Second Department Holds Counsel Fees to Nonmonied Spouse Generally Warranted Where a Significant Disparity in Parties Financial Circumstances and Should Not Be Denied, or Deferred Absent Good Cause, Articulated in a Written Decision

In Prichep v Prichep, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1987254 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Second Department, in an opinion by Justice Prudenti, held that because of the importance of such awards to the fundamental fairness of the proceedings, an award of interim counsel fees to the nonmonied spouse will generally be warranted where there is a significant disparity in the financial circumstances of the parties and should not be denied, or deferred until after the trial, which functions as a denial, without good cause, articulated by the court in a written decision. It cited as examples of good cause, where the requested fees are unsubstantiated or clearly disproportionate to the amount of legal work required in the case. It based this conclusion on the fact that when an action for a divorce is commenced, it is often the case that most of the marital assets available for the payment of legal fees are possessed or controlled by one of the spouses, usually the husband. In order to ensure that the parties will have equal access to skilled legal representation, the Domestic Relations Law authorizes awards of interim counsel fees to the nonmonied spouse during the course of the litigation. The court pointed out that when a party to a divorce action requests an interim award of counsel fees, as opposed to a final award, a detailed inquiry is not warranted. The husband commenced the divorce action in 1998. In June 2005, the wife made a pretrial motion for interim counsel fees of $35,000. The wife's motion papers noted that, although the court previously had awarded her interim counsel fees of $20,000, she currently owed her attorneys $53,009. The wife pointed out that the husband was a "highly successful vascular surgeon," earning $420,100 per year, while she worked part-time as an early intervention therapist, earning $4,015 per year. In opposition to the wife's motion, the husband argued that the wife had "over-litigated" the case, creating and submitting voluminous and unnecessary papers, and thus generating excessive counsel fees. Supreme Court denied the wife's motion "without prejudice to renewal before the trial court to determine the financial circumstances of the parties, the nature and complexity of the case, which includes the valuation of a medical practice, the fees filed and legal services rendered and the expertise of the attorneys." The wife thereafter moved to renew her prior motion and for an additional award of interim counsel fees of $40,000. Her attorney submitted an affidavit asserting that the wife now owed his firm $159,000 in legal fees, as well as invoices and attorney time records documenting billings in that amount. In the alternative, the motion sought leave to withdraw as her counsel. Supreme Court denied the motion for fees but granted the law firm's request to the extent of relieving it as counsel for the wife. An award of interim counsel fees ensures that the nonmonied spouse will be able to litigate the action, and do so on equal footing with the monied spouse. Such an award "is appropriate 'to prevent the more affluent spouse from wearing down or financially punishing the opposition by recalcitrance, or by prolonging the litigation' "(citing Gober v. Gober, 282 A.D.2d 392, 393, quoting O'Shea v. O'Shea, 93 N.Y.2d at 193; see Charpie v. Charpie, 271 A.D.2d 169). If the playing field were not leveled by an award of interim counsel fees, "a wealthy husband could obtain the services of highly paid (and presumably seasoned and superior matrimonial counsel, while the indigent wife, essentially, would be relegated to counsel willing to take her case on a poverty basis".

Third Department Holds That Absent Stipulation No Pendente Lite Counsel Fee Award Without A Hearing

In Bush v Bush, 46 A.D.3d 1140, 848 N.Y.S.2d 721 (3d Dept, 2007) Defendant cross-moved for among other things, interim counsel fees in the amount of $85,172.81. Supreme Court awarded defendant interim counsel fees of $25,000. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that to justify an award of counsel fees, a sufficient evidentiary basis must exist for the court to evaluate the respective financial circumstances of the parties and value of the services rendered' Moreover, Supreme Court cannot award counsel fees based solely upon written submissions, unless so stipulated to by the parties. The proof submitted concerning the financial circumstances of the parties was limited to written submissions by respective counsel. As the record did not contain evidence of a stipulation agreeing thereto, the proof of the financial circumstances of the parties was inadequate for Supreme Court to properly assess the award of counsel fees. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted to Supreme Court for an evidentiary hearing (citing its 2003 decision in Yarinsky v. Yarinsky, 2 A.D.3d 1108 [3 Dept 2003]).

Willful Violation of Support Order Can Be Established Without Testimony by a Formal Judicial Admission

In Matter of Columbia County Support Collection Unit v Interdonato, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1969647 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division rejected Respondents argument on appeal that Family Court erred in finding a willful violation of the support orders and ordering that he be committed based on unsworn testimony. It held that it is well settled that when there is no admission by a respondent, a determination of a willful violation of a support order must be predicated upon proof adduced at a hearing. A formal judicial admission by a respondent may, however, obviate the need for a hearing inasmuch as the respondent, by his or her admission, waives the production of evidence by the opposing party with regard to the facts admitted and the respondent's admission is deemed conclusive with regard to those facts. Here, respondent's unequivocal admission before the Support Magistrate in open court to the facts giving rise to petitioner's claim of respondent's violation of Family Court's orders, that he failed to make the required child support payments, was made with sufficient formality and conclusiveness to be deemed a formal judicial admission even in the absence of an oath. Furthermore, proof of a failure to make required support payments is prima facie evidence of a willful violation. Accordingly, Family Court's order was not based upon unsworn testimony, but was properly made following respondent's admission and, as such, it was affirmed.

May 1, 2008

Second Department Removes Law Guardian Failure to Comply With Rules of Chief Judge

In Cervera v Bressler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1748331 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties' entered into a stipulation, later so-ordered by the court, in which they agreed to joint custody, with primary physical custody with the mother, visitation to the father on alternate weekends and one weekday per week, and the removal of certain restrictions on visitation that had been imposed temporarily. In July 2005, the attorney for the child moved by order to show cause for supervised visitation, based on various allegations by the mother, including one allegation of sexual molestation. The sexual molestation allegation was subsequently determined to be unfounded. Although a hearing on the motion was scheduled at least once, it never took place, and visitation by the father remained supervised since July 28, 2005. The Appellate Division held that supervised visitation was appropriately required only where it is established that unsupervised visitation would be detrimental to the child and because no hearing was ever held on the order to show cause visitation remained supervised, and telephone contact between father and daughter was monitored, for about 2 ½ years, based solely on the hearsay allegations of the mother. These consisted of the allegations of molestation, which were determined by OCFS to be unfounded, and stories of various incidents, the details of which were disputed by the father and, were insufficient to show that unsupervised visitation would be detrimental to the child's well-being. Under these circumstances, it was unacceptable to the Second Department that the hearing had not been held, although ordered more than 2 ½ years earlier. This arrangement resulted in the violation of the father's right to reasonable access and visitation.

It also held that the court should not have required the father to pay the cost of supervising his visitation without determining the economic realities, including his ability to pay and the actual cost of each visit. Finally, it held that the court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying the father's motion to remove Joshua D. Siegel as the attorney for the child. It referred to the new rules that had been recently promulgated by the Chief Judge and stated that an attorney for the child should not have a particular position or decision in mind at the outset of the case before the gathering of evidence. On the other hand, attorneys for children are not neutral automatons. After an appropriate inquiry, it is entirely appropriate, indeed expected, that an attorney for the child form an opinion about what action, if any, would be in a child's best interest. An attorney for the child is not an investigative arm of the court. While attorneys for the children, as advocates, may make their positions known to the court orally or in writing (by way of, among other methods, briefs or summations), presenting reports containing facts which are not part of the record or making submissions directly to the court ex parte are inappropriate practices. Here, in the order to show cause, and the affirmation in support, as well as in every affirmation submitted thereafter, the attorney for the child included facts which were not part of the record, but which constituted hearsay gleaned from the mother. This behavior on the part of the attorney for the child, as well as his repeated ad hominum attacks on the father's character, was both unprofessional and improper, as it amounted to the attorney for the child acting as a witness against the father, in violation of the Rules of the Chief Judge (see 22 NYCRR 7.2[b]).

Law Guardian Rebuked for Failure to Follow Rules of Chief Judge and Wishes of Child

In Matter of Delaney v. Galeano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 1823048 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the attorney for the child appealed from an order of the Family Court, which, after a hearing, denied his motion to hold the respondent mother in contempt. Upon receipt of a copy of a letter dated June 15, 2007, from the 14-year-old child to the effect that he did not want the appeal to proceed, the Appellate Division issued an order to show cause directing the parties or their attorneys to show cause why an order should not be made dismissing the appeal in the above-entitled proceeding as withdrawn. After argument of the appeal the motion was granted and the appeal was dismissed as withdrawn. The Appellate Division held that where "the child is capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, the attorney for the child should be directed by the wishes of the child" (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][2]). Here, the child on numerous occasions has expressed concern that his attorney was not representing his wishes. Additionally, he requested that the appeal be withdrawn, prompting the Court to require the parties or their attorneys to show cause why the appeal should not be dismissed as withdrawn. In response to that order to show cause, the attorney for the child failed to demonstrate any basis upon which the child's preference may properly be disregarded (see 22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]).

Wife's Failure to Disclose Bank Statements and Transfers of Real Property Justified an Adverse Inference Against Her

In Gering v Tavano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 879674 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the verdict of cruel and inhuman treatment was supported by legally sufficient evidence, which included evidence of defendant's denigrating comments about plaintiff's religious background, accusations of infidelity, and interference with plaintiff's relationship with the children and evidence of plaintiff's anxiety, depression, headaches and stomach aches resulting therefrom . Plaintiff showed a reasonable excuse for not filing the complaint alleging cruel and inhuman treatment until approximately two years after the commencement of the divorce action. The parties had stipulated that the issue of fault was resolved and that plaintiff would "take the divorce" on the ground of constructive abandonment. However, defendant objected to that ground two years later, after the inquest. Defendant was not prejudiced by the delay, since plaintiff's summons with notice indicated that he sought a divorce on the grounds of both constructive abandonment and cruel and inhuman treatment. Plaintiff was not required to submit an affidavit of merit. The court properly based its imputation of income to plaintiff on his admission that he took money from his business for personal expenses and failed to report it on his income tax returns. With respect to defendant's financial condition, her failure to disclose her bank statements and various transfers of real property among herself, her family members and third parties justified an adverse inference against her (see 22 NYCRR 202.16[k][5][i]; Wildenstein v. Wildenstein, 251 A.D.2d 189 [1998]). The maintenance award of $2,000 a month was properly based upon the court's finding of defendant's failure to comply with discovery and disclose real estate transactions and bank statements and the family's pre-divorce standard of living. However, the one-year duration of the award was inadequate and it was increased to three years. The court properly articulated its reasons for setting the child support obligation at 25% of $150,000. Given the evidence of defendant's own substantial assets, the court properly required her to contribute 13% during the first year and 14% thereafter. The award to defendant of a 15% interest in plaintiff's business was proper, given her failure to contribute to the business, lack of cooperation with respect to discovery of her own assets, and receipt of temporary maintenance.

Proper To Hold Defendant Responsible for the Plaintiff's Counsel Fees in Same Amount As He Paid His Counsel

In Ciampa v Ciampa, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 193292 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in awarding the plaintiff counsel fees up to the amount defendant paid for his own counsel of $201,437.80, as well as expert fees of $50,000. This matrimonial action required the expenditure of significant counsel fees to deal with the myriad of legal issues presented, as well as substantial expert fees in order to evaluate the parties' multimillion-dollar business assets and residential and commercial real estate. The defendant's expenditure of $201,437.80 for his counsel fees paled in comparison to the plaintiff's expenditure of more than $484,142 for her counsel and experts, the plaintiff having utilized at least five law firms during the course of this matrimonial proceeding. Given, inter alia, the delay attributable to the plaintiff, the Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion.

Error to Admit into Evidence Determination of Social Security Administration on Issue of Wife's Disability

In Grasso v Grasso, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 193262 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that while the husband correctly contended that the court improperly admitted into evidence and relied upon a determination of the Social Security Administration as to the wife's disability, there was other sufficient admissible evidence which supported the finding that the wife was totally disabled.

Proper to Enjoin Defendant from Mailing Any Nonfinancial Correspondence to the Plaintiff

In Meccariello v Meccariello, 847 N.Y.S.2d 618 (2d Dept., 2007) Supreme Court permanently enjoined the wife from mailing any nonfinancial correspondence to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court was correct in permanently enjoining her from mailing any nonfinancial correspondence to the plaintiff, since the plaintiff demonstrated that he would suffer irreparable harm absent the injunction (citing Icy Splash Food & Beverage, Inc. v. Henckel, 14 A.D.3d 595, 596, 789 N.Y.S.2d 505; Kane v. Walsh, 295 N.Y. 198, 205-206, 66 N.E.2d 53).

April 16, 2008

Marital Property Cannot Be Shielded from Equitable Distribution by Investing it in Educational Trust

In Pea v Alves, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 927951 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept) the Appellate Division held that the trial court correctly found the severance pay plaintiff received after commencement of the action to be a form of deferred compensation earned during the marriage, not, as plaintiff argued, compensation for future lost earnings, and thus a distributable marital asset. The court also properly rejected plaintiff's claim that the severance pay should, in effect, be exempt from distribution since she had already invested it in an educational trust for the parties' three children. Marital property cannot be shielded from equitable distribution in this way.

No Basis to Shield Wife from Economic Consequences of Shared Decision to Renovate Property. Spouses Contribution to Separate Assets and Liabilities of Former Spouse May Be Recouped in Equitable Distribution.

In Johnson v Chapin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 664929 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) during the marriage the parties renovated a house that was the separate property of the husband with money's earned during the marriage. It appreciated during the marriage "due in part" to the direct and indirect efforts of both spouses, including the wife's assistance. The appreciated value of the property was less than its value at the time of the marriage plus the cost of the renovations and improvements. The Appellate Division held that the couple shared the risk that the property's appreciation would not equal their investment, and there was no basis in law or equity to shield the wife from the economic consequences of a shared decision to renovate the property. It also held that a spouses contribution to the separate assets and liabilities of his or her former spouse may be recouped in an award of equitable distribution. Marital funds should not be used to pay off separate liabilities' and, whenever that occurs, the inequity may be remedied by permitting the injured spouse to recoup his or her equitable share of the marital funds so used. The trial court determined that because the wife had not worked outside the home for nine years, she could not re-establish her legal career. It also concluded that it would take at least six years for her to develop her career in photography. The court awarded the wife durational maintenance of $6,000 per month for six years. The Appellate Division held that the durational maintenance award was not an abuse of discretion. The wife was 51 years old at the time of the commencement of this action. She had been out of the work force for nine years, during which time she had primary responsibility for raising the parties' child. As such, it was both fair and realistic for the court to have concluded that since it would take at least six years for the wife to develop a career in photography, a six-year maintenance award of $6,000 a month would provide her with appropriate assistance in reaching her vocational goals and allowing her to become self-sufficient. The trial court noted that the wife and her son "have suffered day to day crises resulting from the [husband's] harassment of them" with respect to every aspect of this protracted litigation. It thus awarded the wife $800,000 for the wife's counsel fees, and $85,000 for her expert fees. The Appellate Division held that the court's award was appropriate. The record, including his imputed future earnings, showed that he was in a superior financial position. He engaged in a pattern of obstructionist conduct which unnecessarily delayed and increased the legal fees incurred in the litigation. Given that the wife was required to hire an expert to counter the husband's facially inaccurate valuation of the appreciation of the Claverack property, the court properly granted the wife an award for her expert's fees . The Appellate Division held that equity required that the husband be awarded a distributive credit for $548,460, the amount that his pendente lite support payments exceeded what he would have been required to pay consistent with the final maintenance award. It also required that the husband be credited $484,370.50, 50% of the $968,741 in mortgage and maintenance payments made for the marital residence during the pendency of the divorce action.

For Appreciation of Separate Property to Be Marital Must Demonstrate Manner in Which Contributions Resulted in Increase

In Embury v Embury, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 809026 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly determined that certain real property which was gifted to the plaintiff by her mother during the marriage, was the plaintiff's separate property. Property acquired during the marriage is presumed to be marital property and the party seeking to overcome such presumption has the burden of proving that the property in dispute is separate property. The plaintiff sustained that burden with evidence that she and her mother purchased the property in November 2005, with her mother paying the down payment and all the closing costs, and the mother subsequently gifting to her the mother's interest in the home. Moreover, in order for appreciation in the value of separate property to be deemed marital property subject to equitable distribution the nontitled spouse must demonstrate the manner in which his contributions resulted in the increase in value and the amount of the increase which was attributable to his efforts. The defendant did not sustain his burden, as he failed to set forth proof that the property actually increased in value and, he did not demonstrate the manner in which his contributions resulted in any alleged appreciation. The Supreme Court erred in determining the defendant's child support obligation. While a court may depart from a party's reported income and impute income based on the party's past income or earning potential, such determination must be grounded in law and fact. Here, the court failed to properly consider that a contractual agreement under which the defendant was paid approximately $2,500 per month, or approximately $30,000 annually, had ended in 2003, and that the defendant's income, therefore, was reduced to that extent. The Appellate Division recalculated the defendant's child support obligations based on a total annual income of $60,000, since his federal tax return for his incorporated business, and his claimed monthly expenses, including his pendente lite support obligations, generally approximated that level of income. Since the plaintiff's annual income was $30,000, the parties' combined parental income amounted to $90,000, with the defendant's proportional share thereof at 67%, his child support obligation was $1,557.75 monthly, and he was obligated to pay a 67% pro rata share of child care expenses and the children's unreimbursed health care costs.

Stocks Purchased During Marriage Jointly Titled in Spouse and Son Are Presumptively Marital Property

In Lee v Lee, 48 A.D.3d 377, 853 N.Y.S.2d 34 (1st Dept. 2008) the Appellate Division found that stocks and an insured money mart account, and stock shares resulting from a demutualization, that were jointly titled in defendant and his son were purchased or obtained during the marriage, and were presumptively marital property despite the form of the title. It was defendant's burden to rebut this presumption and he failed to do so. Since he did not, the Appellate Division deemed half the shares and money to be separate property and half marital property.

Error to Admit Into Evidence Report of Neutral Forensic Psychologist Where Report Not Submitted Under Oath

In Tercjak v Tercjak, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 740405 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Second Department held that Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in admitting into evidence the report of the neutral forensic psychologist, since the report was not submitted under oath (see 22 NYCRR 202.16[g][2]) and relied on information other than that upon which an expert may properly base an opinion (see Matter of D'Esposito v. Kepler, 14 AD3d 509). However, the error in admitting the report was harmless.

April 1, 2008

Constructive Abandonment Found Where Unreasonable Condition Imposed by Wife

In Dunne v Dunne, 47 A.D.3d 1056, 850 N.Y.S.2d 659 (3d Dept. 2008) the parties were married in 1976. Around 1996 or 1997, plaintiff was diagnosed with a general anxiety disorder. He was prescribed medications, including Xanax (a Benzodiazepine medication) and Ambien, to alleviate his constant worrying and inability to sleep. Defendant, after reading various articles on the potentially dangerous effects of such medications and noticing a hostile change in plaintiff's demeanor, insisted that plaintiff stop taking the medications. Plaintiff's doctor began decreasing the medications, but, as a result, plaintiff began drinking alcohol in order to cope with his increased anxiety. This led to an incident in February 2002 when plaintiff was found unconscious after excessive drinking and was taken to the hospital. As a result of his consumption of alcohol while taking medication, he was taken completely off the medications. In May 2002, defendant moved plaintiff's belongings from the marital residence to an apartment which they owned. Plaintiff returned to the marital residence shortly thereafter; however, defendant demanded that he leave after she noticed the smell of alcohol. Thereafter, plaintiff sought treatment for alcohol abuse and stopped drinking. In early 2003, his doctor prescribed two prescription medications, one of which was the Benzodiazepine medicine Klonopin, to control his anxiety disorder. Although the parties engaged in marriage counseling, according to plaintiff, defendant insisted that a condition to their reconciliation was that he cease taking any and all prescription Benzodiazepine medications. In April 2004, plaintiff commenced this action for divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment. Supreme Court, crediting plaintiff's testimony, granted the divorce. The Appellate Division affirmed. Defendant contended that plaintiff failed to establish constructive abandonment inasmuch as his exclusion from the marital residence was not complete, was on consent and was justified under the circumstances. In an action for divorce based upon constructive abandonment, the party seeking the divorce must establish that the other spouse has refused to fulfill the basic obligations of the marriage relationship for a period of one year or more, without justification or consent by the abandoned spouse. In addition, the evidence must show a 'hardening of resolve' by one spouse not to live with the other. Here, defendant moved plaintiff's belongings to an apartment and demanded that he leave the marital residence. Plaintiff's testimony established that defendant denied his repeated requests to return to the marital residence. Defendant contended that she was justified in excluding plaintiff from the marital residence until he stopped taking the Benzodiazepine medication. However, it was undisputed that plaintiff suffered from a psychological anxiety disorder. Plaintiff testified that, although he had attempted to control his condition without the use of prescription medication, his doctors advised him that anxiety disorder can only be alleviated through prescription medication. Plaintiff also testified that he had no behavioral problems with his current medications and that his anxiety is under control. Defendant's uncompromising position that plaintiff choose to either adhere to the advice of his treating physicians or cease taking his anxiety medication in order to return to the marital residence, thereby risking his well-being, amounted to "an unreasonable condition as a term of their relationship," which violated her marital obligation to plaintiff.

Counsel Fees Justified by Discovery Misconduct. Defendant Properly Precluded For Failure to Timely Comply with Discovery

In Schorr v Schorr, ___ NYS2d ___, 848 N.Y.S.2d 614 (1st Dept.2007) Supreme Court awarded plaintiff 50% of the marital property, monthly maintenance of $6,500 for five years, and counsel fees of $100,000. The Appellate Division reduced the award to plaintiff to 40% and otherwise affirmed. It found that Plaintiff's contributions to defendant's business interests, which accounted for a substantial portion of the marital assets, were modest. The maintenance award to plaintiff was appropriate in light of the parties' standard of living during the marriage, plaintiff's career sacrifices during the marriage, defendant's substantially superior financial circumstances, and plaintiff's demonstrated inability to meet her living expenses and need for time to establish herself in her new career. Plaintiff's receipt of the distributive award did not obviate the need for maintenance. The award of $100,000 in counsel fees, representing approximately one-half of plaintiff's counsel fees at the time of trial, was justified by the financial disparity between the parties and defendant's discovery misconduct resulting in unnecessary escalation of litigation costs. Defendant was properly precluded from offering evidence at trial as to any financial issues because of his failure to timely comply with discovery requests concerning his businesses and to pay the fees of the expert appointed to value his business interests; such conduct resulted in the expert being unable to submit a complete report of the value of defendant's business interests at trial. Because the various business interests could not be parsed from the other financial issues in the case, to have limited the preclusion order only to testimony challenging the valuation of his business interests by the expert would have allowed defendant to benefit from his concealment of critical information regarding his assets and income.

Property Is Not Marital Property Where Neither Wife Nor Husband Hold Any Valuable Property Rights in It. Defendant Not Required to List Possible Future Rights to Marital Property in Bankruptcy Schedules.

In Mattioli v Mattioli,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 275078 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly refused to treat the former marital residence, which was titled in the names of plaintiff's parents or in one of their names, as marital property subject to equitable distribution, despite the fact that plaintiff paid her father $42,899 during the marriage as a down payment towards its purchase. The court erred, however, in basing its decision solely on the fact that title to the property was held by one or both of plaintiff's parents, rather than by plaintiff and/or defendant. That fact was not necessarily dispositive because Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(1)(c) defines marital property as "all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held." Thus, the dispositive issue was whether plaintiff and/or defendant held "any valuable property rights" in the former marital residence, inasmuch as property is "not marital property [where] neither the wife nor the husband [holds] any valuable property rights" in it (Pulitzer v. Pulitzer, 134 A.D.2d 84, 88). While the parties in this case alluded to an agreement between plaintiff, defendant, and plaintiff's parents for the purchase of the former marital residence, no written agreement for the purchase and sale thereof was presented to the court. In the absence of a written contract, there was no evidence before the court that either plaintiff or defendant held the requisite "valuable property rights" in the former marital residence to render it marital property. The Appellate Division held that the court erred in applying the doctrine of judicial estoppel in precluding defendant from presenting evidence of funds received by plaintiff from the sale of the former marital residence. Defendant attempted to establish that the $8,000 to $9,000 received by plaintiff from the sale of the former marital residence was marital property in the form of appreciation in the value of the property resulting from improvements he made to it during the marriage. The Supreme Court erred in relying on its decision in Matter of Miller (Berti) (1 AD3d 885) when it applied the doctrine of judicial estoppel to the former marital residence. The record established that during the marriage defendant twice filed for bankruptcy under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code and received discharges, and that he claimed in both bankruptcies that he was single and did not list the former marital residence as an asset in his bankruptcy schedules. The court thus determined that judicial estoppel prevented defendant from claiming any interest in funds received upon the sale of the former marital residence. That was error, inasmuch as the discussion of the doctrine of judicial estoppel in Miller was in the context of a bankruptcy proceeding, while here the issue concerned the property rights of the parties in a matrimonial action. [M]arital property rights are determined upon the granting of a divorce", and defendant was not required to list possible future rights to marital property in the bankruptcy schedules (see 11 USC s 541[a][2][A]). It modified the judgment by remitting the matter to Supreme Court to reopen the proof at trial to permit defendant to submit evidence that the funds received by plaintiff from the sale of the former marital residence were marital property.

Failure to Provide Client with Statement of Client's Rights and Responsibilities Constitutes Violation of DR 2-106(f) . Failure to Send Bill During One and One-half Year Divorce Proceeding Violates DR 1-102(A)(5).

In Matter of Larsen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 249850 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), a disciplinary proceeding, the First Department held that the failure of the attorney to provide her client with a Statement of Client's Rights and Responsibilities constituted a violation of DR 2-106(F). It also found that Respondent either improperly notarized her client's signature, or signed her client's name, with the client's consent, notarized that signature, and then submitted the documents to Supreme Court . This was a violation of DR 1-102(A)(4), even if done with the consent of the client. Respondent's failure to send her client a bill during the one and one-half year divorce proceeding was held to be in violation of DR 1-102(A)(5).

March 17, 2008

Proper Standard for Establishing Willful Violation of a Family Court Order Is Clear and Convincing Evidence.

In Matter of Blkaize F., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 516789 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the Appellate Division addressed the proper burden of proof to establish a willful violation under Family Court Act § 1072. The statute itself only mentions "competent proof." The Court noted that it had previously used various phrases in enunciating the standard, including the burden as being simply "ample evidence", "competent and credible evidence", "a fair preponderance of the evidence", and "clear and convincing evidence". It found that except for the terms of punishment, the provisions of Judiciary Law § 753 applied here. Based upon that statute, and considering the potential penalty of imprisonment here it held that the proper standard for establishing a willful violation of a Family Court order is clear and convincing evidence.

Counsel Fee Not Barred By Failure to Provide Itemized Statement

In Johnner v Mims, 850 N.Y.S.2d 786 (4th Dept. 2008) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in granting in part plaintiff's application for counsel fees in this matrimonial action. Defendant contended that the court erred in awarding plaintiff counsel fees because plaintiff's attorney failed to provide plaintiff with written, itemized bills at least every 60 days (see 22 NYCRR 1400.2, 1400.3). The Appellate Division rejected that contention. It found that Plaintiff's attorney complied with 22 NYCRR part 1400 by providing plaintiff with the requisite statement of rights and responsibilities and by executing the requisite written retainer agreement with her. It held that although plaintiff's attorney waited until December 2005 to bill plaintiff for services rendered between August 2004 and December 2005, the right to be billed at least every 60 days is a right afforded to plaintiff, not defendant, and plaintiff waived that right by failing to object to the December 2005 bill. Moreover, denial of plaintiff's application on that ground would result in a windfall to defendant.

Family Court Act Does Not Authorize Dismissal for Forum non Conveniens or Improper Venue

In Cruz v Cruz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 525919 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Family Court dismissed the petitions for visitation with the parties' two younger children, on the ground that "it appears that ... the subject children now reside in Brooklyn, New York" and therefore "proper venue now lies in Kings County." The Appellate Division held that Family Court Act does not authorize dismissal of proceedings for forum non conveniens or improper venue. The proper remedy when the venue of a proceeding is placed in an improper or inconvenient county is to transfer the proceeding to the proper or more convenient county pursuant to Family Court Act 174. Nevertheless, the proceedings should have been dismissed on the ground that the Family Court did not acquire personal jurisdiction over the mother. There was no evidence as to where the mother and the children resided. The father stated, in his petitions, that it is "likely" that the mother moved into the maternal grandmother's apartment in Brooklyn with the children, but he did not provide the court with a name or address for the maternal grandmother. The father sought authorization to serve the mother by publication, since he did not know her current address. Because the Family Court, sua sponte, dismissed the proceedings based on improper venue, it did not address this request, and the petitions were never served. The Appellate Division pointed out that there is no provision of the Family Court Act which authorizes service by publication in a visitation proceeding and that service by publication is basically a symbolic gesture, not a manner reasonably calculated to give notice. It held that if there is good cause shown, service by an alternative method specifically tailored to the particular facts of the case and reasonably calculated to give notice would be sufficient (citing CPLR 7005). As the father failed to provide the court with any information upon which to base such an alternative method of service, the proceeding should have been dismissed, sua sponte, for lack of personal jurisdiction over the mother.

Mismanagement of Receivership Estate by Plaintiff -Wife Warrants Surcharge for Fees, Expenses, and Financial Damage.

In Saline v Saline, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 328788 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a divorce action, the plaintiff was appointed receiver of several investment properties owned by the defendant. The plaintiff was explicitly directed by the Supreme Court to obtain authorization before obtaining the services of any other parties, such as an attorney or managing agent. The plaintiff nevertheless proceeded to hire and pay an inexperienced property manager without court authorization, to collect rents from only a few tenants and to approve minor repairs on the properties. She also allowed one property to remain in foreclosure for more than a year before giving an exclusive listing to her property manager, selling the property far below market value, and paying a full broker's commission to her property manager even though he did not find the purchaser. She also engaged an attorney and paid an apparently excessive attorney's fee for the closing, also without court authorization. When the plaintiff finally provided an accounting of the receivership properties, she was unable to connect receipts for repairs with any particular property, admitted to commingling funds with her personal funds, and was unable to provide documentation to support the claimed expenses. The Appellate Division held that given these facts, the court properly declined to approve the plaintiff's hiring and payment of a property manager and attorney without court authorization. As receiver, the plaintiff was obligated to keep itemized accounts of the receivership estate and it is the receiver's burden to justify the accounting. Given the plaintiff's inability to do so, the court properly declined to approve the belated and incomplete accounting. In light of the overall evidence of the plaintiff's mismanagement of the receivership estate, the court properly surcharged her for fees, expenses, and financial damage caused by her mismanagement. Considering the relative merit of the parties' positions, as well as the plaintiff's conduct, the court also properly awarded the defendant an attorney's fee.

Error for Supreme Court to Have Raised Defect in Commencement Sua Sponte and Vacate Judgment on That Ground Where Defendant Waived Any Objection to the Defect in Commencement by Failing to Raise a Timely Objection.

In Khlevner v Khlevner — N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 331474 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) defendant was served with a summons with notice on November 4, 2005, five days before initiatory papers were filed with the County Clerk. On December 15, 2005, the defendant signed an affidavit stating that he was appearing in the action but did not intend to respond to the summons or answer the complaint and a settlement agreement. A judgment of divorce was entered in March 2006. In May 2006 the plaintiff moved for an order of protection and for an order setting a visitation schedule. The defendant cross-moved, inter alia, to vacate the judgment and to set aside the settlement agreement on the ground, among others, that the plaintiff fraudulently induced him to sign the affidavit and settlement agreement. The matter was referred to a judicial hearing officer for a hearing and a determination of the defendant's cross motion. Before the hearing was completed, the court noted that its review of the court file revealed that the defendant was served with the summons with notice before the initiatory papers were filed with the County Clerk. The court terminated the hearing prematurely and granted that branch of the cross motion which was to vacate the judgment on the ground that the attempted service before the filing of the initiatory papers was a nullity (see Matter of Gershel v. Porr, 89 N.Y.2d 327). The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should not have raised the defect in commencement sua sponte and vacated the judgment on that ground because the defendant waived any objection to the defect in commencement by failing to raise a timely objection thereto (see Harris v. Niagara Falls Bd. of Educ., 6 NY3d 155, 159; Matter of Fry v. Village of Tarrytown, 89 N.Y.2d 714). Since the hearing on the defendant's cross motion was not completed, it remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, for a continuation of the hearing and for a new determination of the cross motion.

Request for Law Guardian, Forensic Expert, or In Camera Must Be Made to Be Preserved of Review

In Dana-Sitzer v Sitzer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 496071 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Supreme Court awarded sole custody of the children to the mother. The father appealed, arguing, inter alia, that the trial court should have appointed a law guardian or forensic mental health expert for the parties' children, or conduct an in camera interview with the children. The Court held that since he never asked the trial court to appoint a law guardian or forensic mental health expert for the parties' children, or to conduct an in camera interview with the children his argument that the trial court should have done all of these things was unpreserved for review and it did not find any public policy exception to the preservation requirement in this case.

March 3, 2008

Court of Appeals Holds that FFCCSOA and UIFSA Prohibit New York From Awarding Child Support After Connecticut Child Support Order Expires

In Matter of Spencer v. Spencer __NY3d__ (February 14, 2008) the Court of Appeals held that when a Connecticut child support order has expired because the child has reached 18 (the age of majority under Connecticut law), and the father still resides in Connecticut, although the mother and children now reside in New York, a subsequent New York child support order for support of the same child to age 21 (the age of majority under New York law) is considered a petition for modification of the Connecticut order. Under the Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act (28 USC § 1738B) and the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (Family Ct Act § 580-611), New York lacks subject matter jurisdiction over a modification petition where the father still resides in the state of the expired original support order, absent a consent to jurisdiction.

Appellate Division Sets Standards For Granting of Continuance. Reversal Not Warranted for Alleged Failure to Comply with ADA

In Kadanoff v Kadanoff, __NYS2d__, 848 N.Y.S.2d 661 (1st Dept, 2007) Supreme Court distributed the marital assets between the parties in accordance with a stipulation of the parties, awarded the wife durational maintenance of $4,000 per month for five years, and fixed the value of a charging lien in favor of her former attorney, and against her, at $66,137.19. The Appellate Division held that reversal of the judgment was not warranted based on the court's alleged failure throughout the course of the litigation and, in particular, when the defendant appeared pro se at trial, to provide reasonable accommodation for her alleged disability, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act. The defendant submitted insufficient evidence in support of her claim that she was disabled. Moreover, she failed to demonstrate, as required by the ADA, that, by reason of her alleged disability, she was substantially limited in a major life activity. The Court found no merit to the defendant's contention that reversal of the order fixing the value of a charging lien in favor of her former attorney, was required because the Supreme Court denied her applications for a continuance of the attorney's fee hearing. It held that it is an improvident exercise of discretion to deny a continuance where the application is properly made, is not made for purposes of delay, the evidence is material, and the need for a continuance does not result from the failure to exercise due diligence. Here, the defendant failed to show that a continuance would produce evidence that was material to the issue of the value of the legal services rendered or that her requests for a continuance were not the result of her successor counsel's failure to exercise due diligence in preparing for the hearing.

Improper to Permit Spouse to Select Forensic Evaluator

In Armstrong v Heilker, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4723608 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Family Court entered an order which granted the father's request for full disclosure to the father of the mother's "mental and physical health records," but limited the disclosure to a 15-month period of time; the court also directed the mother to provide additional records covering a broader time period for the court's in camera review. Thereafter, the court granted the mother's motion to reargue and entered a new order in May 2006, which limited its previous order by requiring that the mother provide her mental health records only to the court for its in camera review. In May 2007, after a review of the mother's "medical records," Family Court entered an order which directed her to submit to a mental health evaluation by an expert to be selected by the father and to fully disclose her "complete medical records" to that expert for the purpose of an "evaluation of her mental health." On appeal the mother contended that it was error to allow the father to choose the expert and the Appellate Division agreed. In the absence of a binding agreement by the parties, the accepted practice is for the court to order an independent evaluation. The statute "makes it clear" that such an evaluation "should be done by a court-appointed [qualified mental health] professional and not one chosen by a party to the proceeding" In a footnote the court pointed out that notwithstanding the provisions of the CPLR (see CPLR 3121, 3124) regarding medical examinations including psychiatric and psychological examinations, Family Ct Act 251 should be followed in Family Court proceedings in which any such examination "will serve the purposes of this act." These examinations have become known as "forensic evaluations" meaning they fall within that part of medical science--forensics--which relates to the law and, as here, are deemed material and necessary by the court in reaching a proper outcome. The matter was remitted to Family Court with instructions that if the court deemed it appropriate to order a forensic mental health evaluation of the mother, it must select an independent or neutral (or agreed-upon) psychiatrist or psychologist to examine her and submit a report to the court. It also directed the court to further exercise its discretion as to the scope of the evaluation, directing, among other things, which medical records of the mother would be made available to that professional, what access the parties and/or their attorneys would have to the report, how the report would be used at trial and who would bear the expense of the evaluation.

Appellate Division Defines Proceeding Which Must Be "Pending" in a Jurisdiction That Is "Substantially in Conformity" with Provisions of UCCJEA Article 5-A

In re Michale McC., v. Manuela A.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4533431 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the parties were married in the United States and had one child, Liam, who was born in Italy in 2001 and who had dual citizenship. A 2004 judgment of divorce entered determined that the court had no jurisdiction over custody issues because Liam had lived in New York for only 9 out of his 27 months since birth. Subsequent to filing divorce proceedings in New York, the mother filed parallel proceedings in Rome and the father consented to the court in Rome entering orders for custody and visitation. In December 2005, the Court of Rome granted the divorce and awarded the mother sole custody of Liam. The order permitted the mother to decide whether she wanted to reside in Italy or in the United States and provided for the father to have visitation under both circumstances. In July 2006, the father filed an appeal in the Appeal Court of Rome. As of January 2005, the mother (with Liam), and the father were living separately in New York. On August 16, 2006 the mother petitioned Family Court in New York to modify the Italian court's order of visitation and to suspend the father's visitation rights on the grounds that the father had abused Liam. The father cross-moved to obtain sole custody of Liam. On or about March 6, 2007 the mother fled with Liam to Italy in violation of a specific court order not to take the child out of New York State. The Appellate Division held that Family Court had jurisdiction to modify the custody order of the Italian court because New York was the child's "home state" at the time both the petition and the cross petition were filed. Under New York's UCCJEA, a New York court has jurisdiction to modify a child custody determination made by a court of another state if this state is the "home state" of the child. DRL 76-b. A court of this state must treat a foreign country as if it were a state of the United States. DRL 75-d. The fact that a custodial parent flees in the middle of a custody litigation commenced properly in New York does not deprive the New York courts of subject matter jurisdiction to issue an order concerning custody, visitation, and related issues so long as the father resided here. The, mother, father and child were living in New York since January 2005, a period of 19 months prior to the mother's petition for a modification of the initial custody order, and 22 months prior to the father's cross petition for sole custody. On appeal the mother argued that "home state" notwithstanding, the New York Court did not have jurisdiction because the father's appeal of the Italian court's sole custody order was pending in Rome. She relied on DRL 76- e(1) which states: "a court of this state may not exercise its jurisdiction under [article 5- A] if, at the time of the commencement of the proceeding, a proceeding concerning the custody of the child has been commenced in a court of another state having jurisdiction substantially in conformity with this article, unless the proceeding has been terminated or is stayed by the court of the other state because a court of this state is a more convenient forum ..." The Appellate Division held that the mother's reliance on DRL 76-e was misplaced. Even though there was an appeal pending in Rome, the mother's contention failed to recognize that the "pending" proceeding must be pending in a jurisdiction that is "substantially in conformity" with the provisions of article 5-A. In other words, it must be a jurisdiction that was either the "home state" when the proceeding was commenced or satisfies one of the other jurisdictional predicates of section 76. When the appeal was filed by the father in July 2006, the Italian court did not have jurisdiction "substantially in conformity" with the UCCJEA since by that time New York, not Italy, was the "home state". The cross petition was reinstated and the matter remanded for further proceedings consistent with the decision, including a custody inquest.

February 16, 2008

Law Guardian May Not Be Unsworn Witness and Must Comply with Law Guardian Rules of the Chief Judge

In Naomi C v Russell A, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 304936 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed without a hearing Court's dismissal of a petition to modify a custody order. The Appellate Division pointed out that with the parties present, the court asked the Law Guardian, on the record, to discuss the position of the 10-year-old child regarding how well the current custody arrangement was working. Although the court was warranted in dismissing the petition on its face, the questioning of the Law Guardian (now called Attorney for the Child) by the court was "something that should not be repeated". Although the court was correct to disallow the "cross-examination" of the Law Guardian by petitioner's counsel, the court should not consider the hearsay opinion of a child in determining the legal sufficiency of a pleading in the first place. Most importantly, such colloquy makes the Law Guardian an unsworn witness, a position in which no attorney should be placed. It emphasized that the attorney for the child is subject to the ethical requirements applicable to all lawyers, including but not limited to becoming a witness in the litigation. (Citing Rules of the Chief Judge [22 NYCRR] 7.2[b]).

Creation of Joint Account Vests in Each Tenant a Present Unconditional Property Interest in Undivided One Half of Money

In Bailey v Bailey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 275056 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that although the court properly determined that plaintiff was entitled to retain the amount of $43,000 she had removed from the parties' joint HSBC checking accounts containing $66,000, the court erred in allocating the entire amount as separate property. "The creation of a joint account vests in each tenant a present unconditional property interest in an undivided one half of the money deposited, regardless of who puts the funds on deposit. The creation of a joint account vests in each tenant a present unconditional property interest in an undivided one half of the money deposited, regardless of who puts the funds on deposit" (Parry v. Parry, 93 A.D.2d 989, 990; see Nasca v. Nasca, 302 A.D.2d 906). Thus, each party was entitled to a distributive award of $33,000 from that account. The Appellate Division held that the court properly distributed the various retirement accounts. The appreciation to defendant's Vanguard Money Market Reserves Account was marital property because plaintiff indirectly contributed to the appreciation of this asset by handling the household matters, thereby permitting [defendant] the freedom to devote energy to his financial endeavors. The remaining accounts in question contained commingled marital property and separate property, and defendant failed to trace the source of the funds [that he contended were separate property] with sufficient particularity to rebut the presumption that they were marital property.

Property Not Marital Where Neither Wife Nor Husband Hold Any Valuable Property Rights in It. Marital Property Rights Are Determined upon Divorce. Thus, Defendant Not Required to List Possible Future Rights to Marital Property in Bankruptcy Schedules.

In Mattioli v Mattioli, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2008 WL 275078 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly refused to treat the former marital residence, which was titled in the names of plaintiff's parents or in one of their names, as marital property subject to equitable distribution, despite the fact that plaintiff paid her father $42,899 during the marriage as a down payment towards its purchase. The court erred, however, in basing its decision solely on the fact that title to the property was held by one or both of plaintiff's parents, rather than by plaintiff and/or defendant. That fact was not necessarily dispositive because Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(1)(c) defines marital property as "all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held." Thus, the dispositive issue was whether plaintiff and/or defendant held "any valuable property rights" in the former marital residence, inasmuch as property is "not marital property [where] neither the wife nor the husband [holds] any valuable property rights" in it (Pulitzer v. Pulitzer, 134 A.D.2d 84, 88). While the parties in this case alluded to an agreement between plaintiff, defendant, and plaintiff's parents for the purchase of the former marital residence, no written agreement for the purchase and sale thereof was presented to the court. In the absence of a written contract, there was no evidence before the court that either plaintiff or defendant held the requisite "valuable property rights" in the former marital residence to render it marital property. The Appellate Division held that the court erred in applying the doctrine of judicial estoppel in precluding defendant from presenting evidence of funds received by plaintiff from the sale of the former marital residence. Defendant attempted to establish that the $8,000 to $9,000 received by plaintiff from the sale of the former marital residence was marital property in the form of appreciation in the value of the property resulting from improvements he made to it during the marriage. The Supreme Court erred in relying on its decision in Matter of Miller (Berti) (1 AD3d 885) when it applied the doctrine of judicial estoppel to the former marital residence. The record established that during the marriage defendant twice filed for bankruptcy under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code and received discharges, and that he claimed in both bankruptcies that he was single and did not list the former marital residence as an asset in his bankruptcy schedules. The court thus determined that judicial estoppel prevented defendant from claiming any interest in funds received upon the sale of the former marital residence. That was error, inasmuch as the discussion of the doctrine of judicial estoppel in Miller was in the context of a bankruptcy proceeding, while here the issue concerned the property rights of the parties in a matrimonial action. [M]arital property rights are determined upon the granting of a divorce", and defendant was not required to list possible future rights to marital property in the bankruptcy schedules (see 11 USC s 541[a][2][A]). It modified the judgment by remitting the matter to Supreme Court to reopen the proof at trial to permit defendant to submit evidence that the funds received by plaintiff from the sale of the former marital residence were marital property.

Third Department Holds "Substantial Change in Circumstances" Standard Correct Where Supreme Court Refers Child Support to Family Court

In Zwickel v Szajer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 191640 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in April 2003 the Support Magistrate entered an order for child support. Shortly thereafter, plaintiff commenced an action for divorce where the issue of child support was referred to Family Court. At about the same time, plaintiff commenced a proceeding, pursuant to Family Ct Act article 4, alleging a violation of the April 2003 order. After a hearing on both matters, the Support Magistrate found That defendant was in willful violation of its prior order and, by separate order, that there was no substantial change in circumstances to warrant an upward modification of child support. Plaintiff's objections were denied by Family Court. The Appellate Division agreed with Family Court that the Support Magistrate applied the correct standard in determining plaintiff's application for an upward modification of the April 2003 order of support. It held that in a matrimonial action, unless a prior support order from Family Court is continued by Supreme Court, the prior order terminates when Supreme Court makes a new support determination. As no such order was issued by Supreme Court, instead referring the matter to Family Court to determine the application, the "substantial change in circumstances" standard was correctly applied upon plaintiff's application for a modification of the Support Magistrate's prior order of support (Citing Cynoske v. Cynoske, 8 A.D.3d 720, 722-723 [2004]). Ed Note: But see Blauner v Blauner, 60 App Div 2d 215 (1st Dept.1977) holding that when divorce follows separation the court may consider child support de novo. The same rule was applied to alimony in Kover v Kover, 29 N.Y.2d 408 (1972).

Failure to Provide Client with Statement of Client's Rights and Responsibilities Constitutes Violation of DR 2-106(f). Failure to Send Bill During One and One-half Year Divorce Proceeding Violates DR 1-102(A)(5).

In Matter of Larsen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 249850 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), a disciplinary proceeding, the First Department held that the failure of the attorney to provide her client with a Statement of Client's Rights and Responsibilities constituted a violation of DR 2-106(F). It also found that Respondent either improperly notarized her client's signature, or signed her client's name, with the client's consent, notarized that signature, and then submitted the documents to Supreme Court. These false signatures and false notarizations constituted violations of DR 1-102(A)(4), even if done with the consent of the client. Respondent's failure to send her client a bill during the one and one-half year divorce proceeding was held to be in violation of DR 1-102(A)(5).

February 1, 2008

Attempt to Bribe Former Trial Justice Constituted Egregious Marital Fault

In Levi v Levi, 848 N.Y.S.2d 225 (2d Dept., 2007) the parties originally appeared before a Justice of the Supreme Court, Kings County and the action terminated abruptly following allegations that the plaintiff attempted to bribe the former Justice for a favorable outcome. At a criminal proceeding in 2004, the plaintiff admitted that he conspired to bribe the former Justice in the pending divorce action, providing a $10,000 payment to influence a favorable outcome on his behalf. Following a second trial, the Supreme Court equitably distributed the sole marital asset, the marital residence, entirely to the defendant, based in part, on the egregious behavior of the plaintiff in attempting to bribe the former Justice. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in finding that the plaintiff's attempt to bribe the former Justice constituted egregious marital fault to be factored into the equitable distribution award in addition to other considerations.

"Substantial Change in Circumstances" Standard Correct Where Supreme Court Refers Child Support to Family Court

In Zwickel v Szajer,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2008 WL 191640 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in April 2003 the Support Magistrate entered an order for child support. Shortly thereafter, plaintiff commenced an action for divorce where the issue of child support was referred to Family Court. At about the same time, plaintiff commenced a proceeding, pursuant to Family Ct Act article 4, alleging a violation of the April 2003 order. After a hearing on both matters, the Support Magistrate found that defendant was in willful violation of its prior order and, by separate order, that there was no substantial change in circumstances to warrant an upward modification of child support. Plaintiff's objections were denied by Family Court. The Appellate Division agreed with Family Court that the Support Magistrate applied the correct standard in determining plaintiff's application for an upward modification of the April 2003 order of support. It held that in a matrimonial action, unless a prior support order from Family Court is continued by Supreme Court, the prior order terminates when Supreme Court makes a new support determination. As no such order was issued by Supreme Court, instead referring the matter to Family Court to determine the application, the "substantial change in circumstances" standard was correctly applied upon plaintiff's application for a modification of the Support Magistrate's prior order of support (Citing Cynoske v. Cynoske, 8 A.D.3d 720, 722-723 [2004]). Ed Note: In Blauner v Blauner, 60

App Div 2d 215 (1st Dept.1977) the First Department held that when divorce follows separation the court may consider child support de novo. In Kover v Kover, 29 N.Y.2d 408 (1972) the Court of Appeals held that alimony may be considered de novo).

Wilful Violation Order Reversed Based Upon Ineffective Assistance of Counsel In Support Enforcement Proceeding

In Matter of Martin v Martin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4530824 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) petitioner father and respondent stipulated to a joint custody arrangement, whereby the father would pay child support of $200 per week. In 2004 the mother sought a finding that the father had willfully violated the order of support and the father sought modification of his support obligation. In his petition, the father listed verbal agreements and health as the change in circumstances justifying modification. On the first day of trial, the father's attorney attempted to introduce medical records but, after the mother objected, the Support Magistrate refused to receive the records "at this time," apparently in the absence of proper authentication. The father testified that in the spring and summer of 2003 his business collapsed, he was diagnosed with an illness which crippled his ability to work until approximately January 2005 and, between September 2003 and May 2004, he lived with the mother and their children under an agreement that he would perform the duties of a "stay-at-home parent" in lieu of support payments. On the second day of trial a month later, the father attempted to introduce the testimony of his therapist who was apparently prepared to testify that during an addiction counseling session the parties had "agreed to have [the father] provide services instead of providing child support dollars." However, the mother objected to such testimony on the ground that it was privileged. The Support Magistrate adjourned the trial for research on the issue of privilege. Thereafter, the Support Magistrate determined that the mother was involved in the counseling only for the purpose of assisting with the father's therapy and that the therapist would be permitted to testify as a fact witness regarding the alleged agreement. On the date of that decision--May 5, 2005--the Support Magistrate set the next date for the continuation of the trial for June 28, 2005. On June 28, 2005, almost eight weeks after her decision, the Support Magistrate was prepared to accept the therapist's testimony. The father's attorney, reported to the court that the therapist was not available and requested that another date be set for the therapist's testimony or, in the alternative, that the mother consent to the receipt in evidence of the therapist's affidavit, which had been submitted previously in support of the father's earlier assertion that the therapist should be allowed to testify. The mother objected to both of these options, and the Support Magistrate agreed. The father's testimony resumed and it was revealed that he had recently been incarcerated on pending criminal charges. The mother testified that the father had indeed resided with her and the children at times and that she had attended therapy sessions with him, but she asserted that they had not entered into any agreement to suspend child support. After again denying the father's requests for an opportunity to call the therapist or introduce the therapist's affidavit, the Support Magistrate ruled from the bench dismissing both petitions based on the father's failure to establish a change in circumstances and finding that he had willfully violated a support order. In her ruling, the Support Magistrate noted that no medical evidence of the father's alleged inability to work due to diminished health was introduced, incarceration is not a basis to modify an order of support, and no credible evidence supported his claims regarding the alleged arrangement between the parties. She issued an order finding that he willfully violated an order of support. Family Court affirmed. The Appellate Division rejected the father's contention that the Support Magistrate's refusal to adjourn the trial so that a key witness could be located amounted to an abuse of discretion and that the decision to not consider the therapist's affidavit in place of his testimony was error. "The grant or denial of a motion for 'an adjournment for any purpose is a matter resting within the sound discretion of the trial court. Here, it was clear that the father's inability to produce the therapist resulted from his counsel's lack of due diligence in preparing for the hearing. His counsel conceded that he never spoke directly with the therapist--simply asserting that a letter was sent and it never came back so "[he] expected him to be [t]here"--and there was no indication in the record that any pretrial attempt was made to obtain a continuance or to reschedule. As for the refusal to admit the therapist's affidavit into evidence, the father failed to suggest any basis on which admission of that hearsay document would have been permissible. The court was persuaded by the father's ineffective assistance of counsel claim based upon his attorney's failure to present sufficient evidence regarding his medical condition and to ensure that a key witness was present at trial. Under Family Ct Act 262(a)(vi), a person has the right to the assistance of counsel in any proceeding before the court in which an order or other determination is being sought to hold such person in contempt of the court or in willful violation of a previous order of the court. The standard for effective assistance of counsel here is whether, viewed in its totality, the representation was meaningful and whether actual prejudice was suffered as a result of claimed deficiencies. The father's initial modification petition and his defense to the willful violation allegations turned on his health-related inability to work due to his treatment for a serious illness and an alleged agreement with the mother to suspend his support payments, and his counsel did not get important evidence admitted that would have advanced these assertions. Counsel failed to properly obtain authentication for the father's medical records, call any witnesses to testify as to the effects of the father's illness, subpoena the therapist, or otherwise ensure his availability as a witness on the trial date. Family Court made specific reference to the lack of medical evidence in its decision, finding that the father had not refuted the mother's prima facie showing of willfulness, and affirmed the specific finding that no credible proof was offered to support the father's assertions of an agreement between the parties--the precise issue on which the therapist was to testify. Had this proof been admitted into evidence, the father would have had independent verification for his assertions which may have relieved him of several months worth of support obligations and may have undermined the allegation of willfulness. Taken together, the omissions constituted a failure to meaningfully represent the father, and he was entitled to a new hearing on his initial modification petition and the mother's violation petition.

Hearsay Evidence of Abuse or Neglect Admissible and May Be Considered in Custody Case Where Corroborated

In Matter of Bartlett v Jackson,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4722934 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept) the mother argued on appeal that Family Court incorrectly admitted hearsay evidence and then relied upon such evidence in its custody decision. The Appellate Division held that in custody proceedings involving allegations of abuse or neglect, hearsay statements of the child pertinent to those allegations may be admitted and considered so long as they are corroborated by other evidence.

January 16, 2008

Father Directed to Put 50% of Child Support Obligation in Escrow until the Mother Can Certify Compliance with Visitation Order and Absence of Interference with Father's Visitation Rights

In Matter of Lew v Sobel,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4555624 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division noted that a custodial parent's deliberate frustration of, or active interference with, the noncustodial parent's visitation rights can warrant the suspension of future child support payments (citing Domestic Relations Law 241) In view of the evidence presented at the hearing and the Supreme Court's determination that the mother deliberately had interfered with the father's visitation rights, it directed the father to pay 50% of his child support obligation to the mother's attorney, to be held in an escrow account until the mother can certify, to the satisfaction of the Supreme Court, her compliance with the visitation provisions of the first order dated April 28, 2006, and the absence of her interference with the father's visitation rights. When the mother can establish to the satisfaction of the court that she was not interfering with the father's visitation with the children, there will then be a basis to direct the mother's attorney to release, to the mother, the child support payments held in escrow. It also held that under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court should have reapportioned the parties' responsibility for the fees of the therapeutic visitation facilitators, the Law Guardian, and the forensic evaluator employed during the course of the proceeding so that the mother was responsible for 75% of such fees and the father was responsible for 25% of such fees.

Strict Application of Tropea Factors Not Required When There No Prior Custody Award

In Streid v Streid, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4440940 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the father filed a petition seeking custody of the children, after the mother removed them from the marital home and relocated to Georgia without his consent. Family Court awarded custody to the mother, provided that she remained in New York. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that the mother was correct that a strict application of the factors set forth in Matter of Tropea v. Tropea (87 N.Y.2d 727 [1996]) is not required when there is no prior award of custody (citing Furman v. Furman, 298 A.D.2d 627, 628-629 [2002], lv dismissed and denied 99 N.Y.2d 575 [2003]). Nevertheless, a parent's decision to reside in a distant locale is a very important factor among the constellation of factors to be considered in arriving at a best interests determination, particularly where there is evidence that it would detrimentally affect the other parent's relationship with the children. Other relevant factors to be considered include the ages of the children, fitness of the parents, quality of the home environment, each parent's ability to provide for the child[ren's] intellectual and emotional development, and the effect the award of custody to one parent would have on the children's relationship with the other. After considering the mother's role as the primary caregiver and the father's strong relationship with the children and significant involvement in their educational and extracurricular activities, as well as the incidents of domestic violence perpetrated by both parties and the mother's alcohol abuse, the award was proper.

Where Every CSSA Requirement Met But BCSO Miscalculated, That May Not Be Enough to Invalidate Agreement

In Sullivan v Sullivan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4441111 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties settlement agreement was incorporated, but not merged, into a February 2005 judgment of divorce. When plaintiff moved to enforce the maintenance and child support provisions, defendant cross-moved to have them declared void. Supreme Court denied defendant's motion.. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that the agreement indicated that the parties were advised of the Child Support Standards Act, the presumptive amount which would be awarded thereunder, albeit miscalculated, and the reasons why the parties sought to deviate therefrom. While agreeing that an omission of the non-waivable statutory requirements would render the agreement void, the Appellate Division held that where, as here, each and every other statutory requirement is met, yet the basic child support obligation from which the deviation is sought is stated but miscalculated, that alone may not be enough to invalidate the agreement. It was clear that the error emanated from the parties' failure to deduct the agreed upon maintenance from defendant's income prior to the calculation under the CSSA. The error resulted in defendant's agreement to pay child support of $1,500 when the presumptively correct CSSA amount would have been $1,548. With the settlement agreement providing that there will never be any upward modification of child support, only a downward modification based upon defendant's income, and that all of the enumerated tax benefits would enure to defendant, despite the fact that they would have been properly credited to plaintiff, the Appellate Court found no basis upon which it would void the otherwise valid child support provisions in the agreement. Moreover, with Supreme Court having stated its reasons for allowing the deviation in its decision supporting the issuance of the judgment of divorce on the same date when it permitted the incorporation of the parties' agreement in the action for divorce, there was no viable challenge to the judgment.

Evidence By Unnamed Preparer is Outside Business Record Exception to Hearsay Rule

In Re Ashley Lisa D, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4390621 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly excluded from evidence the Very Intensive Preventive Services program closing summary and a psychological evaluation by an unnamed preparer, as these documents do not fall under the business record exception to the hearsay rule (citing Matter of Bronstein-Becher v. Becher, 25 AD3d 796, 797 [2006]).

Failure to Indicate If Amount of Child Support Was Presumptively Correct or If it Represented Deviation from CSSa Renders it Void. Not Error to Utilize Amount of Maintenance Actually Paid.

In Bellinger v Bellinger, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4441204 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Supreme Court partially granted defendant's motion prior to trial to set aside the child support provisions of the parties stipulation because it did not indicate whether the amount of child support was presumptively correct or whether it represented a deviation from the Child Support Standards Act. Following trial, Supreme Court's judgment of divorce awarded child support in an amount in excess of that contained in the prior stipulation, ordered plaintiff to pay defendant $2,475 in previously owed car insurance and determined that defendant was entitled to submit an application for counsel fees, and awarded defendant counsel fees of $15,874.47. The Appellate Division held that as no appeal was taken from the order vacating that portion of the stipulation that dealt with child support this issue was not properly before it. In any event, Supreme Court correctly determined that the stipulation failed to comply with nonwaivable requirements of the CSSA. Supreme Court correctly found that the before-tax health insurance deductions in the sum of $1,895 .05 were a fringe benefit provided as part of plaintiff's compensation for employment and includable in the calculation of his income for child support purposes. There was no error in the inclusion of $15,496 .56 in plaintiff's income. Contrary to his claim that this was a one-time nonrecurring payment, the record revealed that he received a similar cash payment in 2003 and the record reflected that his income had consistently increased for three consecutive years. Under these circumstances, even assuming the one-time nature of this payment, Supreme Court permissively exercised its broad discretion to impute that sum as income to plaintiff. With respect to maintenance, plaintiff pointed out that his annual maintenance payment would be $9,804, but that Supreme Court gave him credit only for the amount actually paid in 2005 ($7,353). As the statute authorizes a deduction for "alimony or maintenance actually paid or to be paid to a spouse that is a party to the instant action" (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][b][5][vii][C]), there was no error in Supreme Court utilizing the figure actually paid. With respect to plaintiff's argument that he received improper credit for FICA contributions, it held that Supreme Court committed a minor error in only deducting $5,580 for Social Security and not including $1,648.98 for Medicare. After plaintiff received credit for the Medicare portion of his FICA deduction, his income for child support purposes was $97,549. When added to defendant's income of $21,298.39, the combined parental income was $118,847.39. As the parties had two children, application of 25% to this income yielded an annual child support obligation of $29,711.85 or $571.38 per week. Plaintiff was responsible for 82% of this total or $468.53.

January 1, 2008

DRL 236 B(a)(1) Contains No Express Time Limitation with Respect to Calculating Income for Maintenance Award.

In Haines v Haines, 44 A.D.3d 901, 845 N.Y.S.2d 77 (2d Dept.2007) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $1,200 per month until May 1, 2019. The Appellate Division reduced the award to $900 per month until May 1, 2019, or until the death of either party or the plaintiff's remarriage, whichever shall occur sooner. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to impute income from the plaintiff's second job as a data entry clerk since that income contributed to the predivorce standard of living and was demonstrative of the plaintiff's earning capacity. The plaintiff had been working at the second job for several years prior to the commencement of the matrimonial action, and the defendant had been working for considerably more than 40 hours per week during this time period. While the plaintiff had been earning only approximately $39,000 per year at the time of the commencement of this action, by the time the matter was heard by the trial court, she had increased her earnings to approximately $56,000. Unlike the Equitable Distribution Law, Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(6)(a)(1) contains no express time limitation with respect to calculating income. Thus, when considering the "income and property of the respective parties," the trial court should not exclude any property or income increase which has occurred between the time of commencement of the action and the time of trial. Accordingly, the trial court should have attributed to the plaintiff a yearly income of $56,000. Additionally, the trial court erred in failing to include a provision that the award of maintenance will terminate upon the death of either party or the plaintiff's remarriage.

First Department Holds That Request for Extension to File Objections under FCA 439(e) is Procedural and Can Be Granted At Any Time

In Judith S. v Howard S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4336196 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of Family Court, which denied respondent father's motion for an extension of time to file objections to the final order of child support issued by the Support

Magistrate six months earlier. Respondent father failed to file objections to the final order of child support within the 35-day period set forth in Family Court Act 439(e). It pointed out that CPLR 2004, upon which he relied, contains general authorization for a court to "extend the time fixed by any statute, rule or order for doing any act." It noted that the scope of this section was restricted by the Second Department to "extensions of time for the doing of acts in actions and proceedings and not for the doing of acts which are substantive in character and provided for under other statutes " (Matter of Powers v. Foley, 25 A.D.2d 525 [1966], emphasis added). The request in this case was directed at a procedural time limitation, and not a substantive one, and thus could have been granted even if based on a statute outside the CPLR. However, CPLR 2004 additionally requires a showing of "good cause," and respondent father had not demonstrated good cause for failing to file timely objections. Settlement negotiations alone are an insufficient excuse for delay, and the prejudice that would result to petitioner as a result of the father's delay in filing objections was obvious, given his chronic failure to meet his child support obligations in a full and timely fashion, with no effort to pay down his substantial arrears. The Court pointed out that the Third Department denies its application to time limits set forth in any statutes or regulations "other than those contained in the CPLR" (Matter of Carassavas v. New York State Dept. of Social Servs., 90 A.D.2d 630 [1982]), and has consistently held to that position (see Matter of Monahan v. Hartka, 17 A.D.3d 758, 759 [2005]).

Family Court Required to Consider Whether Cola Increase Should Be Applied and to Review Order To Determine Whether Adjustment Warranted Based on Guidelines

In Matter of Palmer v Palmer. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4328453 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), at the mother's request and the SCU issued a cost-of-living adjustment order, which increased the father's monthly support obligation. The Appellate Division held that in considering the father's objections to the COLA increase, the Family Court was required to consider not only whether the COLA increase should be applied, but also to review the order "to determine whether an adjustment is warranted based on the guidelines" set forth in Family Court Act 413 (citing Matter of Tompkins County Support Collection Unit v. Chamberlin, 99 N.Y.2d 328, 335; see Family Ct Act s 413-a[3][b][1]; Social Services Law s 111-n [5][b]). In the order appealed from, however, was apparent that the Family Court did neither. As a matter of law, the court's calculation was flawed inasmuch as it assumed, incorrectly, that each parent's share of child support could be determined simply by applying the statutory child support percentage of 17% to that party's gross income. Under the Family Court Act, the child support percentage of 17% must be applied to the "combined parental income" , up to $80,000, and the amount must then be "prorated in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income" . Moreover, if the combined parental income exceeds $80,000, then "the court shall determine the amount of child support for the amount of the combined parental income in excess of such dollar amount through consideration of the facts set forth in [Family Court Act s 413(1)(f)]" (Family Ct Act s 413[1][c][3]). Here, the Family Court's methodology failed to account for the mother's gross income and its possible impact on the father's prorated share of child support. It also held that Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion by using the SCU's adjusted support obligation amount, which had been calculated in accordance with Social Services Law 111-n(4)(a), without regard to the guidelines contained in Family Court Act s 413, to compute a gross income figure, which the court then imputed to the father pursuant to Family Court Act 413(1)(b)(iv). Among other things, the Family Court failed to appreciate that, pursuant to the prior order, only part of the father's support obligation represented his prorated share of 17% of what was then the combined parental income. The remaining amount represented his prorated share of health care, child care, educational, and other extraordinary expenses.

When QDRO Conflicts with Stipulation of Settlement the Stipulation Controls, and QDRO must Be Modified Accordingly

In Condon v Condon, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4328729 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a proper QDRO obtained pursuant to a stipulation of settlement can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. It agreed with the former husband's contention that the distribution of his pension as ordered in the QDRO differs from the distribution of the pension as stated in the parties' stipulation of settlement. The plain language of the relevant provision of the stipulation of settlement governing the former husband's pension stated that the former wife shall be entitled to a 50% interest in the retirement plan as calculated from the date of marriage through the date of separation, that is, 50% of the benefits earned during the relevant 17-year period the former husband was working and was a member of the pension plan. However, the QDRO directed that the former wife receive a percentage of the former husband's pension based upon his final pension benefits, and was not limited to her interest in it as provided for in the stipulation. When the QDRO conflicts with the stipulation of settlement upon which it was based, the stipulation of settlement controls, and the QDRO must be modified accordingly. The court also held that the former wife was entitled to share in cost-of-living adjustments in retirement benefits as long as the increases were limited to her portion of the pension.

Family Court Lacks Authority to Enforce Provisions of Settlement Agreement Pertaining to Distribution of Equity of Marital Residence.

In Gambacorta v Gambacorta, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4183000 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties judgment of divorce incorporated by reference, but did not merge, a stipulation of settlement, which provided for distribution of the remaining equity in the marital residence, allocated responsibility for debts incurred by the former wife and required the former husband to pay the wife maintenance and for certain dental expenses. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the husband's contention, the Family Court is authorized by statute to entertain petitions for the enforcement of an order or decree awarding maintenance or support, and to enter money judgments for support arrears, unless the Supreme Court expressly retains exclusive jurisdiction to enforce the terms of a judgment of divorce (see Family Ct Act s 466[c]. However, Family Court, as a court of limited jurisdiction, lacked authority to determine so much of the wife's petition as sought to enforce those provisions of the Settlement Agreement which pertain to distribution of the equity of the marital residence. The Settlement Agreement also required the husband to pay up to $5,000 towards dental work to be provided to the wife. The husband only submitted evidence sufficient to prove payment of $2,500 to the wife's dentist. The unsworn letter from the dentist stating that a total payment of $5,000 had been received did not have the indicia of reliability associated with a receipt or business record, because it was not created contemporaneously with the purported payments and there was no showing that it was created in the ordinary course of business (see CPLR 4518[a]). Accordingly, the husband was obligated to pay $2,500 to the wife for dental expenses.

December 17, 2007

Appeal Dismissed With Leave to Reinstate After Argument Based upon Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine

In Wechsler v Wechsler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 4168955 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the a judgment of divorce directed the appellant husband to pay respondent a distributive award of $22,770,623 in 60 equal installments of $379,510.50, and monthly maintenance of $46,666.66 until appellant transferred certain assets to respondent. Appellant appealed from the judgment. As a consequence of his failure to comply with it Supreme Court granted the wife's motion to hold appellant in contempt. A subsequent order directed that appellant be arrested and incarcerated, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. By subsequent order, Supreme Court granted judgment against appellant for approximately $1 million in maintenance and distributive award arrears. On May 1, 2007, the appeal from the judgment of divorce was argued. On August 16, 2007, respondent moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellant was a fugitive from this jurisdiction and barred from maintaining this appeal under the fugitive disentitlement doctrine. The First Department dismissed the appeal with leave to defendant-appellant to make a motion to reinstate the appeal on condition that he post an undertaking of $9,151,920.57, and $500,000 in additional security relating to other amounts owed. It held that the fugitive disentitlement doctrine permits a court to 'dismiss an appeal if the party seeking relief is a fugitive while the matter is pending'. The doctrine is based on the inherent power of courts to enforce their judgments and it has long been recognized and applied to those who evade the law while simultaneously seeking its protection" (citing Matter of Skiff-Murray v. Murray, 305 A.D.2d 751, 752 [2003]). The doctrine applies in civil cases provided there is a nexus between the appellant's fugitive status and the appellate proceedings. The nexus requirement is satisfied where the appellant's absence frustrates enforcement of the civil judgment. The principal rationales for the doctrine include: (1) assuring the enforceability of any decision that may be rendered against the fugitive; (2) imposing a penalty for flouting the judicial process; (3) discouraging flights from justice and promoting the efficient operation of the courts; and (4) avoiding prejudice to the non-fugitive party. The Appellate Division found that appellant had willfully remained outside of New York in order to avoid the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of this State and refused to afford him review of the judgment of divorce since he evaded court mandates.

Cross Motion Properly Entertained Without Notice of Cross Motion Where Plaintiff Aware of Cross Motion, Submitted Opposition, and Was Not Unduly Prejudiced

In Fugazy v Fugazy, 844 N.Y.S.2d 341 (2d Dept 2007) the Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the court did not err in entertaining the defendant's cross motion, which was set forth in his affidavit in opposition to the plaintiff's order to show cause and did not include a formal notice of cross motion. Since the plaintiff was aware of the cross motion, submitted opposition to it, and was not unduly prejudiced by the lack of service of a notice of cross motion, the court providently exercised its discretion in entertaining the defendant's cross motion (citing Wechsler v. People, 13 A.D.3d 941, 942, 787 N.Y.S.2d 433; Fox Wander W. Neighborhood Assn. v. Luther Forest Community Assn., 178 A.D.2d 871, 872, 577 N.Y.S.2d 729).

Child's Psychologist Allowed to Testify Concerning Out-of-court Statements Made by Child to Show the Child's State of Mind

In Matter of Noemi D, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2812268 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Respondent appealed from an order terminating her parental rights based on a finding of permanent neglect. The Appellate Division held that the court properly allowed the child's psychologist to testify concerning certain out-of-court statements made by the child. Those statements were offered to show the child's state of mind rather than to establish the truth of the matter asserted).

Child Permitted to Assert Psychologist-Patient Privilege in Custody Modification Case

In Matter of Ascolillo v Ascolillo,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2782953 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties stipulation of settlement which was incorporated but not merged in the parties' judgment of divorce dated November 20, 2003, the parties agreed to joint custody of their two minor children and that the minor children would reside with the mother. However, the stipulation of settlement further provided that: "The parties shall acknowledge that the children's wishes when they are at an appropriate age should be considered in connection with the exercise by the parents of the custodial and visitation rights." The instant proceeding was brought when the subject child requested to spend more time with his father. The Appellate Division found that under the circumstances of this case, there was no basis to disturb the Family Court's determination granting the father's petition to modify the parties' judgment of divorce to award him sole legal and physical custody of the subject child. It also held that the Family Court properly refused to permit the mother to call the child's therapist as a witness, since the Law Guardian did not consent to the disclosure of confidential communications between the child and his therapist (citing Matter of Billings v. Billings, 309 A.D.2d 1194), and the proceeding was not a child protective proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 10 (see Family Ct Act s 1046[a][vii]).

Error to Deny Credit For Entire Mortgage Payment Against Child Support

In Lauria v Lauria --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 3317916 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in failing to credit the husbands child support account for the entire amount that he paid for the plaintiff's mortgage pursuant to a pendente lite order because the payment of the mortgage in addition to child support resulted in giving the plaintiff a double shelter allowance.

Supreme Court Correctly Precluded Testimony by the Defendant's Expert Witnesses Because the Defendant Had Not Complied with the Requirements of Cplr 3101(d)(i)

In Fox v Fox --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 3209615 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court , awarded the plaintiff sole custody of the parties' children, awarded the defendant supervised visitation with the parties' children, denied her an award of maintenance, directed her to pay child support of $1,039 per month and 27% of statutory "add-ons" for the expenses of child care, education, and extracurricular activities of the parties' children, and directed her to pay an attorney's fee in the amount of $42,642.42 to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly precluded testimony by the defendant's expert witnesses because the defendant had not complied with the requirements of CPLR 3101(d)(i) for expert witness disclosure (citing Schwartzberg v. Kingsbridge Hgts. Care Ctr., Inc., 28 AD3d 463, 464-465). It also properly awarded custody to the plaintiff. However, the court should have held a hearing on the issue of visitation. It reduced the child support award in light of the defendant's employment situation, directing that the defendant should pay child support in installments of $75 per week, and 10% for the add-ons. It also held that Supreme Court erred in allocating one-half of the plaintiff's educational loan debt to the defendant, as the plaintiff earned his medical license prior to the marriage. It was more appropriate to require the parties to equally divide the medical bills debt, and the plaintiff's TD Waterhouse IRA. In addition, the defendant should not have been held responsible for repayment of any part of the plaintiff's $50,000 loan from his parents and should not have been directed to pay the plaintiff an attorney's fee.

Error to Use Date That Prior Dismissed Matrimonial Action Was Commenced, as "Cut-off" Date for Identification, Classification, and Valuation of Marital Assets

In Montalvo v Montalvo, 842 N.Y.S.2d 504 (2d Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting the husband's motion to establish February 4, 1999, the date that a prior matrimonial action was commenced, as the last date for the identification, classification, and valuation of the parties' marital assets. It pointed out that the prior matrimonial action, commenced by the husband on the ground of abandonment, was dismissed in its entirety on the merits following a trial. Such a dismissal on the merits foreclosed any claim or entitlement of the husband to equitable distribution of the parties' marital property in that action). Thus, the commencement date of the prior dismissed action may not be utilized as a "cut-off" date for the accumulation of marital property for the purpose of identifying, classifying, and valuing that property in connection with its equitable distribution. Nonetheless, the parties' conduct with respect to their property during the interval between the dismissal of the first action and the commencement of the instant action may, if deemed appropriate, be considered by the Supreme Court in the exercise of its broad discretion to fashion an appropriate distribution of what is characterized as marital property.

December 3, 2007

Rules of the Chief Judge Define the Role of the Law Guardian.

Rule 7.2 of the Rules of the Chief Judge, adopted October 17, 2007, define the role of the law guardian. The rule defines 'Attorney for the child' as a law guardian appointed by the family court pursuant to section 249 of the Family Court Act, or by the supreme court or a surrogate's court in a proceeding over which the family court might have exercised jurisdiction had such action or proceeding been commenced in family court or referred thereto. [7.2 (a)]

The attorney for the child is subject to the ethical requirements applicable to all lawyers, including but not limited to constraints on: ex parte communication; disclosure of client confidences and attorney work product; conflicts of interest; and becoming a witness in the litigation. [7.2 (b)]

In juvenile delinquency and person in need of supervision proceedings, where the child is the respondent, the attorney for the child must zealously defend the child.[7.2 (c)] In other types of proceedings, where the child is the subject, the attorney for the child must zealously advocate the child's position. In ascertaining the child's position, the attorney for the child must consult with and advise the child to the extent of and in a manner consistent with the child's capacities, and have a thorough knowledge of the child's circumstances. If the child is capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, the attorney for the child should be directed by the wishes of the child, even if the attorney for the child believes that what the child wants is not in the child's best interests. The attorney should explain fully the options available to the child, and may recommend to the child a course of action that in the attorney's view would best promote the child's interests. When the attorney for the child is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child, the attorney for the child would be justified in advocating a position that is contrary to the child's wishes. In these circumstances, the attorney for the child must inform the court of the child's articulated wishes if the child wants the attorney to do so, notwithstanding the attorney's position. [7.2 (d)]

First Department Explains Requirements for Extent of Temporary Custody Hearing

In Alex A v Ericka H., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 3380148 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which awarded custody of the parties daughter to petitioner. It held that mother was deprived of her fundamental rights when the hearing court, without any notice, transferred custody of her child to petitioner father. The mother was not represented by counsel at the time the court abruptly ordered this transfer, nor was she afforded a hearing with the opportunity to present evidence and to call and cross-examine witnesses. While the mother was entitled to a full, plenary hearing to decide the issue of permanent custody, the court found that, based on this record, the temporary custody arrangement ordered by Family Court was not without support and the court was fully familiar with the history of the case. While these facts did not provide all the necessary legal justification for the court's precipitous action the Appellate Division pointed out that it was cognizant that family courts in many counties have crushing case loads, extremely difficult family issues to decide, and limited time to make fair and informed determinations in what are often chaotic and highly charged emotional cases. It indicated that it had these considerations in mind when it said in its recent holding in Matter of Martin R.G. v.. Ofelia G.O. (24 AD3d 305, 306 [2005]): The nature and extent of a [temporary custody] hearing may be as abbreviated, in the court's broad discretion, as the particular allegations and known circumstances warrant. The extent of the hearing may perhaps be as little as questioning the parties under oath by the court, subject to limited questioning by the lawyers. In any such case, the court should insure that the factual underpinnings of any temporary order are made clear on the record. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for an expedited determination.

Strong Public Policy Against Restitution or Recoupment of Support Overpayments

In the Matter of Annette M.R., v. John W.R.--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 3318246 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.)the mother commenced a proceeding seeking an upward modification of a prior child support order. The Support Magistrate increased the father's child support obligation but Family Court thereafter granted this objections and restored his prior child support obligation. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court erred in permitting the father to recoup overpayments in child support made in the interim between the Support Magistrate's order and the order granting the father's objections. It held that there is a strong public policy against restitution or recoupment of support overpayments. It noted that although recoupment may be permissible under limited circumstances (citing Tuchrello v. Tuchrello, 233 A.D.2d 917), no such circumstances were presented here.

On Motion to Dismiss at Close of Petitioner's Proof, Court must Accept Petitioner's Evidence as True, Afford Petitioner Every Favorable Inference and Resolve All Credibility Questions in Petitioner's Favor

In Matter of David WW v Laureen QQ, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2002451 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) a custody modification proceeding, the Appellate Division held that when deciding a motion to dismiss at the close of a petitioner's proof, the court must accept the petitioner's evidence as true and afford the petitioner every favorable inference that could reasonably be drawn from that evidence, including resolving all credibility questions in the petitioner's favor. At the close of petitioner's case the court acknowledged that it was resolving credibility questions in a manner that would require it to disregard large portions of testimony offered on petitioner's case. Thus, the court did not adhere to the proper standard when considering the motion. It found that Family Court should have denied respondent's motion to dismiss the petition because petitioner presented sufficient prima facie evidence of a change in circumstances and a need to modify custody to ensure the child's best interests. It remitted for further proceedings on the custody and visitation petitions before a different judge.

Life Insurance Increased to Cover Total Child Support. Court May Consider Current Income for Tax Year Not Yet Completed

In Moran v Grillo, 843 N.Y.S.2d 674 (2d Dept.,2007) after a hearing, family court directed the father to pay child support of $1,321 per month, and directed the father to maintain a life insurance policy of $100,000, with the child named as beneficiary and the mother as trustee. The Appellate Division noted that in determining the amount of child support that a parent must pay under the Child Support Standards Act the court is required to begin the calculation with the parent's "gross (total) income as should have been or should be reported in the most recent federal income tax return" .The court is also permitted to consider current income figures for the tax year not yet completed (citing Matter of Taraskas v. Rizzuto, 38 A.D.3d 910, 835 N.Y.S.2d 212; Matter of Culhane v. Holt, 28 A.D.3d 251, 252, 813 N.Y.S.2d 400; Matter of Kellogg v. Kellogg, 300 A.D.2d 996, 752 N.Y.S.2d 462). Here, the father's 2005 income tax return reflected a gross income of $77,475. Although the income reported on the father's 2004 tax return, $163,605, was significantly higher, the Support Magistrate concluded, based upon testimony that she found to be credible, that the father's 2004 income was unusually high. Considering, in addition, the evidence that the father had claimed a portion of his personal expenses as business expenses, the Support Magistrate acted properly within her discretion in determining the father's income for child support purposes to be $100,000. The Support Magistrate did not improvidently exercise her discretion in imputing income of $20,000 to the mother, based on her previous employment as a nurse, a real estate agent, and an office employee. In determining a parent's child support obligation, the Family Court is not required to rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances, and may impute income based on that party's past income or demonstrated earning potential. The father was directed to maintain a policy of insurance on his life in the amount of $100,000. The Appellate Division held that this sum was insufficient. The plain language of Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(8)(a) expressly provides that life insurance may be used as a means to secure maintenance and child support payments, so that dependent spouses and children will be adequately protected. In light of the balance of the father's future child support obligations, the Family Court should have required that the father maintain a life insurance policy in the amount of the total support due until the child reaches the age of majority or a declining term policy that would permit the father to reduce the amount of coverage by the amount of child support actually paid. Considering that the amount of child support that the father had to pay was $1,321 per month and the fact that his obligation to do so will continue for more than a decade, the amount of the life insurance policy should have been fixed at $150,000, and not $100,000.

November 15, 2007

The 2007 New York Law Reports Style Manual, Official Edition is now available online at <http://www.nycourts.gov/reporter>. The Style Manuel is the only official and correct citation authority for New York attorneys and judges
- A new rule (2.1 [a] [1]) requires that published New York decisions be cited by the case names specified in the newly published Official Case Name and Citation Locator (<http://iapps.courts.state.ny.us/lawReporting/SearchCitation>) and in the "Cite Title As" fields of the on-line Reports.

- The use of supra to indicate that an authority has been cited previously is no longer permitted with shortened citations (1.3 [b] [2]) and is no longer required for any subsequent reference (1.3 [c]).
 - The placement of a comma between a citation signal and the citation is no longer permitted (1.4 [a]).
 - The requirement to supply print page references where the electronic source cited does not provide them has been eliminated (1.5 [e]; 7.1 [a]).
 - Formats for citing tabular or abstracted cases (table in print, full text on line) have been added (2.2 [b] [2]; 2.4 [a] [2]).
 - The restrictions on citing Internet materials have been eased to permit Internet citations where the cited material is not readily available in another form (2.4 [a] [3]; 7.1 [c] [1]).
 - A format for citing weblogs has been provided (7.1 [c] [4]).
 - A new rule clarifies that the word "the" is not capitalized as part of the name of an entity (e.g., the New York Times) (10.4 [c]).
- Other rules adopted in 2004 permit the use of the citational footnote style. (1.2 [e]); make mandatory the use of year of decision in full case citations (1.1 [a]); and require that an elision is to be indicated by three ellipsis points (. . .), not by asterisks (11.1 [c]). (Note: The citation style used in the "Bluebook" is not correct in New York and conflicts with the Style Manual.)

Appeal from Judgment Directing Equitable Distribution Upon Default in Appearing at Trial Dismissed under CPLR 5511

In Gerteis v Gerteis, 843 N.Y.S.2d 425 (2d Dept, 2007) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff a divorce on the ground of abandonment and, upon her default in appearing at the trial, directed the equitable distribution of the marital property. The Appeal from so much of the judgment as directed the equitable distribution of the marital property was dismissed and the judgment was affirmed "insofar as reviewed". The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that "Abandonment is almost always a question of fact" and plaintiff made out a prima facie case of abandonment by demonstrating that the defendant failed to fulfill the " 'basic obligations springing from the marriage contract' " for one or more years and that her conduct was neither justified nor consented to by the plaintiff. Moreover, the defendant neither pleaded nor proved justification (see Maryon v. Maryon, 60 A.D.2d 623, 400 N.Y.S.2d 160). Thus, there was no reason to disturb the Supreme Court's conclusion that she abandoned the marital residence for more than a year and did not intend to return. The Court also held that since the portion of the judgment directing the equitable distribution of the marital property was entered upon the defendant's default in appearing at the trial on that issue, the appeal from that portion of the judgment must be dismissed (citing CPLR 5511; Atwater v. Mace, 39 A.D.3d 573, 573-574, 835 N.Y.S.2d 600).

Not Abuse of Discretion to Refuse to Enforce Mediation Confidentiality Agreement

In Hauzinger v Hauzinger, 842 N.Y.S.2d 646 (4th Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the motion of a nonparty witness in this divorce action to quash the subpoena issued by defendant for his appearance at a deposition in this action and for his records in connection with the mediation process that he conducted with the parties prior to the commencement of the action. The Appellate Division noted that the parties were not represented by counsel when they participated in the mediation process that concluded with the execution of a separation agreement. Even assuming, arguendo, that the subpoena and accompanying notice did not advise appellant of the "circumstances or reasons such disclosure [was] sought or required" (CPLR 3101[a][4]) defendant's response to appellant's motion provided the requisite information. Thus, Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in denying that part of appellant's motion seeking to quash the subpoena inasmuch as defendant sought to establish the circumstances surrounding the execution of the separation agreement, and the court must determine in this action whether the terms of the separation agreement "were fair and reasonable at the time of the making of the agreement" the Court rejected appellant's contention that the court abused its discretion in refusing to enforce the confidentiality agreement entered into by the parties as part of the mediation process and in refusing to quash the subpoena as a matter of public policy. Although appellant urged the Court to apply the confidentiality provisions in the Uniform Mediation Act as a matter of public policy. As New York has not adopted that Act and it declined to do so.

Proper To Preclude Expert Witness Where Proposed Testimony Irrelevant and Not Based on Facts in Evidence.

In Jill S. v Steven S, 842 N.Y.S.2d 401 (1st Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division affirmed an order granting respondent's motion to dismiss the child support petition for lack of personal jurisdiction under the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA). It noted that under UIFSA, Family Court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident respondent if the child resides in New York as a result of the acts or directives of the individual (Family Ct. Act 580-201[5]). The determination that petitioner failed to establish by a preponderance of credible evidence a pattern of abuse or harassment by respondent resulting in the child's relocation to New York, so as to exercise personal jurisdiction under the statute, was supported by the record, and there was no basis to disturb the Support Magistrate's credibility assessments. The Appellate Division also held that the Magistrate appropriately exercised his discretion in precluding petitioner's expert witness, inasmuch as the proposed testimony was irrelevant and not based on facts in evidence. Although the expert proposed to testify regarding the circumstances under which the child had left respondent's home in Ohio, she admitted that she had not re-evaluated the child since the parties' divorce proceeding three years earlier. Her proposed testimony was irrelevant to the issue of whether respondent's conduct sufficiently warranted the exercise of personal jurisdiction over him in the proceeding. The issue of whether respondent's conduct caused the child to flee Ohio was a question of fact, to which the child herself testified, and did not require an expert opinion. The expert's opinion regarding the child's physical and mental condition post-2002 was hearsay, based on documents that were not admitted into evidence at the hearing, and was thus inadmissible.

Family Court Lacks Power to Modify Separation Agreement and Power to Do So Can Not Be Conferred upon it by Agreement

In Smith v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2872438 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties separation agreement provided, among other things, that respondent would provide petitioner $100 per week in spousal maintenance and $250 per week in child support. In January 2006, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking an upward modification of maintenance and child support. Respondent counterclaimed, seeking a reduction of his obligations under the agreement and an order requiring petitioner to apply for certain Medicare health coverage benefits. A fact-finding hearing was held and Family Court dismissed petitioner's application for lack of jurisdiction and denied respondent's request for a downward modification. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that on its face, the parties' agreement was an attempt to permit petitioner to seek additional maintenance by filing in a court of appropriate jurisdiction for a modification of the present provisions concerning the payment of maintenance. Consistent with the agreement the petition expressly stated that it was an application to the Family Court for an upward modification of spousal support, premised on the loss of certain Social Security benefits. The Appellate Division held that it is well settled, however, that "Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction which lacks the power to modify the terms of a separation agreement, as opposed to the terms of a divorce decree, and that this power cannot be conferred upon that court by agreement of the parties" (citing Kleila v. Kleila, 50 N.Y.2d 277, 282 [1980]). Moreover, there was no claim that any of the exceptions to this rule, i.e., that petitioner was likely to become a public charge, that the agreement was facially invalid or that respondent breached the agreement, were present here. The provision of the parties' agreement directing that Family Court treat any applications by petitioner as "de novo" was not sufficient to alter the substance of the agreement, which was an improper attempt to confer subject matter jurisdiction upon Family Court. To the extent that Matter of Spilman-Toll v. Toll (209 A.D.2d 1015, 1016 [4th Dept 1994]) held that Family Court is a court of "competent jurisdiction" to modify a support agreement merely because the parties to the agreement have deemed it so, the court declined to follow it on the ground that it was inconsistent with the public policy as articulated by the Court of Appeals in Kleila v. Kleila (50 N.Y.2d at 282). (Justice Peters and Justice Rose dissented in an opinion by Justice Peters)

November 1, 2007

Although New York Personal Service Not Effected, Time Extended After Traverse to Serve Defendant in Japan

In Yamamoto v Yamamoto, 43 A.D.3d 372, 842 N.Y.S.2d 10 (2d Dept., 2007) the Appellate Division affirmed orders which denied plaintiff's request that service of the summons and complaint on defendant be permitted by personal delivery to his attorneys, granted plaintiff's motion for an extension of time to serve the summons and complaint, permitted plaintiff to apply for reimbursement of attorney fees and costs to defray the expense of effectuating service on defendant in Japan, subject to reallocation at trial from the escrowed proceeds of the sale of the marital home, and granted defendant's motion to confirm the Referee's report to the extent that the Referee found defendant had not been personally served and granted plaintiff's motion to extend her time to serve defendant. It held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in granting plaintiff an extension of time to serve defendant, in the interest of justice, given plaintiff's demonstration of reasonably diligent attempts to serve within the 120-day period after filing the summons with notice (CPLR 306-b), her reasonably prompt request for the extension, and the absence of prejudice to defendant, who had long had notice of plaintiff's claims. In view of the procedures in place for effectuating service upon defendant in Japan, and the absence of any evidence that service in that manner is "impracticable," the court properly denied plaintiff's request, pursuant to CPLR 308(5), for an order directing that service on defendant be effectuated by personal delivery of process upon his. Given defendant's alleged removal to Japan and his alleged failure to provide any support for his infant daughter, who allegedly lived in Manhattan with her mother, the court providently granted plaintiff leave to apply for funds to defray the additional expense of effectuating personal service upon defendant in Japan pursuant to the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents in Civil or Commercial Matters (20 USTC ¶36,100 [1965]).

First Department Holds Distributive Award and Attorneys Fees Are Reviewable on Direct Appeal From Default Judgment

In Warner v Houghton, 43 A.D.3d 376, 841 N.Y.S.2d 499 (1st Dept., 2007) defendant did not appear at a compliance conference and by Order dated August 24, 2006 the matter was set down for an inquest on the issue of equitable distribution. After the inquest, at which he did not appear, the court granted a divorce, and made awards concerning the request for equitable distribution and counsel fees. The defendant appealed from the judgment. Plaintiff argued that the judgment of divorce was not reviewable on appeal because of defendant's various defaults. The Appellate Division held that while the issue of whether the divorce was properly granted may not be reviewable, the distribution award was a separate issue, and was still subject to scrutiny, even after a default (citing Michaels v. Michaels, 180 A.D.2d 890, 579 N.Y.S.2d 497 [1992]). Defendant argued that the court did not delineate the factors it considered and its reasons for its decision in dividing the marital property. It observed he had not appeared at the inquest, and granted the relief requested by plaintiff with respect to equitable distribution, except that it awarded only 50% of the amount requested "for equitable distribution of lost opportunity." It appeared that defendant's campaign of avoidance, by inter alia discharging attorneys and failing to appear on various occasions, weighed heavily in the court's decision to grant plaintiff, without specific findings, virtually everything she requested. The Appellate Division held that while defendant's conduct bordered on the contemptuous, the equitable distribution award must still be justified on the record, and should be supported by specific findings. The record was barren of any such support. Thus, the equitable distribution awards had to be vacated and the matter remanded for a new hearing. It directed that the vacatur be conditioned upon the continued retention by defendant of New York counsel. Defendant argues that the combined award of attorneys' fees (for New York and Singapore counsel) in the amount of $252,922 was both unwarranted and excessive. Plaintiff responds that the award was justified because of defendant's obstructionist litigation tactics. The Appellate Division held that while it may be that some of the counsel fees were justified because of defendant's tactics, the court's failure to make specific findings prevented proper review. The issue of counsel fees was remanded for a showing of reasonableness, at least with regard to those fees incurred as a result of defendant's dilatory tactics. Except with regard to those fees the award of legal fees was unjustified. Plaintiff's annual earnings were over $150,000 per year, and there was no showing that her financial circumstances were constrained. Although she did not earn as much as defendant, there was no substantial disparity between their individual incomes. In its August 24, 2006 order, the court found defendant in default due to his failure to appear at a compliance conference the previous month, and directed that the financial issues to which plaintiff had sought discovery were resolved for purposes of the action in accordance with her claims. The Appellate Division held that although CPLR 3126 does not specifically require that formal notice be given, the Court had previously found that the same due process protections afforded under CPLR 3124 (motions to compel disclosure) should also be imposed when sanctions are sought (citing Postel v. New York Univ. Hosp., 262 A.D.2d 40, 42, 691 N.Y.S.2d 468 [1999]). However, since defendant was advised of the compliance conference and had not offered a valid reason for failing to appear, which, inter alia, prompted the court's ire, costs should be imposed for whatever attorneys' fees were incurred as a result of appearing at the conference, and preparation of the ensuing order.

Misrepresenting Income for Purpose of Increasing Support Obligation Causes Wife to Forfeit Entitlement to Counsel Fees

In Griggs v Griggs, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2955678 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the defendant 35% of the value of the husband's medical practice, maintenance for eight years in the amount of $8,000 a month for the first three years and $6,000 a month for the five years thereafter, directed that he pay 100% of all unreimbursed and uncovered medical expenses of the two children until such time as they reach the age of 21, and awarded the defendant $159,230.50 in attorney's and experts' fees. The Appellate Division held that in light of the parties' long marriage and the defendant's partial subordination of her career to the care of the children and looking after the marital home, the court properly awarded the defendant maintenance. However, awarding maintenance for a period of eight years was an improvident exercise of discretion. Maintenance is designed to give the spouse economic independence and should continue only as long as is required to render the recipient self-supporting. In addition, while insuring that the recipient spouse' reasonable needs are provided for, it should also provide her with an appropriate incentive to become financially independent. Notwithstanding her testimony to the contrary, based on the record, there was no reason it should take the defendant, a graduate of the Wharton School of Business, with extensive experience in banking and finance, more than five years to find employment and return to a salary of at least $70,000 a year. Under the circumstances, a reduction in the duration of maintenance from eight years to five years would provide the defendant with a greater incentive to utilize her contacts and prepare for and take whatever tests are necessary to increase her employability, while at the same time still provide her with sufficient time to become financially independent. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant 35% of the plaintiff's medical practice. Although in a marriage of long duration, where both parties have made significant contributions to the marriage, a division of marital assets should be made as equal as possible, there is no requirement that the distribution of each item of marital property be made on an equal basis". The award of 35% takes into account the limits of the defendant's involvement with the Practice, while not ignoring the direct and indirect contributions that she did make. The Supreme Court erred in directing that the husband pay 100% of the health care expenses of the children not covered by insurance and mistakenly omitted the word "reasonable" to describe the unreimbursed health care expenses to be paid. Pursuant to the statute, the court was required to prorate these expenses between the parties "in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income" (Domestic Relations Law 240[1- b][c][5]). Accordingly, the court should have directed that the plaintiff pay 78.6%, and that the defendant pay 21.4%, of the children's unreimbursed reasonable health care expenses. The Appellate Division held that the award of attorney's and experts' fees to the defendant was an improvident exercise of discretion. The circumstances here, in which there was no evidence of delaying tactics on the part of the plaintiff did not warrant an award of attorney's or experts' fees to the defendant. While "indigency is not a prerequisite to an award of counsel fees", the defendant would be receiving a substantial equitable distribution award from the plaintiff, in addition to five years of maintenance. Furthermore, in misrepresenting her income for the purpose of increasing the plaintiff's obligation to support her, the defendant forfeited any entitlement she might otherwise have had to this form of equitable relief.

Waiver of Interest in Husband's Estate Not Construed as a Waiver of Right to Equitable Distribution.

In Moldofsky v Moldofsky, 842 N.Y.S.2d 505 (2d Dept.,2007) the defendant wife purportedly waived her interest in the plaintiff husband's estate pursuant to an antenuptial agreement executed by the parties shortly before their marriage in 1987. The Appellate Division held that this agreement could not be construed as a waiver of the defendant's right to equitable distribution in the event of a divorce.

October 15, 2007

Improvident Exercise of Discretion to Deny Wife Lifetime Maintenance on Ground That Certain Properties Were Distributed to Her in Lieu of Maintenance.

In Xikis v Xikis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2728744 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying the defendant lifetime maintenance on the ground that certain properties were distributed to her in lieu of maintenance. The parties lived together for 28 years and were married for over 18 years. The defendant was not employed during most of the marriage, had limited education and skills, and was 60 years old at the time of the judgment. It held that an award of $1,500 as monthly nondurational maintenance was appropriate. It also held that Supreme Court erred in determining that the $200,000 in funds transferred by the plaintiff from an Atlantic Bank account to a Greek bank account on the date of commencement of the action was deposited into a joint bank account of the parties. In fact, the funds were deposited into a charitable account and were not distributed. The transfer constituted a dissipation of marital assets in contemplation of divorce. As such, the defendant was entitled to an additional award of $100,000 as contemplated by the parties' stipulation.

Nondurational Maintenance Inappropriate Where Durational Maintenance Requested in Supreme Court

In Sirgant v Sirgant,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2728804 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the wife nondurational maintenance of $825 per month and directed child support to the wife of $1,344.17 per month. The Appellate Division held that the overriding purpose of a maintenance award is to give the spouse economic independence, and it should be awarded for a duration that would provide the recipient with enough time to become self-supporting. Under the circumstances, the trial court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the wife maintenance, but the court erred in awarding her nondurational maintenance of $825 per month. It noted that the wife requested a maintenance award of $15,000 per year for a period of five years. It found that based on the evidence, an award of $1,250 per month for a period of five years was appropriate in light of the wife's ability to become self-supporting. It also held that Supreme Court erred in its computation of the child support award by failing to deduct the amount of the maintenance award from the husband's income and by utilizing an incorrect adjusted gross income for the husband. Thus, the basic child support award should have been computed to be $1,171.18 per month.

Proper to Award Marital Residence to Wife Where it Was Transferred to Joint Names to Secure a Marital Loan

In Fitzpatrick v Fitzpatrick, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2728804 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff wife spousal maintenance of $3,000 per month until she reached the age of 65, awarded ownership of the marital residence solely to the plaintiff and child support of $1,500 per month as of June 1, 2004, awarded the defendant certain stock options and shares of stock issued by his employer, and directed the defendant to pay the wife an attorney's fee in the sum of $21,000. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in making the award of maintenance. It also properly awarded ownership of the marital residence, which had belonged to the plaintiff's parents who transferred it to the plaintiff, solely to the plaintiff. The transfer of title to the parties jointly, shortly before the commencement of the action, was effected to secure a marital loan and did not reflect any intent on the plaintiff's part to make the defendant a co-owner of the premises. The Supreme Court's award to the plaintiff of an attorney's fee was a proper exercise of the court's discretion, based in part on the disparity in the parties' incomes.

Supreme Court has Authority to Amend QDRO To Correct Ministerial Error

In Page v Page, 39 A.D.3d 1204, 834 N.Y.S.2d 764, (4th Dept., 2007) the parties were divorced in 1999, and plaintiff moved, inter alia, to modify a qualified domestic relations order (QDRO) entered in 2001. Plaintiff objected to the provisions in the QDRO granting survivor benefits to defendant because the stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged in the judgment of divorce except with respect to maintenance, did not provide for those benefits. Plaintiff also objected to the provision in the QDRO that calculated his retirement benefits by using 198 months as the numerator of the fraction rather than the correct figure of 183 months. In responding to the motion, defendant admitted that the QDRO listed an incorrect number of months in calculating the retirement benefits, but she asserted that she was entitled to the survivor benefits. Supreme Court denied that part of plaintiff's motion seeking to amend the QDRO on the ground that plaintiff either consented to the QDRO or did not raise any objection at the time it was signed by the court and therefore was precluded from raising his present objections. The Appellate Division held that that the court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying that part of the motion to amend the QDRO to reflect the proper number of months in calculating plaintiff's retirement benefits. A court has the discretion to cure a mistake or defect in a judgment or an order that does not affect a substantial right of a party. A court also has the inherent power upon an application for sufficient reason, in the furtherance of justice, "to relieve from judgments taken through 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect' " (Ladd v. Stevenson, 112 N.Y. 325, 332, 19 N.E. 842). This was merely a ministerial error and the court had the authority to amend the QDRO. The court, in the furtherance of justice, should have addressed the merits of plaintiff's contention that the QDRO improperly provided for survivor benefits and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine that issue following a hearing, if necessary.

Marital Assets Must Be Valued Between Date of Commencement and Date of Trial

In Malloy v Malloy 39 A.D.3d 602, 835 N.Y.S.2d 262, (2d Dept., 2007) the Appellate Division rejected the husband's contention that the Supreme Court should have valued the other marital assets as of the date of the parties' separation in 1994, since neither party thereafter contributed to the appreciation of the other's assets. Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236[B][4][b], the Supreme Court was required to select a valuation date "from anytime from the date of commencement of the action to the date of trial." It held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in selecting the date of the commencement of the action as the valuation date for the parties' pensions and the husband's savings and thrift plan. It also held that it was improper for the Supreme Court to have valued the marital residence as of the date of the parties' separation. It found that under the circumstances of this case, the husband should have been awarded a 25% share of the net proceeds from the sale of the home, which was consummated shortly before commencement of the trial. The Supreme Court also improperly valued the wife's pension by reducing it by the amount of a loan she took out against the pension, as there was no evidence that the loan was used for marital purposes.

Husband's Support Obligation Properly Based upon Imputed Income Including Overtime.

In Romano v. Romano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1439552 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly, in effect, denied defendant's post trial motion to dismiss the action upon the ground that the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction because the plaintiff failed to adduce any proof at trial as to grounds for the divorce. At a pretrial conference on the matter, the defendant consented to constructive abandonment as the ground for divorce. Therefore, when the Supreme Court, in effect, granted the plaintiff's motion to re-open the trial to allow her to aver by affidavit that she had been constructively abandoned as a ground for divorce, it merely corrected a technical error and did not prejudice the defendant. "The court may determine the sequence in which the issues shall be tried and otherwise regulate the conduct of the trial in order to achieve a speedy and unprejudiced disposition of the matters at issue in a setting of proper decorum" . The husband's contention that the court failed to apportion the unsecured debt to various family members as well as an Advanta credit card debt was without merit because the husband discharged each of these obligations in his personal bankruptcy action. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in calculating the husband's support obligation based upon imputed income including overtime.

October 1, 2007

Cost of Living (Cola) Child Support Provision Interpreted as "Opting Out" of CSSA Guidelines Requiring Parties' Reasons for Deviating

In Fasano v Fasano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2729684 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties separation agreement dated October 21, 1993, provided, inter alia, that until October 31, 1996, the plaintiff would pay the defendant maintenance of $5,416.66 per month and child support of $833.33 per month. After October 31, 1996, the plaintiff's maintenance obligation would end and his monthly child support obligation would increase to $3,333.33. The child support provisions of the separation agreement also obligated the plaintiff to pay increased child support in the event of increases in the cost of living, as reflected in the Consumer Price Index for the New York Metropolitan area. The separation agreement was incorporated, but not merged, into the judgment of divorce dated February 17, 1994. The Appellate Division held that the child support provision which set the plaintiff's child support obligation at the sum of $3,333.33 per month was not invalid on the ground that it failed to calculate the presumptively correct amount of child support pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act. A provision stating the correct amount of the basic child support obligation under the CSSA is not required unless it is apparent that the parties have "opted out" of the basic child support obligation pursuant to the CSSA. Here, the child support obligation in the sum of $3,333.33 per month did not differ significantly from the correct amount as calculated by a strict application of the statute, and thus, such provision in the separation agreement cannot reasonably be interpreted as indicating that the parties intended to "opt out" of the basic child support obligation pursuant to the CSSA.

However, the plaintiff correctly contended that the provision contained in paragraph 5, Article F, of the separation agreement, allowing for adjustments to his monthly child support obligation based on cost of living increases (hereinafter the COLA provision), failed to comply with Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h). The annual increases in the child support obligation permitted under the COLA provision represented potential deviations from the basic child support obligation and, therefore, can be interpreted as providing for an "opting out" of the CSSA guidelines.

Since the separation agreement failed to state the parties' reasons for deviating from the CSSA guidelines with respect to the potential COLA increases, the COLA provision violated Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h) and should have been set aside.

Error to Award Child Support Amount Which Includes a Shelter Allowance and to Direct

Husband to Reimburse Wife for Portion of Carrying Charges for Marital Residence.

In Curatola v Curatola, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2729779 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, awarded the wife a divorce, directed the husband to pay child support of $2,107 per month and child support arrears, distributed 60% of the equity in the marital residence to the wife and 40% of the equity to the husband, and directed the husband to pay $39,732 to the wife's counsel. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improperly calculated the husband's monthly income when it based its calculations, in part, on the rental income the husband received from subletting his studio space, without deducting from that rental income the amount the husband paid to his landlord in base rent for the studio space. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a new determination as to the husband's monthly income, as well as the appropriate child support and concomitant child support arrears based on such income. It also held that Supreme Court erred in directing the husband to pay child support of $2,107 per month, which sum included the provision of a shelter allowance, while also directing him to reimburse his wife for 40% of the carrying charges for the marital residence. Such an award resulted in the payment a double shelter allowance. In order to arrive at a just and appropriate award, the Supreme Court should have subtracted the fixed carrying charges attributable to the marital residence, i.e., the mortgage payments and real estate taxes, from the parties' gross income before applying the statutory percentages. However, Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion by deducting $39,732 for the wife's counsel fees from the husband's distributive award of 40% of the equity in the marital residence because the husband's obstructionist tactics unnecessarily prolonged the litigation.

Sweat Equity Does Not Entitle Husband to Greater Share of Home Where Wife Contributed as Mother and Worked Outside Home

In Homkey-Hawkins v Hawkins, 839 N.Y.S.2d 849, 2007 N.Y. Slip Op. 06004 (3d Dept., 2007) Supreme Court valued two contiguous parcels of property titled in both of the parties names as of the date of trial and distributed them equally. The properties consisted of an 8.5-acre parcel on which the marital residence was constructed and over 16 acres on an adjoining vacant lot. Supreme Court valued the subject parcels by adopting appraisals prepared closer in time to the October 2005 trial, determined that each parcel was marital property with the equity to be divided equally (subject to a $17,000 credit for defendant's use of separate property to purchase one of the lots) and awarded plaintiff approximately $15,590 in counsel fees. The Appellate Division affirmed. Plaintiff had two sets of appraisals prepared. The Appellate Division found that the increase in the value of the two properties between April 2004 and May 2005 was due solely to market forces. Under these circumstances, Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in finding the later date to be the appropriate valuation date. It also found that defendant failed to meet his burden of demonstrating that he was entitled to a separate property credit for funds expended to construct the marital residence. After the parties married, defendant placed plaintiff's name on his checking account and the two thereafter maintained one such joint account of which plaintiff was the primary custodian, writing most of the checks and ensuring that it was balanced. The parties pooled all of their money and earnings into this joint account, including defendant's separate savings, to pay all expenses, including those associated with the construction of their new home. The Court pointed out that the transfer of separate property into a joint account raises a presumption that the funds are marital property. Defendant failed to overcome this presumption by demonstrating by clear and convincing proof that the joint account was established for convenience only. His testimony made clear that he considered his marriage to be a lifelong commitment and he never even considered separating his premarital funds. Thus, Supreme Court properly determined that all funds so commingled were marital funds and that defendant was not entitled to a separate property credit for same. The Appellate Division was not persuaded that defendant was entitled to a greater share of the equity in the property on which the marital residence was situated owing to his sweat equity in constructing it. The defendant, who earned a living as a construction manager, spent most of his free time during one particular year working on the residence and/or managing the work that he subcontracted on it. Plaintiff, who also worked outside the home, was therefore left with all child-rearing responsibilities for their young son and all daily and weekly household chores necessary to maintain their existing home. Under these circumstances, there was no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court's decision to equally divide the equity in this property.

Must Show Good Faith Effort to Obtain Employment or Impaired Earning Capacity For Downward Modification

In Fowler v Rivera, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1559973 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly denied the father's petition for a downward modification of his child support obligation. A parent seeking downward modification of a child support obligation has the burden of establishing a change in circumstance. In order to meet that burden, a party seeking a downward modification based on a loss of employment must submit evidence showing a good-faith effort to obtain employment commensurate with that party's earning capacity or, alternatively, must establish that his or her previously established earning capacity has been impaired. The conclusory allegations of the father, a self-employed owner of a heretofore lucrative closely-held corporation, were not sufficient to establish that he diligently searched for comparable means of earning an income.

September 17, 2007

Service of Trial Subpoena on Attorney Permitted as of January 1, 2008

CPLR 2303-a has been enacted to reduce the need for service of trial subpoenas on a party or person within the party's control. It provides that where the attendance at trial of a party or person within the party's control can be compelled by a trial subpoena, that subpoena may be served by delivery in accordance with CPLR 2103 (b) to the party's attorney of record. CPLR 2303 allows for service of a subpoena in the same manner as all other papers which are served by one attorney on another pursuant to CPLR. 2103. This provision only modifies the method of service of the subpoena. It does not change the requirement for a fee to be provided with the subpoena. Laws of 2007, Chapter 192, Effective January 1, 2008.

Fine for Violating Subpoena Increases to $150 as of January 1, 2008

CPLR 2308(a) was amended to increase the maximum penalty for disobeying a judicial subpoena from $50 to $150. Laws of 2007, Chapter 205, Approved July 3, 2007 and effective January 1, 2008.

Proper to Grant Extension of Time to Serve Summons After Traverse Hearing Finds Service Not Effectuated

In Yamamoto v Yamamoto, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2445200 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Supreme Court denied plaintiff's request that service of the summons and complaint on defendant be permitted by personal delivery to his attorneys but granted her motion for an extension of time to serve the summons and complaint and permitted her to apply for reimbursement of attorney fees and costs to defray the expense of effectuating service on defendant in Japan, subject to reallocation at trial, from the escrowed proceeds of the sale of the marital home. Thereafter, Supreme Court granted defendant's motion to confirm the Referee's report to the extent that the Referee found defendant had not been personally served and granted plaintiff's motion to extend her time to serve defendant, in accordance with the prior order. The Appellate Division affirmed the orders. It held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in granting plaintiff an extension of time to serve defendant, pursuant to the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents in Civil or Commercial Matters (20 UST 361 [1965]). Although it found that defendant had not been properly served, given plaintiff's demonstration of reasonably diligent attempts to serve the defendant within the 120-day period after filing the summons with notice (CPLR 306-b), her reasonably prompt request for the extension, and the absence of prejudice to defendant, who had long had notice of plaintiff's claims the extension was warranted in the interest of justice. In view of the procedures in place for effectuating service upon defendant in Japan, and the absence of any evidence that service in that manner was "impracticable," the court properly denied plaintiff's request, pursuant to CPLR 308(5), for an order directing that service on defendant be effectuated by personal delivery of process upon his attorneys. Given defendant's alleged removal to Japan and his alleged failure to provide any support for his infant daughter, who allegedly lived in Manhattan with her mother, the court providently granted plaintiff leave to apply for funds to defray the additional expense of effectuating personal service upon defendant in Japan pursuant to the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad. Defendant, who appeared and testified at the traverse hearing and, according to plaintiff, allegedly maintains an apartment in Manhattan, may, as suggested by the IAS court, avoid any more delay and expense in having this marital and child-support dispute resolved by authorizing his New York attorney to accept service of process on his behalf.

Unauthorized Ex Parte Conversations May Be Basis to Disqualify Court Appointed Evaluator.

In Reback v Reback, 41 A.D.3d 814, 839 N.Y.S.2d 516 (2d Dept.,2007) Supreme Court appointed a neutral financial evaluator to consider the value of the parties' assets (i.e., the plaintiff's real estate license and the defendant's businesses). Pursuant to that order, prior to the completion of the evaluator's report, ex parte communications were prohibited except that a party could advise the evaluator in writing about assets he or she thought the other spouse owned. The evaluator was directed to communicate with the parties in writing with copies to counsel for both sides or by conference call. The Appellate Division found that ex parte conversations between the court appointed evaluator and the plaintiff and her counsel were not authorized by the order appointing the evaluator and therefore were improper. It held that the question of whether the impropriety was sufficient to disqualify the evaluator depends on the nature of the conversations. If, as the plaintiff contended, the conversations related solely to ministerial matters, the impropriety would not be sufficient to justify disqualification of the evaluator. It was inappropriate to place the burden of proof as to the nature of those conversations on the defendant. There should have been a hearing to determine whether the nature of those conversations would justify disqualification of the evaluator.

Hearing Should Be Held Where Agreement Appears to Be So One-sided and Unfair That No Rational Person Exercising Common Sense Would Make it

In O'Malley v O'Malley, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1631130 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) after nearly 23 years of marriage, the husband and the wife entered into a postnuptial agreement pursuant to which the husband, inter alia, surrendered his interest in the marital residence as a tenant by the entirety, any rights to equitable distribution of his interest in the marital residence as marital property in the event the parties divorced, and any rights to inherit from the wife. In exchange, the wife agreed to pay the husband $50,000 from a retirement account in 2015, when she could withdraw that sum without penalty. The agreement was prepared by the wife's counsel. The husband claimed he had no independent counsel. Within three months of the execution of the agreement, the wife commenced an action for a divorce. The husband counterclaimed for a divorce and, inter alia, to vacate the parties' postnuptial agreement and to rescind the transfer of the deed to the marital residence from the parties as tenants by the entirety to the wife individually on the grounds, of fraud, overreaching, lack of consideration, and unconscionability. In support of his contentions, he asserted that the parties' equity in the marital residence was at least $580,000, and that he was being asked to surrender his interest in the marital residence in consideration for the future receipt of the principal sum of only $50,000. The husband further noted that the agreement did not contain a reciprocal waiver by the wife of her rights to inherit from him. In addition, he contended that the wife promised not to seek a divorce if he signed the agreement, but breached that promise when she commenced this divorce action within three months of the execution of the agreement. The Supreme Court denied the husband's motion without a hearing. The Appellate Division reversed and remanded for a hearing to determine if the agreement was unconscionable. It held that although postnuptial agreements are generally subject to ordinary principles of contract law, the parties, as husband and wife, have a fiduciary relationship to each other. "To warrant equity's intervention, no actual fraud need be shown, for relief will be granted if the settlement is manifestly unfair to a spouse because of the other's overreaching" (Christian v. Christian, 42 NY2d at 72). A motion to set aside an agreement between spouses may be denied without a hearing if the agreement is fair on its face. It could not be said that the agreement was fair on its face. It appeared from the record that the husband had received no benefit from the agreement-other than a promise to receive $50,000 years hence, which in all likelihood he would have been entitled to as part of his equitable share of marital property. It also appeared that he relinquished a primary asset of the marriage, along with his inheritance rights, without a reciprocal waiver of inheritance rights by the wife.

September 3, 2007

Effective September 1, 2007 Counter-Order or Judgment Must be Submitted with Marked-up Copy

22 NYCRR 202.48 (c)(2) of the Uniform Rules For Trial Courts, which deals with the submission of proposed orders and counter-orders, has been amended effective September 1, 2007. It now requires that " Any proposed counter-order or judgment shall be submitted with a copy clearly marked to delineate each proposed change to the order or judgment to which objection is made."

Maintenance and Child Support Reduced Where Husband's Income Dropped Substantially

In Kahn v Oshin-Kahn, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2199037 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the parties' 2001 judgment of divorce, entered in 2001, awarded defendant wife annual maintenance of $96,000 (for five years ending July 31, 2006) and annual child support of $48,800. These awards were based on, among other things, a finding that, at the time of the judgment, plaintiff husband, under his employment agreement in effect at the time, had a guaranteed annual draw of $408,600 against his commissions as a sales agent for a financial printing firm. The $408,600 figure did not include the value of the perquisites of plaintiff's position imputable to him as income. The judgment also required plaintiff to pay 80% of certain add-on child support expenses, including the costs of private school, summer camp, and child care (the last item being required to enable defendant to reenter the workforce). Plaintiff had cross moved for a downward modification of his maintenance and child support obligations, based on an alleged substantial change in circumstances warranting such relief pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(9)(b). Plaintiff claimed that his income had declined substantially since entry of the judgment of divorce due to a general downturn in the financial printing industry since the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. After a hearing, the motion court found, inter alia, that plaintiff's annual income had fallen to $200,000 and that he owed his employer $600,000 for draws received in excess of commissions earned. Based on these findings, the court reduced plaintiff's annual maintenance obligation to $30,000 and his annual child support obligation to $25,000, in each case with effect retroactive to November 21, 2002, and reduced plaintiff's share of add-on child support expenses to 50%. Defendant appealed. The Appellate Division agreed with the motion court that plaintiff had carried his burden of proving that some reduction of his maintenance and child support obligations was in order (citing O'Brien v. McCann, 249 A.D.2d 92 [1998]), but did not believe that the existing record supported the amounts of the reductions the court granted. It modified to vacate the finding as to plaintiff's income and the downward modifications of his obligations based thereon, and remanded for further proceedings to more accurately determine plaintiff's income during the relevant period and to recompute the appropriate reductions of his obligations.

Unauthorized Ex Parte Conversations May Be Basis to Disqualify Court Appointed Evaluator.

In Reback v Reback, 41 A.D.3d 814, 839 N.Y.S.2d 516 (2d Dept.,2007) by order dated July 16, 2004, Supreme Court appointed a neutral financial evaluator to consider the value of the parties' assets (i.e., the plaintiff's real estate license and the defendant's businesses). Pursuant to that order, prior to the completion of the evaluator's report, ex parte communications were prohibited except that a party could advise the evaluator in writing about assets he or she thought the other spouse owned. The evaluator was directed to communicate with the parties in writing with copies to counsel for both sides or by conference call. The evaluator was authorized to prepare a draft report and serve it on counsel for both sides. In a letter dated October 27, 2005, to the attorneys for both parties, the evaluator noted that preparation of the report with respect to the defendant husband's mortgage activities and his business Nuvillas Realty was completed and the material "may result in judicial referrals to governmental, regulatory, and/or professional bodies for their consideration." The evaluator offered to send the parties a copy of a "draft for settlement purposes only" and to work with the parties toward a settlement. He stated that if he did not hear from the parties by November 1, 2005, he would contact the court to ask for advice on how to proceed "while [our] fees are outstanding." The defendant moved to disqualify the evaluator, claiming the letter was extortion to insure that the evaluator's fee was paid. The defendant also accused the evaluator of engaging in ex parte telephone conversations with the plaintiff, noting that telephone conversations from the plaintiff and her counsel were listed on the evaluator's bill. Counsel for the plaintiff claimed that it was common practice for financial evaluators to engage in settlement negotiations. She further stated that the ex parte telephone conversations between herself and the evaluator, and her client and the evaluator, related to the payment of the evaluator's fees and scheduling the evaluator's testimony at the trial. The evaluator submitted an affidavit stating that the ex parte telephone communications were ministerial, concerning scheduling and fee invoices. No affidavit was submitted by the plaintiff herself. Supreme Court denied the motion, to disqualify the evaluator, noting that the appointment order authorized submission of a draft report to the parties before the submission of a final report to the court. With respect to the ex parte communications, the court found that the defendant husband "has offered no proof that the conversations involved any subjects other than the ministerial matters" identified by the plaintiff's counsel and the evaluator. The Appellate Division held that the letter dated October 27, 2005, did not violate the terms of the order appointing the evaluator, which specifically permitted submission of a draft report to the parties before submission of a final report to the court. The order appointing the evaluator also authorized withholding "delivery of the final report until such time as any outstanding" fees were paid. Therefore, the letter dated October 27, 2005, was not a basis to disqualify the evaluator. However, the ex parte conversations between the evaluator and the plaintiff and her counsel were not authorized by the order appointing the evaluator and therefore were improper. The question of whether the impropriety was sufficient to disqualify the evaluator depends on the nature of the conversations. If, as the plaintiff contends, the conversations related solely to ministerial matters, the impropriety would not be sufficient to justify disqualification of the evaluator. However, the nature of those conversations was exclusively within the knowledge of the evaluator, the plaintiff, and her counsel. Thus, it was inappropriate to place the burden of proof as to the nature of those conversations on the defendant. There should have been a hearing to determine whether the nature of those conversations would justify disqualification of the evaluator.

Oral Stipulation Not Reduced to Writing Not Valid In Fourth Department

In Tomei v Tomei, 39 A.D.3d 1149, 834 N.Y.S.2d 781 (4th Dept, 2007) the parties placed an oral stipulation of settlement on the record in 1996 that provided for the distribution of the marital property, including defendant's pension benefits. Neither party executed the stipulation. Two years later, Supreme Court issued a judgment of divorce and a qualified domestic relations order (QDRO), dividing defendant's pension benefits pursuant to the formula set forth in Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 474 N.Y.S.2d 699, 463 N.E.2d 15. The record did not indicate that the QDRO was served on defendant or that it was filed at that time. When the QDRO was filed with the pension plan administrator in 2002, it was rejected as nonqualifying. The court granted plaintiff's motion to correct and resettle the judgment of divorce and, granted plaintiff's motion to amend the QDRO and denied defendant's cross motion to vacate the QDRO. The court issued an amended QDRO that made an upward adjustment of plaintiff's monthly payments for a period of 64 months as the result of pension benefit overpayments to defendant. The Appellate Division held that Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(3) provides that "[a]n agreement by the parties, made before or during the marriage, shall be valid and enforceable in a matrimonial action if such agreement is in writing, subscribed by the parties, and acknowledged or proven in the manner required to entitle a deed to be recorded." Because the unacknowledged oral stipulation of the parties failed to meet the statutory requirements, it was ineffective with respect to the pension benefits, and the court thus was required to distribute them (citing 236[B][5][a]). Because that did not occur, it reversed the order and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for distribution of defendant's pension benefits. (Citing Hanford v. Hanford, 91 A.D.2d 829, 830, 458 N.Y.S.2d 418; Giambattista v. Giambattista, 89 A.D.2d 1057, 1058, 454 N.Y.S.2d 762).

August 16, 2007

Domestic Relations Law 250 Enacted Effective July 3, 2007

In Scheuer v. Scheuer, 308 NY 447 (1955) the Court of Appeals held that that the statute of limitations is not tolled merely because the parties were husband and wife. That rule was consistently applied in actions to set aside Prenuptial agreements where the six year statute of limitations, in CPLR 213(2), on actions on a contract obligation or liability express or implied applied. In Bloomfield v. Bloomfield, 97 N.Y.2d 188, 192-193, 738 N.Y.S.2d 650, 764 N.E.2d 950 [2001] the Court of Appeals held that CPLR 213 (2) did not apply in an action for a divorce where the defendant raised the parties 30 year old Prenuptial agreement as a defense to equitable distribution because the "... particular argument arises from, and directly relates to, plaintiff's claim that the agreement precludes equitable distribution of his assets". It held that claims and defenses that arise out of the same transaction as a claim asserted in the complaint are not barred by the Statute of Limitations, even though an independent action by defendant might have been time-barred at the time the action was commenced (citing CPLR 203 [d])). Since actions to set aside a Prenuptial or post-nuptial agreement are still barred by the 6 year statute of limitations (see DeMille v. DeMille, 774 N.Y.S.2d 156, 158, 5 A.D.3d 428, 429 (2 Dept. 2004) this has affected and can affect many spouses detrimentally. Because most parties would not contest the validity or terms of a prenuptial agreement or agreements made during the marriage while their marriage is intact Domestic Relations Law 250 was enacted to remedy this situation. See NY Legis Memo 125 (2007) Domestic Relations Law 250 is intended to toll the statute of limitations for causes of actions and defenses related to prenuptial and post-nuptial (“opting-out”) agreements until both parties have made appearances in a matrimonial action. It enacts a three year statute of limitations for commencing an action or proceeding or for claiming a defense that arises from an agreement made pursuant to DRL 236 [B][3] entered into prior to a marriage, or during the marriage, but prior to the service of process in a matrimonial action or proceeding. The statute of limitations is tolled until process has been served in a “matrimonial action or proceeding”, or the death of one of the parties. DRL 250 does not apply to a separation agreement or an agreement made during the pendency of a matrimonial action or in settlement of a matrimonial action. The provisions of DRL 250 are not to be construed to create any new causes of action or defenses for the parties to the agreement. In addition they do not apply to prenuptial agreements where the commencement of an action on the agreement was barred under the CPLR in effect immediately prior to July 3, 2007, its effective date. See NY Legis Memo 125 (2007)

Domestic Relations Law 177 Enacted Effective November 1, 2007

Domestic Relations Law 177 becomes effective November 1, 2007. Subdivision 1 provides that provide that prior to accepting any agreement between the parties in an action for a divorce, the judge is required to ensure that the agreement contains a provision relating to the health care coverage of each individual. The agreement must either provide for the future coverage of the individual, or state that the individual is aware that he or she will no longer be covered by his or her spouse's health insurance plan. Every agreement accepted by the court must contain the following statement, signed by each party, to ensure that the provisions of this subdivision are adhered to:

" I, (spouse), fully understand that upon the entrance of this divorce agreement, I may no longer be allowed to receive health coverage under my former spouse's health insurance plan. I may be entitled to purchase health insurance on my own through a COBRA option, if available, otherwise I may be required to secure my own health insurance.

 (Spouse's signature)

 (Date)"

If, prior to accepting an agreement and entering the judgement thereon, the judge determines that the provisions of DRL 177 have not been met, the judge must require the parties to comply with the this section and may grant a thirty day continuance to afford the parties an opportunity to procure their own health insurance coverage.

Subdivision 2 provides that before rendering a decision in an action for divorce, the judge must ensure that he or she notifies both parties that once the judgement is entered, a person may or may not be eligible to be covered under his or her spouse's health insurance plan, depending on the terms of the plan. Laws of 2007, Ch 412.

Absent Evidence of a Different Value Not An Abuse of Discretion to Direct Real Property Be Listed For Sale at Assessed Value

In Stephens v Stephens, 838 N.Y.S.2d 743 (4th Dept., 2007) Plaintiff contended on appeal that Supreme Court abused its discretion in directing that a parcel of property owned by the parties be listed for sale at the assessed value or at another value agreed upon by the parties, and the proceeds divided. The Appellate Division rejected that contention finding that Plaintiff failed to present reliable evidence of a different value for the property and, absent some evidence that the list price set by the court is unreasonable or other credible evidence showing that a different list price is warranted, it should not be disturbed (citing Harmon v. Harmon, 173 A.D.2d 98, 107, 578 N.Y.S.2d 897). It also held that the court did not abuse its discretion in directing that the list price be reduced incrementally until the property is sold.

Where Combined Parental Income Is Well in Excess of $80,000, it Is Proper to Consider and Base the Award upon the Child's Actual Reasonable Needs

In Matter of Michelle M. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1953685 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Support Magistrate calculated each party's share of the combined parental income and addressed the factors under Family Court Act s 413(1)(f) and found evidence in the record relevant to all factors except those listed in subdivisions (4), (8) and (9). The Support Magistrate found that all the combined parental income in excess of $80,000 should be considered in calculating "the just and appropriate child support" and applied the CSSA percentage to all the combined parental income. The Appellate Division concluded that this was error. Under the statute and case law, the $80,000 figure serves as a presumptive cap, and the court has discretion to limit the parents' respective pro rata child support obligations to the first $80,000 in combined parental income. The court also has the authority to calculate and award child support based upon all or part of the combined parental income, even to the extent that it exceeds $80,000. The court's obligation, in that event, is to articulate a basis for applying the CSSA percentage to all or part of the parental income beyond $80,000. In cases such as this, where the combined parental income is well in excess of $80,000, it is proper to consider and base the award upon the child's " 'actual reasonable needs' " (Anonymous v. Anonymous, 222 A.D.2d 305, 306). Although children must generally be permitted to share in a noncustodial parent's enhanced standard of living and a court is not permitted to make an award based solely on their actual needs, we may consider the child's needs in determining an award of child support on income exceeding the $80,000 cap. (Matter of Mitchell v. Mitchell, 264 A.D.2d 535, 540, lv denied 94 N.Y.2d 754). There was no evidence supporting the determination that the father's appropriate share of child support was over $2,000 per month. Therefore, the Appellate Division modified the order, and remitted the matter to Family Court to recalculate the father's child support obligation by applying the CSSA percentage to one half of the combined parental income in excess of $80,000.

Social Security Benefits May Be Considered in Determining If Child Support Is Unjust or Inappropriate.

In Matter of Weymouth v Mullin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2002320 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the Appellate Division pointed out that Social Security benefits received by a child are "designed to supplement existing resources, and are not intended to displace the obligation of the parent to support his or her child" (citing Matter of Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d 605, 611 [1996]). Instead, they constitute financial resources of the child to be considered only after the presumptively correct amount of basic child support has been calculated and only for the purpose of determining if the amount is unjust or inappropriate.

August 1, 2007

To Avoid "Double Counting," Seed Money from Marital Funds to Help One of the Parties Create a New Business Should Not Be Reimbursed During Distribution If the Value of That Business Is Equitably Distributed

In Pulver v Pulver, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1499069 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improperly directed plaintiff to pay defendant 50% of the $40,000 in marital property used to start his business, Lockwood Financial Services. In order to avoid "double counting," seed money voluntarily contributed from marital funds to help one of the parties create a new business should not be reimbursed during distribution if the value of that business is equitably distributed. Thus, as defendant received a 50% share of plaintiff's business in equitable distribution, the court erred in directing plaintiff to repay defendant $20,000, i.e., half of the $40,000 of marital property used to start his business.

Not An Abuse of Discretion To Order Payout of Distributive Award Without Interest.

In Dewitt v Sheiness, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2050788 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division found no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court ordering the equitable distribution award to be paid in three yearly installments without interest. When equitable distribution is appropriate but impractical or burdensome the court may order a distributive award payable in installments. The liquidity of the assets and the ability of the party to pay are proper considerations when fashioning such an award. The only marital property to be distributed was the value of the improvement made to plaintiff's home. Considering plaintiff's lack of liquid assets and limited income, permitting plaintiff to pay defendant over a three-year period without interest was an appropriate exercise of the court's discretion. The Appellate Division held that the denial of maintenance to defendant was not an abuse of discretion. Her request for that relief was not clear since in her "statement of proposed disposition" she indicated that she was not seeking maintenance.

Orders Reversed Without Appeal Where Minutes Can Not Be Reconstructed

In Rivera v Echavarria, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 2050797 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the petitioner appealed from two orders of the Family Court which, after a hearing held on January 18, 2005, dismissed his petitions alleging violation of an order of visitation and seeking modification of an order of support. By decision and order on motion dated October 25, 2005, the Appellate Division granted the petitioner's motion for a reconstruction hearing with respect to the minutes of the hearing held on January 18, 2005, and referred the matter to the Family Court, for a reconstruction hearing. By order dated June 13, 2006, the Family Court, indicated that the hearing of January 18, 2005, could not be reconstructed. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances the petitioner was entitled to reversal of the orders, and a new hearing and determination of the petitions.

Where Change of Circumstance Not Contemplated it Is Not Necessary to Prove Party No Longer Able to Meet Child's Needs, Only That Changes Resulted in Significant Increase of Needs Which Renders Agreement Unfair

In Matter of Sidoti v Sidoti, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1628423 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties 2001 separation agreement which was incorporated but not merged into their September 2001 judgment of divorce provided for joint legal custody with petitioner as primary custodian. The parties agreed to opt out of the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act limiting respondent's monthly child support obligation to $2,433. Respondent, who at the time of the agreement had annual income of $207,000, also agreed to maintain health insurance for the children and pay a pro rata share of any unreimbursed medical expenses, amounting to 100% thereof inasmuch as petitioner was not employed. In November 2002, approximately a year after the divorce was finalized, the parties' youngest daughter was diagnosed with autism, a learning and developmental disability. In September 2003, petitioner filed a petition seeking a modification of respondent's child support obligations inasmuch as the child's needs had unexpectedly increased due to her diagnosis. The Support Magistrate increased respondent's child support obligation to $3,011 in accordance with the CSSA. The Third Department affirmed. It found that the basis for modifying the terms of the separation agreement was that there had been an unanticipated and unreasonable change in circumstances. To that end, "[i]f the situation has changed to a degree that could not have been contemplated by the parties when they entered into the agreement, it is not necessary to prove that the petitioning party is no longer able to meet the child's needs, but only that the changes have, in fact, resulted in a significant increase in those needs which render the terms of the agreement unfair" (Matter of Schroder v. Schroder, 205 A.D.2d 986, 988 [1994]; see Matter of Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 213 [1977]). The Appellate Division held that the youngest daughter's diagnosis of autism, which the developmental pediatrician explained as "severely involved" and "not a mild case of autism," constituted an unforeseen change in circumstances not anticipated by the parties at the time the separation agreement was signed. . As a result of this child's developmental delays associated with autism, the record established that she required extensive therapy and a structured environment. Testimony supported the importance of effectively implementing and reinforcing her therapy needs at home, which necessitated the purchase of various toys similar to those used by her therapists. Although petitioner was able to furnish some of these items, she indicated that she could not afford other more expensive items such as a computer, physio balls and foam steps used during the child's therapy sessions. In addition, petitioner had previously modified the child's diet to include potentially beneficial, although more expensive, "health" foods; however, again there was proof that petitioner could no longer afford such items. Although petitioner was employed part time at the child's day care center, the record indicated that her ability to work outside the home was difficult and, according to the developmental pediatrician, could be detrimental to the child's best interests. There was no reason to disturb Family Court's finding that petitioner met her burden of establishing that the child's needs increased due to the unanticipated diagnosis of autism thereby rendering the provisions of the agreement opting out of the CSSA to be unfair. The Court held that petitioner was entitled to a modification of child support "without first demonstrating her inability to [financially] meet [the child's] increased support needs".

Spouse Not Responsible Where Asset Declines in Value Through No Fault of Spouse

In Reiff v Reiff, 836 N.Y.S.2d 119 (1st Dept., 2007) the Appellate Division held that where an asset declines in value through no fault of one of the spouses, that spouse should not be held responsible for the loss.

Not An Abuse of Discretion to Strike Answer and Issue Preclusion Order For Contumacious Conduct Designed to Obstruct and Delay Progress of Disclosure

In Casey v Casey, 39 A.D.3d 579, 835 N.Y.S.2d 277,(2d Dept 2007) the Supreme Court struck the husband's answer pursuant to CPLR 3126 as a sanction for his failure to comply with disclosure orders, and after an inquest, directed the equitable distribution of certain marital assets to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently struck the defendant's answer. The drastic remedy of striking an answer requires a showing that a defendant's failure to comply with a disclosure order was the result of willful and contumacious conduct. The willful and contumacious character of a party's conduct can be inferred from the repeated failures to comply with court-ordered discovery, coupled with inadequate explanations for these defaults. Further, the nature and degree of the penalty to be imposed pursuant to CPLR 3126 against a party who refuses to comply with court-ordered discovery is a matter within the discretion of the court. The defendant engaged in a pattern of conduct over a period of time which evidenced an intent to willfully and contumaciously obstruct and delay the progress of disclosure. Moreover, he failed to proffer any reasonable excuse for his default in complying with the court's discovery orders. Accordingly, under the circumstances, the striking of the defendant's answer and the preclusion of the defendant from presenting evidence or testimony at trial relating to financial issues was a provident exercise of the Supreme Court's discretion.

July 26, 2007

Service of Notice of Motion and Cross Motion

Civil Practice Law and Rules 2214 provides that a person making a motion must give his adversary at least eight days advance notice of a motion. The notice of motion must have annexed to it copies of the supporting affidavit, or affidavits, affirmation or affirmations and exhibits.

Where the notice of motion is personally delivered to the other attorney, or other party, eight days advance notice of motion is all that is required. However, if you serve the notice of motion by mail, CPLR 2103 (b)(2) provides that "where a period of time prescribed by law is measured from the service of a paper and service is by mail, five days shall be added to the prescribed period". Therefore, you must add five days to the time to answer the motion, so that thirteen days advance notice of motion is required to be given. Where service of the motion papers is by overnight delivery service CPLR 2103 (b)(6) provides that "where a period of time prescribed by law is measured from the service of a paper and service is by overnight delivery, one business day shall be added to the prescribed period". Therefore, you must add one "business day", where service is by overnight delivery service, so that at least nine days advance notice of motion is required.

When a notice of motion is served giving the eight days notice of motion, CPLR 2214 (b) provides that answering papers must be served on the moving party at least two days before the return date of the motion.

New Notice of Motion and Cross Motion Service Provisions Effective July 3, 2007

Prior to July 3, 2007 CPLR 2214 (b) had provided that a demand could be made for the service of answering affidavits at least 7 days before the return date of the motion by serving the notice of motion at least 12 days before the return date and including such a demand in the notice of motion. At the same time CPLR 2215 provided that the notice of cross motion could be served 3 days in advance of the return date of the motion. It did not matter whether or not the additional four days time was given. Many attorneys would serve the notice of cross motion by mail, which would not always be received by their adversary before the return date of the motion. The party serving the cross-motion could mail it and the time between mailing and delivery was time lost to the party who had to respond.

CPLR 2214 (b) was amended effective July 3, 2007 to allow both parties to have adequate time to prepare their papers. It now provides that where a notice of motion is served at least 16 days before the return date of the motion it may demand that answering affidavits as well as any notice of cross-motion, with supporting papers, if any, be served at least 7 days before the return date of the motion.

CPLR 2214 (b) provides:

(b) Time for service of notice and affidavits. A notice of motion and supporting affidavits shall be served at least eight days before the time at which the motion is noticed to be heard. Answering affidavits shall be served at least two days before such time. Answering affidavits and any notice of cross-motion, with supporting papers, if any, shall be served at least seven days before such time if a notice of motion served at least sixteen days before such time so demands; whereupon any reply or responding affidavits shall be served at least one day before such time.

See Laws of 2007, Chapter 185, Section 1, Approved and effective July 3, 2007. (Section 3. provides: This act shall take effect immediately; provided, however, that this act shall apply to a notice of motion served on or after the date on which this act shall have become a law.)

CPLR 2215 was also amended effective July 3, 2007 to require that any notice of cross-motion, with supporting papers, if any, must be served at least 7 days before the return date of the motion if a notice of motion served at least 16 days before the return date so demands. If the notice of cross motion and any supporting papers are served by mail they must be served three days earlier than as prescribed in CPLR 2103(b) and if they are served by overnight delivery service, they must be served one business day earlier than as prescribed in CPLR 2103 (b).

CPLR 2215 provides:

Rule 2215. Relief demanded by other than moving party. At least three days prior to the time at which the motion is noticed to be heard, or seven days prior to such time if demand is properly made pursuant to subdivision (b) of rule 2214, a party may serve upon the moving party a notice of cross-motion demanding relief, with or without supporting papers; provided, however, that: (a) if such notice and any supporting papers are served by mailing, as provided in paragraph two of subdivision (b) of rule 2103, they shall be served three days earlier than as prescribed in this rule; and (b) if served by overnight delivery, as provided in paragraph six of subdivision (b) of rule 2103, they shall be served one day earlier than as described in this rule. Relief in the alternative or of several different types may be demanded; relief need not be responsive to that demanded by the moving party.

See Laws of 2007, Chapter 185, Section 2, approved and effective July 3, 2007. ("3. This act shall take effect immediately; provided, however, that this act shall apply to a notice of motion served on or after the date on which this act shall have become a law.")

Note: General Construction Law § 19 provides that "a calendar day includes a time from midnight to midnight." Calculating the number of days from within which or after or before which an act is authorized or required to be done, means the number of calendar days exclusive of the calendar day from which the reckoning is made. If the period is a period of two days, Saturday, Sunday or a public holiday must be excluded from the reckoning if it is an intervening day between the day from which the reckoning is made and the last day of the period. In computing any specified period of time from a specified event, the day upon which the event happens is deemed the day from which the reckoning is made. The day from which any specified period of time is reckoned must be excluded in making the reckoning. See GCL § 20

When any period of time within which or after which or before which an act is authorized or required to be done, ends on a Saturday, Sunday or a public holiday, the act may be done on the next succeeding business day and if the period ends at a specified hour, the act may be done at or before the same hour of the next succeeding business day. However where a period of time specified by contract ends on a Saturday, Sunday or a public holiday, the extension of such period is governed by General Construction Law §25. See GCL § 25-a.

July 16, 2007

Second Department Holds Doctrine of Estoppel Does Not Create Standing to Seek Visitation with Nonbiological Child, Ignoring its Decision in Jean Maby H. v. Joseph H. 246 AD2d 282 (2d Dept., 1998)

In Burgess v Ash, N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1632424 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the petitioner, a former boyfriend of the subject child's biological mother, brought a petition against Anthony Ash, the child's legal guardian and biological uncle (respondent), seeking unsupervised visitation with the child. Pursuant to a consent order, the petitioner had been awarded monthly, supervised visitation with the child at the YWCA. Increased visitation was dependent upon further agreement between the parties. The respondent moved to dismiss the petition and vacate the consent order on the ground that the petitioner, as a biological stranger to the child, lacked standing. In opposition, the petitioner claimed that he had established a parent-child relationship with the child and that the doctrine of equitable estoppel precluded the respondent from denying visitation. The Family Court denied the respondent's motion, but ordered a hearing to determine whether the petitioner had standing to seek visitation. The Appellate Division held that the existing consent order, standing alone, did not give the petitioner standing to seek expanded visitation. Family Court properly determined that the petitioner, "who is neither an adoptive nor a biological parent" of the subject child, "lacks standing to seek visitation and cannot rely on the doctrine of equitable estoppel to establish [his] status as a de facto or psychological parent". Thus, Family Court properly dismissed the modification petition.

Court Entitled to Impute Income to Defendant Based on His Pre-divorce Profit Margin

In Irene v Irene, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1652014 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division rejected the contention of defendant in this divorce action that, because Supreme Court made no finding that he voluntarily reduced his income to avoid paying child support, the court erred in imputing any income to him. Trial courts thus possess considerable discretion to impute income in fashioning a child support award and a court is not required to find that a parent deliberately reduced his or her income to avoid a child support obligation before imputing income to that parent. It held that the Court properly imputed income in the amount of $61,432 to defendant for the purpose of calculating his child support obligation. The testimony of plaintiff's expert established that the figures on defendant's 2004 tax return were unreliable, and the court was entitled to impute the amount of $61,432 to defendant based on his predivorce profit margin, after apparently applying a discount based on defendant's economic distress.

Error to Award Share of Pension Where Income Impermissibly "Double-counted"

In Tedesco v Tedesco, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1653043 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding plaintiff her share of defendant's military pension pursuant to Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481) from the date of commencement of the action until the date of the Referee's report. In doing so, the court impermissibly double-counted the income from defendant's military pension because the court previously had considered that income in ordering defendant, by way of temporary orders, to maintain the marital residence for the benefit of plaintiff and the parties' children and to provide plaintiff with funds for household expenses and fuel expenses for her vehicle.

Distributive Award Reduced Where No Evidence Defendant Sacrificed Educational or Employment Opportunities

In Ochs v Ochs, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1559832 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the defendant 50% of the value of the husband's law degree and license as enhanced earnings. The Appellate Division reduced this to 25% of the value of the plaintiff's law degree. It held that defendant, who supported the plaintiff during his last year and a half of law school, was entitled to a share of the enhanced earning capability represented by the plaintiff's law degree and license. However, as the record did not indicate that, by so doing, the defendant sacrificed any educational or employment opportunities, the defendant should have been awarded 25% of the plaintiff's enhanced earnings.

Failure to Appear at Custody Hearing Is Not a Default When Represented by Counsel. Default Custody Award Not Permitted Without Sufficient Evidence or Full Evidentiary Hearing.

In Matter of David AA v Maryann AA, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1653043 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in granting petitioner's motion for a default order awarding sole legal custody of the parties' child to petitioner. Respondent's failure to appear at the hearing on the petition does not automatically constitute a default, particularly where, as here, respondent did appear by her assigned counsel who objected to petitioner's default motion and who, given the opportunity, could have proceeded to a hearing and defended her absent client. Moreover, unless there is sufficient evidence before the court to enable it to undertake a comprehensive independent review of the child's best interests, a determination of a custody matter should only be made after a full evidentiary hearing.

Separation Agreement Cannot Be Set Aside on Motion

In Reiter v Reiter, 39 A.D.3d 616, 835 N.Y.S.2d 240,(2d Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division pointed out that :"a separation agreement is a contract; as such it cannot be annulled by motion" . Thus, a challenge to a stipulation of settlement, which is incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce, must be made by plenary action, and not by motion. As the plaintiff sought to modify the stipulation of settlement by motion rather than by plenary action Supreme Court properly denied her request for relief.

No Jurisdiction Under UCCJEA To Modify Visitation Where Wife and Child No Longer Live in New York

In Zippo v Zippo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1628337 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties stipulated to a February 2000 Family Court order providing petitioner with three days of visitation with the parties' child each year at the correctional facility where petitioner was incarcerated. That summer, respondent and the child relocated to California, where they since resided, returning to New York once each year to provide petitioner with his three days of visitation. On June 22, 2006, petitioner commenced violation and modification proceedings. Determining that it no longer had jurisdiction over the parties' custody disputes, Family Court dismissed the petitions. The Appellate Division pointed out that Domestic Relations Law 76-a provides, in pertinent part, that jurisdiction of a custody matter continues until "a court of this state determines that neither the child, the child and one parent, nor the child and a person acting as a parent have a significant connection with this state and that substantial evidence is no longer available in this state concerning the child's care, protection, training, and personal relationships" (Domestic Relations Law ss 76-a [1][a]). Respondent and the child had not lived in New York since the summer of 2000, they returned here only for a three-day visit each year and New York is not the child's home state. Nor was there any allegation of evidence available in this state concerning the child's care, protection, training and personal relationships. Family Court's determination that it lacked jurisdiction was fully supported by the record.

Marital Residence Generally considered Passive Asset Valued as of Date of Trial

In Newman v Newman, 825 N.Y.S.2d 714 (2d Dept, 2007) the Appellate Division pointed out that a marital residence is generally considered a passive asset which is valued as of the date of the trial. This is especially the case where the dramatic increase in the value of real property is attributable to market forces rather than the contributions of either party. It held that in calculating the distributive award, in light of the fact that the defendant was given a credit for the value of his separate property, the plaintiff was entitled to a credit for the defendant's pre-existing debt on that property, which became the marital residence.

July 2, 2007

Court of Appeals Holds That Adoptive Mother Who Surrenders Child Liable For Child Support.

In Matter of Greene County Department of Social Services o/b/o Ward v Ward, --- N.E.2d ----, 2007 WL 1672315 (N.Y.) Dawn Ward, an unmarried registered nurse, adopted a special needs child on June 20, 2002. He was born prematurely at 27 weeks. Although Jeffrey tested positive for cocaine and syphilis at birth, Ms. Ward was informed that his mother had not habitually used drugs and alcohol during her pregnancy, and that Jeffrey was a "quiet, gentle and pleasant child." Jeffrey was placed with Ms. Ward on May 3, 2001. At the time of placement, he was three years old, weighed 25 pounds, drank from a bottle, was non-verbal, and had been diagnosed with mild cerebral palsy and asthma. Ms. Ward enrolled Jeffrey in an early intervention program and he underwent surgeries to improve his swallowing and breathing capabilities. His emotional and mental development was delayed. In 2001 and 2002, Jeffrey exhibited increasingly aggressive behavior. He began eating sand and grass, biting, licking and spitting at adults, and exhibiting bouts of uncontrolled yelling. By October 2002, Jeffrey's behavior had deteriorated even further. He regressed in toileting, dressing, and eating. His behavior at daycare now included head-banging, hitting and kicking other children and throwing chairs and objects. In February 2003, he was diagnosed with pervasive developmental disorder. Jeffrey's play therapist advised Ms. Ward that Jeffrey had significant neurological issues resulting from exposure to drugs and alcohol in utero. Another psychiatrist diagnosed him with attachment disorder, obsessive-compulsive disorder and autism. Jeffrey's behavior did not improve. He injured both himself and Ms. Ward during the summer of 2003, and had frequent bouts of uncontrollable behavior. On September 2, 2003, Ms. Ward went to the Department of Social Services and asked for a temporary relinquishment of parental rights. When DSS refused to accept a temporary relinquishment, Ms. Ward decided that returning Jeffrey to her home would pose too great a risk to his and her safety, and permanently surrendered her parental rights before a Family Court judge. In 2004 a support magistrate found her liable for child support as the adoptive parent of Jeffrey from the date of surrender. Family Court charged Ms. Ward with "$133.54 weekly child support commencing February 4, 2005 and $10,015.50 arrears from September 2, 2003 through January 28, 2005. The Appellate Division affirmed. In the Court of Appeals Ms. Ward contended that she should be exempt from the child support obligation as the single "parent" of a "child born out of wedlock" and that in the alternative DSS should be equitably estopped from enforcing the support order. It disagreed. It pointed out that an adoptive parent assumes all of the liabilities of a biological parent. Upon voluntary surrender, a parent retains the obligation to provide financial support for a child until he or she is adopted or turns twenty-one. Although the Social Services Law carves out a limited exception from this support requirement for children born out of wedlock to unwed mothers (see SSL 398[6][f]; 18 NYCRR 422.4), this exception did not apply to Ms. Ward. As Jeffrey was not "begotten and born" to her, she did not qualify as the "mother of a child born" out of lawful matrimony (FCA 512). Like the Appellate Division, the Court acknowledged the apparent harsh result in this highly unusual case, but could not conclude that the doctrine of estoppel was applicable against the State.

Reprehensible and Highly Offensive Behavior Is Not Necessarily Sufficient to Establish Cruelty

In Gross v Gross, 836 N.Y.S.2d 166 (1st Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division reversed on the law a judgment of divorce granted to the wife on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The Court pointed out that plaintiff was asked at trial whether defendant had ever "physically force[d] himself on [her] sexually." In response, plaintiff testified that "I would have to say yes. It's only one time that, really where he hurt me." Apparently by way of explanation, plaintiff went on to state that defendant "[r]ammed [her] up against the wall" in the bathroom of their residence. Plaintiff did not elaborate about what she meant in stating that defendant had "force[d] himself on [her] sexually." The Court found that in its vagueness and generality, this testimony could include conduct ranging from the criminal (e.g., forcible rape) to the merely obnoxious. Plaintiff offered no evidence that she had sustained any injuries as a result of this incident and testified on cross-examination that she did not suffer any physical injuries as a result of the incident. Plaintiff also testified that defendant, on many occasions, "physically grabbed [her]." When asked to describe how defendant "grabbed" her, plaintiff stated: "[h]e'll grab me, he'll pull me down the hall, he'll block me so I can't leave the room, throw me on the bed, push me against the wall." No testimony was elicited from plaintiff that she sustained any injuries as a result of defendant's conduct. The Court held that reprehensible and highly offensive behavior is not necessarily sufficient to establish cruel-and-inhuman-treatment. Plaintiff's uncorroborated testimony regarding unwanted physical contact was vague and general, and no evidence was adduced from plaintiff regarding the effects, if any, of defendant's conduct on her physical or mental well-being. Plaintiff denied suffering any injuries as a result of the incident which occurred in the bathroom. She presented no evidence regarding the effects, if any, on her mental well-being of defendant's conduct in entering the bathroom of their residence while plaintiff was showering. While a party seeking a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment is not required to produce medical evidence demonstrating the adverse effects of the defendant's behavior, the absence of such evidence may be relevant. The absence of medical evidence was particularly telling in light of plaintiff's failure to offer any other evidence tending to demonstrate that defendant's conduct was "harmful to the plaintiff's physical or mental health and makes cohabitation unsafe or improper". The Court felt that it was left to speculate as to the effects, if any, of defendant's conduct on plaintiff's physical and mental well-being. Moreover, other evidence militated against the conclusion that plaintiff satisfied the substantial burden the law imposes upon her. The parties were married for 37 years, eight months at the time of trial, a marriage of long duration requiring a high degree of proof of cruel and inhuman treatment; the parties continued to reside together in the marital residence through the trial; and the parties were able to talk to each other in a civilized manner, have dinner together every night, go out for meals and to the movies and attend social functions. The evidence failed to demonstrate, with a high degree of proof, that the conduct of the defendant so endangers the physical or mental well being of the plaintiff as to render it unsafe or improper for the plaintiff to cohabit with the defendant".

No Authority to Issue Medical Execution in Absence of Determination That Health Insurance Benefits Are Available

In Matter of Oneida County Department of Social Services, on Behalf of Heidi S. V Paul S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1652167 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Support Magistrate's order set forth that health insurance "is not available and affordable at this time." Petitioner filed an objection contending that the Family Court Act and the Domestic Relations Law both require support orders to contain language directing any legally responsible relative to provide health insurance benefits when such coverage becomes available if such coverage is not presently available. Family Court determined that, although petitioner was correct that the language with respect to health insurance benefits was mandatory, the decision whether benefits were available, i.e., reasonable in cost, should be made by the court, and the Support Magistrate had determined that health insurance benefits were not available. The court granted the objection to the extent of providing that the parties shall notify petitioner "in writing regarding any change in health insurance benefits available to them." The court also ordered that petitioner "shall not issue a medical execution without a determination made by a court of competent jurisdiction that the health insurance benefits are 'available' " within the meaning of Family Court Act s 416(d)(2). The Appellate Division rejected Petitioner's argument that the court erred in limiting petitioner's authority to issue a medical execution pursuant to CPLR 5241(b)(2)(l). CPLR 5241(b)(2)(l) provides that, "[w]here the court orders the debtor to provide health insurance benefits for specified dependents, an execution for medical support enforcement may ... be issued by the support collection unit." Pursuant to Family Court Act 416(h), the court shall direct the legally responsible relative to enroll the eligible dependents to receive health insurance benefits "[w]here the court determines that health insurance benefits are available" (416[c], [d][2]). " 'Available health insurance benefits' [are] any health insurance benefits that are reasonable in cost and that are reasonably accessible to the person on whose behalf the petition is brought" (416[d][2]). The Support Magistrate determined that health insurance benefits were not available, and respondent was not ordered to provide such benefits. Thus, the prerequisite for the issuance of a medical execution, i.e., an order directing a debtor to provide health insurance benefits (see CPLR 5241[b][2][l]), was not met. Therefore, the court properly determined that petitioner lacked authority pursuant to CPLR 5241(b)(2)(l) to issue a medical execution in the absence of a determination by the court that health insurance benefits are available.

June 18, 2007

Lump Sum Child Support Award of $92,480 Upheld Where Father Received Personal Injury Settlement

In Walker v Gilbert, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1216203 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that a lump-sum payment received by a parent in a tort action is not excluded from consideration in determining child support. One approach where a parent receives a nonrecurring large sum of money is to increase the weekly (or other periodic payment) support obligation by applying a reasonable rate of return to the funds received and imputing that amount as income. This may be a preferred approach in most situations involving a lump-sum settlement. However, directing the payment of a portion of the nonrecurring sum received is not precluded by the statute and may be appropriate under some circumstances. Family Court set forth in detail the compelling reasons for its approach in this case, (it awarded a lump sum of ($92,480 which was 17% of the net amount received as a personal injury award) including, among others, that "the child had extraordinary and heart wrenching multiple medical complications which are becoming more acute with time," "the [m]other has had to dedicate virtually her entire life to the care of the child," and "the [f]ather has totally abandoned his moral obligation and parental responsibilities owed to his son, leaving his son's complete care in the hands of the [m]other." Moreover, it was readily apparent to Family Court that respondent was rapidly dissipating the entire settlement without any regard to his child.

Contempt For Violation of Stipulation Not Approved By Court Must Be Reversed

In Ullah v Entezari-Ullah,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1246919 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which adjudged plaintiff husband in civil contempt for failing to comply with an August 2005 interim order to pay outstanding mortgage arrears and tuition and sentenced him to 15 days in jail if he failed to purge the contempt. The parties, each represented by counsel, entered into a stipulation of settlement to be incorporated but not merged in any subsequent divorce decree. The stipulation provided that the parties intended it "to constitute an agreement pursuant to Domestic Relations Law Section 236, Part B 3" and "to be in lieu of each of their respective rights, pursuant to all aspects of" that statute. The stipulation further provided that it could not be amended or deemed amended "except by an agreement in writing duly subscribed and acknowledged with the same formality as this Agreement," in which each party's signature was duly notarized. The judgment of divorce, accompanied by the stipulation, was filed on May 12, 2004. Thereafter, on June 16, 2004, the parties entered into what they had considered a modification of the stipulation, containing an affirmation signed by the husband, witnessed and notarized, asserting that he had neither income nor access to any income or assets, and in fact had a negative net worth. The modification did not contain the wife's signature and did not reflect that either side was represented by counsel. On or about July 8, 2005, the wife moved, inter alia, to enforce the stipulation and the purported modification agreement. The motion court refused to vacate the stipulation and determined that the wife's only avenue of redress was to enforce it. A hearing on the wife's motion to enforce the stipulation was commenced on August 15, 2005, but was adjourned to September 19 to afford the parties an opportunity to submit documentary evidence. On August 19, the court issued an interim order to "meet the immediate needs" of the wife and the children. In so ruling, the court relied upon provisions of the parties' stipulation and the modification thereto. On September 19, 2005, the wife moved for an order of contempt for the husband's failure to comply with the August 19 interim order. In an order dated December 2, 2005, the court determined that the husband was in civil contempt of the August 2005 order based on his admitted noncompliance. The Appellate Division held that a respondent in a civil contempt proceeding facing the possibility of the imposition of a term of incarceration, however short, is entitled to the assignment of counsel upon a finding of indigence. Here, the record was silent as to whether the husband was, as he was entitled to be, advised of his right to counsel during the contempt proceeding. It is the court's responsibility to advise such a respondent of the right to counsel of his own choosing, or assigned counsel where appropriate, before the commencement of a hearing or other proceedings. The matter was remanded for a new hearing on the contempt motion and a determination as to whether the husband had his own counsel or qualified for the appointment of assigned counsel thereat. The Court also found that there was merit to the husband's argument that the hearing court erred in finding him in contempt for failing to pay the mortgage and common charge arrears on both apartments pursuant to the August 2005 interim order since it was based on the June 2004 modification, which was invalid because it was never judicially authorized. A divorce decree may be modified with respect to spousal support only in the manner provided by statute. No agreement by the parties has any effect on the decree unless made effective by judicial approval. While the husband did not appeal the August 2005 interim order, upon which the finding of contempt was based, public policy dictates that judicial authorization be obtained before courts give recognition to modified matrimonial agreements, especially where, as here, a party agrees to more stringent obligations than those in the original agreement.

Valuation Methodology of Nurse Practitioner License Proper Even though Wife in Work Force Many Years

In Spreitzer v Spreitzer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1439434 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1982. The defendant, who was a registered nurse, graduated from Pace University in 1994, and acquired a Masters of Science Degree and a nurse practitioner license. She held part-time position as a nurse practitioner in a private medical office since 1998. The Appellate Division held that the trial court properly calculated the enhanced earning capacity conferred by the defendant's degree and license by comparing the expected lifetime earnings of a registered nurse with the expected lifetime earnings of a licensed nurse practitioner, and reducing this sum to its present value. Although the defendant had already embarked on her career and acquired a history of actual earnings the court providently exercised its discretion in rejecting her testimony that she was unable to secure full-time employment. The trial court properly awarded the plaintiff 20% of the value of the degree and license constituting the enhanced earning capacity achieved by the defendant during the marriage, based upon his substantial economic as well as noneconomic contributions to the attainment of that enhanced earning capacity . The defendant's contention that the trial court erroneously imputed income of $78,000 to her for the purpose of calculating her child support obligation was without merit. In determining a party's child support obligation, "a court need not rely upon the party's account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential". Here, the court properly imputed an annual income to the defendant since the evidence at trial demonstrated that she was capable of earning $78,000 a year based on her degree, her nurse practitioner license, the facts adduced at trial, and the testimony of the expert who valued her degree and license.. The record supported the determination of the court that the defendant's earning potential exceeded her actual income reported on her 2004 income tax return. The award to the wife of an attorney's fee in the sum of $12,600, and direction to both parties to maintain medical coverage for the children were affirmed.

Court Must Take Husbands Financial Resources into Account in Fixing Maintenance

In Sevdinoglou v Sevdinoglou — N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1501831 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $2,225 per month for 36 months or until the plaintiff's death, remarriage, or cohabitation with a member of the opposite sex pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 248 and counsel fees in the sum of $14,140. The Appellate Division modified the judgment and reduced the amount of the award to $1,500 per month. Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to take into account the husband's financial circumstances in fashioning the maintenance award.

Court May Direct Party to Submit to Counseling as a Component of Visitation

In Thompson v Yu-Thompson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1631494 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that while a court may not order counseling as a condition of future visitation or re-application for visitation rights, it may direct a party to submit to counseling as a component of visitation and that the court also has the authority to order counseling for the child .

June 1, 2007

Motion Granting Judgment Abandoned For Failure to Comply with 22 NYCRR 202.48.L
law office failure does not constitute "good cause" for Delay .

In Farkas v Farkas, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1246924 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department reversed on the law an Order and judgment awarding plaintiff $750,000 with interest from August 6, 2003, vacated the judgment and dismissed as abandoned the claim underlying the judgment. It pointed out that the Court of Appeals has recently made it clear that "statutory time frames-- like court-ordered time frames--are not options, they are requirements, to be taken seriously by the parties" (citing Miceli v State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 3 NY3d 725, 726 [2004] [citation omitted], following Brill v. City of New York, 2 NY3d 648 [2004]). Thus, where a statute or court rule prescribes a limited time frame in which to take a procedural step in litigation, and states that a party's failure to act within that time frame will be excused only upon a showing of "good cause," such a showing requires demonstrating, as the dissent put it, "more ... than [the] merit ... [of] the underlying application and a lack of prejudice to the other party." This principle applied in this case, in which plaintiff failed to comply with the 60-day time frame for the submission of a judgment to the court for signature (Uniform Rules for Trial Cts [22 NYCRR] 202.48[a], [b]). Because plaintiff has failed to show good cause for her failure to comply with the time frame set forth in the Uniform Rules, it reversed and vacated the judgment. Although the order granting plaintiff's application for judgment was entered on October 17, 2000, it was not until May 2, 2005--four and a half years later--that plaintiff finally served defendant with a notice of settlement and a proposed judgment. Defendant opposed entry of the proposed judgment, arguing that it was untimely under 22 NYCRR 202.48(a), more than 60 days having passed since entry of the order directing settlement of the judgment. Therefore, defendant argued, the action should be deemed abandoned pursuant to 22 NYCRR 202.48(b), since plaintiff had not shown "good cause" for the delay. The court, without making any finding on the "good cause" issue, signed the judgment submitted by plaintiff without material amendment. Plaintiff's failure to comply with the clear mandate of the Uniform Rules was not justified either by the lack of prejudice to defendant from the late submission of the judgment or by the merit of the claim on which the judgment is based (cf. Brill, 2 NY3d at 652 ["good cause" for a late summary judgment motion under CPLR 3212(a) "requires a showing of good cause for the delay in making the motion--a satisfactory explanation for the untimeliness--rather than simply permitting meritorious, nonprejudicial filings, however tardy"]). Plaintiff's failure to timely submit a judgment was simply an instance of law office failure. Plaintiff's counsel essentially admitted as much. In reply to defendant's opposition to the belated submission of the judgment, plaintiff's counsel concluded that "any failure to timely submit the Order [sic] for settlement is based on an oversight by the firm filing." In view of Brill and its progeny law office failure clearly does not constitute "good cause" for delay within the meaning of 22 NYCRR 202.48(b). The more contemporary Brill and Miceli decisions indicate that courts are now expected to take a stricter approach to the enforcement of litigation deadlines. [Saxe, J.P. and Malone, J. dissented]

Visitation Schedule that deprives Custodial Parent of Significant Quality Time with Child is Excessive.

In Patrick v Farris, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1217861 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the extent to which the noncustodial parent may exercise parenting time is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the hearing court, to be determined on the basis of the best interests of the child ... consistent with the concurrent right of the child and the noncustodial parent ... to meaningful time together. A visitation schedule that deprives the custodial parent of any significant quality time with the child is, however, excessive.

Court Must Provide For the Disposition of All Property In Final Judgment of Dissolution In Dellafiora v Dellafiora,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 926785 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that improvidently exercised its discretion in not awarding the wife a 50% interest in two properties and that the trial court erred in failing to "provide for the disposition thereof". The wife correctly contended that she would only be able to realize her interest in the property located in Highland Mills, where the plaintiff husband resided, if the property was sold or if the husband purchased her interest. The same applied to the wife's interest in the property located in Cornwall, which could not be realized unless the property was sold or the husband purchased her interest. It remitted to the Supreme Court for further proceedings, including a hearing, if necessary, to determine and provide for the appropriate distribution of these two properties.

Improper to Impute Income to Wife Out of Work Force For Extended Period of Time.

In Walter v Walter,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 852120 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in confirming the referee's determination to limit the plaintiff's award of $4000 a month spousal maintenance to a period of five years, retroactive to the date of commencement of the action. The evidence presented at the hearing revealed that the plaintiff was the primary caretaker of the parties' three children, and that she stopped working shortly before the birth of the parties' second child in 1995 in order to become a stay-at-home mother. It extended the award of maintenance by an additional three years to afford the plaintiff, who had been out of the work force for an extended period of time, and was the primary caretaker of the parties' children, a sufficient opportunity to become self-supporting. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the court should not have confirmed the referee's determination to impute an annual income of $40,000 per year to the plaintiff for purposes of calculating child support under the CSSA. Although the court may impute income based upon a party's past income or demonstrated earning potential given the extended period of time during which the plaintiff has been out of the work force, and the necessity of affording her an additional period of time to become self-supporting, it was improper to impute income to her. It modified the judgment to increase the child support award from $2900 a month to $3,625 per month.

Supreme Court Erred in Determining Defendant Not Entitled to Seek Enforcement of the Federal Affidavit of Support

In Moody v Soronkina, ___ N.Y.S.2d ___, 2007 WL 294218 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Defendant was a Ukrainian national who emigrated to the United States in order to marry plaintiff. The parties were married in the United States in June 1999 and in July 1999 plaintiff executed a federal affidavit of support, Form I-864, in which he agreed, inter alia, to support defendant at or above 125% of the federal poverty line until the occurrence of a qualifying terminating event. The Appellate Division found that the statute expressly permits the sponsored immigrant to bring an action for enforcement of the affidavit of support against the sponsor in any federal or state court. The enforceability of the affidavit terminates when, inter alia, the sponsored immigrant "has worked 40 qualifying quarters of coverage as defined under title II of the Social Security Act [42 USC 01 et seq.]" (8 USC 1183a [a][3][A][I]). It concluded that the court erred in determining that defendant was not entitled to seek enforcement of the federal affidavit of support on the grounds that the statute was for public benefit only and did not afford defendant a private cause of action.

Limited Award of Maintenance to Disabled Wife Who Could Be Self-Supporting

In Mora v Mora, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1218017 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that . Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in determining, upon consideration of all the unique facts of the case, that the husband's obligation to pay maintenance terminated three years after the date of the pendente lite order, or on May 31, 2005. "It is axiomatic that the amount and duration of maintenance is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the trial court and every case must be determined on its unique facts" . In declining to award the wife prospective maintenance beyond that date, the court properly considered, inter alia, the wife's capacity to earn a living as a computer specialist despite her disability, that she had been awarded maintenance during the pendency of the action, and that the husband was responsible for the support of the parties' two children of whom he had custody, and that his income was insufficient for him to provide for his own and their needs without assistance from his mother. It affirmed the counsel fee award of $2000.

May 16, 2007

Improper to Award Compound Interest on Distributive Award and to Fail to Give Credit For Temporary Child Support

In Miklos v Miklos, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1218025 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in failing to award the plaintiff maintenance retroactive to the date the application was first made, with credit to the defendant for any temporary maintenance payments made. Furthermore, although the Supreme Court properly awarded the plaintiff retroactive child support, the court failed to credit the defendant for any amount of temporary child support already paid even though the making of such payments was reflected in the defendant's statement of net worth contained in his submissions. The plaintiff was not entitled to an award of past interest on any maintenance or child support arrears. Domestic Relations Law 244 provides that a judgment "shall provide for the payment of interest on the amount of any arrears if the default was wilful, in that the obligated spouse knowingly, consciously and voluntarily disregarded the obligation under a lawful order." Supreme Court did not find that the defendant's arrears were a product of a wilful default. However, to the extent the Supreme Court directed that arrears be paid in installments, the plaintiff was entitled to interest on the unpaid outstanding balances at the statutory rate (see CPLR 5004). The Supreme Court improperly awarded compound interest of 1.5% per month, which is at least twice the permissible statutory rate of 9% per annum, on any untimely equitable distributive award payments.

Denial of Fair Trial Warrants Reversal of Divorce Judgment

In Shagoury v Shagoury, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 1016997 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed a judgment which, after a nonjury trial, inter alia, granted the plaintiff wife a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. A new trial was required because the trial court impermissibly and repeatedly precluded the husband from eliciting relevant testimony in his defense, as well as in support of the factual allegations contained in his counterclaim, and thereby deprived him of a fair trial.

Property Acquired During Marriage Presumed to Be Marital Property.

In Massimi v Massimi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3525742 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, equitably distributed the parties' marital property and directed the husband to pay child support in the sum of $500 per week. The Appellate Division found that plaintiff commingled certain separate funds with marital funds and assets and failed to trace the source of the funds with sufficient particularity to rebut the presumption that they were marital property. Consequently, to the extent that the plaintiff applied marital funds to his separately titled property, the defendant was entitled to an equitable distribution of the values thereof. Likewise, the defendant was entitled to recoup her equitable share of the marital funds used to reduce the indebtedness and pay for improvements to the marital abode. She also was entitled to an equitable share of the appreciation in value of the marital residence due to the evidence of indirect nonfinancial contributions to the household. The evidence demonstrated that certain other contested assets were commingled with, or funded at least in part by, marital funds. The trial court, therefore, erred in failing to award the defendant an equitable distributive share of such assets. While the defendant would also be entitled to an equitable share of Remy Real Estate Corporation the record lacked adequate proof as to its value and, hence, no award could be made. The Appellate Division agreed with the trial court's determination of the plaintiff's child support obligation based upon the standard of living the child would have enjoyed had the parties' marriage not dissolved, along with its own consideration of the plaintiff's financial resources and the parties' disparate incomes.

Lottery Winnings Are Marital Property. Shelter Costs Must Be Deducted From Child Support Obligation

In Damon v Damon, 823 N.Y.S.2d 540 (2d Dept. 2006) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly concluded that the defendant's lottery prize was marital property subject to equitable distribution. Moreover, as the award was "predominately the result of fortuitous circumstances and not the result of either spouse's toil or labor," the contributions to the marriage of each party have little relevance to the manner in which the lottery jackpot should be distributed. Accordingly, the court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in awarding the plaintiff 25% of the lottery winnings deemed to be her share of the marital property. It agreed with the defendant that the court erred in failing to ascertain and deduct from his child support obligation the shelter costs incurred by the defendant in providing housing for the plaintiff and minor children. Shelter costs, like food and clothing, inherent in the basic child support obligation and, thus, the statute does not contemplate the cost of providing the child's shelter as an extraordinary expense to be added to the support obligation. It remitted to the Supreme Court to recalculate the amount of child support and child support arrears, taking into account the shelter costs incurred by the defendant in providing housing to the plaintiff and the minor children.

Trial Court Not Required to Consider Tax Consequence of Sale of Assets Where No Evidence Sale of Assets Expected

In Hamroff v Hamroff, 826 N.Y.S.2d 389 (2d Dept.,2006) the defendant -wife worked throughout the 14 year marriage, in the businesses incorporated immediately prior to the marriage, in which the plaintiff served as Chief Executive Officer. For much of that time, the defendant received no compensation. In 1999 she was fired by the plaintiff, who then commenced this action for a divorce. The Appellate Division held that the trial court properly awarded the defendant maintenance of $500 per week until she reaches the age of 65. The trial court also properly awarded the defendant 40% of the appreciated value of the businesses which were marital property in light of her direct and indirect contributions to their success. The award of 3% post-judgment interest on the distributive award, which could have been as high as 9%, was a proper exercise of the trial court's discretion. The trial court was not required to consider the tax consequence of the sale of assets where there was no evidence that sale of any assets was expected. The plaintiff's notice of appeal specified that the appeal was limited to certain portions of the judgment. Thus, issues raised in the plaintiff's brief relating to other portions of the judgment were not properly before the court.

Supreme Court Properly Distributed Assets Under Circumstances of Case

In Altieri v Altieri, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3798874 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division rejected the defendant's argument that Supreme Court erred in awarding plaintiff a liquid asset in the form of the marital residence while awarding him a nonliquid asset in the form of his 401k plan. It held that while courts should ordinarily avoid methods of property division which provide one spouse with immediate enjoyment of assets and relegate the other spouse to a potentially long and uncertain wait before access to the equity in the assets is realized, that principle was not violated here. Although defendant will be required to pay income tax on any withdrawals from his 401k account, based on his age he is entitled to make withdrawals without penalties, and had done so several times prior to commencement of this action. As he failed to prove the nonliquidity of that asset, it was properly awarded as an offset against his portion of the marital residence awarded to plaintiff. It also held that Supreme Court did not err by not adjusting the distributions from defendant's 401k account for tax consequences, because defendant did not prove the tax impact of those withdrawals. Were plaintiff to liquidate the realty, she would incur costs for repairs, counsel fees and broker fees. Under the circumstances of this case, considering plaintiff's attachment to the marital home, defendant's actions in secreting assets during the marriage, his failure to disclose significant assets in his financial disclosure statement and his incredible testimony concerning the use of certain assets, it was equitable to balance the distribution of the marital residence to plaintiff against the distribution of the 401k plan to defendant. Supreme Court also did not abuse its discretion in awarding plaintiff credits for amounts that defendant withdrew from marital assets, cash that defendant secreted in the home and did not claim in his statement of net worth and money in accounts that defendant closed, all while matrimonial actions were contemplated or pending.

May 1, 2007

Nondurational Maintenance Awarded in 30 Year Marriage For Partially Self-Supporting Wife

In Kammerer v. Kammerer, 2007 WL 926564 --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 926564 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) after 30 years of marriage, the former wife commenced an action for a divorce in 1998. The parties entered into a stipulation providing for the equitable distribution of the marital residence, the defendant former husband's businesses, and commercial real estate. The Appellate Division held that considering all of the factors relevant in determining maintenance, including the amount of marital assets awarded to the wife, and her ability to become partially self-supporting, the award to her of nondurational maintenance in the sum of $800 per week was a provident exercise of the trial court's discretion. The wife's testimony with respect to her health problems was not corroborated by expert testimony, and did not establish that she was incapable of securing employment. Rather, the evidence indicated that she was capable of working. Considering the wife's means and ability to secure employment, the trial court's refusal to compel the husband to provide health insurance for her was a provident exercise of discretion.

Child Support Awarded Where Efforts to Seek Employment Insufficient

In Hodges v Hodges--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3526824 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division noted that a court may deviate from directing a noncustodial parent to pay his or her share of the basic child support obligation if it finds that amount to be "unjust or inappropriate" but disagreed with Supreme Court's determination that was would be "unjust and inappropriate" even though the plaintiff was presently unemployed. In its decision dated June 16, 2004, the Supreme Court noted that within two months of the parties' separation, the plaintiff obtained employment for two years as a security screener at an airport. After she lost that job due to changing governmental regulations, she began to collect unemployment benefits and performed some hospital security work on a per diem basis as well as catering on an "as needed" basis. Her efforts to seek other employment were insufficient in that they were limited to checking newspapers advertisements for jobs in the security field. Notwithstanding the plaintiff's inability to find such work, she admittedly did not seek employment or education in any other field, nor did she register with any employment agency in the security field or otherwise. Supreme Court also found that the health problems described by the plaintiff did not restrict her activities in any way or diminish her ability to work. Supreme Court imputed income to the plaintiff in the sum of $20,000, of which $4,800 annually, or $400 monthly, would be the plaintiff's share under the CSSA, it relieved her of her statutory obligation thereunder and directed her to pay child support in the sum of $25 monthly. It also deferred payment of the plaintiff's pro rata share of unreimbursed medical, dental, pharmaceutical, or mental health expenses for a period of two years. The Appellate Division held that since there was no indication in the record that the plaintiff could not work or otherwise provide financial resources to support her children, there was no basis to depart from the application of the prescribed statutory percentage or to defer her contribution to the children's unreimbursed medical expenses.

Proper to Deny Maintenance Where No Effort By Wife to Transition Back into Work Force

In Arnone v Arnone, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 174394 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties married in 1980 and had two children, born in 1982 and 1985. This divorce action was commenced in 1997, but was not actively pursued until 2000 when an attempted reconciliation disintegrated. Prior to the 2003 trial, the children resided with plaintiff, who provided their financial support. Supreme Court determined, among other things, that the marital property consisted of the parties' residence, the various personal property located there, a 1982 Camaro, and a portion of plaintiff's state retirement benefit. The court distributed to defendant the residence (valued at $172,000), all personal property at the residence (except a few specifically named items), and the Camaro. Plaintiff was permitted to keep his state pension of about $13,000 per year. Supreme Court directed that defendant would keep her pension; however, she had none. Various bank accounts were determined to be separate property and thus not subject to equitable distribution. The court terminated temporary maintenance as of the date of the judgment of divorce, and awarded no further maintenance. Defendant's request for counsel fees was denied. Plaintiff remained solely financially responsible for the one child who was not yet emancipated. The Appellate Division found that the parties were married the entire time that plaintiff was employed full time with the state. He was injured on that job and later received a state retirement benefit. This injury, and injuries he received while serving with the United States Marines in Vietnam, left him totally disabled. He received about $58,000 per year from the combination of Veteran's disability, Social Security disability and workers' compensation. Defendant made no claim as to these payments, which compensated plaintiff for his personal injuries. During the marriage, defendant held only part-time jobs, her annual earnings did not exceed $12,000, she was not working at the time of the trial, and her medical coverage ceased with the divorce. Defendant was the primary caretaker of the children when they were young, and plaintiff assumed those obligations in their late teenage years, including all support and college expenses. Defendant suffered some infirmities and had unsuccessfully attempted to obtain Social Security disability benefits, but Supreme Court was not convinced that her condition prevented her from working. The court held that her probable financial condition would improve following the divorce and plaintiff's financial condition would remain unchanged. At the time of trial, plaintiff was 56 years old and defendant was 53. It modified the judgment to provide that defendant should receive 50% of plaintiff's state pension, which was $13,326 per year in 2002. The Appellate Division affirmed the denial of maintenance. It found that although defendant had a limited work history, she obtained a college degree while married. Significantly, during the several years prior to the divorce when the marriage was deteriorating (and when she assumed no obligation to provide housing or support to the children and was receiving temporary maintenance in the amount of $1,000 per month from August 8, 2001 until that order was terminated on August 30, 2005), she made no apparent effort to transition back into the work force. Defendant relied on her alleged infirmities as a reason for her lack of initiative in seeking employment. Supreme Court, however, rejected this excuse and it found no reason to disregard the court's credibility determination.

Court Properly Imputed Income and Applied Straight Percentage Based upon Standard of Living That the Parties' Children Would Have Enjoyed

In Devries v Devries, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3803411 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the wife child support of $1,702.75 per week, maintenance of $697 per week for a period of 10 years, 30% of the plaintiff's business, equitable distribution in the sum of $814,110.50, denied her motion for an attorney's fee, and applied the Child Support Standards Act to the husband's income in excess of $80,000. The Appellate Division held that the court properly imputed income to the plaintiff since the evidence showed that he earned and spent well in excess of the income reported on his tax return. The court, applying the straight percentage, properly considered $300,000 of the plaintiff's imputed gross income in determining basic child support. The court providently exercised its discretion in calculating child support against $300,000 of the plaintiff's imputed income based upon the standard of living that the parties' children would have enjoyed had the marriage not dissolved, and upon the parties' disparate financial circumstances. As the defendant proffered no evidence that either the plaintiff or DeVries Concrete, Inc., had any ownership interest in certain New Paltz property and there was conflicting evidence regarding whether the plaintiff made any monetary investment in the New Paltz property, and if so, how much money was involved, the Supreme Court erred in including this property in the distributive award. The Appellate Division held that on the peculiar facts and circumstances of this case, including the defendant's receipt of 70% of the nonbusiness marital assets (not including the New Paltz property), the payment to the defendant of the sum of $200,000 in equitable distribution up front, and the award of interest on the distributive balance calculated at the legal rate, the defendant was not entitled to any portion of the value of the plaintiff's business, M. DeVries Concrete, Inc.

April 16, 2007

Family Court Has Discretion to Grant Post Termination Contact with Biological Parent

In Matter of Kahlil S., 35 A.D.3d 1164, 830 N.Y.S.2d 625 (4th Dept., 2007) the Appellate Division held that Family Court had discretion to determine whether some form of post termination contact with the biological parent was in the best interests of the child, abrogating Matter of Kenneth D., 32 A.D.3d 1237, 821 N.Y.S.2d 698, Matter of Livingston County Dept. of Social Servs. v. Tracy T., 16 A.D.3d 1133, 792 N.Y.S.2d 273. It recognized that the termination of the parental rights of a biological parent results in an abrupt and complete cessation of contact between a child and the parent, and that "psychological harm ... may possibly result from severing the bonds between a child and his or her biological parent, particularly where the child is older and has strong emotional attachments to the birth family. It concluded that, in the event that parental rights are terminated after a finding that the parent is unable by reason of mental illness or mental retardation to provide proper and adequate care for his or her child or after a finding of permanent neglect, Family Court may, in those cases in which the court deems it appropriate, exercise its discretion in determining whether some form of post termination contact with the biological parent is in the best interests of the child. It noted that in determining the best interests of the children, the court may consider, inter alia, the ages of the children, the bond between respondent and the children, and the likelihood that the children will be adopted.

Child Support Awarded Where Efforts to Seek Employment Insufficient

In Hodges v Hodges--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3526824 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division noted that a court may deviate from directing a noncustodial parent to pay his or her share of the basic child support obligation if it finds that amount to be "unjust or inappropriate" but disagreed with Supreme Court's determination that was would be "unjust and inappropriate" even though the plaintiff was presently unemployed. In its decision dated June 16, 2004, the Supreme Court noted that within two months of the parties' separation, the plaintiff obtained employment for two years as a security screener at an airport. After she lost that job due to changing governmental regulations, she began to collect unemployment benefits and performed some hospital security work on a per diem basis as well as catering on an "as needed" basis. Her efforts to seek other employment were insufficient in that they were limited to checking newspapers advertisements for jobs in the security field. Notwithstanding the plaintiff's inability to find such work, she admittedly did not seek employment or education in any other field, nor did she register with any employment agency in the security field or otherwise. Supreme Court also found that the health problems described by the plaintiff did not restrict her activities in any way or diminish her ability to work. Supreme Court imputed income to the plaintiff in the sum of $20,000, of which $4,800 annually, or $400 monthly, would be the plaintiff's share under the CSSA, it relieved her of her statutory obligation thereunder and directed her to pay child support in the sum of $25 monthly. It also deferred payment of the plaintiff's pro rata share of unreimbursed medical, dental, pharmaceutical, or mental health expenses for a period of two years. The Appellate Division held that since there was no indication in the record that the plaintiff could not work or otherwise provide financial resources to support her children, there was no basis to depart from the application of the prescribed statutory percentage or to defer her contribution to the children's unreimbursed medical expenses.

Award of Maintenance Not Determined by Actual Earnings, but by Earning Capacity. Husband Properly Awarded 25% of Marital Assets

In Arrigo v Arrigo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 926881 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Contrary to the husband's contention, the Supreme Court did not err in awarding him only a 25% share of the marital assets. Equitable distribution does not necessarily mean equal distribution, and it was evident that the Supreme Court properly considered the relevant statutory factors in fashioning the distribution. The marriage was of relatively short duration, both parties were relatively young and healthy, there were no children, and the husband's financial contributions to the marriage were minimal. Supreme Court properly denied him an award of maintenance. The marriage was relatively short, and both parties were relatively young and healthy. Although the husband earned substantially less income than the wife, he had three college degrees. An award of maintenance is not determined by actual earnings, but rather by earning capacity. The husband quit many jobs of his own volition, despite the wife's wishes that he maintain steady employment. Furthermore, he received a distributive award of 25% of the marital assets. Thus, the court properly denied him an award of maintenance.

Not error to refuse to award equitable share pension without Proof of Value

In Seckler-Roode v Roode, 36 A.D.3d 889, 830 N.Y.S.2d 211 (2d Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in declining to award the defendant an equitable share of the value of the plaintiff's pension. Generally, that portion of the value of a pension which accrues during the marriage constitutes marital property subject to equitable distribution. Here, however, the defendant failed to meet his burden of proving the value of the plaintiff's pension, offering no proof at all as to its value.

Depositions Not Permitted in Custody Disputes and Deposition of Expert Not Favored.

In Nimkoff v Nimkoff, 36 A.D.3d 498, 830 N.Y.S.2d 27 (1st Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division, First Department, affirmed an order which granted motions by the court-appointed forensic evaluator Schaul and by plaintiff wife to vacate the defendant husband's notice of deposition and quash his subpoena for pre-trial disclosure by Schaul. It held that defendant was given ample opportunity to cross-examine the evaluator as to any bias in favor of mothers in custody proceedings. The circumstances did not suggest the need for a departure from the general rule that depositions are not permitted in custody disputes. Furthermore, deposing of expert witnesses is generally discouraged. The order directing production of Dr. Schaul's data file for review three business days prior to trial was appropriate.

Broad Disclosure Justified Where Closely Held Corporation Owned by Spouse. Special Circumstance Rule Still Applicable to Non-Party Depositions.

In Reich v Reich, 36 A.D.3d 506, 830 N.Y.S.2d 29 the Appellate Division held that the documents and records sought by defendant wife from Hercules Corp. were appropriate to a characterization and valuation of Hercules, a closely held corporation in which plaintiff husband was a 2.5% shareholder. Under the Equitable Distribution Law, broad pretrial disclosure which enables both spouses to obtain necessary information regarding the value and nature of the marital assets is critical if the trial court is to properly distribute the marital assets. This searching exploration is more than justified in the case of close corporations, the ownership of which is in the hands of a small number of stockholders and for which there is little objective evidence of fair market value. Defendant wife will have to bear the costs of any document production. The Appellate Division modified to quash the notice of deposition served upon Alfred May. Defendant had not shown that the information sought from him was not obtainable from other sources (citing Dioguardi v. St. John's Riverside Hosp., 144 A.D.2d 333, 533 N.Y.S.2d 915 [1988]), particularly since appellants had evidently agreed that they would make him available for deposition.

April 1, 2007

Income Imputed to Husband Who Manipulated Corporate Expenses

In Yarinsky v Yarinsky --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 108475 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Courts have considerable discretion in fashioning a child support award; when assessing a parent's income from which to determine his or her child support obligation, a court should consider factors such as the parent's "gross (total) income as ... reported in the most recent federal income tax return", as well as additional income from sources other than employment and a parent's past income . Further, a court may impute income based upon a parent's prior employment experience and future earning capacity in light of his or her educational background. Notably, when a party's or an expert's account of his or her finances is not believable, a court is justified in finding an income higher than that claimed . Upon its review of the record the Appellate Division concluded that the Support Magistrate acted within his discretion in focusing on the 2003 federal tax returns of the parties and the husbands solely owned subchapter S corporation, as they were the most recent at the time of the hearing. Further, each item of income attributed to the husband for child support purposes--which totaled $189,547-- was supported in the record. It was clear that--in anticipation of an eventual full plenary hearing on child support--the husband made a number of financial decisions which effectively reduced the amount of the corporate nonemployment income received by him in 2003; the most glaring were his December 2003 decisions to purchase a new corporate vehicle for his personal use ($31,356) and to upgrade his office computer system ($15,070.16) thereby reducing the 2003 excess corporate profit--payable as income to him as sole shareholder of the corporation--by $46,426. Accordingly, it imputed $40,426 in additional 2003 income to the husband's share of the combined parental income.

Waiver of Referee Transcript Constitutes Waiver of Argument on Appeal

In Lee v Solimano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3290469 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the defendant, who asserted in the trial court that there was no need to submit to the court the transcript of the hearing conducted before the Special Referee, waived the argument that the court should not have confirmed the Special Referee's report without having before it a complete transcript of the underlying hearing.

Where Both Parties Failed to Submit Proof Proper to Award Each Party His Own Assets Without a Distributive Award

In Berliner v Berliner, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2964202 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court distributed the parties' property, awarded the wife basic child support in the sum of $663.37 per month, directed her to pay 85.64% of unreimbursed health care, educational, and child care expenses of the children and limited the former husband's contribution to such expenses to 14.36%, and incorporated a provision of an order dated October 28, 2004, which imposed a "SUNY 'cap' " on the former husband's contributions to college expenses. The Appellate Division found the former husband was properly precluded from introducing any evidence in support of his claims to equitable distribution in light of his refusal to comply with proper discovery demands. The sole evidence submitted by the former wife in support of her claim for equitable distribution was an appraisal report by the court-appointed appraiser which noted that the former husband started working at his law practice in 1980, seven years prior to the marriage in 1987 and determined that the value of the practice was $76,141 as of December 31, 2001, without determining its value as of the date of the marriage. Supreme Court found that since the plaintiff's law practice was commenced prior to the marriage, it constituted separate property. No evidence was submitted as to its appreciation, if any, during the marriage, and whether the former wife's direct or indirect efforts contributed to any appreciation. No evidence was submitted as to retirement investments or pensions. Under the circumstances of this case, where both parties were sophisticated in business affairs and held substantial assets, yet failed to submit proof in support of their claims, Supreme Court properly determined that it was equitable to award each party his or her own assets without fashioning a distributive award. Supreme Court concluded that the former husband's annual income was $73,791 based on the "Recomputed Normalized Income" set forth in the appraisal of the former husband's law practice, and the former wife's annual income was $440,000. The former wife did not call the appraiser as a witness at the trial. After the Supreme Court reached its determination as to child support in the order dated October 28, 2004, the former wife sought reargument based upon an affidavit of the appraiser stating that the former husband's average annual "Recomputed Normalized Income" of $73,791 set forth in the appraisal of the value of his law practice included only excess earnings and not the former husband's reasonable compensation for his services to the practice. The appraiser estimated that former husband's total average annual income amounted to $158,424. Supreme Court granted the former wife's motion for reargument but adhered to the original determination on the ground that the court did not misapprehend the trial evidence. The information provided in the appraiser's affidavit was not presented at the trial and no reasonable justification was offered for failing to do so. That determination was a provident exercise of discretion. However, Supreme Court improperly imposed a so-called "SUNY 'cap' " on the former husband's contribution to the children's college expenses, limiting his contribution to what it would be if the children attend public New York State colleges. There was no basis in this record for so doing, especially in view of the fact that the children attended private boarding secondary school.

Credit For Military Service is Separate Property

In DeLapp v DeLapp, 829 N.Y.S.2d 381(4th Dept.,2007) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should have granted that part of plaintiff's motion seeking to vacate and amend the Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO) to reflect that he was solely entitled to the increase in pension benefits attributable to his purchase of three additional years of credit for military service (see Retirement and Social Security Law 1000). Plaintiff's three years of military service preceded the marriage and the purchase of credit was made following the divorce. Thus, the increase in plaintiff's pension benefit attributable to that credit was plaintiff's separate property.

Parties Who Submit Incomplete Record Must Suffer Consequences on Appeal

In Cherry v Cherry, 824 N.Y.S.2d 701, 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 08357 (4th Dept.,2006) the defendant contended on appeal that Supreme Court erred in directing him to select a certain retirement benefit and that he did not agree to a retirement benefit that would provide for payments to plaintiff in the event that he predeceased her. Those contentions were not reviewable by the Appellate Court because defendant failed to include in the record on appeal the order that allegedly directed him to select that benefit, the motion papers seeking that relief, or any evidence concerning the parties' alleged agreement. Defendant, "as the appellant, submitted this appeal on an incomplete record and must suffer the consequences".

Error to Include Maintenance Award as Income in Computing Child Support. Award Reversed Where Unjust and Inappropriate

In Shapiro v Shapiro, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3628826 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the trial court erroneously included the maintenance award as income in computing the wife's basic child support obligation, and even with this correction, requiring the defendant to pay her pro rata share of the basic child support obligation, would be unjust and inappropriate under the circumstances of this case. Balancing the plaintiff's sole custody of the parties' children, as well as his superior financial position, against the lesser income and financial resources of the defendant who did not work for almost the entire length of the parties' 15-year marriage, an award of $25 per week to the plaintiff, instead of $585 a month, was "just and appropriate". Since it determined that the amount of child support presumptively due from the defendant under the statute is unjust and inappropriate, the defendant was not obligated to pay her pro rata share of the additional child support expenses listed in the judgment. The Court noted that certain of the parties' contentions had not been considered because they were improperly argued for the first time in the parties' respective reply briefs.

March 16, 2007

Dismissal of Appeal From Pendente Lite Order For Lack of Prosecution is Not Reviewable. DRL 253 (3) Complied with Where Husband Offers "Get" After "Heter"

In Seiger v Seiger, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 465656 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties both orthodox Jews, were married in 1972. They had two emancipated children. On December 4, 1995, the wife left the marital residence. In 1997, the husband obtained a "heter" from a rabbinical court, which allowed him to remarry without first giving the wife a "get" (see Sieger v. Union of Orthodox Rabbis of U.S. & Can., 1 A.D.3d 180, 767 N.Y.S.2d 78). On March 2, 1998, the husband commenced the action for a divorce. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the wife's contention, the judgment should not be reversed due to noncompliance with DRL 253(3), which provides that "[n]o final judgment of ... divorce shall ... be entered unless the plaintiff shall have filed and served a sworn statement: (l) that to the best of his or her knowledge, he or she has, prior to the entry of such final judgment, taken all steps solely within his or her power to remove all barriers to the defendant's remarriage following the ... divorce." The evidence revealed that the husband at various times after obtaining the "heter" was willing to give the wife a "get," or religious divorce, but that the wife refused to accept a "get" unless the husband disavowed statements he made concerning her in order to obtain the "heter." It was the wife's contention that the "heter" had the practical effect of preventing her remarriage even were she to receive a "get." The Appellate Division found that husband complied with DRL 253(3) inasmuch as he remained prepared to give his wife a religious divorce. The legislative intent of DRL 253(3) was principally to prevent the husband in the case of a Jewish divorce from using the denial of a "get" as a form of economic coercion in a civil divorce action. No such form of economic coercion was being exerted inasmuch as it was the wife who refused to accept a "get." Insofar as the wife claimed that the "heter" had the practical effect of preventing her remarriage, this court was without jurisdiction to consider this issue because to do so would require the court to review and interpret religious doctrine and resolve the parties' religious dispute, which the court is proscribed from doing under the First Amendment entanglement doctrine. Further, this court's jurisdiction to review the "heter" issue is specifically proscribed under DRL 253(9), which provides that "[n]othing in this section shall be construed to authorize any court to inquire into or determine any ecclesiastical or religious issue." The wife's contention that she was entitled to additional discovery and that the appraisals were tainted could have been raised on the wife's prior appeals from the orders of the same court 2004, denying her motions. Those appeals were dismissed for lack of prosecution. The dismissal of those appeals constituted an adjudication on the merits with respect to all issues which could have been raised, and the court declined to review those issues on this appeal.

Motion to Amend Divorce Judgment is Procedurally Improper Where Additional Relief Sought

In Claus v Claus, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 465656 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting the defendant's motion, made approximately 10 months after the entry of the judgment of divorce, to amend the judgment of divorce to award her credit for payments she made to reduce the principal balances of the first and second mortgages on the former marital residence. The defendant did not request that relief at the trial, nor was the issue litigated by the parties. The motion was also procedurally improper since amendment may only be used to correct a technical defect, mistake, or irregularity in a judgment or order and it may not be employed to affect a substantial right of a party. Since the motion sought an award of additional, discretionary relief the motion was improperly granted.

Change of Circumstances Standard Applies to Modification of Custody After a Bennett Determination

In Metcalf v Odums, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3802823 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Family Court awarded custody of the children to the respondent maternal grandmother based on a finding that extraordinary circumstances existed and that such arrangement was in the best interests of the children (see generally Matter of Bennett v. Jeffreys, 40 N.Y.2d 543). That order was affirmed. In a proceeding to modify that order the Appellate Division held that "[O]nce the preferred status of the birth parent under Bennett (40 N.Y.2d 543) has been lost by a judicial determination of extraordinary circumstances, the appropriate standard in addressing the possible modification of the prior order is whether there has been a change of circumstances requiring a modification of custody to ensure the best interests of the child" (Matter of Guinta v. Doxtator, 20 AD3d 47, 51)

Oral Motion Denies Notice and Opportunity to Be Heard. Contempt Requires Compliance with Judiciary Law

In Xand Corporation V Reliable Systems Alternatives Corporation 35 A.D.3d 849, 827 N.Y.S.2d 269 (2d Dept.,2006) an action to recover damages for fraud in the inducement, the Supreme Court granted the defendant's oral application to hold the plaintiff in contempt of court and to strike the complaint for its failure to comply with a prior court order. The Appellate Division reversed holding that defendant's oral application to hold the plaintiff in contempt of court did not satisfy the statutory requirements for a contempt application. Pursuant to Judiciary Law 756, a contempt application must be in writing, must be made upon at least 10 days notice, and must contain on its face the statutory warning that "failure to appear in court may result in ... immediate arrest and imprisonment for contempt of court" . Since the defendant's oral application failed to comply with any of these procedural safeguards, the Supreme Court erred when it punished the plaintiff for contempt for failing to comply with its prior order. Furthermore, under the circumstances of this case, defendant's oral application to strike the complaint based upon the plaintiff's failure to comply with court-ordered discovery should have been denied in the absence of notice and an opportunity to be heard.

Proper to Award Attorneys Fees For Appeal to Oppose Affirmative Defense Based on Antenuptial Agreement

In Ventimiglia v Ventimiglia, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 258481 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. The Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the plaintiff's motion pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 237 for an award of post-judgment attorneys' fees and disbursements to the extent of awarding her the sum of $185,000. In a matrimonial action, any award of attorneys' fees should be based, inter alia, on the relative financial circumstances of the parties, the relative merit of their positions, and the tactics of a party in unnecessarily prolonging the litigation. These considerations also apply to an award of attorneys' fees for appellate litigation as well as to post-judgment proceedings. Here, when considering the plaintiff's motion for attorneys' fees in connection with the defense of the appeal from the judgment and the amended judgment, the court correctly found that the attorneys' fees were incurred to enable the plaintiff to oppose the affirmative defense based on the antenuptial agreement rather than to rescind the antenuptial agreement, an action in which fees would not be available.

Provision Enforced that Reconciliation Would Not Invalidate Agreement Unless Written Document Executed

In Aiello v Aiello, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3445435 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties executed a separation agreement in 2000 which provided, inter alia, that all property "now owned by him or her ... or which may hereafter belong to" either party was free of any claim of the other, "with full power ... to dispose of the same ... as if he or she were unmarried" and that any reconciliation by the parties would not invalidate the agreement unless they executed a written document acknowledging their reconciliation and expressly indicating their intent to cancel it. In December 2001 the parties reconciled but did not acknowledge their reconciliation in writing. After their reconciliation ended an action for a divorce was commenced. The Appellate Division held Supreme Court not enforcing the agreement according to its terms.

March 1, 2007

Court of Appeals Holds Grandparent Visitation Law, DRL 72(1) is Constitutional

In the Matter of E.S. (Anonymous), v. P.D. (Anonymous), the Court of Appeals in an opinion by Judge Read held that section 72(1) of the Domestic Relations Law is constitutional in view of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Troxel v Granville (530 US 57 [2000]), both on its face and as applied. A.D.'s mother E.S. (grandmother), who lived in East Hampton, Long Island, was asked to move into the marital home in Huntington to care for her terminally ill daughter and the child. The Grandmother cleaned the house, shopped, cooked household meals and looked after the child when A.D.'s illness prevented her from doing so.

After A.D.'s death in March 1998, father invited the grandmother to stay on to help out with the then four-year-old child's care and household duties. They lived together amicably in the Huntington home for the ensuing three and one-half years. During that time, grandmother comforted, supported and cared for the motherless child. She got him ready for school, put him to bed, read with him, helped him with his homework, cooked his meals, laundered his clothes and drove him to school and to doctor's appointments and various activities, including gym class, karate class, bowling, soccer, Little League baseball and swimming class. She arranged and transported him to away-from-home or supervised at-home play dates; she took him to the public library and introduced him to the game of chess. By the fall of 2001, the relationship between grandmother and father had begun to sour. On February 24, 2002 the father demanded that grandmother move out of the home immediately. From April through December 2002, the father allowed sporadic visits, which were limited in length and tightly supervised, and occasional telephone calls. In January 2003, grandmother, who was 78 years old at the time, commenced the proceeding pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 72 and Family Court Act § 651 for an order granting reasonable visitation with the child, who was then nine years old. The Father opposed the grandmother's request, and cross-moved for an order prohibiting grandmother from any contact whatsoever with the child.

Supreme Court granted judgment to grandmother, and ordered visitation according to a detailed schedule. Supreme Court concluded that "[a]lthough mindful of [father]'s right to rear [the child] as he sees fit, and of his stated concern that [grandmother] undermines his parental authority, the Court finds that he has failed to present any credible evidence warranting either the termination of the relationship between [grandmother] and [the child] or the imposition of restrictions on the right of visitation. Instead, the evidence in the record establishes the existence of a very close, loving relationship between [grandmother] and [the child], and that [the child]'s best interest is served by granting [grandmother] regular, unfettered visitation." The Appellate Division affirmed Supreme Court's judgment, but modified certain terms of the visitation schedule in deference to father's wishes, relying on Troxel. The Appellate Division rejected the father's argument that Supreme Court abused its discretion in awarding visitation to grandmother.

The Court of Appeals affirmed. Judge Read noted that Section 72(1) derogates from the common-law rule that "grandparents [have] no standing to assert rights of visitation against a custodial parent". The statute "rests on the humanitarian concern that [v]isits with a grandparent are often a precious part of a child's experience and there are benefits which devolve upon the grandchild . . . which he cannot derive from any other relationship" (id. at 181 [internal quotation marks and citations omitted]). Section 72(1) "does not create an absolute or automatic right of visitation. Instead, the statute provides a procedural mechanism for grandparents to acquire standing to seek visitation with a minor grandchild". When grandparents seek visitation under section 72(1), the court must undertake a two-part inquiry. "First, [the court] must find standing based on death or equitable circumstances"; and "[i]f [the court] concludes that the grandparents have established the right to be heard, then it must determine if visitation is in the best interest of the grandchild" (Matter of Emanuel S., 78 NY2d at 181). She cautioned that the courts should not lightly intrude on the family relationship against a fit parent's wishes. The presumption that a fit parent's decisions are in the child's best interests is a strong one. And while the problems created by parent-grandparent antagonism cannot be ignored, an acrimonious relationship is generally not sufficient cause to deny visitation.

Here, the grandmother had automatic standing under section 72(1) on account of A.D.'s death. Record evidence supported the determination of the courts below that visitation between grandmother and the child is in the child's best interest. The Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's findings of fact, and the Court of Appeals could not revisit them. In light of these factual findings, there was no reason to disturb the best-interest determination in this case.

The Father contended that Domestic Relations Law § 72(1) was facially unconstitutional in light of Troxel. Judge Read noted that the Washington statute at issue in Troxel permitted "[a]ny person' to petition [the trial court] for visitation rights 'at any time,' and authorize[d] that court to grant such visitation rights whenever 'visitation may serve the best interest of the child'". The problem in Troxel was therefore not that the trial court intervened, but that it failed to employ "the traditional presumption that a fit parent will act in the best interest of his or her child" when it did. The trial court effectively applied a presumption in favor of grandparent visitation, placing on the parent "the burden of disproving that visitation would be in the best interest" of her children. Reasoning from Troxel, Judge Read court that section 72(1) was facially constitutional. Section 72(1) "can be, and has been, interpreted to accord deference to a parent's decision, although the statute itself does not specifically require such deference. Further, [section 72(1)] is drafted much more narrowly than the Washington statute [considered in Troxel]. If the United States Supreme Court did not declare the 'breathtakingly broad' Washington statute to be facially invalid, then certainly the more narrowly drafted New York statute is not unconstitutional on its face. In fact, the Court indicated that it would be hesitant to hold specific nonparental visitation statutes unconstitutional per se because 'much state-court adjudication in this context occurs on a case-by-case basis.' Troxel does not prohibit judicial intervention when a fit parent refuses visitation, but only requires that a court accord 'some special weight to the parent's own determination' when applying a nonparental visitation statute".(quoting Justice Altman in Matter of Hertz v Hertz, 291 AD2d 91).

The father also argued that section 72(1) was unconstitutionally applied in this case. The Court of Appeals disagreed. Unlike Troxel, the trial court here did not presuppose that grandparent visitation was warranted as the jumping-off point for fact-finding and best-interest analysis. Instead, the court, emphasizing that it was "mindful" of father's parental prerogatives, employed the strong presumption that the parent's wishes represent the child's best interests, as our statute requires. While this presumption creates a high hurdle, the grandmother in this case surmounted it: from the time the child was almost four until he was seven, the grandmother was his surrogate, live-in mother. The court then properly went on to consider all of the many circumstances bearing upon whether it was in the child's best interest for his relationship with grandmother to continue -- e.g., the reasonableness of father's objections to grandmother's access to the child, her caregiving skills and attitude toward father, the law guardian's assessment, the child's wishes -- before making a judgment granting visitation.

Family Court Does Not Have the Authority to Issue Orders of Protection For Children until They Reached the Age of 18

In Matter of Sheena D, --- N.E.2d ----, 2007 WL 445296 (N.Y.), 2007 N.Y. Slip Op. 01193 the Court of Appeals held that in an Article 10 proceeding Family Court does not have the authority to issue orders of protection in favor of a respondent-father's children until they reached the age of 18, where the fact-finding dispositional order incorporating the orders of protection has no expiration date. The Court held that a dispositional order that has no expiration date, such as the one here placing the children in the custody of the mother with no requirement of supervision, cannot be accompanied by an order of protection with no time limit. To read the statute otherwise would contradict the purpose of the 1989 amendment--to limit the length of orders of protection in child protective proceedings and to provide for periodic court review.

Law of the Case Bars Re-litigation of Same Issue

In Cellamare v Lakeman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 259871 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Family Court stated specifically in its order that child support arrears owing to the mother were to be set at zero. That order was never reversed. The mother nonetheless petitioned the Family Court for an award of child support arrears. The Family Court held that the mother's request for arrears was barred by the law of the case. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that an order violates the law of the case if it violates an order that is "conclusive on all Justices of coordinate jurisdiction". Indeed, "[i]t is fundamental that a Judge may not review or overrule an order of another Judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction in the same action or proceeding".

February 16, 2007

Equitable Estoppel Precludes Father From Challenging Filiation Order Where Child Relied on His Representations

In Matter of Gina L. v. David W., 34 A.D.3d 810, 826 N.Y.S.2d 338,(2d Dept.,2006) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly denied the putative father's motion to vacate the order of filiation. The putative father claimed that the order should be vacated, as a paternity test revealed that he was not the biological father of the subject child. The Court noted that the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be applied to preclude a parent from challenging an order of filiation. It is the child's best interests which are of paramount concern. It held that where a child justifiably relies on the representations of a man that he is his or her father with the result that the child will be harmed by the man's denial of paternity, the man may be estopped from asserting that denial (citing Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 N.Y.3d 320). Because the child is the party in whose favor estoppel was applied, the equities between the two adults were not involved here. The case turned exclusively on the best interests of the child and the court found that there can be no claim that the child was guilty of fraud or misrepresentation. The child's testimony, which was credited by the Family Court, demonstrated that she relied on the putative father's representations by accepting him as her father and treating him as such. The Family Court properly found that it would not be in her best interests to now allow the putative father to renounce paternity.

Childs Cell Phone Bill is Not An Educational and Recreational Expense

In Moss v Moss -- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 102495 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), 2007 N.Y. Slip Op. 00281 the Appellate Division held that in calculating the arrears due under the portion of the pendente lite order which required the husband to pay the carrying charges on the marital residence, it was error to include the cost of newspaper subscriptions, bottled water, heating filters, a new dishwasher, and long distance telephone calls. And, in calculating the arrears due under the portion of the pendente lite order which required the husband to pay for the children's educational and recreational expenses, it was error to include the cost of the children's cell phone bills.

Error as a Matter of Law to Make Custody Order Based on Controverted Allegations Without Full Hearing. Law Guardian to Be Replaced For Incompetence.

In Williams v Williams, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3798938 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), a custody proceeding, on the first day of the hearing, the father was the only witness to testify. When the proceedings were adjourned for that day, the parties were in the midst of his cross-examination by the mother's attorney and the Law Guardian had yet to cross-examine him. On the adjourned hearing date, the mother had traveling problems and was not present in court at its scheduled start time. Her attorney informed Family Court that a bridge closure delayed the mother's arrival and that she was expected to arrive within approximately 30 minutes. Family Court acknowledged that the mother had also contacted the court that morning about her problems but advised the parties that it intended to proceed in her absence. The father's attorney stated that the father had no further proof and the mother's attorney advised the court that she did not feel it was appropriate to proceed in her client's absence. The Law Guardian voiced no objection to this procedure and did not request an opportunity to cross-examine the father or have the court conduct a Lincoln hearing. He reported that he had no witnesses, that the children seemed to be progressing well in the father's care and the father's home seemed appropriate. The Law Guardian acknowledged that he had never been to the mother's home and that the children missed her terribly, thus warranting visitation. The case was then closed and Family Court awarded the father sole custody with visitation to the mother. The only evidence relied upon by the Court was the incomplete testimony of the father. The Appellate Division reversed on the law finding that Family Court erred in rendering a custody decision without a full hearing. It held that as a general rule, it is error as a matter of law to make an order respecting custody based on controverted allegations without a full hearing. The total preclusion of proof by the mother was improper because she had a verified and legitimate explanation for being delayed on the adjourned date and because such total preclusion "adversely affect[ed] the child[ren's] right to have issues affecting [their] best interest fully explored". Since the mother's attorney appeared on the adjourned date and explained her absence, Family Court's order was not entered on default. The evidence was far from uncontroverted. The mother raised issues of the father's fitness, including his alleged verbal and physical abuse, bad temper and sporadic employment history. In the absence of a complete examination of the father, any evidence from the mother and/or an in camera hearing with the children, Family Court "did not possess sufficient information to render an informed determination that was consistent with the child[ren's] best interests". The Appellate Division was troubled by Family Court's approach to the award of temporary and permanent custody and directed that the hearing on remittal should be before another judge. Equally troubling was the Law Guardian's acquiescence in the procedure and failure to conduct his own cross-examination of the father before rendering a recommendation advocating custody to him. The Law Guardian's analysis of the case was rendered without the benefit of a complete record and could not be fairly characterized as "thorough" or "considered". The Appellate Court held that this particular Law Guardian should not be assigned upon remittal.

Absence of New Retainer Agreement upon Substitution after Dissolution of Partnership Did Not Constitute Noncompliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.3 in Light of Ratification of Retainer Agreement

In Gross v Gross--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3803316 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff commenced an action for divorce through her former attorney, Kim Brennan Joyce, who, at that time, was a named partner a law firm which had since dissolved. After the action was submitted to the Supreme Court for an inquest a stipulation was incorporated but not merged into the judgment.. The plaintiff agreed, pursuant to the stipulation, that she was responsible for her own attorney's fees and that: "in the event any outstanding legal fees remain on [plaintiff's] behalf to Kim Brennan Joyce, Esq., same shall be satisfied from her proceeds from the sale of her one-half equity interest in the marital residence at the time of closing. In the event there is a dispute as to any counsel fees outstanding, an amount sufficient to satisfy Kim Brennan Joyce, Esq.'s final bill shall be held by her in escrow pending a resolution of same ". In accordance with the stipulation at the closing on the sale of the marital residence, the parties' attorneys executed an agreement pursuant to which each attorney held in escrow the sum of $140,713.05, representing 50% of the net proceeds of the sale of the marital residence, "without disbursement until further agreement of the parties or order of the court directing same ". Joyce moved to be relieved as counsel for the plaintiff, and to retain the sum of $53,191.61 in escrow subject to determination of the fee dispute committee or further court order. Joyce submitted her own affirmation in which she averred that she had sent the plaintiff bills for services rendered in the requisite time-frames under the rules governing matrimonial actions and that the plaintiff never disputed those bills, but rather, repeatedly assured Joyce that the bills would be paid from the proceeds of the action. Joyce further averred that the closing proceeds were held in escrow "due to failure of the parties to agree on the disbursement of proceeds." The court granted the motion to the extent of permitting Joyce to retain the sum of $53,191.61 in her escrow account subject to a determination by the fee dispute committee, and directing her to release the remaining sum held in escrow to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Supreme Court properly determined that Joyce complied with the requirements of 22 NYCRR 1400.3 and 1400.5, It found that the plaintiff and the partnership entered into a retainer agreement, which was executed by the plaintiff and Joyce, on behalf of the partnership. Under the circumstances of this case, the absence of the execution and filing of a new retainer agreement upon her substitution as the attorney-of-record after the dissolution of the partnership did not constitute noncompliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.3 . The retainer agreement fully complied with the requirements of 22 NYCRR 1400.3. Joyce executed it for the partnership and made appearances for the plaintiff. The Appellate Division held that the plaintiff thereby ratified both Joyce's representation of her after the substitution and that the terms of the original retainer agreement were binding on them.

February 1, 2007

Court May Act Reasonably To Protect Child From Direct Access in Litigation.

In A.C. v D. R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2007 WL 64088 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which enjoined defendant from attending her child's medical appointments, enjoined defendant from taking the child to consult with an attorney regarding custody issues, and enjoined the parties from discussing court proceedings or the current custody schedule with child. A prior order emphasized the court's concern that defendant continued to undermine plaintiff father's medical decision-making authority. It held that the court was not required to hold a hearing before imposing the injunctive sanctions in light of its already extensive experience with the case. It was clear, from the long and contentious history of this case, that the trial court acted reasonably to protect the child from direct involvement in the litigation.

New Trial Granted on Issues of Maintenance And Child Support Where Husband Had Heart Attack After the Decision

In Opperisano v Opperisano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3734238 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $65 per week for five years, granted the plaintiff a right of first refusal on the sale of the marital home at the valuation appraised as of August 29, 2003, awarded the plaintiff $2,860 in maintenance arrears, $13,395.23 in expenses on the marital home, and $7,344 in child support arrears and directed that the defendant pay the plaintiff one half of her credit card debt of $24,000 and denied the defendant's motion for a new trial. The Appellate Division reversed the judgment insofar as appealed from, on the law, and granted the defendant's motion pursuant to CPLR 4404(b) for a new trial and the matter is remitted to the Supreme Court, Queens County, for a new trial and thereafter for a new determination consistent herewith. It held that a court may modify a prior order or judgment of child support or maintenance payments upon a showing of "a substantial change in circumstance. In his affidavit and supporting papers filed on his motion, in effect, for a new trial, the husband made a prima facie showing that, after the first trial, he had been forced to retire and had been put on disability because of a heart attack and continuing heart disease and, consequently, had suffered a significant loss of income. This was sufficient to warrant a new trial and a new determination on the issues of maintenance and child support. The Court also held that the Supreme Court also improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the wife arrears in expenses of the marital home of $13,395.23. No hearing was ever held to determine whether the husband owed arrears in expenses and, if so, how much he owed. Accordingly, this issue, too, must be determined after the new trial. Likewise, a hearing was required to determine whether the wife's credit card debt constituted marital debt. "It is well settled that expenses incurred after the commencement of a matrimonial action are the responsibility of the party who incurred them". The action was commenced in October 2002, yet a credit card bill dated October 1, 2003, was the only documentary evidence submitted in support of the wife's allegation that the debt represented the consolidation of marital debts. Therefore, absent a hearing, it was error to direct that the husband was responsible for one half of that debt. Lastly, the court improvidently exercised its discretion in granting the wife a right of first refusal in purchasing the husband's interest in the marital home, based on the value of the home as appraised two years earlier. In order to avoid the injustice to one spouse which could result from the appreciation in the valuation of the residence since the two-year-old appraisal relied on by the court, the marital home should either be sold at its fair market value at the time the sale is actually made or, if the wife chooses to buy out the husband's interest, the value of his interest should be determined based on a new appraisal to be conducted at the time of the new trial.

Hearsay Admissible In Custody Case Involving allegations of Abuse or Neglect

In Bernton v Mattioli, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3436062 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) petitioner applied for modification of the custody arrangement based on allegations that, among other things, respondent had used the child as a decoy while shoplifting. Family Court agreed and awarded sole custody of the child to petitioner. On appeal respondent argued that Family Court improperly permitted petitioner and others to testify regarding hearsay statements made by the child. The Appellate disagreed. It held that it applies the hearsay exception in Family Ct Act § 1046(a)(vi) in custody proceedings involving allegations of abuse or neglect of a child. While such statements must be corroborated by other evidence, Family Court has considerable discretion in determining whether the corroboration is sufficient. Here, the child's various statements of having been used to aid respondent's shoplifting were properly admitted, as they would support a finding of neglect. Although the child repeatedly refused to discuss respondent's conduct during the in camera interview, her reported statements were corroborated by other evidence, including an item of clothing that appeared consistent with the claim that security tags had been cut off by respondent and the child's atypical familiarity with shoplifting techniques and store security measures. Respondent inconsistently testified as to her shoplifting activities, both denying and then admitting a history of petit larceny. Thus, Family Court did not abuse its discretion in accepting the hearsay evidence and then basing its findings as to a change of circumstances and the best interests of the child upon that evidence.

No Appeal To Appellate Division From Family Court Criminal Contempt

In Kelly v Kelly, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3438605 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division dismissed an appeal from an order of the Family Court which found the respondent in this support proceeding guilty of criminal contempt. It held that where, as here, the purported contempt was committed within the immediate view and presence of the court and was punished summarily review must be had under CPLR article 78 and not by way of direct appeal. Moreover, because the matter involved a Family Court Judge, the Appellate Division is without original jurisdiction to entertain it as a CPLR article 78 proceeding. Editors Note: The Article 78 proceeding must be brought in the Supreme Court.

Proper to Refuse to Allow Witness to Be Called Where no Relevant Testimony to Offer

In Bennett v McGorry, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3334995 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) plaintiff sought, inter alia, an order directing defendant to contribute to the college expenses of the parties' eldest daughter pursuant to the terms of the agreement. The Appellate Division held that the court properly exercised its discretion in refusing to permit the parties to call their eldest daughter as a witness, inasmuch as the daughter had no relevant testimony to offer on the matters at issue. (Citing, alia, Prince, Richardson on Evidence § 4-102 [Farrell 11th ed]).

Denial of Fundamental Right to Be Heard Warrants Reversal of Order

In Beverly B v Rossannh B, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3314617 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which granted petitioner visitation with her granddaughter once every three months in Florida for two hours in a public place, and the matter was remanded for further proceedings before another referee. Petitioner commenced a special proceeding, pro se, pursuant to DRL 72, seeking visitation with the daughter of petitioner's incarcerated son. The Appellate Division noted that although there were numerous relevant factual disputes in the action, the Referee heard no formal testimony and received no documentary evidence. The mother's attorney, who lacked personal knowledge, made allegations regarding the safety of petitioner's residence and the adequacy of her supervision of the child, but petitioner was not allowed to testify or offer any other evidence to rebut, or even the opportunity to confront and cross-examine any adverse witnesses. The record was replete with instances in which the Referee refused to let petitioner speak, talked over her, and reprimanded her for trying to present her position. The court held that every party to a proceeding has a fundamental right to be heard. Since the fundamental right to be heard was not afforded petitioner, the order was vacated.

January 16, 2007

Court Has Right to Limit Speech with Children Upon Balance Competing Factors

In Matter of Powell v Blumenthal--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3632115 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order that prohibited the father from discussing any issues pertaining to his religion or philosophy with the children. It held that "Upon a balancing of the competing interests, the Family Court providently exercised its discretion in restricting the father from discussing any issues pertaining to his religion or philosophy with the subject children, particularly where the Law Guardian supported that restriction (citing Stephanie L. Benjamin L., 158 Misc.2d 665, 667).

Improper Delegation of Authority to Child's Treating Clinician to Determine Visitation.

In Matter of Held v Gomez,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3633419, 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 09467 (NYAD 2 Dept) the Family Court granted the husband's petition for sole custody of the parties' minor child and awarded the wife supervised bi-weekly visitation, to be continued unless and until recommended otherwise by the child's treating clinician. The Appellate Division modified the order by deleting the words "which shall continue unless and until recommended otherwise by the child's treating clinician (i.e., therapist)." The paragraph of the order constituted an improper delegation of authority by the Family Court to the child's treating clinician to determine future issues involving visitation.

No Credit For Voluntary Payments of Child Support

In Zhang v Kwok, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3525356, 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 09242 (NYAD 2 Dept) the Appellate Division held that voluntary payments for the benefit of the parties' child and not pursuant to a court order may not be credited against the amounts due pursuant to the judgment of divorce (citing Horne v. Horne, 22 N.Y.2d 219, 224, 292 N.Y.S.2d 411, 239 N.E.2d 348).

Last Word to One Parent is Antithetical to Concept of Joint Custody

In Williams v Boger, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2971838 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Family Court awarded the parties joint legal custody, with primary physical custody to petitioner and visitation to respondent. The order provided that "the parties are to consult one another on matters involving the health and education of their child and, in the event that they are unable to come to a joint decision, [petitioner] is to prevail." Although not raised by respondent on appeal the Appellate Division was troubled by this provision and modified the order on the law to strike it from the order. It held that: "Such a directive is, in our view, antithetical to the concept of joint legal custody. Moreover, given the parties' history of cooperation, there simply is no basis upon which to award petitioner superior decision-making authority on such matters. Accordingly, that portion of Family Court's order cannot stand."

Default Divorce Judgment Against Wife Upheld Even though She Had Drug Problem

In Wexler v Wexler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3231947 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) during the child custody portion of the trial, the wife failed to appear on time for court proceedings on four separate dates and both she and her counsel failed to appear for continued proceedings on December 20, 2002. On that day, the court granted the husband's motion for sole custody of the parties' two unemancipated children on the wife's default. On January 21, 2003, the court granted the wife's motion to vacate the default and warned her that it would not vacate any subsequent default. The wife then arrived late to court proceedings during child custody phase of the trial on January 24, 2003, February 3, 2003, and March 13, 2003. During the equitable distribution portion of the trial, the wife failed to appear for the court proceeding on April 8, 2003. She appeared late to the proceeding on April 10, 2003. On May 1, 2003, the wife again failed to appear for the scheduled court proceeding and the court granted the husband's application to hold the wife in default, striking her testimony. The court denied her subsequent motion to vacate her default. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that although the judgment was entered upon the wife's default, appellate review of the denial of the wife's motion to vacate her default is not precluded since the appeal from the judgment brings up for review all matters that were the subject of contest before the Supreme Court. Although as a general rule in matrimonial cases the courts have adopted a liberal policy of vacating defaults, it is still incumbent upon the moving party to show a reasonable excuse for the default and the existence of a meritorious claim. While the wife appeared to be in need of in-patient drug treatment for a serious substance abuse problem on the basis of the overall record, her dereliction with regard to court appearances and obligations was so extensive that the court did not err in finding her in default during the equitable distribution portion of the trial and in later refusing to vacate the default. In awarding maintenance, the Supreme Court properly considered the wife's age and apparent drug addiction, the duration of the marriage, and the wife's lack of employment since before the marriage in finding that she was unlikely to become self-supporting. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the sum of $650 per week in nondurational maintenance.

Unsubstantiated Conclusory allegations Insufficient to raise triable issue of fraud, duress, overreaching, or unconscionability

In Rubin v. Rubin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3086360 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the defendant demonstrated his prima facie entitlement to summary judgment dismissing the wife's cause of action for rescission of the parties' "stipulation and settlement agreement," by submitting, inter alia, the agreement, which contained an express representation stating that it was not a product of fraud or duress and awarded the plaintiff generous maintenance and equitable distribution, based on the financial information made available to the plaintiff's independent accountant and legal counsel, who negotiated on the plaintiff's behalf over the course of several months. The plaintiff's evidence submitted in opposition was deficient, being devoid of specificity with respect to the defendant's alleged acts of fraud. The plaintiff submitted statements made by mental health professionals who treated her after the agreement was executed and who failed to establish that she experienced any incapacitating mental impairment at the time of execution of the agreement. She did not submit an affidavit from her former attorney or financial experts, indicating that the defendant failed to comply with demands for financial disclosure or that the defendant or his agents made any actual misrepresentations to them. The plaintiff offered the redacted portions of an unsworn memo of her former attorney dated the same date as the notarization of the plaintiff's execution of the agreement, but written four days prior to the defendant's execution of the agreement, itemizing certain alleged misrepresentations of the defendant and indicating the attorney's belief that the defendant was untrustworthy. This memo negated any potential factual issue since it unequivocally demonstrated that neither the plaintiff nor her former attorney relied on the representations made by the defendant in entering into the agreement. The memo also showed that the plaintiff could have revoked her acceptance of the agreement prior to its execution by the defendant. The plaintiff submitted the affidavit of a realtor to establish that the former marital residence was grossly undervalued, opining that when the property was appraised it was worth between $26,100,000 and $35,000,000 instead of $15,000,000, as set forth in the agreement. That affidavit consisted of a one-page estimate of the market value of the property and contained no information as to the methodology utilized in arriving at the appraised value. Even if the valuation was accurate, the plaintiff failed to allege that the true value was known by the defendant. The agreement stated that both parties had a right to appraise the property but both parties waived such right. The plaintiff failed to demonstrate how she was impeded from doing her own appraisal of the marital residence prior to entering into the agreement in question, and ignored the defendant's assertion, making it un rebutted, that the valuation figure agreed to by the parties was selected by the plaintiff and thereafter accepted by the defendant.

January 1, 2007

Agreement Set Aside Based upon Interrelated Nature of Economic Issues Addressed and Those Not Adequately Addressed

In Yoell-Mirel v Mirel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3437558 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division set aside the provisions of the parties' separation agreement relating to economic issues. The agreement was apparently drafted by the wife and signed by the parties without legal counsel. Supreme Court entered a judgment incorporating the terms of the agreement which related to economic issues, except for a provision concerning the marital home, which the Supreme Court determined denied the husband his interest in a significant marital asset without countervailing benefit. Supreme Court re-wrote that provision to provide the wife with a more limited interest in the marital home, and incorporated the re-written provision into the judgment. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in re-writing rather than setting aside the provision of the agreement concerning the marital home. It also held that Supreme Court erred in entering a judgment incorporating the provision of the agreement concerning child support since it neither complied with nor validly opted-out of the relevant statutory guidelines, and erred in incorporating the remaining portions of the agreement which related to economic issues and dismissing all other claims for relief as the agreement neither waived nor adequately addressed various significant economic issues. The court held that given the interrelated nature of the economic issues addressed by the provisions of the agreement and those not adequately addressed by the agreement, the whole of the agreement as it related to economic issues should have been set aside.

Complaint to Set Aside Agreement Dismissed. No Obligation to Disclose Value or Future Sale of Asset

In Kojovic v Goldman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2975759 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the parties were married in 1998 and divorced in 2004. There were no children. The husband was the chief executive officer of and a minority shareholder (7-8%) in a closely held corporation, Capital IQ, Inc. In her complaint the wife alleged that in May 2004 the husband commenced a divorce action in Dutchess County and she commenced her own action for divorce in New York County. The parties exchanged financial information including lists of assets and statements of net worth. The husband included in his disclosures his minority interest in Capital IQ. They affirmatively decided not to conduct further discovery. On August 5, 2004 they settled all issues incident to the divorce pursuant to a comprehensive settlement agreement that they negotiated with the assistance of their attorneys. Pursuant to the settlement, the wife received $1.15 million in cash, rehabilitative spousal support of $350,000 payable over four years, which she continued to receive, and certain other considerations. The husband retained his minority shareholder interest in Capital IQ. In addition to waiving an appraisal and valuation of the husband's minority interest in Capital IQ and the taking of his deposition, the wife stipulated in the agreement as follows: "Each party has made inquiry into the financial circumstances of the other and is sufficiently informed of the income, assets, and financial condition of the other.... The parties further acknowledge that the Husband has provided the Wife with additional information concerning his business interests, which information she has had independently reviewed by an accountant. The Wife acknowledges that she has the right of further inquiry including the taking of depositions and a forensic evaluation of the value of the Husband's shares of his business, Capital IQ, Inc., and knowingly waives the same." On September 8, 2004, slightly more than one month after execution of the settlement agreement, Standard & Poor's entered into an agreement to acquire Capital IQ, which included the husband's 7-8% minority interest. Nine days later, S & P purchased Capital IQ for approximately $225 million, of which the husband received $18 million. The wife thereafter commenced an action for fraud, reformation, breach of contract and rescission of the settlement agreement, claiming that it was procured through fraud based on her husband's affirmative misrepresentations as to the non-liquidity of his Capital IQ shares. She asserted an obligation on the husband's part to have disclosed to her the value and potential sale of Capital IQ. She also contended that he knew of the imminent sale of Capital IQ at the time of the settlement, but concealed this information from her. The husband moved pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(1) to dismiss. Supreme Court denied the motion, finding that the wife alleged an affirmative misrepresentation, upon the discovery of which she promptly brought this action. The Appellate Division reversed holding that the action was barred by precedents from it and other courts. It relied upon its decision in DiSalvo v. Graff (227 A.D.2d 298 [1996]), where it held that a party may not challenge the validity of a settlement agreement based on a claim that she undervalued assets which, the record showed, were disclosed by her former spouse and known to her at the time. In DiSalvo, where the allegations were substantially similar to those here, the motion court found the former wife was aware, at the time of the settlement of the divorce action, that her husband was the founder and 50% shareholder of a privately held company. Under the terms of the settlement agreement, the wife in DiSalvo kept the couple's valuable shares of a publicly traded company while the husband retained his 50% interest in the closely held company. Six months later, the husband's company "went public" and his interest became worth millions of dollars. The wife commenced a fraud and rescission action to set aside the settlement agreement, claiming that the husband was aware of the privately held company's value at the time the settlement agreement was executed "and that it would 'go public' six months after the execution of the agreement"

(N.Y.L.J, Aug. 4, 1995, at 22, col 5). The Appellate Division held that Plaintiff's claim was analogous. The DiSalvo motion court made no distinction between withholding information about valuation and withholding information that a sale is imminent. The plaintiff there alleged that her former husband had been aware of the company's value at the time of the settlement, and that it would "go public" six months later. Whether characterized as an issue of valuation or imminent sale, the court found the claim insufficient. Nor was there any difference, as the wife contended, between the allegation in DiSalvo that the husband knew the company would go public and the claim here that the husband knew a sale of Capital IQ was imminent. It was uncontroverted that the wife, highly educated and intelligent, with professional experience as a securities analyst, counseled by experienced matrimonial attorneys and an accountant she had retained to conduct an independent review, determined that she required no further information about Capital IQ. Moreover, by her own admission, the wife resisted her husband's first attempt at a quick divorce, which showed that she was under less pressure to rush to settlement than was the wife in DiSalvo. Thus, there was no basis, factually or legally, to distinguish DiSalvo from the instant case. The wife had only herself to blame for her failure to inquire further. Such failure is not, however, a basis upon which to vacate the settlement.

Under UIFSA New Support Order in New York is Not a Modification of Expired Connecticut Support Order

In Matter of Spencer v Spencer, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3627139 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the parties, who divorced in 1995, had three children, Kipp (born in 1986), Tyler (born in 1988), and Kelly (born in 1992). Pursuant to a judgment entered in Connecticut, the Superior Court of Connecticut granted petitioner physical custody of the children and directed respondent to pay child support of $750 per week, $250 per child, until the children reached 18 years of age. Petitioner and the children moved to New York, and Respondent continued to reside in Connecticut. After Kipp reached age 18, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking a new order of support, arguing that the Connecticut judgment had expired with respect to Kipp. A Support Magistrate granted the petition and ordered respondent to pay child support for Kipp in the amount of $350 per week, as well as 75% of unreimbursed medical expenses and college expenses, and awarded petitioner counsel fees. Family Court denied respondent's objections. The Appellate Division affirmed rejecting Respondent's argument that Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to grant a new support order for Kipp under the Federal Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act (28 USC 1738B) and the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (Family Ct Act 580-101 et seq. Respondent characterized Family Court's support award as modifying the duration of the prior Connecticut judgment directing child support payments only until Kipp reached age 18, and asserted that New York courts lack the power to make any such modification because the requirements of FFCCSOA and UIFSA were not met. The Appellate Division found that Family Court did not modify the Connecticut judgment. Rather, the court recognized that modification is possible only during the life of an order and, because the Connecticut judgment had expired when Kipp reached age 18, there was no existing order to modify. It defined "modification" as "a change in a child support order that affects the amount, scope, or duration of the order and modifies, replaces, supersedes, or otherwise is made subsequent to the child support order". Because the Connecticut judgment had expired and Family Court had personal jurisdiction over respondent, Family Court had the authority to issue a new child support order for Kipp and to award counsel fees in connection with this proceeding.

December 16, 2006

Despite Public Policy First Department Allows Recoupment of Overpayments of Child Support Against "Add-ons"

In Coull v Rottman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3513071 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), a modification proceeding in which the court reduced the amount of child support retroactive to the date of the application in 2003, the Appellate Division found that after applying his credits the father had overpaid child support by $15,483.71. On appeal he argued that he should be allowed to reduce his basic child support payment by $500 per month until this overpayment is recouped. The Appellate Division held that public policy forbids this (citing Matter of Maksimydass v. Maksimydass, 275 A.D.2d 459, 461 [2000]; Baraby v. Baraby, 250 A.D.2d 201, 205-206 [1998]). However, it held that, public policy did not forbid offsetting add-on expenses against an overpayment, and that he was entitled to a credit of $15,483.71 against future add-on expenses.

No Appeal From Family Court Order Without Objections

In Holliday v Holliday, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3525313 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that no appeal lies from an order of a Support Magistrate where the appellant has not submitted objections to the order to a Family Court Judge.

Professional Reports Are Hearsay and Not Admissible Without Consent of the Parties

In Berrouet v Greaves, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3525378 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division noted that Trial courts are accorded wide discretion in making evidentiary rulings and that the Family Court is governed specifically by Family Court Act 1046(b)(iii), which states that "[i]n a fact-finding hearing ... except as otherwise provided by this article, only competent, material and relevant evidence may be admitted." The court went on to state that "Professional reports constitute hearsay, and therefore are not admissible without the consent of the parties.” (see Kessler v. Kessler, 10 N.Y.2d 445; Matter of Khan v. Dolly, 6 AD3d 437, 439; Wilson v. Wilson, 226 A.D.2d 711).”

Agreement Which is Not Fair and Reasonable When Entered Into and Unconscionable Set Aside

In Yoell-Mirel v Mirel, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3437558 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff-wife commenced an action for divorce and sought to incorporate the provisions of a 2003, separation agreement into the judgment. The agreement was apparently drafted by the wife and signed by the parties without legal counsel. The husband argued, inter alia, that the portions of the agreement which related to economic issues were not fair and reasonable when entered into, and that it would be unconscionable to incorporate those portions of the agreement into the judgment. He asserted, the agreement neither waived nor adequately addressed various significant economic issues. After a hearing, the Supreme Court granted the wife a divorce, and entered a judgment incorporating the terms of the agreement which related to economic issues, except for a provision concerning the marital home, which it determined denied the husband his interest in a significant marital asset without countervailing benefit. Supreme Court re-wrote that provision to provide the wife with a more limited interest in the marital home, and incorporated the re-written provision into the judgment. The Supreme Court denied "all other claims for relief." The Appellate Division reversed so much of the judgment as incorporated the terms of the agreement which related to economic issues, as re-written, and denied all other claims for relief. It held that Supreme Court erred in re-writing rather than setting aside the provision of the agreement concerning the marital home. It stated: “ This is not to say, however, that the Supreme Court's resolution of the issue would not be appropriate under the Domestic Relations Law and the principles of equitable distribution. It also held that Supreme Court erred in entering a judgment incorporating the provision of the agreement concerning child support which neither complied with nor validly opted-out of the relevant statutory guidelines, and erred in incorporating the remaining portions of the agreement which related to economic issues and dismissing all other claims for relief. The agreement neither waived nor adequately addressed various significant economic issues. Given the interrelated nature of the economic issues addressed by the provisions of the agreement and those not adequately addressed by the agreement, the whole of the agreement as it related to economic issues should have been set aside. It remitted to the Supreme Court “ for a determination of the economic issues in accordance with the Domestic Relations Law and the principles of equitable distribution after the completion of discovery.”

In Fixing Child Support, in Paternity Proceeding Support Magistrate Should Consider Husbands Obligations to his Wife.

In Gina P., v Stephen S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2884315 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), a paternity and support proceeding, the Family Court adopted the findings of a Support Magistrate, who concluded that the father's annual income was $400,000 and that the mother's was $100,000. The Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate made a number of errors in concluding that Mr. S.'s yearly income was $400,000. The Magistrate improperly added to Mr. S.'s income $14,750 reported on Mr. S.'s 2002 tax return which was a repayment of a loan that Mr. S. made to Cape Classics Inc., a nonrecurring payment. Nonrecurring payments should be considered in calculating support obligations. In addition, certain Treasury bills reported on Mr. S.'s tax return belonged to Mrs. S. and the Magistrate should not have included the $38,898 in interest from them to Mr. S. (Citing Matter of Weber v. Coffey, 230 A.D.2d 865 [1996] [error to impute the income of a spouse, not a parent to the child, in determining support obligation]). Finally, the Support Magistrate should have considered both Mr. S.'s obligations to his wife, Mrs. S. (Citing see Family Court Act 412, 413[1][f][10]; Matter of Clovsky v. Henry J., 238 A.D.2d 670, 671- 672 [1997], lv dismissed 91 N.Y.2d 911 [1998] [spousal support is a factor to consider in determining child support obligation]; Commissioner of Social Servs. v. Ayala, 177 A.D.2d 403, 405 [1991] [same]; Matter of Steuben County Dept. of Social Servs. v James, 171 A.D.2d 1023 [1991] [same]), and the tax consequences to Mr. S. The Support Magistrate failed to articulate, as required by the Child Support Standards Act (CSSA), why it deemed 10% of the combined parental income exceeding $80,000 to be an appropriate award. If the court determines not to apply the statutory percentage to the parties' income exceeding $80,000, then it is required to articulate the basis for its deviation. In cases such as this one, where a combined parental income is well in excess of $80,000, it is proper to consider and base the award upon the child's 'actual reasonable needs'. While the Magistrate stated that she had taken the child's needs into consideration when setting the parents' support obligation at 10% of $320,000, she failed to lay out the basis of this conclusion. Further, a review of the record showed that based upon the payments which were documented (including those for the child's classes, clothes, books, toys, home entertainment, laundry, furniture, and expenses for birthday parties), the award of $3706.67 a month was much too high. The child care award of $425 per week for a 45-hour week, was inappropriate given Ms. P's testimony that she worked 25 to 30 hours per week out of her apartment. Family Court Act 413(1)(c)(4) provides for the non-custodial parent to pay his or her proportionate share of the child care expenses incurred by the custodial parent's work schedule. Thus, Mr. S. should be responsible for his share of child care for the time that Ms. P. is working. The Appellate Division noted that the Support Magistrate, when directing that Mr. S. obtain a $1,000,000 life insurance policy in favor of his daughter, relied upon Family Court Act 416(b) without further exposition. Article Four of the Family Court Act governs child support for the issue of married couples, while Article Five governs support for children born out of wedlock. Family Court Act 513 refers to 413, but it does not reference Family Court Act 416(b), which allows the court to order the non-custodial parent to obtain life insurance for the benefit of the child. The question of the constitutionality of the apparent disparity between children born in and out of wedlock was raised on appeal in defense of the Support Magistrate's ruling. As there was no proof of service on, or notice to the attorney general pursuant to CPLR 1012[b][1] of a challenge to the constitutionality of Family Court Act 513 the issue was not properly before it.

December 1, 2006

No Counsel Fee Award Without New Retainer For Post Judgment Services

In Sherman v Sherman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3377483 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the former wife's motion for an attorney fee for post judgment services. It held that absent substantial compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.3, which requires the execution and filing of a retainer agreement setting forth, inter alia, the terms of compensation and the nature of services to be rendered, an attorney may not recover a fee from an adversary spouse. By its own terms the retainer agreement between the wife and her attorney terminated upon entry of the judgment of divorce. The filing of a new retainer agreement in support of the subsequent motion for a post judgment attorney's fee, which purportedly ratified the former agreement, did not amount to substantial compliance with the matrimonial rules.

Family Court Lacks Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Set Aside Child Support Agreement Incorporated in Divorce Judgment

In Savini v Burgaleta, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 3378238 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties 1996 stipulation, was incorporated in and survived their judgment of divorce, and provided, that the father would "pay to the [mother] as and for child support 29 percent of his gross salary as defined under the Child Support Standards Act on a weekly basis calculated on actual income." In a later agreement dated April 1997, which was not incorporated into the judgment, the mother allegedly agreed, to accept the sum of $200 per week from the father as child support and not to commence any proceeding to recover the difference between that amount and the percentage of gross salary specified in the prior stipulation. In 2004, the mother commenced a family court proceeding to enforce the child support provisions. The father moved in Supreme Court to have the petition transferred to it and to have it dismissed based on the terms April 1997 agreement. Supreme Court determined that the April 19, 1997, agreement was not a valid modification agreement because it failed to comply with the provisions of DRL 240(1-b)(h) and denied the motion to transfer. Subsequently, the Support Magistrate, sua sponte, determined that "the prior Judgment of Divorce and the stipulations did not comply with the Child Support Standards Act" and considered the issue of child support de novo. The Appellate Division held that Family Court was without subject matter jurisdiction, in effect, to vacate as illegal so much of the judgment of divorce as directed the father to pay child support and, thereafter, to determine the issue of child support de novo. Family court is a court of limited jurisdiction. New York Constitution, article 6, §13(c) provides that the Family Court is vested with limited jurisdiction "to determine, with the same powers possessed by the [S]upreme [C]ourt, the following matters when referred to the [F]amily [C]ourt from the [S]upreme [C]ourt: ... in actions and proceedings for ... divorce, ... applications to fix temporary or permanent support ... or applications to enforce judgments and orders of support". Nowhere in the Constitution, in the Family Court Act, or in the judgment of divorce itself, is the Family Court empowered, in effect, to invalidate a stipulation incorporated into the judgment of divorce entered by the Supreme Court. Had either party questioned the legality of the stipulation, the issue should have been determined by the Supreme Court, which had issued the judgment in which the stipulation was incorporated.

Marital Assets Awarded Wife in Pre-Petition Divorce Action Where Judgment Not Entered are Assets of Bankrupt Estate

In Musso v Ostashko, --- F.3d ----, 2006 WL 3190285 (C.A.2 (N.Y.)) the Chapter 7 trustee filed an adversary complaint, seeking to avoid the debtor's former wife's interest in marital property and to have the property turned over to him. The former wife filed a counterclaim, asserting that the property was not property of the debtor's bankruptcy estate. The Bankruptcy Court denied the former wife's motion for summary judgment. The District Court, 333 B.R. 625, reversed and directed the bankruptcy court to enter judgment in favor of former wife. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. It held that under New York law, the marital assets in question, which were awarded to the debtor's wife in a pre-petition state-court matrimonial proceeding whose judgment was not docketed until after the filing of debtor's bankruptcy petition, were the property of debtor's bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court had ruled that, in New York, an equitable right to marital property does not arise until entry of the judgment awarding equitable distribution and, thus, the property must be included in the estate. On appeal, the district court reversed, finding that the entry of the state court judgment is "ministerial" and, thus, the rights of the wife, Tanya Ostashko, vested upon rendering of the state court's "Decision After Inquest." The Court of Appeals, in vacating the decision of the district court held that:" Four relevant premises require this result. First, under New York law an equitable distribution award is a remedy, and the enforcement of that remedy is no different than the enforcement of any other judgment. Second, New York adheres to the bright line rule that the priority of judgment creditors is determined on the basis of the order in which judgments are docketed or executed. Third, 11 U.S.C. 544-the so-called "strong arm" provision of the Bankruptcy Code-gives the bankruptcy trustee the rights of a hypothetical perfected judgment lien creditor as of the petition date. Finally, while the Decision After Inquest determined the rights to the marital assets as between husband and wife, the decision did not purport to determine the rights to the assets as between Tanya Ostashko and all other judgment lien creditors. Based upon these considerations, and the undisputed fact that the matrimonial judgment was docketed after the filing of the Chapter 7 petition, we hold that the marital assets are part of the bankruptcy estate and subject to distribution in due course by the bankruptcy court.”

Maintenance Award For 10 Years Proper in 30 Year Marriage

In Saylor v Saylor, 32 A.D.3d 1358, 822 N.Y.S.2d 197(4th Dept.,2006) the judgment awarded plaintiff maintenance of $950 per month for a period of 9 ½ years or until plaintiff's remarriage or the death of either party, distributed certain marital assets and debt, and directed defendant to pay $6,750 toward plaintiff's counsel fees. The Appellate Division affirmed. The parties were married for 30 years, defendant was the primary breadwinner throughout the marriage, plaintiff stayed at home with the children or worked part-time for most of the marriage, thereby delaying her career prospects, and there was a large disparity in the incomes of the parties. The court did not abuse its discretion in ordering defendant to pay one half of plaintiff's credit card debt and in denying defendant's request to receive a credit for one half of a joint account liquidated by plaintiff to pay for the wedding of the parties' daughter. Given the relative financial circumstances of the parties and the relative merits of their positions before and at trial, the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering defendant to pay $6,750 toward plaintiff's counsel fees.

FCA 424-a Requires Disclosure That May Not Be Waived. Review of Objections is De Novo

In Stauffer v Stubs, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2446118 (N.Y. Fam. Ct.) Judge O'Conner of the Family Court refused to confirm the Support Magistrate's order reducing child support to $92 per week. The Court noted that FCA 424-a. provides in part that (a) in all support proceedings in family court, there shall be compulsory disclosure by both parties of their respective financial states,...No showing of special circumstances shall be required before such disclosure is ordered and such disclosure may not be waived by either party or by the court. A sworn statement of net worth shall be filed with the clerk of the court on a date to be fixed by the court, no later than ten days after the return date of the petition. ... All such sworn statements of net worth shall be accompanied by a current and representative paycheck stub and the most recently filed state and federal income tax returns including a copy of the W-2(s) wage and tax statement(s) submitted with the returns.....” The Family Court held that the failure to provide his tax return in 1999 as directed and required was a violation of the compulsory financial disclosure law, The Findings of Fact stated that the father was given five days to produce his tax returns and financial affidavit and that his petition for modification would be dismissed if he did not do so. Accordingly, when he did not submit his tax return, his petition should have been dismissed, and it was error to grant it. The Support Magistrate had no authority to waive this tax return requirement. Although the mother's attorney did not raise these arguments on the motion, he raised them on this objection procedure. The court noted that Family Court Act, 439[e] does not provide any standard for a Family Court Judge to apply when reviewing the Findings of Fact and Orders of a Family Court support magistrate, and stated that there apparently is no case law establishing such a standard. It held that the determination by a Family Court Judge on an objection can be and should be considered as a de novo application.

November 16, 2006

Cruelty Divorce Affirmed in 30 Year Marriage

In Freas v Freas, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2971758 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in October 1972 and had three emancipated children. The action was commenced in September 2003 and granted plaintiff a divorce and awarded her, maintenance and counsel fees. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that Supreme Court heard undisputed testimony from plaintiff regarding both the treatment that she endured from defendant, as well as her reasons for suspecting an extramarital affair. The court noted that "defendant's lack of communication, isolation, name calling, controlling behavior and refusal to end his 'friendship' with [the alleged paramour] and to attend marriage counseling are all acts which demonstrate that continued cohabitation is improper." Supreme Court credited plaintiff's testimony that defendant's conduct caused her to increase her antidepressant medication and, ultimately, vacate the marital residence. It reviewed the testimony of defendant's alleged paramour, as well as that propounded by defendant which was limited to his employment and financial information. From the totality of the testimony, Supreme Court found defendant's conduct to amount to a "systematic pattern of emotional neglect." The Appellate Division found there was no abuse of discretion in the award of maintenance. In light of the disparity in income and the parties' future earning capacity, there is no abuse of discretion in the award of $450 per month in maintenance to plaintiff until she reaches the age of 62. Plaintiff stayed home, upon mutual agreement, to care for the children from 1974 until 1991 and, although she rejoined the work force in 1994, she stopped because of the injuries that she sustained in a car accident. By the time of trial, she was working part time, seeking full-time employment, which would yield an estimated income of approximately $17,000 per year. Defendant was grossing over $57,000 in 2002, decreasing to $38,891 at the time of trial because of a voluntary change in his work shift. Having studied welding, electric work and machine work, he also testified that he received additional income from odd jobs that he performed outside of his full-time employment. The court held that the award of counsel fees, $2,000 after trial and $1,000 for interim fees from the pendente lite order, was entirely reasonable considering the disparate financial circumstances of the parties.

VSF Benefits and COLAS Are Supplements and Enhancements to Already Existing Pension Benefits

In Pagliari v Pagliaro, 31 A.D.3d 728, 821 N.Y.S.2d 602 (2d Dept.,2006) the parties 2003 judgment of divorce incorporated the terms and conditions of an amended 2003 separation agreement which provided that the plaintiff would share in the pension benefits of the defendant, a New York City Police officer. The judgment directed the settlement of a Qualified Domestic Relations Order. On February 22, 2005, the Supreme Court signed a QDRO which had been drafted by the defendant's attorney. It excluded any Variable Supplement Fund (VSF) benefits from the definition of "retirement allowance" and was silent as to cost of living adjustments (COLAs). The Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff's argument that the Supreme Court erred in excluding from the QDRO the defendant's VSF benefits and COLAs payable in relation to his pension. (The defendant conceded on appeal that the plaintiff was entitled to an equitable share of pension-related COLAs). The Appellate Division held that the plaintiff was also entitled to an equitable share of VSF benefits. Pension rights earned during a marriage, prior to a separation agreement or matrimonial action, are marital property subject to equitable distribution. While certain assets created after the divorce do not constitute marital property, enhanced retirement income is marital property subject to equitable distribution, since a non-employee spouse is entitled to share in the pension of the employee spouse as it is ultimately determined.(Olivo v. Olivo, 82 N.Y.2d 202, 209-210, 604 N.Y.S.2d 23, 624 N.E.2d 151). As VSF benefits and COLAs are merely supplements and enhancements to already existing pension benefits, the non-employee spouse is entitled to an equitable share. It rejected the defendant's argument that the plaintiff was not entitled to a share of the defendant's VSF because the Agreement did not specifically provide for such payments. It held that the defendant incorrectly relied upon cases which have held that parties must explicitly provide for an allocation of pre-retirement death benefits in a settlement/separation agreement in order for the non-employee spouse to receive an equitable share of those benefits (see Kazel v. Kazel, 3 N.Y.3d 331, 334-335, 786 N.Y.S.2d 420, 819 N.E.2d 1036). Death benefits, unlike pension enhancements, are separate interests, independent of retirement benefits. Thus, in order for a non-employee spouse to be entitled to a share of the other spouse's death benefits, the parties must make specific provision for such entitlement in their marital agreement. It was not necessary for the Agreement to specifically provide for the plaintiff to receive an equitable share of the VSF benefits and COLAs, because they were merely supplements to the existing pension asset. The QDRO signed by the Supreme Court should have conformed with the Olivo principles to ensure that the plaintiff realized her right to share in the pension benefits as they are ultimately determined.

Presumption That Separate Funds Transmuted into Marital Property May Be Rebutted by Establishing Account Was Created Only as a Matter of Convenience

In Crescimanno v Crescimanno --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2925340 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed the judgment on the law, and remitted to Supreme Court, Suffolk County, for the equitable distribution of the sum of $214,243.27, representing the amount awarded as a separate property credit. It noted that the proceeds from an action to recover damages for personal injuries are considered separate property. However, separate property that is commingled, for example, in a joint bank account, loses its character of separateness and a presumption arises that each party is entitled to a share of the funds (see Banking Law 675[b]). That presumption, may be overcome by clear and convincing evidence, either direct or circumstantial, that the account was created only as a matter of convenience. The defendant opened a joint savings account with the plaintiff into which they deposited a check that was payable to both of them representing the proceeds from a settlement of the defendant's personal injury lawsuit. The next day, the defendant transferred the funds from that account into a joint checking account from which checks were drawn to satisfy certain marital debts, including a loan from the defendant's mother for the down payment on the marital residence and a private purchase money mortgage on that property. The defendant failed to rebut the presumption that the funds were transmuted into marital property by establishing that the account was created only as a matter of convenience without the intention of creating a beneficial interest. Thus, the funds did not retain the character of separate property. Accordingly, the defendant should not have received a property credit in the sum of $214,243.27.

Separate Property Became Marital Property When Defendant Deposited That Amount into Joint Checking Account and Used Amount Toward Purchase of Home

In Baker v Baker 32 A.D.3d 1275, 822 N.Y.S.2d 200 (4th Dept., 2006) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's distribution of the assets was reasonable except insofar as the court ordered that defendant receive $15,000 from the net proceeds of the sale of the home in which plaintiff was living, prior to an equal distribution of those net proceeds. Supreme Court determined that the $15,000 represented defendant's separate contribution towards the purchase of the home and defendant was therefore entitled "to recoup [that] sum ... as his separate property claim...." The Appellate Division concluded that the subject $15,000 was transformed into marital property when defendant deposited that amount into a joint checking account and ultimately used that amount toward the purchase of the home (citing Solomon v. Solomon, 307 A.D.2d 558, 763 N.Y.S.2d 141, lv. dismissed 1 N.Y.3d 546, 775 N.Y.S.2d 242, 807 N.E.2d 292; Sherman v. Sherman, 304 A.D.2d 744, 758 N.Y.S.2d 667). It modified the judgment to provide that the net proceeds from the sale of the home shall be distributed equally between the parties and otherwise affirmed.

New Court Rules For Parent Education & Awareness Program

Rules for The Parent Education and Awareness Program (22 NYCRR § 144.3.) were adopted on July 25, 2006. The program applies to all actions or proceedings that affect the interests of children under 18 years of age that is brought in Supreme Court or Family Court. The rules specify that an order to attend a parent education and awareness program may not delay the expeditious progress of the underlying proceeding, and that a parent who is a victim of domestic violence and for whom safety in traveling to or attending parent education is a concern may opt out of attendance by contacting a program administrator.

November 1, 2006

Equal Division of Marital Property Where Commingled Personal Injury Proceeds Transmuted into Marital Property

In Ruzicka v Ruzicka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1839077 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the wife challenged on Appeal the Supreme Court's decision to divide equally all marital assets, which equal division included the proceeds of an insurance settlement arising out of a car accident which, although involving both parties, resulted in serious injury to plaintiff only. The parties were married in May 1986, the accident occurred in June 1996 and this action was commenced in January 2004. Plaintiff conceded that all of the proceeds of this $240,000 settlement were commingled with marital funds and thus transmuted into marital property, but claimed that Supreme Court should have granted her a greater than one-half interest in these proceeds by awarding her full legal title to her current residence. Supreme Court ruled that this particular residence, valued at $205,000, was marital property to be sold with all net proceeds divided equally between the parties. Plaintiff was given the option of purchasing the property and paying defendant his equitable share thereof, namely, $102,500. The Appellate Division was unpersuaded by plaintiff's claim that Supreme Court's equitable distribution award constituted an abuse of discretion. The Settlement proceeds were commingled with marital funds and thereafter spent on marital debt and numerous marital assets, including a vacant lot where the parties built a new home. While plaintiff suffered severe injuries from the automobile accident, the settlement, which was unallocated and made payable to both parties jointly, was able to exceed the $100,000 maximum insurance coverage for a single individual because defendant was also in the vehicle at the time. The parties collected $240,000 under the under insured/uninsured motorist coverage of their own automobile insurance policy. Had plaintiff been in the vehicle alone, the maximum benefit under this provision would have been $100,000. Because both parties were in the vehicle the maximum benefit was $300,000. Additionally, in light of the equal split of all marital property, defendant did not challenge the $2,100 per month he was obligated to pay plaintiff until she turns 65 years old. This obligation was initially for child support and spousal maintenance. Defendant agreed to continue this amount to plaintiff, in the nature of maintenance only, after their youngest child turns 22 years old. Plaintiff also collected $552 per month in Social Security disability and retirement benefits, and defendant was responsible for providing health insurance for her. Under these circumstances, Supreme Court's decision to split all marital property equally was fully supported by the record.

Distributive Award Disguised As Maintenance Dischargeable In Bankruptcy

In Re Duffy v Taback 2006 WL 1540542 (S.D.N.Y.) during the course of the marriage, Duffy obtained his medical degree. In 1994 Appellant Taback commenced an action for divorce and it came on for trial before the Honorable Fred Shapiro on June 27, 1997. On that date, with the participation of Justice Shapiro, the parties stipulated to a settlement of what the Bankruptcy Court found to be the single issue on which they went to trial, that of the equitable distribution of the value of the medical degree. The judgment of divorce stated in relevant part: ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the Defendant [Duffy] shall pay monthly spousal maintenance to the Plaintiff [Taback] commencing July 1, 1997 in the sum of $2,000 per month payable in monthly installments which shall be made on the first day of each month for the term of ten (10) consecutive years, which payment shall be non-dischargeable in bankruptcy and paid unconditionally to the Wife irrespective of her cohabitation or remarriage. In May 2002, Duffy admitted to several professional misconduct allegations and relinquished his license to practice medicine. The Bankruptcy Court held that the provision in the divorce judgment for ten-year payments designated "spousal maintenance" aggregating $240,000 constituted the settlement of a dispute between the parties concerning solely equitable distribution of the debtor's property interest in his medical license and practice. Since the dispute which was tried in the state court on June 27, 1997 concerned only equitable distribution, and since Taback made no claim for alimony/maintenance at or prior to the trial in the divorce action the liability to pay $240,000 over ten years although designated as "spousal maintenance" was not "actually in the nature of alimony, maintenance, or support" .. [and accordingly] cannot be deemed alimony, maintenance or support within the scope of Section 523(a)(5). The Court rejected Appellants argument that according to Zaera v. Raff, 93 B.R. 41 (Bankr.S.D.N.Y.1988) the monies at issue were, as a matter of law, in the nature of alimony and therefore not dischargeable under Section 523(a)(5) of the Bankruptcy Code. In Raff, the Bankruptcy Court relied on O'Brien v. O'Brien, 66 N.Y.2d 576, 584 (1985), and held that an award of a percentage of the value of a medical degree was in the nature of alimony and support and was non-dischargeable. To the extent that Zaera v. Raff, which held that a distributive award of the value of debtor's medical degree acquired during marriage is in the nature of non-dischargeable alimony and not marital property, intended to establish a bright line rule to that effect, the District Court declined to follow Raff. The Court did not find an intended bright line rule in Raff, but were it so to find, it would nevertheless not be bound thereby. The Bankruptcy Court found that on June 17, 1997, the parties settled their only actually remaining dispute pending before the state court, which was over the equitable distribution of Duffy's property interest in his medical degree, and they did not settle a claim over alimony or maintenance, as such a claim was never made. It found that the parties treated the distribution as spousal maintenance at the suggestion of Justice Shapiro in order to settle Taback's claim for equitable distribution in a way that Duffy's net cost would be reduced by way of federal income tax deductions. Despite the tax consequences reflecting alimony in this case, the term making the payments unconditional despite Taback's remarriage or cohabitation flies in the face of an intent to award alimony support.

Wife Entitled to Only 20% of Husbands Enhanced Earning Capacity

In Martinson v Martinson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2789238 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 06957 the Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff that the court erred in awarding defendant 40% of the value of the marital portion of plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity arising from plaintiff's obtaining, during the marriage, a license to practice as a physician's assistant. In light of defendant's modest contribution to the attainment of plaintiff's license, it concluded that the court should have awarded defendant only 20% of the value of the marital portion of plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity and modified the judgment to provide that plaintiff pay defendant $21,472 for her share of plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity, with interest at the rate of 9% per annum from February 4, 2005, and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine the duration and minimum amount to be paid per month on that amount.

Error Not To Honor Parties Stipulation. Noncustodial Parent May Declare Child as Dependent

In Pachomski v Pachomski, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2742654 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 06840 the judgment awarded the plaintiff $80,082.35, representing 50% of the defendant's enhanced earnings capacity as a licensed teacher, permitted the plaintiff to claim tax exemptions for the parties' older child in odd years and their younger child in even years, and awarded the plaintiff credits in the sums of $1,200 for past rental income and $400 per month for future rental income beginning in November 2002 from an apartment in the marital residence. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in determining the marital portion of the defendant's teaching license. To meet licensing requirements, the defendant was required, inter alia, to obtain a bachelor's degree and several additional teaching credits. When the parties were married in 1985, the defendant had already received her college degree. During the marriage, she completed the additional classes required for licensure and in 1998 she became licensed. In light of these circumstances, the court's decision to apply a 100% coverture factor in determining the marital portion of the teaching license was without proper support. While the record contained evidence to support a finding that some portion of the license constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution, since the plaintiff contributed both in economic and noneconomic terms to the defendant's attainment of the license, the evidence did not justify the court's use of a coverture factor of 100%. The matter was remitted for a new determination of the marital portion of the teaching license. The parties stipulated to allow the defendant to retain the past rental income from an apartment in the marital residence as payment for repairs made to the marital residence. The Appellate Division held that the court erred in awarding the plaintiff the sum of $1,200 of the past rental income rather than honoring the parties' stipulation. It also held that Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was entitled to claim federal and state tax dependency exemptions for the parties' older child in odd years and their younger child in even years. Where a noncustodial parent meets all or a substantial part of a child's financial needs, a court may determine that the noncustodial parent is entitled to declare the child as a dependent. Both parents were wage earners, and each contributed toward the support of their two children.

October 16, 2006

Provision for Own Attorneys Fees For Collecting Law Firms Attorneys Fees Void

In Ween v Dow, (2006 NY Slip Op 07227) the Appellate Division, First Department, held that a provision in a retainer agreement, which holds the client liable for attorneys' fees incurred in the collection of fees generated under the retainer agreement, is void as against public policy. The retainer agreement provided, in part: "If client fails to pay for charges due under this agreement and the law firm takes legal action and is awarded such charges, client shall owe to law firm costs, expenses and attorneys' fees (including but not limited to the reasonable value of the law firm's own work) attributable to law firm's collection proceedings and/or action." The Court noted that even in the absence of fraud or undue influence, an agreement to pay a legal fee may be invalid if it appears that the attorney got the better of the bargain, unless he can show that the client was fully aware of the consequences and that there was no exploitation of the client's confidence in the attorney. It found that the very nature of the provision, which permits the recovery of attorneys' fees by the attorney should he prevail in a collection action, without a reciprocal allowance for attorneys' fees should the client prevail, to be fundamentally unfair and unreasonable. Aside from its lack of mutuality, the clause, even if not so designed, had the distinct potential for silencing a client's complaint about fees for fear of retaliation for the nonpayment of even unreasonable fees. For that reason the provision was unenforceable.

Prenuptial Agreement Must Be Considered in Property Distribution. Court Required To Set forth Child Care Factors

In Gilbert v Gilbert, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2257730 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties prenuptial agreement provided that, in the event of a divorce, they would divide property held in joint names proportionately in the same ratio as their respective individual financial contributions to such asset." On July 29, 1991, the parties purchased the first marital residence. On December 7, 1998, the parties sold the first marital residence, and used all of the equity from the sale toward the purchase of the second marital residence. On September 20, 2002, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce and the parties agreed to sell the second marital residence. The Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court erred, as a matter of law, in considering the equity from the sale of the first marital residence as having been contributed towards the second marital residence equally by each party, since the equity from the sale of the first marital residence was traceable to the parties' separate property contributions toward the first marital residence. The equity from the sale of the first marital residence was not placed in a joint account or otherwise commingled with marital funds before it was applied toward the purchase of the second marital residence. Since the precise amount of the parties' individual contributions toward the first marital residence was not clear from the record, the matter was remitted for a new determination of this amount. It also held that Supreme Court erred in its child support determination. It was required to set forth the factors it considered with respect to its determination of the parties' child support and child care obligations--including, in the circumstances of this case, private school tuition and expenses for extracurricular activities and summer camp--on combined income in excess of $80,000. It was also required to relate the statutory factors to the ultimate facts on which it relied.

SCU Is Required to Issue Immediate Income Execution

In Matter of Franklin County Department of Social Services v Mandigo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2433398 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Support Magistrate directed respondent to pay $512 biweekly in child support for three of his children who were receiving public assistance. The order directed the Support Collection Unit to calculate the amount of retroactive support, but ordered that no immediate income execution be issued by the SCU for current or past due support. The Appellate Division held that Child support orders for children receiving public assistance must direct payment to the SCU, which is required to issue an immediate income execution unless "the court finds and sets forth in writing the reasons that there is good cause not to require immediate income withholding". "[G]ood cause shall mean substantial harm to the debtor," but does not include the mere issuance of an income execution (Family Ct Act 440[1][b][1]). The "good cause" found by the Support Magistrate here was that respondent was left with only $500 biweekly to support himself, after subtracting all amounts currently being deducted from his paycheck, including taxes, FICA, and current child support, as well as a pension plan loan repayment, amounts being garnished to pay a medical bill judgment, and presumably health insurance premiums and union dues. The Support Magistrate concluded that substantial harm would result to respondent due to the SCU's mandatory collection of past due support if an income execution were ordered. The Support Magistrate's conclusions were incorrect. In addition to deducting current support, regulations require the SCU to deduct an additional amount toward arrears, equal to the greater of $50 per week or one-half the support obligation.. Under the Support Magistrate's calculations, this would have resulted in an additional deduction of $256 biweekly from respondent's net pay of $500. Regulations provide safety valves in the SCU's calculation of additional deductions for arrears, however, including a limit on total deductions to 40% of disposable income and a prohibition on reducing the payor's income below the self-support reserve. The payor's "disposable income" is defined as "any amounts required by law to be withheld" (18 NYCRR 347.9[e][1][v]; see CPLR 5241[g]; 5242 [c]), which would not include some of the items considered by the Support Magistrate. Additionally, the Legislature has determined that support income deductions have priority over any other levies or assignments of income. Support income executions are statutorily limited to a percentage of the payor's disposable income , and other statutes limit the total amount that can be deducted from a person's income. Because support income executions have priority, creditor garnishment is not permitted during any pay period in which the amount garnished for support exceeds the permissible statutory percentage for overall levies or assignments. Not having considered this legal priority, the Support Magistrate inappropriately subtracted other debts from respondent's annual salary of over $49,000 when deciding how much money he would have to support himself from each paycheck. The Appellate Division did not find substantial harm to respondent through the issuance of an income execution. Considering that such an income execution is subject to statutory and regulatory safeguards in the payor's favor, there was no good cause to disallow an income execution.

Support Ordered In Accordance With Agreement Where Income Impossible to Calculate

In Frazier v Penraat, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2728933 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Respondent testified that her adjusted gross income for the years 2000, 2001 and 2002 was $66,268, $56,609, and $32,047, respectively. Petitioner testified that respondent often received cash payments through her business, which were not reported on respondent's tax returns and in 2000 or 2001, received between $60,000 and $100,000 in undeclared cash payments. Prior to the parties' separation, the children enjoyed a fairly high standard of living. The Support Magistrate found respondents testimony to be neither candid, nor fully credible. Petitioner, in the Magistrate's view, fared no better as he also found her testimony to be not fully credible, specifically noting that "[h]er testimony concerning the 'wads' of cash she observed sounded contrived and was not fully believable. The Magistrate determined that petitioner's income, for the purposes of calculating child support, was $78,522.08 and found that determining respondent's income "was problematic". The Magistrate concluded that neither parent could be deemed the custodial parent for purposes of the Child Support Standards Act since both parents had essentially the same income and shared custody equally, and, therefore, declined to enter an order of child support. The Magistrate, in a supplemental decision, stated that "none of [respondent's] testimony concerning her income was relied upon in reaching my factual determination regarding her income." Family Court agreed with the Magistrate that it was not possible to differentiate between the parties on the basis of their access to the children, but went on to calculate petitioner's adjusted gross income to be $79,316.74, which was within $1,000 of the figure arrived at by the Magistrate, and found that it was an abuse of discretion for the Magistrate to utilize respondent's tax returns in light of his conclusion that none of her testimony concerning her income was credible. Family Court utilized the figure respondent listed as her annual income on a car lease application in November 2001, which was $80,000, and after additional adjustments, concluded that respondent's adjusted gross income, for child support purposes, was $102,275.86. In light of the shared custody situation, it concluded that a strict application of the CSSA guidelines would be unjust and ordered respondent to pay monthly support of $958.33 retroactive to the date petitioner filed the petition. The Appellate Division reversed on the law. It perceived of no basis, in light of the Magistrate's credibility findings, for Family Court's decision to utilize the $80,000 figure respondent reported on her car loan application, while discounting respondent's tax returns due to lack of credibility. Since, based on the record, it was is not possible to calculate an appropriate award of support pursuant to the CSSA, the court held that find that the parties should comply with the terms of a mediation agreement, which, was executed after the events which purportedly devastated respondent's business. Respondent was directed to pay petitioner $600 per month, retroactive to the date of the filing of the petition.

October 2, 2006

Supreme Court Required to Appoint Counsel For Certain Indigent Litigants

Section 35 of the Judiciary Law was amended by Laws of 2006, Ch 538, effective August 16, 2006 to add a new subdivision 8 which requires supreme court to appoint counsel for indigent litigants in the same manner as family court is required to appoint such counsel. It provides that whenever supreme court shall exercise jurisdiction over a matter which the family court could have exercised jurisdiction had such action been commenced in family court, supreme court shall appoint counsel for indigent persons in the same manner as required by section 262 of the family court act. Family Court Act 262(a) provides which persons have the right to the assistance of counsel. When such person first appears in court, the judge must advise such person before proceeding that he or she has the right to be represented by counsel of his or her own choosing, of the right to have an adjournment to confer with counsel, and of the right to have counsel assigned by the court in any case where he or she is financially unable to obtain the same. Those persons who might appear before the Supreme Court, in a matrimonial action, for which the court is required to appoint counsel are the petitioner and the respondent in any proceeding under article eight of the act (family offenses); the parent of any child seeking custody or contesting the substantial infringement of his or her right to custody of such child, in any proceeding before the court in which the court has jurisdiction to determine such custody; any person in any proceeding before the court in which an order or other determination is being sought to hold such person in contempt of the court or in willful violation of a previous order of the court, except for a contempt which may be punished summarily under section seven hundred fifty-five of the judiciary law; (viii) the respondent in any proceeding under article five of this act in relation to the establishment of paternity. Ed Note: The failure to advise a party of the right to counsel and to an adjournment to obtain counsel before the court made any orders has been held to be reversible error. See generally Perez v Arebalo, 13 AD3d 85, 786 NYS2d 441(1st Dept. 2004) Patricia L. v Steven N. 119 AD2d 221 (2d Dept. 1986); Mahoney v Doring 256 AD2d 1112 (4th Dept.,1998)

Stipulation Does Not Foreclose Inquiry into Propriety of Attorneys' fee

In Campion v Campion, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2615131 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order which granted the motion of the former attorney for the plaintiff, to enter a money judgment in the sum of $31,615.40 against the plaintiff, and denied the plaintiff's cross motion to vacate the portion of a stipulation of settlement between the parties requiring her to pay an attorney's fee to him. In the course of negotiating the settlement of this matrimonial action, the attorney for the plaintiff-client obtained the client's consent to insert into the stipulation of settlement between the parties a provision requiring her to pay his fee, in the amount of $31,615.40, from certain marital property that she was to receive in equitable distribution. The stipulation was subsequently "so ordered" and incorporated, without being merged, into the judgment of divorce. The client subsequently refused to comply with the terms of the stipulation of settlement. The attorney then moved in the action to hold the client in contempt of court for her noncompliance with the stipulation of settlement or, among other things, for leave to enter a money judgment against the client. The client opposed the motion on the ground that the time for which she was charged was excessive. At the same time, she commenced a plenary action in the Supreme Court to set aside the fee provision in the stipulation of settlement. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting the motion for leave to enter a money judgment without considering the client's cross motion to vacate the portion of the stipulation of settlement requiring her to pay an attorney's fee. By moving in the matrimonial action for leave to enter a money judgment upon the ground that the client had defaulted, the attorney necessarily invoked the summary procedure established by Domestic Relations Law 244 for the enforcement of matrimonial obligations. Under the terms of that provision, a party against whom enforcement of an obligation other than child support is sought may seek relief from the obligation upon showing good cause. Here, such good cause was established, prima facie, by the attorney-client relationship between the attorney and the client at the time the client entered into the fee stipulation. "[I]t is well settled that the courts possess the traditional authority 'to supervise the charging of fees for legal services' pursuant to their 'inherent and statutory power to regulate the practice of law' " The existence of the stipulation did not foreclose the court from inquiring into the propriety of an attorneys' fee, even in the absence of undue influence or fraud.

Net Worth Statement Required Before Court Can Apportion Law Guardian Fees

In Frost v Goldberg, 818 N.Y.S.2d 533 (2d Dept.,2006) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in confirming that portion of the Judicial Hearing Officer's report which recommended that the plaintiff reimburse the defendant the sum of $12,400 in fees paid by the defendant to the Law Guardian. Although such fees and related expenses are entrusted to the sound discretion of the court, they are nonetheless to be controlled by the equities of the case and the financial circumstances of the parties. The Judicial Hearing Officer failed to consider the financial circumstances of the parties. The defendant failed to file a current statement of net worth with his cross motion, as required by 22 NYCRR 202.16(k)(2). In addition, the plaintiff did not file a statement of net worth with the court. The matter was remitted to Supreme Court, for a hearing to consider the parties' relative financial positions, and for a new determination on the issue of reimbursement of fees paid to the Law Guardian. It directed that the new determination should be made only after receipt of a statement of net worth from both parties.

No Impediment to Distributing Present Value of Residential Apartments in name of Holding Company. Lifetime Maintenance Appropriate. Recoupment of Pendente Lite Award Indirectly Permitted.

In Pickard v Pickard, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2291170 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that it was proper to adjust plaintiff's equitable distribution award to give defendant credit for excess temporary maintenance payment, [Ed. Note: the effect of which was to allow recoupment of the pendente lite award]. Lifetime maintenance of $3500 per month was appropriately awarded in view of the 23-year duration of the marriage, plaintiff's role in raising and educating the two children, her minimal job skills, her having been out of the workforce since 1977 and the parties' respective financial positions. However, defendant improperly received a 100% credit of $109,251 for maintenance payments and $6553 for homeowner's insurance for the marital apartment. Since these payments maintained the value of the marital residence and both parties benefitted from the sale of the residence, defendant should have received a 50% credit for these payments, i.e., $57,902, and it reduced plaintiff's credit for past temporary maintenance payments by that amount. The court also found that given the disparity in the parties' future earning capacity and plaintiff's bleak work prospects, defendant should pay for plaintiff's health insurance until she obtains a job with benefits or is eligible for medicare. The Appellate Division also held that the trial court erred in declining to distribute the present value of the parties' 25% interest in KP Holdings. Instead it directed that this asset be divided on an "if, as and when" basis as the assets it holds are sold. KP Holdings was a New York limited liability company which owned 11 occupied rent-controlled or rent-stabilized apartments. Defendant offered the testimony of an expert who appraised this asset and concluded that the present value of KP Holdings at the time of the valuation was $340,000. The parties' 25% share was valued at $55,000 after applying a "minority discount" to take into account the lesser market value of a minority interest; without that discount, the parties' interest was valued at $85,000. The Appellate Division noted that the trial court rejected the validity of this expert's valuation and concluded that the parties' interest in KP Holdings was "wholly speculative," thereby precluding accurate valuation and distribution of its present value, and requiring instead that any future distribution following a sale of a KP-owned apartment be split upon receipt. The Appellate Division held that the present value of this asset was no more speculative than that of any other asset with limited marketability; it may be properly determined by standard valuation techniques. Rather than rendering the asset's value too speculative to determine, the marketability limitation simply creates the need to apply discounting factors to the future value--exactly the procedure the expert here employed. Where the asset consists of residential apartments held in the name of a holding company, there is no impediment to determining and distributing a present value. Distribution of assets should not be left unresolved at the time of the divorce where it can be effectuated at that time, as can the parties' interest in KP Holdings. The Appellate Division held that under such circumstances, the court had the authority to appoint another expert (22 NYCRR 202.18) and direct further proceedings for purposes of a more accurate appraisal.

September 18, 2006

Despite Agreement Hearing Warranted on Husband's Petition For Downward Modification of Child Support Where He Alleged Involuntary Substantial Decrease in Income

In Lonsdale v McEwen (2006 NY Slip Op 06313) (NYAD 1 Dept), a 3-2 opinion, the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Supreme Court which denied defendant's motion for downward modification of his child support obligation, and directed a hearing on defendant's petition. When the parties separation agreement was entered into in December of 2001, defendant's annual salary in that position was $1.3 million. The agreement provided that in the event of an involuntary substantial decrease in defendant's annual income to $600,000 or less, his annual, basic child support obligation would be $33,600 (payable in equal monthly installments) rather than $48,000. The agreement provided for an "adjustment" of his non-basic child support obligations if his income were to decrease by more than 50% of the amount of income he earned in 2000 (which apparently was in excess of $1 million). The defendant lost his high-paying position in October of 2002. In 2003, defendant was unemployed except for occasional jobs he was able to obtain, but received some $77,527 in income from a variety of sources (including capital gains, dividends, interest and pension payments, as well as earnings from the employment he obtained). He remained unemployed for most of 2004, but received some $34,750 in income over the first seven months of the year. As a result of the new employment he finally was able to secure in Florida, he expected to earn an additional $38,000 in the final months of 2004. Defendant expected to earn $200,000 in salary over the first year in his new job, with increases of $15,000 and $10,000 in the second and third years. It was undisputed that defendant did not voluntarily lose his high-paying position nor was there any basis for doubting that he diligently sought new employment. Defendant was entitled under the agreement to reductions in his support obligations. Defendant's non-basic child support obligations were substantial. In 2002 defendant paid $49,520 in non-basic child support, including $15,000 for tuition and $31,000 for child care. In 2003, defendant paid approximately $26,400 in non-basic child support, including $8,500 for tuition and $16,900 for child care. In the first nine months of 2004, defendant paid approximately $19,800 in non-basic child support. In support of his motion for a downward modification of his child support obligations, defendant relied on, inter alia, the loss of his high-paying position, the periods of unemployment and reduced income in 2003 and 2004 and the need to provide for his twin sons, born in September of 2003, following his remarriage in April of 2002. In addition, defendant alleged both that plaintiff, as an attorney for a major pharmaceutical company, likely earned more than he would in his new position, and that her financial assets had increased significantly while his had decreased significantly since the agreement was entered into in December of 2001. The majority noted that the dissent stated that "the loss of [the] long-standing lucrative position" defendant held "affords no basis for the relief" he seeks because "[t]hat circumstance . . . was specifically anticipated and addressed in the [separation] agreement." The majority held that this rationale was not alone sufficient to warrant denial of defendant's motion. If defendant either had failed to secure new employment or secured a new position that paid an annual salary less than the total amount of his annual support obligations, defendant could not rationally be denied relief on this ground. The only reasonable conclusion to be drawn was the obvious one: the parties to the agreement anticipated the loss of defendant's lucrative position but neither anticipated nor addressed either a prolonged period of unemployment or so huge a reduction in salary. The agreement provided for a reduction in annual child support "in the event the Husband suffers an involuntary substantial decrease in [his] income, as defined, so that such income is $600,000 or less" . But the phrase "or less" is too slender a peg upon which to hang the ponderous conclusion that the parties "specifically anticipated and addressed" all the potential consequences of the loss of defendant's position. Defendant's 84% salary reduction was substantial and the defendant was without any steady employment for nearly two years. Under these circumstances, Supreme Court erred as well in brushing aside defendant's claim of a "concomitant need" for a downward modification. In concluding that "payment of $2,800 per month is a reasonable child support amount" "given the fact that [defendant] is now earning $200,000 annually," Supreme Court ignored the substantial amounts of non-basic child support payments defendant was obligated to make and appeared to have not considered the after-tax burden of defendant's obligations. After the separation agreement was entered into defendant became responsible for the expenses of raising two children, his twin sons. Supreme Court rejected defendant's reliance on these expenses. Even assuming that defendant anticipated the birth of twins, Supreme Court erred just the same. The issue was whether these expenses were unanticipated at the time the parties entered into the separation agreement. Regardless of whether defendant could fairly be blamed for remarrying and raising children with his new spouse, his infant sons were blameless and Supreme Court should not have been so dismissive of defendant's need to provide for them. The court stated that Defendant also was correct in asserting that increases, if any, in plaintiff's salary would support his motion. Note: This may be the first decision applying Boden (42 NY2d 210) to a downward modification of a child support judgment. However, since DRL 236 [B][9] does not authorize the court to modify the agreement provisions downward, it would seem that any relief for defendant would be temporary.

Husband Lacked Standing to Seek Visitation with Wife's Children

In Bank v White, 817 N.Y.S.2d 367 (2d Dept.,2006), the parties married and lived together with the Wife's two children from September 1997 until their separation in June 2003. During the marriage, the plaintiff played a role in the daily upbringing of her children and served as a "father figure" in their lives. When the parties separated, the plaintiff moved to California and the defendant remained in New York with the children. By order to show cause the wife requested pendente lite maintenance and the husband cross-moved for visitation with the children. The Supreme Court denied the cross motion for lack of standing and the Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Supreme Court correctly denied the plaintiff's cross motion since he lacked standing to seek visitation with his wife's children (citing Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M., 77 N.Y.2d 651, 569 N.Y.S.2d 586, 572 N.E.2d 27; Matter of Ronald FF. v. Cindy GG., 70 N.Y.2d 141, 517 N.Y.S.2d 932, 511 N.E.2d 75). The plaintiff failed to demonstrate that he had the requisite contacts or undertook any effort to maintain a relationship with the subject children since he left the marital residence and the cross motion was brought only in response to the wife's request for pendente lite maintenance. The Supreme Court correctly determined that application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel was not warranted in this case. Although equitable estoppel has been applied by the court to visitation disputes under compelling circumstances the Appellate Division declined to apply it under the facts of this case.

Where Parties' Respective Financial Circumstances About Equal Award of Attorney's Fee For Trial and Appeal Improvident.

In Penna v Penna 29 A.D.3d 970, 817 N.Y.S.2d 313, 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 04262 (2d Dept.,2006) the Appellate Division noted that during this long-term marriage, the parties, both of whom were born in 1946, were employed and enjoyed a modest middle-class lifestyle. The principal asset of the marriage was the marital residence, improved by an apartment constructed in 1987 with $60,000 given to the parties by the plaintiff's mother. The plaintiff also inherited considerable funds during the marriage, the balance of which remained her separate property. It held that the $60,000 given by the plaintiff's mother to the parties during the marriage for the purpose of building her an apartment within the marital residence lost its character as separate property and became marital property. As such, it should have been distributed between the parties rather than allocated solely to the plaintiff. In light of the parties' ages and their lifestyle during the marriage, as well as their financial circumstances the Supreme Court should have awarded the plaintiff maintenance only until the plaintiff becomes eligible for full Social Security benefits at the age of 66, remarries, or dies. Given the plaintiff's present income, her doctor's testimony that she was capable of performing the functions required by her present employment, her reasonable needs, her separate property, and the defendant's financial circumstances, an award of maintenance in the sum of $125 per week was appropriate. It was clear from the decision after trial that the life insurance policy was intended to be $250,000, which was excessive. The Appellate Division held that it should be for an amount commensurate with the collective sum of the maintenance payments of $52,000, coterminous with the period of maintenance. In light of the parties' respective financial circumstances, which were about equal, the Supreme Court's award of an attorney's fee to the plaintiff for the trial and appeal was an improvident exercise of discretion.

September 1, 2006

First Department Allows Indirect Recoupment for Excess Pendente Lite Maintenance Payments

The general rule has been that a spouse is not entitled to restitution or recoupment of the payments made pursuant to a temporary maintenance or child support award. In Vigliotti v. Vigliotti, 260 A.D.2d 470, 688 N.Y.S.2d 198 (2d Dep't 1999), the Second Department held that ". . . the husband would not be entitled to restitution or recoupment of the payments made pursuant to the modified temporary maintenance award." See also Rodgers v Rodgers, 98 AD2d 386, 470 NYS2d 401 (2d Dept.,1983); Stone v Stone, 152 AD 2d 560, 543 NYS2d 489. (2d Dept.,1989), The Third Department has held where the final award of maintenance and child support is less than the amount of the pendente lite award it is error for the trial court to direct that its award should be retroactive and prospective and thus, in effect, modify downward the pendente lite order. Foxx v Foxx, 114 App Div 2d 605, 494 NYS2d 446 (3d Dept.,1985). It has noted that there is a strong public policy against restitution of support payments. Baraby v Baraby, 250 AD2d 201, 681 NYS2d 826 (3d Dept.,1986) . The Fourth Department has adhered to this rule. See O'Brien v O'Brien, 195 AD2d 993, 601 NYS2d 895. (4th Dept.,1993). The First Department had adhered to this rule until recently. In Willets v. Willets, 247 A.D.2d 288, 668 N.Y.S.2d 623 (1st Dep't 1998) the First Department held that there could be no retroactive credit for overpayment of temporary maintenance attributable to a spouse's return to work during the pendency of the action. See also Grossman v Ostrow, 33 AD2d 1006 (1st Dept, 1970). Nevertheless, in Pickard v Pickard (2006 NY Slip Op 06209) the First Department held that "It was also proper to adjust plaintiff's equitable distribution award to give defendant credit for excess temporary maintenance payments" (citing Galvano v Galvano, 303 AD2d 206 [2003]). In Galvano, supra, the same Appellate Division stated, with regard to the pendente lite award, that" " If the award is found at trial to be excessive, the court can remedy the inequity by appropriate adjustment in the equitable distribution award *(citing Gad v. Gad, 283 A.D.2d 200, 724 N.Y.S.2d 305)." In Gad v Gad, supra, the Court set forth its rationale for this rule when it affirmed, without citation to authority, an Order which directed defendant to pay $8000 a month for temporary maintenance: "Nowadays, if a pendente lite award is found at trial to be excessive, the court can remedy the inequity by appropriate adjustment in the equitable distribution award."

Party Must Be Given Opportunity to Object to Report of Judicial Hearing Officer

In Jones v Jones --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1913104 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties entered into a stipulation of settlement, incorporated into a judgment of separation, resolving numerous issues pertaining to the equitable distribution of their marital property, in which the parties agreed that all real property of the marriage, including the marital residence, would be sold and the proceeds divided equally, after payment of mortgages and capital gains taxes. It further outlined each party's respective responsibilities for the carrying charges on each property and further provided that neither would borrow money against any of these parcels. Following the stipulation, the mortgage and tax obligations on three of these parcels, which were the financial obligation of defendant under the terms of the stipulation, continued to be in arrears. Less than one month after the stipulation, plaintiff borrowed money from a friend which resulted in a mortgage being executed in the friend's favor on one of the properties. Three other mortgages were executed in his favor one year later. In October 2003, upon learning of these post-stipulation mortgages (as well as another mortgage that had been executed in the friend's favor prior to the stipulation but allegedly unbeknownst to defendant), defendant moved for an accounting by plaintiff, as well as a contempt finding for her alleged willful violation of the stipulation. Supreme Court ordered plaintiff to provide defendant "with a full accounting ... of all monies which resulted in mortgages being executed by her in favor of said [friend] ... The cumulative total of which, as of August 1, 2003, was approximately $53,000.00." Thereafter, plaintiff brought a separate motion concerning the sale of the marital residence. Ultimately, a Judicial Hearing Officer was appointed "to hear and report" in the matter. A proceeding was scheduled for February 18, 2005. Prior to that time, the parties' attorneys were directed to outline their clients' respective position on each of the subject properties. No testimony was taken at this appearance nor was evidence admitted. The entire proceeding consisted of oral argument of counsel. Shortly after its conclusion, plaintiff's counsel submitted proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the Judicial Hearing Officer. Defendant objected on the ground that no hearing had been conducted on the extant orders to show cause. He further pointed out that he had never been provided with the ordered accounting by plaintiff. Despite these objections, the Judicial Hearing Officer submitted findings of fact and conclusions of law to Supreme Court, which the court adopted one day later. Defendant appealed from this order, as well as another order of Supreme Court which denied all then pending orders to show cause. The Appellate Division reversed the orders on the law holding that Supreme Court erred in adopting the Judicial Hearing Officer's findings without providing him an opportunity to object. A party must be given the opportunity of pointing out in what respects, if any, the Judicial Hearing Officer's report or his or her conduct of the proceedings is erroneous. Here, defendant was denied that right.

Money Judgement for Support Arrears Must Be Upon Application to Court

In Matter of Fixman v Fixman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2005526 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) The Appellate Division held that the dismissal of the New York matrimonial action did not preclude the mother from seeking any arrears which may have accrued while the pendente lite order remained in effect, and that she could enforce the father's support obligation by seeking leave to enter a money judgment. However, Domestic Relations Law § 244 requires that a money judgment for support arrears be made "[u]pon application [to] the court," and here the support petition filed pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act did not seek support arrears. Under these circumstances, the issue of whether arrears were due and owing pursuant to the pendente lite order was not properly before the Family Court.

Counsel Fee Permitted for Counsel Fee Application. Court May Not Sua Sponte Vacate Order Appealed From

In Matter Rospigliosi v Abbate, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 2004413 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that although awards for legal services provided in connection with a fee application should not be routinely expected or freely granted, such awards are committed to the sound discretion of the Family Court "to be exercised in appropriate cases, to further the objectives of litigational parity, and to prevent the more affluent spouse from wearing down or financially punishing the opposition by recalcitrance, or by prolonging the litigation" (citing O'Shea v. O'Shea, 93 N.Y.2d 187, 193). To the extent that Matter of Getman v. Getman (156 A.D.2d 686, 687) may be read to deprive the court of this discretion, it has, in effect, been overruled in this regard by O'Shea v. O'Shea, and should no longer be followed for that proposition. Inasmuch as the Family Court declined to reach the merits of the petitioners request for an award for an attorney's fee on the mistaken ground that it was without authority to award an attorney's fee incurred by the petitioner in prosecuting her fee application, it remitted the matter to the Family Court for a new determination with respect to that narrow issue. The Appellate Division noted that well after this appeal had been perfected, the Family Court, sua sponte, issued an order, which, inter alia, purported to vacate its order appealed from. This was improper. While it is true that, during the pendency of an appeal, the issuing court generally retains the power to clarify the order appealed from or to correct ministerial errors or irregularities contained therein that do not affect substantial rights of the parties, and that the issuing court generally retains the power to entertain and decide motions, even where the outcome of such motion practice may impact the pending appeal, the issuing court may not vacate, sua sponte, a prior order from which an appeal has been taken. If it were able to do so, the issuing court would, in effect, be insulating its subsequent order from appellate review as of right.

August 16, 2012

Amendments to Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act

Laws of 2006, Ch 184, amended, effective July 26, 2006, the provisions of the Domestic Relations Law in relation to service of process, communications between courts and taking of testimony in proceedings under the uniform child custody jurisdiction and enforcement act. Domestic Relations Law, section 75-g, subdivisions 1 and 2, section 75-i, subdivision 1, section 75-j, subdivision 2, and section 77-h were amended. In addition the last sentence of CPLR 302(b) was amended to add: "and article five-B" of the family court act "and article five-A of the domestic relations law". As a result of the amendment the last sentence now provides: " The family court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a non-resident respondent to the extent provided in sections one hundred fifty-four and one thousand thirty-six and article five-B of the family court act and article five-A of the domestic relations law."

Court May Not Delegate Its Authority to Fix a Visitation Schedule

In Matter of Feeney v. Castronuovo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1913104 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) by stipulation incorporated into their divorce decree, petitioner and respondent shared joint legal and physical (alternating weeks) custody of their three children. In May 2004, due to the mother's abuse of alcohol, Family Court awarded temporary sole, legal and physical custody to the father, with supervised visitation to the mother. In September 2004, the parties resumed the alternate weekly physical custody schedule and the Family Court order was modified to require the mother to complete alcohol rehabilitation treatment and, until November 2004, to equip her automobile with a sensalock device that would prevent her from starting her car if her blood alcohol level was excessive. When, in February 2005, the mother was arrested for driving while intoxicated, the father sought further modification of the custodial arrangement. Following hearings, Family Court ordered joint legal custody with primary physical custody being awarded to the father. With respect to visitation, Family Court ordered in the second decretal paragraph: "Parenting time with the mother shall be at times and places as agreed under such circumstances and conditions as the father determines are necessary to protect the safety and general welfare of the children." The Appellate Division modified the order on the law holding that Family Court by improperly delegating to the father the court's responsibility to structure a visitation schedule. Despite Family Court's understandable concern that the mother could suffer a relapse at any time, unless visitation is inimical to the child's welfare, Family Court is required to structure a schedule which results in frequent and regular access by the noncustodial parent .The court's authority in this respect can no more be delegated to one of the parties than it can be to a child or to a therapist.

Limitations Statute Does Not Bar Challenge by Motion to Prenuptial Agreement. Exclusive Occupancy Awarded to Insure Safety

In Iuliano v Iuliano, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 817 N.Y.S.2d 174 (3d Dept.,2006) plaintiff sought exclusive possession of the parties' marital residence and defendant cross-moved for the same relief and a declaration that the parties' prenuptial agreement executed on July 31, 1997, the day before they were married, was invalid. Following an evidentiary hearing, Supreme Court granted defendant exclusive possession of the marital residence, denied defendant's cross motion for rescission of the prenuptial agreement, and determined that the provisions thereof relating to separate assets were unconscionable. The Appellate Division affirmed. The extensive testimony demonstrated the existence of marital strife between the parties requiring an award of exclusive possession to insure the personal safety of the parties. In light of the disparate financial circumstances of the parties, the award of exclusive possession to defendant was proper. Supreme Court denied defendant's cross motion to set aside the prenuptial agreement on the ground that an action for rescission has a six-year statute of limitations and defendant's claim was now time barred. While a separate action for rescission is so governed, defendant is not time-barred from challenging the validity of the prenuptial agreement because this particular argument arises from, and directly relates to, plaintiff's claim that the agreement precludes equitable distribution of his assets. Claims and defenses that arise out of the same transaction as a claim asserted in the complaint are not barred by the statute of limitations, even though an independent action by defendant might have been time-barred at the time the action was commenced. (Bloomfield v. Bloomfield, 97 N.Y.2d 188, 192-193, 738 N.Y.S.2d 650, 764 N.E.2d 950 [2001]; see CPLR 203[d]). Thus, to this extent, defendant's claim survived.

Commingling Portion of Income Produced By Corpus Does Not Transmute Corpus Which Was Never commingled

In Chernoff v Chernoff, 2006 WL 1913018 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court "miscalculated child support in consideration of the standard of living of the child during the marriage and because defendant's income will "be considerably reduced by the equitable distribution award," it limited child support to 17% of the first $80,000 of defendant's income. The parties had combined parental income for child support purposes of at least $118,508. The statute requires the trial court to determine the amount of support on the combined income above $80,000 (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][3]) by application of the subparagraph (f) factors "and/or the child support percentage." As the record was incomplete as to these factors and Supreme Court erroneously limited the child support calculation to the first $80,000 of defendant's income it remitted for recalculation of child support. The Appellate Division found that defendant entered the 19-year marriage owning, among other things, his residence on Long Island, three rental properties (Lazy Cow, Long Beach and a parking lot) and stocks inherited from his mother; the stocks and the Lazy Cow property were still titled in defendant's name; defendant sold the parking lot approximately six to eight years prior to the divorce action and received $150,000, which he invested in four mortgages in his own name; the Long Beach building was sold shortly after the divorce action was commenced and defendant received $200,000 which netted him a $160,000 increase over his 1979 $40,000 investment in this property; and defendant had deposited income received from these assets in four bank accounts, in his name alone, from which accounts he had frequently withdrawn funds that were then commingled with plaintiff's funds in a bank account from which the parties paid their expenses. Supreme Court held that because the income from these assets had been commingled and because plaintiff had contributed services as a wife and homemaker and defendant produced no paper trail for the $73,000 sum by which the mortgages exceeded the $150,000 sale price of the parking lot, these increases in value ($73,000 and $160,000) represented marital property and awarded plaintiff 50% of the four mortgages and 50% of the four bank accounts (total to plaintiff--$119,025.34). The Appellate Division reversed holding that this award was erroneous because commingling the corpus with marital funds transmutes the separate property into marital property for purposes of equitable distribution but commingling only a portion of the income produced by the corpus does not transmute the corpus which has never been commingled. Furthermore, the lack of a paper trail concerning the source of the funds invested in the four mortgages was not alone, fatal to defendant's claim. Defendant documented his claim that the proceeds from the sale of the parking lot were invested in the mortgages in his own name alone. The evidence showed no source other than defendant's separate property for these investments and plaintiff acknowledged this property to be defendant's separate property. The court also noted that "[w]hen a nontitled spouse's claim to appreciation in the other spouse's separate property is predicated solely on the nontitled spouse's indirect contributions, some nexus between the titled spouse's active efforts and the appreciation in the separate asset is required" (citing Hartog v. Hartog, 85 N.Y.2d 36, 46 [1995]). There was not a scintilla of evidence that the increase in value of defendant's property was due to any effort on his part or to anything other than passive market forces. Plaintiff, as the nontitled spouse, bore the burden of proof on this issue. Finally, there were two main items of marital property, the marital residence and an apartment house that the parties owned through their corporation. The marital residence was acquired by the parties, as tenants in common, prior to the marriage. Each contributed separate funds to the purchase and defendant contributed additional separate funds to pay off the purchase money mortgage (a total of $46,000). In addition, defendant contributed $25,000 of separate funds to the purchase of the apartment house. Supreme Court found that defendant made a gift of these funds to plaintiff and denied him a separate property credit. The Appellate Division disagreed and find that the record supports defendant receiving a credit in those amounts in the equitable distribution of these assets.

August 1, 2006

New Court Rules For Depositions, Ex Parte Temporary Restraining Orders and Decisions

The Chief Administrator of the Courts has adopted new rules which will take effect on October 1, 2006 which are designed to prevent abuses in taking of depositions (22 NYCRR Part 221), limit the circumstances under which attorneys may obtain ex parte temporary restraining orders (22 NYCRR 202.7), and compel judges to comply with the rule which requires them to determine motions within 60 days after final submission.

No objections may be made at a deposition unless they are permitted under CPLR 3115 (b) [Errors which might be obviated if made known promptly], CPLR 3115 (c) [Disqualification of person taking deposition] or CPLR 3115 (d) [Competency of witnesses or admissibility of testimony] and would be waived if not interposed. In addition, the objections must be in compliance with CPLR 3115(e). The answer must be given and the deposition must proceed subject to the objections and subject to the right of a person to apply for appropriate relief pursuant to Article 31 of the CPLR. Every objection made during a deposition must be stated succinctly and framed so as not to suggest an answer to the deponent. In addition, if the questioning attorney requests it, the objection must include a clear statement as to any defect in form or other basis of error or irregularity. A deponent is required to answer all questions at a deposition, except when it is necessary to preserve a privilege or right of confidentiality, (to enforce a limitation set forth in an order of a court, or when the question is plainly improper and would, if answered, cause significant prejudice to any person. An attorney may not direct a deponent not to answer except under such circumstances or as provided in CPLR 3115. Any refusal to answer or direction not to answer must be accompanied by a succinct and clear statement of the basis therefor. Before interrupting a deposition, an attorney must 'clearly and succinctly' state the reason for intervening. An attorney may not interrupt the deposition for the purpose of communicating with the deponent unless all parties consent or the communication is made for the purpose of determining whether the question should not be answered on the grounds set forth in section 221.2 of the rules and, in such event, the reason for the communication must be stated for the record succinctly and clearly. Another new rule (22 NYCRR 202.7) prevents a party from seeking an ex parte temporary restraining order absent a showing of significant prejudice. Under the rule, judges are barred from granting restraining orders unless a party demonstrates a significant reason why an adversary must not know of the application in advance. Where a party can not demonstrate significant prejudice to justify obtaining an ex parte order, the attorney's must advise their adversaries of the time and place they will be asking for a restraining order. The rule does not specify how much advance notice will be required but provides that it must be 'sufficient' to allow opposition.

Section 202.8(h) of the Uniform Civil Rules for the Supreme and County Courts dealing with the Procedures for Pending Motions in the Supreme Court has been repealed and replaced with a new section 202.8(h) which now places the burden on the Court Administrators to notify a judge that 60 days has elapsed after final submission of a motion and there is no record that the motion has been resolved. The former rule placed the burden on the attorney for the movant to notify the judge by letter of this fact.

Child Support Award Unjust and Inappropriate

In Calian v Calian, 814 N.Y.S.2d 649 (2d Dept. 2006) the partes had joint custody of their three children. In their stipulation determining the issue of parental access to the children, the parties agreed that a comparison of the amount of time each parent had physical custody of the children would not be used in a future hearing determining child support. The Appellate Division noted that by so stipulating, the parties, in effect, agreed to employ a method which potentially would have yielded a child support award deviating from what the basic child support obligation would have been under the Child Support Standards Act. It found that the stipulation failed to include the provisions required, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240(1)(b), (h), when a stipulation deviates from the basic child support obligation, and that the Supreme Court properly found the relevant provisions invalid and, in effect, set that part of the Stipulation aside and applied the CSSA to determine the issue of child support. While the mother correctly pointed out that the requisite language was included in the original divorce stipulation, that stipulation was superseded by an intervening order modifying the divorce judgment and stipulation to comply with the CSSA. Upon setting aside that part of the Stipulation that deviated from the CSSA, the court properly determined that the defendant was the primary custodial parent. The Court found that the basic child support obligation was unjust and inappropriate under the circumstances of the case, even after the Supreme Court capped the combined parental income at $80,000, and deleted the award of $4,640 per year substituting a provision directing the plaintiff to pay basic child support in the sum of $300 per year.

New York Loses Continuing Jurisdiction to Enforce Support Order Modified By Another State

In Catalano v. Catalano, 27 A.D.3d 734, 812 N.Y.S.2d 616, 2006 WL [2d Dept.2006] following the parties' divorce in 1990, the mother relocated with the children to New Jersey, while the father re-located to Florida. Orders of the Family Court in 1999, and 2000, directed the father to pay for the support of the parties' three children. In June 2002 the parties' older son relocated to Florida to reside with the father. An order of the New Jersey Superior Court in 2004, terminated the New York support orders with regard to that son effective June 2002. The Appellate Division held that where a child support order issued by a tribunal of this state is modified by a tribunal of another state pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, this state loses continuing exclusive jurisdiction with regard to prospective enforcement of the order. The Family Court found that, since the New Jersey order dated March 12, 2004, terminated the father's support obligation as to one of the children effective June 2002, the court lost continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over the enforcement of the prior New York orders as of June 2002. However, this state may enforce the order that was modified by another state's tribunal, as to amounts accruing before the out-of-state modification (see Family Ct. Act § 580-205[c][1]). The New Jersey order modifying the New York order was dated March 14, 2004, and the court erred in dismissing the violation petition to the extent it sought arrears which accrued before that date.

Key Facts Deemed Admitted Where Father Did Not Controvert Them in Affidavit.

In Matter of Giliya v. Warren, 2006 WL 1544517 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) after the mother commenced a proceeding for an upward modification of the father's child support obligation, the parties entered into a stipulation of settlement which provided for the father to pay for certain educational needs of their child, and for the mother's application for an award of an attorney's fee to be determined upon submission of affidavits and documents, without a hearing. The Support Magistrate found that, although the mother's attorney had provided skillful representation that contributed to a successful resolution of the matter, the mother failed to provide adequate proof in support of her allegation that the father had substantial assets or to establish the true extent of her own income. The Appellate Division disagreed. It found that in support of her application, the mother submitted an affidavit and documentary evidence, including the first pages of relevant individual and corporate tax returns, which showed that she had a negative net worth and had not been steadily employed since mid-2001, while the father had a net worth of well over $500,000 and reported gross annual income of about $50,000. In opposition, the father did not deny the key facts alleged by the mother concerning the parties' respective financial circumstances, but contended that the mother's unemployment was voluntary and that her income prior to 2001 had been comparable to his own. The Appellate Division held that since the father did not controvert the key facts alleged in the application concerning the parties' financial circumstances, those facts are deemed admitted. It held that in view of the wide disparity in the parties' financial circumstances, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying any award of an attorney's fee to the mother. Taking into account the amount already paid by the mother, it found that an award of an attorney's fee to the mother's counsel of $10,000, plus disbursements $2,852, was warranted.

July 17, 2006

New Uncontested Divorce Packet

çThe Unified Court System's has a new Uncontested Divorce Packet for New Yorkers seeking an uncontested divorce without the assistance of an attorney. The comprehensive new packet, announced May 6, 2006 by Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye and Chief Administrative Judge Jonathan Lippman, is designed to simplify the complex legal process for self-represented litigants seeking uncontested divorces that do not involve children. It features user-friendly graphics and design with plain language step-by-step instructions and practice forms. The Uncontested Divorce Packet was created by Administrative Judge for Matrimonial Matters Jacqueline W. Silbermann, in collaboration with Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for Justice Initiatives Juanita Bing Newton, after recognizing the need for a more user-friendly resource for the large number of self-represented litigants seeking uncontested divorces. The packet, which includes the instruction booklet with practice forms, and a set of the official court forms for filing the divorce, are available at no charge in the New York Supreme Court in every county. The packet can also be accessed online from www.nycourts.gov/litigants/divorce or www.nycourthelp.gov. A packet for uncontested divorces that involve children is under development.

Court of Appeals Adopts Doctrine of Equitable Estoppel

In Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 40, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court and the Appellate Division, Second Department, in directing a man to pay child support for a child he did not father. The Court based its determination upon the doctrine of 'equity paternity,' or paternity by estoppel. The Court of Appeals focused on the best interests of the child, stating in an opinion by Judge Albert M. Rosenblatt for the 5-2 majority, that: 'In allowing a court to declare paternity irrespective of biological fatherhood, the Legislature made a deliberate policy choice that speaks directly to the case before us.' 'The potential damage to a child's psyche caused by suddenly ending established parental support need only be stated to be appreciated. Cutting off that support, whether emotional or financial, may leave the child in a worse position than if that support had never been given.' The Court of Appeals found that the Respondent had in every way held himself out to be the child's father, including buying her Christmas and birthday presents, referring to himself as 'daddy,' introducing her to his family, and regularly communicating with her. Judge George Bundy Smith dissented in an opinion joined by Judge Robert S. Smith. The dissent objected to the application of estoppel against a 'completely innocent litigant' who was misled by the child's mother. The mother swore in Family Court that she had not had sexual relations during the relevant time span with anyone other than Mark, an assertion that DNA analysis proved was a lie. They said the decision rewards people who make no effort to nurture or support a child who may be their own while penalizing people like Mark who immediately assumed responsibility.

Court of Appeals Holds New York State Constitution Does Not Grant Right to Marry to Same Sex Couples

In Hernandez v. Robles, 86, Samuels v. NYS Dept. of Health, 87, Kane v. Marsolais, 88, and Seymour v. Holcomb, 89, a 4-2 decision the Court of Appeals affirmed four Appellate Division decisions that had declined to extend the right to marry to same-sex couples. The opinion written by Judge Robert S. Smith found that a rational basis existed for the Legislature's decision to limit marriage to opposite-sex couples when it enacted the Domestic Relations Law in 1909, and whether same-sex marriage, as opposed to simply marriage itself, constitutes a fundamental right. He stated that there are at least two grounds that rationally support the limitation on marriage that the Legislature has enacted. First, the Legislature could rationally decide that, for the welfare of children, it is more important to promote stability, and to avoid instability, in opposite-sex than in same-sex relationships. Second, the Legislature could rationally believe that it is better, other things being equal, for children to grow up with both a mother and a father.' Such rational grounds were sufficient to uphold the Appellate Division decisions, as the plaintiffs failed to establish grounds for a heightened level of scrutiny, such as a fundamental right under the state Constitution to same-sex marriage. Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye wrote a lengthy dissent, which was joined by Judge Carmen Beauchamp Ciparick.

Public Policy Enunciated in DRL § 237 Embodies Level Playing Field

In Kessler v. Kessler, 2004-04773, an action for a divorce and ancillary relief, the wife sought to rescind or reform a prenuptial agreement on the grounds, inter alia, that she entered it under duress and that it was unconscionable. Supreme Court denied her request but held that the portion of the agreement waiving the right to seek an award of attorney's fees for the equitable distribution portion of their divorce case was unconscionable and unenforceable in light of Domestic Relations Law §237(a). The Second Department affirmed, holding that DRL § 237 "embodies a public policy determination by the Legislature that matrimonial matters are best resolved by parties operating on a level playing field". However, it indicated that "not every agreement waiving the right to seek an award of an attorney's fee should be set aside. Rather, careful and individualized scrutiny is called for. The determination as to whether or not a provision waiving the right to seek an award of an attorney's fee is enforceable must be made on a case-by-case basis after weighing the competing public policy interests in light of all relevant facts and circumstances both at the time the agreement was entered and at the time it is to be enforced. If, upon such an inquiry, the court determines that enforcement of the provision would preclude the non-monied spouse from carrying on or defending a matrimonial action or proceeding as justice requires, the provision may be held unenforceable. Also relevant to such a determination is the conduct of the parties over the course of the matrimonial action. Such a determination is frequently best made at the conclusion of the action. However, because an attorney's fee is authorized when needed to carry on or defend an action, it may be necessary to make such a determination at an earlier point in the litigation." To the extent that such an award would otherwise be subject to the waiver contained in the prenuptial agreement, the Supreme Court, after careful and individualized scrutiny of the need for the same, may award the wife an attorney's fee as justice requires to enable her to carry on or defend issues of equitable distribution. Here, the agreement provided that "each party shall have no right or claim against the other for support, alimony, attorney fees or costs." The Appellate Division found that there was a great disparity in the parties income and assets and the prenuptial agreement reflected no consideration given to the specific facts and circumstances of the parties as they related to an award of an attorney's fee. Although the wife came into the marriage with minimal assets compared to the husband, the agreement provided for a blanket waiver of the right to seek an award of an attorney's fee, regardless of the length of the marriage or what occurred therein. The agreement did not provide for any consideration to be given "at the time of the matrimonial action to the various issues relevant to an award of an attorney's fee, including, inter alia, the quantity and complexity of the issues to be litigated, and the relative means of the parties to do so". The court noted that matters related to child support and child custody were not controlled by the agreement, nor were the fees incurred by the wife in her unsuccessful effort to rescind or reform the agreement, which are not compensable pursuant to DRL § 237. The court found that the matrimonial scales were skewed in favor of the husband's heavier wallet. The wealthier spouse should not be permitted, by the same agreement, to both opt out of the statutory scheme concerning an award of an attorney's fee and prevent an effective assessment of how important an award of an attorney's fee may be. Moreover, whether or not either party here has improperly prolonged the litigation, or created needless litigation, etc., should also be considered by the court in determining the amount, if any, of an award of an attorney's fee to the wife.

July 3, 2006

Wife Liable For half of Taxes Where She Shared Equally in Benefits of Failure to Pay
In Conway v Conway, 15 N.Y.S.2d 233 (2d Dept.,2006) an action for a divorce, the Supreme Court awarded the wife one-half of $71,273 representing her share of the plaintiff's business, directed her to pay one-half of the parties' tax obligation, and directed her to pay 75% of the plaintiff's attorney and expert fees. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the Supreme Court correctly determined that the defendant was liable for one-half of the parties' tax obligation arising out of the failure to pay proper income taxes during their marriage. Since the defendant shared equally in the benefits derived from the failure to pay, she had to share in the financial liability arising out of tax liability.

Improper to Alter Custodial Arrangement Automatically upon Happening of Specified Future Event

In Brzozowski v Brzozowski, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1643384 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the mother appealed from an order of the Family Court, which, after a hearing, denied her petition to relocate with the child to Westport, Connecticut, and directed that in the event of her relocation with the child to Westport, Connecticut, the judgment of divorce and stipulation of settlement shall be modified so that physical custody is transferred to the father. The Appellate Division modified the order and vacated the direction that "[in] the event the mother relocates to Westport, Connecticut, then [physical] custody of the child .. shall belong with the father, forthwith." It held that this direction, while possibly never taking effect, impermissibly purported to alter the parties' custodial arrangement automatically upon the happening of a specified future event without taking into account the child's best interests at that time.

Oral Modification of Agreement Permitted Despite Contract Clause Prohibiting Oral Modification

In Healy v Williams, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1644138 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties entered into a stipulation in 1992 pursuant to which the defendant father was to pay $243 per week for child support for their two children, subject to cost-of-living adjustments. The Stipulation included a proscription against oral modification of its terms. It awarded the plaintiff exclusive use and occupancy of the marital home until the occurrence of a terminating event. One of the enumerated terminating events was the plaintiff's cohabitation with an unrelated male for 30 consecutive days. In or prior to August 1993, the plaintiff resided with an unrelated male in the former marital residence (potentially triggering a terminating event). The trial court found that in September 1993, the parties orally agreed to suspend the defendant's obligation to pay child support of $243 per week and reduced the payment to $300 per month per child. The trial court credited the defendant's testimony that the plaintiff received consideration from the defendant based on his agreement to defer his right to terminate her exclusive use and occupancy and to compel the immediate sale of the marital premises. In 1996 the plaintiff, who had since remarried, purchased the defendant's equity in the marital premises for a sum that was considerably less than fair market value. The court accepted the defendant's testimony which established that he accepted the lesser sum because the plaintiff agreed to extinguish the balance due on the suspended child support obligation and to permanently fix his obligation at the sum of $300 per month per child. In 1997, the older child began to reside with the defendant. Thereafter, the defendant paid the plaintiff $300 per month for the one child residing with her. From May 2000 to July 2002, each check for $300 also contained the notation "child support balance 0." The plaintiff endorsed these checks during that two-year period, before this enforcement proceeding was commenced. The Appellate Division affirmed. It stated that as a general rule, where a contract has a provision which explicitly prohibits oral modification, such clause is afforded great deference. Where such a clause is present, one claiming that provisions of the agreement were orally modified can only prevail upon proof that there was an oral modification and that the performance of the modification was not merely executory, but had actually been performed in a manner which was unequivocally referable to that oral modification. It agreed with the trial court that the defendant met that burden. The Appellate Division found that the trial court properly credited the defendant's testimony over that of the plaintiff. According to the defendant's testimony, in exchange for the reduction of his child support obligation, he had twice waived his right, pursuant to the Stipulation, to force a sale of the marital home, and then agreed to a buyout payment that was little more than half the value of his interest in the house. Additionally the court heard proof that one of the children resided with the defendant, the agreed level of child support was accepted without objection for five years, and during a portion of this time written notations on the child support checks indicated that no balance was due on the defendant's child support obligation. This testimony was sufficient to support the court's conclusion that the defendant had provided valuable consideration in exchange for the modification. It supported a finding that there had been partial performance and, as the parties' conduct conformed to the terms of the alleged oral agreement, and the record did not indicate other motivations for either party's conduct, that the performance was unequivocally referable to the oral modification.

Hearing of Objections in Family Court is Equivalent of Appellate Review. Failure to Preserve Issue By Failing to Object.

In Matter of Musarra v Musarra, 28 A.D.3d 668, 814 N.Y.S.2d 657 (2d Dept.,2006)the Support Magistrate found that the father's failure to pay support in July and October 2003 was willful and awarded the mother an attorney's fee of $10,019.22. The father did not file an objection to the Support Magistrate's finding that he willfully violated the support provisions of the parties' judgment of divorce. The Appellate Division noted that by failing to object to the finding the father failed to preserve the willfulness issue for appellate review. The hearing of objections in Family Court is the equivalent of an appellate review. (Citing Matter of Redmond v. Easy, 18 A.D.3d 283, 794 N.Y.S.2d 643). The Appellate Court also held that once a finding of willfulness was made, the court was required by Family Court Act § 438[b], to award an attorney's fee to the mother. Factors to be considered in computing an appropriate award of an attorney's fee include the parties' ability to pay, the nature and extent of the services rendered, the complexity of the issues involved, and the reasonableness of the fee under all of the circumstances. It reduced the award to $3,826, which constituted the attorney's fee incurred with respect to the violation petition.

Recipient May Not Impliedly Waive Unpaid Child Support. Change in Custody Insufficient to Constitute A Waiver

In Matter of Duffy v Duffy --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1544517 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 04421 the parties separation agreement, which was incorporated into a judgment of divorce, provided for joint legal custody, primary physical custody of both children to petitioner and biweekly child support payable by respondent in the amount of $424. In June 2002, the parties informally transferred primary physical custody of their son to respondent. Respondent began paying petitioner $93 biweekly, which he contended represented his support obligation as a result of the change in custody. In March 2004, respondent commenced a support modification proceeding in Family Court, resulting in a modification of the judgment of divorce. Petitioner then commenced a proceeding alleging a violation of the divorce judgment and seeking a money judgment for arrears. The Support Magistrate found that respondent willfully violated the judgment from June 1, 2002 through March 4, 2004, established arrears for that time period and awarded counsel fees to petitioner. The Appellate Division held that Family Court properly determined that respondent willfully violated the child support portion of the divorce judgment. Without an express waiver by petitioner of her right to receive the amount of child support recited in the divorce judgment, respondent was required to pay the court-ordered amount; a support recipient may not impliedly "waive the right to unpaid child support simply by failing to demand payment or seek enforcement of support obligations". The change in custody of one child was insufficient to constitute a waiver of child support. Therefore, respondent was required to file a modification petition if he desired to lower his child support payments. By unilaterally reducing the amount of support he paid, absent an express agreement with petitioner, respondent violated the divorce judgment. Petitioner proved that respondent did not pay as required but was financially capable of making those payments, thus establishing that the violation was willful.

June 16, 2006

Despite Father's Defiance of Court Orders Appellate Division Bends over Backward in Best Interest of Child

In Zafran v Zafran --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1085381 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in an order dated October 9, 2002 (affirmed Zafran v. Zafran, 306 A.D.2d 468, 761 N.Y.S.2d 317), the Supreme Court awarded custody of the parties' daughter to the defendant mother, based on a finding that the plaintiff father was responsible for alienating the parties' two sons from the mother. The order dated October 9, 2002, also implemented a case management plan, mandating family therapy conducted by a court-appointed mental health professional to serve as case manager, and awarded the father temporary visitation with the daughter, supervised by the case manager, pending the court's final determination on the issue of visitation, which was the subject of a hearing. At the hearing, it became apparent that the father had failed to cooperate with the court-ordered case management plan, which was designed to modify his alienating behavior so that he could resume unsupervised visitation with the daughter. The father had sought to manipulate the process to his advantage by, inter alia, surreptitiously tape recording his therapy sessions with the case manager. The visitation hearing was suspended to permit the court and the parties to address the issues presented by the father's secret taping. As a final step before resuming and completing the hearing, the Supreme Court, in an order dated July 16, 2004, directed the father to submit to a psychiatric evaluation, to "update the [c]ourt's forensics in this matter so that the visitation herein could be facilitated." The father did not undergo a psychiatric evaluation and stated through counsel in open court that he had no intention of submitting to a psychiatric evaluation or participating in the case management plan. The mother then moved, inter alia, to hold the father in contempt for failing to comply with the orders dated October 9, 2002, and July 16, 2004, and to suspend all visitation between the father and daughter pending further order of the Supreme Court. In an order dated February 4, 2005, the Supreme Court denied the relief requested by the mother, and instead terminated all visitation and contact between the father and the daughter. The Appellate Division found that the Supreme Court reasonably perceived a risk that the father would alienate the parties' daughter from the mother as he had done with the parties' sons. Moreover, by refusing to cooperate with the court-ordered case management plan, the father arguably forfeited his visitation rights. The Appellate Division did not agree that termination of visitation and contact between the father and the daughter was the appropriate response to the father's recalcitrance. "We are especially mindful that "[v]isitation is a joint right of the noncustodial parent and of the child"  and that "[i]t is generally in the best interest of the child for a rapport to be established with the noncustodial parent" . The record did not convince it that the result reached by the Supreme Court, which has the effect of terminating the daughter's relationship with her father, is in the daughter's best interest. It suggested that the Supreme Court revisit the issue of contempt, either in the context of a renewed motion by the mother or on its own motion. "Since the daughter's interests, and not just those of the father, are at stake, the father's refusal to cooperate with the Supreme Court's case management plan, including his express, open-court statements that he had no intention of complying with the court's orders, cannot be tolerated." The Court rejected the father's attempt to justify his defiance of court orders by arguing that those orders had the impermissible effect of conditioning his right to apply for visitation with the daughter upon his participation in therapy. On the prior appeal it had held that "since the father's right to visitation was not made contingent on his participation in therapy, there is no improper interference with his rights to visitation". The Supreme Court's subsequent order dated July 16, 2004, directed the father to submit to a psychiatric evaluation in order to "update the [c]ourt's forensics" and, thus, facilitate the court's ultimate determination of the visitation issue, a measure which clearly did not constitute an impermissible requirement of participation in therapy as a condition to applying for visitation. The therapy requirement was imposed as a component of the court-ordered program of temporary visitation, which is perfectly permissible. Because the therapy requirement was already properly in place, insisting that the father comply with that requirement does not impose a condition to an application for visitation. Any other rule would leave the Supreme Court powerless to enforce its legitimate directive that the father participate in therapy as part of a visitation program; the father would be entitled to violate the therapy requirement at will, and thus unilaterally remove the issue of therapy from the court's consideration upon any future reapplication for visitation. Moreover, the rationale underlying the rule against conditioning visitation upon participation in therapy is that a court may not properly delegate to mental health professionals the ultimate determination of whether a parent will be awarded visitation rights. It specifically directed the Supreme Court to exercise its own discretion to determine whether and when the suspension of the father's visitation rights should be lifted. That determination will not be left to the judgment of any mental health professional, but will be based upon the Supreme Court's findings and conclusions.

UIFSA is Retroactive

In Matter of Strom v Lomtevas, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1085871 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were divorced in New York in November 1987 pursuant to a resettled judgment of divorce which provided that the father was to pay the sum of $50 per week in child support. The resettled judgment additionally provided that "the Supreme Court retains jurisdiction with respect to custody, alimony, support and visitation as it finds appropriate under the circumstances and the Family Court shall not have concurrent jurisdiction." The mother, who subsequently remarried and relocated to Germany, filed a petition on October 8, 2002, inter alia, to enforce the support provision of the resettled judgment of divorce under the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, article 5-B of the Family Court Act. The Family Court received the petition pursuant to UIFSA. The Family Court granted the father's motion to dismiss the petition, finding that pursuant to the resettled judgment of divorce, it did not have subject matter jurisdiction. The Appellate Division reversed. The Appellate Division reversed. It noted that in 1997, when New York adopted the UIFSA, and as originally enacted, the UIFSA only applied prospectively. In 1998, however, the Legislature amended Family Court Act 580-904 to apply the UIFSA retroactively to "clarify that actions and pleadings filed and orders issued prior to the effective date of UIFSA will be governed by UIFSA. Although the parties' resettled judgment of divorce, which vested exclusive enforcement jurisdiction with the Supreme Court, was issued before the effective date of the UIFSA, the UIFSA and Family Ct Act 580-102 now governed the resettled judgment's provision for child support with jurisdiction established in the Family Court. Since the Family Court is the exclusive UIFSA enforcement tribunal, the provision of the 1987 resettled judgment of divorce, which vested the Supreme Court with exclusive jurisdiction, was inconsistent with the retroactively-applied State law and was rendered null and void. The Appellate Division reinstated the petition and remitted the matter to the Family Court for further proceedings on the petition.

Adoptive Mother Who Surrenders Child is Liable for Child Support

In Matter of Greene County DSS o/b/o Ward v. Ward --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1169127 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), respondent, who was divorced in 1999, sought to adopt a child with special needs and did so in June 2002. While the child's physical and psychological disabilities initially showed some improvement, by June 2003 the child's behavior had deteriorated to such an extent that respondent was unable to cope with the situation. As a consequence, respondent sought and obtained a judicial surrender of the child. Petitioner thereafter a proceeding seeking an order of support for the child. Family Court granted petitioner's application. The Appellate Division affirmed. Family Ct Act 413 provides, in pertinent part, that "the parents of a child under the age of [21] years are chargeable with the support of such child and, if possessed of sufficient means or able to earn such means, shall be required to pay for child support a fair and reasonable sum as the court may determine" (Family Ct Act 413[1][a]). A "parent," in turn, is defined as "an individual who is the biological parent, stepparent or adoptive parent of a child" (18 NYCRR 422.1[a]). Social Services Law 398(6)(f) provides a narrow exception to the mandate set forth in Family Ct Act 413, stating that "the acceptance by the social services official of a surrender of a child born out of wedlock from the mother or father of such child shall relieve the parent executing such surrender from any and all liability for the support of such child." Respondent contended that because she was unwed and the child was born out of wedlock, she should be relieved of her child support obligation under the terms of Social Services Law 398(6)(f). The Appellate Division disagreed. It held that the plain language of Social Services Law 398(6)(f) makes clear that the exception to a parent's obligation of support applies to children born out of wedlock and surrendered by the mother or father of such children. And while Social Services Law 398(6)(f) admittedly does not so expressly state, it is evident from both the use of the phrase "the mother or father" and the context in which such phrase is employed that "the parent executing such surrender" refers to the "biological parent" and not the sweeping definition of "parent" contained in 18 NYCRR 422.1(a). Such interpretation was supported by the legislative history underlying Social Services Law 398(6)(f). Had the Legislature wished to extend the exception set forth in Social Services Law 398(6)(f) beyond the biological parents of a child born out of wedlock, it would have so stated.

June 1, 2006

All Marital Debt Distributed to Husband Who Dissipated Assets. Wife Awarded Permanent Maintenance.

In Brzuszkiewicz v Brzuszkiewicz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 870934 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties had been married for 23 years and had three children, only one of whom was under 21 years of age. Supreme Court granted plaintiff a divorce and ordered an equal division of the parties' pensions, distributed all other marital assets to plaintiff and all marital debt to defendant, and directed defendant to pay plaintiff permanent maintenance in the amount of $300 per month. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that in addition to the length of the parties' marriage and their disparate incomes, the primary factor in Supreme Court's distribution was its finding that defendant had wastefully dissipated virtually all of the marital assets as well as plaintiff's separate property. Defendant mismanaged his rental property so that its income never exceeded its expenses, incurred excessive credit card debt and invested in a business that resulted in no economic benefit to the parties. As a result of this dissipation, the marital residence was the only remaining asset of significant value. Although valued at $96,000, the residence had a net equity of only $16,000 to $24,000 because defendant had recently extracted most of its value through refinancing to pay off his credit card. In addition, the parties had outstanding debts in excess of $90,000 as well as a large deficiency judgment against them due to foreclosure of a mortgage on defendant's rental property. The court rejected defendant's contention that Supreme Court abused its discretion by awarding plaintiff nondurational maintenance. It considered the relevant statutory factors, giving particular emphasis to the disparity between the parties' incomes, plaintiff's age, her lack of assets and defendant's dissipation of assets. Defendant earned $55,000 per year and his income would likely increase before he retires.

Plaintiff received only $22,000 per year from her employment and had little prospect of any significant increase before she retires, given that she was 57 years of age at the time of trial and had limited earning capacity due to her arthritis and severe hearing loss. Plaintiff's income from her pension and Social Security after retirement would be less than her current earnings, which are already insufficient to meet her modest monthly expenses. These factors all militated in favor of an award of permanent maintenance. Supreme Court also reasoned that defendant's earnings would increase and his debts would decrease in the future. Thus, the court appropriately balanced plaintiff's needs with defendant's ability to pay.

Abuse of Discretion to Deny Disclosure Which will Assist in Proving Case

In Siosky v Sinosky, 809 N.Y.S.2d 743 (4th Dept.2006) plaintiff sought an order terminating his maintenance obligation. Supreme Court denied plaintiff's application to depose defendant, and granted defendant's motion for dismissal. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the court abused its discretion in denying his application to depose defendant. "Pursuant to CPLR 3101(a), '[t]here shall be full disclosure of all evidence material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action, regardless of the burden of proof' " (Matter of New York County DES Litig., 171 A.D.2d 119, 122-123, 575 N.Y.S.2d 19). "This provision has been liberally construed to require disclosure where the matter sought will 'assist preparation for trial by sharpening the issues and reducing delay and prolixity.' Thus, restricted only by a test for materiality 'of usefulness and reason,' pretrial discovery is to be encouraged". While a court has broad discretion in controlling discovery and disclosure, " 'a clear abuse of discretion will prompt appellate action'. The Appellate Division found that there was a clear abuse of discretion because the plaintiff had established that the opportunity to depose the defendant would likely have assisted him in proving his case.

Attorney Sanctioned for Making Materially False Factual Statement to the Court

In Rogovin v Rogovin, 27 A.D.3d 233, 812 N.Y.S.2d 41(1st Dept, 2006) the Appellate Division held that Petitioner's attorney's failure in the custody proceeding to inform Family Court that the very relief he was seeking therein, an injunction against respondent's removing the subject child from the State of New York, had been denied, both by Supreme Court and this Court, in this Supreme Court habeas corpus proceeding he had also initiated on behalf of petitioner, was a sanctionable materially false factual statement. The omission was compounded by the attorney's assertion in opposition to the Law Guardian's motion for sanctions that he had verbally informed Family Court of the prior applications, which assertion was proven false by the transcript of the Family Court proceedings submitted with the Law Guardian's reply. The intent to protect a child does not justify a lack of candor with the court. It found no basis exists to disqualify the Law Guardian, who, having determined that the child was unimpaired in accordance with local standards, properly acted as the child's advocate in urging retention of the custodial status quo, rather than as an aide to the court in determining the child's best interests (citing Family Ct. Act § 241; see Matter of Albanese v. Lee, 272 A.D.2d 81, 707 N.Y.S.2d 171 [2000]; Law Guardian Definitions and Standards, State of New York Unified Court System, Statewide Administrative Judge for Matrimonial Matters). Argument from the Law Guardian in support of the child's stated preferences is to be expected. The Appellate Division also found that the record filed by petitioner's attorney was so deficient as to amount to frivolous conduct.

Payment of Marital Debts is Not Waste of Assets

In Rand v Rand, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1491960 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly concluded that the pre-tax $438,000 withdrawn by the plaintiff from his TIAA-CREF pension fund did not constitute waste or a dissipation of the parties' assets. The record supported the Supreme Court's finding that the plaintiff used the funds to pay legitimate expenses, much of which took the form of marital debts.

No Recoupment of Maintenance . Incomplete Education Is Not Enhanced Earning Capacity.

In Fruchter v Fruchter, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1493623 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that while a party in a matrimonial action may request the downward modification of a temporary child support award when that party can demonstrate financial hardship, such a downward modification may operate only prospectively. Thus, the plaintiff was not entitled to recoupment of payments previously made pursuant to the pendente lite order. It also found that the Supreme Court erred in appointing an appraiser to value the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity arising from educational accomplishments and professional training acquired during the marriage, including his Masters of Business Administration (hereinafter MBA) and Certified Financial Analyst (hereinafter CFA) studies and his legal training and employment. It held that his legal training and employment were not marital property because he received his law degree before the marriage. It was undisputed that the plaintiff did not finish the required courses to obtain an MBA degree and did not take all three CFA examinations required to receive that certification. Thus, as his MBA and CFA studies were uncompleted, any enhanced earning capacity which may result upon completion of these studies would not constitute marital property. Accordingly, the plaintiff had no enhanced earning capacity subject to equitable distribution to be appraised.

May 16, 2006

Parties Can Not Confer Jurisdiction on Appellate Division or Family Court Support Magistrate

In Commissioner of Services a/a/o Campbell v Harris, -- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 463254 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Department of Social Services, as assignee, filed a petition seeking an order of filiation. When they appeared in Family Court the parties stipulated on the record as follows: "IT IS HEREBY STIPULATED AND AGREED that this action and the issues therein be referred to the Hearing Examiner/Referee to hear and determine. All appeals of decisions made by the Hearing Examiner/Referee in their capacity as Referee shall be made to the Appellate Division. All issues of support are still subject to the objection process." After the Support Magistrate adjudged Harris the father of the child another Support Magistrate entered an Order of Support. Harris filed an objection to both orders. Family Court sustained his objections because, inter alia, the Support Magistrate commenced the hearing without advising Harris of his right to counsel. Thereafter, the court vacated her order and remanded the matter for a new paternity hearing, having determined that she did not have jurisdiction to vacate the orders of the support magistrates because of the stipulation signed by Harris and Campbell whereby all appeals of decisions made by the Hearing Examiner/Referee "shall be made to the Appellate Division." The Appellate Division reversed on the law holding that family court lacked jurisdiction. It held that assuming arguendo that the provision of the order of filiation allowing objections "[to] be filed with this court" would not abrogate an agreement between the parties to forego the objection process, the stipulation was void as a stipulation to enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of the Court. The stipulation was problematic in its entirety since the parties' agreement to adjudication by a hearing examiner/referee at that time was enjoined by statute. The statute in effect as of 2003 precluded support magistrates from hearing, determining or granting any relief with respect to issues of contested paternity. Harris disputed paternity. The action therefore required a hearing before a judge. Although the parties purported to waive this right and stipulate to allow the action to proceed before a hearing examiner, they could not effectively do so since their stipulation was void and unenforceable under the Family Court Act (see Matter of Niblock v. Niblock, 181 A.D.2d 825 [1992] Nor could the parties stipulate to enlarge the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Appellate Division (see Matter of Shaw, 96 N.Y.2d 7 [2001]).

No counsel Fee in Action to Set Aside Separation Agreement

In Fine v Fine, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 406297 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties entered into a stipulation of settlement of their matrimonial litigation. The stipulation of settlement was incorporated, but not merged, into the judgment of divorce entered July 21, 1999. As the unmerged stipulation of settlement survived as a separate contract, the plaintiff commenced the instant action to set it aside on the ground that it was fraudulently induced by the defendant's alleged misrepresentation of his income. The complaint sought no relief under the judgment of divorce. The Supreme Court granted that branch of the plaintiff's motion which was for an attorney's fee to the extent of awarding her a fee in the sum of $5,000, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 237(b). The award was in addition to an earlier $3,500 award of an attorney's fee to the plaintiff. The Appellate Division reversed. Domestic Relations Law 237(b) permits a court to award an attorney's fee "[u]pon any application to annul or modify an order or judgment for alimony ... or maintenance." The Supreme Court's reliance upon Conrad v. Conrad (64 A.D.2d 751, 406 N.Y.S.2d 636), in awarding the fee here, was misplaced, as Conrad affirmed an award of an attorney's fee where the parties' separation agreement merged into the judgment of divorce, thereby triggering the discretionary provisions of Domestic Relations Law 237(b). Here, relief is sought only as to the parties' stipulation of settlement, which did not merge into the judgment. A plenary action to vacate a stipulation of settlement on the basis of fraud, is not a matrimonial action. Accordingly, the Supreme Court erred in awarding the plaintiff an attorney's fee under Domestic Relations Law 237(b). An attorney's fee may be awarded when a party seeks by a plenary action to enforce a separation agreement or provisions of a judgment of divorce. However, the plaintiff, by seeking to set aside the parties' stipulation by a plenary action, was not entitled to an attorney's fee under Domestic Relations Law 237(b).

Application of Formula Amount to Income in Excess of $80,000 Requires Finding that Departure from Statutory Percentage not warranted.

In Cohen v Cohen --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 870800 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in June 1995 and had one child. In March 2002, plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. Supreme Court entered a judgment of divorce directing defendant to pay $2,000 in spousal maintenance per month for six years and $2,059.98 in child support per month. The Appellate Division agreed with defendant that Supreme Court erred in applying the statutory percentage to defendant's entire income without some record articulation of the court's reasoning. It is well settled that where the court opts to apply the full child support percentage [to annual income in excess of $80,000], the court's reasoning must evidence careful consideration of the parties' circumstances and reflect a finding that departure from the statutory percentage was not warranted. Supreme Court set defendant's annual income at $145,410 and, without further explanation, simply multiplied that amount by the statutory percentage (17%) to obtain a child support award in the amount of $2,059.98 per month. Further, while there may be evidence in the record to support the imputation of income to defendant beyond the widely varying accounts of his finances set forth by his expert at trial and in his sworn statements of net worth showing his annual income to be at most $85,000, Supreme Court did not delineate the sources of the income imputed to defendant or specify the amount assigned to each category. Similarly, although the court appeared to have imputed income to plaintiff in ruling that she would be liable for 40% of the child's unreimbursed medical expenses and day-care costs, the court did not specify the amount of that imputed income or take it into account in determining either of the parties' basic child support obligations. Supreme Court's decision was insufficiently detailed to permit the court to evaluate defendant's claim that the award of child support was excessive and the matter was remitted. It directed that upon remittal, Supreme Court should set forth in detail the amounts and sources of the parties' actual and imputed income and, if the court determines that the statutory percentage should be applied to the total combined parental income in determining child support, articulate the factors that the court deems relevant to its determination, if that combined annual income exceeds $80,000. The issue of durational maintenance was also remitted for redetermination.

No Hearing Required Where Family Court Possessed Sufficient Information to Render Informed Determination

In Grassi v Grassi --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 862854 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Family Court, without a hearing, granted sole custody of the parties' daughter to the father, denied the mother visitation with the daughter and, in effect, conditioned her further petition for supervised visitation upon her ability to demonstrate, among other things, that she maintained sobriety, regularly attended therapy sessions, and underwent a complete psychiatric in-depth extensive evaluation. The Appellate Division modified the order on the law by deleting the provision thereof, in effect, conditioning the mother's further petition for supervised visitation. It held that a parent seeking a change in custody is not automatically entitled to a hearing, but must make some evidentiary showing sufficient to warrant a hearing. The mother failed to make such a showing. In any event, the Family Court possessed sufficient information to render an informed determination on custody and visitation, without a hearing, consistent with the best interests of the child. The court presided over the parties' extensive court appearances, spanning approximately two years, and was intimately familiar with their situation, including the mother's repeated denial of her alcohol problem and the daughter's physical manifestations of her discomfort and anxiety on visitation days. The court conducted an in camera interview with the daughter and relied upon the reports of the Law Guardian and the Department of Probation. Accordingly, the court providently exercised its discretion in discontinuing the mother's supervised visitation with the daughter and declining to conduct a hearing on the issues of custody and visitation. However, it agreed with the mother's contention that it was improper for the Family Court to bar her from petitioning for visitation without first demonstrating "that she has maintained sobriety for a significant period of time; maintained regular therapy sessions; undergone a complete psychiatric in-depth extensive evaluation; and, if prescribed medication, she has complied and taken medication as directed". Although the court may, in appropriate circumstances, require a party to obtain counseling and treatment as a component of a custody or visitation order, it has no authority to compel a parent to undergo therapy as a condition to a future application for custody or visitation.

May 1, 2006

Counsel Now Required to Write a Letter to Court Where No Decision in 60 Days

22 N.Y.C.R.R. 202.8 (h) was amended to require counsel to advise the court by letter that 60 days have elapsed after a motion has been finally submitted or oral argument held, whichever was later, and no decision has been issued by the court. The letter must indicate the name and index number of the case and state: "Pursuant to section 202.8(h) of the Uniform Civil Rules for the Supreme and County Courts, please be advised that 60 days have elapsed after submission on (date) of the motion by (party) for (relief requested), and no decision has been issued." The letter may not contain any other substantive language. The letter requires no response.

Contingency Fees Barred in Any Matrimonial Action

In Ross v Delorenzo --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 1009642 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant hired the plaintiff to represent her in a divorce action and signed an hourly fee agreement. After discussing the case, the plaintiff concluded that, based on the short duration and alienated nature of the marriage and the dearth of marital property, the defendant was only entitled to nominal maintenance and was not entitled to equitable distribution. Based on the parties past business relationship the plaintiff decided to also interpose claims alleging an oral partnership and constructive trust and the parties signed a contingency fee agreement whereby the plaintiff would recover one third of all sums recovered on the partnership and constructive trust claims. The parties later executed a new hourly fee agreement that increased the plaintiff's hourly rate. According to the plaintiff, at some point during the course of the litigation he and the defendant agreed that he would accept $300,000 in full satisfaction of his fees if the matter settled for less than $1.8 million. After the matter was settled the parties stipulated to and the defendant thereafter remitted the sum of $200,000 to the plaintiff. When the plaintiff reminded the defendant that he was entitled to an additional $100,000, but the defendant refused to pay it, and the suit ensued. The Appellate Division held that an attorney may not, in the context of a suit which includes both matrimonial and nonmatrimonial causes of action, enter into a contingency fee agreement whereby he becomes entitled to a percentage of so much of the proceeds of the litigation as are derived from the nonmatrimonial causes of action. The court noted that while an attorney may charge a contingency fee to prosecute nonmatrimonial claims generally, "[a] lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect ... any fee in a domestic relations matter, the payment or amount of which is contingent upon the securing of a divorce or in any way determined by reference to the amount of maintenance, support, equitable distribution or property settlement" (citing, inter alia, 22 NYCRR 1200.11[c][2][i]; see 22 NYCRR 1400.1 and 1400.2.) "The rule against contingent fees in domestic relations cases in New York is deep seated and well established. The policy reasons include a belief that this kind of fee might induce lawyers to discourage reconciliation and encourage bitter and wounding court battles. Another often expressed policy reason to preclude contingent fees in matrimonial actions is that they are not necessary, since the court may award attorney's fees to a nonmonied spouse and thus any party should be able to retain counsel" . The Court was aware of rulings from other states holding that such fees do not violate the public policy against contingency fees in domestic relations matters because they are not contingent upon the securing of "alimony or support or property settlement in lieu thereof" . However, New York's prohibition on contingency fees in domestic relations matters is very broad, and does not distinguish between property settlements made in lieu of maintenance, support, or equitable distribution and property settlements based on nonmatrimonial property claims (see 22 NYCRR 1200.11[c][2][i]; see also 22 NYCRR 1400.1 and 1400.2). And, allowing contingency fees for nonmatrimonial claims interposed with matrimonial claims would contravene the important policy concerns that inform the general prohibition. Such a rule would create an incentive for attorneys to characterize most, if not all, of the proceeds of a settlement as deriving from the nonmatrimonial claims in order to maximize the value of, and therefore the contingency fee derived from, those claims. The result would be to diminish the amount of property available for maintenance, support, and equitable distribution. The Second Department concluded that the better rule is to prohibit contingency fees in the context of any action containing matrimonial claims

Counsel Sanctioned By Appellate Division for Matter Dehors the Record

In Miller v Dugan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 552483 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Supreme Court awarded the defendant sole title to the marital residence and certain rental property, directed her to transfer her interest in the marital residence and the rental property to the defendant, and awarded her the sum of $57,500 as the value of her equitable share of the rental property. The Appellate Division affirmed. On the court's own motion, counsel for the respective parties were directed by the Appellate Division to show cause why an order should or should not be made and entered imposing such sanctions or costs, if any, against the plaintiff and/or her counsel, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1(c)(3). It stated that: "The purpose of an appellate brief "is to assist, not mislead the court" (Merl v. Merl, 128 A.D.2d 685, 686, 513 N.Y.S.2d 184). Counsel who mischaracterize events, fabricate issues, and rely upon matter dehors the record act "in direct derogation of their professional obligations" (Merl v. Merl, supra at 686, 513 N.Y.S.2d 184). In the present case, the imposition of sanctions and/or costs against the plaintiff and/or her counsel may be warranted. Many of the plaintiff's appellate arguments appear to be unsupported by, or even contradicted by, the record and completely without merit in law or fact (see 22 NYCRR 130-1.1[a],[c][3]; Curcio v. Hogan Coring & Sawing Corp., 303 A.D.2d 357, 359, 756 N.Y.S.2d 269; Braten v. Finkelstein, 235 A.D.2d 513, 514, 652 N.Y.S.2d 769). Accordingly, it directed counsel for the parties to submit affirmations or affidavits on the issue of the imposition of sanctions and/or costs against the plaintiff and/or her counsel.

Husband Precluded for Failure to Comply with Discovery Demands

In Hildreth-Henry v Henry--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 552573 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Supreme Court after a nonjury trial, awarded the plaintiff yearly maintenance in the sum of $20,800 for five years, and did not credit him for his contributions to the appreciation in value of the plaintiff's separate properties. The Appellate Division held that since the plaintiff was not employed during the marriage and desired to attend college classes to earn an associate's degree, the five-year award of maintenance was a provident exercise of the court's discretion. The defendant's contention that the Supreme Court erred in failing to grant him a credit for his contributions to the mortgage payments of the marital residence, which the parties stipulated was the plaintiff's separate property, was not properly before this court, since the defendant did not request such relief in the Supreme Court, and it declined to review the issue in the exercise of discretion. Furthermore, the Supreme Court properly denied the defendant's request for credit for a portion of the appreciation of the plaintiff's other separate property. As a result of his failure to comply fully with the plaintiff's discovery demands, the defendant was precluded from testifying at trial and, therefore, could not establish his claim to the appreciated value of the plaintiff's other separate property.

Stipulation of Settlement Conditioned on Divorce Enforced.

In Tarone v Tarone, 25 A.D.3d 779, 809 N.Y.S.2d 150 (2d Dept.,2006) the plaintiff and the appellant entered into a stipulation of settlement of the financial issues in their Action for a divorce with the understanding that the stipulation would be "incorporated but not merged into the parties Judgment of Divorce." Immediately thereafter, the court conducted an inquest regarding the issue of constructive abandonment alleged by the plaintiff. At the conclusion of the inquest, the court granted "the plaintiff a Judgment of Divorce based upon the grounds of constructive abandonment" and held that "[t]he terms of the stipulation are incorporated into the decree." The plaintiff was directed to submit a judgment of divorce to the court. Thereafter, the Supreme Court granted the appellant's motion to set aside its determination, held that the plaintiff failed to establish grounds for divorce, and set the matter down for a new trial, but refused to set aside the stipulation of settlement. The Appellate Division held that this was error. Open-court stipulations are judicially favored, and will not be set aside absent fraud, overreaching, mistake, duress, or unconscionability. However in view of the determination that the plaintiff failed to establish his entitlement to a divorce, the stipulation of settlement should have been vacated (citing Lyons v. Lyons, 187 A.D.2d 415, 416, 589 N.Y.S.2d 557; Elkaim v. Elkaim, 123 A.D.2d 371, 506 N.Y.S.2d 450). The stipulation could not be considered a valid postnuptial or "opting out" agreement pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(3).

April 17, 2006

Child Support Award in High Income Cases Should Be Based On Need and Standard of Living and Court May Consider Partial Tax Year Income Information

In Culhane v Holt --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 910403 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department embraced the rule enunciated by the Second Department in Matter of Brim v. Combs, 25 AD3d 691, 808 N.Y.S.2d 735, 736 [2006] that "[I]n high income cases, the appropriate determination under [FCA § 413(1)(f)] for an award of child support on parental income in excess of $80,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and the amount that is required for the child to live an appropriate lifestyle, rather than the wealth of one or both parties". The First Department also adopted the rule of the Fourth Department (in Kellogg v. Kellogg, 300 A.D.2d 996 [2002]; Matter of Monroe County Dept. of Social Servs. v Mercado, 241 A.D.2d 948 [1997]) when it held that the Magistrate did not violate the mandate of Family Court Act § 413(1)(b)(5)(i) when he based respondent's income on the average of his projected earnings for 2004 and 2005. It stated that while FCA § 413(1)(b)(5)(i) provides that the relevant income figure is the "gross (total) income as it should have been or should be reported in the most recent federal income tax return," nothing in the statute prohibits reliance upon partial information from a tax year not yet completed, and a court is not required to rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances and may impute income based upon that party's past income or demonstrated earning potential. Brim v Combs relied on the First Department's statement in Anonymous v. Anonymous, 286 A.D.2d 585 [2001]), where the trial court fixed child support in an amount necessary to enable the child to significantly enjoy the aspects of the parties marital standard of living consistent with the social milieu in which she was raised. The First Department commented that "...we note that consideration of the child's actual needs with reference to the prior standard of living continues to be appropriate in determining an award of child support on parental income in excess of $80,000.00". The Court in Anonymous also referred to Gluckman v Qua, 253 AD2d 267, where the Third Department held that the child's needs is one of the factors to be considered if the court decides to deviate from the statutory percentage in excess of $80,000.00.

Vocational Assessment of Wife Denied Where Wife Never Worked Outside Home

In Obermueller v Obermueller, 24 A.D.3d 641, 808 N.Y.S.2d 324 (2d Dept.2005) the plaintiff, who was approximately 60 years of age, never worked outside the home in this more than 28 year marriage. The defendant served a notice pursuant to CPLR 3121 to the plaintiff to submit to a vocational assessment. The Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court providently granted the plaintiff's motion for a protective order. Although broad financial disclosure is necessary and required in a matrimonial action, the trial court is also vested with "broad discretion to supervise disclosure to prevent unreasonable annoyance, expense, embarrassment, disadvantage or other prejudice".. Under the circumstances of this case, including the fact that the defendant simultaneously sought discovery through other CPLR article 31 devices, which discovery had not been completed when the plaintiff's motion was made, the plaintiff's motion for a protective order was appropriately granted to prevent unreasonable annoyance and expense to the plaintiff.

Modification of child Support Denied Where Surviving Agreement and Boden-Brescia Test Not Met

In Hejna v Reilly, -- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 407796 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties entered into a separation agreement which was incorporated, but not merged, into their judgment of divorce. Plaintiff obtained primary physical custody of the parties' two children. Defendant agreed to pay $603.59 in biweekly child support and to contribute one half of the college tuition expenses for each of the children "based upon the cost of same at a New York State supported college, equivalent to SUNY Albany." In September 2003, while still in high school, the daughter elected to take courses at SUNY Albany, for which the father paid. A year later, the daughter matriculated at Yale University. The mother moved for modification of the child support provisions of the separation agreement, seeking increased child support and to direct the father to pay one half of each child's college expenses as determined by the institution actually attended by the child. The father cross-moved for partial reimbursement of the expenses incurred during the daughter's attendance at SUNY Albany and recoupment of support paid to the mother while the daughter allegedly resided with him. Supreme Court granted the mother's motion for an upward modification of child support from biweekly payments of $603.59 to weekly payments of $642 and the father's cross motion for a money judgment based upon the daughter's SUNY Albany expenses. The Appellate Division rejected the mother's argument that the child support provisions should be modified and reversed. It held that it is well settled that the child support provisions of separation agreements that are incorporated but not merged into divorce decrees can be modified only if it is shown that the agreement was not fair and equitable when entered into or that there has been a subsequent unanticipated change in circumstances and a concomitant showing of need. The mother did not assert that the terms of the agreement were unfair or inequitable. Rather, she argued that an unanticipated change in circumstances had occurred based upon the father's increased income and his receipt of a $58,332 inheritance, as well as the daughter's choice to attend a costly private university. The Appellate Division held that "neither an increase in the income of the noncustodial parent nor the generalized increased needs of the parties' growing children, standing alone, are sufficient to warrant an upward modification of support". Where, as here, a separation agreement "manifests an understanding that the child might pursue a college education [and s]pecific provision was made ... to cover those expenses," an unanticipated or unreasonable change in circumstances will not be found based solely on an increase in the cost of that education (Matter of Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 213 [1977]; see Matter of Gravlin v. Ruppert, supra at 5). Further, neither the father's increase in income from approximately $68,000 to $80,000 nor his inheritance constituted unreasonable or unanticipated circumstances warranting a modification of child support. The mother's conclusory allegations, unsupported by documentary evidence, that the cost of the daughter's education had left her without adequate support were insufficient to establish that the children's needs are not being met. The court noted that its holding with respect to the father's inheritance was limited to a rejection of the mother's argument that a $58,332 bequest constituted an unanticipated change in circumstances in light of the facts of this particular case. It did not question the proposition that, as a general matter, "while New York does not consider inheritances to fall within the statutory definition of gross income used to calculate a parent's basic child support obligation, it treats the entire amount of the inheritance as an available resource where additional support is warranted". The Appellate Division agreed with the mother that Supreme Court improperly directed her to reimburse the father for expenses that he incurred when the daughter attended SUNY Albany. The parties agreed only that the father would be responsible for a certain portion of the children's college expenses and, in the absence of any indication that the mother would be required to provide an equal amount, such a term may not be reasonably implied by the agreement's language.

Split of Authority on Modification of Child Support Where No Surviving Agreement

In Kent v Kent --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 463650 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department recognized that there is a split in authority as to whether a substantial increase in the noncustodial parent's income, in and of itself, warrants an upward modification, where there is no surviving agreement. It referred to the following cases: Matter of Commr. of Soc. Servs. v. Currie, 182 A.D.2d 433 [1st Dept 1992] [increase in court-ordered child support based solely on increase in income of noncustodial spouse warranted where such increase lifts child out of living below poverty level]; Matter of Love, 303 A.D.2d 756 [2d Dept 2003] [increase in income only one factor to consider on upward modification application]; Matter of Sorrentino v. Sorrentino, 203 A.D.2d 829 [3d Dept 1994] [increase in income alone under certain circumstances sufficient change in circumstances to warrant upward modification].

April 3, 2006

Preclusion Warranted Only Where Failure to Disclose is Wilful and Contumacious

In Anthony v Anthony, 24 A.D.3d 694, 807 N.Y.S.2d 394(2d Dept.,2005) Supreme Court granted that branch of the plaintiff's motion which was pursuant to CPLR 3126 to the extent of precluding him "from offering any testimony [at trial] in connection with credit card accounts, bank accounts, investment accounts, the use of the second mortgage placed upon the marital premises by him and the value of the Maryland property for which he failed to provide information [and directing that] all issues with regard to the documents defendant failed to supply shall be resolved in favor of the plaintiff," and granted that branch of the plaintiff's motion which was for an award of an attorney's fee in the sum of $3,120. The Appellate Division reversed the order and denied those branches of the plaintiff's motion which were pursuant to CPLR 3126 and for an award of an attorney's fee are denied. It held that while the nature and degree of the penalty to be imposed on a motion pursuant to CPLR 3126 is a matter of discretion for the court an order of preclusion should only be imposed where the moving party establishes that the failure to disclose is willful and contumacious (citing Mangiapane v. Brookhaven Beach Health Related Facility, 305 A.D.2d 642, 759 N.Y.S.2d 890; Klutchko v. Baron, 1 A.D.3d 400, 768 N.Y.S.2d 217). Since the plaintiff did not show that the defendant's failure to disclose was willful and contumacious, the court's determination to preclude the defendant from offering testimony at trial concerning certain categories of documents, to resolve issues concerning those documents in favor of the plaintiff, and to award an attorney's fee to the plaintiff was improvident.

Life Insurance Award Should Have Been Declining Term Policy

In Somerville v Somerville, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 344806 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties married in February 1999. Supreme Court granted defendant a divorce, directed plaintiff to pay spousal maintenance in the amount of $1,000 per month for 24 months. Supreme Court awarded sole legal and physical custody of the child to defendant with liberal visitation to plaintiff. Plaintiff also was ordered to pay child support in the amount of $2,000 per month (including arrears), in addition to 92% of any childcare and uncovered healthcare expenses and 100% of the child's educational expenses. To secure such obligations, plaintiff was ordered to maintain a $1 million life insurance policy for the child's benefit for the duration of his support obligation. The Appellate Division held that the $1 million life insurance policy intended to secure plaintiff's child support obligation should be a declining term policy that would permit plaintiff to reduce the amount of coverage by the amount of child support actually paid (citing Florio v. Florio, --- AD3d ----[Jan. 19, 2006], slip op p 6).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Warrants New Custody Hearing

In Mitchell v Childs, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 407686 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the petitioner was in prison and consistently sought visitation. The current proceeding was grounded upon petitioner's September 21, 2004 petition which he completed pro se. In that petition he that he had the right to have visitation with his child, despite his incarceration, unless it is first shown that visitation is detrimental to the child's welfare. At the initial court appearance on October 19, 2004, only the Law Guardian was present. Family Court appointed a Public Defender for petitioner. At the next court appearance, the Public Defender appeared without petitioner and respondent appeared pro se. The Law Guardian advocated for dismissal of the proceeding since petitioner had no relationship with the child; no mention was made about allegations that respondent had consistently violated the court's prior order. The Public Defender openly admitted to Family Court that she had not yet spoken with petitioner and had no relevant documents with her, other than a copy of the petition. Family Court adjourned the matter and denied both the motion to dismiss and the Public Defender's request to have petitioner participate by phone. Instead, Family Court told the Public Defender to speak with petitioner and be prepared to speak on his behalf at the next scheduled hearing. On November 30, 2004, respondent and her counsel, the Law Guardian and a different Public Defender appearing for petitioner were present. This Public Defender admitted that she had not spoken to petitioner, had no file on the matter and had absolutely no information about this proceeding. Respondent's counsel moved to dismiss the petition, claiming no change in circumstance. Respondent's counsel represented to Family Court that petitioner might soon be eligible for parole so there was no point in having visitation; the Law Guardian agreed. Without articulating a basis, Family Court dismissed the petition, without prejudice, and stated that "[i]t's almost malpractice that the members of the Office of the Public Defender don't talk to each other." The Appellate Division held that petitioner was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel. Recognizing that petitioner had to demonstrate that he "received less than meaningful representation and that he suffered actual prejudice as a result of the claimed deficiencies in the representation provided by counsel" (citing Matter of Jonathan LL. [Lobsang LL.], 294 A.D.2d 752, 753 [2002]), the court found it evident, as did Family Court, that there was a consistent failure by the Public Defender's office to communicate with petitioner at any point prior to his scheduled appearances. Moreover, even though problems were noted in petitioner's pro se pleadings, such to be liberally construed. Had petitioner's counsel communicated with him, these drafting deficiencies could have been rectified by the filing of an amended petition. The court could not condone the inadequacy of the representation provided to him when petitioner has a statutory right to have counsel in these circumstances.

Incontrovertible Official Document Which is De Hors the Record May Be Considered on Appeal

In Interrante v Rozzi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 407776 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) plaintiff commenced an action for a divorce in 1996. In 1999, Supreme Court granted plaintiff a preliminary injunction prohibiting defendant from selling, transferring or otherwise disposing of the parties' marital assets, including stocks and securities, during the pendency of the action. Following trial, Supreme Court issued a decision and order in February 2003 that, among other things, awarded plaintiff a judgment of divorce and directed equitable distribution of the marital assets. In May 2004, the court stayed that decision and order pending an accounting of the marital assets and, thus, did not enter a judgment of divorce. The court also ruled that the October 1999 restraining order was still in effect and that defendant was in violation of it. The Appellate Division affirmed. Both the record and defendant's admissions as reflected in a Supreme Court order issued subsequent to the May 2004 order fully supported the court's finding that the restraining order continued in force and effect, and that defendant knowingly violated that order. The Appellate Division held that contrary to defendant's argument that the subsequent order may not be considered on appeal "an incontrovertible official document, even though it is dehors the record, may be considered on appeal for the purpose[] of sustaining a judgment" (citing Brandes Meat Corp. v. Cromer, 146 A.D.2d 666, 667 [1989]; see Matter of Park Realty Corp. v. Hydrania, Inc., 17 A.D.3d 898, 899 [2005]).

Denial of Right to Counsel Warrants Reversal of Custody Order

In Matter of Williams v Bentley, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 406820 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Family Court improperly conducted a custody hearing in the absence of the mother's counsel. Family Court awarded custody to the father, stating that it intended to avoid delaying the hearing and disposition of the custody matter. The mother repeatedly told the Family Court that she would not proceed in the absence of her lawyer and that she would wait for her lawyer. Requiring the mother to try the custody matter without benefit of counsel impermissibly placed the court's interest in preventing delay above the interest of the parents and the children, and violated the mother's right to be represented by counsel. The deprivation of a party's fundamental right to counsel in a custody or visitation proceeding is a denial of due process and requires reversal, without regard to the merits of the unrepresented party's position.

March 16, 2006

Supreme Court Impermissibly Engaged in "Double Counting" Husbands' Income in Fixing Maintenance Award

In Keane v Keane --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 223830 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the wife maintenance of $1,292 per month through December 1, 2010, and $471 per month thereafter, granted her a distributive award of $57,600, plus monthly payments of only $2,000 until September 2012, and denied her an award of an attorney's fee,. The judgment was modified, by the Appellate Division, inter alia, deleting the provision thereof awarding the plaintiff wife nondurational maintenance . The parties were married for over 30 years and were 62 and 63 years of age, respectively, at the time of trial. The plaintiff wife was not employed during the marriage. The husband was the sole shareholder of a real estate entity which held two assets, one of which was a real estate parcel leased to an automobile body repair shop which yielded monthly rental income. The only evidence of the body shop property's value was supplied by his appraiser, who estimated its value to be approximately $290,000, on the basis of a capitalization of income approach which took into consideration, inter alia, the monthly rental income. The appraiser estimated the body shop property's value to be approximately $324,000 if it were valued according to the market approach. The parties stipulated that the marital property would be equally distributed between them. In 1981 the defendant and his two siblings inherited a vacation residence . In 2001 the property was valued at $1,050,000, which was $990,000 more than its estimated value in 1980. The evidence established that the defendant held sole title to the Madison property at the time of the commencement of the matrimonial action. The Appellate Division held that, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the defendant established that he held a two-thirds interest in the property as nominee of his siblings and that his original one-third interest constituted separate property based upon evidence that he acquired it through inheritance from his father. The Appellate Division held that the Appreciation in the value of the defendant's separate property due to the plaintiff's contributions or efforts constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution and that the Supreme Court correctly determined that 30% of the appreciation of the defendant's original one-third interest in the property (30% of $330,000) constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution. The balance of the appreciation in the value of the property resulted from market forces rather than the plaintiff's contributions or efforts. The Appellate Division held that considering the plaintiff's age, the length of the marriage, and her limited employment history, the plaintiff was unequipped to become self supporting and that an award of non-durational maintenance was appropriate. In adjudicating the amount of maintenance, the Supreme Court properly considered the parties' Social Security benefits. The Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court improperly considered the defendant's monthly rental income received from the body shop repair business in awarding the plaintiff maintenance of $1,292 per month through December 1, 2010. The Supreme Court valued the body shop property at full market value by utilizing the capitalization of income method supplied by the defendant's appraiser, and included its value in calculating the plaintiff's distributive award of marital property. It was proper for the Supreme Court to utilize the capitalization of income approach to value this income producing property. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court also included the monthly rental income from the body shop repair business until the expiration of the lease term in 2010 in fixing the maintenance award of $1,292 per month through December 1, 2010, without making an adjustment to reflect that the rental income stream was previously included in the plaintiff's distributive award. It held that the Supreme Court impermissibly engaged in the "double counting" of the defendant's income by valuing the body shop property, which was equitably distributed as marital property, and by calculating the amount of maintenance to the plaintiff based upon the excess earnings of that business (see Grunfeld v. Grunfeld, 94 N.Y.2d 696; McSparron v. McSparron, 87 N.Y.2d 275; Murphy v. Murphy, 6 AD3d 678). "Once a court converts a specific stream of income into an asset, that income may no longer be calculated into the maintenance formula and payout". Consequently, the Supreme Court had to "reduce either the income available to make maintenance payments or the marital assets available for distribution, or some combination of the two". It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court to recalculate that portion of the maintenance awarded to the plaintiff through December 1, 2010.

Reargument Granted By Appellate Division in High Income Child Support Case

In Matter of Brim v Combs, 2005 WL 758112 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), a child support proceeding to vacate a child support agreement and modify the father's child support obligation, the father a well known singer, appealed from an order of the Family Court which granted the petition and awarded the mother child support in the sum of $35,000 per month, child support arrears in the sum of $398,451.12, and an attorney's fee in the sum of $60,000. The Appellate Division modified the order by directing the father to pay child support in the sum of $21,782.08 per month and remitted for further proceedings. It found that in calculating the award of child support to the mother under Family Court Act 413, the Support Magistrate erred in basing the award in part on the amount of child support the father paid for his other child by a different woman, particularly where no evidence was presented as to that child's expenses, resources, and needs. It held that "To this end, in high income cases, the appropriate determination under Family Court Act 413(f) for an award of child support on parental income in excess of $80,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and the amount that is required for the child to live an appropriate lifestyle, rather than the wealth of one or both parties (citing Anonymous v Anonymous, 286 AD2d 585). It found that the mother's net worth statement and her extensive testimony at the hearing established that her expenses related to the child were $21,782.08 per month, exclusive of the child's educational, health, medical, dental, extracurricular activity, transportation, security, and summer camp expenses, which in any case were paid by the father. This amount was deemed admitted as fact by the father due to his failure to comply with the compulsory financial disclosure requirements of Family Court Act 424-a. It held that The Family Court erred in awarding $35,000 in monthly child support to the mother. It held that the mother should have been awarded monthly child support in the sum of $21,782.08 to satisfy the child's actual needs and to afford him an appropriate lifestyle (see Family Court Act 413). The arrears in child support had to be recalculated in light of the change. Subsequently, in Matter of Brim v Combs, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 203500 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division granted the appellant's motion for leave to reargue and recalled and vacated its April 4, 2005 decision, substituting a new decision which was identical to the original decision except it awarded the mother $19,148.74 in child support, instead of $21,782.08, indicating that the mother's net worth statement and her extensive testimony at the hearing established that her expenses related to the child were $19,148.74 per month.

Loan Established by Check Notation. Counsel Fee to Wife Who Received Large Distributive Award Because of Husbands Trial Tactics

In Levine v Levine, 24 A.D.3d 625, 807 N.Y.S.2d 384, (2d Dept, 2005) the Supreme Court, Nassau County allocated marital debt and awarded an attorney's fee to the defendant in the sum of $250,000. The Appellate Division affirmed. During the course of the parties' marriage, the defendant's father gave them a 14% interest in a corporation called Browertown, a holding company formed for the purpose of constructing a nursing home. After construction began, the corporation issued a capital call from its shareholders. The parties did not have the funds to meet the contribution of $280,000 demanded from the shareholders. Accordingly, the defendant's father gave the parties a check in the sum of $280,000 which had the word "loan" written on it to meet the capital call. The defendant claimed that this payment represented a bona fide marital debt to be satisfied from marital assets before distribution. The plaintiff, contended that the money was given to the parties by the defendant's father as gifts to both of them. The trial court found that the payment of $280,000 was a loan to both parties, based upon the memorandum notation on the check issued to the parties. The Appellate Division held that there was sufficient evidence adduced at trial demonstrating that the $280,000 payment constituted a loan, to be paid either when Browertown began to make disbursements to its shareholders, or upon demand made by the defendant's father. Accordingly, the trial court properly allocated the loan as marital debt to be satisfied from the marital assets prior to distribution. In light of factors such as the disparity in income between the parties, the plaintiff's trial tactics which unnecessarily prolonged the litigation, as well as the plaintiff's willful failure to comply with court orders, the Supreme Court properly directed the plaintiff to pay a portion of the defendant's attorney's fee, despite the substantial equitable distribution award to the defendant.

March 1, 2006

Medical Reports Not admissible as Business Records Where They Contain Doctor's Opinion or Expert Proof

In Bronstein-Becher v Becher, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 240531 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), during a hearing pursuant to a violation petition, the evidence revealed that the father failed to make the requisite child support payments. Failure to pay support as ordered constitutes "prima facie evidence of a willful violation". Once prima facie evidence of willful violation was presented, the burden shifted to the father to offer competent, credible evidence of his inability to make the support payments. At the hearing, the father's attorney sought to introduce into evidence medical reports from the father's psychiatrist, Dr. Edward M. Stephens. While the reports were certified, the hearing court found them to be inadmissible, stating they were "not a medical record [and] not a hospital record. It's a letter. Therefore, it's hearsay." The Appellate Division held that the hearing court was correct in refusing to accept Dr. Stephen's medical reports into evidence. A physician's office records, supported by the statutory foundations set forth in CPLR 4518(a), are admissible in evidence as business records. However, medical reports, as opposed to day-to-day business entries of a treating physician, are not admissible as business records where they contain the doctor's opinion or expert proof. Here, Dr. Stephens' two "narrative reports" were simply letters summarizing his diagnosis, treatment, and opinion concerning the father's ability to return to work. No proper foundation was provided demonstrating that they were in fact business records (see CPLR 4518[a]). Their certification did not cure this defect as only hospital records, and not physician office records, are admissible by certification. Since the father failed to submit evidence sufficient to show his inability to pay, he failed to rebut the mother's prima facie case. Accordingly, the Family Court properly found him to be in contempt for willfully failing to obey the child support order.

Error to Terminate Maintenance Where Former Wife Cohabits With Unrelated Male

In Florio v Florio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3676634 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1979 and the action was commenced in 2002. Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded plaintiff the three rental properties acquired by the parties during marriage, with a directive that he be responsible for the mortgages and related expenses until such time as he elected to sell such properties and made a similar award to defendant as to the marital residence, except that defendant was directed to sell the property on or before June 30, 2005, at which time she would retain all proceeds from the sale. Plaintiff was directed to pay defendant maintenance of $700 per week until June 30, 2005, at which point his maintenance obligation would be reduced to $400 per week. The Appellate Division rejected defendant's assertion that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff a $75,000 credit in distributing his employee savings plan. It stated that although plaintiff's proof on this point could have been presented with greater clarity, his testimony and the documentary evidence adduced at trial were sufficient to document the various marital expenses he paid following his departure from the marital residence. While there may have been deficiencies in plaintiff's paper trail, there was no serious dispute that plaintiff paid the expenses at issue, nor was there any proof that defendant in any way contributed to such payments. Nor was there any error or inequity in Supreme Court's directive that defendant sell the marital residence by a particular date. Defendant's testimony made clear that she could not have remained in the marital residence pending trial had plaintiff not paid the mortgage and the home equity line of credit and that she could not afford to retain the marital residence at her current income level. Supreme Court was not arbitrarily removing defendant from the marital residence but, rather, was imposing a limit upon the amount of time that plaintiff would be required to fund defendant's continued occupancy of it. Although Supreme Court essentially divided the remaining cash assets 50% to each party, the real estate was divided 35% to defendant and 65% to plaintiff. Supreme Court's only expressed rationale was that plaintiff was financially better able to maintain the rental properties until they could be sold. However, these properties were awarded, in kind, to plaintiff. The remaining tangible personalty was also awarded to plaintiff, although its value was not established by competent evidence by either party. The Appellate Division held that some semblance of parity must be achieved. In this 25-year marriage, not only did defendant contribute financially, but Supreme Court found that she contributed as a spouse, parent and homemaker. Under these circumstances, Supreme Court abused its discretion in not dividing all assets 50% to each party. The Supreme court's written decision provided that the award of maintenance "shall cease upon the [d]efendant's remarriage or cohabitation with an unrelated male or the death of the [p]laintiff."

Defendant contended that Supreme Court erred in permitting plaintiff to terminate maintenance payments upon proof that she is cohabiting with an unrelated male as Domestic Relations Law 248 requires, in addition to cohabitation, proof that defendant "hold[s] herself out as his wife, although not married to such man." As the case law on this point plainly requires that both elements of the statute be established and, further, that mere cohabitation is insufficient any attempt by Supreme Court to impose a less stringent requirement clearly would be erroneous. Supreme Court did not err in the amount or duration of the maintenance awarded to defendant. While defendant held a Master's degree in elementary education and could, by her own admission, seek a better paying position, neither party presented any testimony as to the likelihood of the then 47-year-old defendant, who was earning $15,000 per year as a teacher's assistant, obtaining a full-time teaching position that would allow her to be self-supporting. Having failed to demonstrate that defendant was intentionally underemployed and/or capable of securing a full-time position well in excess of her then current salary, and in light of the income disparity existing between the parties at the time of trial, plaintiff could not now be heard to complain as to his maintenance obligation. However, Supreme Court abused its discretion as to the award of counsel fees to defendant. She received sufficient assets to enable her to pay her own counsel fees. Under such circumstances, Supreme Court abused its discretion in ordering plaintiff to pay defendant's then outstanding counsel fees in the amount of $7,500, particularly in view of the fact that defendant utilized marital assets to pay her initial round of counsel fees.

Counsel Fee to Wife Who Discontinued Prior Action Was Improvident Exercise of Discretion

In Mesholam v Mesholam, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 205088 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, valued the husband's pension at $859,084 for purposes of equitable distribution, directed that he pay pendente lite arrears in the amount of $31,746, did not credit him for mortgage payments made on the marital residence, and directed that he pay 60% of the wife's counsel fees. The Appellate Division modified the judgment. It held that although trial courts have the discretion to select valuation dates which are appropriate and fair under the particular facts and circumstances presented. Under the circumstances of this case, the selection of the commencement date of the action as the valuation date for the husband's pension was an improvident exercise of discretion. There was no evidence that the parties reconciled and continued to receive the benefits of the marital relationship after the prior action was commenced. The appropriate date for valuation of his pension was September 7, 1994, the date of the divorce action previously commenced by the wife, which she discontinued voluntarily in August 1999. Supreme Court properly credited the wife with arrears accumulated under the pendente lite order in her favor in the prior action. They related to the period prior to the discontinuance of the wife's prior action. However, the Supreme Court should have reduced the wife's share of the proceeds from the sale of the marital residence by one-half of the total of the husband's payments of principal on the mortgage for that property from April 20, 2000, to August 29, 2001, the date the trial concluded. It also held that the award of counsel fees to the wife was an improvident exercise of discretion in view of her abrupt discontinuance of the prior action which left the husband with no practical course but to commence a new action, her significant resources resulting from the equitable distribution of marital property, and the amount of maintenance awarded.

Proper to Admit Hearsay In Custody Cases involving Allegations of Abuse and Neglect

In Mateo v Tuttle, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 251125 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which awarded custody to petitioner father, with supervised visitation to respondent mother. It found that contrary to respondent's contention, the court properly admitted hearsay statements at the hearing on the petition. It is well settled that there is "an exception to the hearsay rule in custody cases involving allegations of abuse and neglect of a child, based on the Legislature's intent to protect children from abuse and neglect as evidenced in Family Ct Act 1046(a)(vi)" where, as here, the statements are corroborated. The child's hearsay statements to others were sufficiently corroborated. In any event, the statements of the child to petitioner and his wife as well as statements made by a nurse to petitioner's wife were not offered for the truth of the matters asserted therein but, rather, were offered to explain actions taken by petitioner and his wife, and thus those statements and that testimony fall within an exception to the hearsay rule.

February 16, 2006

Denial of Attorneys Fee For Engaging in Conduct Resulting in Unnecessary Litigation. Maintenance Reversed Where Impermissible Double Counting of Income

In Chamberlain v Chamberlain, ---- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3485881 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly concluded that the parties' investment account, funded with the proceeds of an action commenced by the defendant to recover damages for personal injuries he sustained prior to the marriage, was his separate property, even though he placed those funds in an investment account titled jointly with the plaintiff. The proceeds of an action to recover damages for personal injuries are the separate property of the injured spouse. When spouses hold property in a joint account, however, a rebuttable presumption arises that both have an undivided one-half interest in it. Thus, by depositing the proceeds of his personal injury lawsuit in an account titled jointly with the plaintiff, the defendant created the presumption that the funds were marital. This presumption may be overcome by evidence that the account was titled jointly as a matter of convenience, without the intention of creating a beneficial interest, and that the funds in the account originated solely in the separate property of the spouse who claims the separate interest. Here, the defendant overcame the presumption by establishing that he was the sole beneficiary of the proceeds of the personal injury action, that the investment account into which the funds were deposited, although in joint names, was managed solely by him, and that the plaintiff had no involvement with the account other than one withdrawal which she made at the defendant's direction. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant 30 percent of the value of the degrees and license constituting the enhanced earning capacity achieved by the plaintiff during the marriage, based upon his indirect contributions to the attainment of that enhanced earning capacity by paying all of the family's living expenses while the plaintiff was a student and modifying his employment schedule in order to enable him to care for the parties' older child, who was born during that period. Since that enhanced earning capacity was marital property Supreme Court should have required the defendant to bear a concomitant portion of the student loan debt incurred by the plaintiff in pursuing her degrees. The defendant's share of that debt should have been set off against the defendant's distributive award, reducing it to $24,969. The record supported the Supreme Court's determination to impute an annual income of $60,000 to the plaintiff. Maintenance and child support are determined on the basis of earning capacity, not actual earnings. Here, the report of the financial expert that the plaintiff could expect to earn such an annual income and the plaintiff's part-time earnings commensurate with such full-time compensation supported the Supreme Court's determination. In denying the plaintiff's request for maintenance, however, the Supreme Court failed to remove from consideration that portion of the plaintiff's income stream that was distributed in equitable distribution, as it was required to do. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for reconsideration of the plaintiff's request for maintenance without consideration of the income stream derived from the enhanced earning capacity. A party who has engaged in conduct resulting in unnecessary litigation may properly be denied an award of an attorney's fee, and a party who was thereby caused to incur legal fees that otherwise would have been unnecessary may recover such fees. The record supported the Supreme Court's determination to deny the plaintiff's request for an award of an attorney's fee and grant the defendant's request for an award of an attorney's fee on this basis.

No Award To Wife in Absence of Proof that Advanced Degree Enhanced Husband's Earning Capacity

In Xu v He --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3485889 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the statutory factors contained in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5)(d) "do not have to be specifically cited when the ... findings of the court otherwise adequately articulate that the relevant statutory factors were considered". In the absence of any proof that plaintiff's advanced degree enhanced his earning capacity, the court did not err in declining to issue an award based upon that degree. There was no abuse of discretion in the award to defendant of maintenance in the amount of $1,000 per month for a period of three years or in the court's imputation of $25,000 in yearly income to defendant in light of her educational and professional background.

Court Can Not Change Custody Without a Hearing in Non-Emergency Situation

In re R. G. v G. O.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3490108 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) a proceeding for modification of a custody order, family court temporarily transferred custody of the parties' child from respondent mother to petitioner father pending a hearing on the issue of whether the mother's relocation with the child to New Jersey was in the child's best interests. The Appellate Division reversed, on the law, and returned custody of the child to the mother pending such hearing holding that Family Court erred in transferring custody without holding a hearing on the best interests of the child. The court pointed out that in applying the settled doctrine that custody awards must be based on the best interests of the child, a hearing is generally required before a judge may award a temporary change of custody in a non-emergency situation, and that the non-custodial parent has the significant burden of demonstrating at such hearing that the child's best interests under the totality of the circumstances warrant a modification of the previously entered custody order. Therefore, Family Court should have held one. The Court indicated that the nature and extent of a hearing may be as abbreviated, in the court's broad discretion, as the particular allegations and known circumstances warrant. The extent of the hearing may perhaps be as little as questioning the parties under oath by the court, subject to limited questioning by the lawyers. In any such case, the court should insure that the factual underpinnings of any temporary order are made clear on the record. Other than Family Court's evident displeasure at the mother's move to New Jersey, there was no apparent basis for the order nor any emergency concerns to support it. The mother did not violate any court order by moving some 90 miles from the Bronx to New Jersey, and the record contained controverted allegations regarding whether the mother had consent to relocate. The mother had previously been awarded sole custody of the child and no provision for visitation by the father had been made in the order granting her sole custody.

Maintenance Award Increased on Appeal

In Dermigny v Dermigny, 23 A.D.3d 429, 805 N.Y.S.2d 577 (2d Dept.2005) the Appellate Division modified the judgment by, inter alia, by awarding the plaintiff spousal maintenance of $3,000 per month for a period of five years. It held that the plaintiff should have been granted durational spousal maintenance to enable her to become self-supporting based on the great disparity in the parties' expected earnings and their potential assets, as well as the lifestyle enjoyed during the marriage. It also held that stock options issued to the defendant which were exercised before the commencement of the action, which were reduced to cash and commingled with other marital assets, were marital property that both parties helped to create during the marriage and expected to enjoy at a later date. Thus, the Supreme Court properly directed the distribution of the net proceeds from this asset at the rate of 50% to each party.

Although No Appeal Take Appellate Division Exercised Inherent Authority to Review Order in Custody Case

In the Matter of Cadejah A. A. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2006 WL 176800 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the petitioner filed a petition against both respondents in October 2003 alleging neglect of their children based on admissions by the father that he had looked at the daughter while she was taking a shower and had watched her through the hole in her bedroom wall, and allegations that the mother had violated the order of protection and had refused to make, or agree to alternative living arrangements for the daughter. Family Court accepted the mother's admission and issued an order with a finding of neglect based upon inadequate guardianship and placing the daughter in the custody of petitioner for one year. Both the mother and father appealed. Although the mother made an oral waiver of her right to appeal, the Appellate Division exercised its inherent authority to review any matter involving the welfare of a child in a Family Court proceeding and determined her appeal.

February 1, 2006

Child Support Based on Imputed Income Must Have Basis

In Matter of Bianchi v Breakell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3118046 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), respondent filed an objection to a cost of living adjustment in his child support obligation and a petition seeking a downward modification, alleging a change in employment and a substantial loss of income and benefits from his family. Respondent testified that in February 2002, after his construction business ceased to exist due to, among other things, an inability to acquire insurance, he was hired as a general contractor by LDB Associates, a company owned by his father and respondent's current wife. His entire income now consisted of an annual salary of $35,000, despite his testimony that he worked 40 to 60 hours per week. The Support Magistrate, correctly determining that the objection to the COLA brought the parties into court for a de novo determination under the Child Support Standards Act, rejected as incredible respondent's testimony that he now was a salaried employee limited to $35,000 per year, especially since his expenses were in excess of his claimed income after taxes. The Support Magistrate therefore imputed $80,000 in income to respondent from his employment, along with an additional $20,000 in benefits bestowed by his family, to find the combined parental income, after FICA, to be $137,281. After determining respondent's share of child support on the first $80,000 of combined income, it applied the statutory 17% to the balance of $57,281, resulting in a support obligation of $307 per week, a reduction of $15 per week as compared to the prior order. Family Court denied respondent's objections. The Appellate Division held that while Family Court was wholly permitted to impute income to him "based upon a prior employment experience, as well as such parent's future earning capacity in light of that party's educational background" the determination had to be rejected because the articulated reason to impute $80,000 in income was based upon what would be a "reasonable employment wage." With no evidence in the record that respondent or anyone else with a similar educational and employment history could earn $80,000 per year doing similar work, the imputation of that amount was speculative. As to the additional $20,000 in income imputed to respondent, remittal was required due to the failure of the Support Magistrate "to specifically delineate each category/source of income imputed to respondent ... [as well as] the actual dollar amount assigned to each category". Thus, with these insufficiencies undermining its ability to review whether the statutory percentage was properly applied to the income exceeding the $80,000 statutory cap it reversed and remitted the matter for further proceedings.

Improper for Court to Direct Law Guardian to file "Report" or give "Recommendations"

In Matter of Graham v Graham, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3489247 (N.Y. A.D. 3 Dept.), a custody case, the Appellate Division strenuously voiced its opinion that it was improper for Family Court to direct the child's attorney, the Law Guardian, to file a "report" in this case. Although the Law Guardian was careful to characterize his written submission at the end of the proof as his "summation" and appropriately relied solely on record evidence in support of his position. Family Court, however, not only referred to the "summation" as a "report" but, in lieu of making independent findings, adopted--in its own decision--the Law Guardian's submission in its entirety. The Law Guardian also made "recommendations" in his submission; evidence that he, as well as Family Court, may have misunderstood his role. It stated: "The use by a court of the "recommendation of the Law Guardian" has too long been tolerated in Family Court and matrimonial proceedings. When a court asks the child's attorney to make "a recommendation," it improperly elevates the Law Guardian's position to something more important to the court than the positions of the attorneys for each of the parents. Attorneys representing parents do not advocate on behalf of their clients by making "reports" and "recommendations." The Law Guardian should take a position on behalf of the child at the completion of a proceeding--whether orally, on the record, or in writing --and that position must be supported by evidence in the record."

No Requirement that Actual CSSA Calculations Be Set Out in Agreement. However, Agreement Held Unconscionable.

In Bright v Freeman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3485889 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father brought an action, inter alia, for a judgment declaring, in effect, that the child support provisions of the parties' "separation and child support agreement" properly departed from the presumptive support payable pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act. Supreme Court granted the father's motion for summary judgment declaring that "the agreement is enforceable." The Appellate Division reversed the order on the law and upon searching the record, granted summary judgment declaring that the agreement was unconscionable and unenforceable. The parties, who were never married, are the parents of two children. When they separated, they entered into a "separation and child support agreement" dated December 1, 2002, pursuant to which the father agreed to pay child support in the sum of $450 per month, per child. Following a dispute over the validity of the child support provisions of the agreement, which was being litigated in Family Court, the father commenced this action for a pre-emptive Supreme Court judgment declaring that the agreement was valid and enforceable. The Appellate Division found that pursuant to the CSSA a separation agreement which awards child support different from the presumptive amount mandated by statute must contain the following: (1) an acknowledgment that the parties have been advised of the substance of the CSSA; (2) a statement that the basic child support pursuant to the CSSA would presumptively result in the correct amount of child support; (3) what the CSSA basic child support would have been in the specific circumstances presented; and (4) the reasons why the agreed upon child support deviates from that set forth in the CSSA. The agreement did not violate Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h). It recites, inter alia, the parties' combined net income, their respective net incomes after the CSSA deductions are made, as well as the percentage of income (25%) that is mandated to be applied to the first $80,000 in combined income and, in the court's discretion, to the combined income above that amount. The agreement also recited the father's putative support obligation. While the calculations themselves were not set out, the parties have specified the information and amounts as required by the CSSA. There is no requirement that the actual calculations used to reach the results also be set out in the agreement. Finally, the agreement sets forth the parties' reasons for departing from the statutory formula. However, in opposition to the father's motion for summary judgment the mother established, as a matter of law, that the parties' agreement was unconscionable. The Court stated that it is well settled that a separation agreement is closely scrutinized and may be set aside upon a showing that it is unconscionable or the result of fraud or overreaching in its execution. Separation agreements may be set aside if their terms evidence a bargain so inequitable that no reasonable and competent person would have consented to it. Here, the agreement minimized the father's financial liability and placed a disproportionately greater burden on the mother, inter alia, by requiring the father to pay the sum of only $900 per month instead of more than $2000 per month that would be due under the CSSA. Moreover, the agreement compelled the mother to spend a portion of the father's support payment for designated expenses such as the children's camp and college expenses, as well as to contribute the sum of $100 per month, per child to their college fund accounts. In addition, the mother was required to pay all unreimbursed medical benefits and dental expenses, as well as the cost of camp, Hebrew school, and similar expenses so long as she is employed and her health insurance continues. The agreement was to be effective only so long as the father earned $100,000 annually (net of the CSSA deductions), and provided for a reduction in his support obligation should his income diminish. However, it made no provision for an increase in his obligations should his income appreciate nor for any adjustment to his obligation in the event mother's income drops or ceases entirely. Finally, the agreement compelled the mother to reimburse the father for his visitation expenses up to $1,200 per child, per year. The Appellate Division concluded that "... that the agreement is so one-sided and inequitable as to be unconscionable. It is of such a quality that "no reasonable and competent person would have consented to it".

Maintenance Award For Car Payments Proper

In Booth v Booth, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3508849 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) defendant contended on appeal that Supreme Court erred in awarding plaintiff maintenance in the form of ordering defendant to make plaintiff's car payments. It is well settled that "[t]he amount and duration of maintenance are matters committed to the sound discretion of the trial court". The record established that defendant had steady employment and received supplemental income from Air Force disability payments and rental properties. In addition, defendant received Social Security payments for each child based on plaintiff's disability and plaintiff has been ordered to pay child support to defendant. Plaintiff's income consisted of Social Security disability payments and minimal wages from part-time employment at a fast-food restaurant. Although her income exceeded her expenses, plaintiff had health problems that affected the stability of her employment. It also held that the court did not abuse its discretion in its equitable distribution of the marital property by awarding defendant 70% and plaintiff 30% of the marital assets. "It is well established that '[e]quitable distribution presents issues of fact to be resolved by the trial court, and its judgment should be upheld absent an abuse of discretion'. Even where, as here, defendant contributed most of the family's support and was the primary caretaker of the children, an award of 30% of the marital assets to plaintiff was not an abuse of discretion.

January 17, 2006

UCCJEA Emergency Jurisdiction Requires Communication with Court of Other State

In Callahan v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3118147 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties, who are the parents of a son now eight years old, lived together in Ohio until late June 2004, when petitioner came to New York with the child. In July 2004, she commenced this proceeding requesting Family Court to, among other things, exercise temporary emergency jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 76-c alleging, among other things, that respondent made disturbing accusations and/or requests of a sexual nature concerning her children (including the child at issue) and threatened to kill her. Upon respondent's default in the matter, petitioner was granted custody by order entered August 23, 2004. In its decision, the court found "sufficient ground to support the granting of [the] order." In December 2004, respondent moved to vacate the order alleging that he had already commenced his own custody proceeding in Ohio on June 25, 2004, and that petitioner had fled with the child without his notice or consent. At a March 2005 hearing on respondent's motion, there was a dispute between the parties concerning whether there was in fact a pending proceeding in Ohio. Family Court made no effort to confirm or deny this fact, despite the clear mandate of Domestic Relations Law 76-c (4). In addition, Family Court stated at the hearing that it was "not aware of any emergency with regard to the child, as opposed to [petitioner] herself personally[,] that required the court last summer to exercise any kind of emergency jurisdiction." The court repeated this sentiment a few more times during the hearing, namely, that there was no emergency "affecting the child." Based on this reasoning, Family Court granted respondent's motion and vacated the prior order. The Appellate Division reversed. Family Court's decision to vacate the prior order on the ground that there was no emergency affecting the parties' child ignored the clear and unequivocal language of Domestic Relations Law 76-c (1), which states, as relevant here, that "[a] court of this state has temporary emergency jurisdiction if the child is present in this state and ... it is necessary in an emergency to protect the child, a sibling or parent of the child ". Family Court, having apparently believed that an emergency did indeed exist with respect to petitioner at the time of its original determination, should have continued its assumption of temporary emergency jurisdiction. Moreover, at the very least, Family Court was obligated, upon being informed that a proceeding was pending in Ohio, to "immediately communicate with the [Ohio] court" . It therefore remitted the matter to Family Court for compliance with the statute. In a footnote the court pointed out that the duration of an order exercising temporary emergency jurisdiction is guided by whether there is a previous child custody proceeding or determination in a court of another. Here, there was a dispute concerning whether a proceeding was pending in Ohio. Resolution of this dispute will aid the court in determining the duration of the temporary order. It also pointed out that even though respondent originally defaulted, Family Court should have still immediately communicated with the Ohio court since petitioner herself, then pro se, notified the court at an August 18, 2004 appearance that respondent "has filed [in Ohio], but there has been no court date set".

Extreme Hardship Warrants Downward Modification of Agreement

In Marrano v Marrano, 804 N.Y.S.2d 215 (4th Dept.2005) pursuant to the parties' 1994 separation agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, defendant agreed to pay plaintiff $40,000 in maintenance per year. In May 2001, plaintiff sought enforcement of that provision, and defendant cross-moved for a reduction in maintenance. Supreme Court confirmed the report of the Referee, which reduced the award of maintenance to plaintiff to $22,000 per year. Where a party seeks to reduce the amount of maintenance recited in a separation agreement that has been incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce, that party must make "a showing of extreme hardship". The record established that defendant earned approximately $174,000 from his real estate development business in 1994 but that, by 1999, his earnings were reduced to approximately $18,000. The gross income from his business was approximately $1,810,000 in 1995 but was reduced to $295,000 in 1999. Indeed, plaintiff did not controvert the evidence presented by defendant that his company, valued at $150,000, would produce a yearly income for defendant of $56,557 over the next three years, and that his approximate yearly personal expenses would be $50,400. His only other assets at the time of the hearing were $300 in a bank account and $15,000 in equity in his home. Therefore defendant met his burden of establishing that his continued payment of $40,000 per year to plaintiff would result in the requisite extreme hardship to warrant reduction of his maintenance obligation.

Important Tax Law Changes For 2006

Earned Income Credit Amounts Increase

The maximum amount of income you can earn and still get the credit is higher for 2006 than it is for 2005. You may be able to take the credit for 2006 if:

You have more than one qualifying child and you earn less than $36,348 ($38,348 if married filing jointly),

You have one qualifying child and you earn less than $32,001 ($34,001 if married filing jointly), or

You do not have a qualifying child and you earn less than $12,120 ($14,120 if married filing jointly).

The maximum amount of adjusted gross income (AGI) you can have and still get the credit has also increased. You may be able to take the credit if your AGI is less than the amount in the above list that applies to you.

Investment income amount.

The maximum amount of investment income you can have in 2006 and still get the credit increases to $2,800.

Exemption Amount Increased

The amount you can deduct for each exemption has increased from $3,200 in 2005 to $3,300 in 2006.

You lose all or part of the benefit of your exemptions if your adjusted gross income is above a certain amount. The amount at which the phaseout begins depends on your filing status. For 2006, the phaseout begins at:

$112,875 for married persons filing separately,

$150,500 for single individuals,

$188,150 for heads of household, and $225,750 for married persons filing jointly or qualifying widow(er)s.

Social Security and Medicare Taxes

For 2006, the employer and employee will continue to pay:

6.2% each for social security tax (old-age, survivors, and disability insurance), and

1.45% each for Medicare tax (hospital insurance).

Wage limits. For social security tax, the maximum amount of 2006 wages subject to the tax has increased from $90,000 to $94,200. For Medicare tax, all covered 2006 wages are subject to the tax.

Standard Deduction Amount Increased

The standard deduction for taxpayers who do not itemize deductions on Schedule A of Form 1040 is, in most cases, higher for 2006 than it was for 2005. The amount depends on your filing status, whether you are 65 or older or blind, and whether an exemption can be claimed for you by another taxpayer.

The basic standard deduction amounts for 2006 are:

Head of household — $7,550

Married taxpayers filing jointly and qualifying widow(er)s — $10,300

Married taxpayers filing separately — $5,150

Single — $5,150

The standard deduction amount for an individual who may be claimed as a dependent by another taxpayer may not exceed the greater of $850 or the sum of $300 and the individual's earned income.

Standard Mileage Rates

For tax years beginning in 2006, the allowable deductions for the standard mileage rate are as follows:

Business miles. The standard mileage rate for the cost of operating your car increases to 44.5 cents a mile for all business miles driven.

January 2, 2006

Single Action Rule Not Applicable in Matrimonial Action

In Chen v Fischer, ___NY2d___, 2005 WL 3452221 (N.Y.) Supreme Court found that the allegations in Chen's personal injury action were "virtually identical" to those in her counterclaim for divorce and arose out of the same transaction or series of transactions. The court determined that the tort action was barred by res judicata. The Appellate Division affirmed, agreeing that the action was barred because the tort claim could have been litigated with the divorce action and Chen did not expressly reserve the right to bring that claim when she withdrew her fault allegations for purposes of the stipulation. The Appellate Division extended the rule set forth in Boronow v. Boronow (71 N.Y.2d 284, 290 [1988]), that issues relating to marital property be decided with the matrimonial action, to interspousal tort actions, holding that an interspousal tort action seeking to recover damages for personal injuries commenced subsequent to, and separate from an action for divorce is barred by claim preclusion. (12 A.D.3d 43, 47 [2004]. The Court of Appeals reversed. It held that to require joinder of interspousal personal injury claims with the matrimonial action would complicate and prolong the divorce proceeding. In addition, parties should be encouraged to stipulate to, rather than litigate, the issue of fault. Significantly, the Court pointed out that if fault allegations are actually litigated in a matrimonial action, res judicata or some form of issue preclusion would bar a subsequent action in tort based on the same allegations. It declined to adopt the reasoning of the New Jersey Supreme Court in Tevis v. Tevis (79 N.J. 422, 400 A.2d 1189 [1979]), which held that under that State's "single controversy" rule, the interspousal personal injury claim should have been brought with the matrimonial action so that the issues between the parties could be decided in one proceeding in order to prevent protracted litigation.

Standard of Living is Primary Consideration in Fixing Maintenance

In Milnarik v. Milnarik, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3118181 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the matrimonial action was filed after the parties had been married for 12 years and had three children. The Appellate Division held that the imputation of $211,300 in income to defendant was well within the range of income that he had earned in sales and real estate development during the marriage and would not be disturbed. Tax records revealed that in the years preceding the commencement of the action, defendant earned between $129,444 and $273,429. When questioned at trial about how much he earned annually during the marriage, defendant testified that he "remember[s] making about $200,000 a year." This testimony was consistent with the testimony of his former employer, who testified that defendant worked for him for two years and earned a little over $400,000 in salary and bonuses between 2000 and 2002 (in addition to a country club membership and car allowance). The Supreme Court failed to sufficiently explain the precise deductions it was applying to this figure. Nor did it appear that the court deducted defendant's spousal maintenance obligation from his imputed income (see Domestic Relations Law [§ 240\[1-b\]\[4\]](#), [§ 240\[5\]\[vii\]\[C\]](#)). The matter had to be remitted for clarification and recalculation of child support. The court held that upon remittal, since plaintiff testified that she earned between $1,200 and $1,400 per month, her income should be set at $15,600 (an average of these two figures). There was no abuse of discretion in calculating child support on the combined parental income in excess of $80,000 given the lavish lifestyle enjoyed during this marriage, which included a million dollar home, a second home on an island in Lake Placid, luxury vehicles, boats, a country club membership and private schooling for their two sons. Plaintiff's monthly expenses, exclusive of the private school tuition, were well over $8,000. The court held that the award of $3,000 per month for five years was entirely appropriate, particularly since the parties agreed that plaintiff would not work once they had children, there was a great disparity in their incomes and they enjoyed a lavish lifestyle during the marriage. Since the uncontroverted evidence established that defendant insisted that his sons attend this particular private school the court did not err in directing him to pay his pro rata share of such expense. Defendant was entitled to a $3,250 credit representing half the value of jewelry he gave to plaintiff during the marriage.

Gifts To Former Spouse Not a Wasteful Dissipation

In Kohl v Kohl, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3385639 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the money given by the husband to his former wife and children of that marriage a wasteful dissipation of marital assets. Such gifts were not unreasonable in relation to the husband's income and were consistent with the type of gift giving he had engaged in throughout his marriage to the wife, which included generous gifts to her own two children from a prior marriage. The distribution of 35% of the husband's sales and consulting business to the wife was warranted by evidence that, inter alia, the husband had learned the skills associated with this business during the 15 years he had worked before the marriage, and that the wife contributed little to the creation of the new business, and impeded it by refusing to use marital stock accounts held in her name to help pay family expenses. No basis existed to disturb the maintenance award to the wife of $12,000 per month for one year following the sale of the parties' Southampton home, and $7000 per month thereafter until the husband turned 70. The wife was to receive a distribution of marital assets in excess of $8 million. The maintenance award was based on a finding of reasonable compensation that was urged by the wife's expert for purposes of valuing the husband's consultancy business. The Court rejected the husband's argument that because the wife will receive enough from the distribution to be self-supporting, she should not be awarded any maintenance at all, and found that the parties' lavish predivorce standard of living was given appropriate consideration in the determination of maintenance.

First Department Rejects Court Permitting Same Sex Marriage

In Hernandez v Robles, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 3322959 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the motion court erred in finding the provisions of the DRL unconstitutional to the extent that they do not permit same-sex marriage. The court stated that the definition of marriage in the DRL expresses an important, long-recognized public policy supporting, among other things, procreation, child welfare and social stability--all legitimate state interests. The Court held that the DRL provisions regarding marriage do not violate the due process and equal protection provisions of the New York State Constitution (N.Y. Const art I, section 6, section 11). Marriage, defined as the union between one man and one woman, is based upon important public policy considerations and has been recognized as a fundamental constitutional right. These considerations are based on innate, complementary, procreative roles, a function of biology, not mere legal rights. [T]he reasons justifying the civil marriage laws are inextricably linked to the fact that human sexual intercourse between a man and a woman frequently results in pregnancy and childbirth . The legislative policy rationale is that society and government have a strong interest in fostering heterosexual marriage as the social institution that best forges a linkage between sex, procreation and child rearing. It systematically regulates heterosexual behavior, brings order to the resulting procreation and ensures a stable family structure for the rearing, education and socialization of children. Marriage promotes sharing of resources between men, women and the children that they procreate; provides a basis for the legal and factual assumption that a man is the father of his wife's child via the legal presumption of paternity plus the marital expectations of monogamy and fidelity; and creates and develops a relationship between parents and child based on real, everyday ties. It is based on the presumption that the optimal situation for child rearing is having both biological parents present in a committed, socially esteemed relationship. The law assumes that a marriage will produce children and affords benefits based on that assumption. It sets up heterosexual marriage as the cultural, social and legal ideal in an effort to discourage unmarried childbearing and to encourage sufficient marital childbearing to sustain the population and society; the entire society, even those who do not marry, depend on a healthy marriage culture for this latter, critical, but presently undervalued, benefit. Marriage laws are not primarily about adult needs for official recognition and support, but about the well-being of children and society, and such preference constitutes a rational policy decision. Thus, society and government have reasonable, important interests in encouraging heterosexual couples to accept the recognition and regulation of marriage. This procedure was in direct conflict with FCA 418 and 532. Further, such a procedure is in direct contravention of the primary purpose of the FCA, which is to protect and promote the best interests of the child.

December 16, 2005

Equitable Estoppel Requires Best Interest Hearing

In Matter of Westchester County Department of Social Services, o/b/o Melissa B. v. Robert W.R., 803 N.Y.S.2d 672 (2 Dept. ,2005) the Appellate Division held, considering two issues of first impression, that Family Court Act 516-a (b) requires the Family Court to conduct a hearing before ordering a genetic marker test to determine issues of fraud, duress, or material mistake of fact upon receiving a challenge to an acknowledgment of paternity brought more than 60 days after its execution. It also held that where a party meets his burden of establishing fraud, duress, or material mistake of fact, the Family Court is then required to conduct a hearing regarding the best interests of the child before ordering a genetic marker test. The court noted that the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be invoked to preclude a father from denying paternity to avoid support obligations where the invocation of the doctrine is in the best interests of the child and the purpose of the hearing is to determine whether the doctrine should be applied.

Master Electrician License is Marital Property

In Hlinka v Hlinka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2542864 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which awarded the defendant wife maintenance of $2,500 per month for five years and $1,500 per month for an additional five years, and awarded the defendant wife $898.88 monthly for 14 years and 10 months as equitable distribution of the plaintiff husband's enhanced earnings as a licensed master electrician.

Distributive Awards May Not Include Payments Which Are Taxable As Ordinary Income to the Recipient

In Carman v Carman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2781147 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1978 and the divorce action was commenced in 2001. Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded plaintiff maintenance of $1,000 per month for 30 months, determined that 20% of the value of defendant's license as a certified public accountant was marital property, valued defendant's interest in his business and equally divided the marital property between the parties. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court appropriately determined defendant's child support obligation with regard to combined parental income in excess of $80,000. Although the Child Support Standards Act does not provide for nor permit the inclusion or deduction of a distributive award when calculating parental income because "a distributive award to be paid by one parent to the other pertains to the financial resources of the parties," it is an appropriate factor to be considered by the court when determining the appropriate amount of child support for income in excess of $80,000. Based on the parties' modest predivorce standard of living, the lack of any special needs of the children, plaintiff's ability to return to work because the children were in school, and the substantial assets available to plaintiff through distributive awards, the court did not abuse its discretion when it determined that only half of the combined parental income over $80,000 should be utilized in calculating the parties' child support obligations. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly considered 20% of defendant's CPA license as marital property. Before the marriage, defendant completed a Bachelor's degree and almost one year of the required two years of practice. During the marriage, he finished the remaining practice period, took an exam preparation course and passed all portions of the CPA exam. The court reasonably accepted the expert's 20% figure, representing one sixth of defendant's education and practical experience with a slight increase for exam preparation and successful completion, as the marital portion of defendant's enhanced earning capacity related to his CPA license. Where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. Defendant obtained his college degree and completed almost half of his two-year practice requirement before the marriage. He completed the second year of practice during the marriage, but that experience was earned through a job where he was gainfully employed, earning money to support the parties as a couple. The exam preparatory course lasted less than two months and was a review of his college work. During this time, plaintiff was also employed full time. While plaintiff performed household chores and provided an environment for defendant to study, this can be seen more as overall contributions to the marriage rather than an additional effort to support defendant in obtaining his license. As plaintiff's testimony indicated that she did not substantially alter her schedule due to defendant's studying for his CPA exam and licensure, it would be inequitable to award plaintiff half of defendant's enhanced earning capacity related to his CPA license . Based on plaintiff's limited contribution to defendant's acquisition of this asset, her equitable share of the marital portion of defendant's CPA license was 20%. Considering all of the appropriate factors, Supreme Court properly divided the remaining marital assets equally, including defendant's interest in his business. The marriage was of long duration, the parties were relatively young, both parties had college degrees, they had no assets at the time of the marriage, plaintiff had primary physical custody of the two minor children, and both parties worked initially but plaintiff stayed home to care for the children after the youngest child was born. The increase in value of defendant's annuity account was correctly classified as marital property because Defendant used his financial planning and accounting expertise to manage that account, even if only a few times a year, directly and actively contributing to the appreciation in value of that account. Regarding defendant's claim that he was entitled to a credit for moneys that plaintiff borrowed against the home equity line of credit after the commencement of the divorce action, plaintiff testified that this money was not for personal expenses but was expended on marital expenses such as the children and marital residence. Because defendant was ordered to pay retroactive child support and maintenance, which presumably would have been applied toward these marital expenses, he was entitled to a credit for half the amount of funds borrowed from the home equity line of credit. The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court failed to consider all of the tax impacts to the parties. Courts are required to consider the tax consequences in fashioning equitable distribution but distributive awards may not include payments which are taxable as ordinary income to the recipient . While Supreme Court correctly ordered distribution of a portion of defendant's year-end bonus for the year of commencement defendant should have been ordered to pay plaintiff the after-tax amount of her portion, or $20,790, because he already paid the taxes on that bonus. Similarly, the court did not address the tax consequences associated with the distribution of defendant's business, despite statements in the expert's report noting that, depending on the method of distribution, it may be appropriate to discount the business's value 25% to 40% due to taxes. The Appellate Division remitted for the court to consider the tax impact of its awards, as well as to reevaluate the equitable distribution of assets in light of its modification of Supreme Court's distribution. Supreme Court's maintenance award was appropriate. "[M]aintenance should be designed to provide temporary support while the recipient develops the skills or experience necessary to become self-sufficient". The record supported Supreme Court's finding that the parties lived a modest lifestyle despite defendant's substantial earnings. The court acknowledged that defendant earned considerably more than plaintiff, probably more than she will ever earn. But plaintiff was healthy, relatively young, obtained a Bachelor's degree, worked full time in the past, ran her own part-time bookkeeping business as well as working part time for another business, received a sizeable distributive award, and could return to full-time employment because the children were in school and the youngest was 10 years old. As plaintiff did not entirely sacrifice her employment opportunities during the marriage and was capable of finding gainful employment, $1,000 was a fair amount and 30 months was a reasonable time period to allow her to reestablish her earning power. Based on the expert's testimony and report, it appeared that the court's maintenance award was partly based on defendant's untapped earnings, namely his income that remained after subtracting the amount attributable to his CPA license. The amount and duration of the award were not excessive considering defendant's remaining assets. While Supreme Court correctly determined that plaintiff could afford her own counsel fees, based on her distributive award plaintiff also should have equally shared the joint costs of litigation, such as fees for the parties' jointly retained expert and appraiser.

Arbitration of Child Support Permissible

In Frieden v Frieden, 802 N.Y.S.2d 727(2d Dept,2005) the plaintiff sought a divorce from the defendant with whom she had one child. They entered into a settlement agreement which required disputes over child support to be subject to arbitration. After the defendant lost his job, he requested a reduction of child support payments, but the parties could not reach an agreement. The defendant requested arbitration pursuant to the agreement, but the plaintiff refused to arbitrate the dispute. Thus, the defendant moved before the Supreme Court to compel arbitration. The Supreme Court determined that child support matters were beyond the reach of arbitration. The Appellate Division reversed on the law. It held that Child support issues may be subject to arbitration. (citing Schneider v. Schneider, 17 N.Y.2d 123, 128, 269 N.Y.S.2d 107, 216 N.E.2d 318; Sheets v. Sheets, 22 A.D.2d 176, 178, 254 N.Y.S.2d 320). Arbitration of child support issues does not violate the objectives of the Child Support Standards Act because an arbitration award is subject to vacatur if it fails to comply with the CSSA and is not in the best interest of the child. Accordingly, the defendant's motion to compel arbitration should have been granted.

December 1, 2005

Obligation to Pay Home Equity Loan Is Not Open-ended Obligation

In Popelaski v Popelaski --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2781147 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $1,583 per month for 10 years, directed him to pay a home equity loan on the former marital residence, granted the plaintiff a credit for the entire reduction of principal for the mortgage on the marital premises, awarded the plaintiff a credit of $4,657.11 based on allocating to him the sum of $8,000 for marital funds he expended for his personal use, and directed that the plaintiff was entitled to declare the parties' three children as dependents on her income tax return. The judgment was modified by reducing the maintenance to $1,300 per month for 7 years, and granting the plaintiff a credit for 50% of the reduction of the principal of the mortgage on the marital premises. The Appellate Division held that the obligation to pay a home equity loan on the marital residence did not constitute an improper, open-ended obligation since it entailed specific monthly payments and had a predetermined duration. The Supreme Court erred in determining that the plaintiff was entitled to declare all three of the parties' children as dependents on her income tax returns. Where a noncustodial parent meets all or a substantial part of a child's financial needs, a court may determine that the noncustodial parent is entitled to declare the child as a dependent. Both parents were wage earners who each contributed toward the support of their three children. The Appellate Division held that the father may claim the parties' two youngest children as dependents on his income tax returns, while the mother may claim their oldest child as a dependent. The award of $15,000 counsel fees was an improvident exercise of its discretion. Given the defendant's child support and maintenance obligations and considerable debt burden, much of which was incurred for the legitimate purpose of mounting a legal defense to the action and ancillary proceedings, it was clear that the defendant, even with the additional income imputed to him by the court, lacked the ability to pay the plaintiff's counsel fees.

Counsel Fees Reduced On Appeal Even Though Defendant Use Obstructionist Tactics

In Daniel v Friedman --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2787217 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court directed the husband to pay maintenance of $2,500 per month for three years, directed him to pay child support of $4,000 per month until the emancipation of the parties' first child and, upon emancipation of the parties' first child, to pay child support of $3,317.08 per month until the emancipation of the parties' second child, and awarded counsel fees to the plaintiff of $165,000. The Appellate Division modified the judgment by reducing the award of counsel fees to $70,089.63. It held that courts have discretion to value 'active' assets such as a professional practice on the commencement date of the action, while 'passive' assets such as securities, which could change in value suddenly based on market fluctuations, may be valued at the date of trial but such formulations should be treated as helpful guideposts and not immutable rules. Although an economic downturn between the date of commencement of the action and the date of trial had an effect upon the value of the defendant's business, the evidence at trial demonstrated that the business had rebounded significantly and that there were signs of potential positive growth for the future. The Appellate Division held that the trial court's determination to use the date of commencement of the action as the valuation date for the defendant's business was a provident exercise of discretion. It also held that the trial court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff maintenance in light of the disparity in the parties' incomes and the wife's ability to become self-supporting in the future as a result of her new career. It appeared to the Appellate Division that the defendant's obstructionist tactics substantially contributed to the protracted nature of the litigation. However, in consideration of all the relevant factors, including the complex nature and extent of the marital property, a prior pendente lite award of counsel fees to the plaintiff paid by the defendant of $25,000, the defendant's payment of the parties' expert fees of approximately $78,000, and the plaintiff's ability to pay some of her own counsel fees, the Appellate Division reduced the award of counsel fees to $70,089.63, the amount actually due and owing at the time of her application.

Modest Contributions of Wife Warranted Reduction to 20% of Husband's Enhanced Earning Capacity

In Schiffmacher v Schiffmacher, 801 N.Y.S.2d 848 (4th Dept. 2005) defendant contended on appeal that Supreme Court erred in awarding plaintiff 70% of the value of the parties' investment and savings accounts. The record established that the court properly considered the factors set forth in DRL 236(B)(5)(d), including the fact that plaintiff's contributions to the parties' investments were significantly greater than defendant's contributions. It rejected the contention of defendant that the court erred in determining the value of his master's degree in business administration. The value of the degree may be measured by comparing the average lifetime income of a college graduate and the average lifetime earnings of a person holding such a degree and reducing the difference to its present value. Plaintiff's expert utilized that method in determining the value of defendant's degree, and defendant presented no expert testimony that would support a different valuation. The Appellate Division held that court erred in awarding plaintiff one half of the value of defendant's enhanced earning capacity arising from the degree. In light of plaintiff's modest contributions to defendant's degree, the court should have awarded plaintiff only 20% of the value of defendant's enhanced earning capacity and it modified the judgment accordingly.

Income Imputed to Husband Who Intentionally Withheld Information As to Income

In Robbins-Johnson v. Johnson, 20 A.D.3d 723, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1993 and had no children. Supreme Court ordered defendant to pay maintenance in decreasing weekly amounts over a period of eight years, starting with $800 in the first year and ending with $100 in the last. Supreme Court also granted plaintiff counsel fees of $1,500 for services rendered in opposing a second motion by defendant for reduction of temporary maintenance. The Appellate Division affirmed. At the time of trial, defendant was 58, plaintiff was 46 and both were in good health. Although plaintiff had worked during some of the marriage, she lost her employment, along with attendant health and retirement benefits in 1996 when defendant restricted the hours she could work. Supreme Court imputed income to the parties greater than they claimed, attributing an annual income of $20,800 to plaintiff and $100,000 to defendant. Defendant's income was calculated using his admitted salary and then augmented based on Supreme Court's finding that he had intentionally withheld information concerning the actual amount of his income. The court also noted that defendant owns far more separate property than does plaintiff. Supreme Court considered these factors, as well as the living expenses of the parties and the evidence of their predivorce standard of living, and awarded plaintiff a decreasing share of defendant's annual income. Supreme Court detailed the parties' separate and marital property, finding a total net worth of $677,346, and valuing their vehicles and other marital property at $136,663.44. The court awarded plaintiff $16,500 of these assets and, to balance the division of marital property, directed defendant to pay plaintiff $50,000 as a distributive award. Thus, plaintiff received approximately 48% of the marital property. The nearly equal distribution was appropriate in light of the parties' circumstances, including the 10-year duration of the marriage, loss of pension rights and liquidity of the assets. Defendant argued that a separate hearing was required because the counsel fee award was imposed as a sanction for frivolous conduct. The record showed that plaintiff did not make her request pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 and the court did not treat plaintiff's request for counsel fees as a motion for costs or sanctions. Supreme Court's award was adequately supported by the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel setting forth the agreed-upon hourly rate for his services and the hours spent opposing defendant's motion. Further, plaintiff's counsel requested these fees and submitted his affidavit more than one month before the second day of the four-day trial and defendant then failed to question plaintiff or present any evidence concerning fees. Even though the issue was raised again at the end of the trial, defendant did not submit an answering affidavit or request a separate hearing on fees. Under these circumstances, defendant had ample opportunity to be heard on this issue and there was no abuse of Supreme Court's discretion in awarding counsel fees.

Hague Convention - Grave Risk of Harm Exception

In Didur v Viger, 392 F.Supp.2d 1268 (D. Kansas, 2005) the District Court held that the father established that the child's return to his mother's custody in Canada would expose him to grave risk of physical or psychological harm. The Canadian child welfare authorities documented incidents in which the mother repeatedly drove while drunk with the child, the mother was drunk in public with the child alongside her, the mother was intoxicated repeatedly while pregnant with the child's younger sibling, the mother refused to parent the child, and the mother suffered from mood swings and depression, the child was unable to obtain counseling in Canada, the mother sought to have her parents obtain custody of child, and the Canadian authorities recommended against returning the child to Canada and stated that he would be placed in foster care if he was returned.

November 16, 2005

Third Department Joins Other Departments Holding Prospective Child Support Payments May Be Waived

In Williams v Chapman, 2005 WL 2782578 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Third Department joined the other Departments in holding that prospective child support payments may be waived. Pursuant to an open court stipulation Family Court ordered respondent to pay petitioner $150 per week in child support for the parties' two unemancipated children. In February 1999, one child relocated to the father's residence and the parties agreed, in a handwritten document, that child support payments to the mother would be suspended while each party had physical custody of one of the children. In 2003, the mother commenced a proceeding, seeking approximately $37,000 in child support arrears asserting that the father failed to pay support for both children after one child left the mother's residence. Family Court found that the mother expressly waived prospective child support payments in the parties' agreement and denied her petition. The Third Department affirmed. It noted that in Matter of Dox v. Tynon, 90 N.Y.2d 166, 168 [1997] the Court of Appeals has held that pursuant to the New York State Support Enforcement Acts of 1986 and 1987 a recipient may not impliedly "waive the right to unpaid child support simply by failing to demand payment or seek enforcement of support obligations", but declined to reach the question of whether express waivers of future child support payments were similarly impermissible. The mother argued that express waivers of child support must also be deemed to violate the legislative intent of the amendments at issue in Matter of Dox. The Appellate Division rejected her argument which was at odds with positions taken by the other Departments (See Matter of Parker v. Parker, 305 A.D.2d 1077 [4th Dept 2003]; Matter of O'Connor v. Curcio, 281 A.D.2d 100 [2d Dept 2001]; Matter of Grant v. Grant, 265 A.D.2d 19, [1st Dept 2000], lv denied 95 N.Y.2d 758 [2000] Mitchell v. Mitchell, 170 A.D.2d 585, 585 [2d Dept 1991]). The purpose of the amendments under consideration in Matter of Dox was to preclude forgiveness of child support arrears to ensure that respondents are not financially rewarded for failing either to pay the order or to seek its modification. In determining that implied waivers are not permissible, the Court of Appeals emphasized that such waivers are "based on petitioner's behavior after respondent declined to make the requisite payments". Here the waiver was based upon the mother's conduct prior to any default, that is her agreement to forego future support payments, rather than support arrears. The court held that contrary to the mother's argument regarding legislative intent, when future child support payments are waived, no arrears accrue, and the statutory amendments precluding the cancellation of arrears are inapplicable. The court rejected the mother's argument that the express waiver given was invalid as a matter of law due to the parties' failure to comply with Family Ct Act 413(1)(h). While she was correct that in the absence of an express waiver, a party seeking modification of a child support obligation is required to apply to the courts and any order entered in such a proceeding must comply with the CSSA in arguing that the parties' out-of-court agreement must also comply with the statutory requirements, the mother failed to distinguish between a modification agreement and a waiver. A modification agreement 'is binding according to its terms and may only be withdrawn by agreement while a waiver requires no more than the voluntary and intentional abandonment of a known right and, to the extent that it remains executory, may be withdrawn without agreement. Thus, an agreement that does not satisfy the prerequisites of a legally binding modification agreement may nonetheless constitute a valid waiver.

Acupuncture License is Marital Property. Husband Warned That Proving Wife's Alleged Fraud in Obtaining License Hurts His Case

In Liu v. Chen, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2005 WL 2522800 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff appealed from a judgment, which, inter alia, awarded the defendant $127,500, representing 50% of the value of the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity due to her acquisition of a license to practice acupuncture, and valued AC500, Inc., the parties' acupuncture and herbology practice, at $220,000. The Appellate Division held that in determining the value of her enhanced earning capacity resulting from the acupuncture license, Supreme Court improperly relied on the valuation of the expert retained by the defendant. The expert testified that his estimate of the plaintiff's earnings was based on the earnings of AC500, Inc., the company which operated the parties' acupuncture and herbology practice for the year 2000. The expert, erroneously assumed that the company was operated solely by the plaintiff, and had no knowledge of the defendant's role in contributing to the company's earnings. While the plaintiff claimed that the defendant's contributions to the practice that year through his provision of herbology services constituted about 20% of those earnings, the defendant testified that his herbology practice accounted for only 1% of the company's revenue. Nevertheless, the defendant conceded that, in 2000, he worked full-time for the company, six days a week, alongside the plaintiff. The expert's valuation was based on incorrect assumptions, and should not have been relied upon in determining the plaintiff's enhanced earning capacity. Supreme Court also improvidently exercised its discretion in determining the marital portion of the plaintiff's acupuncture license. To meet the admission requirements for the acupuncture licensing exam, the plaintiff was required, inter alia, to establish that she received three years of prior training. The parties were married in China on November 29, 1990, and emigrated to the United States on or about September 27, 1991. The plaintiff qualified for and passed the New York State acupuncture licensing exam in 1992 based, among other things, on documentary evidence that she had received three years of training in China between January 1988 and April 1991. Thereafter, she received a limited permit to practice acupuncture in December 1992, and a full license in April 1995. All times prior to receiving her license, the plaintiff worked outside the home and helped to support the family. In light of the above circumstances, the court's decision to apply a 100% coverture factor in determining the marital portion of the acupuncture license lacked proper support in the record. The defendant claimed that, after the marriage, he paid for three months of acupuncture training for the plaintiff in China, from May 1991 through August 1991, before the couple moved to the United States. He also claimed that he paid the filing fee for the exam, assisted the plaintiff in studying for it, and drove her to the test center. While some portion of the license constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution the evidence did not justify the court's use of a coverture factor of 100%. The court pointed out that defendant's claim that the academic documents submitted by the plaintiff in support of her application for the license were fraudulent did not advance his claim for equitable distribution; to the contrary, such evidence, if true, could only serve to establish that the license was issued under false pretenses and, therefore, had no present value as a future source of earnings. The matter was remitted for a new determination of the valuation issue and to determine the marital portion of the acupuncture license.

Adultery Committed After Commencement is Still Basis for Divorce

In Golub v Ganz, ---- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2665335 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division rejected the defendant's argument that the trial court should not have granted a divorce on the basis of adultery because his only act of adultery took place after the action was commenced and because plaintiff's own alleged adultery constituted a complete defense to his adultery. Defendant's adultery, committed after the parties were married but before any judgment of divorce, fit within the parameters of Domestic Relations Law 170(4). Since no provision of the Domestic Relations Law precludes a party from obtaining a divorce upon acts of adultery that occur after an action is commenced and because no prejudice had been demonstrated by defendant a divorce could be granted on this ground (citing, inter alia, 1 Foster, Freed and Brandes, Law and the Family New York 6:9, at 392 [2d ed]). Nor was the plaintiff's acknowledgment at trial that she became "romantically involved" with another during the late summer of 2002, sufficient to establish that she committed adultery such that the defense of recrimination was established. Since plaintiff's adultery was not established by independent satisfactory evidence in the first instance, no negative influence arises from her invocation of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination when asked at trial if she engaged in a sexual relationship with another. The defendant failed to establish that the appreciation of plaintiff's premarital stock in the Golub Corporation during the marriage could be attributed to her active efforts during the marriage. The subject stock was nonvoting, preferred stock, plaintiff was but one of hundreds of midlevel managers amongst the corporation's 102 grocery stores and 22,000 employees, had no role in corporate policy-making decisions, had no input into corporate procedures and was the manager of an income-producing department. She was in marketing. Nor had she ever been consulted by any member of corporate management or the board of directors regarding anything other than her specific duties. None of the positions ever held by plaintiff, nor her attendance at corporate meetings or charitable events, had affected the profitability of the corporation.

November 1, 2005

Party May Testify As an Expert

In Thoma v Thoma — N.Y.S.2d ---, 2005 WL 2381622 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed the judgment and the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for a hearing and new determination as to the issues of maintenance, child support, arrears, the proportion of unreimbursed medical, dental, optical, and pharmaceutical expenses to be paid by the plaintiff, and counsel fees, if any, to be paid by the plaintiff. The defendant was a licensed school teacher with two teaching certificates and a degree in architecture and interior design. She testified that her "best guess" was that if she secured full-time employment as a school teacher, she could earn a starting salary of $39,000 per year. The defendant testified that for five years since 1999, she was unable to obtain full-time employment. However, she acknowledged that in 2000 she was able to secure full-time employment at a private school but she quit that job. She further noted that she was unable to secure other full-time employment despite the fact that she "sent out 40 resumes last month." She failed to submit copies of applications or any rejection letters. Her claim that she could not secure full-time employment was based upon conclusory assertions. It was clear from the record that the defendant is relatively young and capable of working. Therefore the award of lifetime maintenance was improper. Maintenance should continue only as long as required to render the recipient spouse self-supporting. In view of the conclusory testimony with respect to the defendant's inability to obtain full-time employment, The Appellate Division deemed it appropriate to remit for a new hearing to determine the results of her 40 job applications and whatever other efforts she made to secure full-time employment. It specifically stated that: "This case may warrant imputation of income to the defendant based upon her earnings potential." At the trial, the Supreme Court precluded the plaintiff, an architect, from testifying as an expert as to the defendant's earning capacity in architecture and interior design on the ground that he was an "adversary." This was error. A party may testify as an expert witness. However, since the plaintiff never made an offer of proof as to his qualifications to testify, it was impossible to determine whether this error had an effect on the outcome. At the new hearing, the plaintiff should be permitted to attempt to qualify himself as a expert or to submit other expert testimony. In determining child support, the Supreme Court must deduct from the plaintiff's gross income the amount that he pays in maintenance and taxes paid pursuant to the Federal Insurance Contributions Act before determining the combined parental income and provide for an adjustment in child support upon the termination of maintenance, if any. One of the two children for whom child support was awarded will reach the age of 21 years on December 22, 2005. In view of the close proximity of this date, upon remittitur, the Supreme Court should determine the child support to be awarded before and after December 22, 2005. The judgment directed the plaintiff to pay the unreimbursed medical, dental, optical, and pharmaceutical expenses of the two children under the age of 21 years. However, the Supreme Court was required to determine the plaintiff's share of such expenses by prorating his income to the combined parental income. With respect to counsel fees, the plaintiff did not consent to a determination without a hearing and specifically objected to the amount of counsel fees incurred by the wife as excessive. Therefore, a hearing is warranted on the amount of counsel fees to be awarded, if any.

Claim of Bias By Referee Waived By Failure to Timely Objection

In Shen v Shen — N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2384687 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant contended on appeal that the referee who was appointed to hear and report exhibited bias against her, and that the Supreme Court should have directed a new hearing on the issues. The Appellate Division held that the defendant waived any claim of bias by her conduct in raising the issue of bias for the first time after the hearing, after the referee prepared her report, and after the plaintiff moved to confirm the report. The Court held that where a referee's findings are supported by the record, the court should confirm the referee's report and adopt the recommendation made therein. The majority of the referee's findings, including those regarding the custody of the parties' children, were amply supported by the evidence and were properly upheld by the Supreme Court. However, the determination that a particular IRA and bank account owned by the defendant constituted marital property subject to equitable distribution was not supported by the record. Those accounts were opened by the defendant prior to the parties' marriage, she deposited no funds in them during the marriage, and any increase in their value was not attributable to the plaintiff. Thus, the court should not have distributed those accounts. In view of the respective assets and earning capacities of the parties and the other relevant factors in this case the court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing the defendant to pay $41,934, or approximately 75%, of the plaintiff's counsel fees. Under the circumstances of this case, an award of $22,000 or approximately 40% of the plaintiff's total counsel fees was appropriate.

Judgment Modified to Correct Oversight

In Ignaszak v Ignaszak--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2404643 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the JHO determined that "[e]ach party shall be solely responsible for [his or her] attorney's fees," but that determination was not incorporated into the judgment of divorce. The Appellate Division stated that in its view the court's failure to incorporate the JHO's determination was an oversight, and it modified the judgment on the law by providing that each party shall be solely responsible for his or her attorney's fees.

Maintenance Not Dischargeable in Bankruptcy

In re Duffy, --- B.R. ---, 2005 WL 2483328 (Bankr.S.D.N.Y.) the wife waived maintenance but the parties stipulation of settlement which was made during the equitable distribution trial contained the following provision: Adjudged and Decreed that the Defendant [Duffy] shall pay monthly spousal maintenance to the Plaintiff [Taback] commencing July 1, 1997 in the sum of $2,000 per month payable in monthly installments which shall be made on the first day of each month for the term of ten (10) consecutive years, which payments shall be non-dischargeable in bankruptcy and paid unconditionally to the Wife irrespective of her cohabitation or remarriage. The bankruptcy court held that this debt was dischargeable pursuant to 11 USC 523(a)(5), of the Bankruptcy Code which excepts from discharge any debt (5) to a spouse, former spouse, or child of the debtor, for alimony to, maintenance for, or support of such spouse or child, in connection with a separation agreement, divorce decree or other order of a court of record, ..., or property settlement agreement, but not to the extent that-- ...(B) such debt includes a liability designated as alimony, maintenance, or support, unless such liability is actually in the nature of alimony, maintenance, or support....The Court held that the payments did not constitute alimony/maintenance within the meaning of Section 523(a)(5) of the Bankruptcy Code. The question whether obligations under a divorce decree constitute alimony/maintenance within the meaning of Section 523(a)(5), or equitable distribution of marital property not within subsection (5), is a question of bankruptcy law to be decided by the bankruptcy court on the basis of all the facts and circumstances, and the bankruptcy court must reject the characterization applied to the obligation by the divorce court or the parties if warranted by a consideration of all of the facts. The court found that payments were designated as "spousal maintenance" and treated as such by the parties at the suggestion of the trial court, not for the purpose of providing alimony but in order to facilitate the settlement of the wife's equitable distribution claim by reducing the net cost to the husband. Unlike alimony/maintenance, the payments were to continue for ten years regardless of the wife's cohabitation, which long predated the divorce, or remarriage, which was contemplated to occur and did shortly after the divorce judgment.

Must Give Credit For Room and Board at College When Directing Payment of College Expenses

In Navin v Navin, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2005 WL 2438521 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.)the Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff maintenance in the sum of $540 per week and child support in the sum of $408.80 per week for the parties' unemancipated child. The Appellate Division modified, on the law, by deleting the decretal paragraph awarding the plaintiff child support of $408.80 per week for the parties' unemancipated child. In calculating the defendant's child support obligation, the Supreme Court failed to reduce the defendant's income by the amount of maintenance paid to the plaintiff before determining his child support obligation, and failed to direct a concomitant increase in the child support obligation upon the termination of the maintenance obligation. Further, while the Supreme Court properly directed the defendant to pay a proportionate share of the children's educational expenses, it was error to do so without including a provision that the amount that the defendant contributes to the room and board expenses of the unemancipated child's school while the child is away from home and at school shall be deducted from the defendant's child support obligation.

October 17, 2005

Order of Protection May Not Be Based Upon Unpleaded Allegations

In Czop v Czop, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2211379 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a family offense proceeding, the husband was charged with harassment in the second degree resulting from a heated dispute with the wife. The wife testified at the hearing that shortly after he was served with divorce papers, the husband, yelling and wildly pacing back and forth, threatened the wife with bodily injury. She also testified that the husband owned guns, and that she feared for her safety. The Appellate Division pointed out that Harassment in the second degree is committed "when, with intent to harass, annoy or alarm another person: [a person] strikes, shoves, kicks or otherwise subjects such other person to physical contact, or attempts or threatens to do the same " (Penal Law 240.26[1]. Evidence of a genuine threat of physical harm backed by the ability to carry it out is sufficient to prove harassment in the second degree. The Court held that an order of protection rendered in a family offense proceeding may not be based upon allegations not charged in the petition. At the hearing, the wife offered testimony regarding a prior physical assault. The husband objected to the admission of this evidence as it sought to prove an incident that was not charged in the petition. The Family Court sustained the husband's objection and struck the wife's testimony. However when it rendered its decision the Court referred to the wife's testimony of the prior assault, mischaracterizing it as "uncontroverted" and it stated that the wife's testimony of the prior assault would be taken into consideration. This was error. Family Court also erred in curtailing the husband's cross-examination of the wife concerning her alleged installation of a tape recording device on the parties' telephone line in order to surreptitiously record the husband's telephone conversations. Such conduct, if proved, constitutes eavesdropping in violation of Penal Law 250.05. This evidence was probative of the wife's credibility and such cross-examination should have been allowed. The Court agreed with the husband's contention that he was denied a fair hearing and remitted the matter for a new hearing and determination before a different family court judge.

Income Capped At $300,000 for Child Support Award

In Kaplan v Kaplan--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2292997 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Supreme Court, Nassau County (LaMarca, J.), Supreme Court awarded the mother custody of the parties' child and permitted her to relocate, and awarded child support in the sum of $3,925 per month, maintenance in the sum of $7,500 per month for 5 years, and an attorney's fee in the sum of $100,000. The Appellate Division reduced the child support to $2,836 per month, adding a provision directing that, upon the termination of the father's maintenance obligation, the father's child support obligation shall be upwardly modified to the sum of $4,112 per month, and adding thereto a provision directing that (a) the parties shall jointly consult with each other with respect to the child's education and health, including, but not limited to, decisions pertaining to his special needs arising from his hearing disability, and (b) the parents in their consultation shall always use their best efforts and good faith to arrive at a joint decision in the best interests of the child, but that the mother shall have final decision-making authority. Given that the mother was supportive of visitation, that both parties are fit and loving parents, each capable of caring for the child, that the mother was available to care for the child and address his special needs, and that the mother was the primary caretaker since the child's birth, the trial court properly awarded custody of the parties' child to the mother. Given the foregoing, the court deemed it appropriate to modify the judgment to add a provision directing that the parties, in good faith, jointly consult with each other regarding decisions pertaining to the child's education and health, with the mother having final decision-making authority. In calculating the amount of the child support award pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act the trial court opted to apply the child support percentage (in this case 17%) to the combined parental income over $80,000. The mother was not working at the pertinent time, and was attending to child care, including the child's special needs. The father was working, and was earning in excess of $400,000 per year. Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in capping his annual income at $300,000. Thus, as the Supreme Court correctly concluded, the combined parental income was $300,000, and the father's percentage obligation for child support was 100%. However, in making its child support determination, the Supreme Court failed to deduct from the father's income the amount of maintenance ($90,000 per year) that he was ordered to pay to the mother and the court erred in its FICA calculation. Rather than remit the matter to the Supreme Court, Nassau County, for a recalculation of child support, the court did it in the interest of judicial economy. The award of maintenance in the sum of $7,500 per month for 5 years was a proper exercise of the trial court's discretion, taking into consideration the relevant factors, including the parties' pre-separation standard of living, the separate property retained by each party and their respective net equitable distributive awards of marital property, the mother's absence from the work force as a certified social worker for most of the period following the birth of the parties' special needs child on January 19, 2001, the mother's continued role as the primary caretaker of a special needs child, the father's significantly higher earning capacity as a successful partner in a radiology practice, and the short duration of the parties' marriage.

Federal Court Can Not Enforce Rights of Access Under Hague Convention

In Wiesel v Wiesel-Tyrnauer — F.Supp.2d ---, 2005 WL 22850 (S.D.N.Y.) the father filed an application for the return of his children to Israel pursuant to the International Child Abduction Remedies Act and the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. His Petition was made pursuant to Article 12 of the Convention, which provides "Where a child has been wrongfully removed or retained...the judicial or administrative authority of the Contracting State where the child is...shall order the return of the child forthwith." Although he claimed to be a custodial parent of the Children, he did not seek the permanent return of the Children to Israel. Instead he sought court-ordered visitation or access rights, specifically an order directing the Mother to arrange, at her expense, for the children to visit their Father in Israel twice per calendar year, and to allow the Father to have at least four unsupervised visits per year with the Children in the United States. The District Court granted the mother's motion to dismiss the petition because the father did not seek the permanent return of the children to Israel. The jurisdictional issue was whether the court had jurisdiction over an Article 12 claim by a petitioning parent who claims to have custody rights but is seeking as, a remedy, only visitation and other access rights. Petitioner was seeking to have the court enforce his custody rights by ordering visitation rights. The Court noted that Article 12 directs the court to order a single remedy, the return of the child, upon a finding of a wrongful removal. The Convention does not permit the court to order the relief that Petitioner was seeking. Moreover, the Convention sets forth separate procedures by which signatory nations may enforce access rights of petitioning parents, and those procedures do not involve the federal courts. While Article 12 addresses procedures to effectuate the return of a wrongfully removed child, Article 21 concerns "organizing or securing the effective exercise of rights of access" to a child. Although Article 12 specifically refers to action by the "judicial or administrative authority" of a member nation, Article 21 makes no mention of recourse to a judicial authority. Instead, a parent must apply to the "Central Authority" of a nation to secure enforcement of his or her rights of access, and the "central authority" for the United States is the Department of State. The court found that it lacked jurisdiction to issue orders to create and secure access rights. Lacking the authority to order the relief requested, the court found that the action had to be dismissed.

Compound Interest Improper On Pay-out of Counsel Fee Award

In Miklos v Miklos, 21 A.D.3d 353, 800 N.Y.S.2d 561(2d Dept.2005) the appellate Division modified an order directing the defendant former husband to pay an attorney's fee in the sum of $87,500, payable in four annual installments each in the sum of $21,875, and to pay her experts 60% of their fees. The Appellate Division held that while it was proper to direct the payment of the attorneys fee in installments Supreme Court improperly awarded compound interest of 1.5% per month, which is at least twice the statutory rate of 9% per annum, on any untimely installment payments.

October 3, 2005

NYSBA Ethics Opinion 781 Requires Lawyers to Withdraw Fraudulent Net Worth Statement or Withdraw From Case

In New York State Bar Association, Opinion 781 – 12/8/04, in order to submit a financial statement on behalf of a client, a matrimonial lawyer certified the accuracy of the statement to family court. After filing the statement, the lawyer learned that it contained a material error relating to the omission of substantial client assets. The lawyer asked the Committee if he is required to withdraw the financial statement?

The Committee on Professional Ethics rendered an opinion which concluded that a matrimonial lawyer who learns that a financial statement submitted by the lawyer to family court contains a material omission, and that the client perpetrated a fraud on the tribunal, must call upon the client to rectify the material omission. If the client refuses, the lawyer must withdraw the financial statement. If the lawyer knows or it is obvious that continued employment will result in violation of a Disciplinary Rule (which we be the case where it is not withdrawn), the lawyer must withdraw from the representation, with the court's permission if required by court rules.

The lawyer must first determine if he or she received information "clearly establishing" that the client has committed a fraud. "Fraud" under the Code of Ethics "does not include conduct, although characterized as fraudulent by statute or administrative rule, which lacks an element of scienter, deceit, intent to mislead, or knowing failure to correct misrepresentations which can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another." If the lawyer is uncertain of the client's state of mind in making this determination, EC 7-6 states that the lawyer should "resolve reasonable doubts in favor of the client."

DRL 236[B][9][b] Applied in Family Court Proceeding For Modification of Spousal Support

In Sannuto v Sannuto,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2152701 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) The Appellate Division pointed out that Family Court Act 439(e) provides that an aggrieved party's specific written objections to the final order of support of the Support Magistrate must be submitted within 35 days after the mailing of the order to such party. Since the wife did not submit written objections to the Support Magistrate's order until more than 35 days after the mailing of the order, the Family Court should have denied the objections on this ground. However, the order of the Support Magistrate dated March 2, 2004, was subject to the review process set forth in Family Court Act 439(e), based upon the husband's timely objection, coupled with the wife's rebuttal to his objections. Upon review of the husband's objections, it held that the Support Magistrate erred in determining that the husband demonstrated a substantial change in circumstances to justify a downward modification of his spousal support obligation. Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(9)(b), the court may modify any prior order or judgment with respect to maintenance. The party seeking the modification has the burden of establishing the existence of a "substantial change in circumstances" warranting the modification. Importantly, in determining if there is a "substantial change in circumstances" to justify a downward modification, the change is measured by comparing the payor's financial circumstances at the time of the motion for downward modification and at the time of the divorce or the time when the order sought to be modified was made. Under the circumstances in the present case, the court properly determined that the husband failed to meet his burden.

Child Support Agreement That Does Not Specify Amount of Basic Child Support Obligation And Reasons For Deviation is Void

In Jefferson v Jefferson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2154697 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order which denied the Wife's motion to vacate the child support provisions of the parties' separation agreement on the ground that they did not comply with Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h), and granted the motion. The matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for a determination of the parties' respective financial circumstances, including income, expenses, and standard of living, as of December 6, 2000, and for a determination of the appropriate amount of child support to be paid based thereon. The child support provisions of the parties' December 6, 2000, separation agreement (hereinafter the agreement) deviated from the Child Support Standards Act (Domestic Relations Law 2401-b in that the agreement failed to take into account the combined parental income in excess of $80,000. Domestic Relations Law 240(1-b)(h) provides that a validly-executed support agreement which deviates from the basic child support obligation set forth in the CSSA must specify, inter alia, the amount that the basic child support obligation would have been under the CSSA and the reason or reasons that the agreement does not provide for payment of that amount. Here, the agreement failed to set forth the presumptively correct amount of support that would have been fixed pursuant to the CSSA, and failed to articulate the reason the parties chose to deviate from the CSSA guidelines. Consequently, the child support provisions of the agreement are invalid and unenforceable and the Supreme Court should have granted that branch of the plaintiff's motion which sought their vacatur.

Wife Entitled To Opportunity To Purge Contempt Before Going to Jail

In Cooper v Cooper --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2155186 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) pursuant to a pendente lite order of the Supreme Court the wife was directed to return $274,000 she unilaterally withdrew from the parties' joint account and to account for any sums spent. She not only refused to abide by the court's directive, but, after issuance of the directive, secretly removed the funds and hid them in her father's safe and continued to deplete the funds. The Supreme Court held her in contempt and directed that she be incarcerated for four days with no opportunity to purge herself of the contempt. She was released by the sheriff after serving a day in jail, who mistakenly calculated her release date. Learning of her release, the Supreme Court directed that she be re-incarcerated. The Appellate Division stayed enforcement of those portions of the Supreme Court's orders directing incarceration, including the directive requiring re-incarceration and reversed the order directing incarceration on the law. It held that even if the wife had been properly adjudicated in contempt, the Supreme Court erred in failing to give her an opportunity to purge herself of her civil contempt, since she still had the ability to return the funds and to render an accounting (see Judiciary Law 774). It also erred in granting the husband's motion for contempt. Before holding a party in contempt, Domestic Relations Law 245 requires a showing that resort to other enforcement devices has been exhausted or would be ineffectual. The Wife's attorney's efforts to defend against the contempt motion by demonstrating the efficiency of other enforcement remedies were prematurely terminated by the hearing court. Thus, the court improperly adjudicated the plaintiff in contempt.

Preclusion not Available where Movant Spouse Failed to Disclose Too

In Biggio v Biggio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 2211685 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that husband having failed to make full disclosure, was in no position to argue that wife should have been sanctioned with penalty of preclusion for failure to make disclosure. It noted that the preclusion order overlooked the plaintiff's failure to make full disclosure, including disclosure of financial information regarding assets and expenses clearly within his sole control. Under the circumstances, the plaintiff was in no position to argue that the court should sanction the defendant with the penalty of preclusion.

September 16, 2005

Modification of Custody Requires Change of Circumstances and Best Interest Showing Where Surviving Agreement

In Matter of Rawlins v Barth, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2005 WL 1962987 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother commenced a proceeding to transfer custody of the parties' two children from the father to her. The father had custody pursuant to a stipulation between the parties. The Appellate Division held that when the parties enter into a stipulation concerning custody, "it will not be set aside unless there is a sufficient change in circumstances since the time of the stipulation and unless the modification of the custody agreement is in the best interests of the children".

Purchase Price Not Evidence of Value In Rapidly Rising Real Estate Market

In London v London, 2005 WL 1846874 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the trial court erroneously found that the marital residence was a marital asset despite uncontroverted evidence that it was acquired by defendant prior to the marriage. As the nontitled spouse, plaintiff had the burden of establishing the value, if any, that was added to this property by her direct or indirect contributions during the marriage. As she did not, Supreme Court should not have awarded her any interest in this asset. Moreover, it was error for Supreme Court to order this separate property sold.(citing Carr v. Carr, 291 A.D.2d 672, 676-677 [2002]). Supreme Court also found that defendant's pension and profit-sharing trust plans were marital assets despite uncontroverted evidence that these plans were established prior to the marriage while defendant was operating his own professional corporation. However, there is a marital component to these assets, as contributions were made after the marriage and before the dissolution of the professional corporation. The Appellate Court rejected defendant's argument that plaintiff was entitled to no share in these assets by reason of her failure to offer proof of valuation concerning the separate and marital portions of these assets. Such proof is necessary only if the asset will be the subject of a distributive award. Rather than make a distributive award, Supreme Court erroneously equally divided these accounts without giving the defendant credit for his contributions. The Appellate Division held that the Majauskas formula (Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 488-493 [1984]) should be applied to properly distribute these accounts. The Supreme Court properly determined that certain premises acquired by defendant prior to the institution of the action, was marital. However, even though only about six months elapsed between those events, in a rapidly rising real estate market, evidence of a possible purchase price may not be the equivalent of the actual value of the property at the time of the commencement of the action.

Award For Religious School Tuition Proper

In Cohen v Cohen, 2005 WL 1819643 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.)the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of divorce which directed the husband to pay 64% of the religious school tuition for the parties' children, to continue to maintain health insurance benefits for the children and contribute his pro rata share of the children's unreimbursed medical expenses, and to pay maintenance to the defendant in the sum of $250 per week for a period of three years. It held that a court may award educational expenses for private schooling having regard for the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties and in the best interests of the child. Here, the parties led a religious life during the marriage, including enrollment of their children in full-time religious school. In view of this, as well as all of the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court properly ordered the plaintiff to pay a pro rata share of the children's religious school tuition. There was no reason to disturb the maintenance award. The overriding purpose of an award of maintenance is to enable the receiving spouse to achieve financial independence. Inasmuch as the defendant was attending evening college classes to become a certified teacher, the three-year award of spousal support was a proper exercise of the court's discretion.

Valuation of Enhanced Value of Separate Property From Date of Acquisition, Rather Than Commencement Date

In Ritz v Ritz, 799 N.Y.S.2d 501 (1st Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division modified the judgment of divorce to reduce the plaintiff wife's share of the enhanced value of defendant's rental apartment from 50% to 25%. The apartment was a separate asset of defendant's purchased before the marriage. It held that the trial court was correct in finding that the enhanced value was marital property as the rent money was deposited in a joint checking account and there was evidence of plaintiff's indirect contributions as a homemaker and mother. It was also correct in finding that the enhanced value was to be determined from the date of acquisition, not the date of commencement, because the court was only provided with a dollar figure for the date of commencement, and since defendant produced no evidence as to the amount of increase due to passive market forces as opposed to his direct efforts, it was proper to classify the entire increase as marital property. In view of this most favorable calculation for plaintiff to determine the marital portion, an award of 50% of the enhanced value was disproportionate. She contributed no money to the operation of the apartment; the rent money, which was merely "parked" in the joint checking account, more than paid for its expenses. Nor did plaintiff directly contribute to the operation or management of the apartment.

Durational Maintenance Awarded Where Wife Had Significant Savings

In Benzaken v Benzaken, 799 N.Y.S.2d 579 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division held that awarding the wife maintenance of $350 per week for three years was a provident exercise of discretion. One of the purposes of an award of maintenance is to encourage economic independence. The husband lived in a house owned by his mother and paid no rent. He reported having $207,729.83 in assets and no liabilities. He retained sole ownership of the family business pursuant to the resettled amended judgment. Although the wife had significant savings, she was unemployed and required training to find employment. An award of maintenance for a period of three years was sufficient to enable the plaintiff to complete a course of training and obtain employment. In light of the disparity between the economic circumstances of the parties, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in directing the husband to pay the wife an attorney's fee of $4,000.

Error To Award Husband Share of Assets Titled in Wife's Name Where No "Economic Partnership"

In Galvin v Galvin, 799 N.Y.S.2d 547 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division modified the judgment, on the law, by deleting the provisions thereof awarding the husband a distributive share of the property known as 1102 Victory Blvd., Staten Island, N.Y., and the accounts known as Bernard Herold & Co., Inc., Account No. 5M7-105023, Bernard Herold & Co., Inc., Account No. 577-141291, Merrill Lynch Account No. 433-51051, Merrill Lynch SEP Account No. 433-51M78, and a Mercedes Benz and denied the defendant a distributive share of those assets. It held that the trial court erroneously awarded the husband a distributive share of these assets which were titled solely in the plaintiff wife's name. Except for the marital home, the parties kept their finances separate during the course of the marriage. They conducted themselves during the marriage in a manner inconsistent with the typical "economic partnership." The husband played an extremely limited role in the marriage and failed to provide any significant financial resources to the marriage. In view of these facts, the trial court erred in awarding the husband a distributive share of these assets.

September 1, 2005

Wife's Appeal of Maintenance Award Dismissed for Inadequate Record

In Mergl v Mergl, 796 N.Y.S.2d 823 (4th Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division dismissed plaintiff's appeal from a judgment of divorce that, inter alia, granted defendant durational maintenance and counsel fees, based on plaintiff's failure to provide an adequate record. It noted that its rules provide that the complete record on appeal shall include, in the following order: the notice of appeal with proof of service and filing; the order or judgment from which the appeal is taken; the decision, if any, of the court granting the order or judgment; the judgment roll, if any; the pleadings of the action or proceeding; the corrected transcript of the action or proceeding or statement in lieu of transcript, if any; all necessary and relevant motion papers; and, to the extent practicable, all necessary and relevant exhibits". As there were no pleadings, no financial affidavits, and no exhibits that establish the parties' respective incomes, it was thus unable to determine whether Supreme Court's award of maintenance or counsel fees was error as alleged. It is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal. The record must contain all of the relevant papers that were before the Supreme Court. Where a record on appeal does not contain documents submitted to the trial court and the absence of those documents renders meaningful appellate review impossible, dismissal of [the] appeal is an appropriate disposition.

Error to Value License of Practitioner Based Upon Hypothetical Earnings

In Guskin v Guskin, 18 A.D.3d 814, 796 N.Y.S.2d(2d Dept, 2005) the Appellate Division reversed the judgment of divorce and remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a hearing on the issues of the value of the defendant's license to practice podiatric medicine and the distribution of the plaintiff's pension and tax-deferred annuity in light of the defendant's direct and indirect contributions, and for a new determination of the issue of counsel fees. It held that the "The enhanced earning capacity due to acquisition of a professional license during the marriage is clearly a marital asset subject to equitable distribution. Supreme Court improperly based its valuation of the defendant's license to practice podiatric medicine on the estimated earnings of a hypothetical license holder, rather than on his actual prior earnings. It also noted that when separate property appreciated during the marriage due to the active efforts of the titled spouse, and where such appreciation was due in part to the active contributions and efforts of the non-titled spouse as a parent and homemaker, the amount of that appreciation should be added to the sum of marital property for equitable distribution. The Supreme Court therefore also erred in distributing the plaintiff's pension and tax-deferred annuity after improperly limiting the defendant's testimony as to his noneconomic contributions to the household during the parties' long-term marriage.

August 16, 2005

Reduction in income Not Necessarily A Change in Financial Circumstances

In Carr v Carr, 2005 WL 1413395 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) petitioner's income, as reported in his tax returns from 1999 through 2003, fluctuated widely due to the dissolution of his law firm . His 1999 return, upon which the initial child support calculation was based, reported income of only $44,620. In July 2000, he obtained employment at an annual salary of $135,000, which remained unchanged. The former wife petitioned for an increase in monthly child support. It was reduced by the Appellate Division to $ 2,336.02. His 2001 return reported income of $277,566 and his 2002 tax return showed income of $60,116, which included his salary and losses attributable to the law firm dissolution. His 2003 petitioner's return showed income of $141,415, including his salary and interest income. At the time of his application he lived in the marital residence, which had been valued at $650,000 at the time of the divorce. He claimed net annual income of approximately $80,000, which included a monthly payment of $750 from a woman who was living with him. He asserted that his income had been supplemented by the liquidation of assets, and he acknowledged that the value of his retirement accounts had increased by $200,000 during the past year. Petitioner claimed annual expenses of approximately $130,200, including annual payments of $41,500 to a former wife, as well as nearly $10,000 for country club expenses and $9,800 for lawn care and pool maintenance, which was approximately half the amount of his expenses in 2001. Petitioner claimed little debt other than the mortgage on his residence and amounts owed to his attorney. Based solely upon his income in 2003, petitioner sought to have his monthly child support obligation reduced to $240.68. The Appellate Division held that a petitioner seeking a downward modification of a prior order of support must demonstrate a substantial change in circumstances warranting a downward modification. A reduction in a payor's net income, while a primary element of the analysis, does not limit Family Court's ability to examine the financial circumstances at the time of the prior order and the financial circumstances at the time of the application for modification and to consider whether the payor has the means or ability to comply with the prior order of support. It found that Petitioner's argument would improperly narrow the required showing of a substantial change in financial circumstances to a showing of a substantial change in reported income, which would invite petitions for modification any and every time there was a bump or dip in a payor's income, without regard to whether the payor has assets and/or earning capacity that are not reflected in the payor's tax return in a particular year. "This is not the law, nor should it be." The Court held that notwithstanding the undisputed reduction in income as reflected in his 2001 and 2003 tax returns, petitioner did not establish that his financial circumstances had deteriorated such that he lacked the means to pay monthly child support in the amount of $2,336.02. His income remained substantial, as did his assets, and his significant expenditures on luxuries such as country club fees and lawn care belied any claim that he could not afford his child support obligation. The court could not agree that petitioner's volitional depletion of his savings to maintain his prior standard of living should be ignored in favor of a reduction in child support, particularly where, as here, petitioner conceded that he typically billed no more than 18 hours per week at work. While the parties' income will be used to establish the "basic child support obligation", a reduction in petitioner's income does not necessarily constitute a change in financial circumstances warranting a downward modification of child support.

Factors Considered in Maintenance Award

In Gubiotti v Gubiotti, 2005 WL 1489502 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1972 and had three emancipated sons. At the time of the hearing plaintiff was 50 and defendant was 53. Plaintiff had a high school education and spent the greater part of the marriage as a homemaker. At times during the marriage, plaintiff worked outside the home in a variety of menial jobs and also babysat for other people's children. In 1995, she began to run a licensed day-care center in the marital home from which she reported a gross income of $18,901 in 2002. Defendant, who earned an MBA during the marriage, was a Life Insurance Company agent. Defendant's average gross income for 2000, 2001 and 2002 was $165,227, while his tax returns for those years reported an average net income of $58,962. Supreme Court distributed the marital estate and awarded plaintiff maintenance of $3,000 per month for seven years and $1,500 per month thereafter until plaintiff's death or remarriage or the death of defendant. On appeal Defendant asserted that the durational award of maintenance was excessive in that he will have to pay annual maintenance of $36,000 despite the fact that his income was only approximately $59,000. He contended that the durational maintenance award constituted 62% of his income, and left him with annual income in the amount of $17,250, after taxes. In making its factual findings pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a), Supreme Court appeared to have used the figure of $59,000 in determining defendant's income, but also made findings suggesting that the award of maintenance was based in part upon income and perquisites of defendant not reflected in that $59,000 figure. There was evidence in the record to support both the $59,000 figure or a higher level of income, but a lack of detail in Supreme Court's express factual findings precludes the Appellate Court from determining whether the award of $3,000 per month for seven years was excessive. Defendant further contended that Supreme Court erred in awarding plaintiff nondurational maintenance because it was a de facto redistribution of his pension, and because it would require him to continue working into the years during which he intended to retire. Although these narrow, conclusory arguments lacked merit, the court had to remit the issue of nondurational maintenance to Supreme Court. It held that nondurational maintenance may be appropriate where, as here, plaintiff's energies during the marriage were primarily devoted to homemaking and child rearing to the detriment of her ability to become self-sufficient and maintain the predivorce standard of living. An award of nondurational maintenance is among the issues to be resolved in the sound discretion of the trial court after consideration of the pertinent factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(6)(a), the payee spouse's reasonable needs, and the predivorce standard of living. Among the many specific considerations underlying an award of nondurational maintenance and the amount thereof is the present and potential future income of each of the parties. As with the award of durational maintenance in the amount of $3,000 per month, Supreme Court's findings of fact regarding defendant's income lacked sufficient detail to permit review of the nondurational maintenance award. Inasmuch as the evidence may support Supreme Court's maintenance award, but was insufficient to afford the Appellate Court the capability to make appropriate findings the Court declined to exercise its authority to consider the issue of the amount and duration of maintenance de novo.

Child Support Award Increased on Appeal

In Hammack v Hammack, 2005 WL 1644788 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1976 and had four children. If the statutory formula were strictly applied to the total combined parental income, defendant's obligation would have been $103,002. Supreme Court applied the statutory percentage to the first $80,000, fixing defendant's initial support obligation at $22,568. The court then tacked on an additional $8,000 per year (to be used for the limited purpose of contributing to the hockey costs for two of the children), thus making defendant's total child support obligation about $30,000 per year, which was approximately $73,000 less than that which a strict application of the statutory formula would call for. Defendant was also ordered to continue paying his proportionate share of up to $23,000 per year for the college expenses of the oldest child, his share of college expenses for the other three children up to an amount equal to tuition, room and board at the State University of New York, up to $6,000 per year for private school expenses for two of the boys, and his share of medical insurance and the cost of unreimbursed health related expenses for all of the children. The Appellate Division found that the award was insufficient. Although the trial court observed that the family's lifestyle was not lavish or extravagant, it was substantially more comfortable than that which would be permitted by the support obligation set forth by the court. While agreeing with Supreme Court that a $103,000 support obligation, based on a strict application of the combined parental income, appeared to be manifestly unjust and inappropriate, it also found this to be true of a $30,000 support obligation where the noncustodial parent earns in excess of $300,000 per year. Applying the facts to the factors found in DRL 240(1-b)(f), the Appellate Division found that while the financial resources of the parents had for the most part been equalized as of the time the judgment was rendered, defendant's financial resources would continue to grow, increasing the disparity in the parties' incomes. Supreme Court overlooked the increasing needs of the children as they grow older, as well as their entitlement to share in their father's post-2003 standard of living. It found that that a child support percentage of 12% of the combined parental income which exceeds $80,000 would be more appropriate and defendant's total annual child support obligation was increased to $4,475 per month. The additional $8,000 per year for hockey costs was terminated. The remainder of Supreme Court's judgment with regard to the costs involved in the children's educational expenses and healthcare expenses remained unchanged.

August 1, 2005

Award of Entire Marital Residence to Wife Appropriate Where Husband Did Not Contribute

In Herzog v Herzog, 795 N.Y.S.2d 749 (2d Dept. 2005) the husband appealed from a judgment of the Supreme Court that directed him to pay maintenance of $400 per month for 15 years, awarded the defendant wife 50% of the marital portion of his pension, denied his request for equitable distribution of the marital premises and awarded the defendant the sum of $125,000, which represented her separate property contribution towards its purchase, as well as the remaining value of the marital premises, and awarded the defendant an attorney's fee of $10,000. The judgment was modified by the Appellate Division, on the law, by reducing the length of the maintenance award to a period of four years, or until the defendant's remarriage, whichever occurs sooner, and by deleting the attorney's fee. It held that the trial court providently exercised its discretion in denying the plaintiff's request for equitable distribution of the former marital residence. While the marital residence, purchased in the joint names of the plaintiff and the defendant, was marital property, the defendant used proceeds from her separate property to purchase the residence. Therefore, there was no basis upon which to disturb the trial court's finding that the defendant was entitled to the purchase price of $125,000, which was derived from her separate property. The trial court did not find credible the plaintiff's testimony that the funds used to purchase the residence were a gift, and such determination is afforded great deference on appeal. With respect to the remaining value of the former marital residence, the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the entirety to the wife. At trial, the plaintiff testified only to improvements he made to the former marital residence prior to the time when he and the defendant owned the property, and completely failed to substantiate any of his assertions regarding contributions to the former marital residence or the marriage. In contrast, the defendant credibly testified that she paid all expenses in connection with the residence after acquiring ownership, and supported such testimony with documentary evidence. The trial court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing the plaintiff to pay maintenance for a period of 15 years in light of the short duration of the parties' marriage. A four-year maintenance award was appropriate. It also improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant an attorney's fee under the circumstances presented.

Proper to Award Protective Order During Childs' Entire Minority

In Matter of Neail v DeShane, 796 NYS2d 435 (3d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division affirmed a mutual orders of protection that were for the duration of the child's minority. It held that because the dispute concerned a custody proceeding under Family Court Act article 6, the duration of the orders of protection was permissible.

Forensic Report Diminished Where Not Comprehensive

In Neuman v Neuman, 796 NYS2d 403 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division held that fact that court-appointed forensic psychologist had recommended that child remain in the mother's custody did not render unreasonable Supreme Court's determination that custody should be transferred to father. The recommendations of court-appointed experts are but one factor to be considered in making a custody determination and are entitled to some weight. However, they are not determinative and do not usurp the judgment of the trial judge. The Court noted that where, as here, the forensic report was based solely on brief interviews (many done via telephone) with the parties, the children, the mother's paramour, teachers, a rabbi, and healthcare providers, did not contain any allegation of an underlying psychological problem regarding the child, and where no standardized psychological tests were administered nor objectives articulated for the child, the utility of the report was diminished.

Admissibility of Out-of-Court Statements of Child in Custody Case

In Matter of Jacqueline B v Peter K, 796 NYS2d 518 (Fam. Ct. 2005) a custody modification proceeding the court addressed the issue of the admissibility of out-of-court statements of the child through the testimony of third-party witnesses called by the Petitioner or the Law Guardian. It noted that the petition was filed under Article VI of the Family Court Act and while the Legislature has enacted special provisions, such as FCA § 1046 to admit hearsay statements relating to any allegations of abuse and neglect to be admitted into evidence providing the statements are corroborated by "[a]ny other evidence tending to support" their reliability, no alteration of the rules of evidence had been enacted for custody matters. It noted that a body of case law had developed upholding the admissibility of a child's hearsay statements in custody proceedings where the gravamen of the application is based upon allegations of abuse or neglect, and where the custody proceeding under Article VI becomes, in effect, a substitute for the child protective proceeding under Article X. Trial and appellate courts have applied the FCA 1046 exception to custody proceedings and have admitted, when corroborated, the out-of-court hearsay statements of a child in custody proceedings, custody modification proceedings, proceedings to terminate visitation, and applications for supervised visitation. The Court held that as the gravamen of the Petitioner's application to modify the joint custody order did not allege that the father physically or sexually abused the child or that he neglected the physical, mental or emotional condition of the child by failing to exercise a minimum degree of care, statements of the child were not admissible. When, however, the Court is trying a neglect or abuse case within the context of a custody proceeding, and those acts or omissions are the predicate for making or altering a custodial determination, statements of the child pertaining to those allegations would be admissible.

Pendente Lite Order Can Be Enforced after Complaint Dismissed

In Fotadis v Fotadis, 795 N.Y.S.2d 729 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion by, in effect, denying the plaintiff's application to extend the time to serve the complaint, since the delay was over 15 months, she failed to show good cause for it, and a meritorious cause of action. Her verified complaint which stated a cause of action sounding in constructive abandonment was submitted for the first time as part of her surreply papers. Therefore, the Supreme Court properly refused to consider it. Her claim of actual abandonment was insufficient since the alleged abandonment occurred less than one year prior to the commencement of the action. However, it was error to deny plaintiff's motion for leave to enter a judgment for arrears against the defendant. Although the defendant's current obligations pursuant to the pendente lite order terminated with the dismissal of the action the defendant was required to obey the pendente lite order while the action was. Upon dismissal of the action, the pendente lite order was no longer in effect, but the plaintiff was entitled to any arrears which accrued under that order prior to dismissal and may enforce that obligation by seeking leave to enter a money judgment. And although a party may not seek to enforce a pendente lite order by way of contempt proceedings subsequent to the termination of the action, the dismissal of the complaint did not extinguish any rights which accrued under contempt orders issued prior to dismissal.

Joint Custody Awarded to Permit Hague Protection

In Matter of Ish-Shalom v. Wittmann, 797 NYS2d 111 (2d Dept. 2005) Family Court awarded custody of the children to the mother and permitted her to relocate with the children to Florida. While affirming the award which permitted the mother to relocate, the Appellate Division modified to award the mother and father joint custody, with the residence of the children to remain with the mother in Florida and with all decision-making authority to remain with the mother. Finding that the award was appropriate, the Appellate Division shared the Family Court's concern that the immigration status of the mother, a German national who entered the country on a visitor's visa, "is questionable at best." The father and a court-appointed psychologist expressed concern that the mother would return with the children to Germany, where she was licensed to practice medicine. The mother had already removed the children from New York to Florida, in direct contravention of a direction by the Family Court in open court that "neither party shall remove the children from the jurisdiction of the court." The Court found that if the mother were to return to Germany with the children, the father, as noncustodial parent, could not petition under the terms of the Hague Convention on International Child Abduction for the children's return (citing Matter of Welsh v. Lewis, 292 A.D.2d 536, 537; Croll v. Croll, 229 F3d 133, cert. denied 534 U.S. 949). The Appellate Division held that under these particular circumstances, the father should have been awarded joint custody with the mother.

July 18, 2005

Waiver of Right to Pension

In Leichtner v Leichtner, 794 N.Y.S.2d 364, the Appellate Division held that although a pension is normally subject to equitable distribution, because the defendant failed to request that the Supreme Court award her a portion of the plaintiff's pension, and no evidence was offered with regard to the plaintiff's pension, the Supreme Court properly declined to distribute a portion of the plaintiff's pension to the defendant.

Maintenance Denied Attorney-Wife Who Failed to Demonstrate Disability Prevented Her Working at Attorney.

In Ferro v Ferro, 2005 WL 1346542 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court which awarded the wife supervised visitation with the parties' children, denied her an award of maintenance, and directed her and the defendant to pay equal shares of the Law Guardian's fee from each party's share of the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence. As the Supreme Court awarded custody to the respondent, with the appellant responsible for child support, and as the appellant failed to sufficiently demonstrate that her disability prevented her from earning a living as an attorney, the Supreme Court properly denied her an award of maintenance. The judgment of divorce directed that the marital residence be sold, with the proceeds to be divided equally between the parties. Accordingly, Supreme Court properly directed the parties to pay equal shares of the Law Guardian's fee from each party's share of these proceeds.

Enhanced Earning Capacity Not Marital Property. Retroactive Award Denied.

In Corless v Corless, 795 N.Y.S.2d 273 (2d Dept. 2005), Supreme distributed the marital assets, allocated the marital debt, found the wife was solely responsible for a loan taken to finance her graduate school education, awarded her maintenance in the sum of $4,000 per month until she reached the age of 65 years, to then be reduced to the sum of $2,000 per month until the defendant reached the age of 65 years, awarded her child support in the sum of $3,000 per month without specifying that it was to be assessed retroactive to the date of the commencement of the action, determined that the defendant pay 35% of the reasonable attorney's fees and litigation costs incurred by her and awarded her $17,768 in attorney's fees and litigation costs. The Appellate Division modified the judgment by adding a provision directing the defendant to maintain a life insurance policy with the plaintiff as beneficiary in the sum of $400,000 until he reached the age of 65 years. It held that Supreme Court erred in failing to direct the defendant to obtain and maintain a life insurance policy to secure his obligation for maintenance and child support. It also held that the defendant's use of his income, including severance pay, to pay legitimate household expenses did not constitute a dissipation of marital assets. While outstanding financial obligations incurred during the marriage which are not solely the liability of either spouse may be deemed marital obligations, a financial obligation incurred by one party in pursuit of his or her separate interests should remain that party's separate liability. The plaintiff's graduate school education was not treated as marital property and the student loan used to finance that education was, under the circumstances, incurred for the plaintiff's sole benefit. In view of the foregoing, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in allocating this debt to the plaintiff as her separate responsibility.

Parent Entitled to Hearing on Law Guardian Fees and May Claim Malpractice

In Mars v Mars, 2005 WL 1389223 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that because the court directed plaintiff to pay the law guardian's fees and the children were old enough to articulate their wishes, plaintiff has standing to assert legal malpractice as an affirmative defense to the fee application to the extent of challenging that portion of the fees attributable to advocacy, as opposed to guardianship. Adopting the rule enunciated by the Second Department that "if a parent who has been directed to pay a fee contests a law guardian's claims relative to the time expended and the reasonable value of the services provided, he or she should be afforded hearing on the issue" (citing Matter of Plovnick v. Klinger, 10 AD3d 84, 91 [2004]), the Appellate Division held that if as plaintiff alleged, the law guardian's invoices reflect work never done, plaintiff must be afforded the opportunity to challenge the reasonableness of the law guardian's fee at the fee hearing.

Hearsay Not Admissible in Custody Case Absent Abuse or Neglect Allegations

In Matter of Jacqueline B v Peter K, 2005 WL 1353910 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.), a custody modification proceeding the court addressed the issue of the admissibility of out-of-court statements of the child through the testimony of third-party witnesses called by the Petitioner or the Law Guardian. It noted that the petition was filed under Article VI of the Family Court Act and while the Legislature has enacted special provisions, such as FCA § 1046 to admit hearsay statements relating to any allegations of abuse and neglect to be admitted into evidence providing the statements are corroborated by "[a]ny other evidence tending to support" their reliability, no alteration of the rules of evidence had been enacted for custody matters. It noted that a body of case law had developed upholding the admissibility of a child's hearsay statements in custody proceedings where the gravamen of the application is based upon allegations of abuse or neglect, and where the custody proceeding under Article VI becomes, in effect, a substitute for the child protective proceeding under Article X, trial and appellate courts have applied the FCA 1046 exception to custody proceedings and have admitted, when corroborated, the out-of-court hearsay statements of a child in custody proceedings, custody modification proceedings, proceedings to terminate visitation, and applications for supervised visitation. The Court held that as the gravamen of the Petitioner's application to modify the joint custody order did not allege that the father physically or sexually abused the child or that he neglected the physical, mental or emotional condition of the child by failing to exercise a minimum degree of care, statements of the child were not admissible. When, however, the Court is trying a neglect or abuse case within the context of a custody proceeding, and those acts or omissions are the predicate for making or altering a custodial determination, statements of the child pertaining to those allegations would be admissible.

Fair Trial Denied By Judge's Intrusive Questioning

In Matter of Yadiel Roque C, 793 N.Y.S.2d 857(4th Dept, 2005), Respondent appealed from an order adjudicating him to be a juvenile delinquent, contending that he was denied a fair trial by the court's intrusive conduct during the fact-finding hearing. Although respondent's contention was not preserved for our review the Appellate Division reviewed it in the interest of justice, and reversed the order. It held that although a trial judge may intervene in a trial to clarify confusing testimony and facilitate the orderly and expeditious progress of the trial, the court may not take on 'the function or appearance of an advocate. In last analysis, ... [the trial judge] should be guided by the principle that his [or her] function is to protect the record, not to make it", including juvenile delinquency proceedings. Here, "[t]he course of conduct of the trial judge was such that he assumed the appearance of an advocate at the trial by his extensive examination of certain witnesses".

Custody Awarded Without Hearing

In Van Orman v Van Orman, 2005 WL 1378612 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly granted the petition for sole custody of the parties' two children without a hearing. At that time, respondent was incarcerated in New York and was also held upon a detainer issued from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The Court held that no hearing is required upon a custody petition when the court possesses sufficient information to make a comprehensive assessment of the best interests of the children (citing Matter of Glenn v. Glenn, 262 A.D.2d 885, 887, lv dismissed in part and denied in part 94 N.Y.2d 782; cf. Matter of Mills v. Sweeting, 278 A.D.2d 943, 944). As a result of his incarceration, respondent was incapable of fulfilling the obligations of a custodial parent. The court therefore properly dismissed respondent's petition, without prejudice to the right of respondent to re-file when he is released from incarceration.

July 1, 2005

"Income" For Child Support Award Includes Maintenance Where Judgment Contains Future Adjustment

In Nichols v Nichols, 2005 WL 1368068 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that where defendant earned $96,910 annually while plaintiff received only $18,056 annually from a disability retirement pension and earnings from part-time employment, given plaintiff's age and poor health, the gross disparity between the parties' incomes and the unlikelihood of plaintiff becoming self-supporting, Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in fixing maintenance at $350 per week until she was 62, a period of six years. The Appellate Division also held that Supreme Court should have included the maintenance award in its calculation of defendant's share of unreimbursed health expenses and college expenses. The percentage of unreimbursed health care costs for the marital children is pro rated in the same proportion as each parent's income is to the combined parental income and the same formula is generally used in computing each parent's share of the children's future educational expenses. In computing the combined parental income, the spouse obligated to pay maintenance is entitled to have that amount deducted from his or her income while the spouse in receipt of the maintenance will experience an increase in income. After reducing defendant's salary by $18,200, the annual amount of his $350 weekly maintenance obligation, defendant's income for purposes of his unreimbursed health care obligation was $78,710. In turn, plaintiff's income was increased by $18,200. Thus, defendant's percentage of the combined parental income ($114,966) was 68.5%, requiring that defendant's pro rata obligation for their son's college expenses and unreimbursed health care expenses should have been reduced from 88.5% to 68.5%. The Appellate Division also held that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff counsel fees. For an award of counsel fees to be justified, there must exist a sufficient evidentiary basis for the court to evaluate the value of the services rendered. Although both counsel agreed to submit affidavits of services rendered, no proof was submitted. The award of counsel fees was vacated and the matter remitted for a redetermination

Acknowledgment Not Necessary on Modification Agreement Where Parties Not Married

In Penrose v Penrose, 793 N.Y.S.2d 579 (3d Dept. 2005) the parties 1985 separation agreement was incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce. By an "Agreement and Waiver" dated August 2, 1993, plaintiff waived all of her rights under the divorce decree in exchange for specific bequests as then set forth in a will executed by defendant that same day. In 2003, plaintiff brought an application for enforcement of certain terms of the divorce decree. The Appellate Division held that her attempt to enforce the provisions of the 1985 separation agreement was time barred. Moreover, since the parties were no longer married at the time of its execution it rejected plaintiff's contention that the 1993 agreement should have had a notarized acknowledgment in order to be valid.

Unacknowledged Custody Agreement Valid and Enforceable

In Kelly v Kelly, 2005 WL 1377954 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) defendant argued on appeal that Supreme Court erred in awarding custody of the parties' children to plaintiff. At trial, defendant stipulated to an award of custody to plaintiff, and the court denied his subsequent request to withdraw that stipulation. On appeal, defendant relied on Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(3) in support of his contention that the stipulation was invalid. The Court held that his reliance was misplaced because the requirements of Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(3) pertain to stipulations which effect the equitable distribution of marital property. Here, the stipulation pertained to custody and was binding pursuant to CPLR 2104.

Request For Custody Not Necessary in Custody Proceeding

In Miller v Orbaker, 793 N.Y.S.2d 840 (4th Dept.,2005) the Appellate Division rejected petitioner's contention that Family Court erred in awarding sole custody of the child to respondent because respondent did not file a cross petition seeking that relief. Because petitioner sought sole custody, the issue of an award of custody to any party was properly before the court. In a child custody proceeding, a court has the authority to "enter orders for custody ... as, in the court's discretion, justice requires, having regard to the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties and to the best interests of the child" (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1][a]).

Exception to Fraudulent Transfer Rule

In Bernstein v Bernstein, 795 NYS2d 733 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division held that where jointly-held property is transferred for the purpose of defrauding creditors, the transferor may not then share in the value of the transferred asset for purposes of equitable distribution. Nevertheless, where the plaintiff expressly acknowledged that she knowingly encouraged and benefitted from the transfer, the asset properly was subject to equitable distribution to the defendant .

Parent's Share of Add-on's Not Limited to $80,000.00 Cap

In Matter of D'avano v Papa, 796 NYS2d 106 (2d Dept. 2005) after a hearing Family Court directed the father to pay basic child support in the sum of $2,008 per month and 79% of child care expenses and unreimbursed medical, dental, and optical expenses. The Appellate Division modified to substitute a provision directing the father to pay 92% of child care expenses and unreimbursed medical, dental, and optical expenses. It held that the Family Court's determination of basic child support was proper. Since the combined parental income exceeded $80,000, the court, in its discretion, could apply the applicable percentage, in this case 17% for one child, or the factors set forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(f) or both to the parental income in excess of $80,000. The Support Magistrate, applying the factors set forth in Family Court Act 413(1)(f), properly considered $150,000 of the father's gross income in determining basic child support. However, the Support Magistrate improperly determined that the father was only responsible for 79% of child care expenses and unreimbursed medical, dental, and optical expenses. A parent's share of such expenses is computed by prorating the parent's income to the combined parental income (see Family Ct Act 413[1][c][4], [5]). The $80,000 cap has no application to this calculation.

Pendente Lite Counsel Fees Awarded For Non-Matrimonial Proceedings

In Soifer v Soifer, 794 N.Y.S.2d 20 (1st Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division affirmed an Order of the Supreme Court which awarded defendant wife interim attorneys' fees in the total amount of $178,646.99, consisting of payment to defendant's attorneys of $59,156.49 for outstanding legal fees charged through July 21, 2004, reimbursement to defendant for $44,490.50 she paid to her attorneys, and $75,000 as an advance on anticipated future services. It modified a subsequent order which upon renewal, awarded defendant additional interim attorneys' fees of $63,522.98 for that period, to reduce the award to $18,520, and otherwise affirmed. It held that the first order "appropriately redresses the parties' economic disparity, and is adequately supported by evidence of the nature and extent of the legal services rendered and anticipated and defendant's attorneys' time records and hourly rate. The attorneys' bills were properly redacted so as to safeguard defendant's attorney-client privilege. However, the legal work performed between August 8 and September 25, 2004 mostly related to the then separate Family Court article 10 proceeding brought against defendant. Since fee awards for services rendered in an article 10 proceeding are not authorized by Domestic Relations Law 237 it modified the first order so as to include only the services rendered before August 8, 2004. The Appellate Division held that fees for services related to the article 10 proceeding rendered after the October 18, 2004 court-ordered transfer of that proceeding to Supreme Court for joint trial with the divorce action were reimbursable. It also held that the award for future services in the first order was an appropriate advance on those and other anticipated fees.

June 16, 2005

Income For Child Support Calculation Does Not include Maintenance Award

In Lee v Lee, 795 NYS2d 283 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in considering the maintenance to be received by the wife as her income for purposes of performing the CSSA calculations and that it should have provided for a method for reducing the defendant's overall child support obligation as each child reaches the age of 21 or is otherwise emancipated. The parties had four minor children as of the time the action was commenced, and it held that the defendant's overall child support obligation should be diminished as each child reaches the age of majority. In the particular circumstances of this case, it found that as the number of children that the defendant is obligated to support diminishes from four to one, upon the date that each child, in succession, becomes (or already has been) emancipated, the amount of child support owing should be based on the figure of $200,000, against which the diminishing statutory percentages pertaining to the number of children that the husband is obligated to support, i.e., 29%, 25%, and 17%, should be applied. In dicta the court stated that it is not the defendant's overall child support obligation, which in this case encompassed his duty to support four children, that might properly be reduced on account of his payment of "college expenses" on behalf of one or more of those children; rather, the "college expenses" paid on behalf of one particular child, or on behalf of some particular children, could properly serve as a credit only with respect to so much of the defendant's overall child support obligation as relates to such particular child or children. In respect to any credit against child support that might be granted in connection with the defendant's payment of "college expenses," any such credit should be calculated based solely on those expenses that are associated with the cost of room and board, or on other similar expenses of the kind that "child support" is normally intended to defray. Such a credit should not be calculated based on the cost of college tuition, which is beyond the realm of what is normally considered "child support." Those cases in which, in one context or another, the courts have approved of the reduction of a parent's child support obligation based on that parent's payment of tuition expenses did not, in its view, reflect the general rule.

Cannot Enforce Counsel Fee By Conditional Preclusion Order

In Singer v Singer 16 A.D.3d 666, 792 N.Y.S.2d 541(2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the wife's motion for an award of an interim counsel fee in the sum of $100,000, but reversed that part as directed that if such payment was not made within 20 days of the date of the order, he would be precluded from proffering any testimony or evidence as to claims of separate property or equitable distribution at trial. The court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the wife an interim counsel fee in the sum of $100,000 based upon, inter alia, the financial disparity between the parties, the husband's obstreperous conduct which unnecessarily protracted the litigation, and the quality of the representation afforded the wife by her counsel. However, a conditional order of preclusion is not an available mechanism to enforce an order directing payment of an interim counsel fee award.

Attorney Has Right to Represent Self in Divorce Action

In Nimkoff v Nimkoff, 2005 WL 1216034 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the IAS court erred in barring the defendant from representing himself (citing Walker & Bailey v We Try Harder, Inc., 123 AD2d 256), which held that an attorney has a statutory and constitutional right to represent himself and the advocate-witness rule does not apply when an attorney represents himself or his partnership). Although the right to represent oneself is not absolute, any restriction must be carefully scrutinized. Even where a self-represented attorney-litigant is held in contempt due to misconduct during court appearances, a deprivation of the right to self-representation must be extremely well supported. The court's out-of-hand denial of defendants' application for overnight visitation, which he made when the child was two years old, constituted an improvident exercise of discretion. There was no indication that defendants' relationship with the child was such that overnight visitation would not be in the child's best interest. The court's observations of defendants' demeanor and conduct in court should not be the focus when considering the visitation arrangement. The focus must be solely on the child's best interest, which is normally best protected by allowing the development of the fullest possible healthy relationship with both parents.

Modification of Custody Order Requires a Two-Step Analysis

In Matter of Griffen v Griffen, 2005 WL 1119595 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Appellate Division, Third Department, held that where a party seeks to modify a prior order of custody, he or she must demonstrate a sufficient change in circumstances to warrant alteration of the existing custody arrangement in order to ensure the continued best interests of the children. Only when such a change in circumstances has been demonstrated may Family Court properly proceed to undertake a best interest analysis.

Pendente Lite Maintenance and Counsel Fee Award Affirmed

In Susskind v Susskind, 795 BYS2d 315 (2d Dept. 2005) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed the husband to pay pendente lite support of $4,000 per month for the wife and the parties' two children, interim counsel fees in the sum of $35,000, all carrying charges on the marital residence, all educational and extracurricular expenses of the parties' two minor children, all unreimbursed in-network medical expenses of the plaintiff and the two minor children, all costs associated with the plaintiff wife's motor vehicle, and conditionally precluded him from introducing evidence as to his finances at trial based upon his failure to comply with court-ordered discovery, unless he fully responded to the plaintiff wife's discovery demands within 30 days of the date of the court's order. It held that: "Pendente lite awards should reflect an accommodation between the reasonable needs of the moving spouse and the financial ability of the other spouse with due regard for the parties' pre-separation standard of living" (). "An appellate court will rarely modify such an award, unless exigent circumstances exist, such as where a party is unable to meet his or her own financial obligations or justice otherwise requires" (). Here, the husband failed to demonstrate the existence of such circumstances. Therefore, modification of the award is unwarranted. "Rather, perceived inequities in pendente lite orders are best addressed via a speedy trial at which the parties' economic circumstances may be thoroughly explored" (). The Court also held that given the financial circumstances of the parties the Supreme Court properly exercised its discretion in directing the husband to pay one-half of the wife's counsel fees. The wife was not required to exhaust her own capital in order to qualify for an interim counsel fee award. However, since the wife failed to demonstrate that she lacked sufficient funds of her own to compensate counsel at this state of the litigation, the Supreme Court properly awarded her only half of the attorney's fees sought.

Agreement Waiving Child Support Upheld

In Daratany v Daratany, 2005 WL 1109435 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties' 1986 judgment incorporated but did not merge the terms of a 1986 oral stipulation of settlement. Both the stipulation and the judgment provided, inter alia, that the defendant pay the plaintiff maintenance and child support for the parties' three children, and provided for the immediate listing and sale of the former marital residence, for equal division of the net sale proceeds between the parties and that, pending sale thereof, the plaintiff would have sole occupancy of the former marital residence. They signed a modification agreement in 1994 which provided, in substance, that in exchange for the defendant's conveyance of his remaining interest in the former marital residence, his obligation for child support "past and future" was terminated. The defendant delivered a deed in July 1994 conveying his interest in the former marital residence to the plaintiff and her present husband. In 2003 the plaintiff asserted that she was owed child support arrears. In response, the defendant brought this motion. As to the defendant's support obligation which allegedly accrued before June 1994, the Judicial Hearing Officer determined that the conveyance pursuant to the modification agreement satisfied such obligation in toto. The Appellate Division held that here, as in Matter of O'Connor v. Curcio (281 A.D.2d 100, 103), the parties identified the consideration, to wit, the defendant's interest in the former marital residence, paid by the defendant to the plaintiff for the plaintiff's relinquishment of future child support. The 1994 modification agreement was not executory but fully performed and the parties are bound by its terms. Accordingly, the defendant's child support obligation should have been vacated as to the period after June 1994.

June 1, 2005

College Credit Limited By Second Department (in dicta)

In Lee v Lee 2005 WL 1107377 (NYAD 2 Dept) the Second Department held that the trial court should provide in the judgment a method of reducing the overall child support obligation as each child is 21 or emancipated, based on the diminishing statutory percentages. In dicta it stated that college expenses paid on behalf of a child could properly serve as a credit only with respect to so much of the overall child support obligation as relates to the particular child. The credit should be based solely on those expenses associated with the cost of room and board, or other similar expenses that child support is intended to defray. Such a credit should not be based on the cost of college tuition. Cases which reflect the reduction of a parents child support obligation based upon the parents payment of tuition expenses do not reflect the general rule. Life insurance was awarded for wife's benefit because she will be depending on husband for substantial maintenance and child support and would be severely prejudiced in the event of his death.

Oral Modification of Divorce Judgment

In Kayser v Kayser, 2005 WL 1022959 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the defendant moved for a money judgment for child support arrears by reason of defendant's failure to pay those items, as required by the parties' judgment of divorce. In opposition, the plaintiff contended that there here was an oral modification of the judgment of divorce pursuant to which the defendant waived those items in exchange for the plaintiff's waiver of his equitable distribution award. The Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court properly denied the defendant's motion because the plaintiff showed consideration to support the alleged oral modification and that the conduct of the parties was unequivocally referable to the oral modification.

Child Support Waiver Void Ab Initio

In Smith v Smith, 2005 WL 1007635 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) pursuant to a prior consent order entered in a paternity proceeding petitioner father was "responsible for providing for the needs of the child[] and [would] not seek support from [respondent] mother, for child support or child care expenses...." Petitioner, who had joint custody and physical residence of the child, subsequently commenced a proceeding seeking child support under article 4 of the Family Court Act. Following a hearing, the Hearing Examiner issued an order that required respondent to pay child support and contribute to child care costs. The Appellate Division held that petitioner was not required to establish a basis to set aside or modify the prior order. The prior order did not comply with Family Court Act 413(1)(h) because it failed to set forth the presumptive child support amount or the court's reasons for deviating from that amount. The provisions of section 413(1)(h) may not be waived by either parent, and the failure of petitioner to contend that the prior order failed to comply with that section is of no moment. Because the prior order failed to comply with section 413(1)(h), it was void ab initio, and the court was required to disregard it and to address the child support issue de novo.

Unacknowledged Agreement Enforceable In Other Actions

In Matter of Sbarra, 2005 WL 975858 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) decedent created a tax deferred pension plan trust naming respondent, his wife, as sole beneficiary. He later purchased life insurance and established individual retirement accounts also naming her as beneficiary. In 1998 decedent and respondent stopped living together and executed a separation agreement. This agreement provided that respondent would receive certain marital assets valued at $650,000, retain approximately $300,000 worth of assets that had been held in her name alone and waive any right that she had "to share as beneficiary of any life insurance proceeds, death benefits, retirement benefits, or to share in any other death benefits payable under any contract or otherwise." In their subsequent divorce action, respondent asserted that the separation agreement had been properly executed and was fair and reasonable. When the judgment of divorce was issued on May 10, 1999, the separation agreement survived and a Qualified Domestic Relations Order was later entered directing the transfer of certain pension plan assets to respondent pursuant to the agreement. After decedent's death and the admission of his will to probate, a dispute arose between petitioner and respondent over the remaining pension plan assets and the other assets of which respondent was the named beneficiary. Supreme Court held that respondent had waived her rights to the remaining assets and awarded them to petitioner. The Appellate Division rejected Respondent's assertion on appeal that, although she signed the separation agreement, she did not acknowledge her signature to the notary public who signed it later, making it unenforceable as a waiver of her rights to decedent's pension plan and other assets. It held that while a separation agreement must be properly acknowledged in order to be enforceable in a matrimonial action since respondent did not deny that she signed the separation agreement and it survived the judgment of divorce, the agreement was enforceable in other types of actions despite the alleged insufficiency of the acknowledgment. Moreover, Since respondent affirmatively alleged in the divorce action that the separation agreement was valid, she was judicially estopped from challenging its validity. Having received the benefit of the Separation agreement's provisions for division of marital property in the earlier divorce action, respondent could not now assume a contrary position here simply because her pecuniary interests had changed.

Court Imputing Income Must State Source and Actual Dollar Amount

In Matter of Kristy Helen T. v. Richard F.G., 2005 WL 957960 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Support Magistrate imputed income to the father in calculating his basic child support obligation pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act. The Appellate Division noted that a Support Magistrate is permitted to impute income in calculating a support obligation where it finds that a party's account of his or her finances is not credible. However, in exercising the discretion to impute income to a party, a Support Magistrate is required to provide a clear record of the source from which the income is imputed and the reasons for such imputation. As the Support Magistrate failed to specify the sources of income imputed and the actual dollar amount assigned to each category, the record was not sufficiently developed to permit appellate review. The matter was remitted to the Support Magistrate to specify the sources of income imputed and the actual dollar amount assigned to each category, and the appeal was held in abeyance pending receipt of the report.

Personality Disorder is Not Extreme Hardship

In Malaga v Malaga, 2005 WL 958023 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties divorce judgment incorporated, but did not merge their stipulation of settlement which provided that the defendant would pay maintenance to the plaintiff in the sum of $800 per month for a period of eight months. In 1999 the plaintiff filed a motion in the original matrimonial action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(9)(b) to modify the judgment dated August 21, 1990, so as to award her maintenance. After a psychiatric evaluation and a hearing, the Supreme Court found that she established "extreme hardship" in that, inter alia, her personality disorder precluded her from being self-supporting. The Supreme Court awarded lifetime maintenance in the sum of $2,000 per month. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that were a separation agreement or stipulation of settlement has been incorporated, but not merged, into a judgment of divorce, a court is authorized to modify maintenance obligations even after the term for durational maintenance in the stipulation has expired. However, it may only grant such a modification, either upward or downward, upon the showing of "extreme hardship" (Domestic Relations Law 236[B][9][b]). The record did not support the conclusion of the Supreme Court that the plaintiff established "extreme hardship". She testified to monthly expenses totaling approximately $750, including a purported $250 per month for groceries, and costs associated with a new car she purchased with the $14,000 net proceeds of a lawsuit that she settled. Her monthly income, including a $989 pension from a former employer, with or without her social security payment of $604 and social security disability payment of $48, among other subsidies, more than sufficiently covers her outlays. Thus, she failed to prove "extreme hardship" and failed to justify the resumption of the defendant's obligation to pay her maintenance in any amount.

May 16, 2005

Equitable Distribution

In Hathaway v Hathaway, 791 N.Y.S.2d 631 (2d Dept, 2005) the Supreme Court, inter alia, dissolved the marriage, equitably distributed 70% of the marital assets to the plaintiff and 30% of the marital assets to him, awarded him maintenance in the sum of $1,000 per month until July 15, 2003, and directed that the plaintiff's "outstanding legal fees ... and those fees paid previously from her separate property ... be paid to plaintiff's counsel and reimbursed to plaintiff, respectively, from the marital assets prior to the distribution to the parties." The Appellate Division modified the judgment on the law, by deleting the provision regarding the plaintiff's legal fees. It held that the distributive award of 70% of the marital assets to the plaintiff was a provident exercise of discretion. While the parties were married for a considerable period, approximately 33 years, and although the defendant devoted significant time to the parties' two daughters' educational and athletic activities during most of that time, the defendant refused to work, against the plaintiff's wishes, despite being skilled in the computer field and otherwise gainfully employable. The plaintiff was the sole wage earner, and the plaintiff also performed substantially all of the usual and customary housekeeping duties and was evenly involved with the upbringing of the children, while the defendant's contribution to the marriage was minimal. The defendant contended that the Supreme Court improperly awarded him rehabilitative maintenance in the sum of only $1,000 per month until July 2003, as opposed to life-time maintenance for a much larger amount, due to, inter alia, his age, alleged poor health, claimed incapability of becoming self-supporting, and the plaintiff's superior financial position. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in granting the defendant limited maintenance, since there was little to no evidence regarding the parties' pre-separation standard of living or any evidence regarding the defendant's needs, the defendant, who had a college education and worked during the early years of the marriage, had the skills for gainful employment in the computer field in which he worked following the parties' physical separation, and despite having been awarded only 30% of the marital property, the actual amount of his distributive award was relatively high. The Supreme Court erred in directing that the plaintiff's "outstanding legal fees ... and those fees paid previously from her separate property ... be paid to plaintiff's counsel and reimbursed to plaintiff, respectively, from the marital assets prior to the distribution to the parties." This provision effectively made the defendant, the non-monied spouse, pay a substantial portion of the counsel fees of the monied spouse, the plaintiff who was worth over $1 million, in violation of Domestic Relations Law § 237 and, therefore, was improper.

Necessary Joinder of Parties May Not be Necessary

In Ramnarine v Ramnarine, 792 N.Y.S.2d 40 (1st Dept,2005) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which dissolved the marriage and set aside a conveyance of the marital home to plaintiff husband's brother. It rejected the plaintiff's argument that the court could not divest his brother of title to the house unless and until the latter was formally joined as a party to this action. The brother, who was represented by plaintiff's attorney in connection with his own further conveyance of the house, had notice that his title was to be challenged at a hearing, appeared at the hearing without objection, offered testimony and documentary evidence, and otherwise had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the validity of his title. Even though he had the opportunity to do so, he never sought to intervene. Such participation and indeed control of the hearing by the brother seriously undercut the jurisdictional objection he made, "through plaintiff" that he was a necessary party who must be formally joined.

No Waiver of Pension Rights Where Agreement Clear and Unambiguous

In Valentin v New York City Police Pension Fund, 792 N.Y.S.2d 22 (1st Dept,2005) the Appellate Division affirmed a Judgment which granted the petition to set aside respondent Pension Fund's determination and remanded the matter for disbursement of death benefits to the decedent's estate instead of to Selena Valentin. It held that the interpretation of an unambiguous marital agreement was a question of law for the court and did not require deference to any particular expertise of the administrative agency. In the agreement, involving a childless couple who had separated after less than a year of marriage, and which was executed just 18 days before decedent's death, Selena Valentin waived any rights, title or interest in his pension or retirement benefits, and any other interest in his estate, specifically, a right to take under any "testamentary writing ... now or hereafter in force and effect." The court held that this evinced a clear intent of the parties to separate their lives and finances, and was to be the sole expression of the division of their property and interests. Taken as a whole, this unambiguous contract was sufficiently specific to demonstrate, as a matter of law, that respondent-appellant waived any right to the death benefits she was awarded by the Pension Fund. The fact that the decedent did not remove his estranged wife as a named beneficiary on his pension during the last 18 days of his life was of no moment, nor was the fact that the agreement did not expressly include a waiver of pre-retirement death benefits.

Watch out for an unintended Waiver of Rights

In Luce-Metcalf v Digati, 792 N.Y.S.2d 267 (4th Dept.2005) the parties 1989 separation agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce, provided that the defendant retained the right to occupy the marital residence, owned by the parties during the marriage as tenants by the entirety, until his death or removal from the premises, at which juncture the premises were to be sold and one half of the net proceeds distributed to plaintiff. In 1998, the parties jointly conveyed the premises to their son for a nominal consideration, reserving a life estate to defendant. One year later, the son conveyed his remainder interest in the premises to defendant alone. Plaintiff moved in Supreme Court, which had granted the divorce, for an order compelling defendant to convey the premises to plaintiff and defendant, as a means of enforcing what plaintiff considered to be her continuing right under the separation agreement to share in the proceeds of any future resale of the premises. The court adjudged that plaintiff's right to collect one half of the net proceeds of any future sale of the subject property, as set forth in the separation agreement, remained in full force and effect, and ordered that, upon a future sale of the premises, defendant shall share the proceeds with plaintiff pursuant to the terms of the separation agreement. The Appellate Division held that the court erred in determining that plaintiff retained any interest in the premises or any right under the separation agreement to share in the proceeds of any eventual resale. "In joining in the conveyance of the premises to her son, plaintiff alienated all of her right, title, and interest in the premises (see Real Property Law § 245). Concomitantly, plaintiff relinquished any expectancy in the proceeds of any future sale, thereby modifying the separation agreement to a corresponding extent, waiving her rights thereunder, and releasing defendant from his obligations thereunder."

Large Counsel Fee to Wife Where Husband Had Resources to Litigate

In Weinstein v Weinstein, 2005 WL 1088251 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted plaintiff's motion for an award of $300,000 in counsel fees. It held that the court properly exercised its discretion in awarding counsel fees, given the parties' respective financial circumstances and all the other circumstances of the case, stating that: "Defendant has always been far more able than plaintiff to pay legal fees in connection with this proceeding. His substantial resources have been a significant factor in achieving the desired outcome with regard to custody of the children. This has resulted in an escalation of legal fees for plaintiff."

Recent Legislation

CPLR 2103-a, Confidentiality of addresses in civil proceedings, provides that in any civil proceeding the court may authorize any party to keep his or her residential and business addresses and telephone numbers confidential from any other party where disclosure of the addresses or telephone numbers would pose an unreasonable risk to the health or safety of that party. Added by Laws of 2004, Ch. 111, § 1, effective July 15, 2004.

May 2, 2005

Court of Appeals Rules on Renunciation of Life Insurance in Agreement

In Kamens v Utica Mut. Ins. Co., 2005 WL 729152, --- N.E.2d --- (2005) the issue before the Court of Appeals was the effect of a provision in the parties stipulation of settlement, as part of their divorce settlement, which provided that "[Susan] will execute any and all forms or instruments necessary to remove herself as primary contingent beneficiary on annuity owned by Utica Mutual Life Insurance Company implementing a structured settlement that the parties received as a result of injuries suffered by [Charles]." Plaintiffs argued that Susan was agreeing to a "renunciation" of her interest in the Utica Mutual agreement, and point out that under Estates, Powers and Trust Law 2-1.11(d) the effect of a renunciation is "as though the renouncing person had died at the time of filing" the renunciation. While Susan did not file a formal renunciation, plaintiffs' argument was that she in substance agreed to do so. If Susan renounced her interest prior to Charles's death, she must be deemed to have predeceased Charles, and by the terms of the Utica Mutual agreement the payments after Charles's death should go to plaintiffs, their children. Defendants argued that the purpose of Susan's agreement "to remove herself as primary contingent beneficiary" was to convey her rights under the Utica Mutual agreement to Charles. Defendants argued that a conveyance is what Susan in substance agreed to. If Susan's rights were conveyed to Charles, Charles was entitled to name anyone else he liked, to receive the payments that Susan would have been entitled to under the agreement.

The Court stated that the real issue is whether they meant that Susan step aside in favor of her daughters, or in favor of Charles. The Court found that the parties intended Charles, not plaintiffs, to benefit from Susan's agreement to "remove herself." It noted that a primary purpose in any divorce settlement is to divide assets between the husband and the wife, and where, as here, the wife agrees not to claim a particular asset, the natural reading of the agreement is that the asset becomes the husband's. It is true, of course, that parties may and often do agree to give assets to their children, but where that occurs one would normally expect the children to be mentioned. Susan's agreement to "remove herself" made no mention of plaintiffs, suggesting that there was no intention to benefit them. Other language in the divorce settlement supported this inference. The sentence immediately following the one in dispute expressly gave a benefit to "the children." That sentence provided: "In addition, [Susan] will execute any and all forms or instruments necessary to change her as primary beneficiary under the husband's life insurance policy and [Charles] will agree that he will appoint the children irrevocable beneficiaries of such policy." When the parties sought to confer rights on plaintiffs, they left no doubt of their intention. Finally, a colloquy that occurred in open court during the divorce settlement confirmed that the clause in dispute was meant to benefit. The Court held that the Appellate Division correctly concluded that the effect of the disputed provision in the 1985 divorce settlement was to give Charles the right to name anyone he chose as the primary contingent beneficiary of the Utica Mutual agreement.

Appeal without transcript Dismissed

In Rudick v Rudick, ___AD3d___, 2005 WL 600678 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother appealed from an order which, after a hearing, granted the father's application for a downward modification of his maintenance obligation. The Appellate Division dismissed her appeal holding that her failure to include transcripts of the support hearing required dismissal of her appeal. It stated that it is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal. The failure to provide necessary transcripts inhibits the court's ability to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal. The papers provided were patently insufficient for the purpose of reviewing the issues she raised.

Must Register to Enforce Foreign Support Order

In Matter of Linksman v Linksman, ___AD3d___, 2005 WL 646367 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) pursuant to the parties 1997 Virginia divorce decree and their previously entered into settlement agreement, the father's child support obligation was $400 per month. In 2001 the Family Court modified the father's obligation by reducing it to $0. In 2003 the mother commenced a proceeding in the Family Court to enforce the Virginia decree and for arrears. A Support Magistrate awarded the mother arrears in the sum of $15,835. The Appellate Division denied the petition and dismissed the proceeding holding that because the mother failed to demonstrate that the Virginia decree was registered in New York, New York lacked subject matter jurisdiction to enforce the decree (citing 28 USC § 1738B[I]; Family Ct Act §§ 580-603, 580-611[a]).

Counsel Fees Pendente Lite

In Stella v Stella, 791 N.Y.S.2d 20, (1st Dept.2005) the Appellate Division affirmed a Judgment which awarded plaintiff pendente lite counsel and expert fees, plus interest, in the total amount of $227,726.33. It held that inasmuch as the record disclosed that defendant husband had significantly greater financial resources at his disposal than plaintiff wife, and that defendant's actions had caused protracted litigation, the court properly exercised its discretion in making the interim awards.

Modification of Maintenance

In Glass v Glass, 791 N.Y.S.2d 15 (1st Dept.2005) the Appellate Division held that where a judgment of divorce incorporates by reference, but does not merge with, a stipulation of settlement between the parties the parties to such agreement may contractually provide for a support modification on a lesser standard than legally required.

Equitable Distribution Decisions

Schiffer v Schiffer, 2005 WL 71204 (NYAD 2 Dept)

Child Support: $8031.75 per month. Maintenance: $2500.00 per month for 8 years. Counsel Fee: $145,000. While Supreme Court properly deducted the amount of defendant's parental income used in calculating child support it failed to account for the increase in his income and the concomitant increase in the child support payments upon the termination of maintenance.

Sina v Sina , 2005 WL 774515 (NYAD 1 Dept)

Years Married: 8. Payments for basic living expenses, the court appointed accountant and divorce lawyers did not constitute dissipation, nor did the decline in the stock market, which was out of defendant's control.

Sysgrove v Sysgrove, 15 AD3d 292, 791 NYS2d 93 (1st Dept.,2005)

Years married: 19. 50% of equity in marital residence awarded to husband, valued in amount of bona fide offer of $950,000. in July 1998 (a year after action commenced) made prior to time wife transferred the property to her mother to eliminate her mortgage and tax obligations. Husbands' expert's testimony, valuing it at $2.1 million in July 2001 prior to trial was properly rejected.

April 15, 2005

Equitable Distribution

In Hale v Hale, __AD3d__, 2005 WL 612968 (NYAD 1 Dept) where the parties were married 6 years, the appellate Division affirmed a maintenance award to the wife for four years. The Appellate Division held that as to the husband's appeal from those portions of the original divorce judgment relating to the distributive award, equitable distribution and a distributive award are two different elements of relief and arguably, maintenance would not fall into either category. Where the only "distributive award" was the parties' Cadillac, precluding the husband's appeal from aspects involving equitable distribution for his choice of semantics would elevate form over substance. As for his arguments regarding maintenance, since he ultimately appealed from "each and every portion" of the amended judgment, he should not be denied the right to challenge the awards of maintenance and equitable distribution on appeal.

The husband argued there was no evidence on which the court could have concluded his condominium's appreciation in value was due in any way to the direct or indirect efforts of either party, and that the court should delete the award of $89,141 for his wife's share. Since the record contained evidence that the wife played some role in the upkeep and maintenance of the condo, it was not an abuse of discretion for the court to grant her a share in its appreciated value. The court rejected the husband's assertion that the trial court erred in accepting the wife's appraiser's $925,000 valuation based on comparable sales for properties much newer or larger than the condo. The Appellate Division held that substantial deference should be accorded to the court's rejection of the testimony of the husband's appraiser, whose associate left a note stating "150 K over, should be around 800 to 900"

Even though the wife did not produce witnesses to refute her husband's testimony that his employer loaned him substantial sums of money over the years, the Appellate Division held that the burden remained on him to prove that the travelers' checks and other sums from the employer were loans and not part of his salary. The trial court gave several reasons why it found that the husband failed to sustain his burden, including his acknowledgment that the writing constituted mere "housekeeping" he created subsequent to the purported loans, offering no explanation for the "moratorium."

The trial court's maintenance award resulted from a provident exercise of discretion. In light of the wife's age and limited earning capacity, it would be unreasonable to expect that she could support herself in a lifestyle approximating that which she enjoyed during the marriage. During the marriage, the husband gave his wife an allowance of $2,500 per month, paid for all expenses, and they took frequent vacations. Although he indicated his intention to retire when he is 65, this award was not for her lifetime, but only for four years, and his income and earning capacity demonstrated that he can manage the payments. While the parties were married only six years, they did live together for an additional eight years. In any event, a short marriage alone would not compel an award of lower maintenance in view of the marked disparity between the parties' income and earning capacity.

The Appellate Division held that the husband should not have been given 100% of the credit for the mortgage payments he made on the New York co-op, including principal and interest. When he began deducting the co-op's carrying charges from his wife's maintenance installments in May 2003, the payments he made to the third parties for the mortgage and other charges should have been viewed as in lieu of spousal support. Thus, while the court was correct in determining that he could not offset payments made in lieu of direct spousal support, it should have awarded him property credit for only that portion representing the principal, not interest. Since the court awarded each party a 50% interest in the co-op, it should have awarded him only 50% of the credit toward the principal of the mortgage.

The Appellate Division also held that the trial court should have used the value of the parties' boat at the commencement of the action, which the husband estimated at $450,000. Since he had exclusive possession, he should be solely responsible for any drop in value, in light of his witness's testimony that increased engine usage would hasten depreciation. The Appellate Division rejected the wife's attempt to deprive her husband of his equal share of her frequent flyer miles, which, by implication, it held was marital property.

Child Support in High Income Cases

In Matter of Brim v Combs, 2005 WL 758112 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), a child support proceeding to vacate a child support agreement and modify the father's child support obligation, the father a well known singer, appealed from an order of the Family Court which granted the petition and awarded the mother child support in the sum of $35,000 per month, child support arrears in the sum of $398,451.12, and an attorney's fee in the sum of $60,000. The Appellate Division modified the order by directing the father to pay child support in the sum of $21,782.08 per month and remitted for further proceedings. It found that in calculating the award of child support to the mother under Family Court Act 413, the Support Magistrate erred in basing the award in part on the amount of child support the father paid for his other child by a different woman, particularly where no evidence was presented as to that child's expenses, resources, and needs. It held that " To this end, in high income cases, the appropriate determination under Family Court Act

413(f) for an award of child support on parental income in excess of $80,000 should be based on the child's actual needs and the amount that is required for the child to live an appropriate lifestyle, rather than the wealth of one or both parties (citing Anonymous v Anonymous, 286 AD2d 585). It found that the mother's net worth statement and her extensive testimony at the hearing established that her expenses related to the child were $21,782.08 per month, exclusive of the child's educational, health, medical, dental, extracurricular activity, transportation, security, and summer camp expenses, which in any case were paid by the father. This amount was deemed admitted as fact by the father due to his failure to comply with the compulsory financial disclosure requirements of Family Court Act 424-a. It held that The Family Court erred in awarding $35,000 in monthly child support to the mother. Instead, the mother should have been awarded monthly child support in the sum of $21,782.08 to satisfy the child's actual needs and to afford him an appropriate lifestyle (see Family Court Act 413). The arrears in child support had to be recalculated in light of the change.

Law Guardian's Role

In Usack v Usack, 2004 WL 3258905 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), 2005 N.Y. Slip Op. 02712 the Appellate Division specifically emphasized (citing Weiglhofer v. Weiglhofer, 1 AD3d 786, 788 n 1 [2003]) that it is not proper for a Law Guardian to make a "report" to a court. There the Law Guardian submitted, at Supreme Court's direction, a report containing her own unsworn observations regarding the parties, recounting personal interactions or opinions about them, all of which, it noted, could have been explored and elicited by calling witnesses and upon cross-examination of the parties and other witnesses. We note that in Weiglhofer, supra, where the Supreme Court ordered and relied on a "report" from the Law Guardian, the same court emphasized that a law guardian is the attorney for the children and not an investigative arm of the court. "While law guardians, as advocates, may make their positions known to the court orally or in writing (by way of, among other methods, briefs or summations), presenting reports containing facts which are not part of the record or making submissions directly to the court ex parte are inappropriate practices. Consequently, courts should not direct law guardians to make such reports."

April 1, 2005

2005 Equitable Distribution Decisions

Bennett v Bennet , 2005 WL 3019118 (NYAD 4 Dept)

Years Married: 32. Maintenance Award: $1300 a week until age 69. [Continuing Maintenance Award until wife reached 75 would be onerous for plaintiff who was planning to retire earlier. W Proper to decline to consider tax consequences of a distributive award from pension and distribution from dissolution of law firm where neither party presented evidence to support a determination. Wife properly awarded interest on distributive award.]

D'Angelo v D'Angelo, __AD3d__, 788 NYS2d 154 (2d Dept.,2005)

[Valuation date for marital assets must be between the date of commencement and the date of trial. Where the appraisal of the marital residence was conducted 3 years before the trial and the appraiser testified that property values had changed the court should have ordered a new appraisal. Failure to respond to a notice to admit that a debt is marital is a concession that it is.]

D'Elia v D'Elia, __AD3d__, 788NYS2d 156 (2d Dept.,2005)

[Can not cure defective acknowledgment of antenuptial agreement by submitting duly executed certificate of acknowledgment at trial. However, deed from husband to wife of undivided half interest in property changed its character from separate to marital.]

Falgoust v Falgoust, __AD3d__, 790 NYSd 532 WL 469305 (2d Dept.,2005)

Years Married: 8. Maintenance Award: $500 per week for two years. [Federal and State taxes are not deducted from a parents income for purposes of calculating child support. Maintenance Award for two years proper where wife received a considerable distributive award and was capable of being self-supporting. Wife entitled to 1/3 of appreciation of value of husbands separate residence where he maintained and improved the property with his earnings during he marriage and she took care of the children and did household chores.]

Hale v Hale, 2005 WL 612968 (NYAD 1 Dept)

Years Married: 6. Maintenance Award: to wife for four years. [Although distributive award and equitable distribution are different elements of relief and Maintenance Award differs from both, husband permitted to appeal even though his notice of appeal was limited. Since wife paid some role in upkeep and Maintenance Award of condo,(which appears to be husbands separate property) it was not an abuse of discretion to award her a share of its appreciated value. Even though wife did not produce witnesses to refute husbands testimony that his employer loaned him substantial sums of money the burden remained on him to prove that travelers checks and other sums were loans and not salary, and he failed to sustain burden. Husband entitled to share of wife's frequent flyer miles. Husband should not have been given credit for all mortgage, principal and interest payments on co-op but since wife awarded 50% of the co-op , credit should be for only 50% of principal payments. Boat should be valued at date of commencement which husband estimated at $450,000. He should be responsible for any drop in value in light of his witness testimony that increased engine use would hasten depreciation.]

Hendricks v Hendricks, __AD3d __, 788 NYS2d 190 (3d Dept.,2004)

Years Married: 35. Husbands Age: 59., Husbands Income: $73,500. Wife's Age: 58. Wife's income: $450/mo Soc Sec. Maintenance Award: $1275 per month until husband retires. Counsel Fee: denied. [remitted to determine issues of health insurance and life insurance]

Puglisi v Puglisi, 2005 WL 599981 (NYAD 2 Dept)

Maintenance Award: Denied. [Proper to distribute wife's pension entirely to her considering that the parties led separate economic lives during their marriage.]

Redder v Redder, __AD2d__, 2005 WL 549412 (NYAD 3 Dept)

Husbands Income: $80000. Wife's Income: $27,000 imputed. Child Support Award: $250 per week. Maintenance Award: $1500 per month for 24 months. Counsel Fee: denied. [Supreme Court did not have the authority to direct the parties to pay the fees of the Law Guardian. They are limited to compensation from the state (specifically rejecting the First Department view. Father deeded non custodial parent, where joint custody and equal time sharing, for purposes of child support award where he was greater wage earner.]

Redgrave v Redgrave, 2004 WL 3015135 (NYAD 3 Dept)

Years Married: 29. Husbands Age: 54. Husbands Income: $34,000. Wife's Age: 50. Wife's Income: $273,000. Maintenance Award: award to husband reversed on appeal. [Proper to deny wife a share of husbands $20,623 per year pension where he earned $34,494 from his other employment and wife earned $273,551. Proper to award husband 50% of wife's share in title company where he made economic and non-economic contributions. Improper to direct husband be reimbursed for all pendente lite expenditures he made for the marital residence where wife continued to share in payment of mortgage and taxes and he had exclusive occupancy.]

Snow v Snow, __AD3d__, 2004 WL 3052077 (3d Dept.,2005)

Years Married: 25. Husbands Income: $6900. Child Support Award: $425.00 per month. Property Distribution to Wife: remitted. [Supreme Court may not impose a Child Support Award obligation that will reduce a non-custodial parents income below the federal poverty level.]

Wade v Steinfeld, __AD2d__, 790 NYS2d 64 (2d Dept.,2005)

Maintenance Award: lifetime award to wife. Counsel Fee: $29,092 to wife. Property Distribution to Wife: one half of marital portion of husbands interest in benefits from NYS Teachers Retirements System. [Husband not awarded any portion of wife's law license. Wife entitled to credit for her separate property contribution to martial residence where she overcame presumption that she intended to commingle her funds by depositing them for 3 days in parties joint account]

March 18, 2005

Private Payment of Law Guardian Fees Struck Down by Third Department - Court Cites Our Article

In Redder v Redder, 2005 WL 549412 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the Law Guardian applied for a fee in excess of the statutory limit and for payment of that fee from plaintiff. Supreme Court awarded a fee of $7,125 and directed each party to pay half of that amount to the Law Guardian. Both parties appealed arguing against the award of a fee payable equally by the parties directly to the Law Guardian. The Appellate Division noted that Law Guardian fees are governed by the pertinent standards regarding compensation (citing Judiciary Law 35[3]; 22 NYCRR 835.5). With respect to compensation, while the statutes and regulations speak directly to a procedure for payment from the state (see Family Ct Act 248; 22 NYCRR 835.5), there is no specific statutory or regulatory scheme for direct payment of an appointed Law Guardian by a parent or parents (citing generally Brandes, Compensation and Law Guardians, NYLJ, July 28, 1998, at 3, col 1). The lack of parameters for a direct-pay system creates the potential for issues about the integrity of the appointment process in such situations (which often pay no attention to the statutory caps on compensation for assigned counsel), the independence of the Law Guardian, and raise concerns about fundamental fairness to all children regardless of the economic status of their parents. It noted that it had previously stated, in dicta, that "Law Guardian costs shall be payable by the [s]tate". While acknowledging that resolution of this issue is susceptible to more than one reasonable view (citing Matter of Plovnick v. Klinger, 10 AD3d 84 [2d Dept 2004]) and there are policy arguments supporting different feasible approaches, it held that until the Legislature or Court of Appeals provides otherwise, the current statutory and regulatory framework should be interpreted as limiting compensation to Law Guardians appointed pursuant to the Law Guardian Program in a contested custody proceeding to payment by the state (citing Lips v. Lips, 284 A.D.2d 716, 717 [2001]); see also Family Ct Act 248 ["The costs of law guardians ... shall be payable by the state of New York"]; Matter of Lynda A.H. v. Diane T.O., 243 A.D.2d 24, 27-28 [4th Dept 1998], lv denied 92 N.Y.2d 811 [1998] [holding that Family Court "had no authority to compel the parties to pay the Law Guardian's legal fees and expenses"]; Brandes, Compensation and Law Guardians, NYLJ, July 28, 1998, at 3, col 1). [FN2] The order directing the parties to pay the Law Guardian directly was reversed, and the Law Guardian was told he could apply for a fee as provided in 22 NYCRR 835.5.

Counsel Fee Request Without Net Worth Statement Denied as Defective

In Bertone v Bertone, 790 N.Y.S.2d 35 (2d Dept.,2005), a proceeding for modification of child support, the Second Department held that the plaintiff's failure to submit an updated net worth statement on her behalf rendered that branch of her cross motion which was for an award of an attorney's fee defective.

New 22 NYCRR Part 500

The Court of Appeals has rescinded in its entirety 22 NYCRR part 500 and approved a new Part 500, entitled The Rules of Practice of the Court of Appeals. The new 22 NYCRR part 500 will be effective September 1, 2005. Changes of note include; substitution of a Court-promulgated preliminary appeal statement for the jurisdictional statement previously required for appeals (see Rule 500.9); use of scheduling letters to set due dates for appeal papers (see Rule 500.12[a]) and elimination of the automatic 20-day extension for filing dates for appeals; reduction of the time period from 80 days to 60 days for perfecting appeals, unless an extension is granted (see Rule 500.16[a]); and set filing dates for all applications for amicus curiae relief (see Rule 500.23). The number of copies to be filed on appeals and motions for leave to appeal in civil cases also has been changed.

Constructive Abandonment Reminder - You have to nag and ask repeatedly
In Archibald v Archibald, 2005 WL 357894 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the appellate division affirmed a judgment which, after a nonjury trial, dismissed the complaint for a divorce. "It is well settled that to establish a cause of action for a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment, the spouse who claims to have been constructively abandoned must prove that the abandoning spouse unjustifiably refused to fulfill the basic obligations arising from the marriage contract and that the abandonment continued for at least one year" . The refusal must be "unjustified, willful, and continued, despite repeated requests for continued conjugal relations". Where there is no proof that one spouse repeatedly requested a resumption of sexual relations, evidence that the other spouse refused a single request to engage in sexual relations is insufficient to sustain a cause of action for a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment. The plaintiff failed to establish a cause of action for a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment as his testimony failed to support such a finding.

Admissibility of Hearsay in Custody Case Based on Abuse

In Heater v Heater, 2005 WL 425412 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner filed a petition seeking modification of a prior order that had granted respondent visitation with the three children alleging that respondent had shown the five year old child a sexually explicit videotape in which petitioner was performing oral sex on respondent. Following a hearing, Family Court found that respondent had shown a sexually explicit videotape to her and indefinitely suspended all visitation by respondent with the children. The Appellate Division rejected Respondent's argument that Family Court improperly based the termination of his visitation rights on the uncorroborated hearsay statements of the child.

It held that in determining whether there is sufficient change in circumstances, a child's out-of-court statements may be considered so long as the statements are corroborated (citing Matter of Baxter v. Perico, 288 A.D.2d 717, 717 [2001]). "[T]he standard for determining what constitutes sufficient corroboration is not overly stringent [and] Family Court has considerable discretion" in such a determination. Here the five-year-old child made consistent descriptive statements regarding the videotape to three different adults at various times. Petitioner testified that, before they separated, respondent had made such a videotape and that respondent kept possession of the videotape after they separated. Respondent's current paramour acknowledged that respondent had told her about such a videotape. While the child's repetition of her statement was not by itself sufficient corroboration, the court found adequate corroboration in the testimony of petitioner and respondent's paramour acknowledging the existence of a videotape that was last in respondent's possession and depicted petitioner and respondent as described by the child. The evidence was thus sufficient to support Family Court's finding that the child had been shown a sexually explicit videotape by respondent and this constituted a change in circumstances justifying a modification of the visitation order. We note that the basis for the decision is found in FCA 1046 (a)(vi) which provides that in any hearing under Article 10 (abuse or neglect) previous statements made by the child relating to any allegations of abuse or neglect shall be admissible in evidence, but if uncorroborated, such statements shall not be sufficient to make a fact-finding of abuse or neglect. Any other evidence tending to support the reliability of the previous statements, including, but not limited to the types of evidence defined in the statute is sufficient corroboration.

March 1, 2005

Judgment of Divorce and QDRO Awarding Interest in Husband's Pension Do Not Automatically Include Preretirement Death Benefits Available under Plan. If the Intent Is to Distribute Such Benefits, That Should Be Separately and Explicitly Stated.

In Kazel v Kazel, 3 N.Y.3d 331, 819 N.E.2d 1036, 786 N.Y.S.2d 420 (2004) the Court of Appeals held that a judgment of divorce and qualified domestic relations order (QDRO) awarding an interest in the husband's pension plan do not automatically include preretirement death benefits available under the plan. If the intent is to distribute such benefits, that should be separately, and explicitly ,stated.

The parties 1991 divorce judgment distributed the marital property by, among other things, dividing the husband's pension plan between the parties pursuant to the equitable distribution formula established in Majauskas v Majauskas (61 NY2d 481 [1984]). The matrimonial court entered a QDRO directing that plaintiff wife begin to receive a fixed percentage of her former husband's monthly allowance either at such time as he "has retired from and is actually receiving a monthly allowance from his . . . Pension Plan" or, at plaintiff's option, "after the earlier to occur of the first date for payments allowed under the plan or after [he] reaches the earliest retirement age under the Plan." The husband died in 2001 before reaching retirement age, and never received any payments under the plan. Following his death, plaintiff sought to share with decedent's widow in preretirement death benefits payable under decedent's pension plan. Because the QDRO, by its plain terms, granted plaintiff an interest only in decedent's retirement annuity, and not in his death benefits, the plan administrator denied plaintiff any share of those benefits. Plaintiff sought to modify or supplement the QDRO to award her a share of such benefits. Supreme Court denied her motion, concluding that plaintiff had failed to establish that the intent of the underlying divorce decree had been to award her survivor benefits. The Court of Appeals noted that Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29 USC 1001 et seq.) (ERISA) and the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (IRC) require all pension plans to provide survivor benefits to a participant's surviving spouse (see ERISA [29 USC] 1055 [a]; Internal Revenue Code [26 USC] 401 [a] [11]; 417). Pursuant to a divorce, however, a QDRO can provide that a former spouse be treated as a surviving spouse--to the exclusion of the actually surviving spouse if, as here, the decedent had remarried--for purposes of ERISA and the joint and survivor rules of the IRC (see ERISA [29 USC] 1056 [d] [3] [F]; Internal Revenue Code [26 USC] 401 [a] [11]; 417, 414 [p] [5] [A]). Thus, a former spouse can overcome the right of an actually surviving spouse to receive a survivor annuity only if specifically awarded such benefits by the matrimonial court. Further, such an award must be reflected in a QDRO, evidenced by clear language designating the former spouse as the surviving spouse for purposes of the survivor benefits. The QDRO must reflect the intent of the underlying judgment of divorce, and must comply with its terms.

Cause of Action for Divorce on Ground of Imprisonment Brought 16 Years after Commencement of Defendant's Confinement, Not Barred by the Five-year Statute of Limitations

In Covington v Walker, 3 N.Y.3d 287, 819 N.E.2d 1025, 786 N.Y.S.2d 409 (2004) the Court of Appeals held that plaintiff's cause of action for divorce on the ground of imprisonment pursuant to Domestic Relations Law 170 (3), brought 16 years after the commencement of defendant's confinement, was not barred by the five-year statute of limitations as set forth in Domestic Relations Law 210. The statute of limitations is measured from the date of defendant's release from prison (see Domestic Relations Law 170 [3] [providing that an action for divorce may be maintained on the ground of the defendant's confinement in prison for a period of at least three consecutive years]). The Court concluded, based on the legislative history, and public policy, that the cause of action accrues on the date defendant completes his third consecutive year of incarceration, but the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the date he is released from prison. Thus, plaintiff's divorce action was not time-barred.

On May 12, 1983, plaintiff wife and defendant husband were married. In 1985 defendant was convicted of murder and robbery and sentenced to a prison term of 25 years to life. Defendant was incarcerated since the date of his arrest. Plaintiff was convicted of the same crimes as defendant and was incarcerated. On April 10, 2000, plaintiff commenced an action for divorce on the ground that defendant has been confined for a period of three or more consecutive years after their marriage (Domestic Relations Law 170 [3]). Plaintiff moved for summary judgment of divorce and in opposition, defendant asserted defenses, including the five-year statute of limitations in Domestic Relations Law 210. Supreme Court dismissed plaintiff's action on summary judgment. The Appellate Division affirmed.

The Court of Appeals reversed. It held that a cause of action for divorce based on the ground of imprisonment continues to arise anew for statute of limitations purposes on each day the defendant spouse remains in prison for "three or more consecutive years" until the defendant is released. The purpose of the requirement that the defendant be incarcerated for three years prior to the commencement of an action for divorce is to give the convicted party an opportunity to obtain release from prison and to prevent the "natural but sometimes too rash inclination to dissolve a marriage" upon a spouse's conviction. Nothing in the legislative history suggests, however, that Domestic Relations Law 170 (3) was intended to start the statute of limitations running against the plaintiff spouse as early as possible so as to create the potential for a spouse, who may have missed the five-year window. The words "or more" in Domestic Relations Law 170 (3) suggest that divorce actions based on imprisonment are actions involving recurring injuries to the parties which implicate the continuous wrong doctrine. The rule is based on the principle that continuous injuries create separate causes of action barred only by the running of the statute of limitations against each successive trespass. The repeated offenses are treated as separate rights of action and the limitations period begins to run as to each upon its commission. Under a continuous wrong or violation rule, where a defendant spouse is incarcerated for a consecutive period exceeding three years, each day of continued confinement beyond three years inflicts new injury on the plaintiff spouse. Thus, although this ground for divorce arises originally at the conclusion of the third consecutive year of a defendant's incarceration, it continues to arise anew each day thereafter until the defendant is released from prison. An action based on this continuous wrong is barred only by the expiration of the five-year limitations period measured from the date upon which the defendant is released from prison.

Procedure for Collecting Maintenance Clarified

In Matter of Balanoff v Niosi, __AD2d__, 2004 WL 3171130 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.))the Second Department clarified the procedure for enforcing a judgment against an award of maintenance. The respondent Niosi and his former wife, Ditroia, were divorced pursuant to a judgment entered in the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, which provided that Niosi would make monthly maintenance payments to Ditroia. Upon Niosi's failure to make these payments, the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, entered an income execution for support directing Niosi's employer, the respondent Prospective Computer to deduct the maintenance payments from Niosi's income and to pay them over to Ditroia on a monthly basis. In July 2002, the petitioner obtained a judgment against Ditroia on her default in Supreme Court, Nassau County, for unpaid legal services. The petitioner served the respondents, Niosi and Prospective Computer, with restraining notices alleging that the respondents were in possession of property in which the petitioner had an interest, i.e., Ditroia's monthly maintenance payments. When the respondents refused to pay the petitioner, he commenced a proceeding to enforce the restraining notices in Supreme Court, Nassau County, on notice to Ditroia. The Supreme Court held that the respondents did not violate the restraining notices because their payment of Ditroia's monthly maintenance was exempt from restraint pursuant to CPLR 5205(d)(3). The court further stated that any determination of the extent to which the maintenance was not exempt should be made by the court that issued the award (i.e., the Supreme Court, Suffolk County). It dismissed the petition and vacated the previously-issued restraining notices. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the petitioner took the wrong initial steps in his attempt to enforce his money judgment against Ditroia's award of maintenance. Ditroia's burden to claim and prove her exemption would not be triggered until the petitioner submits a proper application for an installment payment order to reach the amount of Ditroia's maintenance in excess of her reasonable requirements.

Under the CPLR an application for an installment payment order remains the expedient for accessing exempt salary and wages. Reinforcing this procedure, CPLR 5222(a) prohibits a judgment creditor from serving a restraining notice upon the judgment debtor's employer where the property sought to be restrained consists of wages or salary due or to become due to the judgment debtor (see CPLR 5222[a]; Silbert v. Silbert, 25 A.D.2d 570). Such restraining notices are not given any binding effect. The Second Department held that the same is true within the limited context of the case. Maintenance is a form of "income" that is exempt, just like 90% of a debtor's salary, and such clearly exempt income, when sought at its source, can only be divested of its exempt status upon proper application to a court for a determination of the judgment debtor's reasonable requirements (see CPLR 5205[d]). In order to reach Ditroia's maintenance, the petitioner is required to make a motion for an installment payment order in the action in which he recovered judgment against Ditroia in the Supreme Court, Nassau County. He must raise the issue of Ditroia's reasonable requirements in his motion papers. Upon this motion, the Supreme Court, Nassau County, must transfer the action to the Supreme Court, Suffolk County (the matrimonial court) for a determination of Ditroia's reasonable requirements pursuant to CPLR 5205(d)(3). In those proceedings Ditroia bears the ultimate burden of establishing her reasonable requirements and she may not continue to benefit from her default. Once the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, determines the amount in excess of Ditroia's reasonable requirements, the petitioner may also secure an order against third parties, like the respondents, to access payment of Ditroia's surplus maintenance at its source.

Trial Evidence Bits and Bytes

Valuation Methodology

Nasca v Nasca, AD2d , 754 NYS2d 502 (4th Dept.,2003) [Proper to value ring based on 1987 appraisal which was not disputed]

Braun v Braun, 11 AD3d 423, 782 NYS2d 785 (2d Dept.,2004) [Proper to award business to husband and house to wife where it was virtually impossible to value the husbands business because he was not forthcoming with all the necessary documents to make that evaluation.]

Cahen-Vorberger v Vorberger , 785 NYS2d 435 (1st Dept.,2004) [Proper in valuing husbands business interest at $9.75 million for courts expert to formulate a fair indirect methodology because of inadequate documentation from husband. Proper to value increase in value of business from zero where defendant failed to offer evidence of its value at time of marriage and did not deny that wife contributed to appreciation in value of this separate property by being a homemaker and care giver.]

Spillman-Conklin v Conklin, 783 NYS2d 114 (3d Dept.,2004) [Proper to value timeshare based on value listed in net worth statement and included in proposed findings of fact. Proper to use purchase price, rather than market price, to determine value of jewelry, where no other proof offered by husband, leaving court free to credit wife's testimony.]

Valuation Date Outside DRL 236[B][4] Parameters

Dashinaw v Dashinaw, 11 AD3d 732, 783 NYS2d 93 (3d Dept.,2004) [Proper to use purchase price of the rental properties, rather than their fair market value, in valuing husbands gift equity in them Proper to value certain personalty as of date of purchase, rather than date of commencement or trial, where only evidence was wife's testimony and no opposing proof from husband about fair market value.]

Preclusion For Failure to Disclose

Berk v Berk, 5 AD3d 165, 773 NYS2d 53 (1st Dept., 2004) [Proper for trial court to preclude husband from offering evidence on financial issues considering that he repeatedly violated orders, his persistent refusal to provide financial disclosure, his failure to pay his share of the fee for the neutral appraiser and his failure to appear for his deposition and a court appearance.]

Cahen-Vorberger v Vorberger , 785 NYS2d 435 (1st Dept.,2004) [Preclusion order and default judgment was supported by ample evidence of husbands contumacious failure to provide disclosure.]

Proof of Separate Property

Kenney v Lureman, 778 NYS2d 821 (4th Dept.,2004) [Wife sustained her burden of establishing that stockholdings were her separate property based upon her uncontroverted testimony that she either inherited them or purchased them with inherited funds]

Chiotti v Chiotti, 785 NYS2d 157 (3d Dept.,2004) [Inability to produce a complete paper trail from a gift or inheritance does not require a contrary finding where not evidence suggesting other possible sources of the funds and no contradictory evidence offered.]

Admissibility of Expert Opinion

Matter of D'Esposito v Kepler, 88 N.Y.S.2d 169, (2d Dept,2005) [Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in admitting into evidence the report of the neutral forensic psychologist, since the report was not submitted under oath (citing 22 NYCRR 202.16[g][2]) and relied on information other than that upon which an expert may properly base an opinion. Nevertheless, even without considering the experts report and testimony, it found that Family Court providently exercised its discretion in requiring that the residence of the subject child, who had been relocated by the appellant to California, be returned to New York by the mother

Jemmott v Lazofsky, 5 A.D.3d 558, 772 N.Y.S.2d 840) (2d Dept., 2004) ["It is well settled that, to be admissible, opinion evidence must be based on one of the following: first, personal knowledge of the facts upon which the opinion rests; second, where the expert does not have personal knowledge of the facts upon which the opinion rests, the opinion may be based upon facts and material in evidence, real or testimonial; third, material not in evidence provided that the out-of-court material is derived from a witness subject to full cross-examination; and fourth, material not in evidence provided the out-of-court material is accompanied by evidence establishing its reliability".]

Wagman v. Bradshaw, 292 A.D.2d 84, 86-87, 739 N.Y.S.2d 421. [The Court of Appeals has held that an expert witness may testify that he or she relied upon specific, inadmissible out-of-court material to formulate an opinion, provided (1) it is of a kind accepted in the profession as reliable as a basis in forming a professional opinion, and (2) there is evidence presented establishing the reliability of the out-of-court material referred to by the witness (see, Hamsch v. New York City Tr. Auth., 63 N.Y.2d 723, 480 N.Y.S.2d 195, 469 N.E.2d 516). While the expert witness's testimony of reliance upon out-of-court material to form an opinion may be received in evidence, provided there is proof of reliability, testimony as to the express contents of the out-of-court material is inadmissible. Expert opinion, based on unreliable secondary evidence, is nothing more than conjecture. Admission into evidence of a written report prepared by a non-testifying person would violate the rule against hearsay and the best evidence rule. Inasmuch as such a written report is inadmissible, logic dictates that testimony as to its contents is also barred from admission into evidence.

February 14, 2005

Divorce Lawyer Discharged Without Cause by Client Can Still Make an Application for Counsel Fees Against Other Spouse Pursuant to DRL §237(a) after Discharge

In Frankel v Frankel, 2 NY 3d 601, 781 NYS2s 59 (June 29, 2004) the Court of Appeals held that a divorce lawyer discharged without cause by one spouse can still make an application for counsel fees against the other spouse pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237(a) after the discharge. The wife retained a law firm which represented her in the parties divorce action for more than three years. She then fired her attorneys and hired different counsel, who negotiated a settlement with the husband, which stipulated that each side would be responsible for its own legal fees. The wife's former attorneys, owed some $94,000, moved under §237(a) for a counsel fee award from the husband. The Second Department held that the Domestic Relations Law was drafted to protect the non-monied client, not the non-monied client's former lawyer. It held that the statute applies only to the current attorney of record and that "former counsel has no standing to pursue the adversary spouse within the matrimonial action" (309 AD2d 65, 69 [2d Dept 2002]). The Court of Appeals reversed. Judge Albert M. Rosenblatt, writing for the Court, said a decision to the contrary would undermine public policy and legislative intent by giving the more affluent spouse an upper hand. He pointed out that Domestic Relations Law § 237 (a) provides, in pertinent part, that "[i]n any action or proceeding ... for a divorce ... the court may direct either spouse ... to pay such sum or sums of money directly to the attorney of the other spouse to carry on or defend the action or proceeding as, in the court's discretion, justice requires, having regard to the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties." The statute goes on to say that "[a]ny applications for counsel fees and expenses may be maintained by the attorney for either spouse in counsel's own name in the same proceeding." Although the provision is silent as to whether an attorney who has been discharged without cause has the right in the same proceeding to seek counsel fees, reading the provision in light of precedents and the policy interests surrounding the statute, the Court held that Domestic Relations Law § 237 (a) allows an attorney who was discharged without cause to proceed against the other spouse in the matrimonial litigation. In Holterman v Holterman, 3 NY 3d 1, 781 NYS2s 458 (2004) the New York Court of Appeals, in a 5-2 opinion, held that the Supreme Court did not err by declining to adjust defendant's child support obligation to account for the distributive award payments he was obligated to pay plaintiff for her share of the future enhanced earnings attributable to his medical license. The majority, in an opinion by Judge Graffeo, agreed with the Appellate Division, and found no statutory authority for deducting enhanced earning contributions from the child support calculus. The opinion held that "... the husband's proposed reallocation formula -- or any formula that requires a deduction of a distributive award paid over a period of years from the licensed spouse's income for purposes of calculating child support -- is impermissible under the CSSA," the Child Support Standards Act. Judge Graffeo wrote. "Had the Legislature intended to make distributive awards deductible from one parent's income and includable in the other's, it could easily have so provided." Notably, the Court agreed with husband that a distributive award to be paid by one parent to the other pertains to the financial resources of the parties and is an appropriate paragraph (f) factor that the trial court may consider, in determining whether the application of the child support guidelines amount is "unjust or inappropriate" when awarding child support. Here, in determining whether to apply the child support percentage of 25% to all income in excess of $80,000, Supreme Court expressly indicated that it considered the distributive award and maintenance obligations, the substantial disparity in gross income between the parties, as well as the upper middle-class lifestyle the children would have enjoyed had the parties not divorced. The family had taken frequent vacations, the children received allowances and engaged in extracurricular pursuits, and the daughter, who is musically talented, had taken private music lessons and had traveled with the Empire State Youth Orchestra. Under these circumstances, The Court could not say Supreme Court abused its discretion by applying the statutory percentage of 25% to husband's income in excess of $80,000. Judge Robert S. Smith dissented in an opinion with Judge Susan Phillips Read. He said : "It makes no sense at all to calculate child support as if no such distribution had occurred -- as though the transferring spouse still owned the asset and received the income it generated,"  "Yet the majority concludes that this irrational procedure is required by the CSSA -- as indeed it would be, except that the CSSA expressly permits departure from its formula to avoid an 'unjust or inappropriate' result."

Court of Appeals Affirms Order Which Granted Parents' Request to Terminate Grandparents Visitation Where Terminating Visitation Was in Child's Best Interest

In Wilson v McGlinchey, 2 NY3d 375, 779 NYS2d 159 (2004) the Court of Appeals affirmed an order which granted the parents' request to terminate grandparents visitation based on a change in circumstances, because it agreed with the Appellate Division that terminating visitation was in the child's best interest. Judge Graffeo, writing for the Court, stated that although there are benefits which devolve upon the grandchild from grandparent visitation, which cannot be derived from any other relationship, that interest must yield where the circumstances of the child's family including the worsening relations between the litigants and the strenuous objection to grandparent visitation by both parents render the continuation of visitation with the grandparents not in the child's best interest. The Court noted that in light of its ruling it did not address the Petitioners' argument challenging the constitutionality of Domestic Relations Law § 72.

Grandparents given "custody rights". New York's Domestic Relations Law was amended effective January 5, 2004 to give the grandparent or the grandparents of a child residing in New York state custody rights where the grandparent or grandparents can demonstrate the existence of "extraordinary circumstances". An "extended disruption of custody" constitutes an extraordinary circumstance. "Extended disruption of custody" is defined to include a prolonged separation of the respondent parent and the child for at least twenty-four continuous months during which the parent voluntarily relinquished care and control of the child and the child resided in the household of the petitioner grandparent or grandparents. The court may find that extraordinary circumstances exist where the prolonged separation has lasted for less than twenty-four months, and based upon other circumstances. (DRL § 72 , subdivision 2 as added by L.2003, c. 657, § 2, eff. Jan. 5, 2004.)

Trial Evidence Bits and Bytes

Separate Property Presumed to Become Marital Property Where Commingled

Garner v Garner, AD2d , 761 NYS2d 414 (3rd Dept.,2003) [personal injury recovery deposited into a joint account of the parties is presumed to be marital property]

Chiotti v Chiotti, 785 NYS2d 157 (3d Dept.,2004) [Separate property which is commingled with marital property or subsequently titled in both names is presumed to be marital property. Once converted to marital property the property does not resume its status as separate, even if all the marital funds are removed from the account.]

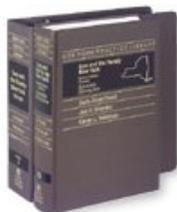

Separate Property Becomes Marital Property For No Apparent Statutory Reason

Dashinaw v Dashinaw, 11 AD3d 732, 783 NYS2d 93 (3d Dept.,2004) [Wife made significant economic and noneconomic contributions sufficient to render rental properties given to husband by his father and brother marital assets.]

Parise v Parise, ___AD3d___, 2004 WL 2952731 (2d Dept.,2004) [Proper to award wife share of appreciation of husbands separate residential real estate where he failed to satisfy his burden of establishing that the wife's indirect efforts did not contribute, in some degree, to the appreciation.]

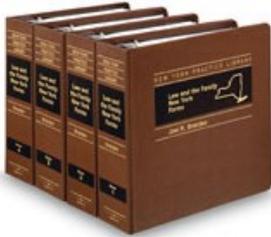

Joel R. Brandes, the President of Joel R. Brandes Consulting Services, Inc. is the author of Law and The Family New York, 2d (9 volumes) (Thomson Reuters Westlaw), and Law and the Family New York Forms (5 volumes) (Thomson Reuters Westlaw).

These sets can be purchased directly from Thomson Reuters Westlaw, 1-800-544-3008. See legalsolutions.thomsonreuters.com.

Law and the Family New York, 2d (New York Practice Library, 9 Volumes)
By Joel R. Brandes. (Updated December 2016 by Joel R. Brandes, Bari Brandes Corbin and Evan B. Brandes).

Description: This set is both a treatise and a procedural guide. The usual family law issues are covered such as Formation of the Family Unit, Divorce, Judicial Separation, and Annulments. It presents such vital practical considerations as counsel fees to prosecute or defend an appeal. The text analyzes statutes, discusses cases, and includes authors' notes which present hints, practice pointers, and pitfalls to avoid. It also features a complete discussion of appellate practice and offers step-by-step guidance on how to handle an appeal in each of the state's judicial departments. Research aids annotate the text.

Law and the Family New York Forms, 2d (New York Practice Library, 5 Volumes) By Joel R. Brandes. (Updated August 2017 by Bari Brandes Corbin and Evan B. Brandes)

Description. This set provides you with practitioner-tested forms for a wide variety of family law matters. It includes forms relating to the creation of the marriage relationship, the attorney-client relationship, matrimonial agreements, and matrimonial litigation. Specific topics covered include antenuptial agreements, separation agreements, modification agreements, and matters relating to infants and incompetents, and service of process.

Bits and Bytes*,[™] is published twice a month by Joel R. Brandes Consulting Services, Inc., 2881 NE 33rd Court, Fort Lauderdale, Florida, 33306, 954-564-9883. Joel R. Brandes Consulting Services, Inc. is not a law firm or a lawyer, and does not give legal advice. Send mail to: joel@nysdivorce.com. Website: www.nysdivorce.com or www.nysdivorce.net.

Notice: This publication was created to provide authoritative information concerning the subject matter covered. However, it was not necessarily written by persons licensed to practice law in a particular jurisdiction. The publisher is not engaged in rendering legal advice and this publication is not intended to give legal advice about a specific legal problem, nor is it a substitute for the advice of an attorney. If legal advice is required the services of a competent attorney should be sought. Copyright © 2018, Joel R. Brandes Consulting Services, Inc., All Rights Reserved.

Bits and Bytes*[™] is written by Joel R. Brandes, the author of Law and the Family New York, 2d, and Law and the Family New York Forms, 2d (Thomson Reuters Westlaw), Bari Brandes Corbin, of the New York Bar, and co-author of Law and the Family New York, 2d, Volumes 5 & 6 (Thomson-West), and Evan B. Brandes, of the New York and Massachusetts Bars, and a Solicitor in New South Wales, Australia. The authors write the annual supplements to Law and the Family New York, 2d, and Law and the Family New York Forms, 2d.

ⁱ Became Public Law No: 115-97 on December 22, 2017. It is known as an Act to provide for reconciliation pursuant to titles II and V of the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 2018 and was originally introduced in Congress as the Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017 (TCJA).

ⁱⁱ IRC §24

ⁱⁱⁱ Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

iv See Act Sec. 11041. Suspension of Deduction for Personal Exemptions. Before the Act, taxpayers subtracted $4,150 from income for each person claimed.

v IRC §§ 61, 71, and 215.

vi IRC §§ 215(a), 61(a)(8) and 71(a).

vii IRC § 71(c).

viii Public Law No: 115-97.

ix Sec. 11051. Repeal of Deduction for Alimony Payments.

x Former 26 U.S.C.A. § 215

xi Former I.R.C. § 215 (a)

xii Former I.R.C. § 215 (b)

xiii Former 26 U.S.C.A. § 71, I.R.C. § 71.

xiv Former I.R.C. § 71(a).

xv Former I.R.C. § 71(b).

xvi Former 26 U.S.C.A. § 61, I.R.C. § 61

xvii Former 26 U.S.C.A. § 62, I.R.C. § 62 (a)

xviii Former 26 U.S.C.A. § 62, I.R.C. § 62 (a) (10)

xix Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xx Sec. 11022. Increase in And Modification of Child Tax Credit provides:

(a) IN GENERAL. —Section 24 is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

“(h) SPECIAL RULES FOR TAXABLE YEARS 2018 THROUGH 2025.—

“(1) IN GENERAL. —In the case of a taxable year beginning after December 31, 2017, and before January 1, 2026, this section shall be applied as provided in paragraphs (2) through (7).

“(2) CREDIT AMOUNT. —Subsection (a) shall be applied by substituting ‘$2,000’ for ‘$1,000’.

“(3) LIMITATION. —In lieu of the amount determined under subsection (b)(2), the threshold amount shall be $400,000 in the case of a joint return ($200,000 in any other case).

“(4) PARTIAL CREDIT ALLOWED FOR CERTAIN OTHER DEPENDENTS. —

“(A) IN GENERAL. —The credit determined under subsection (a) (after the application of paragraph (2)) shall be increased by $500 for each dependent of the taxpayer (as defined in section 152) other than a qualifying child described in subsection (c).

“(B) EXCEPTION FOR CERTAIN NONCITIZENS. —Subparagraph (A) shall not apply with respect to any individual who would not be a dependent if subparagraph (A) of section 152(b)(3) were applied without regard to all that follows ‘resident of the United States’.

“(C) CERTAIN QUALIFYING CHILDREN. —In the case of any qualifying child with respect to whom a credit is not allowed under this section by reason of paragraph (7), such child shall be treated as a dependent to whom subparagraph (A) applies.

“(5) MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF REFUNDABLE CREDIT. —

“(A) IN GENERAL. —The amount determined under subsection (d)(1)(A) with respect to any qualifying child shall not exceed $1,400, and such subsection shall be applied without regard to paragraph (4) of this subsection.

“(B) ADJUSTMENT FOR INFLATION. —In the case of a taxable year beginning after 2018, the $1,400 amount in subparagraph (A) shall be increased by an amount equal to—

“(i) such dollar amount, multiplied by

“(ii) the cost-of-living adjustment determined under section 1(f)(3) for the calendar year in which the taxable year begins, determined by substituting ‘2017’ for ‘2016’ in subparagraph (A)(ii) thereof.

If any increase under this clause is not a multiple of $100, such increase shall be rounded to the next lowest multiple of $100.

“(6) EARNED INCOME THRESHOLD FOR REFUNDABLE CREDIT. —

Subsection (d)(1)(B)(i) shall be applied by substituting ‘$2,500’ for ‘$3,000’.

“(7) SOCIAL SECURITY NUMBER REQUIRED. —No credit shall be allowed under this section to a taxpayer with respect to any qualifying child unless the taxpayer includes the social security number of such child on the return of tax for the taxable year. For purposes of the preceding sentence, the term ‘social security number’ means a social security number issued to an individual by the Social Security Administration, but only if the social security number is issued—

“(A) to a citizen of the United States or pursuant to subclause (I) (or that portion of subclause (III) that relates to subclause (I)) of section 205(c)(2)(B)(i) of the Social Security Act, and

“(B) before the due date for such return.”.

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE. —The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 2017.

xxi Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxii Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxiii Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxiv Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxv Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxvi Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxvii The act uses an indexing convention that rounds the $1,400 amount to the next lowest multiple of $100.

xxviii Additionally, a qualifying child who is ineligible to receive the child tax credit because that child did not have a Social Security number as the child's taxpayer identification number may nonetheless qualify for the non-refundable $500 credit.

xxix Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxx Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>

xxxi Public law No. 115-97. (2017) See Conference Report at <http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20171218/CRPT-115HRPT-466.pdf>