The New York Matrimonial Trial Handbook by Joel R. Brandes was written for both the attorney who has never tried a matrimonial action and for the experienced litigator. It is a “how to” book for lawyers. This 836 page handbook focuses on the procedural and substantive law, as well as the law of evidence, that an attorney must have at his or her fingertips when trying a matrimonial action. It is intended to be an aide for preparing for a trial and as a reference for the procedure in offering and objecting to evidence during a trial. The handbook deals extensively with the testimonial and documentary evidence necessary to meet the burden of proof. There are thousands of suggested questions for the examination of witnesses at trial to establish each cause of action and requests for ancillary relief, as well as for the cross-examination of difficult witnesses.

Laws of 2018, Chapter 218, Amended CPLR 2305

Chapter 218 amended CPLR 2305, effective August 24, 2018 to add a new subdivision (d) which gives counsel the option of having trial material delivered to the attorney or self-represented party at the return address set forth in the subpoena, rather than to the clerk of the court. Existing subdivision 2 provides: “Any person may comply with a subpoena duces tecum for a trial, hearing or examination by having the requisite books, documents or things produced by a person able to identify them and testify respecting their origin, purpose and custody.”

CPLR 2305(d) provides as follows:

(d) Subpoena duces tecum for a trial; service of subpoena and delivery for records. Where a trial subpoena directs service of the subpoenaed documents to the attorney or self-represented party at the return address set forth in the subpoena, a copy of the subpoena shall be served upon all parties simultaneously and the party receiving such subpoenaed records, in any format, shall deliver a complete copy of such records in the same format to all opposing counsel and self-represented parties where applicable, forthwith.

The amendment was effective immediately and applies to all actions pending on or after such effective date.

Laws of 2018, Chapter 217 added CPLR 4540-a

Chapter 217 added CPLR 4540-a effective January 1, 2019 to eliminate the authentication burden often encountered by litigants who seek to introduce into evidence documents or other items authored or otherwise created by an adverse party who produced those materials in the course of pretrial disclosure.

According to the Legislative memorandum in support of the legislation the genuineness of a document or other physical object must be established as a prerequisite to its admissibility when the relevance of the item depends upon its source or origin. But evidence of such authenticity should not be required if the party who purportedly authored or otherwise created the documents at issue has already admitted their authenticity. And if a party has responded to a pretrial litigation demand for its documents by producing those documents, the party has implicitly acknowledged their authenticity. Thus, in such cases, the presentation of evidence of authenticity is a waste of the court's time and an unnecessary burden on the proponent of the evidence.

New CPLR 4540-a creates a rebuttable presumption that material produced by a party in response to a demand pursuant to article thirty- one of this chapter for material authored or otherwise created by such party shall be presumed authentic when offered into evidence by an adverse party. The presumption recognized by the statute applies only to the issue of authenticity or genuineness of the item. A party is free to assert any and all other objections that might be pertinent in the case, such as lack of relevance or violation of the best evidence rule. The Legislative memorandum noted that the adoption of the proposed new CPLR 4540-a would not preclude establishing authenticity by any other statutory or common law means. See CPLR 4543 ("Nothing in this article prevents the proof of a fact or a writing by any method authorized by any applicable statute or by the rules of evidence at common law.").

CPLR 4540-a, effective January 1, 2019 reads as follows:

Rule 4540-a. Presumption of authenticity based on a party's production of material authored or otherwise created by the party. Material produced by a party in response to a demand pursuant to article thirty-one of this chapter for material authored or otherwise created by such party shall be presumed authentic when offered into evidence by an adverse party. Such presumption may be rebutted by a preponderance of evidence proving such material is not authentic, and shall not preclude any other objection to admissibility.

Laws of 2018, Chapter 235 adds new privileged communications

Chapter 235 amended judiciary law section 498, effective August 24, 2018 by renumbering subdivision 2 as subdivision 3 and adding a new subdivision 2 that deems communications between a consumer of legal services and a legal or lawyer referral service to be privileged, similar to the attorney-client privilege.

Judiciary Law §498, new subdivision 2 reads as follows:

2. The communications between a member or authorized agent of an association or society of attorneys or counselors at law and any person, persons or entity communicating with such member or authorized agent for the purpose of seeking or obtaining a professional referral shall be deemed to be privileged on the same basis as the privilege provided by law for communications between attorney and client. Such privilege may be waived only by the person, persons or entity who has furnished information to the association or society, its members or authorized agents.

Appellate Division, First Department

Adoption Subsidy Should Be Considered as A Resource of The Child When Determining Child Support

In Barbara T v Acquinetta T, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3789133, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05736 (1st Dept., 2018), a support proceeding, the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in determining that the Children's Law Center (CLC) which had been appointed as attorney for the child with no limitations on the scope of its representation did not have standing to file objections in Family Court. It rejected the argument that Family Court Act § 439(e) restricts the filing of objections to a "party or parties." That section does not prohibit children's attorneys, where appointed, from filing or rebutting objections to a Support Magistrate's order. It found that the child's attorney had standing to file objections to the Support Magistrate's order. CLC also had standing to bring the appeal. The final order of a Support Magistrate is appealable after objections have been reviewed by a judge (FCA § 439[e]). In addition, the Court has discretion to entertain an appeal of any Family Court order other than an order of disposition (FCA § 1112).

The child was born on December 21, 2000. In or about 2010, he was removed from his birth mother's home and placed in non-kinship foster care with respondent Acquinetta M. (mother or Ms. M), who thereafter adopted him. When the adoption became final she began to receive a monthly adoption subsidy for him, which was administered by the Administration for Children's Services (ACS). On December 2, 2015, the petitioner in the proceeding, the child's godmother, Barbara T. (guardian or Ms. T), filed a petition for guardianship and in or about February 2016, the child began living with her full-time. Ms. M did not contest the petition, and it was granted on March 28, 2016. In March 2016, Ms. M advised ACS that the child was no longer living with her and that she wished to stop receiving the subsidy. Based solely on her request, ACS issued a notice to the mother stating that the subsidy had been "suspended" effective April 14, 2016 at her request. On March 31, 2016, the child's guardian filed a petition seeking child support from Ms. M.

The Appellate Division held, inter alia, that Family Court properly determined that an adoption subsidy should be considered as a resource of the child when determining child support. The Court observed that foster parents apply for the subsidy prior to adoption (18 NYCRR 421.24 [b], [c][1]), and sign a contract with ACS (18 NYCRR 421.24[c][3]). The minimum provisions of such contracts are set by regulation (18 NYCRR 421.24[c][3]). The applicable regulations further provide that the written agreement "will remain in effect until the child's 21st birthday. No payments may be made if [ACS] determines that the adoptive parents are no longer legally responsible for the support of the child or the child is no longer receiving any support from such parents. Such written agreement must state that it will be the responsibility of the adoptive parent(s) to inform the appropriate State or local official when they are no longer legally responsible for the child or no longer providing any support to the child" (18 NYCRR 421.24[c][5]). Similarly, the Social Services Law provides that, once approved, subsidy payments "shall be made until the child's twenty first birthday" (SSL § 453 [1][a]) and that payment of the subsidy may only be suspended if ACS "determines that the adoptive parents are no longer legally responsible for the support of the child or the child is no longer receiving any support from such parents" (SSL § 453[1][c]; see also 42 USC § 673[a][4][A][ii], [iii]). The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in determining that receipt of the subsidy, once the contract is entered into, is at the adoptive parent's election or that the subsidy terminates when the adoptive parent "opts" not to receive it. The mother's claim that she was no longer eligible to receive the subsidy once the child no longer resided with her was contrary to the applicable statutes and regulations and the required language of the adoption subsidy agreement.

The Appellate Division held that although the statute does not presently permit anyone other than an adoptive parent to receive the subsidy on the child's behalf, there is no statutory or regulatory requirement that the child continue to reside with the adoptive parent in order for the subsidy to continue. Accordingly, Family Court erred when it determined that it is "inappropriate, if not illegal, for a person to apply for and receive adoption subsidies for a minor who is not in said person's care." The subsidy may be considered in determining whether the non-custodial parent's statutory child support obligation is "unjust or inappropriate" (FCA § 413 [1][f]). Adoptive parents, just like biological parents, remain legally responsible for the support of their children until they are 21 (FCA § 413[1][a]). The adoption subsidy (see 18 NYCRR 421.24) is not income that can be imputed to the adoptive parent (see A.E. v. J.I.E., 179 Misc. 2d 663, 686 N.Y.S.2d 613).

However, Family Court erred in determining that a deviation based on the subsidy would be improper because it would “force” the mother to take steps to undo the subsidy’s suspension. Awarding child support in the amount of the subsidy is not unlike awarding support based on a parent’s historic earning potential, which similarly requires the parent to do what the court has determined he or she is capable of doing based on past performance. Family Court further erred in failing to properly consider the 10 factors set forth in FCA § 413(1)(f) to determine whether the mother’s basic child support obligation is unjust or inappropriate.” Considering these factors, it found that awarding child support in at least the amount of the subsidy for so long as the mother was eligible to receive it on the child’s behalf was an appropriate deviation from the basic child support obligation (see Smith, 75 A.D.3d 802, 903 N.Y.S.2d 758). However, it was not clear from the record whether the mother may obtain the subsidy retroactive to the date on which it was suspended and remanded for further proceedings.

To Extent Defendant Promised Plaintiff, In Contemplation of Marriage, That She Would Raise Any Children They Had as Vegetarians, The Promise Is Not Binding

In Kesavan v Kesavan, 162 A.D.3d 445, 78 N.Y.S.3d 345, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 04088 (1st Dept., 2018) in the parties parenting agreement, the parties agreed to jointly determine all major matters with respect to the child, including “religious choices.” The 24–page agreement did not otherwise mention the child’s religious upbringing and made no reference at all to dietary requirements. Although the parenting coordinator found that the child’s diet was a day-to-day choice within the discretion of each party, the trial court explicitly determined that the child’s diet was a religious choice, and dictated the child’s diet by effectively prohibiting the parties from feeding her meat, poultry or fish. The Appellate Division held that this was an abuse of discretion (see De Arakie v. De Arakie, 172 A.D.2d 398, 399, 568 N.Y.S.2d 778 [1st Dept. 1991]). To the extent defendant promised plaintiff, in contemplation of marriage, that she would raise any children they had as vegetarians, the promise is not binding (Stevenot v. Stevenot, 133 A.D.2d 820, 520 N.Y.S.2d 197 [2d Dept. 1987]), particularly in view of the parenting agreement, which omits any such understanding. Nor was there support in the record for a finding that a vegetarian diet is in the child’s best interests.

Appellate Division, Second Department

In proceeding pursuant to FCA § 661(a) there is no express statutory fingerprinting requirement, or express requirement to submit documentation to OCFS.

In Matter of A v P, 161 A.D.3d 1068, 78 N.Y.S.3d 189, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03674 (2d Dept., 2018) the mother commenced a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 6 to be appointed guardian of the child for the purpose of obtaining an order declaring that the child is dependent on the Family Court and making specific findings so as to enable the child to petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status (SIJS) pursuant to 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J). The mother also moved for the issuance of an order making the requisite declaration and specific findings so as to enable the child to petition for SIJS. Family Court denied the mother's motion without a hearing and dismissed the guardianship petition for "failure to prosecute," respectively.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that in a proceeding such as this pursuant to Family Court Act § 661(a) for "[g]uardianship of the person of a minor or infant," there is no express statutory fingerprinting requirement, or any express requirement to submit documentation pertaining to the Office of Children and Family Services. Further, under the circumstances of this case, the court erred in dismissing the petition and denying the motion for "failure to prosecute" based upon the mother's failure to submit documentation regarding, inter alia, the child's enrollment in school. Since the Family Court dismissed the guardianship petition and denied the mother's motion without conducting a hearing or considering the child's best interests, it remitted the matter to the Family Court for a hearing and a new determination thereafter of the petition and the motion.

Second Department Holds that cases such as Matter of Angelo O., 41 A.D.3d 605, 836 N.Y.S.2d 421 should no longer be followed. Family Court's Determinations Following A Permanency Hearing Must Be Made 'In Accordance with The Best Interests and Safety of The Child

In Matter of Victoria B, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3748220, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05675 (2d Dept., 2018) after issuing the order of fact-finding of neglect and disposition, the Family Court held a permanency hearing. In a permanency hearing order dated August 30, 2017, the court changed the permanency goal from reunification to placement for adoption and continued the child's placement in the custody of the Commissioner until the completion of the next permanency hearing or pending further order of the court. The order also directed the filing of a petition to terminate the father's parental rights.

The Appellate Division held that the father's appeal was academic insofar as the permanency hearing order dated August 30, 2017, continued the child's placement with the Commissioner. This portion of the order had already expired. However, it concluded that the portions of the August 30, 2017, permanency hearing order which changed the permanency goal from reunification to placement for adoption and directed the filing of a petition to terminate the father's parental rights was not academic. It agreed with the First and Third Departments that since the permanency goal was changed so as to alter the objectives to be sought by the petitioner in the course of future permanency proceedings from working toward reunification to working toward permanent placement and termination of parental rights, any new orders would be the direct result of the order appealed from, and the issue of whether the order appealed from was proper will continue to affect the father's rights (see Matter of Jacelyn TT. [Tonia TT. —Carlton TT.], 80 A.D.3d 1119, 1120, 915 N.Y.S.2d 732; see also Matter of Justyce HH. [Andrew II.] 136 A.D.3d 1181, 26 N.Y.S.3d 376; accord Matter of Alexander L. [Andrea L.], 109 A.D.3d 767, 972 N.Y.S.2d 229). To the extent that cases such as Matter of Angelo O., 41 A.D.3d 605, 836 N.Y.S.2d 421 are to the contrary, they should no longer be followed.

In affirming the order upon its review, the Appellate Division observed that Article 10-A "establishes a system of 'permanency hearings' for children who have been removed from parental custody”. The hearings are “scheduled at six-month intervals” (see Family Ct Act § 1089[a][3]). “At the conclusion of each hearing, Family Court enters an order of disposition, schedules a subsequent hearing, and may also consider whether the permanency goal should be approved or modified”. Permissible permanency goals include returning the child to a parent or placing the child for adoption (Family Ct Act § 1089[d][2][i]). “At a permanency hearing, the petitioner bears the burden of establishing the appropriateness of a permanency goal, or a goal change, by a preponderance of the evidence” The Family Court’s determinations following a permanency hearing “must be made ‘in accordance with the best interests and safety of the child, including whether the child would be at risk of abuse or neglect if returned to the parent’”

Family Court Does Not Have Authority to Compel Child to Participate in Permanency Hearing When Child Has Waived Right to Participate Following Consultation with Attorney

In Matter of Shawn S, 163 A.D.3d 31, 77 N.Y.S.3d 824, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 042081(4th Dept., 2018), the Family Court, directed 14-year-old child to be present for any permanency hearing, despite the child’s waiver of right to participate in hearing. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Family Court does not have the authority to compel a child to participate in a permanency hearing when that child has waived his or her right to participate following consultation with his or her attorney (see Family Ct Act § 1090–a [a][2]). The question was one of statutory interpretation. Here, the statutory language was clear and unambiguous. Although the permanency hearing must include “an age appropriate consultation with the child” (Family Ct Act § 1090–a [a][1]), that requirement may not “be construed to compel a child who does not wish to participate in his or her permanency hearing to do so” (Family Court act§ 1090–a [g]). The choice belongs to the child. “A child age fourteen and older shall be permitted to participate in person in all or any portion of his or her permanency hearing in which he or she chooses to participate” (§ 1090–a [b][1]). Moreover, “a child who has chosen to participate in his or her permanency hearing shall choose the manner in which he or she shall participate, which may include participation in person, by telephone or available electronic means, or the issuance of a written statement to the court” (§ 1090–a [c]). Although the court may limit the participation of a child under the age of 14 based on the best interests of the child (see § 1090–a [a][3]; [b][2]), the court lacks the authority to compel the participation of a child who has waived his or her right to participate in a permanency hearing after consultation with his or her attorney (see § 1090–a [a][2]; [g]).

Second Department Holds That Request at Trial for Judgment for Arrears of Temporary Maintenance Must Be Made on Notice

In Cravo v Diegel, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3559159, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05447 (2d Dept., 2018) in affirming the judgment of divorce, the Appellate Division held, inter alia, that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in failing to the husband him maintenance arrears accruing under a pendente lite order dated December 29, 2014, because he failed to make an application for such an award. A party to a matrimonial action may make an application for a judgment directing payment of maintenance arrears at any time prior to or subsequent to the entry of a judgment of divorce (see Domestic Relations Law § 244). However, an application for a judgment directing payment of maintenance arrears must be made “upon such notice to the spouse or other person as the court may direct” (Domestic Relations Law § 244). Here, the defendant made no such application (see Domestic Relations Law § 244; Matter of Fixman v. Fixman, 31 A.D.3d 637, 637–638, 819 N.Y.S.2d 770).

Fourth Department Holds That Comity Requires Recognition of Property Rights Arising from Civil Union in Vermont

In O'Reilly- Morshead v O'Reilly-Morshead, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3567116, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05419 (4th Dept., 2018) Plaintiff and defendant were residents of New York who, on June 9, 2003, traveled to Vermont and entered into a civil union under the laws of that state. On June 9, 2006, they were married in Canada. In 2014, plaintiff commenced this action seeking dissolution of the marriage and defendant counterclaimed for, inter alia, dissolution of the civil union and the equitable distribution of property acquired during the civil union. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly declined to treat the civil union as equivalent to a marriage for the purposes of the equitable distribution of property under the Domestic Relations Law. It observed that when the New York State Legislature enacted the Marriage Equality Act, it granted same-sex couples the right to marry, but it did not grant those couples who had entered into civil unions the same rights as those who marry. The Domestic Relations Law provides that “[a] marriage that is otherwise valid shall be valid regardless of whether the parties to the marriage are of the same or different sex” (DRL§ 10–a [1]). While the word “marriage” is not defined in the Domestic Relations Law, the disposition of property in a matrimonial action is dependent on whether that property is “[m]arital property” (DRL§ 236[B][5][c]). The Domestic Relations Law defines “ ‘marital property’ ” as property acquired “during the marriage” (DRL§ 236[B][1][c]) and, as relevant here, “separate property” is defined as “property acquired before marriage” (§ 236[B][1][d][1]). The parties were married on June 9, 2006, and thus the property at issue was acquired prior to the parties’ marriage.

However, the Appellate Division concluded that the court erred in denying defendant’s request to apply principles of comity to the civil union and recognize that both parties have rights with respect to property acquired during the civil union. In Debra H. v. Janice R., 14 N.Y.3d 576, 904 N.Y.S.2d 263, 930 N.E.2d 184 (2010) the Court of Appeals left open the question whether New York should extend comity to the civil union for purposes other than parentage. The Appellate Division concluded that comity does require the recognition of property rights arising from a civil union in Vermont. One of the consequences of the parties' civil union in Vermont was that they would receive "all the same benefits, protections, and responsibilities under law ... as are granted to spouses in a civil marriage" (Vt. Stat. Ann, tit. 15, § 1204[a]), including rights with respect to "divorce ... and property division" (§ 1204 [d]; see DeLeonardis v. Page, 188 Vt. 94, 101, 998 A.2d 1072, 1076 [2010]). That rule is consistent with the public policy of New York, inasmuch as the laws of Vermont and New York both "predicate [] [property rights] on the objective evidence of a formal legal relationship," i.e., legal union between the parties. In other words, under the laws of both Vermont and New York, property acquired during a legal union of two people—in Vermont a civil union or marriage, and in New York, a marriage—is subject to equitable distribution under the governing statutes of the state. The relevant New York and Vermont statutes both provide similar factors for the court to consider when determining the equitable distribution of the property. It concluded that, under the principles of comity, the property acquired during the civil union and prior to the marriage is subject to equitable distribution, and such property will therefore be equitably distributed after trial, along with the property acquired during the marriage.

Terms of agreement are to be interpreted consistently corresponding statutory scheme

In Burns v Burns, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3569023, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05411 (4th Dept., 2018) the parties settlement agreement pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3) which was incorporated into their judgment of divorce provided that "[a]ll matters affecting interpretation of this [a]greement and the rights of the parties [t]hereto shall be governed by the laws of the State of New York." The agreement obligated the husband to pay "rehabilitative maintenance" to the wife pursuant to a schedule, until November 30, 2010 but was silent regarding the effect, if any, of the wife's remarriage upon the husband's maintenance obligation. The wife remarried in December 2015. In April 2016, the husband emailed the wife to inform her that he would stop paying maintenance as a result of her remarriage. The wife then moved to, inter alia, recover a monetary judgment for the amount outstanding and hold the husband in contempt for ending the maintenance payments. The Appellate Division rejected the wife's argument that "a plain reading of ... the agreement [] leads to only one conclusion: [the husband's] rehabilitative maintenance obligation survives [her] remarriage." because "[o]ther than November 30, 2020, no termination events are identified in the agreement.

The Appellate Division held that when parties enter into an agreement authorized by or related to a particular statutory scheme, the courts will presume—absent something to the contrary—that the terms of the agreement are to be interpreted consistently with the corresponding statutory scheme (Dolman v. United States Trust Co. of N.Y., 2 N.Y.2d 110, 116, 157 N.Y.S.2d 537, 138 N.E.2d 784 [1956]). The statutory scheme corresponding to the agreement in this case is Domestic Relations Law § 236, which includes the following caveat: any maintenance award "shall terminate upon the death of either party or upon the payee's valid or invalid marriage". As thus defined, the concept of maintenance is unequivocally limited to payments made to an unmarried ex-spouse. And unless the parties contract otherwise, the statutory limitation is incorporated directly into a divorce settlement agreement "as though it were expressed or referred to therein". It rejected the wife's argument that the statutory definition of maintenance embodied in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(1)(a) is irrelevant simply because the parties chose to settle the terms of their divorce in a written agreement. The concept of "maintenance," is explicitly limited by statute to payments made to an unmarried payee.

Party Moving for Attorney's Fees Must Make Prima Facie Showing of Substantial Compliance With 22 NYCRR 1400.2 And 1400.3

In Matter of Tarpey v Tarpey, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3371501, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05178 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division reversed an order which granted the mother's petition for an upward modification of child support and attorneys fees. It pointed out that an attorney may recover fees from a client or the client's spouse only if the attorney has substantially complied with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3, which, inter alia, require counsel to provide the client with "written, itemized bills at least every 60 days" (Gahagan v. Gahagan, 51 A.D.3d 863, 864, 859 N.Y.S.2d 218). The party moving for attorney's fees must make a prima facie showing of substantial compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3 (see Gottlieb v. Gottlieb, 101 A.D.3d 678, 679, 957 N.Y.S.2d 132). It held that the Support Magistrate erred in awarding the mother attorney's fees, as the mother did not demonstrate, prima facie, substantial compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 or 1400.3. The mother failed to submit appropriate evidence in support of her application for attorney's fees

Recording Call Placed on Speaker at Request of Party to Conversation Is Not Eavesdropping

In Perlman v Perlman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3371321, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05212 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division, inter alai, affirmed an order denying defendant's motion to preclude the plaintiff from offering a tape recording of a telephone call into evidence at trial. Generally, "[t]he contents of any overheard or recorded communication, conversation or discussion, or evidence derived therefrom, which has been obtained by conduct constituting the crime of eavesdropping, as defined by section 250.05 of the penal law, may not be received in evidence in any trial, hearing or proceeding before any court or grand jury" (CPLR 4506[1]). "A person is guilty of eavesdropping when he unlawfully engages in wiretapping, mechanical overhearing of a conversation, or intercepting or accessing of an electronic communication" (Penal Law § 250.05). It found that the plaintiff's actions in recording a telephone call, which apparently took place between the defendant and the children after the defendant requested that the children place the call on speaker so that the plaintiff could hear what he had to say, did not constitute the crime of eavesdropping. The plaintiff's actions did not amount to "mechanical overhearing of a conversation [,]" as she was present at, and a party to, the conversation at issue (Penal Law § 250.00[2]; cf. People v. Badalamenti, 27 N.Y.3d 423, 432, 34 N.Y.S.3d 360, 54 N.E.3d 32). Thus, the recordings of that conversation were admissible pursuant to CPLR 4506(1) (see CPLR 4506[1]; Penal Law §§ 250.05, 250.00[1], [2]).

Provision of Postnuptial Agreement Waiving Right to Seek Attorney's Fee Held Unenforceable

In Maddaloni v Maddaloni, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3450169, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05295 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, among other things, granted the plaintiffs motion for post judgment and interim appellate counsel fees. The parties' 1988 postnuptial agreement provided that in the event that either of the parties was unable or unwilling to continue the marriage arrangement, neither of the parties would be entitled to counsel fees. It observed that "[t]he determination as to whether or not a provision waiving the right to seek an award of an attorney's fee is enforceable must be made on a case-by-case basis after weighing the competing public policy interests in light of all relevant facts and circumstances both at the time the agreement was entered and at the time it is to be enforced" (Kessler v. Kessler, 33 A.D.3d 42, 48, 818 N.Y.S.2d 571; see Abramson v. Gavares, 109 A.D.3d 849, 851, 971 N.Y.S.2d 538). Here, based on the disparity between the financial positions of the parties, and all of the circumstances of this matter, the provision of the parties' postnuptial agreement waiving the right to seek an award of an attorney's fee was unenforceable.

Net Loss on Rental Property Excluded from Income for Child Support Calculation

In DeSouza v DeSouza, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3383635, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05237 (3d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that where a net loss is sustained on rental property for a given year, such rental income is properly excluded from the calculation of the parties' total gross income for child support purposes (see Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b] [b][5][ii]).

Rules of Professional Conduct amended effective June 1, 2018

— The Judicial Departments of the Appellate Division of the New York State Supreme Court, amended Title 22 of the Official Compilation of Code, Rules, and Regulations of the State of New York Part 1200 (Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 8.4[g]) and Part 1210 (Statement of Client's Rights) to prohibit discrimination in the practice of law on the basis. of, gender identity. or gender expression, as follows:

Part 1200. Attorney Rules of Professional Conduct

Rule 8.4. Misconduct

A lawyer or law firm shall not:

(g) unlawfully discriminate in the practice of law, including in hiring, promoting or otherwise determining conditions of employment on the basis. of age, race, creed, color, national origin, sex, disability, marital status, sexual orientation, gender identity. or gender expression. Where there is a tribunal with jurisdiction to hear a complaint, if timely brought, other than a Departmental Disciplinary Committee, a complaint based on unlawful discrimination shall be brought before such tribunal in the first instance. A certified copy of a determination by such a tribunal, which has become final and enforceable and as to which the right to judicial or appellate review has been exhausted, finding that the lawyer has engaged in an unlawful discriminatory practice shall constitute prima facie evidence of professional misconduct in a disciplinary proceeding.

Part 1210. Statement of Client's Rights
§ 1210.1. Posting

Every attorney with an office located in the State of New York shall insure that there is posted in that office, in a manner visible to clients of the attorney, a statement of client's rights in the form set forth below. Attorneys in offices that provide legal services without fee may delete from the statement those provisions dealing with fees. The statement shall contain the following:

STATEMENT OF CLIENT'S RIGHTS ...

10. You may not be refused representation on the basis of race, creed, color, religion, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity, gender expression, age, national origin, or disability.

Statewide Practice Rules of the Appellate Division Amended and Local Rules Adopted

22 NYCRR Part 1250, Statewide Practice Rules of the Appellate Division were adopted by the four Judicial Departments of the Appellate Division on December 12, 2017 and revised by joint order on June 29, 2018, to take effect on September 17, 2018. See: Joint Order of the Departments of the New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division

22 NYCRR Part 1250 applies to all matters that are commenced in the Appellate Division, or in which a notice of appeal to the Appellate Division is filed, on or after September 17, 2018. Unless otherwise ordered by the Court upon a showing that application of part 1250 to the matter would result in substantial prejudice to a party or would be manifestly unjust or impracticable under the circumstances, part 1250 applies to each matter pending in the Appellate Division on September 17, 2018.

Due to the differences inherent in practice among the four departments of the Appellate Division, each department has also adopted a set of local rules.

The Appellate Division, First Judicial Department rescinded 22 NYCRR Part 600 and adopted a new 22 NYCRR Part 600 to supplement the statewide Practice Rules of the Appellate Division, effective on September 17, 2018.

The Appellate Division, Second Judicial Department rescinded 22 NYCRR Part 670 and adopted a new 22 NYCRR Part 670, effective September 17, 2018.

The Appellate Division, Third Department rescinded 22 NYCRR Part 850 and adopted a new 22 NYCRR Part 850 effective September 17, 2018.

The Appellate Division, Fourth Department repealed in its entirety 22 NYCRR Part 1000, governing practice before the Court and enacted a new 22 NYCRR Part 1000, effective September 17, 2018.

Mother Did Not Consent to Reference Merely by Participating in The Proceeding Without Requesting Judge to Hear Case

In Matter of Rose v Simon, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3131427, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 04736 (2d Dept., 2018) the father filed a petition for sole physical custody of the child. During the pendency of the custody proceeding, the mother filed a family offense petition against the father. The matters were heard before a Court Attorney Referee, who, after a consolidated hearing, granted the father's petition and dismissed the mother's family offense petition. The Appellate Division observed that a referee derives authority from an order of reference by the court (see CPLR 4311, 4317). The order of reference did not authorize the Court Attorney Referee to hear and report or to hear and determine a contested family offense petition. The Court Attorney Referee therefore lacked jurisdiction to dismiss the mother's family offense petition.

With respect to the determination of custody, the order of reference recited that, upon the parties' stipulation, a court attorney referee is authorized to hear and determine the parties' rights to custody of and visitation with the child, including the determination of motions and temporary orders of custody. A review of the record revealed that the parties had not stipulated to the reference in the manner prescribed by CPLR 2104, and, absent such stipulation, the Court Attorney Referee had the power only to hear and report her findings. It further found that the mother did not consent to the reference merely by participating in the proceeding without expressing her desire to have the matter tried before a judge. The order of reference was therefore deemed an order to hear and report. Thus, the Court Attorney Referee had no jurisdiction to determine, but only to hear and report, with respect to the parties' respective rights of custody and visitation. The portion of the order, which determined custody and visitation, was deemed a report (see CPLR 4320[b]), and the custody matter was remitted for further proceedings pursuant to CPLR 4403 before a judge of the Family Court.

Attorney Sanctioned for Submissions Filled with Half Truths, Distortions of Facts, Facts Taken Out of Context, And Omissions of Material Facts and Relevant Decisions

In Matter of Ermini v Vittori, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3295635, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 05038 (2d Dept., 2018) after Family Court, issued a final order of protection in favor of the mother and the children and against the father, the attorney for the children moved pursuant to Family Court Act § 842 to extend that order of protection. The father cross-moved, in effect, to enforce certain purported orders of an Italian Court pertaining to visitation, and to remove the attorney for the children. The attorney for the children cross-moved, inter alia, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 for an award of an attorney's fee. The mother's attorney made an application pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 for an award of an attorney's fee. Family Court, inter alia, granted the cross motion of the attorney for the children, and the separate application of the mother's attorney, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 for an award of attorneys' fees to the extent of directing the father's attorney, to pay the sum of $2,000 to each attorney. On the issue of attorney's fees pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-1.1, the court concluded, in part, that the father's "submissions are filled with half truths, distortions of facts, facts taken out of context, and most distressingly, omissions of material facts and relevant decisions" and that most of the father's "submissions were an attempt to revise and re-litigate facts that were already decided." The father and his attorney appealed from those portions of the order. The Appellate Division affirmed.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Procedures mandated by FCA § 1017 must be strictly followed. Placement order must be set aside if a failure to comply with statute prejudiced either the rights of a relative to seek placement or the child's right to be placed with a suitable relative

In Matter of Richard HH v Saratoga County of Social Services, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3276162, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 04990 2018 WL 3276162 (3d Dept., 2018) in September 2014, the children were removed from the mother's care and placed in the custody of respondent (DSS) after neglect petitions were filed against the mother and the children's father. In February 2015, Family Court issued an order finding the children to be neglected and continuing their placement in the custody of DSS. In October 2015, petitioner, the children's maternal uncle, filed two petitions seeking custody of the children and for permission to intervene in the neglect proceedings pursuant to Family Ct. Act § 1035 (f). Family Court's denial of the uncle's motion to intervene was reversed on appeal and upon remittal, the uncle was joined and two permanency hearings were conducted with respect to the younger child. Following a trial on the uncle's custody petition and a Lincoln hearing, Family Court dismissed the uncle's petition. The Appellate Division reversed.

The Appellate Division held that the uncle was prejudiced by DSS's failure to comply with Family Ct. Act § 1017, which provides, as relevant here, that when a court determines that a child must be removed from his or her home based on neglect, the court shall direct the local commissioner of social services to conduct an immediate investigation to locate relatives who may be a placement resource and to provide any such individuals with written notice of the pendency of the neglect proceeding and the opportunity to seek custody of the child (see Family Ct. Act § 1017[1][a]). After the investigation is completed, the court must determine whether there is a relative with whom the child may appropriately reside (see Family Ct. Act § 1017[1][c]). If a suitable relative exists, the court is required to "either place the child with that relative or with the local commissioner of social services with directions to allow the child to reside with that relative pending his or her approval as a foster parent," and, notably, only if no suitable relative can be located should Family Court consider another placement. The statute, in short, is intended to guard not only the rights of relatives of a child who is removed from his or her home, but also to protect the rights and interests of children to be placed with their relatives". It accomplishes this purpose by requiring that the initial placement of children who must be removed from their homes be made, whenever possible, with a relative, thereby allowing them to form or maintain bonds with family members rather than with foster parents. A placement order must be set aside if a failure to comply with [Family Ct. Act § 1017] prejudiced either the rights of a relative to seek placement or the child's right to be placed with a suitable relative.

The Appellate Division found that the uncle testified that he received a single telephone call from DSS personnel approximately four months after the children were placed in DSS custody asking whether he would be a custodial resource if the mother's parental rights were terminated, and that he responded affirmatively. He stated that DSS did not contact him again until after he filed the instant custody petition—more than one year after the children were first removed from the mother's home—when it sent him the New York State Handbook for Relatives Raising Children. In its appellate brief, DSS admitted that it did not timely provide the uncle with the required information but criticized him for not sooner seeking custody. Notably, the statute did not impose a duty on the uncle to have affirmatively sought placement based solely upon DSS's inquiry regarding his willingness to be a custodial resource if the mother's parental rights were terminated and before he was advised of the procedures by which he could do so. Rather, the statute imposed a duty on DSS to "immediately" conduct an investigation to locate relatives and provide the required information, in writing (Family Ct. Act § 1017[1][a]).

The Appellate Division found that the failure of Family Court and DSS to strictly follow the statutory mandate to seek initial placement with a relative in this case created the very harm the statute was intended to prevent—long-term placement in foster care rather than with a suitable relative. Not only did DSS fail to identify the uncle as a custodial resource and to provide him with the mandated information, it ignored his initial expression of willingness to serve as a custodial resource for the child. Moreover, when the uncle filed his custody petition, he was treated as an unwelcome interloper by both DSS and Family Court, which erroneously denied his motion to intervene in the Family Ct Act article 10 proceeding and contemplated staying an investigation regarding the uncle's suitability as a custodial resource that was being conducted in Texas pursuant to the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (see Social Services Law § 374-a [hereinafter ICPC]). Family Court's conclusion that "[h]ad the [u]ncle requested that [the child] be placed with him in September, 2014, when she was initially placed in foster care, DSS may very well have placed [the child] with the [u]ncle" ignored the fact that DSS failed to fulfill its statutory duty to inform the uncle of the methods by which he could seek placement of the child. These failures were especially egregious given that Family Court and DSS now agreed that the uncle and his wife were able to provide a good home for the child. The procedures mandated by Family Ct. Act § 1017 are to be strictly followed.

Appellate Division, First Department

First Department Holds Brooke's Reasoning Applies with Equal Force Where Child Is Legally Adopted by One Partner and Other Partner Claims He or She Is A "Parent" With Co-Equal Rights Because Of Preadoption Agreement. Observes Equitable Estoppel Requires Close Scrutiny of Child.

In re K.G., v. C.H., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3118937 (1st Dept., 2018) petitioner (KG) claimed that she was a parent with standing to seek custody of and visitation with A., the adopted child of respondent (CH), her now ex-partner. KG was not biologically related to A., who was born in Ethiopia, nor did she second adopt the child. KG's claim of parental standing was predicated upon the Court of Appeals decision in Matter of Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A.C.C. (28 NY3d 1 [2016]), which expansively defined who is a "parent" under Domestic Relations Law § 70. On appeal, KG primarily claimed that in 2007, before A. was identified and offered to CH for adoption, the parties had an agreement to adopt and raise a child together. CH did not deny that the parties had an agreement in 2007 but claimed that the 2007 agreement terminated when the parties' romantic relationship ended in 2009, before A. was first identified and offered for adoption to CH in March 2011. After a 36-day trial, Supreme Court held that notwithstanding the parties' agreement to adopt and raise a child together, KG did not remain committed to their agreement, which terminated before the adoption agency matched A. with CH. The court denied KG standing to proceed and dismissed the petition for custody and visitation.

The Appellate Division observed that in Brooke, the Court of Appeals overruled Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991]) and abrogated Debra H. v. Janice R. (14 NY3d 576 [2010], cert denied 562 U.S. 1136 [2011]), its earlier precedents, thereby greatly expanding the definition of who can obtain status as a parent and have standing to seek custody and visitation of a child. The Brooke Court placed the burden of proving standing, by clear and convincing evidence, on the party seeking it. The Court recognized that there could be a variety of avenues for a movant to prove standing. It expressly rejected the premise that there is only one test that is appropriate to determine whether a former same-sex nonbiological, nonadoptive party has parental standing. In Brooke and its companion case of Matter of Estrellita A. v. Jennifer L.D., the Court of Appeals recognized each petitioner's status as a parent but did so applying two completely different tests. The Court of Appeals also left open the possibility that a third "test," involving the application of equitable principles, such as the doctrine of equitable estoppel, could be utilized to confer standing in certain circumstances. In Brooke, the Court of Appeals recognized that where a former same-sex partner shows by clear and convincing evidence that the parties had jointly agreed to conceive a child that one of them would bear, and also agreed to raise that child together once born, the nonbiological, nonadoptive partner has standing, as a parent, to seek custody and visitation with the child, even if the parties' relationship has ended. The Court referred to these circumstances as the parties having a preconception agreement and applied the "conception test"). In Estrellita, the Court resolved the question of standing differently, applying the doctrine of judicial estoppel. In Estrellita, the child's biological parent (Jennifer L.D.) had previously petitioned Family Court for an order requiring Estrellita A., the nonbiological, nonadoptive partner to pay child support. Jennifer L.D.'s support petition was granted and she was successful in obtaining child support from Estrellita A. Subsequently, Estrellita A. sought custody and visitation with the child, but Jennifer L.D. denied that Estrellita A. had standing as a parent. The Court of Appeals determined that Jennifer L.D. had asserted an inconsistent position in the support action, because Jennifer L.D. had successfully obtained a judgment of support in her favor and therefore, was judicially estopped denying Estrellita A.'s status as a parent given Family Court's prior determination that Estrellita A. was in fact, a legal parent to the child (id. at 29).

In deciding Brooke, the Court rejected the argument that it should adopt only one, uniform test to determine standing as a parent. The Court observed that a different test might be applicable in circumstances where, for instance, a partner did not have any preconception agreement with the legal parent. In Brooke it concluded that where a petitioner proves by clear and convincing evidence that he or she has agreed with the biological parent of the child to conceive and raise the child as co-parents, the petitioner has presented sufficient evidence to achieve standing to seek custody and visitation of the child.

The First Department held that although Brooke was decided in the context of children who were planned and conceived through means of artificial insemination, the Court's reasoning applies with equal force where, as here, a child is legally adopted by one partner and the other partner claims he or she is a "parent" with co-equal rights because of a preadoption agreement.

The Appellate Division found ample support in the record for the trial court's factual conclusion that the parties' 2007 agreement to adopt and raise a child together had terminated before A. was identified by the agency and offered to CH for adoption. Nor was the trial court's consideration of whether the plan was in effect at the time the particular child in this proceeding was identified for adoption an impermissible reformulation or restriction on the plan test originally enunciated in Brooke.

Although the original petition did not expressly state that KG was claiming standing under Domestic Relations Law § 70 under an alternative theory of equitable estoppel, the issue was raised early on in the proceeding by the trial court itself.

The Court found that the record was incomplete precluding it from reaching the merits of the parties' respective substantive claims on the issue of equitable estoppel on the appeal. It observed that equitable estoppel requires careful scrutiny of the child's relationship with the relevant adult and is ultimately based upon the best interest of the child. In the context of standing under Domestic Relations Law § 70, equitable estoppel concerns whether a child has a bonded and de facto parental relationship with a nonbiological, nonadoptive adult. The focus is and must be on the child (Brooke, 28 NY3d at 27). It is for this reason that the child's point of view is crucial whenever equitable estoppel is raised. Although the appointment of an attorney for the child is discretionary, it is commonplace and should be the norm where the issue raised is equitable estoppel. This is because equitable estoppel necessarily involves an analysis and determination of what is in the best interests of the child. Even if a court denies the appointment of an attorney for the child, there are alternative means to obtaining this information, including a forensic evaluation or a Lincoln hearing. Here, the child's voice was totally silent in this record.

In view of its conclusion that the record was incomplete, the Court did not reach CH's argument that because CH did not consent to holding KG out as a parent, KG cannot prove equitable estoppel. It only held that that the record developed at trial did not permit it to make the full consideration necessary to finally determine the issue of equitable estoppel at this point. Because the record on equitable estoppel was incomplete, it remanded the matter for further proceedings consistent with the decision.

Appellate Divison, Second Department

Income tax liability of the parties is subject to equitable distribution

In Greenberg v Greenberg, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 3041099, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 04539 (2d Dept., 2018) the parties were married in 1995 and had four children. During the marriage, the defendant owned an Internet-based business, which he sold in approximately January 2009. In June 2009, the Federal Trade Commission commenced a civil action against, among others, the defendant, in connection with the operation of his Internet company. In August 2009, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. In January 2014, the defendant was convicted in federal court of, among other things, wire fraud, aggravated identity theft, and money laundering. In the ongoing divorce action, Supreme Court conducted a hearing in June and July 2014 with respect to the parties' finances and equitable distribution. The defendant was sentenced in federal court on October 31, 2014, to seven years' imprisonment and ordered to pay restitution in the sum of $1,125,022.58.

After trial Supreme Court, inter alia, found that in all respects the defendant was not credible. It imputed an income of $100,000 per year to the defendant for the purposes of calculating child support obligations. As to equitable distribution, the court found that the only assets available for equitable distribution were two adjacent properties in Lawrence. The properties had been the marital residence and had no present value but might generate income. The court awarded the plaintiff the two properties upon considering a number of factors, including that the real estate was acquired during the marriage; the defendant's income increased substantially during the marriage, while the plaintiff delayed her own career advancement and remained at home caring for the parties' four children; the businesses, which were marital property and would have been subject to equitable distribution, could not be evaluated because the defendant failed to keep appropriate records; the defendant caused the businesses acquired and created during the marriage to be completely destroyed through his criminal activity; and it was likely that the defendant had transferred business assets without fair consideration. In light of the equitable distribution award and the circumstances of the case, the court declined to award the plaintiff maintenance. It also determined that the defendant would be responsible for any marital debt, including an FTC judgment against him for more than $2,000,000. Finally, the court awarded $50,000 to the plaintiff's attorney for outstanding counsel fees and $25,000 to the plaintiff for counsel fees previously paid by her, because the defendant had engaged in dilatory tactics and failed to comply with prior orders, causing the plaintiff to incur additional legal expenses. In an amended judgment of divorce entered February 6, 2015, the Supreme Court, among other things, directed the defendant to pay a pro rata share of child support and certain expenses of the children based on the imputed income, awarded the plaintiff the two properties, directed that the defendant would be responsible for any taxes, interest, penalties, and deficiencies that result as a direct consequence of his actions, and directed the defendant to pay the total sum of $75,000 in counsel fees to the plaintiff and her attorney. The defendant appeals.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that under the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion with regard to the awards. The Court observed that the income tax liability of the parties is subject to equitable distribution. Where a party "shared equally in the benefits derived from the failure to pay, she [or he] must share equally in the financial liability arising out of tax liability" (Conway v. Conway, 29 A.D.3d at 725-726, 815 N.Y.S.2d 233; see Lago v. Adrion, 93 A.D.3d at 700, 940 N.Y.S.2d 287). "However, if one spouse makes the financial decisions regarding the income tax return and earned virtually 100% of the parties' income during the period, the court, in its discretion, may direct that spouse to pay the entire tax liability". Here, the Supreme Court deemed the defendant responsible for, inter alia, all of the parties' tax liabilities incurred during the marriage, including the plaintiff's own failure to file tax returns for her personal income or to pay taxes on her income, of which failings she had reason to be aware by virtue of notices she received from the Internal Revenue Service. Under these circumstances, it was not equitable to hold the defendant, rather than the plaintiff, liable for any taxes, interest, penalties, and deficiencies that resulted from the plaintiff's failure to file income tax returns and to pay taxes on income that she individually earned during the marriage.

Family Court Suggests That Legislature Consider Revising Family Court Act §812 (3) To Balance the Root of Its Intent with What Has Become Its Perverted Application

In Matter of Maliha A., v. Onu M., 2018 WL 3074532 (Fam Ct., 2018) Ms. A. testified that she and Mr. M. had been dating on and off for approximately 5 years. She told the Court that in Fall of 2017, they had a difficult separation and there remained unresolved issues between them. She stated that when the parties ended their relationship, they agreed that they would no longer communicate with each other. Thereafter, Ms. A. posted a series of tweets on her Twitter account indicating that the two were never compatible and her life had improved since their breakup. Ms. A. testified that she never mentioned Mr. M.'s name in the Tweets but acknowledged that it would have been obvious to anyone that knew them that she had been referring to Mr. M. Ms. A. told the Court that after the texts were posted, Mr. M. texted her three times asking her to stop speaking about him on social media. She stated that she was puzzled as to why he would contact her if they had agreed not to communicate, and she deleted his texts immediately. Ms. A. testified that Mr. M.'s fiancé then contacted her to tell her that she was trying to calm Mr. M. because he was upset about the Tweets. Ms. A. stated that Mr. M.'s fiancé told her that she had been speaking with Mr. M. in an effort to keep the peace between him and Ms. A. Ms. A. told the Court that during that time period, her uncle sent her a screenshot of a text that Mr. M. had sent to him in which Mr. M. said, "it's a wrap." Ms. A. testified that she received that message poorly, believing that it was a threat, even though the text was not sent directly to her. Ms. A. testified that she wanted an order of protection against Mr. M. because "there is no telling what he might say or do." At the close of Ms. A.'s case, the Court dismissed her petition since Ms. A. did not meet her burden of proving conduct that rose to the level of a family offense.

Family Court observed that it did not appear that a non-violent, bad break-up was ever intended by the framers of the Family Court Act to be the basis for invoking the family court's authority to issue orders of protection where none are necessary. The Court noted that Family Court Act § 812(3) provides that no court official or law enforcement official "shall discourage or prevent any person who wishes to file a petition or sign a complaint from having access to any court for that purpose." The application of this statute nowadays allows individuals claiming to have some kind of "intimate" relationship to freely file, without vetting, family offense petitions on any set of alleged facts they wish, regardless of whether those facts, if actually proven, would ultimately make out a family offense. The unintended consequence is that family offense petitions can be filed on factual allegations by ex-girlfriends and ex-boyfriends that amount to nothing more than name-calling that results in hurt feelings, and disrespectful behavior manifested by ill-advised posts on social media or extreme text messages. It is time for the statute to be revisited in light of modern technology and the expansion of family court jurisdiction to "intimate relationships." All too often in these types of cases, the family court does not act as a legal authority but as an informal mediator, an unofficial "minister of bitter breakups," whose judicial function is to preside over the dissolution of a dating relationship that ends poorly, perhaps artlessly, but not criminally. Sometimes the apparent goal of the petitioner is not protection from, but rather a continued connection with, the respondent through repeated court proceedings that continue a temporary order of protection in their favor, thereby imposing a power dynamic placing the petitioner in control. At other times, the court is asked to mend the relationship so that the parties can start anew, or failing that, to bring some type of closure to a broken relationship. None of these functions are judicial in nature. The overburdened family court could certainly benefit from the Legislature's closer look at revising the statute to balance the root of its intent with what has become its perverted application.

Appellate Division, First Department

First Department Holds law firm not entitled to a money judgment against defendant, its former client, on a motion to fix charging lien pursuant to Judiciary Law § 475

In Bernard v De Rham, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2435717, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03891 (1st Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that the law firm was not entitled to a money judgment against defendant, its former client, on a motion pursuant to Judiciary Law § 475. Such a motion seeks a lien upon the client's cause of action, which does not provide for an immediately enforceable judgment against all his assets, but is a security interest against a single asset, i.e., a judgment or settlement in his favor. To obtain a money judgment, the law firm must commence a plenary action.

The Appellate Division further held that Judiciary Law § 475 does not preclude the attachment and enforcement of a charging lien on an award in his favor, which may include an award of legal fees from his ex-wife (citing Cohen v. Cohen, 160 A.D.2d 571, 572, 554 N.Y.S.2d 525 [1st Dept. 1990] [holding that “[a]lthough a charging lien does not attach to an award of alimony and maintenance, section 475 does not preclude the enforcement of such lien upon any other award made in the action”; Rosen v. Rosen, 97 A.D.2d 837, 468 N.Y.S.2d 723 [2nd Dept. 1983] [holding that “(w)hile a charging lien does not attach to an award of alimony and maintenance, section 475 of the Judiciary Law does not preclude the enforcement of such a lien upon another award made in the action, such as an award of counsel fees to either the client or subsequent counsel”])

Equitable Distribution of a Portion of a Contingency Fee That the Plaintiff Was Paid After Commencement of The Action for Work Performed Before Its Commencement

In Weidman v Weidman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2709520, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 04027 (2d Dept., 2018) the plaintiff and the defendant were married in 2000, and had one minor child. The plaintiff, who was admitted to the New York State Bar in 1986, was a solo practitioner with a general law practice. After the birth of the parties' child, the defendant did not return to her full-time teaching position but worked on a part-time basis earning approximately $30,000 annually. In September 2011, the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce and ancillary relief. The Appellate Division, among other things, saw no reason to disturb the Supreme Court's equitable distribution of a portion of a contingency fee that the plaintiff was paid after commencement of the action (see Block v. Block, 258 A.D.2d 324, 325, 685 N.Y.S.2d 443; Blechman v. Blechman, 234 A.D.2d 693, 695–696, 650 N.Y.S.2d 456). The plaintiff had agreed to accept a lump sum payment of $34,971, as well as a $240,000 structured settlement, as his attorney's fee in a case on which he worked from January 2004, through the beginning of January 2013. The court found that only the $240,000 structured settlement earned prior to commencement was marital property, to reflect that the defendant was not entitled to compensation for the work the plaintiff performed after the commencement of this action. The court properly determined that the defendant's equitable share of the structured settlement payments was 50%, and that her distributive award should be reduced by 15% to account for the plaintiff's income tax liability. Moreover, the plaintiff's contention that the court engaged in "double counting" by distributing a portion of the contingency fee to the defendant in addition to maintenance was without merit, as the plaintiff's income for purposes of determining maintenance was based on imputation of his income admitted for purposes of child support. The contingency fee in the form of a structured settlement was treated as a one-time bonus outside the $100,000 of imputed income.

Second Department Joins Third and Fourth Departments in Holding that Court may award visitation-physical access "as agreed by the parties"

In Matter of Samuel v Sowers, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2709799, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03984 (2d Dept., 2018) after a hearing, the Family Court granted the father's custody petition and awarded the mother physical access "as agreed amongst the parties." The Appellate Division affirmed observing that notwithstanding the litigation between these parties, the father expressed, both through his words and his actions, a strong commitment to ensuring physical access between the mother and the children. Under these circumstances, awarding the mother physical access "as agreed amongst the parties" was not an improvident exercise of discretion. It observed that should the mother be unable to obtain physical access by agreement, she may file a petition seeking to enforce or modify the order.

Doctrine of Judicial Estoppel, Also Known as Estoppel Against Inconsistent Positions, Bars Constructive Trust Action

In Bihn v Connelly, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2709955, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03956 (2d Dept., 2018) the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant Susan Connelly and her husband, inter alia, to impose a constructive trust on certain Chaucer Street property. The defendants moved for summary judgment dismissing the complaint, and to impose sanctions pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130-a.1(a). They contended that in 2011, the plaintiff represented in a bankruptcy petition that he had no interests in real property. Therefore, he was judicially estopped from contending that he had an interest in the Chaucer Street property. The Supreme Court granted the defendants' motion. The Appellate Division affirmed. It agreed with the Supreme Court's determination that the action was barred by the doctrine of judicial estoppel. Under the doctrine of judicial estoppel, also known as estoppel against inconsistent positions, a party may not take a position in a legal proceeding that is contrary to a position he or she took in a prior proceeding, simply because his or her interests have changed. The doctrine applies only where the party secured a judgment in his or her favor in the prior proceeding. This doctrine “rests upon the principle that a litigant ‘should not be permitted ... to lead a court to find a fact one way and then contend in another judicial proceeding that the same fact should be found otherwise’”. “The doctrine is invoked to estop parties from adopting such contrary positions because the judicial system cannot tolerate this playing fast and loose with the courts” (Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Colonial Funding Corp., 215 A.D.2d at 436, 626 N.Y.S.2d 527). Tthe plaintiff’s contention that he had an interest in the Chaucer Street property based on promises that Susan made to the plaintiff in 2007 and 2009 was contrary to his representation to the United States Bankruptcy Court in 2011 that he had no interest in real property. Based upon the plaintiff’s representations to the Bankruptcy Court, his debts were discharged. Therefore, the action was barred by the doctrine of judicial estoppel.

Moreover, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in awarding sanctions in the form of attorney’s fees and costs to the defendants upon a finding that the action was completely without merit in law and could not be supported by a reasonable argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Third Department Holds That Stepgrandparent Is Not Related to A Stepgrandchild By Marriage for Purposes of Family Ct. Act § 1056(4).

In Matter of Makayla I, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2726019, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 04047 (3d Dept.,2018) the order adjudicating the subject children to be abused and/or neglected was affirmed. Respondent Caleb K. was the father of Annabella J. (born 2009) and Caleb J. (born 2012), and the stepfather of Makayla I. (born 2004). Respondent Harold J. was Caleb K.’s father, and was the biological grandfather of Annabella J. and Caleb J. and the stepgrandfather of Makayla I. In December 2013, petitioner commenced a Family Ct Act article 10 proceeding against Caleb K., alleging that he allowed Harold J. to sexually abuse Makayla and derivatively abused the other two children. Petitioner thereafter commenced a Family Ct Act article 10 proceeding against Harold J., alleging that he sexually abused Makayla and derivatively abused the other two children. After a fact-finding hearing, Family Court held that Makayla was abused by Harold J. and Caleb K., Annabella was abused by Caleb K. and derivatively abused by Harold J., and Caleb J. was derivatively abused by both respondents. Following a dispositional hearing, the court issued three orders of protection barring Harold J. from having any contact with the children until their eighteenth birthdays. Harold J. appeals the fact-finding order and the orders of protection. Caleb K. appeals the fact-finding order only. The Appellate Division observed that Harold J. was not Makayla’s biological grandfather, but rather was related to her through his son’s marriage to Makayla’s mother. This raised the issue of whether a stepgrandparent is related to a stepgrandchild by marriage for the purposes of Family Ct. Act § 1056(4). The Appellate Division concluded that they are not. This conclusion was supported by the specific language in the statute, “related by ... marriage” (Family Ct. Act § 1056[4]), rather than the broader and more inclusive concept of “affinity,” which is used elsewhere in the Family Ct Act (cf. Family Ct. Act § 812[1][a]). Further, a stepgrandparent has no enforceable legal right to have contact with a stepgrandchild as a stepgrandparent lacks standing to pursue visitation. Thus, although Family Ct. Act § 1056(4) limits the duration of orders of protection against a stepparent who is related to a child by and through his or her own marriage to the child's mother or father, these limitations do not apply to a stepgrandparent, whose relationship to the child is attenuated. Therefore, because Harold J.'s relationship to Makayla was not established by his own marriage, but rather through his son's marriage, it was statutorily permissible, in this regard, for Family Court to issue an order of protection until Makayla's eighteenth birthday. Family Ct. Act § 1056(4) prohibits orders of protection until a child's eighteenth birthday if the order is against someone who is related by blood or marriage to a member of the child's household. Therefore, if, at the time of disposition, Makayla resided in the same household as Annabella and Caleb J., the order of protection as to Makayla could not exceed one year (see Family Ct. Act § 1056[4]). The matter must be remitted for the purpose of making this determination. The order adjudicating the subject children to be abused and/or neglected was affirmed.

Law of The Case Doctrine Forecloses Re-Examination of Holding That Petitioner Had Standing to Seek Custody or Visitation Absent A Showing of New Evidence or A Change in The Law.

In Matter of Renee P.-F v Frank G., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2425251, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03839 (2d Dept., 2018) Joseph P. and Frank G. were domestic partners., They asked Joseph's sister, Renee P.-F., to act as a surrogate. Renee executed a surrogacy contract in which she agreed to be impregnated with Frank's sperm and to terminate her parental rights in order for Joseph to adopt the child or children. In February 2010, Renee gave birth to fraternal twins. During the first four years of the children's lives, Joseph and Frank equally shared the rights and responsibilities of parenthood, although Joseph did not legally adopt the children. The children regarded both Joseph and Frank as their parents. During that period, Renee frequently saw the children. In early 2014, Joseph and Frank separated, and the children continued to reside with Frank. Joseph, acting in a parental role, visited and cared for the children on a daily basis. In May 2014, Frank suddenly refused to allow Joseph or Renee to have any access to the children. In December 2014, Frank moved to Florida with the children without informing Joseph or Renee or commencing a proceeding for custody of the children. Renee petitioned for custody of the children, and Joseph petitioned to be appointed guardian of the children. In March 2015, Frank petitioned for custody of the children and for permission to relocate with the children to Florida. In an order dated April 8, 2015, the Family Court denied that branch of Frank's motion which was for permission to relocate with the children to Florida. In June 2015, Joseph withdrew his guardianship petition and filed a petition for custody of the children. Frank then moved, in effect, to dismiss Joseph's custody petition on the ground, inter alia, that Joseph lacked standing under Domestic Relations Law § 70. In an order dated August 21, 2015, the court, after a hearing, denied Frank's motion to dismiss and determined that Joseph had standing to seek custody of or physical access with the children. Frank appealed from the orders dated April 8, 2015, and August 21, 2015. While Frank's appeals were pending, the Court of Appeals, in Matter of Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A.C.C., 28 N.Y.3d 1, 39 N.Y.S.3d 89, 61 N.E.3d 488, overruled Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M., 77 N.Y.2d 651, 569 N.Y.S.2d 586, 572 N.E.2d 27. Based upon the evidence adduced at the hearing before the Family Court and in light of Matter of Brooke S.B., the Appellate Division determined that Joseph established standing to seek custody or physical access and remitted the matter to the Family Court, Orange County, for a full hearing on the custody petitions (see Matter of Giavonna F.P.–G. [Frank G.–Renee P.–F.], 142 A.D.3d 931, 36 N.Y.S.3d 892; Matter of Frank G. v. Renee P.–F., 142 A.D.3d 928, 37 N.Y.S.3d 155). On remittitur, the Family Court, after a hearing, issued an order dated February 14, 2017, granting Joseph custody of the children and denying Frank’s petition. The Appellate Division held that Family Court properly determined that Joseph had standing to seek custody of the children pursuant to Matter of Brooke S.B., 28 N.Y.3d 1, 39 N.Y.S.3d 89, 61 N.E.3d 488. On Frank’s prior appeal from the order dated August 21, 2015, the Appellate Division determined that Joseph established standing to seek custody or physical access pursuant to the standard set forth in Matter of Brooke S.B. and remitted the matter to the Family Court, Orange County, for a full hearing on Joseph’s petition for custody or visitation with the children (see Matter of Frank G. v. Renee P.–F., 142 A.D.3d at 930–931, 37 N.Y.S.3d 890). “The law of the case doctrine foreclosed re-examination of issues decided on a prior appeal in the same action, absent a showing of new evidence or a change in the law”. Here, Frank had a full and fair opportunity before the Family Court and on the prior appeal to contest the issue of Joseph’s standing. Frank had neither presented new evidence that would change the determination in the prior appeal nor demonstrated that there had been a subsequent change in the law. Under these circumstances, Frank was barred from raising the same argument again on these appeals

Purpose of Counsel Fees Is to Prevent More Affluent Spouse from Considerably Wearing Down the Opposition. Court Should Not Unduly Rely Upon Financial Circumstances at Time of Decision Rather Than Weighing Historical and Future Earning Capacities of Both Parties

In Matter of Brookelyn M., v Christopher M., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2406234, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03801(1st Dept.,2018) the Appellant mother and respondent father had a child together. The father filed a custody petition in 2014. The mother cross-moved for custody and sought interim counsel fees. The father cross-moved for counsel fees and filed an affirmation in opposition to the mother’s application for interim counsel fees. The parties arrived at a settlement that resolved the issues in the custody matter, but left counsel fees to the court’s determination. The mother sought counsel fees of $174,000, which the mother claims are attributable to the custody matter. The court denied the mother’s request for counsel fees because, among other reasons, she retained private counsel although she was unemployed at the onset of the litigation. At the time the decision was rendered, she earned an annual gross income of $44,000, and the father was unemployed. The court also held that the conduct of the parties throughout the custody matter did not support an award of counsel fees because it found no evidence that the father unnecessarily prolonged the litigation or that he caused undue fees to accrue in the litigation. The Appellate Division remanded the matter for a fee hearing. It observed that the purpose of awarding counsel fees is to further the objectives of “litigational parity” and prevent a more affluent spouse from considerably wearing down the opposition. In its dismissal of the mother’s motion for counsel fees, the court unduly relied upon the financial circumstances of the parties at the time it rendered its decision rather than weighing the historical and future earning capacities of both parties. Although the father was unemployed at the time the court’s decision was rendered, and the mother had secured employment, the father earned considerably more than the mother during the course of their relationship and had significantly more expected earning capacity than the mother. The financial and tax documents in the record supported such a conclusion. However, the father was entitled to a hearing so that the relative financial positions of the parties and the value and extent of the counsel fees requested could be examined. While an evidentiary hearing is not required prior to making an interim award, it was required here since the mother was seeking fees following the final resolution of the case. The fees here were significant and the father has raised questions about the bills. Moreover, in assessing the father’s contentions that the mother overlitigated this matter, the court would need to consider what the father spent on legal fees. That information could not be ascertained on the record.

Consideration of Relevant Factors, Including Fact That Wife Was Suffering from Psychiatric Condition and was Unable, For Foreseeable Future, To Be Self-Supporting, Warranted Non-Durational Maintenance Award

In Greco v Greco, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2225174, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03510 (2d Dept., 2018) the parties were married in 1999 and had two children together. In May 2010, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. Following a custody trial, the Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff full custody of the children based upon the defendant’s psychiatric condition. Thereafter, a trial was held on the financial issues. The court, inter alia, awarded the defendant monthly maintenance in the sum of $4,500 for a period of three years and the sum of $114,555.50, representing her equitable share of the appreciated value of the marital residence. The Appellate Division held that, the amount of maintenance awarded by the Supreme Court was consistent with the purpose and function of a maintenance award considering, among other things, the equitable distribution award and the absence of child-rearing responsibilities because the plaintiff was awarded full custody of the children. However, taking into consideration all the relevant factors, including the fact that the defendant was suffering from a psychiatric condition and was unable, for the foreseeable future, to be self-supporting, it was an improvident exercise of the court’s discretion to limit the maintenance award to a period of three years. It modified the duration of the defendant’s maintenance should be until her remarriage or cohabitation, or the death of either party, or until the defendant begins to draw Social Security benefits or reaches the age of 67 or such age that she would qualify for full Social Security benefits, whichever occurs first, at which time the maintenance award would be reduced to $2,000 per month.

The Appellate Division held that similarly, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to direct the plaintiff to pay the defendant's health insurance premiums. The court should have directed the plaintiff to pay for the defendant's health insurance premiums until the earliest of such time as the defendant is eligible for Medicaid or Medicare, or she obtains health insurance through employment, or remarries or cohabitates.

Attorneys Failure to Send Client A Bill At Least Every 60 Days Warranted Denial of Post Trial Counsel Fee Application. Expert Fees May Not Be Awarded Where No Affidavit Submitted from Expert.

In Greco v Greco, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2225194, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03509 (2d Dept., 2018) following the conclusion of the trial on financial issues, the defendant moved for awards of counsel fees and expert witness fees. The court awarded counsel fees of $70,000 payable to Lawrence J. Glynn and $37,500 payable to John A. Gemelli, and expert witness fees of $12,700 payable to the defendant

The Appellate Division modified. It observed that court rules impose certain requirements upon attorneys who represent clients in domestic relations matters, and the failure to substantially comply with the rules will preclude an attorney's recovery of a fee from his or her client or from the adversary spouse. A showing of substantial compliance must be made on a prima facie basis as part of the moving party's papers. Here, the evidence proffered by the defendant in support of an award for work performed by Glynn demonstrated that Glynn failed to substantially comply with the rules requiring periodic billing statements at least every 60 days (see 22 NYCRR 1400.2, 1400.3[9]; Montoya v. Montoya, 143 A.D.3d at 866, 40 N.Y.S.3d 151; Rosado v. Rosado, 100 A.D.3d at 856, 955 N.Y.S.2d 119; Gahagan v. Gahagan, 51 A.D.3d 863, 859 N.Y.S.2d 218). Accordingly, Supreme Court erred in granting Glynn's counsel's fees.

The Appellate Division reversed the award of expert fees. It noted that absent affidavits from the expert witnesses at issue, the Supreme Court lacks a sufficient basis to grant a motion for the award of such fees. As the defendant failed to submit such expert affidavits Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant expert witness fees.

Court Found May Not Validate Illegal Surrogacy Contract by Approving Adoption. Family Court Holds That There Is No Authority for A Parent to Adopt Their Biological Child

In Matter of Adoption of A, 72 N.Y.S.3d 811, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 28088 (Fam Ct, 2018) J.G. ("Mr. G") filed a petition seeking to adopt his biological son, J., born on October 9, 2017. According to the petition, J. was conceived through a surrogacy arrangement in New York in which it was agreed that Mr. G would be J.'s only parent. The petition stated after transferring frozen embryos of an unknown egg donor into the surrogate's womb, Mr. G's sperm was used to artificially inseminate those embryos. Family Court denied the petition. It noted that, surrogacy was outlawed in New York. See DRL § 121 et seq., it is well-settled that a party to a surrogacy contract may not seek a court's assistance to enforce the agreement, nor will such contract be deemed viable for any other claims arising under its arrangement. See Itskov, 11 Misc. 3d at 69–70, 813 N.Y.S.2d 844. The court found that it may not validate a patently illegal surrogacy contract by approving Mr. G's adoption of J. Surrogacy agreement aside, the Court found that there is no authority for a parent to adopt their biological child. See DRL § 110; see also Matter of Zoe D.K., 26 A.D.3d 22, 25, 804 N.Y.S.2d 197 (4th Dep't 2005). DRL § 110 sets forth categories of persons who may adopt, and a natural parent does not fall within them. Mr. G's adoption of J. was unwarranted, and the Court declined to approve the adoption.

An Award of Counsel Fees Under DRL §§237 and 238 Cannot Be Made Merely to Punish A Party For Its Litigation Conduct

In Roddy v Roddy, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2049379, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03225 (1st Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the [Supreme Court which rejected the recommendation of the special referee that plaintiff not be required to reimburse defendant for counsel fees, and directed that plaintiff pay a portion of defendant's counsel fees. It pointed out that the Domestic Relations Law permits the court to direct a party to pay counsel fees "to enable the other party to carry on or defend the action or proceeding as, in the court's discretion, justice requires, having regard to the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties" . (DRL§ 237(a)) These provisions are intended "to ensure a just resolution of the issues by creating a more level playing field with respect to the parties' respective abilities to pay counsel and permit consideration of many factors, but focus primarily upon the paramount factor of financial need" (Silverman v. Silverman, 304 A.D.2d 41, 48, 756 N.Y.S.2d 14 [1st Dept. 2003]; Wells v. Serman, 92 A.D.3d 555, 555, 938 N.Y.S.2d 439 [1st Dept. 2012] [an award of counsel fees under these provisions "cannot be made merely to punish a party" for its litigation conduct]). Where a party's inappropriate litigation conduct has adversely affected the other party but both are able to pay their own counsel fees, the appropriate remedy may be a sanction (22 NYCRR 130–1.1), not an award of attorneys' fees. The court awarded legal fees to defendant based upon its consideration of the merits of plaintiff's positions in the parties' custody litigation. The court also adopted the special referee's findings that neither party was the "monied spouse," that each was capable of paying his or her own counsel fees, and that both parties are genuinely concerned for and "deeply care about their children." Under these circumstances, the award of counsel fees under the Domestic Relations Law was improper (Wells v. Serman, 92 A.D.3d 555, 938 N.Y.S.2d 439).

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

When Supreme Court exercises jurisdiction over a matter which Family Court might have exercised jurisdiction, it is required to advise an unrepresented party of right to have counsel assigned by the court where he or she is financially unable to obtain the same.

In DiBella v DiBella, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2048993, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03186 (3d Dept., 2018) the mother appealed from the divorce judgment contending that she was deprived of her statutory right to counsel when Supreme Court compelled her to proceed with the continuation of trial without the aid of counsel. The mother was represented by counsel at the first four days of trial in May, June and July 2014. In October 2014, however, the mother appeared before Supreme Court and indicated that she was discharging her attorney and intended to hire replacement counsel to represent her for the remainder of the trial. The mother represented to Supreme Court that she would need at least two or three months to make arrangements for hiring a new attorney because the normal retainer for an attorney was $3,000. Supreme Court thereafter cautioned the mother to procure new counsel “sooner rather than later.” Supreme Court adjourned the case and scheduled two additional trial dates on May 27, 2015 and June 3, 2015. On May 27, 2015, the mother appeared in court, explaining that, although she had retained new counsel, he was unable to attend that day and, therefore, she requested the court to “extend” or “hold off” proceeding with the continuation of the trial until June 3, 2015. Supreme Court denied the mother’s request for an adjournment, indicating that no notice of appearance had been filed by the mother’s replacement counsel and that it could not rely solely upon her statement that she may be represented by counsel going forward. Supreme Court then proceeded with the trial, informing the mother that, under the circumstances, she was going to have to proceed pro se.

The Appellate Division observed that pursuant to Judiciary Law § 35(8), when Supreme Court exercises “jurisdiction over a matter which the [F]amily [C]ourt might have exercised jurisdiction had such action or proceeding been commenced in [F]amily [C]ourt or referred thereto pursuant to law,” Supreme Court is required to abide by the requirements set forth in Family Ct Act § 262 (see Carney v. Carney, ---A.D.3d ----, ----, --- N.E.3d ----, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02034, *3 [2018]) Family Ct Act § 262(a) provides, in relevant part, that a parent of any child seeking custody must be advised “before proceeding that he or she has the right to be represented by counsel of his or her own choosing, of the right to have an adjournment to confer with counsel, and of the right to have counsel assigned by the court in any case where he or she is financially unable to obtain the same” (see Family Ct Act § 262[a][v]). The deprivation of a party’s statutory right to counsel “requires reversal, without regard to the merits of the unrepresented party’s position. There was nothing in the record to indicate that Supreme Court ever advised the mother of her rights pursuant to Family Ct Act § 262(a). It was incumbent upon the court—particularly in light of the mother’s expressed need for several months to obtain the necessary retainer fee—to advise her of the right to assigned counsel in the event that she could not afford same. In the absence of the requisite statutory advisement of her right to counsel (see Family Ct Act § 262[a][v]) or a valid waiver of such right the mother was deprived of her fundamental right to counsel (see Family Ct Act §§ 261, 262[a][v]; Judiciary Law § 35[8]. Under the circumstances, it remitted the matter to Supreme Court for a new trial on the issues of custody, visitation and child support.

Courts Failure to Comply with DRL § 75-i [2] and DRL § 75-i [4] requires reversal of Custody determination regarding Jurisdiction.

In Matter of Beyer v Hofmann, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 2075877, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 03259 (4th Dept., 2018) the children were born in New York and lived with both parties in New York until December 29, 2015, when the parties moved with the children to State College, Pennsylvania. In April 2016 the children and respondent mother moved to York, Pennsylvania without the father, and the father thereafter returned to New York. He commenced a proceeding on June 6, 2016, and the mother commenced a custody proceeding in Pennsylvania on August 9, 2016. The Appellate Division observed that under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), adopted by New York (Domestic Relations Law art 5-A) and Pennsylvania (23 Pa Cons Stat Ann § 5401 et seq.), Family Court had jurisdiction to make an initial custody determination at the time the father commenced the instant proceeding (see Domestic Relations Law §§ 75-a [7]; 76[1][a]) and Pennsylvania had such jurisdiction at the time the mother commenced the proceeding in that state (see 23 Pa Cons Stat Ann §§ 5402, 5421[a][1]). It held that Family Court erred in declining to exercise jurisdiction and dismissing the proceeding without following the procedures required by the UCCJEA. The court, after determining that another child custody proceeding had been commenced in Pennsylvania, properly communicated with the Pennsylvania court (see Domestic Relations Law § 76-e [2]). The court erred, however, in failing either to allow the parties to participate in the communication (see § 75-i [2]), or to give the parties “the opportunity to present facts and legal arguments before a decision on jurisdiction [was] made” (§ 75-i [2]). The court also violated the requirements of the UCCJEA when it failed to create a record of its communication with the Pennsylvania court (see § 75-i [4]). The summary and explanation of the court’s determination following the telephone conference with the Pennsylvania court did not comply with the statutory mandate to make a record of the communication between courts.

The Appellate Division found that there were insufficient facts in the record to make a determination, (see Domestic Relations Law § 76-f [2][a] -[h]), regarding which state was the more convenient forum to resolve the issue of custody. It reversed the order, reinstated the petition and remit the matter to Family Court for further proceedings on the petition. It noted that the events subsequent to the entry of the order it was reversing may be relevant to and can be considered on remittal (Andrews, 44 A.D.3d at 1111, 844 N.Y.S.2d 147).

Supreme Court

[[International Child Abduction][Hague Convention] Dominican Republic] [Habitual Residence][Grave risk of harm]

In LM v JF, 2018 WL 2171080 (Sup. Ct., 2018) the Court granted the mothers Hague Convention Petition for an order directing the return of the parties son to the Dominican Republic.

The parties were never married. The Mother was a citizen of the Dominican Republic and the Father was a citizen of the United States. The parties met in 2010 in the Dominican Republic where both were enrolled in medical school. The Child was born in the Dominican Republic, was raised in the Dominican Republic and spent time each year visiting the Father's family whom resided in Levittown, New York. Prior to the Child's first visit to the United States the parties obtained a United States passport and United States citizenship for the Child. During a stay in New York in or about April, 2013, the parties obtained a social security card on behalf of the Child listing the Levittown, New York, address as the Child's residence.

The Mother graduated from medical school in 2011. In August, 2014, the Mother left for Rochester, New York to begin studies for a Masters Degree while the Father remained in the Dominican Republic with the Child. The Mother visited the Child and communicated with the Child via "Skype" while in Rochester. In August of 2015, the Father learned that the Mother had become romantically involved with another man while in Rochester, New York. The Mother completed her Master's Degree and returned to the Dominican Republic in February, 2016. Upon her return, the Mother stated that the Father did not allow her to see the Child until four days later. She sought the assistance of the Dominican Republic courts and the parties agreed to an "informal arrangement" where the Mother would be permitted to spend time with the Child. In March, 2016, the Mother filed documents with the authorities in the Dominican Republic to prevent the Father from leaving the Country with the Child without her consent. On March 15, 2016, there was an altercation between the parties wherein the Father alleged the Mother had pushed her way inside his home and physically lunged at him. The parties returned to court and obtained a reciprocal "order of protection."

On October 19, 2016, both parties, while represented by counsel, appeared in court and agreed to an order wherein they would equally share time with the Child. On November 30, 2016, the Father, the Child and the Paternal Grandmother, traveled to the Father's parent's home in Levittown, New York, with no intention of returning. On December 5, 2016, the Father filed a custody petition in Family Court which granted the Father's application for sole legal and residential custody of the Child upon the default of the Mother. The Mother commenced this proceeding on August 23, 2017 by Order to Show Cause seeking an Order directing the Child's return to the Dominican Republic.

Supreme Court found that the Dominican Republic was the child's habitual residence under the analysis established by Gitter v. Gitter, 396 F.3d 124, 133 (2d Cir. 2005) as follows: "First, the court should inquire into the shared intent of those entitled to fix the child's residence (usually the parents) at the latest time that their intent was shared. In making this determination the court should look, as always in determining intent, at actions as well as declarations. Normally the shared intent of the parents should control the habitual residence of the child. Second, the court should inquire whether the evidence unequivocally points to the conclusion that the child has acclimatized to the new location and thus has acquired a new habitual residence, notwithstanding any conflict with the parents' latest shared intent."

Based upon the testimony the court concluded that, the Dominican Republic was the Child's habitual residence. Although the Child enjoyed frequent visits to New York where he stayed in the home of the Father's parents, the majority of his life was spent in the Dominican Republic. It was where his home was, where he attended preschool, where he attended church and where his medical doctors were. There is a distinction to be made between a child who goes somewhere for a temporary duration and a child permanently moving to a new location. A Child who goes somewhere for a temporary duration, such as summer camp, is not considered to have acquired a new habitual residence because "he already has an established habitual residence elsewhere and his absence from it—even from an entire summer—is not indication that he means to abandon it." Gitter v. Gitter, 396 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2005) (quoting Mozes v. Mozes, 239 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2001)). There was no evidence that the Child unequivocally acclimated to a location other than the Dominican Republic so as to allow the Court to disregard the intent of the parties. The fact that Child may have acclimated to the United States from the time he was removed on November 30, 2016 until now is not the acclimation intended under this habitual resident analysis: The change in geography must occur before the questionable removal; here, the removal precipitated the change in geography. If we were to determine that by removing Thomas from his habitual residence without Mr. Friedrich's knowledge or consent Ms. Friedrich 'altered' Thomas's habitual residence, we would render the Convention meaningless." (Friedrich v. Friedrich, 983 F.2d 1396 (6th Cir. 1993) Supreme Court also found that the Mother had rights of custody at the time the Father and Child left the country and she was exercising her custody rights when the Child was removed. It found that the Mother had met her burden and established by a preponderance of the evidence that the Child was wrongfully removed from his place of habitual residence.

Supreme Court noted that with regard to the grave risk of harm defense the parent opposing the Child's return must show that the risk to the child is grave, not just serious, and the harm must be more than a potential harm. There must be a direct threat to the Child upon his return to the Dominican Republic in order for this exception to apply. The Court considered the testimony of the Father and the Paternal Grandmother regarding allegations that the Mother abused or neglected the Child and that the Dominican Republic authorities did not satisfactorily address these allegations. The Father presented photographs of the Child depicting unclean fingernails, an ear infection, mosquito bites, scabbing, cuts, burns and rashes. The Father testified that was the condition the Child was in when he returned from the Mother's care in 2016. The Father testified that he went to court representatives with the Child, to the police and to child protective services but that no assistance was provided to him. The Father did not provide any records of said reports. On cross examination, the Father testified that the child is considered to be hypersensitive to mosquito bites and that the scars on his body were caused by scratching scabies. He testified that the Child had only one ear infection and although he did not know with certainty what caused it, he concluded it was the Mother's fault. The Child's medical records were reviewed and the Father testified that the pediatrician's records stated that the Child was regularly brought to his office as a healthy child who was at times afflicted by allergies to insect bites. There was no mention of any burns or any child abuse. The Father testified that since November, 2017, the Child cried, screamed and begged the Father to not make him see the Mother before the Mother's parenting time. He testified that the Child returned from visits with the Mother angry and sad. The Father also testified that he did not believe the court in the Dominican Republic did or would do anything about his concerns. However, the Father offered no credible evidence that the courts failed to act on a legitimate threat to safety of the Child. He offered no basis for this Court to conclude that the Dominican Republic authorities had not and will not act in the best interests of the Child.

The Father offered the testimony of an expert in the field of forensic evaluations and children's mental health who never interviewed or observed the Mother. She concluded that the Child was suffering trauma due to the relationship with the Mother but testified that the cause of that trauma could not be clinically ascertained. On cross examination, the witness testified that the trauma could be because the Child was used to being with both of his parents, or it could be because he did not see the Mother, or it could be some other reason. The Court was not convinced that the Child's reaction to the mention of the Mother was because of abuse or neglect at the hands of the Mother. The expert agreed on cross examination that while she believed the Child's trauma related to the Mother, it could be because of the trauma of the removal or some other reason.

The Court found that the Child's comfort in his current environment was not a basis for the Child to remain in the United States. Whatever re-adjustment period the Child may have to undergo in the Dominican Republic is not considered a "grave harm" under the Convention. It is well established that the "harm" set forth in the grave harm exception must be "greater than would normally be expected on taking a child away from one parent and passing him to another." Madrigal v. Tellez, 848 F.3d 669 (5th Cir. 2017); Nunez-Escudero, 58 F.3d 374 (8th Cir. 1995).

The Court held that the Father had not established, by clear and convincing evidence, that the Child will be subjected to a grave risk of harm if he returned to the Dominican Republic or any other affirmative defense.

Family Court Act §812 (1) amended

The opening paragraph of Family Court Act §812 (1) has been amended to add coercion in the third degree as one of the crimes that constitutes a family offense. It now reads as follows:

The family court and the criminal courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction over any proceeding concerning acts which would constitute disorderly conduct, harassment in the first degree, harassment in the second degree, aggravated harassment in the second degree, sexual misconduct, forcible touching, sexual abuse in the third degree, sexual abuse in the second degree as set forth in subdivision one of section 130.60 of the penal law, stalking in the first degree, stalking in the second degree, stalking in the third degree, stalking in the fourth degree, criminal mischief, menacing in the second degree, menacing in the third degree, reckless endangerment, criminal obstruction of breathing or blood circulation, strangulation in the second degree, strangulation in the first degree, assault in the second degree, assault in the third degree, an attempted assault, identity theft in the first degree, identity theft in the second degree, identity theft in the third degree, grand larceny in the fourth degree, grand larceny in the third degree, coercion in the second degree or coercion in the third degree as set forth in subdivisions one, two and three of section 135.60 of the penal law between spouses or former spouses, or between parent and child or between members of the same family or household except that if the respondent would not be criminally responsible by reason of age pursuant to section 30.00 of the penal law, then the family court shall have exclusive jurisdiction over such proceeding. Notwithstanding a complainant's election to proceed in family court, the criminal court shall not be divested of jurisdiction to hear a family offense proceeding pursuant to this section. In any proceeding pursuant to this article, a court shall not deny an order of protection, or dismiss a petition, solely on the basis that the acts or events alleged are not relatively contemporaneous with the date of the petition, the conclusion of the fact-finding or the conclusion of the dispositional hearing. For purposes of this article, "disorderly conduct" includes disorderly conduct not in a public place. For purposes of this article, "members of the same family or household" shall mean the following:

Mother's Summer Visitation Reduced, Due to Child's Changing Circumstances, as he Grew Older

In Miller v Shaw, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1734617, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02471 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division found that the child's changing needs as he grew older constituted a change in circumstances warranting modification of the visitation schedule so as to reduce the mother's summer visitation with the child. It noted, among other things, that a child's expressed preference, while not determinative, may also be indicative of the child's best interests. In weighing this factor, the court must consider the age and maturity of the child and the potential for influence having been exerted on the child. Despite expressing his love for his mother and his desire not to hurt her, the child unequivocally expressed his desire not to have extended visitation with the mother, articulating legitimate reasons in support of this preference. The child noted his schooling and preparation for college, as well as the numerous activities in which he participates in Florida, as some of the reasons why he wanted to spend less time in New York. The child was 16 years old and had a notable level of maturity, which clearly enabled him to form and express his own desires, and there is nothing in the record to indicate that influence was exerted on him by anyone. Accordingly, the Family Court's determination was supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record.

Respondents Statement That He Would "Kick [The Petitioner's] Ass" Is Not A Family Offense

In Benjamin v Benjamin, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1833135, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02631 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division reversed an order which determined that the appellant, the child's grandfather, in effect, had committed the family offense of harassment in the second degree and issued an order of protection. It found that petitioner failed to establish by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the appellant, in effect, committed the family offense of harassment in the second degree. The testimony at the hearing established only that the appellant stated that he would "kick [the petitioner's] ass" when he saw him on the street. Such conduct does not establish the family offense of harassment in the second degree as there was no evidence that the statement was "either serious [or] should reasonably have been taken to be serious" (People v. Dietze, 75 N.Y.2d 47, 53, 550 N.Y.S.2d 595, 549 N.E.2d 1166).

Court Has No Authority To Modify Unincorporated Settlement Agreement.

In Abdelrahman v Mahdi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1864537, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02698 (3d Dept, 2018) while an action for a divorce was pending the parties executed a written agreement adopting an oral stipulation that had been placed on the record providing for payment of child support and durational maintenance, and subsequently executed an addendum. On March 7, 2016, the husband an affidavit in support of a motion seeking a reduction, and temporary suspension, of his child support and maintenance obligations on the basis that he had been terminated from his employment in February 2016. The agreement and the addendum each provided for incorporation, without merger, in the judgment of divorce; however, neither an order governing child support and maintenance nor a judgment of divorce had been entered when the husband made his motion or when the wife served her answering papers. The Appellate Division reversed the order of Supreme Court while found that the husband did not cause the loss of his employment and that he had been diligently seeking employment and granted the husband's motion to the extent of suspending his child support and maintenance obligations for 90 days or until he secured employment, whichever first occurred, and forgiving all arrears that had accrued prior to August 11, 2016—the date that the hearing was held. It held that inasmuch as the record did not establish the existence of an order governing child support and maintenance or a judgment of divorce, the separation agreement was the sole source of the husband's obligation to pay child support and maintenance. On this record, there was no valid basis for Supreme Court to suspend the husband's contractual obligation to pay child support and maintenance. The husband sought modification of the terms of the agreement with respect to his child support and maintenance obligations, by motion, on the ground that his loss of employment constituted a change in circumstances that warranted modification—a standard that applies to modification of orders and judgments (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][9][b])—but he made no argument that the settlement agreement was invalid. Supreme Court may, upon a proper showing establishing a change in circumstances, modify an order or judgment of divorce that incorporates a settlement agreement. However, the court had no authority under the present circumstances to grant the husband's motion by modifying the settlement agreement.

First Department Holds Support Magistrate Acted Outside Bounds of Authority When, He Deferred Issue of a Recommendation as To the Father's Incarceration to A "Post-Dispositional Hearing"

In Matter of Carmen R. v Luis I, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1720655, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02422 (1st Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate acted outside the bounds of his authority when, after issuing a written fact-finding order in which he determined that the father had willfully violated a child support order, he deferred the issue of a recommendation as to the father's incarceration to a "post-dispositional hearing." The Support Magistrate's decision contravened Family Court Rule § 205.43(g)(3), which states that, upon a finding of willful violation, the findings of fact shall include "a recommendation whether the sanction of incarceration is recommended," and Rule § 205.43(f), which requires that the written findings be issued within five court days after completion of the hearing. Here, instead of issuing such recommendation in his March 7, 2017 fact-finding order after completion of the hearing on the violation petition that day, the Support Magistrate improperly set the matter down for "post-dispositional review" to commence on May 1, 2017, 54 days later. That hearing lasted several months. During this time, the father continued to violate the support order. The Family Court then compounded the Support Magistrate's error of law by denying the mother's objections as premature, leaving her with no recourse to effectively challenge the further delay that ensued.

The Family Court denied the mother's objections to the Support Magistrate's fact-finding order because it found that the order was not "final." The order cited Family Court Act Section 439(e), which permits objections to a "final" order of a Support Magistrate, and Section 439(a), which provides that a "determination by a Support Magistrate that a person is in willful violation of an order ... and that recommends commitment ... shall have no force and effect until confirmed by a judge of the court." This was error. First, under the plain language of the statute, the Support Magistrate's fact-finding order was not an order that "shall have no force and effect until confirmed by a judge of the court," since it did not recommend incarceration. The Support Magistrate's failure to make a recommendation as to incarceration upon his finding of willfulness essentially constituted a recommendation against incarceration, since the mother could not seek that remedy without a recommendation from the Support Magistrate. Moreover, the parties were entitled to a complete written fact-finding order, including a recommendation as to incarceration, within five court days following completion of the hearing on the mother's violation petition (22 NYCRR § 205.43[f], [g]). Accordingly, the Family Court should have considered the mother's objections, and, upon doing so, should have exercised its authority to remand the matter to the Support Magistrate for an immediate recommendation as to incarceration, or to make, with or without holding a new hearing, its own findings of fact and order based on the record (Family Court Act § 439[e]).

The Family Court's order cited to trial court cases finding that Family Court may consider objections to nonfinal orders where irreparable harm would result from denial of permission to file such objections. It nevertheless found that "a delay in the disposition of a violation of child support petition is not an irreparable harm." However, under the circumstances of this case, the mother made a prima facie showing that she suffered irreparable harm. A litigant has a right to bring a violation petition to an expeditious final disposition (Family Court Act § 439-a). The mother was deprived of the "expedited process" guaranteed by statute and the Family Court Rules when the support magistrate conducted protracted unauthorized "post-dispositional" proceedings.

Wife Carried Burden of Raising Material Issue of Fact to Defeat Husbands Motion for Summary Judgment with Regard to Validity of Prenuptial Agreement. Concurring Opinion Says Court Established Dramatically Lower Standard for Challenging Prenuptial Agreements.

In Carter v Fairchild-Carter, 2018 WL 1525180 (3d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division found that the wife carried her burden of raising a material issue of fact to defeat the husband's motion for summary judgment with regard to the validity of the parties prenuptial agreement. In opposition to the husband's motion, the wife submitted an affidavit in which she stated that shortly before the wedding day, the husband presented her with a prenuptial agreement. The wife, on the advice of her counsel, told the husband that she could not sign it or marry him unless he made some changes—namely, that she would get half the value of the land and house where they resided and 50% of everything they acquired during the marriage. The wife further averred that, on "the very day before the wedding" and as she was making final preparations for the wedding, the husband presented her with a revised prenuptial agreement, told her that he had made the requested changes and assured her that she would be taken care of for the rest of her life. The wife stated that she was given this new prenuptial agreement while standing outside the County Clerk's office and that the husband "didn't really give [her] time to even read the document, let alone take it back to the lawyer to look at it again." She stated that she was feeling stressed and pressured with the wedding planning and "just signed the document." It held that these facts, if credited, give rise to the inference of overreaching (citing Leighton v. Leighton, 46 A.D.3d 264, 265, 847 N.Y.S.2d 64 [2007]). Accordingly, Supreme Court properly denied the husband's summary judgment motion.

Justice Rumsey, concurring, expressed his concern that at the majority's determination that the wife met her burden based upon allegations that she was pressured into signing the prenuptial agreement on the day prior to the wedding without reading it established a dramatically lower standard for challenging prenuptial agreements that contravenes our long-standing precedent. He observed that the Court had upheld the validity of a prenuptial agreement that was executed under circumstances strikingly similar to those that the majority holds may now be used to establish overreaching—namely, (1) the husband requested the prenuptial agreement, (2) the agreement was prepared by the husband's attorney at his direction,(3) the agreement was executed only a few hours prior to the parties' wedding, and (4) the wife did not read the agreement or seek to have it reviewed by her counsel before she signed it (Matter of Garbade, 221 A.D.2d 844, 845, 633 N.Y.S.2d 878 [1995], lv denied 88 N.Y.2d 803, 645 N.Y.S.2d 446, 668 N.E.2d 417 [1996]). It found that such circumstances established “nothing more than [the wife’s] own dereliction in failing to acquaint herself with the provisions of the agreement and to obtain the benefit of independent legal counsel[, and a]lthough this dereliction may have caused her to be ignorant of the precise terms of the agreement, the fact remains that, absent fraud or other misconduct, parties are bound by their signatures” He further noted that the case on which the majority primarily relied in finding that the wife’s allegations regarding the circumstances surrounding execution of the agreement on the eve of the wedding establish the existence of overreaching—Leighton v. Leighton, 46 A.D.3d 264, 265, 847 N.Y.S.2d 64 [2007], appeal dismissed 10 N.Y.3d 739, 853 N.Y.S.2d 281, 882 N.E.2d 894 (2008)—was a 3–2 decision of the First Department that, in his view, contravened the Courts own precedent.

Use of Funds Withdrawn from Account That Is Separate Property to Pay Marital Expenses Does Not Change the Character of The Account to Marital Property.

In Giannuzzi v Kearney, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1629752, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02378 (3d Dept., 2018) Plaintiff (wife) and defendant (husband) were married in 1998 and had no children. In 2013, the wife commenced this action for divorce. Prior to the marriage, the wife inherited IBM stock from her grandfather worth in excess of $1 million. Supreme Court granted the wife a divorce and, in relevant part, determined that the wife’s IBM stock was her separate property.

The Appellate Division rejected the husband’s contention on appeal that Supreme Court erred in determining that the wife’s IBM stock was her separate property. Property acquired by a spouse prior to the marriage is separate property, unless it is transmuted into marital property during the course of the marriage (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][1][d]; Spera v. Spera, 71 A.D.3d 661, 664, 898 N.Y.S.2d 548 [2010]; Sherman v. Sherman, 304 A.D.2d 744, 744, 758 N.Y.S.2d 667 [2003]). The IBM stock, including any reinvestment thereof, remained in accounts maintained exclusively in the wife’s name throughout the marriage. It rejected his argument that the IBM stock became marital property because the parties filed joint income tax returns reporting income derived from the IBM stock, the parties utilized dividends received from the IBM stock to maintain the marital standard of living, and the IBM stock was pledged as collateral to secure the loan that the parties obtained to finance the purchase of several of the Florida properties.

The Appellate Division noted that a party to litigation is precluded from taking a position contrary to affirmative elections or representations made on an income tax return that are material to the characterization or taxation of any income derived from the separate property (see Mahoney–Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 N.Y.3d 415, 422, 881 N.Y.S.2d 369, 909 N.E.2d 62 [2009]; Winship v. Winship, 115 A.D.3d 1328, 1330, 984 N.Y.S.2d 247 [2014]). For example, income realized from the sale, during the marriage, of corporate stock that was separate property was properly classified as marital property because it had been reported on a federal income tax return as ordinary income, rather than as capital gains realized upon the sale of an asset, and income earned during the marriage is marital property (see Mahoney–Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 N.Y.3d at 422, 881 N.Y.S.2d 369, 909 N.E.2d 62). Similarly, the argument that a farm was separate property because it had been inherited by one spouse in 2010 was inconsistent with the fact that the parties had depreciated property and equipment used to operate the farm on joint returns that they filed from 2000 through 2008, because a party cannot depreciate property that he or she does not own (see Winship v. Winship, 115 A.D.3d at 1329–1330, 984 N.Y.S.2d 247). By contrast, the mere reporting of income earned from the separate assets of one spouse on a joint return does not transmute the separate property to marital property because both spouses are required to report all of their income, whatever the source, on a joint return. It agreed that a contrary rule “would force married persons to file separate income tax returns, and to pay higher income taxes, simply to protect the non-marital status of their separate property” (Holden v. Holden, 667 So.2d 867, 869 [Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1996]). Here, the wife’s assertion that the IBM stock was her separate property was not contrary to any position that she had taken by reporting income derived from her IBM stock on the parties’ joint income tax returns as dividends and capital gains.

It is also well-settled that the use of funds withdrawn from an account that is separate property to pay marital expenses does not change the character of the account to marital property. Thus, the use of dividends earned on the wife’s IBM stock to pay marital expenses was insufficient to transform the stock to marital property. Similarly, the pledge of the IBM stock as collateral for the loan used to acquire several parcels of real property located in Florida did not transmute all or any portion of the stock to separate property. This conclusion is illustrated by the fact that a spouse who contributes separate property toward the purchase of a marital asset, or whose separate property is used to pay a marital debt that was incurred to acquire a marital asset, is entitled to a credit for the separate property contribution.

Court Rules

Appellate Divisions Adopt Uniform Rules for Practice

“Practice Rules of the Appellate Division” have been Approved by Joint Order of the Departments of the New York State Supreme Court, Appellate Division on December 12, 2017. The Practice Rules are effective September 15, 2018.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Separation agreement evidencing parties’ agreement to live separate and apart complies with Domestic Relations Law § 110 requirements for adoption.

In Matter of Jason, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1404086, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01922 (2d Dept, 2018) the petitioner commenced a proceeding to adopt her grandson, who was placed with her in foster care and freed for adoption. The SCO Family of Services, which placed the child with the petitioner, approved the adoption. The petitioner had been separated from her spouse since June 2016, and a separation agreement was executed by the petitioner and her spouse and duly acknowledged on May 12, 2017. The Family Court determined that the separation agreement was insufficient to comply with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law § 110 because it was merely an agreement by the parties to live separately and apart and did not contain any substantive provisions settling marital issues. The court concluded that the petitioner lacked standing under Domestic Relations Law § 110 to adopt without her spouse and dismissed the petition without prejudice based on lack of standing. The Appellate Division reversed. It noted that Domestic Relations Law § 110 dictates who has standing to adopt. As relevant here, an “adult married person who is living separate and apart from his or her spouse ... pursuant to a written agreement of separation subscribed by the parties thereto and acknowledged or proved in the form required to entitle a deed to be recorded ... may adopt another person” without his or her spouse (Domestic Relations Law § 110). The court noted that a separation agreement may contain substantive provisions settling marital issues such as equitable distribution and maintenance. However, the agreement is ‘simply intended as evidence of the authenticity and reality of the separation. Thus, for example, where the substantive provisions of a separation agreement have been invalidated as unconscionable, the agreement “generally ... may still be accepted for the sole purpose of evidencing the parties’ agreement to live separate and apart, thus satisfying the statutory requirement in respect to a separation agreement” in providing grounds for a conversion divorce under Domestic Relations Law § 170(6) (Christian v. Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 70). Here, the separation agreement evidenced the parties’ agreement to live separate and apart; it was in writing, subscribed by the parties thereto, and acknowledged in the form required to entitle a deed to be recorded (see Domestic Relations Law § 110). Therefore, it satisfied the statutory requirement of the adoption statute with respect to a separation agreement.

Statements made during preliminary conference are not admissible at fact-finding hearing on order of protection

In Almaguer v Almaguer, 2018 WL 1404102 (Mem), 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01916 (Mem) (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division reversed an order of protection granted to the wife and remitted for a new hearing. The parties were married, lived together for over 20 years, and were the parents of three children. The wife commenced a proceeding by filing a petition alleging, inter alia, that the husband committed the family offense of harassment in the second degree by threatening to kill her if she filed for divorce. The Appellate Division held that in making its determination, the Family Court erred in considering and relying upon statements made by the husband during a preliminary conference and in proceedings prior to the hearing. Statements made during a preliminary conference are not admissible at a fact-finding hearing (see Family Ct Act § 824). Moreover, the court may not rely upon evidence of an incident not charged in the petition in sustaining a charge of harassment (see Matter of Czop v. Czop, 21 A.D.3d 958, 801 N.Y.S.2d 63).

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Courts may not impute income to a party in determining the party's eligibility for assigned counsel.

In Carney v Carney, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1441079, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02034 (4th Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that courts may not impute income to a party in determining the party's eligibility for assigned counsel.

Defendant appeared pro se and requested that counsel be appointed for him given his status as an unemployed graduate student and his lack of a full-time job. Defendant admitted that his living expenses were "next to nothing," except for his car payment and insurance, because he had been residing with his parents for 6½ years. The court expressed reservation about appointing counsel because of defendant's advanced degree and demonstrated "high level of skills," stated that its "obligation is to protect the taxpayers of this state," and questioned whether it could impute income to defendant before making a decision on his request for assigned counsel. The court determined that there was no authority restricting its ability to impute income to an applicant for assigned counsel. The court then created a framework for an adversarial hearing by appointing the Public Defender's Office to represent defendant for the limited purpose of supporting his application for assigned counsel and appointing special counsel to present the facts in favor of imputation. The court ordered an evidentiary hearing to determine defendant's eligibility for assigned counsel based on any imputed income. Following the evidentiary hearing, the court issued the order in appeal No. 2 in which it determined that $50,000 in income should be imputed to defendant and that defendant was not eligible for the appointment of counsel in the pending proceeding (Carney v. Carney, 55 Misc.3d 1220[A], 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 50667[U], *16, 2017 WL 2271317 [Sup. Ct., Monroe County 2017]).

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that as pertinent here, any person seeking custody of his or her child or "contesting the substantial infringement of his or her right to custody of such child" (FCA § 262[a][v]), as well as "any person in any proceeding before the court in which an order ... is being sought to hold such person in contempt of the court or in willful violation of a previous order of the court" (§ 262[a][vi]), has "the right to have counsel assigned by the court in any case where he or she is financially unable to obtain the same" (§ 262[a]; see County Law § 722; Judiciary Law § 770;. Where, as here, Supreme Court exercises jurisdiction over a matter over which Family Court might have exercised jurisdiction had the proceeding been commenced there, Supreme Court must appoint counsel if required under Family Court Act § 262 (see Judiciary Law § 35[8]). "Where a party indicates an inability to retain private counsel, the court must make inquiry to determine whether the party is eligible for court-appointed counsel. In fulfilling that obligation, the court may inquire into the person's financial circumstances, including, but not limited to, his or her income, expenses, obligations and other relevant financial information and, in furtherance of that inquiry, the court may require the submission of documentation. Here, the submissions in support of the motion for the assignment of counsel confirmed a lack of income and assets. In light of these financial circumstances defendant qualified for assigned counsel pursuant to the Public Defender's Office eligibility guidelines.

The Appellate Division held that the court had no authority to deprive defendant of his constitutional and statutory right to counsel on the basis of imputed income, and it therefore lacked the authority to conduct a hearing on that issue, requiring reversal.

End of Document

In Matter of Kelly v Fifield, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1441971, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02110 (4th Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that where, as here, a prior order provides for visitation as the parties may mutually agree, a party who is unable to obtain visitation pursuant to that order "may file a petition seeking to enforce or modify the order". It agreed with the father that the court erred in dismissing the modification petition without a hearing inasmuch as the father made "a sufficient evidentiary showing of a change in circumstances to require a hearing" The father adequately alleged a change of circumstances insofar as the visitation arrangement based upon mutual agreement was no longer tenable given that the mother purportedly denied the father any contact with the child. In addition, it noted that there is a rebuttable presumption that visitation is in the child's best interests

Where the UIFSA and the FFCCSOA conflicted when applied to the facts, Appellate Division concluded that the FFCCSOA preempted the UIFSA.

In Matter of Reynolds v Evans, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1441435, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 02077 (4th Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in dismissing the fathers petition to modify a New Jersey child support order based upon lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The father and respondent mother previously resided in New Jersey with the child, and a New Jersey court issued a child support order in 2001. The mother and child thereafter relocated to Tennessee, and the father relocated to New York. In 2004, the New Jersey child support order was registered in New York for purposes of enforcement. In 2016, the father filed a instant petition in New York seeking a downward modification of his child support obligation. In order to modify an out-of-state child support order under the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act ([UIFSA] Family Ct Act art 5–B), the order must be registered in New York and, in relevant part, the following conditions must be present: "(i) neither the child, nor the obligee who is an individual, nor the obligor resides in the issuing state; (ii) a petitioner who is a nonresident of this state seeks modification; and (iii) the respondent is subject to the personal jurisdiction of the tribunal of this state" (§ 580–611 [a][1]). Although the New Jersey child support order was registered in New York, the father was the petitioner and he was a resident of New York. Therefore, under the UIFSA, the father could not properly bring the petition for modification of the New Jersey child support order in New York. The father could, however, properly bring the petition for modification in New York under the Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act ([FFCCSOA] 28 USC § 1738B.. Under the FFCCSOA, a New York court may modify an out-of-state child support order if "the court has jurisdiction to make such a child support order pursuant to [28 USC § 1738B] subsection (i)” and, in relevant part, “the court of the other State no longer has continuing, exclusive jurisdiction of the child support order because that State no longer is the child’s State or the residence of any individual contestant” (28 USC § 1738B [e][1], [2][A]). Here, neither the parties nor the child continued to reside in New Jersey, and New Jersey therefore ceased to have continuing, exclusive jurisdiction (see Family Ct Act § 580–205[a][1]; 28 USC § 1738B [d]). Although the UIFSA and the FFCCSOA “have complementary policy goals and should be read in tandem” (Matter of Spencer v. Spencer, 10 N.Y.3d 60, 65–66, 853 N.Y.S.2d 274, 882 N.E.2d 886 [2008]), the UIFSA and the FFCCSOA conflict when applied to these facts, and the Appellate Division concluded that the FFCCSOA preempted the UIFSA here.

Court exceeded its authority in directing petitioner to find foster care for respondents’ cat.

In Matter of Ruth H, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1357868, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01840 (4th Dept., 2018) the Petitioner commenced this neglect proceeding seeking, inter alia, the temporary removal of respondents’ two children from their custody. Respondents consented to the temporary removal of the children and, after a hearing pursuant to Family Court Act § 1027, Family Court determined, inter alia, that the temporary removal of the children while the neglect petition was pending was in the children’s best interests based upon respondents’ failure to provide adequate nutrition for the children and the uninhabitable condition of respondents’ home. The court also determined that petitioner failed to make reasonable efforts to prevent the removal of the children from respondents’ custody, and ordered petitioner to find a foster home for respondents’ cat. The Appellate Division reversed the finding of lack of “reasonable efforts”, and agreed with petitioner that the court lacked the authority to order it to find a foster home for respondents’ cat. Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction that cannot exercise powers beyond those granted to it by statute , or by the New York Constitution). Inasmuch as animals are property (see generally Mullaly v. People, 86 N.Y. 365, 368 [1881]), and Family Court does not have jurisdiction over matters concerning personal property, it concluded that the court exceeded its authority in directing petitioner to find foster care for respondents’ cat.

2018 Child Support Standards Chart Issued

The 2018 poverty income guidelines amount for a single person as reported by the United States Department of Health and Human Services is $12,140 and the 2018 self-support reserve is $16,389. The combined parental income amount is $148,000. See Child Support Standards Chart LDSS 4515 (3/18), <https://www.childsupport.ny.gov/dcse/pdfs/CSSA.pdf> (last accessed March 1, 2018)

Appellate Division, Second Department

Order dismissing Custody Petition Reversed Where Right to Self-Representation Denied.

In Matter of Aeman v Lansch, 2018 WL 1076261 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division reversed an order which denied, without a hearing, the fathers modification petitions seeking custody of the children. It noted that where a party unequivocally and timely asserts the right to self-representation, the court must conduct a searching inquiry to ensure that the waiver of the right to counsel is knowing, intelligent, and voluntary (see Matter of Kathleen K. [Steven K.], 17 N.Y.3d at 385, 929 N.Y.S.2d 535, 953 N.E.2d 773). There must be a showing that the party was aware of the dangers and disadvantages of proceeding without counsel. The Court of Appeals has stated that the better practice is to ask the party about his or her age, education, occupation, previous exposure to legal procedures, and other relevant factors bearing on a competent, intelligent, and voluntary waiver (see People v. Arroyo, 98 N.Y.2d 101, 104, 745 N.Y.S.2d 796, 772 N.E.2d 1154). The father unequivocally and timely asserted his right to represent himself in the Family Court proceedings. The Family Court engaged in a searching inquiry of the father, which revealed that he knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his right to counsel, and that it was his desire and personal choice to proceed pro se. The court properly warned him of the perils of self-representation, which he acknowledged. It found that the father was a tax attorney, and held that his relative ignorance of family law did not justify the court's denial of his request, as mere ignorance of the law is insufficient to deprive one of the right to self-representation. Further, the court's belief that counsel for the father would be helpful in these matters was an insufficient reason to deprive the father of his right of self-representation. The father did not engage in any disruptive conduct that would prevent the fair and orderly exposition of the issues. Accordingly, the Family Court should not have deprived the father of his right to self-representation. In light of the court's unreasonable refusal to honor the father's right to self-representation, which was accompanied by increasing intolerance towards the father, it remitted the matters to a different judge for a new hearing.

Second Department Holds DRL § 236(B)(2)(b) and 22 NYCRR § 202.16-a, in tandem (automatic orders), constitute unequivocal mandates of the court for purposes of contempt. But Contempt not available after entry of judgment.

In Spencer v Spencer, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2018 WL 1075362, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01348 (2d Dept, 2018) the Appellate Division, Second Department reversed an order which held the former husband in contempt. It held, as a matter of first impression that the provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(2)(b) and Uniform Rules for Trial Courts (22 NYCRR) § 202.16-a, in tandem (automatic orders), constitute unequivocal mandates of the court for the purposes of holding a party in civil contempt pursuant to Judiciary Law § 753. It also held that civil contempt is not an available remedy for a violation of the automatic orders when that civil contempt is sought after entry of a judgment of divorce.

After the judgment of divorce had been entered, the plaintiff learned that, while the trial was pending, defendant sold a warehouse in Brooklyn, which was a marital asset (Property), without her consent and without the consent of the Supreme Court during the pendency of the action. Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(2)(b) and 22 NYCRR 202.16–a which virtually mirror each other, precludes either of the parties in a matrimonial action from transferring or in any way disposing of marital assets such as the Property without the written consent of the other party or order of the court, except under certain circumstances not applicable to this case (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][2][b]; 22 NYCRR 202.16–a). The automatic orders are binding upon a plaintiff upon commencement of the matrimonial action and upon a defendant upon service of the summons or summons and complaint (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][2][b]).

Although the judgment of divorce had already been entered, plaintiff filed an order to show cause seeking, inter alia, pursuant to Judiciary Law § 753, a finding of civil contempt against the defendant. Supreme Court then held a hearing during which the defendant admitted that he sold the Property for $1.6 million during the pendency of the divorce trial and after paying the mortgage and other encumbrances on the Property, he received proceeds from the sale in the amount of $300,000, which he spent paying debts that he owed. Supreme Court held the defendant in civil contempt, finding the defendant's sale of the Property in violation of the automatic orders and his expenditure of the proceeds for his own benefit defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced the rights of the plaintiff. The court directed that, unless the defendant purged the contempt by paying $150,000 to the plaintiff on or before December 16, 2016, the defendant would be incarcerated every weekend for a period of six months.

The Appellate Division held that the legislative history of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(2)(b) supported the conclusion that the automatic orders constitute unequivocal mandates of the court. It rejected defendant's contention that Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(2)(b) constitute a legislative, not a court, mandate for the reason that it is contrary to the express language of 22 NYCRR 202.16–a, against public policy, and without merit. Notwithstanding the foregoing, it found that where a judgment of divorce has already been entered, the remedy of civil contempt is not available for a violation of the automatic orders after the judgment of divorce has been entered. The automatic orders are temporary and exist only "in full force and effect" during the pendency of the action until "terminated, modified or amended by further order of the court or upon written agreement between the parties" (22 NYCRR 202.16–a[b]). Upon entry of a judgment of divorce, the purpose of the automatic orders ends, and, when the life of the automatic orders thus expires, the statutory remedies for their enforcement fall at the same time (see Mittman v. Mittman, 263 App.Div. 384, 385, 33 N.Y.S.2d 211). Here, after the judgment of divorce was entered, the automatic orders ceased to exist for the purposes of enforcement (see 22 NYCRR 202.16–a). The Court noted that the unavailability of civil contempt as a remedy to enforce the terms of the automatic orders after the entry of the judgment of divorce did not render this plaintiff without available remedies. For example, vacatur of the judgment of divorce based on newly discovered evidence, a civil contempt motion for a violation of the judgment of divorce, a proceeding to enforce the terms of the judgment of divorce or to obtain an order directing the payment of 50% of the value of the Property which was awarded to the plaintiff in the judgment of divorce, or amendment of the judgment of divorce are all remedies that the plaintiff could have sought.

A Court Must Determine Whether A Proposed Adoption Is in The Best Interests of The Child and Should Consider All the Relevant Factors.

In Matter of Isabella, 2018 WL 1075864 (Mem), 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01309 (2d Dept., 2018) the petitioner, who has been the legal guardian of Isabella, since 2011, filed a petition to adopt her in 2015. Her father consented to the adoption and following a hearing, the Family Court found that the consent of Isabella's mother was not required because she had abandoned the child. The court dismissed the petition on the ground that the petitioner has a lengthy criminal record, refusing to make any further inquiry into any other factor bearing on whether the adoption would be in the child's best interests. The Appellate Division reversed. It pointed out that a court must determine whether a proposed adoption is in the best interests of the child (see Domestic Relations Law §§ 114[1]; 116[4]). The court should consider all the relevant factors. Perfection is not demanded of adoptive parents and "even an unacceptable record of misconduct by adoptive parents may be mitigated by evidence that the proposed adoptive child is healthy and happy and considers petitioners to be his [or her] parents. It held that Family Court erred in determining that the adoption was not in the child's best interests based solely on the petitioner's criminal history. The court should have received evidence and considered other factors relevant to the issue. This was particularly true since the petitioner had been appointed the child's permanent guardian and had served in that role for over five years, which was most of the child's life, and all of the petitioner's convictions occurred more than 20 years before he commenced this proceeding. The matter was remitted to the Family for further proceedings on the petition, before a different judge.

Error to Award Custody Based Upon Information Provided at Family Court Appearance by Persons Not Under Oath

In Matter of Richard T v Victoria U, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 1093499, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01364 (3d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in granting the father's custody petition without conducting an evidentiary hearing. Custody determinations should generally be made only after a full and plenary hearing and inquiry (S.L. v. J.R., 27 N.Y.3d 558, 563, 36 N.Y.S.3d 411, 56 N.E.3d 193 [2016]) A court's final custody determination must be based on admissible evidence and not on, as relevant here, "information provided at court appearances by persons not under oath" The Family Court's ultimate custody and visitation determination was made only after a few preliminary court appearances in which no witness gave sworn testimony or documentary evidence was received, and there was no indication that Family Court considered the various factors relative to the best interests of the children. The matter was remitted for a full hearing because Family Court “did not possess sufficient information to render an informed determination that was consistent with the children’s best interests”

Where settlement agreement not merged into divorce judgment a postjudgment motion within the matrimonial action is not proper vehicle to challenge agreement

In Matula v Matula, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2018 WL 1093474, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01365 (3d Dept., 2018), the parties entered into a stipulated settlement agreement, and, in September 2015, a judgment of divorce was entered, which incorporated, but did not merge with, the settlement agreement. In January 2016, the husband, an attorney admitted to practice in this state, moved, inter alia, to enjoin the wife from enforcing, and challenging the validity of, certain provisions of the settlement agreement. The wife cross-moved to dismiss the husband’s motion and requested counsel fees. Supreme Court denied the husband’s requested relief and granted the wife’s application. The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that in cases where a settlement agreement is not merged into a judgment of divorce, a postjudgment motion within the matrimonial action is not the proper vehicle for challenging or annulling the settlement agreement or the support obligations included therein. Inasmuch as the proper vehicle for challenging the propriety of the support provisions contained in that agreement was a separate plenary action, Supreme Court properly denied the husband’s postjudgment motion. The existence of related proceedings in Family Court did not provide Supreme Court with a proper basis to entertain the husband’s attempt to invalidate the settlement agreement by postjudgment motion in Supreme Court.

Court of Appeals Establishes Guidelines for Disclosure Disputes involving Social Media Materials.

In Forman v. Henkin, __NY3d__ (2018), a personal injury case, the Court of Appeals rejected the notion that the account holder’s so-called “privacy” settings govern the scope of disclosure of social media materials. It agreed with other courts that commencement of a personal injury action renders a party’s entire Facebook account automatically discoverable. It held that rather than applying a one-size-fits-all rule, courts addressing disputes over the scope of social media discovery should employ well-established rules, there is no need for a specialized or heightened factual predicate to avoid improper “fishing expeditions.” In the event that judicial intervention becomes necessary, courts should first consider the nature of the event giving rise to the litigation and the injuries claimed, as well as any other information specific to the case, to assess whether relevant material is likely to be found on the Facebook account. Second, balancing the potential utility of the information sought against any specific “privacy” or other concerns raised by the account holder, the court should issue an order tailored to the particular controversy that identifies the types of materials that must be disclosed while avoiding disclosure of nonrelevant materials.

The Court noted that in a personal injury case it is appropriate to consider the nature of the underlying incident and the injuries claimed and to craft a rule for discovering information specific to each. Temporal limitations may also be appropriate, for example, the court should consider whether photographs or messages posted years before an accident are likely to be germane to the litigation.

The Court observed that to the extent the account may contain sensitive or embarrassing materials of marginal relevance, the account holder can seek protection from the court (see CPLR 3103[a]). Here, for example, Supreme Court exempted from disclosure any photographs of plaintiff depicting nudity or romantic encounters.

Plaintiff suggested that disclosure of social media materials necessarily constitutes an unjustified invasion of privacy. The Court assumed for purposes of resolving the narrow issue before it that some materials on a Facebook account may fairly be characterized as private. It indicated that even private materials may be subject to discovery if they are relevant. For purposes of disclosure, the threshold inquiry is not whether the materials sought are private but whether they are reasonably calculated to contain relevant information.

Parties’ Inability to Agree on The Child’s Religious Training, An Issue That Had Not Been Addressed in The Parties’ Stipulation Of Settlement, Constituted A Change In Circumstances Warranting Modification of Custody

In Balla v Balla, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 846199, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 01050 (2d Dept., 2018) prior to the marriage, the mother was Christian and the father was Muslim, but the mother converted to Islam and they were married in a religious ceremony. When the parties separated, the mother returned to Christianity. Pursuant to the parties’ stipulation of settlement and their judgment of divorce, the parties had joint legal custody of the child and the mother had primary physical custody of the child, who was approximately 2 ½ years old when the parties separated. The stipulation stated that the parties would consult with each other regarding the child’s religious training, but did not specify in which religious tradition the child would be raised. As the child’s primary custodian, the mother taught the child Christian values and practices in accordance with her beliefs. When the child was approximately 7 ½ years old, she complained to the mother that the father was pressuring her to adopt Muslim practices and had threatened to abscond with her to his native Morocco, where he retained citizenship in addition to his U.S. citizenship, if she failed to follow Muslim practices and customs. The child asked the mother to call the police and also sought help from school personnel. The mother responded by filing a petition seeking sole legal custody of the child. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court properly exercised its discretion in awarding custody to the mother. The parties' inability to agree on the child's religious training, which was an issue that had not been addressed in the parties' July 2009 stipulation of settlement, constituted a change in circumstances. The change in the child's relationship with the father based on the child's fear of his displeasure if she were not a "true Muslim," and her belief that he threatened to abscond with her to Morocco, also contributed to the change in circumstances warranting modification. The record supported the conclusion of the Family Court that it was in the child's best interests to award sole legal custody to the mother. The award to the mother of sole decision-making authority with respect to religion was in the child's best interests, and the award of parenting time to each parent on his or her respective religious holidays would continue to allow the child to be exposed to both parents' religions. Similarly, the father's actual or perceived insistence that the child follow Islam and actual or perceived threats to abscond to Morocco with the child had a serious adverse effect on the child's relationship with him and, thus, made an award of sole custody to the mother appropriate. The child was 10 years old at the time of the hearing and, accordingly, the Family Court properly considered her wishes, weighed in light of her age and maturity.

Second Department Holds Defective Acknowledgement in Prenuptial Agreement Can be Cured by Extrinsic Proof of Notary who took signature.

In Koegel v Koegel, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 736117, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00833 (2d Dept., 2017), the Appellate Division observed that the Court of Appeals, in Galetta, left open the issue of whether a defective acknowledgment can be cured by extrinsic proof provided by the notary public who took a party's signature, and held that under the circumstances of this case such proof remedied the defective acknowledgment.

At the outset it pointed out that Matisoff v Dobi, 90 N.Y.2d 127, 681 N.E.2d 376, 659 N.Y.S.2d 209, (1997) was not controlling here. In Matisoff, a case involving a postnuptial agreement in which the parties waived any rights of election provided by the EPTL, "it [wa]s undisputed...that the document was not acknowledged by the parties or anyone else" (90 NY2d at 130). The case at bar differed from Matisoff since here, there were certificates of acknowledgment of the signatures of Irene and the decedent, but the certificates did not contain the required language for acknowledgment as currently required by the Real Property Law. Similarly, reliance on D'Elia was misplaced since the agreement in that case was not acknowledged at the time of execution. The statement in D'Elia that "[i]t is uncontroverted that the parties' postnuptial agreement was not properly acknowledged at the time that it was executed" (14 AD3d at 478) was not referring to a defective acknowledgment, but instead, to the absence of any acknowledgment, at 190). However, in the acknowledgment relating to the husband's signature, the certificate failed to indicate that the notary "confirmed the identity of the person executing the document or that the person was the individual described in the document" (id.). The husband filed for divorce and the wife separately filed for divorce and for a declaration that the prenuptial agreement was unenforceable (see id.). The wife moved for summary judgment on her cause of action seeking declaratory relief, contending that the agreement was invalid because the certificate of acknowledgment relating to the husband's signature did not comport with the Real Property Law requirements. The husband opposed the motion on the basis that the language of the acknowledgment substantially complied with the Real Property Law. He also submitted an affidavit from the notary who had witnessed his signature in 1997 and executed the certificate of acknowledgment (see id.). "The notary, an employee of a local bank where the husband then did business, averred that it was his custom and practice, prior to acknowledging a signature, to confirm the identity of the signer and assure that the signer was the person named in the document. He stated in the affidavit that he presumed he had followed that practice before acknowledging the husband's signature" (id. [emphasis added]). The Supreme Court denied the wife's motion, finding that the acknowledgment substantially complied with the requirements of the Real Property Law. A divided Fourth Department affirmed the order albeit on the different ground that, although the acknowledgment was defective, the deficiency could be cured after the fact and that the notary's affidavit raised a triable issue of fact as to whether the agreement had been properly acknowledged when executed (see 96 AD3d 1565, revd 21 NY3d 186).

In Galetta v Galetta, 21 N.Y.3d 186, 991 N.E.2d 684, 969 N.Y.S.2d 826 (2013) the parties executed a prenuptial agreement before different notaries at different times one week before their wedding took place in July 1997 (21 NY3d at 189). As here, it was undisputed that the signatures on the document were authentic and there was no claim that the agreement was procured through fraud or duress. The certificate of acknowledgment relating to the wife's signature contained the proper language (see id.

With respect to the issue of whether the certificate of acknowledgment accompanying the husband's signature was defective, the Court of Appeals determined that without stating "to me known and known to me," the certificate failed to indicate either that the notary knew the husband or had ascertained through some form of proof that the husband was the person described in the prenuptial agreement (21 NY3d at 193). The Court noted that: "At the time the parties here signed the prenuptial agreement in 1997, proper certificates of acknowledgment typically contained boilerplate language substantially the same as that included in the certificate accompanying the wife's signature: before me came (name of signer) to me known and known to me to be the person described in and who executed the foregoing instrument and duly acknowledged to me that s/he executed the same" (id. [footnote omitted]). The Court pointed out that the "to me known and known to me to be the person described in the document" language "satisfied the requirement that the official indicate that he or she knew or had ascertained that the signer was the person described in the document" (id.). It also observed that "[t]he clause beginning with the words and duly acknowledged' established that the signer had made the requisite oral declaration" (id.). Given the failure to include this language in the acknowledgment of the husband's signature, the Court of Appeals agreed with the Fourth Department that the acknowledgment did not conform with statutory requirements (see id. at 194).

Since the Court of Appeals determined that the certificate was defective, it then turned to address the question of "whether such a deficiency can be cured and, if so, whether the affidavit of the notary public prepared in the course of litigation was sufficient to raise a question of fact precluding summary judgment in the wife's favor" (id.). However, in looking at the proof submitted by the husband, the Court of Appeals stated that it "need not definitively resolve the question of whether a cure is possible because, similar to what occurred in Matisoff, the proof submitted here was insufficient” (id. at 197).

The Court of Appeals analyzed in detail the affidavit of the notary submitted by the husband in opposing the wife’s summary judgment motion. The Court pointed out that the notary only recognized his own signature and had no independent recollection of notarizing the subject document (see id.). Given these statements, the Court found that the husband could not rely on the notary’s custom and practice to fill in the evidentiary gaps because “the averments presented by the notary public in this case [we]re too conclusory to fall into this category” (id.). Further, the Court stated that if the notary had recalled acknowledging the husband’s signature, “he might have been able to fill in the gap in the certificate by averring that he recalled having confirmed [the husband’s] identity, without specifying how” (id. at 198). However, since the notary did not recall acknowledging the husband’s signature and was attempting to rely on custom and practice evidence, the Court stated that “it was crucial that the affidavit describe a specific protocol that the notary repeatedly and invariably used — and proof of that type is absent here” (id.).

In Koegel, the Appellate Division found that the situation at bar was akin to the hypothetical described by the Court of Appeals in Galetta, where the notaries here, the decedent’s law partner and Irene’s attorney, actually recalled acknowledging the signatures at issue. In such a situation, the Court of Appeals explained that the confirmation of the identity of the signer, through an affidavit, is sufficient without having to explain how the identity was confirmed (see id.). Although, in support of her motion, Irene submitted the prenuptial agreement with the defective acknowledgments to demonstrate that the agreement was invalid, the Surrogate’s Court properly declined to dismiss the petition on the basis of documentary evidence in light of John’s submission in opposition to her motion. To supplement the allegations of the petition, in opposition, John submitted affidavits which showed that the petition may be meritorious in spite of the documentary evidence. In response to the assertion that the prenuptial agreement was invalid as improperly acknowledged, the affidavits of Donovan and Jacobsen specifically stated that each observed the document being signed, took the acknowledgment in question, and personally knew the individual signer signing before him. In so doing, the defect in the acknowledgment was cured in order to give vitality to the expressed intent of the parties set forth in the prenuptial agreement. Accordingly, the Surrogate’s Court properly denied Irene’s motion pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(1) and Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(3) to dismiss the petition. Therefore, the order was affirmed.

Second Department Joins First and Third Department Holding Presumption of legitimacy applicable to Same-Sex Marriages

New York has a strong policy in favor of legitimacy. Matter of Anonymous, 74 Misc.2d 99, 104, 345 N.Y.S.2d 430 [1973]. At common law there is a rebuttable presumption that the child, a child born to a married woman, is the legitimate child of both parties. Matter of Findlay, 253 N.Y. 1, 7, 170 N.E. 471 [1930]. The presumption that a child born to a marriage is the legitimate child of both parents ‘is one of the strongest and most persuasive known to the law.” State of New York ex rel. H. v. P., 90 A.D.2d 434, 437, 457 N.Y.S.2d 488 [1982]; Matter of Findlay, 253 N.Y. 1, 7, 170 N.E. 471 [1930].

The presumption of legitimacy as codified in Domestic Relations Law §24 is that a child “born of parents who prior or subsequent to the birth of such child shall have entered into a civil or religious marriage, or shall have consummated a common-law marriage where such marriage is recognized as valid”, is the legitimate child of both birth parents. See also Family Ct Act § 417.

In Matter of Maria-Irene D. (Carlos A. v. Han Ming.), 153 A.D.3d 1203, 1205 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division, first department held that the “presumption of legitimacy”, applies to a child born to a same-sex married couple. There the court applied the presumption of legitimacy to a married gay male couple, one member of whom wanted to vacate the adoption of their child by the other man’s new partner.

In Matter of Christopher YY. v Jessica ZZ., _____ AD3d _____, 2018 NY Slip Op 00495, *5-6 (3d Dept., 2017) the Third Department held that the “presumption of legitimacy” applied to a a married lesbian couple and that, therefore, a paternity petition filed by the male sperm donor must fail. The court pointed out that typically the presumption is rebuttable in the law” upon clear and convincing evidence excluding the [spouse] as the child’s [parent] or otherwise tending to prove that the child was not the product of the marriage,” quoting Matter of Beth R. v. Ronald S., 149 A.D.3d at 1217. In cases involving opposite-gender spouses, the rebuttal happens, for instance, with “proof that a husband did not have ‘access to’ his wife at the time that she conceived a child and he acknowledged that he was not the biological father, combined with testimony that the child was conceived during a trip with the putative father with whom his wife was in a monogamous relationship,” citing Matter of Beth R. v. Ronald S. But applying case law on rebuttal to same-gender spouses is “inherently problematic, as it is not currently scientifically possible for same-gender couples to produce a child that is biologically the product of the marriage,” and the “changing legal and social landscape requires reexamination of the traditional analysis governing the presumption of legitimacy.”

In Matter of Joseph O. v Danielle B. ,2018 NY Slip Op 01192 (2d Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division, Second Department observed that it is an established legal presumption that every child born during a marriage is the legitimate child of both spouses (see Domestic Relations Law § 24[1]; Family Ct Act § 417) and that the respondents correctly contended that because the child was conceived and born to the lesbian respondents during their marriage, there was a presumption that the child is the legitimate child of both respondents (see Domestic Relations Law § 24[1]; Family Ct Act § 417; Matter of Christopher YY. v Jessica ZZ., _____ AD3d _____, 2018 NY Slip Op 00495, *5-6; Matter of Maria-Irene D. [Carlos A.-Han Ming T.], 153 AD3d 1203, 1205). The presumption of legitimacy is rebuttable (see Matter of Findlay, 253 NY 1, 7), and thus its application alone did not warrant the summary denial of a paternity petition brought by the sperm donor. However, the Appellate Division found that the respondents were entitled to dismissal of the paternity petition on the ground of equitable estoppel and it was not necessary to determine if the presumption of legitimacy was rebutted.

Supreme Court

Supreme Court Dismisses Pleading as Spoliation Sanction

In Crocker C. v Anne R. 2018 WL 846746 (Sup. Ct., 2018) Unreported Disposition Supreme Court found that that the plaintiff knowingly and purposefully violated the defendant's attorney-client privilege through an ongoing course of conduct of intercepting hundreds of her attorney-client communications and "listening in" on her attorney-client privileged consultations. It also found that the plaintiff engaged in spoliation of evidence when he installed multiple data "wiping" applications and used them to destroy much of the spyware data on his computing devices. Here, plaintiff commenced legal action against defendant, monitored her communications and physical whereabouts in real-time using spyware, 51 violated her attorney-client privilege and then willfully destroyed the only remaining evidence that would reveal the extent of his violation of that privilege

The Court observed that historically, New York courts have applied strong spoliation sanctions even for inadvertent, negligent spoliation of evidence. In Kirkland v New York City Hous. Auth., the Appellate Division, First Department held that dismissal of the case was appropriate where the spoliation was intentional or negligent (236 AD2d 170, 666 NYS2d 609, 611 [1 Dept.,1997]; see also Standard Fire Ins. Co. v Federal Pacific Elec. Co., 14 AD3d 213, 786 NYS2d 41 [1 Dept.,2004]). In Kirkland, the Appellate Division, First Department found that the severe sanction of dismissal was appropriate on the basis of the patent "unfairness (in) allowing a party to destroy evidence and then to benefit from the conduct or omission" (666 NYS2d at 611). The Court of Appeals in Ortega v City of New York, citing favorably to the Kirkland and Standard Fire Ins. Co. decisions, held that: New York courts therefore possess broad discretion to provide proportionate relief to the party deprived of the lost evidence, such as precluding proof favorable to the spoliator to restore balance to the litigation, requiring the spoliator to pay costs to the injured party associated with the development of replacement evidence, or employing an adverse inference...Where appropriate, a court can impose the ultimate sanction of dismissing the action or striking responsive pleadings, thereby rendering a judgment by default against the offending party (9 NY3d 69, 75, 845 NYS2d 773 [2007]). In 2015, the New York Court of Appeals in Pegasus Aviation I, Inc. v. 41 Varig Logistica S.A., adopted the standards set forth by the Appellate Division, First Department in the VOOM decision holding that a party seeking sanctions for spoliation of evidence must show: (1) that the party having control over the evidence possessed an obligation to preserve it at the time of its destruction, (2) that the evidence was destroyed with a "culpable state of mind," which would include negligence, and (3) that the destroyed evidence was relevant to, or would have supported, the seeking party's claim or defense (26 NYS3d 543, 26 NYS3d 218 [2015]). In addressing the second prong of the test in Pegasus the Court of Appeals held that if the evidence is determined to have been "intentionally or willfully destroyed" then the relevancy of that evidence to the seeking party's claim is presumed under the third prong of the inquiry. Certainly, while the determination of the appropriate sanction is within the discretion of the trial court the Court of Appeals in Pegasus made it abundantly clear that one of the key distinctions to guide the trial court is whether the destruction of evidence deprives the other party of the ability to establish his or her defense and whether the destruction of evidence was in bad faith. Evidence can be spoliated along a full range of state of mind culpability: If the Court determines that the spoliation of evidence was “negligent” the party seeking spoliation sanctions must establish that the destroyed materials were relevant to their claim or defense (id. at 547-48; see also Atilas v Golub Corp., 141 AD3d 1055, 36 NYS3d 533 [3 Dept.,2016] (court applied Pegasus and ruled that video footage sought “was not ‘relevant to [plaintiffs]’ claim...” after determining that “plaintiffs failed to prove that defendants intentionally or willfully destroyed [portion of] video while under obligation to present it...”). innocently, negligently, recklessly, intentionally, or in bad faith. A review of the New York case law related to the remedies correlating to the state of mind of the spoliator supported a general approach that as the culpability of the spoliating party decreases (from bad faith and intentional to negligent and unintentional) so too does the appeal of the punitive and deterrent purpose underlying the spoliation doctrine. The rationale was obvious. Where a party intentionally destroys evidence, the conduct raises a strong inference that the party thought the evidence would be so harmful to its case that the risk of getting caught destroying the evidence outweighed the risk of the opposing party obtaining the evidence and the possibility that the Court could have the evidence to consider. It appeared that the Court of Appeals decision in Pegasus intended to draw the distinction in a way that corresponds the sanction to the intent of the spoliator when possible so that less drastic sanctions are possible for spoliators who were not acting in bad faith so long as the spoliation did not result in insurmountable prejudice to the innocent party (26 NYS3d 543, 26 NYS3d 218 [2015]).

Based upon the totality of the facts and circumstances, including the plaintiff’s total and on-going violation of the defendant’s attorney-client privilege for more than four (4) months which included purloining hundreds of her attorney-client privileged communications and “listening in” on her attorney-client meetings, together with the allegation that he also “listened in” on her sessions with her treating psychiatrist, together with his intentional and bad faith spoliation of the only evidence that would have allowed the defendant and the Court to assess the extent of any negative inference, and in the interest of justice, the Court found that the appropriate remedy was to strike the plaintiff’s pleadings related to all financial relief except for the issue of child support, which is the right of the children. The Court struck plaintiff’s pleading seeking spousal support, equitable distribution and counsel fees. The Court did not strike the plaintiff’s pleadings relating to any request for child support if he is awarded custody inasmuch as child support is the right of the children and it would prejudice the children to strike his request for children support if he is awarded custody.

Table of Effective Dates of Changes to Poverty Income Guidelines Amount, Self-Support Reserve, Combined Parental Income Amount and Income Cap Since 2003.

The maintenance and child support provisions of Domestic Relations Law §§ 236 and 240, and Family Court Act §§ 412 and 413 refer to “income cap” with regard to maintenance and temporary maintenance awards, and “combined parental income” with regard to child support awards. These statutes also refer to the terms “self-support reserve” and the “poverty income guidelines amount for a single person.”

For purposes of Child support awards pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240 the poverty income guidelines amount, self-support reserve, and combined parental income amount change yearly on March 1. For purposes of Maintenance and Temporary Maintenance awards pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5] and [B][5-a] the Income Cap for Maintenance and Temporary maintenance changes yearly on January 31. Different versions of Domestic Relations Law §§ 236 and 240 apply in matrimonial actions depending upon the date of the commencement of an action, and different amounts apply depending upon the date of the application. The following table has been created to enable counsel to quickly find the amount applicable to actions commenced since 2003 and is available for download, with footnote references and links to charts, on our website at www.nysdivorce.com

Table of Poverty Income Guidelines Amount, Self-support reserve, Combined Parental Income and Income Cap amounts since 2003.

Award of Costs, Pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130–2.1 Must Reflect Work “Actually Performed” Or Fees “Actually Incurred”

In Matter of Jagnarain v Aponte, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 736122, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00832 (2d Dept., 2018) nonparty-appellant Amal Oummih was the attorney for the mother in these child custody proceedings, and the nonparty-respondent David Badanes was the attorney for the father. On the eve of the trial scheduled for Monday, August 22, 2016, appellant sought to withdraw as counsel for the mother, because her mother had been gravely ill since July 2016. Instead of moving to withdraw as counsel, the appellant asked her client to discharge her as her attorney. On August 17, 2016, the client complied, and by letter dated August 18, 2016, the appellant informed the Family Court that she had been discharged. On Friday, August 19, 2016, the appellant notified the attorney for the child, who, in turn, notified the respondent. On the day of trial, no consent to change attorney form pursuant to CPLR 321 had been filed, because the retainer agreement for the mother’s new attorney had not been finalized. The respondent moved pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130–2.1 for costs in the form of reimbursement for actual expenses reasonably incurred and reasonable attorney’s fees based upon the appellant’s failure to appear for the trial.

The Family Court, inter alia, determined that the appellant’s failure to appear at the trial was without good cause, granted the respondent’s motion and awarded him the sum of $2,100.

The Appellate Division modified the order. It noted that pursuant to 22 NYCRR 130–2.1(a) “the court, in its discretion, may impose financial sanctions or, in addition to or in lieu of imposing sanctions, may award costs in the form of reimbursement for actual expenses reasonably incurred and reasonable attorney’s fees, upon any attorney who, without good cause, fails to appear at a time and place scheduled for an action or proceeding to be heard before a designated court.” Here, Family Court providently exercised its discretion in granting the respondent’s motion and appellant’s failure to properly notify the Family Court and the other parties of her dilemma, and the nature of the harm caused by her nonappearance, which prolonged the custody litigation, warranted an award of costs in the form of reimbursement for actual expenses reasonably incurred and reasonable attorney's fees. However, the award of costs, in the form of reimbursement for actual expenses reasonably incurred and reasonable attorney's fees, did not reflect work "actually performed" or fees "actually incurred". Accordingly, it reduced the award of costs from the sum of $2,100 to the sum of $600.

Proper to Consider as Factor in Awarding Maintenance to Plaintiff Inheritance That Defendant Was Entitled to Receive, Even Though It Was Separate Property.

In Cullen v Cullen, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 635171, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00541 (2d Dept., 2018) the parties were married in August 1982 and plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce and ancillary relief in January 2009 after 26 years of marriage. In September 2012, the parties entered into a stipulation of undisputed facts resolving issues relating to the equitable distribution of certain marital property. During the marriage, the defendant owned and operated Hudson Marine, Inc., a diving services company, while the plaintiff was a full-time mother and homemaker.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff maintenance for a period of eight years, in the sum of $2,200 per month for the first five years, and in the sum of $1,000 per month for the last three years. The court properly considered as one factor in awarding maintenance to the plaintiff the inheritance that the defendant was entitled to receive from his aunt's estate, even though the inheritance was the defendant's separate property and not subject to equitable distribution. Additionally, because Hudson constituted a tangible income-producing asset, the court did not err in awarding the plaintiff a distributive share of Hudson in addition to maintenance (see Keane v. Keane, 8 N.Y.3d 115, 122, 828 N.Y.S.2d 283, 861 N.E.2d 98).

Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in equitably distributing the marital assets. The plaintiff was properly awarded $105,250, representing a 25% share of the value of Hudson as of the date of commencement. Given the court's discretion to establish the valuation date of assets, and the parties' stipulation as to the value of Hudson on the date of commencement, the court did not err in employing the date of commencement as the valuation date for Hudson. It held that the court did not place undue emphasis on the inheritance that he was entitled to receive from his aunt's estate, and was permitted to consider the inheritance as a factor in equitably distributing the marital assets (see Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5][d][4], [9]; Owens v. Owens, 107 A.D.3d at 1174, 967 N.Y.S.2d 465).

It rejected the defendant's contention that he was entitled to a separate property credit for his contributions to the down payment on the marital residence. His self-serving trial testimony that his aunt gave him a check for $50,000, that his uncle gave him $10,000, and that he used these funds toward the down payment, was unsupported by documentary evidence, and insufficient to establish his entitlement to a separate property credit. Additionally, Supreme Court properly found that the defendant failed to present sufficient evidence tracing the source of any funds used to purchase the marital residence to the sale of certain stock, which was purportedly the defendant's separate property.

Childs Out of Court Statements Sufficiently Corroborated for FCA § 1046(A)(Vi) Exception to Hearsay Rule by Childs Age-Inappropriate Knowledge of Sexual Conduct

In Matter of William JB v Dayna LS, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 668916, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00774 (4th Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which modified a prior custody order by awarding primary physical custody of the parties' daughter to petitioner, with supervised visitation with respondent. It held, inter alia, that Family Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the daughter's out-of-court statements describing her alleged sexual abuse by the mother's boyfriend were sufficiently corroborated. Family Court Act § 1046(a)(vi) provides that a child's "previous statements ... relating to any allegations of abuse or neglect shall be admissible in evidence, but if uncorroborated, such statements shall not be sufficient to make a fact-finding of abuse or neglect." Corroboration may be provided by "[a]ny other evidence tending to support the reliability of [the child's] previous statements". Although section 1046 is applicable to child protective proceedings, the Court has routinely applied its provisions as "an exception to the hearsay rule in custody cases involving allegations of abuse and neglect ... where ... the statements are corroborated". It found that corroboration was provided by the daughter's age-inappropriate knowledge of sexual conduct which 'demonstrated specific knowledge of sexual activity. Moreover, the daughter's statements described unique sexual conduct that the boyfriend engaged in with the daughter, and the father submitted evidence that the mother and her boyfriend had admitted that the boyfriend engaged in such conduct with the mother during their sexual relations.

Parent Seeking Downward Modification of Child Support on Ground Physical Disability Interfered with His Ability to Maintain Employment Must "Offer Competent Medical Evidence to Substantiate" Claim

In Matter of Hwang v Tam, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 668940, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00768 (4th Dept., 2018) the Appellate Division affirmed an order confirming the Support Magistrate's determination that the father willfully violated a prior order to pay child support for the parties' children. It observed that a failure to pay support as ordered itself constitutes 'prima facie evidence of a willful violation and establishes the petitioner's direct case of willful violation, shifting to the respondent the burden of going forward" (Powers, 86 N.Y.2d at 69, 629 N.Y.S.2d 984, 653 N.E.2d 1154). To meet that burden, the respondent must offer some competent, credible evidence of his or inability to make the required payments. If the respondent contends that he or she was unable to meet the support obligation because a physical disability interfered with his or her ability to maintain employment, the respondent must "offer competent medical evidence to substantiate" that claim. That medical evidence must establish that the alleged physical disability affected his or her ability to work. Here, the father failed to offer any medical evidence to substantiate his claim that his disability prevented him from making any of the required payments. The fact that the father was receiving Social Security benefits did not preclude a finding that he was capable of working where, as here, his claimed inability to work was not supported by the requisite medical evidence.

February 1, 2018

Appellate Division, Second Department

In Taha v Elzemity, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 343624, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00188 (2d Dept., 2018) the parties were married in 2007, and had three children. Shortly before their marriage, they entered into a prenuptial agreement, which provided, inter alia, that, in the event of separation or divorce, each party waived the right to the other's separate property, including property acquired from the proceeds of separate property acquired during the marriage; each party would keep separate bank accounts; and the plaintiff's maintenance obligation would be limited to a lump sum payment of $20,000. In 2008, the parties moved into the marital residence, which was purchased with funds from the plaintiff's bank account, and the deed and mortgage were placed solely in his name. The plaintiff had been practicing medicine since 1987 and earned approximately $300,000 annually. The defendant, who had been employed part-time as a sales person when the parties met, did not work outside the home during the marriage but dedicated herself to the care of the household and the parties' children, one with special needs. In October 2013, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce . The defendant moved to set aside the prenuptial agreement on the ground, inter alia, that it was unconscionable. The plaintiff cross-moved for summary judgment determining that the prenuptial agreement was valid and enforceable. After a hearing, the Supreme Court found that the prenuptial agreement was not unconscionable. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that an agreement that might not have been unconscionable when entered into may become unconscionable at the time a final judgment would be entered (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [3]). The burden of proof as to unconscionability is on the party seeking to set aside the agreement. The defendant sustained her burden of establishing that the prenuptial agreement was, at the time this action was before the court, unconscionable. Enforcement of the agreement would result in the risk of the defendant's becoming a public charge. The defendant, who was unemployed, largely without assets, and the primary caregiver for the parties' young children, would, under the prenuptial agreement, receive only $20,000, in full satisfaction of all claims, even though the plaintiff earned approximately $300,000 annually as a physician Accordingly, the defendant's motion to set aside the prenuptial agreement should have been granted.

In Matter of Rouster v Murray, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 343755, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00151 (2d Dept., 2018) the petitioner was the live-in girlfriend of the appellant's brother. The petitioner and the appellant lived in the same building, on different floors. The petitioner filed a family offense petition against the appellant, alleging that she had physically attacked and verbally threatened her. After a fact-finding hearing, the Family Court determined that the petitioner established by a preponderance of the evidence that the appellant had committed the family offenses of menacing in the third degree and disorderly conduct. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that pursuant to Family Court Act § 812(1), the Family Court's jurisdiction in family offense proceedings is limited to certain prescribed criminal acts that occur between, inter alia, members of the same family or household. Members of the same family or household include, among others, "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time" (Family Ct Act § 812[1][e]) Expressly excluded from the ambit of "intimate relationship" are "casual acquaintance[s]" and "ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts" (Family Ct Act § 812[1][e]). Beyond those delineated exclusions, what qualifies as an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e) is determined on a case-by-case basis. Relevant factors include "the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship. Here, the parties had no direct relationship and were only connected through a third party, who is the petitioner's live-in boyfriend and the appellant's brother. The parties never resided together and their contact with one another had been purely by happenstance, as they lived in the same building. Accordingly, they do not have an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), and Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the family offense petition and to issue the order of protection

The Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017

By Joel R. Brandes

The Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017 ("Act") repealed the deduction for alimony and maintenance payments and made other changes to the Internal Revenue Code which will affect the negotiation of separation agreements as well as maintenance and child support awards made after January 1, 2018. The provisions of the Act which effect the tax aspects of maintenance and child support, and are of interest to matrimonial lawyers are discussed in this brief summary of the changes.

Alimony Deduction

The most significant change is that the ("Act") repealed the deduction for alimony payments for any divorce or separation instrument executed or modified after December 31, 2018. ¹

Under existing law ² alimony and separate maintenance payments made pursuant to a divorce or separation instrument are deductible by the payor spouse and includible in income by the recipient spouse.³

The Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017, ⁴ eliminated the deduction by the payor spouse for alimony and separate maintenance payments. The Internal Revenue Code provisions that specify that alimony and separate maintenance payments were included in income were repealed.

The repeal is effective for any divorce or separation instrument executed after December 31, 2018, or for any divorce or separation instrument executed on or before December 31, 2018, and modified after December 31, 2018, if the modification expressly provides that these amendments apply to the modification.⁵ Alimony payments made pursuant to a divorce or separation instrument made on or after December 31, 2018, are no longer deductible by the payor or includable in the income of the recipient. Payments under existing orders continue to be deductible to the payor and are includable in the income of the recipient.

IRC. § 215, “Alimony, etc., payments” was repealed.⁶ It formerly provided, in part: “ In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to the alimony or separate maintenance payments paid during such individual’s taxable year.”⁷ For purposes of this section, the term “alimony or separate maintenance payment” was defined to mean any alimony or separate maintenance payment (as defined in section 71(b)) which is includible in the gross income of the recipient under section 71.⁸

Some of the conforming amendments are discussed below.

IRC § 71 9 “Alimony and separate maintenance payments” was repealed. It formerly provided the general rule that gross income includes amounts received as alimony or separate maintenance payments.”¹⁰ It defined “alimony or separate maintenance payments” as any payment in cash if--(A) such payment is received by (or on behalf of) a spouse under a divorce or separation instrument, (B) the divorce or separation instrument does not designate such payment as a payment which is not includible in gross income under this section and not allowable as a deduction under section 215, (C) in the case of an individual legally separated from his spouse under a decree of divorce or of separate maintenance, the payee spouse and the payor spouse are not members of the same household at the time such payment is made, and (D) there is no liability to make any such payment for any period after the death of the payee spouse and there is no liability to make any payment (in cash or property) as a substitute for such payments after the death of the payee spouse.¹¹ A “divorce or separation instrument” was defined as (A) a decree of divorce or separate maintenance or a written instrument incident to such a decree, (B) a written separation agreement, or (C) a decree (not described in subparagraph (A)) requiring a spouse to make payments for the support or maintenance of the other spouse. ¹²

IRC § 6113 “Gross income defined” which contains the general definition of “gross income” was amended by striking paragraph (a) (8) titled “Alimony and separate maintenance payments” and by redesignating paragraphs (9) through (15) as paragraphs (8) through (14), respectively. It had provided: “(a) General definition. -- Except as otherwise provided in this subtitle, gross income means all income from whatever source derived, including (but not limited to) the following items: (8) Alimony and separate maintenance payments;

IRC § 62 14 “Adjusted gross income defined” was amended by striking paragraph (a) (10) which defined “adjusted gross income” in the case of an individual, to mean gross income minus the following deductions: ... (10) Alimony.--The deduction allowed by section 215.”¹⁵

Enhancement of child tax credit through 2025 and new family credit

Under 2017 law an individual may claim a tax credit for each qualifying child under the age of 17. The amount of the credit per child is $1,000. A child who is not a citizen, national, or resident of the United States cannot be a qualifying child.¹⁷

IRC § 24 (h) was added effective January 1, 2018¹⁸ and is titled “Special Rules for Taxable Years 2018 through 2025”.¹⁹ Under the Act the aggregate amount of child credits that may be claimed is phased out for individuals with income over certain threshold amounts. ²⁰ The otherwise allowable child tax credit is reduced by $50 for each $1,000 (or fraction thereof) of modified adjusted gross income (“AGI”) over $75,000 for single individuals or heads of households, $110,000 for married individuals filing joint returns, and $55,000 for married individuals filing separate returns. For purposes of this limitation, modified AGI includes certain otherwise excludable income earned by U.S. citizens or residents living abroad or in certain U.S. territories. ²¹

The credit is allowable against both the regular tax and the alternative minimum tax (“AMT”). To the extent the child credit exceeds the taxpayer's tax liability, the taxpayer is eligible for a refundable credit (the “additional child tax credit”) equal to 15 percent of earned income in excess of $3,000 (the “earned income” formula). ²²

Families with three or more children may determine the additional child tax credit using the “alternative formula,” if this results in a larger credit than determined under the earned income formula. Under the alternative formula, the additional child tax credit equals the amount by which the taxpayer's Social Security taxes exceed the taxpayer's earned income credit (“EIC”). ²³

²³ Public law No. 115-97 (2017). IRC § 24(h).

Earned income is defined as the sum of wages, salaries, tips, and other taxable employee compensation plus net self-employment earnings. At the taxpayer's election, combat pay may be treated as earned income for these purposes. Unlike the EIC, which also includes the preceding items in its definition of earned income, the additional child tax credit is based only on earned income to the extent it is included in computing taxable income. For example, some ministers' parsonage allowances are considered self-employment income, and thus are considered earned income for purposes of computing the EIC, but the allowances are excluded from gross income for individual income tax purposes, and thus are not considered earned income for purposes of the additional child tax credit since the income is not included in taxable income. 24

Any credit or refund allowed or made to an individual under this provision (including to any resident of a U.S. possession) is not taken into account as income and is not be taken into account as resources for the month of receipt and the following two months for purposes of determining eligibility of the individual or any other individual for benefits or assistance, or the amount or extent of benefits or assistance, under any Federal program or under any State or local program financed in whole or in part with Federal funds. 25

The child tax credit is temporarily increased from $1000 to $2,000 per qualifying child.26

The credit is further modified to temporarily provide for a $500 nonrefundable credit for each qualifying dependent, 27 other than a qualifying children. The provision generally retains the present definition of dependent. 28

The maximum amount refundable increases to and may not exceed $1,400 per qualifying child.29 Additionally, in order to receive the child tax credit (i.e., both the refundable and non-refundable portion), a taxpayer must include a Social Security number for each qualifying child for whom the credit is claimed on the tax return. For these purposes, a Social Security number must be issued before the due date for the filing of the return for the taxable year. This requirement does not apply to a non-child dependent for whom the $500 non-refundable credit is claimed.30

25 Public law No. 115-97 (2017). IRC § 24(h).

26 Public law No. 115-97 (2017). IRC § 24(h)(2).

27 As dependent is defined in IRC § 152,

28 Public law No. 115-97 (2017). IRC § 24(h)(4).

29 Public law No. 115-97 (2017). IRC § 24(h)(5). The Act uses an indexing convention that rounds the $1,400 amount to the next lowest multiple of $100.

30 Public law No. 115-97 (2017). IRC § 24(h)(7). Additionally, a qualifying child who is ineligible to receive the child tax credit because that child did not have a Social Security number as the child's taxpayer identification number may nonetheless qualify for the non-refundable $500 credit.

The present age limit for a qualifying child is retained. Thus, a qualifying child is an individual who has not attained age 17 during the taxable year. 31

Finally, the adjusted gross income phaseout thresholds are modified. The credit begins to phase out for taxpayers with adjusted gross income in excess of $400,000 (in the case of married taxpayers filing a joint return) and $200,000 (for all other taxpayers). These phaseout thresholds are not indexed for inflation. 32

In 2026 the rules for the child tax credit revert to the rules in effect in 2017 with a maximum credit of $1000 for a qualifying child and lower phaseouts. The provision for enhancement of child tax credit and new family credit is effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 2017 and expires for taxable years beginning after December 31, 2025. 33

Personal and Dependent Exemptions

The personal exemption for tax year 2017 remains as it was for 2016: $4,050. However, the exemption is subject to a phase-out that begins with adjusted gross incomes of $261,500 ($313,800 for married couples filing jointly). It phases out completely at $384,000 ($436,300 for married couples filing jointly.) 34

The Act suspended the personal and dependent exemptions from 2018 through 2025.³⁵ Taxpayers will be able to claim personal and dependent exemptions again in 2026.

Standard Deduction

The standard deduction for married filing jointly is $12,700 for tax year 2017, up $100 from the prior year. For single taxpayers and married individuals filing separately, the standard deduction rises to $6,350 in 2017, up from $6,300 in 2016, and for heads of households, the standard deduction will be $9,350 for tax year 2017, up from $9,300 for tax year 2016. 36

The Standard deduction is increased from 2018 through 2025. The standard deduction amounts are $12,000 (single person), $18,000 (head of household) and $24,000

Recent Legislation

Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017

The Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017, ⁱ inter alia, repealed the deduction for alimony payments for any divorce or separation instrument executed or modified after December 31, 2018. ⁱⁱ The child tax credit is temporarily increased to $2,000 per qualifying child and to provide for a temporary $500 nonrefundable credit for qualifying dependents other than qualifying children. ⁱⁱⁱ The Act eliminated the personal exemptions.^{iv} This discussion focuses on those provisions in the Act of interest to New York matrimonial lawyers.

Under existing law ^v alimony and separate maintenance payments made pursuant to a divorce or separation instrument are deductible by the payor spouse and includible in income by the recipient spouse.^{vi}

Child support payments pursuant to a divorce or separation instrument are not treated as alimony.^{vii}

The Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017, ^{viii} eliminated the deduction by the payor spouse for alimony and separate maintenance payments. The Internal Revenue Code provisions that specify that alimony and separate maintenance payments were included in income were repealed.

The treatment of child support has not changed.

The repeal is effective for any divorce or separation instrument executed after December 31, 2018, or for any divorce or separation instrument executed on or before December 31, 2018, and modified after December 31, 2018, if the modification expressly provides that these amendments apply to the modification.^{ix}

I.R.C. § 215, “Alimony, etc., payments” was repealed.^x It formerly provided, in part: “ In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to the alimony or separate maintenance payments paid during such individual’s taxable year.”^{xi} For purposes of this section, the term “alimony or separate maintenance payment” was defined to mean any alimony or separate maintenance payment (as defined in section 71(b)) which is includible in the gross income of the recipient under section 71.^{xii}

Some of the conforming amendments are discussed below.

IRC §71^{xiii} “Alimony and separate maintenance payments” was repealed. It formerly provided the general rule that gross income includes amounts received as alimony or separate maintenance payments,^{xiv} and, among other things, defined “alimony or separate maintenance payments” and a “divorce or separation instrument.”^{xv}

IRC § 61^{xvi} “Gross income defined” which contains the general definition of “gross income” was amended by striking paragraph (a) (8) titled “Alimony and separate maintenance payments” and by redesignating paragraphs (9) through (15) as paragraphs (8) through (14), respectively. It had provided: “(a) General definition. -- Except as otherwise provided in this subtitle, gross income means all income from whatever source derived, including (but not limited to) the following items: (8) Alimony and separate maintenance payments;

IRC § 62^{xvii} “Adjusted gross income defined” was amended by striking paragraph (a) (10) which defined “adjusted gross income” in the case of an individual, to mean gross income minus the following deductions: ... (10) Alimony.--The deduction allowed by section 215.”^{xviii}

Enhancement of child tax credit and new family credit

Under existing law an individual may claim a tax credit for each qualifying child under the age of 17. The amount of the credit per child is $1,000. A child who is not a citizen, national, or resident of the United States cannot be a qualifying child.^{xix}

The aggregate amount of child credits that may be claimed is phased out for individuals with income over certain threshold amounts.^{xx} Specifically, the otherwise allowable child tax credit is reduced by $50 for each $1,000 (or fraction thereof) of modified adjusted gross income (“AGI”) over $75,000 for single individuals or heads of households, $110,000 for married individuals filing joint returns, and $55,000 for married individuals filing separate returns. For purposes of this limitation, modified AGI includes certain otherwise excludable income earned by U.S. citizens or residents living abroad or in certain U.S. territories.^{xxi}

The credit is allowable against both the regular tax and the alternative minimum tax (“AMT”). To the extent the child credit exceeds the taxpayer's tax liability, the taxpayer is eligible for a refundable credit (the “additional child tax credit”) equal to 15 percent of earned income in excess of $3,000 (the “earned income” formula).^{xxii}

Families with three or more children may determine the additional child tax credit using the “alternative formula,” if this results in a larger credit than determined under the earned income formula. Under the alternative formula, the additional child tax credit equals the amount by which the taxpayer's Social Security taxes exceed the taxpayer's earned income credit (“EIC”).^{xxiii}

Earned income is defined as the sum of wages, salaries, tips, and other taxable employee compensation plus net self-employment earnings. At the taxpayer's election, combat pay may be treated as earned income for these purposes. Unlike the EIC,

which also includes the preceding items in its definition of earned income, the additional child tax credit is based only on earned income to the extent it is included in computing taxable income. For example, some ministers' parsonage allowances are considered self-employment income, and thus are considered earned income for purposes of computing the EIC, but the allowances are excluded from gross income for individual income tax purposes, and thus are not considered earned income for purposes of the additional child tax credit since the income is not included in taxable income.^{xxiv}

Any credit or refund allowed or made to an individual under this provision (including to any resident of a U.S. possession) is not taken into account as income and is not be taken into account as resources for the month of receipt and the following two months for purposes of determining eligibility of such individual or any other individual for benefits or assistance, or the amount or extent of benefits or assistance, under any Federal program or under any State or local program financed in whole or in part with Federal funds.^{xxv}

The child tax credit is temporarily increased to $2,000 per qualifying child. The credit is further modified to temporarily provide for a $500 nonrefundable credit for qualifying dependents other than qualifying children. The provision generally retains the present-law definition of dependent.^{xxvi}

The maximum amount refundable may not exceed $1,400 per qualifying child.^{xxvii} Additionally, in order to receive the child tax credit (i.e., both the refundable and non-refundable portion), a taxpayer must include a Social Security number for each qualifying child for whom the credit is claimed on the tax return. For these purposes, a Social Security number must be issued before the due date for the filing of the return for the taxable year. This requirement does not apply to a non-child dependent for whom the $500 non-refundable credit is claimed.^{xxviii}

The present-law age limit for a qualifying child is retained. Thus, a qualifying child is an individual who has not attained age 17 during the taxable year.^{xxix}

Finally, the adjusted gross income phaseout thresholds. Under the conference agreement are modified. The credit begins to phase out for taxpayers with adjusted gross income in excess of $400,000 (in the case of married taxpayers filing a joint return) and $200,000 (for all other taxpayers). These phaseout thresholds are not indexed for inflation.^{xxx}

The provision expires for taxable years beginning after December 31, 2025. The provision is effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 2017.^{xxxi}

Appellate Division, First Department

Attorney Sanctioned for prosecuting a meritless appeal

In Sonkin v Sonkin, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2018 WL 256523, 2018 N.Y. Slip Op. 00011 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied plaintiff's motion to invalidate and vacate the parties' divorce judgment on the ground that defendant did not personally sign an updated statement of net worth and the stipulation of settlement that was eventually incorporated but not merged into the judgment. Plaintiff contended on appeal that there were no documents before the motion court to warrant dismissal of the complaint based on documentary evidence pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(1). However, the court cited the documentary evidence that was proffered which served as a complete defense to plaintiff's causes of action. The Appellate Division granted defendant's request that it impose sanctions upon plaintiff and his counsel (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[a]). The action below, and the appeal before it, both of which counsel prosecuted, were plainly without merit (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c][1]). Moreover, the appeal constituted plaintiff's third unsuccessful challenge in the Court to the stipulation of settlement, which the parties entered into in 2012. In its 2016 decision and order, which affirmed, inter alia, an award of counsel fees to defendant, it held that the award was proper based in part on plaintiff's "multiple, unsuccessful attempts to void or rescind the support provisions contained in the stipulation" (Sonkin, 137 A.D.3d at 636, 28 N.Y.S.3d 361). Where a matrimonial litigant engages in a "relentless campaign to prolong th[e] litigation," sanctions in the Appellate Division are appropriate (Heilbut v. Heilbut, 18 A.D.3d 1, 8, 792 N.Y.S.2d 419 [1st Dept. 2005]; 22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c][2]). A sanction was imposed upon plaintiff in the amount of $5,000, for engaging in frivolous conduct. A sanction was imposed upon plaintiff's attorney, in the amount of $5,000, for frivolous appellate practice.

Appellate Division holds court must consider child's best interests in determining whether to apply doctrine of judicial estoppel in paternity proceeding

In Matter of Fahima A v Shah A, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6601554, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 09122 (2d Dept., 2017) the mother commenced a proceeding to declare Shah A. the father of the child. The mother's husband, Sayeed A., moved, inter alia, to dismiss the petition, contending that it was barred, among other things, by the doctrine of judicial estoppel. Family Court granted Sayeed's motion without conducting a hearing. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for a "best interests" hearing. It noted that under the doctrine of judicial estoppel, a party who assumes a certain position in a prior legal proceeding and secures a favorable judgment therein is precluded from assuming a contrary position in another action simply because his or her interests have changed (Matter of Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A.C.C., 28 N.Y.3d 1, 17, 61 N.E.3d 488). Nevertheless, the "paramount concern" in a paternity proceeding is the child's best interests. The governing statute provides that a petition for genetic testing to determine paternity shall be denied when a court makes a written finding that testing "is not in the best interests of the child on the basis of res judicata, equitable estoppel, or the presumption of legitimacy of a child born to a married woman" (Family Ct Act § 532[a]; see Family Ct Act § 418[a]). "The issue does not arise between two adults; the case turns exclusively on the best interests of the child. Similarly, the child's best interests must be considered when applying the doctrine of judicial estoppel." Family Court dismissed the petition based on evidence demonstrating that the mother had named Sayeed as the child's father in prior court filings in a related matrimonial action in which she obtained support for the child. However, the court failed to consider the child's best interests in making that determination. Since the petition was dismissed without a hearing, the record was inadequate for the Court to make any informed determination as to the child's best interests.

Excess payments made by husband under temporary order may be considered at trial "in appropriately adjusting the equitable distribution award"

In Rouis v Rouis, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6519456, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08928 (3d Dept., 2017) Plaintiff (wife) and defendant (husband) were married in 1993 and had two children (born in 1997 and 1999). The wife commenced the action for divorce in August 2014. In September 2015, the wife moved for, inter alia, temporary maintenance. Supreme Court granted the wife, among other things, temporary maintenance ($1,958 per month) and child support ($2,720 per month) and required the husband to pay for the carrying costs and upkeep of the marital home ($4,859 per month), private school for the youngest child ($848 per month), health insurance for the family ($1,921 per month), interim counsel fees ($10,000) and the wife's vehicle and fuel costs ($644 per month).

The Appellate Division held that the awards were excessive and should be reduced. Supreme Court's combined monthly awards amounted to an annual award of $155,400 plus $10,000 in interim counsel fees, to be paid from the husband's annual gross income of $183,300.50 (for purposes of maintenance) as calculated by the court based upon his 2013 tax return. In calculating the temporary maintenance award, Supreme Court applied the statutory formula (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c][1]), which "created a substantial presumptive entitlement intended to provide consistency and predictability in calculating temporary spousal maintenance awards." The wife was awarded exclusive use and possession of the marital home and resided there with the younger child; the older child also resided there when home from college. The wife also requested, on top of the presumptive maintenance award, that the husband pay $4,859 per month for the home's carrying costs, including the mortgage, taxes, utilities, insurance and upkeep. The court essentially credited the husband for one half of the carrying costs on the home ($2,429.50 per month) by reducing the presumptive maintenance award by that amount, resulting in a temporary maintenance award of $1,958 per month. Supreme Court then ordered the husband to pay the full monthly carrying costs on the home ($4,859) in which he did not reside. When the wife's vehicle expenses are added ($644 per month), this resulted in a total combined monthly award of $7,461, plus tuition ($848 per month) and child support. The net effect of Supreme Court's order was that the husband was paying the full presumptive maintenance award plus one half of the carrying costs on the home and the wife's vehicle expenses. The Appellate Division recognized that it has been held that "[t]he formula to determine temporary spousal maintenance that is outlined in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a)(c) is intended to cover all of the payee spouse's basic living expenses, including housing costs, the costs of food and clothing, and other usual expenses" (Su v. Su, 128 A.D.3d at 950, 11 N.Y.S.3d 611). In addition, the court ordered the husband, who no longer had family health coverage from his prior elective office, to obtain and pay the full amount of “equivalent coverage,” which was estimated to cost $23,052 per year, or $1,921 monthly, and apportioned an incorrect pro rata share of unreimbursed medical expenses. The husband was also ordered to pay the entire cost of the younger child’s private school tuition.

The Appellate Division held that while requiring the husband to pay a portion of the housing costs may have been appropriate, Supreme Court should have discussed why the presumptive award of temporary maintenance was “unjust or inappropriate” and the factors it considered. To that end, the court did not explain its reasons for substantially upwardly deviating from the presumptive maintenance award or the basis for requiring the husband to pay the add-on living expenses and half of the housing expenses on top of the guideline amount (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][e][2]; Su v. Su, 128 A.D.3d at 949–950, 11 N.Y.S.3d 611; Khaira v. Khaira, 93 A.D.3d at 197–200, 938 N.Y.S.2d 513). It found that the combined award was excessive. It reduced the husband’s obligation to pay the carrying costs on the marital home by approximately one half of that excess amount, or $1,540 per month, to $3,319 per month. The temporary maintenance award of $1,958 was not changed.

It found that Supreme Court miscalculated the parties’ pro rata shares of child support and remitted, the matter for immediate recalculation of the husband’s temporary child support obligation.

It noted that the excess payments made by the husband under the court’s temporary order may be considered at trial “in appropriately adjusting the equitable distribution award” (Giannuzzi v. Kearney, 127 A.D.3d at 1351, 4 N.Y.S.3d 561).

Sworn Testimony That Marriage Irretrievably Broken Down for A Period Of At Least Six Months Sufficient to Establish Cause of Action for Divorce Under Domestic Relations Law § 170(7)

In Johnston v Johnston, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6519486, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08923 (3d Dept., 2017) Plaintiff (hereinafter the wife) and defendant (hereinafter the husband) were married in September 1989 and had two children (born in 1991 and 1995). In April 2014, the wife commenced the action.

The Appellate Division held that the husband’s sworn testimony that his marriage to the wife had irretrievably broken down for a period of at least six months was sufficient to establish, as a matter of law, his cause of action for divorce pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7). Having determined that the husband established irretrievable breakdown pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7), Supreme Court was under no obligation to grant the wife a judgment of divorce on the ground of adultery or constructive abandonment (see Hoffer-Adou v. Adou, 121 A.D.3d at 619, 997 N.Y.S.2d 7)

Where Parties Had Two Children Living in Two Different States Family Court Properly

Retained Jurisdiction Over Petition. To Hold Otherwise Would Compromise Each Child's Statutory Right to Sibling Visitation.

In Matter of Korisa DD. on behalf of Morgan DD., v Michelle EE. --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6519625, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08909 (3d Dept., 2017) after entering into an “Embryo Donation Agreement,” petitioner Korisa DD. gave birth to a son in 2006 (the older child) through in vitro fertilization, utilizing ova donated by respondent Michelle EE. and sperm donated by petitioner Wayne DD., Korisa DD.’s husband. Through the same fertilization process, Michelle EE. gave birth to a son in 2007 (the younger child), who is the genetic sibling of the older child. Petitioners maintain that the two children are aware of the genetic relationship, referring to each other as “bro,” and have developed a close familial relationship. Pursuant to a May 2014 consent order issued in a separate Family Court proceeding, Michelle EE. was permitted to relocate to Kentucky with the younger child. Further, Michelle EE. and her then spouse, respondent Michael FF., agreed that they would have joint custody of the younger child, with Michael FF. having defined parenting time in New York during school breaks and over the summer. Michelle EE. moved to Kentucky with the younger child in June 2014. In July 2015, petitioners commenced a proceeding on behalf of their son seeking sibling visitation pursuant to Family Ct Act § 651(b). Michelle EE. moved to dismiss the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, contending that, under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Enforcement Act New York is no longer the “home state” of the younger child (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [7]) because the younger child lived in Kentucky since June 2014. Family Court denied the motion, finding that it had subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to Family Ct Act § 651(b).

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that court of this state has jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination only if, as pertinent here, New York is the child’s home state (see Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a]). An initial determination “means the first child custody determination concerning a particular child” (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [8]), which includes a visitation order (see Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [3]). It recognized that the younger child had resided in Kentucky for more than six months, making that state his home state under the UCCJEA (see Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [7]). However, simply focusing on the home state of one child would effectively deprive each state of initial jurisdiction in this matter. The operative distinction here was that the issue of visitation concerned both children, and New York was unquestionably the home state of the older child. Moreover, Family Court retained continuing jurisdiction over the younger child through the consent order providing respondents with joint custody of the younger child, who had significant contacts with New York (see Domestic Relations Law § 76-a [1][a]). Although not determinative, it was important to recognize that the Embryo Donation Agreement included a “Choice of Law and Jurisdiction” provision specifying that the agreement “shall be governed by, construed and enforced in accordance with the laws of the State of New York” (see Matter of Eldad LL. v. Dannai MM., 155 A.D.3d 1336, 65 N.Y.S.3d 284, — [2017]). In this context, Family Court properly retained jurisdiction over the petition. To hold otherwise would compromise each child’s statutory right to sibling visitation. The petition to establish visitation between these two children fell squarely within the embrace of Domestic Relations Law § 71 and Family Ct Act § 651 [b]).

Mother Who Petitioned for Enforcement After the Father Refused to Honor Tennessee Order to Immediately Return Child entitled to “Necessary and Reasonable Expenses Incurred (Domestic Relations Law § 77–K [1] Where Father Failed to Established Award Would Be Inappropriate.

In Matter of Jessica CC v William DD, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6519622, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08910 (3d Dept., 2017) the mother filed a Tennessee order awarding her custody for registration in New York pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (Domestic Relations Law § 77–d). The father then refused to turn over the child in defiance of the Tennessee order, prompting the mother to petition Family Court for enforcement of the Tennessee order and obtain an ex parte temporary order awarding her sole legal and physical custody of the child pending further proceedings. The child was turned over to the mother prior to an appearance on the pending petitions and, at that appearance, the father withdrew his custody modification petition and conceded that Tennessee was the appropriate forum. The mother requested an award of costs and counsel fees pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 77–k. Upon Family Court’s direction, the mother submitted paperwork reflecting that she had incurred $4,262.29 in costs and counsel fees. After considering those papers, as well as the father’s written opposition, Family Court found that the requested amount was appropriate and ordered the father to pay it.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that the mother was obliged to petition for enforcement after the father refused to honor the Tennessee order and its direction that he “immediately return the child to the [m]other” under penalty of contempt. Inasmuch as the mother succeeded in her enforcement efforts, with the father turning over the child to her and acknowledging that Tennessee was the appropriate venue, she was entitled to “necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by or on [her] behalf ..., including costs, communication expenses, attorney’s fees, investigative fees, expenses for witnesses, travel expenses, and child care during the course of the proceedings, unless the party from whom fees or expenses are sought establishes that the award would be inappropriate” (Domestic Relations Law § 77–k [1]). The father agreed that Family Court should resolve the issue on papers and failed to thereafter request a hearing. Counsel for the mother submitted an affirmation, with time sheets annexed to it, explaining that she had performed $3,750 of work but had agreed to cap her bill for the mother at $2,000. The mother also submitted her own affidavit in which she set forth the travel and lodging expenses incurred as the result of her quest to recover the child in New York. The father responded by nitpicking the amount sought and claiming that any award would be inappropriate given his allegedly virtuous aims. The costs and counsel fees sought were reasonable and in light of the father’s refusal to turn the child over to the mother despite an order directing him to do so from a jurisdiction that he never disputed was a correct one, the father failed to establish that the award would be inappropriate (Domestic Relations Law § 77–k [1]).

Where Separation Agreements Unconscionable and Product of Overreaching Court Vacates Financial Provisions of Divorce Judgment

In Tuzzolino v Tuzzolino, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6546093, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08991 (4th Dept., 2017) the parties were married in 1978 and entered into a separation agreement on October 30, 2013 and a modification agreement on July 7, 2014. In October 2015, plaintiff husband commenced an action seeking a divorce and to have the agreements set aside. Supreme Court denied his motion. The Appellate Division found that at the time the parties entered into the agreements, defendant wife was represented by counsel but plaintiff was not, which, while not dispositive, is a significant factor for us to consider. Another factor to consider is that the agreements did not make a full disclosure of the finances of the parties. Defendant, who had a master's degree in business administration and was a professor at a SUNY college, would receive two pensions upon retirement, neither of which was valued. The separation agreement did not provide for any maintenance for plaintiff despite the gross disparity in incomes and the length of the marriage and, while the modification agreement provided maintenance for plaintiff, it also required plaintiff to transfer his interest in the marital residence to defendant. In opposition to the motion, defendant averred that the parties "wanted an agreement whereby [plaintiff] would keep his income and retirement assets and I would keep mine." As shown by their statements of net worth, which were prepared after the agreements were executed, plaintiff's assets totaled approximately $77,000 whereas defendant's assets, which included the marital residence, totaled approximately $740,000. Based on its consideration of all the factors, the Appellate Division concluded that the agreements were unconscionable and were the product of overreaching by defendant and should be set aside. It reversed the judgment, granted the motion, and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine the issues of equitable distribution and maintenance.

Doctrine of Unclean Hands Applied to deny vacatur of divorce judgment

In Sui-Hsu Hsieh v Yen-Tung Teng, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6545844, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 09008 (4th Dept., 2017), defendant husband was ordered by a 2008 divorce to pay plaintiff wife a distributive award, maintenance, and child support. Shortly thereafter, defendant relocated to Taiwan and failed to comply with the judgment or with subsequent judgments ordering him to pay money to plaintiff. In August 2016 Defendant moved, inter alia, to vacate the judgment of divorce regarding the division of assets and his obligation to pay maintenance and child support. According to defendant, he learned in early 2016 that, during the marriage, plaintiff acquired property in Taiwan that she failed to disclose in her statement of net worth. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion based on the doctrine of unclean hands. "A trial court may relieve a party from the terms of a judgment of divorce on the grounds of fraud or misrepresentation (see CPLR 5015[a][3]), but the decision to grant such motion rests in the trial court's discretion" (VanZandt v. VanZandt, 88 AD3d 1232, 1233 [3d Dept. 2011]). The doctrine of unclean hands is an equitable defense and is applicable to the equitable relief sought by defendant, i.e., vacatur of the equitable distribution, maintenance, and child support provisions of the judgment of divorce.

Court Rules Amendments

22 NYCRR 137.6 (a)(1) Amended

NY Order 17-0021 amended 22 NYCRR 137.6 (a) (1) dealing with the Mandatory Arbitration Procedure to add a provision that where the attorney seeks to commence an action against the client for attorney's fees he must comply with the Fee Arbitration Rules. It modified 22 NYCRR 137.6 to read as follows

(a)(1) Except as set forth in paragraph (2), where the attorney and client cannot agree as to the attorney's fee or where the attorney seeks to commence an action against the client for attorney's fees, the attorney shall forward a written notice to the client, entitled Notice of Client's Right to Arbitrate, by certified mail or by personal service. The notice (i) shall be in a form approved by the board of governors; (ii) shall contain a statement of the client's right to arbitrate; (iii) shall advise that the client has 30 days from receipt of the notice in which to elect to resolve the dispute under this Part; (iv) shall be accompanied by the written instructions and procedures for the arbitral body having jurisdiction over the fee dispute, which explain how to commence a fee arbitration proceeding; and (v) shall be accompanied by a copy of the "request for arbitration" form necessary to commence the arbitration proceeding.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit

Second Circuit defines "Retention" for purposes of the Hague Convention on International Child Abduction and Explains when the Convention Enters into Force

In Marks v. Hochhauser 2017 WL 5760345 (2d Cir., 2017) the Second Circuit held that for purposes of the Convention "retention" is a singular and not a continuing act; and that the Convention does not enter into force until a ratifying state accepts an acceding state's accession.

The parties were American citizens who were living in Hong Kong when their three sons were born, one in 2002 and twins in 2005. In July 2005, the parties and the children relocated to Bangkok, Thailand. In August 2015, Marks and Hochhauser were divorced, in Thailand, and the divorce judgment granted Hochhauser sole custody of the Children. On September 18, 2015, Hochhauser and the Children traveled to the United States to visit Hochhauser's ill mother. Before their departure, Hochhauser represented to Marks and the Thai court that she and the Children would stay in New York for three weeks and then return to Thailand on October 10, 2015. On October 7, 2015, Hochhauser sent Marks an email as follows: "I have made the decision to remain in the United States with the boys. It is clear to me now that there is no workable solution for us to live in Thailand. This decision was based upon trying to build a future for both myself and them, not out of any anger toward you about the past or any desire to exclude you from their lives. The boys need you to continue to be an important part of their lives and I will do as much as I can to facilitate that. Hopefully we can find a way to build a working relationship for their benefit." On January 25, 2016, the Thai Court of Appeals vacated the trial court's judgment in part and held that Marks and Hochhauser "shall exercise joint custody of all of their three minor children."

Marks filed a petition for the return of the Children to Thailand on September 9, 2016, within one year of the date Hochhauser advised Marks that she and the Children would not be returning to Thailand. Hochhauser moved to dismiss the petition, arguing, inter alia, that any wrongful retention of the Children took place prior to the Convention's entry into force between the United States and Thailand. The district court granted the motion to dismiss the petition. It first concluded that "retention" is a singular and not a continuing act and that the singular act here occurred on October 7, 2015, when Hochhauser sent her email to Marks advising that she and the Children were not returning to Thailand. It then concluded that the Convention did not enter into force between the United States and Thailand until April 2016, after the United States accepted Thailand's accession to the Convention. The district court held that the retention occurred before the Convention entered into force between the two countries and entered judgment on November 7, 2016, granting the motion to dismiss the petition.

The Second Circuit affirmed. It agreed with the district court that "retention" for these purposes is a singular and not a continuing act. It concluded that the Convention contemplates that "retention" occurs on a fixed date. Here, that date was October 7, 2015, when Hochhauser advised Marks that she would not be returning with the Children to Thailand.

The Second Circuit observed that Article 35 of the Convention provides that it "shall apply as between Contracting States only to wrongful removals or retentions occurring after its entry into force in those States." Convention, art. 35. Hence, if the removal or retention occurs before the Convention has entered into force between two States, the Convention does not apply.

The Court noted that the Convention does not define "Contracting State," but Articles 37 and 38 provide two separate procedures for countries to accept the Convention. Under Article 37, "[t]he Convention shall be open for signature by the States which were Members of the Hague Conference of Private International Law [the 'CPIL'] at the time of its Fourteenth Session." Convention, art. 37. Once a State signs, the Convention must be "ratified, accepted or approved and the instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval" must be deposited with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in the Netherlands. Convention, art. 37. Article 38 provides an acceptance procedure for states that were not members of the CPIL at the time of its fourteenth session. In lieu of ratification, these states may "accede" to the Convention. Article 38 explains that: Any other State may accede to the Convention. ... The accession will have effect only as regards the relations between the acceding State and such Contracting States as will have declared their acceptance of the accession. ... The Convention will enter into force as between the acceding State and the State that has declared its acceptance of the accession on the first day of the third calendar month after the deposit of the declaration of acceptance. Convention, art. 38. As Article 38 makes clear, accession requires the acceptance of other states before the Convention “will enter into force,” i.e., the accession has effect only as to Contracting States that “have declared their acceptance of the accession.” Id.

At the time the Convention was opened for signature, the United States was a member of the CPIL and Thailand was not. The United States signed the Convention in 1981 and ratified it, thereby becoming a Contracting State, in 1988, and the Convention entered into force in the United States on July 1, 1988. See Contracting State Status Table; Souratgar, 720 F.3d at 102 n.5. Thailand acceded to the Convention, pursuant to Article 38, on August 14, 2002, and it entered into force in Thailand on November 1, 2002. Id. The United States accepted Thailand’s accession to the Convention on January 26, 2016. See Acceptances of Accessions: Thailand, Hague Conference on Private International Law, <https://www.hcch.net/en/instruments/conventions/status-table/acceptances/?mid=670> (last visited Sept. 26, 2017) (“Acceptances of Accessions Table”). The first day of the third calendar month after the United States accepted Thailand’s accession was April 1, 2016. See id.; Convention, art. 38.

The Court then held that the Convention does not enter into force until a ratifying state accepts an acceding state’s accession and that Article 35 limits the Convention’s application to removals and retentions taking place after the Convention has entered into force between the two states involved. Therefore, because the Convention did not enter into force between the United States and Thailand until April 1, 2016, after the allegedly wrongful retention of the children in New York on October 7, 2015, the Convention did not apply to petitioner’s claim.

Supreme Court

Supreme Court holds that Court In Matrimonial Action May grant an interim charging lien to outgoing attorney

In Dayan v Dayan, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 6043430, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 27399 (Sup. Ct., 2017) Plaintiff’s incoming counsel moved for, inter alia, an order directing former counsel to turn over the file to plaintiff’s new attorney.

Supreme Court, held that in a matrimonial action the right to a charging lien must be held in abeyance in order to satisfy the dictates of Charnow v. Charnow (134 AD3d 875, 876, 22 N.Y.S.3d 126 [2d Dept., 2015]) which held that a charging lien is limited “to the extent that an equitable distribution award reflects the creation of a new fund by an attorney greater than the value of the interests already held by the client.” Charnow creates the situation where a plaintiff cannot secure her file because the issue of a charging lien is not ripe for adjudication pendente lite since the case has not yet been tried and determined.

With regard to the retaining lien the Court held that it must be established that outgoing counsel has a right to a hearing on the issue of a retaining lien, and the court may set a security interest and an “interim charging lien.” That lien would then be subject to a further hearing at the conclusion of the trial and after decision to determine the amount of a “final charging lien” that would attach to proceeds that is limited “to the extent that an equitable distribution award reflects the creation of a new fund by an attorney greater than the value of the interests already held by the client” (Charnow at 876). The Court found that the wife’s claim of indigence was sufficiently controverted so as to require a hearing before a retaining lien could be extinguished and the Court could fix the required security pending completion of the case. The Court had to refer the matter to a hearing to determine plaintiff’s counsels appropriate fee and the posting of adequate security to satisfy the retaining lien.

The Court noted that an attorney of record who is discharged without cause possesses a charging lien pursuant to Judiciary Law § 475. In a matrimonial action a charging lien will be available “to the extent that an equitable distribution award reflects the creation of a new fund by an attorney greater than the value of the interest already held by the client. ’ Moody v. Sorokina, 50 AD3d 1522, 1523, 856 N.Y.S.2d 755. Where the attorney’s services do not create any proceeds, but consist solely of defending a title or interest already held by the client, there is no lien on that title or interest (Charnow v. Charnow 134 AD3d 875, 876, 22 N.Y.S.3d 126, 127–28 [2 Dept.2015]). A charging lien does not attach to an award of alimony or maintenance” (Turner v. Woolworth, 221 N.Y. 425, 117 N.E. 814 (1917); Theroux v. Theroux, 145 A.D.2d 625, 627, [2d Dept., 1988]) or an award of child support (CPLR 5205[d][3])” (Haser v. Haser, 271 A.D.2d 253, 254, [1st Dept., 2000]). It noted that Mura v. Mura , 128 AD3d 1344, 1347, 7 N.Y.S.3d 766 (4d Dept., 2014), held that a charging lien could attach to a child support award because “plaintiff did not seek to enforce the 16–year–old support obligation until the parties’ children, who were the intended beneficiaries of the support, were either emancipated or nearly emancipated. In light of the fact that the divorce action was still pending, and no final decision on equitable distribution had been determined, there was no “recovery” for the charging lien to attach to. Supreme Court deemed the application as one for a final charging lien and denied it without prejudice as premature. It held that case law prevents the attorney, pendente lite, from attaching a final charging lien to any fund prior to a determination as to whether a “new fund” has been created by the attorney’s efforts as the matter had not yet proceeded to trial and no judgments had been issued. Thus, any establishment of a charging lien had to be delineated as an interim charging lien subject to a hearing on a final charging lien once the matter was concluded.

The Court referred this issue of fixing the security interest and interim charging lien to a hearing to a Referee to hear and report subject to compliance with 22 NYCRR part 1400 (Hovanec v. Hovanec, 79 AD3d 816, 817, 912 N.Y.S.2d 442 [2d Dept., 2010]). It directed that : “If any lien is established by the Court, plaintiff’s former attorney will then be ordered by the Court to turn over the file for posting adequate security under the present statutory and case law requirements or outgoing counsel may be granted an “interim charging lien.” The interim charging lien would serve to prevent this matter from further delay and give counsel adequate security to extinguish the retaining lien. However, that security interest and the “interim charging lien” would be subject to further adjustment once the case has been properly adjudicated and then a further hearing can be held to determine what role Mr. Buttermann or his firm had in obtaining the result achieved in equitable distribution consistent with the dictates of Charnow. Then and only then would a final charging lien attach.”

Court of Appeals

Dismissal of A Neglect Petition Divests Family Court of Jurisdiction to Issue Further Orders or Impose Additional Conditions on A Child's Release

In Matter of Jamie J., 2017 WL 5557887, 2017 NY Slip Op 08161 (2017) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Wilson, held that Family Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction to conduct a permanency hearing pursuant to Family Court Act article 10-A once the underlying neglect petition brought under Article 10 has been dismissed for failure to prove neglect. The dismissal of a neglect petition terminates Family Court's jurisdiction.

Jamie J. was born in November 2014. A week later, at the request of the Wayne County Department of Social Services, Family Court directed her temporary removal from Michelle E.C.'s custody pursuant to an ex parte pre-petition order under FCA § 1022. Four days after that, the Department filed its FCA article 10 neglect petition. More than a year later, on the eve of the fact-finding hearing held to determine whether it could carry its burden to prove neglect, the Department moved to amend its petition to conform the pleadings with the proof. Family Court denied that eleventh-hour motion as unfairly prejudicial to Michelle E.C. and to the attorney for Jamie J. After hearing evidence, Family Court found that the Department failed to prove neglect, and therefore dismissed the petition. The Department did not appeal that decision. Family Court did not release Jamie J. into her mother's custody when it dismissed the article 10 neglect petition. Instead, at the Department's insistence and over Michelle E.C.'s objection, it held a second permanency hearing, which had been scheduled as a matter of course during the statutorily required first permanency hearing in the summer of 2015. Family Court and the Department contended that, even though the Department had failed to prove any legal basis to remove Jamie J. from her mother, article 10-A of the FCA gave Family Court continuing jurisdiction over Jamie J. and entitled it to continue her placement in foster care. Family Court held the second permanency hearing on January 19, 2016. There, Michelle E.C. argued, as she did here, that the dismissal of the neglect proceeding ended Family Court's subject matter jurisdiction and should have required her daughter's immediate return. Solely to expedite her appeal of that issue, Michelle E.C. consented to a second permanency hearing order denying her motion to dismiss the proceeding and continuing Jamie J.'s placement in foster care. The Appellate Division, with two Justices dissenting, affirmed.

Judge Wilson observed that the appeal presented a straightforward question of statutory interpretation: does FCA article 10-A provide an independent grant of continuing jurisdiction that survives the dismissal of the underlying article 10 neglect petition? The Court rejected the Departments “hyperliteral reading of section 1088, divorced from all context,” to argue that Family Court's pre-petition placement of Jamie J. under section 1022 triggered a continuing grant of jurisdiction that survived the eventual dismissal of the neglect petition. In other words, even if the Family Court removes a child who has not been neglected or abused, it has jurisdiction to continue that child's placement in foster care until and unless it decides otherwise. The Court held that Section 1088's place in the overall statutory scheme, the legislative history of article 10-A, and the dictates of parents' and children's constitutional rights to remain together compelled the opposite conclusion. Family Court's jurisdiction terminates upon dismissal of the original neglect or abuse petition. Observing that the Court held in Matter of Tammie Z., “if abuse or neglect is not proved, the court must dismiss the petition . . . at which time the child is returned to the parents” (66 NY2d 1, 4-5 [1985]), nothing in the legislative history of article 10-A suggested that its drafters intended to overturn the long-established rule, promulgated by pre-2005 decisions of the Court and of the Appellate Division, that the dismissal of a neglect petition divests Family Court of jurisdiction to issue further orders or impose additional conditions on a child's release. Instead, that history demonstrated that the drafters intended only to correct a technical issue that plagued article 10 and threatened the State's continued access to federal funding under Title IV of the Social Security Act. The order was reversed and the January 26, 2016 permanency order vacated.

Appellate Division, First Department

Appellate Division holds that under circumstances of case, court properly awarded prospective maintenance only. Credit properly denied for Payments towards mortgage and maintenance on marital residence. Such payments were made in satisfaction of defendant's own contractual obligations and did not constitute voluntary payments contemplated under Domestic Relations Law § 236(B) (7) (a)

In Aristova v. Derkach, 2017 WL 5575056 (1s Dept., 2017) on December 27, 2004, the parties signed an agreement, effective as of August 1, 2004 (the Termination Agreement), pursuant to which they terminated a preexisting separation agreement but agreed, among other things, that property each had acquired before August 1, 2004 would be separate property.

The Appellate Division held that the court correctly determined equitable distribution in accordance with the terms of the Termination Agreement, upon its finding after trial that defendant failed to prove that the Termination Agreement, which was written, signed, and properly acknowledged, was invalid. While he was not represented by counsel, defendant, an engineer with an MBA, was sufficiently sophisticated to be aware that he might need counsel, particularly given plaintiff's forthright explanation that her purpose in entering into the agreement was to protect her rights to an apartment she had purchased before August 1, 2004, and the fact that she had given him a week to review the agreement before signing it. Moreover, plaintiff, although an attorney, was not a matrimonial lawyer, and needed the help of online forms in drafting the agreement.

The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the court properly awarded prospective maintenance only. During the first two years following commencement of the action, the parties lived together in the marital residence with their children. The trial evidence showed that, during that period, plaintiff voluntarily bore the majority of the family's expenses, including costs associated with the parties' cooperative apartment, and the family's medical and dental insurance costs, as well as groceries and other family expenses. Defendant did not move for pendente lite relief until two months before the scheduled trial date.

The Appellate Division rejected Defendant's contention that he was entitled to a credit against the retroactive child support award because it was unsupported by a showing of any payments he made for child-related expenses. To the extent he relied on his payments towards the mortgage and maintenance on the marital residence, it found that these payments were made in satisfaction of defendant's own contractual obligations and did not constitute the voluntary payments contemplated under Domestic Relations Law § 236(B) (7) (a) (see Krantz v. Krantz, 175 A.D.2d 865 [2d Dept 1991], accord Sergeon v. Surgeon, 216 A.D.2d 122 [1st Dept 1995]).

Family Court Act § 424–a(a) requires that parties to child support proceedings submit most recently filed income tax returns. Where petitioner mother failed without good cause to submit most recent tax returns Support Magistrate improvidently exercised discretion in failing to adjourn proceeding until mother filed required documents

In Matter of Feixia Wi-Fisher v Michael, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 5473843 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate properly imputed income to the father based on his future earning capacity and the funds he received from his wife to pay his expenses, where he had access to his wife's bank accounts which were used to pay the household's expenses.

The Appellate Division observed that Family Court Act § 424–a(a) requires that parties to child support proceedings submit certain required financial documents, including the party's most recently filed state and federal income tax returns. When a petitioner fails without good cause to file the required documents, "the court may on its own motion or upon application of any party adjourn such proceeding until such time as the petitioner files with the court such statements and tax returns" (Family Ct Act § 424–a[c]). Here, the mother failed without good cause to submit her most recent tax returns. Further, her testimony and the financial documents she did submit did not remedy her failure to make complete financial disclosure, since the mother's financial disclosure affidavit contained inconsistencies, her claimed rental income was unsubstantiated, and her testimony regarding her income and expenses was determined to be incredible. Accordingly, the Support Magistrate improvidently exercised her discretion in failing to adjourn the proceeding until such time as the mother filed the required documents. It remitted the matter for a new determination of the father's child support obligation following the mother's submission of the required financial disclosure.

Error to awarded plaintiff portion of appreciation in value of defendant's dental practice during marriage where she failed to establish the baseline value of the business and the extent of its appreciation

In Lestz v Lestz, 2017 WL 5473999 (2d Dept., 2017) the parties married in 1984. At that time, the defendant, who had been a dentist for at least five or six years, had his own dental practice at which the plaintiff was an employee. In 2007, the plaintiff commenced the divorce action. After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff a portion of the appreciation in value of the defendant's dental practice during the marriage. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that an increase in the value of separate property is considered separate property 'except to the extent that such appreciation is due in part to the contributions or efforts of the other spouse. (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [1] [d] [3]). The nontitled spouse has the burden of establishing that any increase in the value of the separate property was due at least in part to his or her direct or indirect contributions or efforts during the marriage. Here, the Supreme Court improperly awarded the plaintiff the sum of $91,500, representing, in effect, 25% of the appreciation in value during the marriage of the defendant's dental practice, which was his separate property. Although the evidence at trial demonstrated that the plaintiff made limited contributions with respect to the practice, the plaintiff did not offer any proof of the value of the dental practice at the time of the marriage. Accordingly, she failed to satisfy her burden of establishing "the baseline value of the business and the extent of its appreciation" (Morrow v. Morrow, 19 A.D.3d at 254, 800 N.Y.S.2d 378), and the court erred in making an award to the plaintiff on this basis (see Ceravolo v. DeSantis, 125 A.D.3d 113, 117–118, 1 N.Y.S.3d 468; Clark v. Clark, 117 A.D.3d at 669, 985 N.Y.S.2d 276; Davidman v. Davidman, 97 A.D.3d 627, 628, 948 N.Y.S.2d 639; Albanese v. Albanese, 69 A.D.3d 1005, 1006, 892 N.Y.S.2d 631; *Burgio v. Postsecondary education expenses are not subject to collection through income execution

In Dillon v Dillon, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 5489353, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08062 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held, inter alia, that Family Court erred in directing that the mother's payments toward the child's college education be made through the Support Collection Unit, as "postsecondary education expenses [are] a separate item in addition to the basic child support obligation” (Matter of Cohen v. Rosen, 207 A.D.2d 155, 157 [1995], lv denied 86 N.Y.2d 702 [1995]; see Cimons v. Cimons, 53 AD3d 125, 131 [2008]; Tryon v. A Court Errs In Granting A QDRO More Expansive Than an Underlying Written Separation Agreement Regardless of Whether the Parties or Their Attorneys Approved the QDRO

In Sanitllo v Santillo, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 5505810, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 08155 (4th Dept., 2017) the parties divorced in 1994, and the separation agreement incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce provided that plaintiff was entitled to a share of defendant’s pension benefits “until her death or remarriage, or [defendant’s] death,” whichever occurred first. Although plaintiff remarried in August 1995, defendant’s attorney executed a qualified domestic relations order (QDRO) that was entered in February 1996. The QDRO did not provide that plaintiff’s entitlement to a share of defendant’s pension would terminate upon her remarriage. In April 2016, defendant filed his retirement documents with the New York State and Local Retirement System and discovered the existence of the QDRO. Shortly thereafter, he moved for, inter alia, an order vacating the QDRO inasmuch as it is inconsistent with the separation agreement. The Appellate Division agreed with defendant that the court erred in denying his motion to vacate the QDRO. A QDRO obtained pursuant to a separation agreement ‘can convey only those rights ... which the parties [agreed to] as a basis for the judgment’ “(Duhamel v. Duhamel [appeal No. 1], 4 AD3d 739, 741 [4th Dept 2004], quoting McCoy v. Feinman, 99 N.Y.2d 295, 304 [2002]). Thus, it is well established that a court errs in granting a QDRO more expansive than an underlying written separation agreement”, regardless whether the parties or their attorneys approved the QDRO without objecting to the inconsistency (see Page v. Page, 39 AD3d 1204, 1205 [4th Dept 2007]). Under such circumstances, the court has the authority to vacate or amend the QDRO as appropriate to reflect the provisions of the separation agreement (see Beiter v. Beiter, 67 AD3d 1415, 1417 [4th Dept 2009]). It found that the QDRO should never have been entered in the first instance because the clear and unambiguous language of the separation agreement provided that plaintiff’s rights in defendant’s pension benefits had terminated upon her remarriage.

The Appellate Division rejected plaintiff’s contention that defendant was barred by laches from seeking to vacate the QDRO. “The defense of laches requires both delay in bringing an action and a showing of prejudice to the adverse party” (Beiter, 67 AD3d at 1416]; see Matter of Sierra Club v. Village of Painted Post, 134 AD3d 1475, 1476 [4th Dept 2015]). Even assuming, arguendo, that there was a delay in seeking to vacate the QDRO, it concluded that plaintiff did not demonstrate that she was prejudiced by that delay.

Appellate Division Holds Supreme Court Has The Authority To Enforce Promissory Notes To A Third Party.

In Schorr v Schorr, 2017 WL 4892266 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that in calculating the child support award, the court properly imputed income to defendant by including significant funds he received from his parents to pay his expenses (see Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][b][5][iv][d]). Defendant was self-employed and refused to maintain a general ledger or financial records for his business. Trial evidence supported the court's finding that defendant inflated his expenses on his tax returns so as to deflate his reported net income, and otherwise manipulated his income. Further, the defendant, who was the sole executor of his father's estate, admitted to using estate funds directly to pay some of his personal expenses. In view of its inability to quantify these alternate sources of revenue available to the defendant, the court acted within its discretion in imputing income to him based on the discernible measure of parental contributions.

The Appellate Division held that the court providently exercised its discretion in directing the parties to repay to plaintiff's parents from the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence a loan for monies borrowed from her father to purchase the marital residence. It rejected defendant's contention that the court does not have the authority to enforce promissory notes to a third party.

Unequal Distribution Of Marital Property Under DRL § 236(B)(5)(d)(14) Allowed Where Spouse'S Criminal Conduct And Incarceration Impacts Family. Not Necessary for Court To Make Finding Of Marital Waste To Impose Financial Responsibility On A Party For Expenses Arising From His Or Her Criminal Activities.

In Linda G., v. James G., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 5326824 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that there can be an unequal distribution of the marital home under the "just and proper" standard set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(d)(14) where a spouse's criminal conduct and subsequent incarceration impacts the family. The parties were married in 1989. They had two children from the marriage. Shortly after the older son was born, the family purchased and moved into a cooperative apartment on Park Avenue in Manhattan. The husband was a partner in Ernst & Young (E & Y). In October 2007, due to a pending Securities and Exchange Commission insider trading investigation, the husband resigned. At that time, he had been earning $1.25 million a year. In 2010, the husband was indicted on charges of conspiracy and insider trading. He was found guilty and served a one year and one day sentence in federal prison from May 2010 through January 2011. The SEC investigation and criminal trial depleted the joint assets of the parties. The divorce proceedings started on January 26, 2010. The wife returned to work at JP Morgan in February of 2010, shortly before the husband was imprisoned. In 2013, her base salary was $300,000 and her bonus was more than $200,000. The husband began working at Sherwood Partners after his release from incarceration and testified that, as of 2013, his base salary was $226,000. At the time of the trial, the apartment was valued at $4.75 million. The husband admitted that he stopped contributing to the mortgage shortly before he went to prison in May 2010.

Supreme Court took into account the husband's "adulterous and criminal behavior" and awarded the wife 75% of the marital home. The Appellate Division held the husband's adulterous conduct was not sufficiently egregious and shocking to the conscience to justify making an unequal distribution of the marital home. However, it held that the impact of the husband's criminal conduct on the family may be considered in making an unequal distribution. Comparing this case to the facts in Kohl v. Kohl (6 Misc.3d 1009[A], 2004 N.Y. Slip Op 51759[U], *24 [Sup Ct., N.Y. County 2004], aff'd 24 AD3d 219 [1st Dept. 2005]) the record supported an unequal distribution. The parties were required to spend down their savings from 2007 through 2010 when the husband was forced to resign due to the SEC investigation. He refused to take a plea bargain and insisted on going to trial, blaming a woman with whom he had an extramarital affair for his insider trading. He was convicted of a felony and lost his license to practice law. The husband's post-incarceration earnings at the time of the trial dropped significantly to less than 20% of his prior income. His income never returned to the level he earned prior to the conviction. As a result of the husband's criminal actions, the wife, who had left a lucrative career to raise their children, was compelled to return to work after being out of the workforce for almost a decade. This meant that the wife could no longer remain at home with the children. During this time, the younger son suffered from psychiatric issues and the older son from significant emotional issues. The husband's insider trading, and ensuing criminal trial, conviction and incarceration caused the family to undergo financial losses and a substantial decrease in the standard of living. These events also significantly disrupted the family's stability and well-being. Based on its review of the record, it found that a 60%/40% equitable division of the value of the marital estate was just and proper when taking into account the hardship that the husband put his family through as a result of his volitional and irresponsible behavior.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's award to the wife of a credit of 50% of marital funds expended in connection with the SEC investigation and criminal proceedings was proper, relying on Kohl v Kohl, where, the court found that the husband should be responsible for 65% of the legal fees for civil forfeiture proceedings and the wife responsible for 35% (2004 N.Y. Slip Op 51759[U], *30). It agreed with the wife that she should not be liable for legal fees as she was not a party to the SEC action and also believed the husband's assertions of innocence. To hold the wife responsible for the accumulation of substantial legal fees for which she shared no culpability would be inequitable. It held that it is not necessary for a court to make a finding of marital waste to impose financial responsibility on a party for expenses arising from his or her criminal activities (Kohl, 24 AD3d at 220). The portion of the judgment awarding the wife a 50% credit for the legal fees arising from the husband's criminal activity was affirmed.

Order or Judgment Entered By Lower Court On A Remittitur Must Conform Strictly To The Remittitur.

In Stassa v Stassa, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4930843, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07629 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that trial court, upon remittitur from the Appellate Division, lacks the power to deviate from the mandate of the higher court. An order or judgment entered by the lower court on a remittitur 'must conform strictly to the remittitur. Here, the Supreme Court erred in failing to adhere to the terms of its remittitur.

Third Department Holds Default Is Not Willful Under DRL §244 When It Arises with "A Sincere, Though Mistaken, Belief That Payments Were Not Required, Especially When That Belief Was Based Upon Advice from Counsel"

In Seale v Seale, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4817287, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07492 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held, inter alia, that the wife's request for a money judgment for arrears of payments due pursuant to the judgment of divorce should have been granted. Domestic Relations Law § 244 provides that, upon a party's failure to make any payment for an obligation under a judgment of divorce other than child support, "the court shall make an order directing the entry of judgment for the amount of arrears . . . unless the defaulting party shows good cause for failure to make application for relief . . . prior to the accrual of such arrears" (emphasis added). This provision was intended to shift the burden of seeking relief to the defaulting spouse and to limit a court's discretion in determining whether to grant judgments for arrears. The husband offered various explanations for his failure to make timely payments, but he neither applied for relief prior to his default nor stated any reason for his failure to do so. Supreme Court thus had no discretion to deny the wife's request for a judgment in the full amount of the arrears.

It was undisputed that no arrears remained outstanding. Nevertheless, the wife sought interest for the periods in which the various payments were due but unpaid. Domestic Relations Law § 244 mandates the payment of interest upon arrears "if the default was willful, in that the obligated spouse knowingly, consciously and voluntarily disregarded the obligation under a lawful court order." The Appellate Division held that a default is not willful when it arises from financial disability or from "a sincere, though mistaken, belief that payments were not required, especially when that belief was based upon advice from counsel" (Parnes v Parnes, 41 AD3d 934, 937 [2007]; see Desautels v Desautels, 80 AD3d 926, 930 [2011]; see also Allen v Allen, 83 AD2d 708, 709 [1981]). Here, the husband owned, as his separate property, a number of valuable parcels of real estate, including several business properties. However, he contended that he was in significant financial distress and had no liquid resources other than sales of his separate property with which to satisfy his equitable distribution obligations. The divorce judgment offered some implied support for this assertion by directing the husband to satisfy most of his equitable distribution obligations by selling parcels of his separate property. In addition to evidence specifically detailing the outstanding debts, tax obligations and other financial constraints that resulted in the husband's lack of liquid resources, his submissions established that a June 2014 separate property transaction yielded no funds from which payments could have been made to the wife and that the proceeds of a September 2014 sale, while adequate to permit payment of the other obligations, did not yield sufficient funds to cover the second counsel fee installment payment. A showing of inability to pay does not preclude a judgment for arrears pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 244. Nevertheless, for the purpose of determining the interest issue, the Appellate Division found the husband met his burden to demonstrate that his defaults at the time of the property sales were not willful. Both a bench decision issued shortly after the September 2014 transaction and the January 2015 order upon appeal interpreted the provisions of the divorce judgment to find that the second counsel fee installment payment had not yet become due. Although it disagreed with this interpretation, these rulings provided the basis for a sincere belief on the husband's part that he was not then required to make the second installment payment (see Desautels v Desautels, 80 AD3d at 930; Parnes v Parnes, 41 AD3d at 937). Under these circumstances, it found that the husband met his burden to demonstrate that his delay in making payments was not willful. Thus, the wife was not entitled to interest for the periods of delay.

Wife Estopped from claiming charitable contributions were marital waste. A party to litigation may not take a position contrary to a position taken in an income tax return

In Melvin v Melvin, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4781198, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07421 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the plaintiff husband's cross motion for an order declaring defendant wife judicially estopped from claiming that charitable contributions reported on the parties' joint income tax returns from 2011 through 2015 constituted marital waste. The wife argued that charitable contributions totaling approximately $1.5 million, reflected on the parties' joint tax returns from 2011 through 2015, were made without her consent. However, she did not deny that she signed the tax returns under penalty of perjury, that the charity receiving the contributions was a bona fide nonprofit organization, and that the marital estate received a benefit from the contributions in the form of tax deductions. Although the wife claimed that the husband only sent her the signature page of the tax returns, so that she was unaware of their contents, she had unfettered access to the complete returns from the parties' accountant. In any event, by signing the tax returns, she is presumed to have read and understood their contents (see Vulcan Power Co. v. Munson, 89 AD3d 494 [1st Dept 2011], lv denied 19 NY3d 807 [2012]; see also Da Silva v. Musso, 53 N.Y.2d 543, 550–551 [1981]). “A party to litigation may not take a position contrary to a position taken in an income tax return” (Mahoney–Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 NY3d 415, 422 [2009]). By signing the joint tax return, the wife represented that the charitable contributions were made in both parties' names as a married couple. Thus, she was judicially estopped from now claiming that the donations were, in fact, made without her consent.

Volitional actions which result in unemployment, do not constitute extreme hardship warranting Modification of Child Support

In Matter of Richard K v Deborah K, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4542490 (Mem), 2017

N.Y. Slip Op. 07173 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that the father, a disbarred attorney who was imprisoned, failed to demonstrate the extreme hardship necessary to obtain modification of the maintenance obligations contained in the parties' stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into the parties' divorce judgment (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][9][b]). A husband's volitional actions which result in his unemployment, including incarceration preventing any employment, do not constitute such extreme hardship (see Fabrikant v. Fabrikant, 62 AD3d 585, 586 [1st Dept 2009]).

Movant may not meet burden on motion by submitting evidence in Reply

In Dankenbrink v Dankenbrink, 2017 WL 4658402 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division, in vacating an order, which vacated a default judgment, held that a movant may not meet his or her burden on a motion by submitting evidence in reply (see Pinos v. Clinton Café & Deli, Inc., 139 AD3d 1034; Cotter v. Brookhaven Mem. Hosp. Med. Ctr., 97 AD3d 524; Tingling v. C.I.N.H.R., Inc., 74 AD3d 954). There is no express requirement to submit documentation pertaining to the Office of Children and Family Services in a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act § 661(a)

In Matter of Francisca M.V.R. v. Jose G.H.G., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4655898, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07258 (2d Dept., 2017) the mother commenced a proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 6 to be appointed guardian of the child for the purpose of obtaining an order declaring that the child was dependent on the Family Court and making specific findings so as to enable the child to petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status (SIJS) pursuant to 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J). The Family Court denied the mothers motion for the issuance of an order making the requisite declaration and specific findings so as to enable the child to petition for SIJS without a hearing and dismissed the guardianship petition "for failure to produce required documentation" and "for failure to prosecute." The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for a hearing. It held that there is no express requirement to submit documentation pertaining to the Office of Children and Family Services in a proceeding such as this pursuant to Family Court Act § 661(a) for "[g]uardianship of the person of a minor or infant". Consequently, it was improper for the court to dismiss the petition based on the mother's "failure to produce required documentation." Further, under the circumstances of this case, it was improper for the court to dismiss the petition "for failure to prosecute".

New York State may modify an issuing state's order of child support only when the issuing state has lost continuing, exclusive jurisdiction

In Matter of Zagarino v McLean, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4532102, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07131 (2d Dept., 2017) the father commenced a seeking child support for the parties' son. The support Magistrate granted the mothers motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that an order of support was already issued by a court in Missouri, which had continuing, exclusive jurisdiction under the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (hereinafter UIFSA; Family Ct Act art 5-B). The Appellate Division affirmed. Under the Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act and UIFSA, the state issuing a child support order retains continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over its child support orders so long as an individual contestant continues to reside in the issuing state (Matter of Spencer v. Spencer, 10 NY3d 60, 66; see 28 USC § 1738B[d]; Family Ct Act § 580-205). A state may modify the issuing state's order of child support only when the issuing state has lost continuing, exclusive jurisdiction. (Matter of Pauls v. Neathery, 149 AD3d 950, 952, quoting Matter of Spencer v. Spencer, 10 NY3d at 66; see 28 USC § 1738B[e]; Family Ct Act § 580-611[a]). The petition was in the nature of a "modification petition," rather than a de novo application. Since the mother and the parties' daughter resided in Missouri, that state retained continuing, exclusive jurisdiction of its child support order, and New York did not have jurisdiction to modify the Missouri order.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Third Department holds it is Error to completely offset presumptive temporary maintenance award by husband's payment of household expenses where husband continued to reside in marital residence.

In Gavin v Gavin, 2017 WL 4679950 (3d Dept., 2017) Plaintiff (husband) and defendant (wife) were married in 1995 and had three children, one of whom was unemancipated. The husband commenced the action for a divorce in 2015. The wife moved for pendente lite relief, including temporary maintenance. Both parties continued to reside in the marital residence. Supreme Court ordered the husband to continue paying certain monthly household expenses and to pay the wife an additional $2,500 per month.

The Appellate Division noted that the Domestic Relations Law was amended in 2010 to establish a formula for calculating temporary maintenance awards (see L 2010, ch 371, § 1). The amendment "create[d] a substantial presumptive entitlement" intended "to provide 'consistency and predictability in calculating temporary spousal maintenance awards' "(Khaira v. Khaira, 93 AD3d 194, 197 [2012]) . . . A temporary award may be modified when exigent circumstances are shown, such as when "a party is unable to meet his or her financial obligations or justice otherwise requires" (Cheney v. Cheney, 86 AD3d 833, 834-835 [2011]).

The husband earned substantially more money than the wife. After determining that the husband's income exceeded the then statutory cap of $543,000, Supreme Court determined that the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance payable to the wife was $160,331, or $13,361 per month. The court thereafter ordered the husband to continue to pay the monthly household expenses, totaling $15,415.2 Further, with respect to that income in excess of $543,000, the court referenced its ability to award additional temporary maintenance; based on the length of the marriage and the disparity between the parties' incomes, and to provide "additional funds for the [wife] to meet the standard of living enjoyed during the marriage," the court directed the husband to pay an additional $2,500 each month to the wife.

The wife contended that Supreme Court erred by completely offsetting the presumptive award by the husband's payment of the household expenses. Since the husband continued to reside in the marital residence, the wife maintained that he should be permitted to offset no more than 50% of the household expenses against the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance. In effect, according to the wife, the husband is paying $10,207.50 each month (i.e., 50% of the carrying charges plus $2,500), which is less than the presumptive amount provided by the statutory formula.

The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances, justice required a modification to allow the wife to receive the properly calculated presumptive share of maintenance. It was apparent that Supreme Court believed it was appropriate to award temporary maintenance in excess of the statutory cap. Where, as here, the parties continued to reside together in the marital residence during the pendency of a divorce, it found that it is appropriate to credit the payor spouse with one half of the court-ordered carrying charges (see Su v. Su, 128 AD3d 949, 950 [2015]; Francis v. Francis, 111 AD3d 454, 455 [2013]). Correspondingly, the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance should only be offset by the amount that is credited to the payor spouse. By applying 100% of the carrying charges against the presumptive amount, Supreme Court effectively negated the presumptive amount, a result that was neither intended nor supported by a finding that the presumptive amount was unjust or inappropriate. There was no suggestion that the husband was unable to fulfill the parties' financial obligations as set forth on their respective statements of net worth or to pay the presumptive amount. As such, it found that the wife was entitled to the presumptive award of $13,361 each month, plus $2,500 for the amount of the husband's income above the statutory cap, offset by one half of the household expenses, or a credit in the amount of $7,707.50 each month. Accordingly, in addition to the defined household expenses, the monthly amount payable by the husband to the wife as temporary maintenance should be increased by $5,654, for a total of $8,154.

The order was modified by awarding defendant a monthly payment of temporary maintenance totaling $8,154.

Agreement to deviate from provisions of CSSA which failed to comply with FCA § 413(1)(h) invalid and unenforceable from inception five years earlier, regardless of fact that mother benefitted from it

In Hardman v Coleman, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2017 WL 4679940, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07373 (3d Dept., 2017) the parties entered into a settlement agreement in 2009 where they agreed, with regard to child support, deviate from application of the Child Support Standards Act (see Family Ct Act § 413). The child support provisions of the agreement exempted the mother, as the noncustodial parent, from paying child support to the father, but obligated her to pay, among other things, one half of the children's health insurance premiums and uncovered medical expenses. The parties finalized their divorce in January 2012, and their 2009 settlement agreement and subsequent stipulations were incorporated, but not merged, with the judgment of divorce. In 2014, the mother filed a support modification petition, seeking to have the father pay child support in accordance with CSSA guidelines. The Support Magistrate dismissed the mother's modification petition for lack of proof. The mother's subsequent written objections to the Support Magistrate's order (see Family Ct Act § 439[e]) were dismissed by Family Court. The Appellate Division reversed. It agreed with the mother that the child support provisions of the 2009 agreement had to be vacated because the agreement to deviate from the CSSA failed to comply with the requirements of Family Ct Act § 413(1)(h). As relevant here, all child support stipulations seeking to deviate from the CSSA must "include a provision stating that the parties have been advised of the provisions of [the CSSA] and that the basic child support obligation provided for therein would presumptively result in the correct amount of child support to be awarded" (Family Ct Act § 413[1][h]). Such provision may not be waived by either party or counsel (see Family Ct Act § 413[1][h]), and the failure to include such recitals in a stipulation agreeing to deviate from the CSSA guidelines will render it "invalid and unenforceable" (Matter of McKenna v. McKenna, 90 AD3d at 1111). Here, the agreement stated that the parties reviewed the provisions of the CSSA, understood them and were aware that, absent their agreement to deviate therefrom, the CSSA would govern the determination of the noncustodial parent's basic child support obligation. The agreement then indicated that the amount of child support to be paid by the mother, as the noncustodial parent, pursuant to the CSSA would be $79 per week. The mother's basic child support obligation, however, was miscalculated. Although, standing alone, such a miscalculation would be insufficient to invalidate the agreement, here, the parties' stipulation also failed to demonstrate that the parties were apprised that the application of the CSSA "would presumptively result in the correct amount of child support to be awarded." Accordingly, the parties' agreement to deviate from the provisions of the CSSA was invalid and unenforceable from its inception, regardless of the fact that the mother benefitted from the terms of the deviation agreement in the first instance. Therefore, Family Court erred in dismissing the mother's objections. As such, the order was reversed and the matter remitted for a de novo hearing to determine the proper amount that the noncustodial parent must pay in child support pursuant to the provisions of the CSSA.

Grandparents Have Standing to seek visitation where mother made deliberate efforts, without reasonable justification, to preclude them from developing relationship with the children

In Monroe v Monroe, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4680065, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07358 (3d Dept, 2017) the grandparents commenced a proceeding seeking visitation with their grandchildren. The Appellate Division reversed an order which dismissed the grandparents' petition on the ground that they lacked standing to seek visitation. It observed that when the parents of the subject children are alive, a grandparent may acquire standing to seek visitation of the children by demonstrating that "conditions exist which equity would see fit to intervene" (Domestic Relations Law § 72[1]; see Matter of E.S. v. P.D., 8 NY3d 150, 156 [2007]; Matter of Wilson v. McGlinchey, 2 NY3d 375, 380 [2004]). The grandparents must establish a sufficient existing relationship with their grandchildren, or in cases where such a relationship has been frustrated ..., a sufficient effort to establish one, so that the court perceives it as one deserving the court's intervention. The sufficiency of the grandparents' efforts in this regard must always be measured against what they could reasonably have done under the circumstances. The grandparents acknowledged that they did not have a close relationship with either grandchild; however, they averred that the mother willfully and deliberately denied them any access to the children, without any reasonable cause for doing so, since their respective births. In support of their petition, the grandparents submitted a notarized letter. With regard to the oldest child, the grandparents averred that they were able to hold the child at the hospital on the day she was born. That since such time, they had not been allowed to have contact with the child and acknowledged that they had only seen the child four additional times—one of which was the result of them showing up unannounced to the parents' residence and, on another occasion, to the child's first birthday party. With regard to the youngest child, the grandparents averred that they went to the hospital on the day of the child's birth; however, after only briefly holding the child, the mother informed them that they were not welcome and security was called to escort them out of the hospital. They had not been able to see the child since. Two months later, the grandparents filed the petition seeking visitation. The Appellate Division found the proof adduced in support of the grandparents' petition to be sufficient to confer standing to seek visitation with their grandchildren. Significantly, the circumstances indicated that the mother has made deliberate and immediate efforts to preclude the grandparents from having and/or developing any significant relationship with the children, since the very day they were born, without any stated reasonable justification for doing so. Given the young ages of the children and the brief amount of time that had elapsed between their respective births and the disruption of the grandparents' visitation, equity dictated that the Court not allow the lack of an established relationship be used as a pretext to prevent the grandparents from otherwise exercising their right to seek visitation.

Income Imputed to Father based upon unpaid monthly installments on promissory note to parents

In Matter of Worfel v Kime, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4679943, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07372 (3d Dept., 2017) the father asserted on appeal that the funds provided by his parents for construction of his new home were improperly considered in assessing his child support obligation. Although there was a promissory note, as of the date of the hearing, the father had not begun to repay the debt in accord with its terms. He also failed to list this debt on either of his financial disclosure affidavits. He father testified that his pay from his parent's hardware store had been decreased. Family Court noted this inconsistency, in that the parents had allegedly made a major loan while decreasing his pay, with knowledge of the ongoing contentious legal proceedings, and upheld the Support Magistrate's determinations upon consideration of the contradictions between the testimony and the documentation. The Appellate Division found no abuse of discretion in Family Court's determination to impute to the father an amount equal to the unpaid monthly payments on the promissory note (see Family Ct Act § 413[5] [iv] [D]; Matter of Abellard v. Aime, 18 AD3d 653, 653 [2005]; Matter of Collins v. Collins, 241 A.D.2d 725, 727 [1997], lv dismissed and denied 91 N.Y.2d 829 [1997]).

Third Department Holds Family Court has discretion to overlook minor failure to comply with requirements of FCA §439(e) regarding filing objections

In Alberino v Alberino, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4679958, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07370 (3d Dept., 2017) the Support Magistrate modified the prior support order by increasing the father's weekly child support obligation. The order was entered on December 1, 2015 and mailed to the parties on December 3, 2015. The father's attorney attempted to file objections with Family Court at 4:36 p.m. on January 7, 2016, the statutory filing deadline (see Family Ct Act § 439[e]), but was prevented from doing so because the courthouse was closed. Counsel mailed a copy of the objections to the mother and her counsel that day. Counsel also mailed a copy to the court, along with a letter explaining the unsuccessful attempt at filing, and filed the objections with the court in person early the following morning. The mother filed a rebuttal, with no mention of the timing of the objections. Family Court dismissed the objections as untimely. The Appellate Division reversed holding that Family Court abused its discretion when it dismissed the father's objections to the support magistrates order as untimely. Unlike the nonwaivable and jurisdictional time period for filing a notice of appeal, the courts need not require strict adherence" to this filing deadline (Matter of Ogborn v. Hiltz, 262 A.D.2d 857, 858 [1999]). Family Court has discretion to overlook a minor failure to comply with the statutory requirements regarding filing objections and address the merits" (Matter of Ryan v. Ryan, 110 AD3d 1176, 1178 [2013]) Two attorneys and a law clerk from the firm representing the father submitted affidavits in which they averred that their office called the Family Court Clerk's office earlier in the week and verified that the court would be open until 5:00 p.m. on the filing deadline. They also checked the court's hours of operation on the Unified Court System website, which listed them as 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.

In termination of parental rights actions, a court may properly look to the ADA's standards for guidance in evaluating whether "diligent efforts" were made

In Matter of Lacey L, 153 A.D.3d 1151, 60 N.Y.S.3d 164, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 06418 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that Family Court properly determined that agency made reasonable efforts to achieve the permanency goal of returning the child to the mother during the nine-month period following the child's removal. The main issue raised at the permanency hearing was "to what degree the [foster care] agency was required to accommodate the parents' cognitive disabilities when discharging its obligation to pursue the goal of return to parent." While Family Court correctly determined that the ADA was not applicable to this proceeding (see Matter of La'Asia Lanae S., 23 A.D.3d 271, 803 N.Y.S.2d 568 [1st Dept.2005]), the law makes clear, as Family Court recognized and the parties in this case agreed, that "the agencies efforts towards a permanency plan must be tailored to the particular circumstances and individuals in a given case". As the Family Court held in La'Asia Lanae S. (191 Misc.2d 28, 42-43, 739 N.Y.S.2d 898 [Fam.Ct., N.Y. County 2002]), in the context of termination of parental rights actions, a court may properly look to the ADA's standards for guidance in evaluating whether "diligent efforts" were made by the agency under Social Services Law § 384-

b(7). The Family Court here acknowledged that it was required to consider the mother's special needs when determining if the agency's efforts were reasonable in this case. After evaluating the agency's efforts in that light, the court found that the agency satisfied its obligation to tailor its efforts to the mother's needs, and that the agency's reunification efforts were reasonable under the circumstances. In precluding litigation of ADA claims during the permanency hearing, but considerate of its purpose to guide the reasonable efforts analysis, the Family Court properly complied with the requirements as set forth by the court in the La'Asia case.

Table of Effective dates of Revisions to Domestic Relations Law §§ 236, 237, 238 and 240

The Maintenance, Child Support and Counsel Fee provisions of the Domestic Relations Law have been amended numerous times since the statutes were enacted, especially since 1999. Different versions of Domestic Relations Law §§ 236, 237, 238 and 240 apply in matrimonial actions depending upon the date of the commencement of an action. The following table has been created to enable counsel to quickly find the version applicable to actions commenced since 1999 which are available for download on our website at www.nysdivorce.com

Domestic Relations Law § 236 – September 18, 1999 to date

DRL §236, effective September 18, 1999 to September 21, 2003 ³⁹

DRL §236, effective September 22, 2003 to August 31, 2009 ⁴⁰

DRL §236, effective September 1, 2009 to September 13, 2009 ⁴¹

⁴⁰ L.2003, c. 595, § 1, eff. Sept. 22, 2003. (This Chapter, among other things, added the following sentence to DRL § 236[B][3]: “Notwithstanding any other provision of law, an acknowledgment of an agreement made before marriage may be executed before any person authorized to solemnize a marriage pursuant to subdivisions one, two and three of section eleven of this chapter.”)

⁴¹ L.2009, c. 72, § 1, eff. Sept. 1, 2009; L 2010, c. 32, § 1, eff. March 30, 2010, deemed eff. Sept. 1, 2009 (These chapters added to DRL § 236[B] [2] [b] provisions for “automatic orders in matrimonial actions”.)

DRL §236, effective September 14, 2009 to August 12, 2010 ⁴²

DRL §236, effective August 13, 2010 to October 11, 2010 ⁴³

DRL§ 236, effective October 12, 2010 to October 12, 2010 ⁴⁴

⁴³ L.2010, c. 371, § 3, eff. Aug. 13, 2010. (This chapter, among other things, enacted DRL § 236 [B][5-a] providing for temporary maintenance guidelines; and added to DRL § 236[B][6] the following six additional maintenance factors: (5) the need of one party to incur education or training expenses; (6) the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household; (7) acts by one party against another that have inhibited or continue to inhibit a party's earning capacity or ability to obtain meaningful employment. Such acts include but are not limited to acts of domestic violence as provided in section four hundred fifty-nine-a of the social services law; (11) the care of the children or stepchildren, disabled adult children or stepchildren, elderly parents or in-laws that has inhibited or continues to inhibit a party's earning capacity; (12) the inability of one party to obtain meaningful employment due to age or absence from the workforce; (13) the need to pay for exceptional additional expenses for the child/children, including but not limited to, schooling, day care and medical treatment).

⁴⁴ L.2010, c. 371, §§ 1, 2, 4, eff. Oct. 12, 2010. (This chapter, among other things, amended DRL §236 [B] by adding a new subdivision 5–a Temporary maintenance awards, which requires the court to make its award in accordance with this subdivision, except where the parties have entered into an agreement pursuant to subdivision 5–a. DRL §236[B] was amended to change the factors, except factor (1), as follows: (2) length of the marriage; (3) the age and health of both parties; (4) the present and future earning capacity of both parties; (5) the need of one party to incur education or training expenses; (6) the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household; (7) acts by one party against another that have inhibited or continue to inhibit a party's earning capacity or ability to obtain meaningful employment. Such acts include but are not limited to acts of domestic violence as provided in section four hundred fifty-nine-a of the social services law; (8) the ability of the party seeking maintenance to become self-supporting and, if applicable, the period of time and training necessary therefor; (9) reduced or lost lifetime earning capacity of the party seeking maintenance as a result of having foregone or delayed education, training, employment, or career opportunities during the marriage; (10) the presence of children of the marriage in the respective homes of the parties; (11) the care of the children or stepchildren, disabled adult children or stepchildren, elderly parents or in-laws that has inhibited or continues to inhibit a party's earning capacity; (12) the inability of one party to obtain meaningful employment due to age or absence from the workforce; (13) the need to pay for exceptional additional expenses for the child/children, including but not limited to, schooling, day care and medical treatment; (14) the tax consequences to each party; (15) the equitable distribution of marital property; (16) contributions and services of the party seeking maintenance as a spouse, parent, wage earner and homemaker, and to the career or career potential of the other party; (17) the wasteful dissipation of marital property by either spouse; (18) the transfer or encumbrance made in contemplation of a matrimonial action without fair consideration; (19) the loss of health insurance benefits upon dissolution of the marriage, and the availability and cost of medical insurance for the parties; and (20) any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper.)

DRL §236, effective October 13, 2010 to October 24, 2015 ⁴⁵

⁴⁵ L.2010, c. 182, §§ 7, 9, eff. Oct. 13, 2015. (This chapter, among other things, added subdivision (2) to DRL §236 [B][9][b], as follows:

(2)(i) The court may modify an order of child support, including an order incorporating without merging an agreement or stipulation of the parties, upon a showing of a substantial change in circumstances. Incarceration shall not be a bar to finding a substantial change in circumstances provided such incarceration is not the result of nonpayment of a child support order, or an offense against the custodial parent or child who is the subject of the order or judgment.

(ii) In addition, unless the parties have specifically opted out of the following provisions in a validly executed agreement or stipulation entered into between the parties, the court may modify an order of child support where:

(A) three years have passed since the order was entered, last modified or adjusted; or

(B) there has been a change in either party's gross income by fifteen percent or more since the order was entered, last modified, or adjusted. A reduction in income shall not be considered as a ground for modification unless it was involuntary and the party has made diligent attempts to secure employment commensurate with his or her education, ability, and experience.

(iii) No modification or annulment shall reduce or annul any arrears of child support which have accrued prior to the date of application to annul or modify any prior order or judgment as to child support. Such modification may increase child support nunc pro tunc as of the date of application based on newly discovered evidence. Any retroactive amount of child support due shall, except as provided for in this subparagraph, be paid in one sum or periodic sums, as the court directs, taking into account any temporary or partial payments which have been made. Any retroactive amount of child support due shall be support arrears/past due support. In addition, such retroactive child support shall be enforceable in any manner provided by law including, but not limited to, an execution for support enforcement pursuant to subdivision (b) of section fifty-two hundred forty-one of the civil practice law and rules. When a child receiving support is a public assistance recipient, or the order of support is being enforced or is to be enforced pursuant to section one hundred eleven-g of the social services law, the court shall establish the amount of retroactive child support and notify the parties that such amount shall be enforced by the support collection unit pursuant to an immediate execution for support enforcement as provided for by this chapter, or in such periodic payments as would have been authorized had such an execution been issued. In such case, the court shall not direct the schedule of repayment of retroactive support.

This chapter, among other things, also added subdivision [d] to DRL §236[B][7], as follows:

d. Any child support order made by the court in any proceeding under the provisions of this section shall include, on its face, a notice printed or typewritten in a size equal to at least eight point bold type informing the parties of their right to seek a modification of the child support order upon a showing of:

(i) a substantial change in circumstances; or

(ii) that three years have passed since the order was entered, last modified or adjusted; or

(iii) there has been a change in either party's gross income by fifteen percent or more since the order was entered, last modified, or adjusted; however, if the parties have specifically opted out of subparagraph (ii) or (iii) of this paragraph in a validly executed agreement or stipulation, then that basis to seek modification does not apply.)

DRL §236, effective January 23, 2016 ⁴⁷

Domestic Relations Law § 237 – July 17, 1992 to date

DRL §237, effective July 17, 1992, to October 11, 2012 ⁴⁸

⁴⁷ L.2015, c. 269, §§ 1, 2, 4, 5, eff. Jan. 23, 2016. (This chapter, among other things, modified the temporary maintenance provisions of DRL §236 [B] [5-a]. It also modified the post-divorce maintenance provisions of DRL §236 [B] [6] [a] to add post-divorce maintenance guidelines and added additional factors for consideration by the court in determining maintenance. The fourteen (14) factors are now:

- (a) the age and health of the parties;
- (b) the present or future earning capacity of the parties, including a history of limited participation in the workforce;
- (c) the need of one party to incur education or training expenses;
- (d) the termination of a child support award before the termination of the maintenance award when the calculation of maintenance was based upon child support being awarded which resulted in a maintenance award lower than it would have been had child support not been awarded;
- (e) the wasteful dissipation of marital property, including transfers or encumbrances made in contemplation of a matrimonial action without fair consideration;
- (f) the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household;
- (g) acts by one party against another that have inhibited or continue to inhibit a party’s earning capacity or ability to obtain meaningful employment. Such acts include but are not limited to acts of domestic violence as provided in section four hundred fifty-nine-a of the social services law;
- (h) the availability and cost of medical insurance for the parties;
- (i) the care of children or stepchildren, disabled adult children or stepchildren, elderly parents or in-laws provided during the marriage that inhibits a party’s earning capacity;
- (j) the tax consequences to each party;
- (k) the standard of living of the parties established during the marriage;
- (l) the reduced or lost earning capacity of the payee as a result of having forgone or delayed education, training, employment or career opportunities during the marriage;
- (m) the equitable distribution of marital property and the income or imputed income on the assets so distributed;
- (n) the contributions and services of the payee as a spouse, parent, wage earner and homemaker and to the career or career potential of the other party; and
- (o) any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper.)

First Department Holds "Presumption of Legitimacy" applies to a Child Born to a Same-sex Married Couple

In re Maria-Irene D, 2017 WL 4287334 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which vacated an adoption. Appellant Marco D. and respondent Han Ming T. (Ming), both British citizens, entered a civil union in the United Kingdom (UK) in 2008, which they converted into a legal marriage in 2015, effective as of the date of their ⁷⁶ L.2015, c. 387, §§ 3, 4, eff. Jan. 24, 2016. (This chapter, among other things, amended DRL § 240 (1-b) (5)(iii) subclauses (G) and (H) to add a new subclause (I) to read as follows: (G) fellowships and stipends, and(H) annuity payments; and(I) alimony or maintenance actually paid or to be paid to a spouse who is a party to the instant action pursuant to an existing court order or contained in the order to be entered by the court, or pursuant to a validly executed written agreement, in which event the order or agreement shall provide for a specific adjustment, in accordance with this subdivision, in the amount of child support payable upon the termination of alimony or maintenance to such spouse; provided, however, that the specific adjustment in the amount of child support is without prejudice to either party's right to seek a modification in accordance with subparagraph two of paragraph b of subdivision nine of part B of section two hundred thirty-six of this article. In an action or proceeding to modify an order of child support, including an order incorporating without merging an agreement, issued prior to the effective date of this subclause, the provisions of this subclause shall not, by themselves, constitute a substantial change of circumstances pursuant to paragraph b of subdivision nine of part B of section two hundred thirty-six of this article.

DRL § 240 (1-b) (b)(5)(vii) subclause (C) was amended to read as follows: (C) alimony or maintenance actually paid or to be paid to a spouse that who is a party to the instant action pursuant to an existing court order or contained in the order to be entered by the court, or pursuant to a validly executed written agreement, provided in which event the order or agreement provides shall provide for a specific adjustment, in accordance with this subdivision, in the amount of child support payable upon the termination of alimony or maintenance to such spouse; provided, however, that the specific adjustment in the amount of child support is without prejudice to either party's right to seek a modification in accordance with subparagraph two of paragraph b of subdivision nine of part B of section two hundred thirty-six of this article. In an action or proceeding to modify an order of child support, including an order incorporating without merging an agreement, issued prior to the effective date of this subclause, the provisions of this subclause shall not, by themselves, constitute a substantial change of circumstances pursuant to paragraph b of subdivision nine of part B of section two hundred thirty-six of this article.)

civil union. In 2013, the couple jointly executed an egg donor and surrogacy agreement with the intention of becoming parents. Both contributed sperm, and the embryo fertilized by Marco's sperm was transferred to the surrogate. The child was born in September 2014. The couple commenced a proceeding in Missouri to terminate the egg donor and surrogate's parental rights to the child. In October 2014, the Missouri court awarded Marco, as the genetic father, "sole and exclusive custody" of the child. Marco, Ming, and the child returned to Florida, where they lived as a family until October 2015, when Ming returned to the UK to seek employment. At some point in or after 2013, Marco entered a relationship with petitioner Carlos A., and they moved to New York with the child after Ming went to the UK. In January 2016, Carlos filed a petition in New York to adopt the child. In the adoption papers, Carlos disclosed that Marco and Ming were married in 2008, but alleged that they had not lived together continuously since 2012 and that Carlos and Marco had been caring for the child since her birth. A home study report stated that Marco and Ming legally separated in 2013 and had no children together. Ming's role in the surrogacy process was not disclosed, nor was the Florida divorce action commenced by Ming in March 2016 in which he sought joint custody of the child.

Family Court granted Ming's motion, and vacated the adoption pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 114(3), finding that Carlos and Marco had made material misrepresentations to the court that provided sufficient cause to vacate, and that Ming was entitled to notice of the adoption proceeding. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that Ming and Marco's marriage in the UK was effective as of August 2008. New York courts as a matter of comity will recognize such out-of-state marriages (see e.g. Matter of Mott v. Duncan Petroleum Trans., 51 N.Y.2d 289, 292 [1980]). The child was born in 2014, as the result of jointly executed surrogacy agreements, at a time when the couple was considered legally married, thus giving rise to the presumption that the child was the legitimate child of both Marco and Ming (see Domestic Relations Law § 24; Matter of Fay, 44 N.Y.2d 137 [1978]). After the child was born, Marco, Ming and the child lived together as a family, and the couple took affirmative steps in the UK to establish Ming's parental rights in accordance with UK law. Under these circumstances, the Missouri judgment in 2014 awarding Marco sole and exclusive custody of the child, as opposed to the egg donor and surrogate, was insufficient to rebut the presumption of legitimacy. Marco and Ming were deemed legally married when they embarked on the surrogacy process to have a child together (see Debra H. v. Janice R., 14 NY3d 576 [2010], cert denied 562 U.S. 1136 [2011]). Accordingly, the child was born in wedlock, and Ming was entitled to notice of the adoption proceeding (see Domestic Relations Law § 111[1] [b]). Petitioner's failure to disclose the Florida divorce action, in which the child was named as a child of the marriage and Ming sought joint custody, provided another ground to vacate the adoption (see Domestic Relations Law § 114[3]). The adoption petition required petitioner to give a sworn statement that the child to be adopted was not the subject of any proceeding affecting his or her custody or status. Even though petitioner was aware of the Florida divorce action before finalization of the adoption, he failed to disclose the action to the court, instead averring in a supplemental affidavit that there had been no change in circumstances "whatsoever" since the filing of the adoption petition.

Family Offense Petition Should Not Be Dismissed “Solely on the Basis That the Acts or Events Alleged Are Not Relatively Contemporaneous with the Date of Petition

In Monwara G v Abdul G., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4246833 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of Family Court which granted petitioner wife an order of protection. It found that her testimony, although lacking in detail concerning specific dates, supported a finding that the pattern of abusive conduct during the marriage which she testified to had continued within the year preceding the filing of the petition, and her testimony concerning more remote allegations was relevant (see Matter of Opray v. Fitzharris, 84 AD3d 1092, 1093 [2d Dept 2011]). It pointed out that a family offense petition should not be dismissed “solely on the basis that the acts or events alleged are not relatively contemporaneous with the date of the petition” (Family Ct Act § 812[1]).

Judgment of Divorce Must Contain Provision Addressing Equitable Distribution

No Automatic Entitlement to Prejudgment Interest in Matrimonial Litigation. Recoupment of Overpayments of Maintenance Is Generally Against Public Policy

In O'Donnell v O'Donnell, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4158945, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 06540 (2d Dept., 2017) the parties divorce judgment entered on March 26, 2015, incorporated by reference, to survive, their stipulation of settlement dated March 17, 2014, in which the defendant agreed, to “pay the Wife a lump sum of $1,000,000 on or before September 30, 2014,” to transfer certain real property to her, and to pay her maintenance in the sum of $4,000 per month for a period of five years. The defendant transferred the real property, but in lieu of paying his maintenance obligation of $4,000 per month, he paid certain carrying charges on the real property, which totaled more than $91,000 for the period from April 1, 2014, through October 1, 2015. His maintenance obligation of $4,000 per month for that period totaled $72,000. At the time the judgment of divorce was entered on March 26, 2015, the defendant had not paid the $1,000,000 distributive award. The plaintiff moved, inter alia, to compel the defendant to execute a confession of judgment, or in the alternative, for leave to enter a money judgment against him in the sum of $1,000,000 plus interest at the statutory rate of 9% per annum (see CPLR 5004). The defendant cross-moved for a money judgment for an alleged overpayment of maintenance of $19,241.31, representing the difference between the amount he paid in carrying charges and his maintenance obligation for the period from April 1, 2014, through October 1, 2015. The defendant produced a signed confession of judgment executed on March 17, 2014, which rendered academic the motion to compel the defendant to execute a confession of judgment. The confession of judgment made no provision for interest. The defendant stated that he paid the $1,000,000 in full on June 19, 2015. Supreme Court denied plaintiff’s request for an award of statutory interest on the $1,000,000, because the stipulation of settlement did not provide for such interest. The court granted the defendant a credit for the alleged overpayment of maintenance of $19,241.31, on the ground that the plaintiff did not object to the defendant making those payments, therefore “it would be unjust and inequitable to allow the [plaintiff] to retain such additional money.”

The Appellate Division held that plaintiff was not entitled to postjudgment interest, as the $1,000,000 distributive award was not explicitly set forth in the judgment of divorce, but, rather, was part of the stipulation of settlement that was incorporated by reference, but not merged, in the judgment of divorce. The defendant paid the $1,000,000 distributive award while the plaintiff’s motion for a money judgment was pending, thus avoiding postjudgment interest. As to prejudgment interest, “[t]here is no automatic entitlement to prejudgment interest, under CPLR 5001, in matrimonial litigation” (Rubin v. Rubin, 1 AD3d 220, 221). The general rule in matrimonial actions is that the determination of whether to award prejudgment interest is a discretionary determination with the trial court. As there was no finding of a willful default which would entitle the wife to interest pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 244, and the amount was not reduced to a judgment, the denial of prejudgment interest was a provident exercise of discretion.

The Appellate Division held that the award of $19,241.31, representing an alleged overpayment of maintenance, was improper. The recoupment of overpayments of maintenance and/or child support is generally against public policy, since those payments are deemed to have been spent for that purpose. Voluntary payments are generally not credited against amounts currently due (see McKay v. Groesbeck, 117 AD3d 810, 811). The voluntary payments were made, at least in part, because the plaintiff was unable to satisfy certain mortgage liens on the real property transferred to her because the defendant did not transfer the $1,000,000 distributive award to her in a timely manner.

Recent Legislation

Laws of 2017, Ch 35 amended the Domestic Relations Law to prohibit marriage of minors under seventeen years of age and amended the process to obtain court approval for marriage of persons at least seventeen years of age but under eighteen years of age.

Domestic Relations Law § 15-a was amended to increase the age of minors who are prohibited from marrying to under seventeen years of age. Previously minors under fourteen years of age were prohibited from marrying.

Domestic Relations Law § 13-b was amended to allow the solemnization of marriage of a party to be married to who is at least seventeen years upon the Court making written affirmative findings required under Domestic Relations Law § 15, subdivision 3. Formerly, the court could allow the solemnization of marriage by minor under sixteen years of age but over fourteen years of age.

Domestic Relations Law §15, subdivisions 1(a), 2 and 3 were amended to require the town or city clerk to require each applicant for a marriage license to present documentary proof of age. In cases where it appears that either party is at least seventeen years of age but under eighteen years of age the process by which the written approval of a justice of the supreme court or a judge of the family court was obtained was amended to provide for, among other things: (i) the appointment of an attorney for the child for each minor party which attorney must have received training in domestic violence including a component on forced marriage; and (ii) prior to the justice of the supreme court or the judge of the family court issuing approval, the justice or judge must (1) provide notification to each minor party of his or her rights, including but not limited to, in relation to termination of the marriage, child and spousal support, domestic violence services and access to public benefits and other services (2) conduct, with respect to each party, including a minor party, a review of related decisions in court proceedings initiated pursuant to article ten of the family court act, and all warrants issued under the family court act, reports of the statewide computerized registry of orders of protection under section two hundred twenty-one-a of the executive law, and reports of the sex offender registry under section one hundred sixty-eight-b of the correction law, and (3) hold an in camera interview, separately with each minor party, and make written affirmative findings specified in subdivision 3, taking into consideration, among other relevant factors, the factors set forth in subdivision 3. The wishes of the parents or legal guardians of the minor intending to be married shall not be the sole basis for consent or approval under this subdivision.

According to the Sponsor's memorandum in support of this legislation parents force their children into marriages, citing reasons such as protecting "family honor," controlling the child's behavior and/or sexuality, and enhancing the family's status. Such reasons are reminiscent of the reasons for allowing girls age fourteen and over but under age sixteen to marry with court approval in 1929. The occurrence of child marriage is not limited to a particular culture or religion, but is widespread in the United States. Child marriage or forced marriage, or both, occur in families across faiths, including Muslim, Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh, Orthodox Jew, Mormon and Unification Church. Tactics such as threats of ostracism, beatings or death are used to force children to marry against their will. Under the Penal Law, a child under 17 does not have the capacity to consent to sex. It is statutory rape for an adult to have sex with a 16-year old but if he is married to her he can force her to have non-consensual sex as often as he likes. Marriage at any age before 18, undermines girls' health, education and economic opportunities, and increases their likelihood of experiencing violence. As a matter of public policy, no parent or court should be permitted to bind a child under the age of seventeen to a contract where the child lacks the capacity as well as the opportunity to consent. This legislation is intended to strengthen the process as applied to marriage of persons at least seventeen but under eighteen years of age. See 2017 NY Legis Memo 35.

Hearing Required on Motion for Contempt Only If Papers in Opposition Raise Factual Dispute as to Elements of Civil Contempt, or Existence of a Defense

In Shemtov v Shemtov, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 4018453, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 06473 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which held the defendant in civil contempt for his failure to comply with a prior order directing him to pay, inter alia, pendente lite child support and maintenance, without conducting a hearing on his defense of an inability to pay. It observed that a motion to punish a party for civil contempt is addressed to the sound discretion of the motion court. To prevail on a motion to hold a party in civil contempt, the movant must establish by clear and convincing evidence (1) that a lawful order of the court was in effect, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, (2) the appearance, with reasonable certainty, that the order was disobeyed, (3) that the party to be held in contempt had knowledge of the court's order, and (4) prejudice to the right of a party to the litigation (see Judiciary Law § 753[A][3]; El-Dehdan v. El-Dehdan, 26 NY3d 19, 29). Once the moving party makes this showing, the burden shifts to the alleged contemnor to refute the movant's showing, or to offer evidence of a defense, such as an inability to comply with the order. A hearing is required only if the papers in opposition raise a factual dispute as to the elements of civil contempt, or the existence of a defense (see Matter of Fitzgerald, 144 AD3d at 907; Matter of Savas v. Bruen, 139 AD3d 736, 737; El-Dehdan v. El-Dehdan, 114 AD3d 4, 17, affd 26 NY3d 19). Here, the papers in opposition did not raise a factual dispute or the existence of a defense.

Family Court

Although Emergency Jurisdiction under DRL. § 76-c Is Generally Temporary it Becomes Permanent Where No Other Custody Proceeding Are Instituted in a Competing Forum and New York Becomes Children's Home State Following Commencement of the Proceeding

In Matter of J.A. v J.M.G., Slip Copy, 2017 WL 4018751 (Table), 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 51125(U) (Fam.Ct., 2017) on February 6, 2017, fifteen-year-old A.'s paternal grandmother J.A. filed a petition for her custody. The child had been living in Virginia with her mother. On the same day, an ex parte temporary order of custody on behalf of the petitioner was granted. On March 8, 2017, petitioner filed a family offense petition on behalf of A. against her mother, J.G. Petitioner stated in January the respondent allowed child to be physically abused by someone living in her home. The child fled the home and called her [the petitioner] and the police was called. Petitioner states the respondent put the child out of the home and gave her custody of the child. Petitioner requested an order keeping the respondent away from her, her grandchild, their home and to not harass them. An ex parte order of protection ordering the respondent mother to stay away from the child and the grandmother was issued on that day. Family Court, inter alia, denied the mother's motion to dismiss. It found that at the time the petitioner filed her custody and family offense petitions in New York, New York was not the home state of the child as the child had been living in Virginia since 2005 and had only been in New York for less than two months. D.R.L. § 75-a (7). However, the child was physically present in New York and the allegations that she had been abused in Virginia and was at risk of harm if returned there established that New York had temporary emergency jurisdiction. D.R.L. § 76-c (1) ("A court of this state has temporary emergency jurisdiction if the child is present in this state and the child has been abandoned or it is necessary in an emergency to protect the child, a sibling or parent of the child.") Pursuant to D.R.L. § 76-c (2), if there is no previous child custody determination that is entitled to be enforced, and a child custody proceeding has not been commenced in a court of a state having jurisdiction, a custody determination made under temporary emergency jurisdiction remains in effect until the court of a state having jurisdiction has taken steps to assure the protection of the child. Moreover, if a child custody proceeding has not been or is not commenced in a state having jurisdiction, a child custody determination made under this section becomes a final determination and this state becomes the home state of the child. Here, there were allegations that the child was abused in her mother's home and that she was at risk of further abuse if she returns. No proceeding which could protect the child had been commenced in Virginia, which was the child's home state when she left. There was no previous child custody determination that was entitled to be enforced. Thus, in the absence of any proceeding in another state that would have jurisdiction, under D.R.L. § 76-c (2), New York, which originally exercised emergency jurisdiction, had now become the home state of the child. Under D.R.L. § 76-c (2), the New York court retains jurisdiction, and the motion to dismiss the petitions on that ground was denied. § 76-c (2); See Rodriguez v. Rodriguez, 118 AD3d 1011 (2d Dept.2014) (reversing family court's determination that Florida was proper venue where there was a prima facie showing that child would be in imminent risk of harm if returned to father in Florida); Santiago v. Riley, 79 AD3d 1045 (2d Dept.2010) (reversing family court's dismissal of family offense proceeding where children were present in New York and, although there was also a proceeding commenced in Delaware, family court failed to determine whether it should continue to exercise emergency jurisdiction because it was necessary to protect the child); see also Tin Tin v. Thar Kyi, 92 AD3d 1293, 1294 (4th Dept.2012) ("Although emergency jurisdiction is generally temporary, the court was authorized to make a permanent custody award because no other custody proceeding had been instituted in a competing forum and New York had become the children's home state following commencement of the proceeding....").

Appellate Division, Second Department

Religious Upbringing Clause in Custody Agreement Cannot Be Enforced Extent it is not in Best Interests of Children or Violates Parent's Legitimate Due Process Right to Express Oneself and Live Freely.

In Weisberger v Weisberger, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 3496090, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 06212 (2d Dept., 2017) in their stipulation of settlement dated November 3, 2008, which was incorporated but not merged into their 2009 judgment of divorce, the parties agreed to joint legal custody of the children with the mother having primary residential custody and the father having specified visitation. The stipulation contained the following religious upbringing clause: "Parties agree to give the children a Hasidic upbringing in all details, in home or outside of home, compatible with that of their families'. Father shall decide which school the children attend. Mother to insure that the children arrive in school in a timely manner and have all their needs provided."The stipulation of settlement further provided that each party "shall be free from interference, authority and control, direct or indirect, by the other."

In November 2012, at which time the children were nine, seven, and five years old, respectively, the father moved to modify the stipulation of settlement so as to, inter alia, award him sole legal and residential custody of the children; award the mother only supervised therapeutic visitation; and to enforce the religious upbringing clause so as to require the mother to direct the children to practice full religious observance in accordance with the Jewish Hasidic practices of ultra Orthodoxy at all times and require her to practice full religious observance in accordance with the Hasidic practices of ultra Orthodoxy during any period in which she has physical custody of the children and at any appearance at the children's schools. In support of the motion, the father alleged that the mother had radically changed her lifestyle in a way that conflicted with the parties' religious upbringing clause. The father alleged that since the parties had entered into the stipulation of settlement the mother had, among other things, come out publicly as a lesbian, disparaged the basic tenets of Hasidic Judaism in front of the children, allowed the children to wear non-Hasidic clothes, permitted them to violate the Sabbath and kosher dietary laws, and referred to them by names that were not traditionally used in the Hasidic community. The father further alleged that the mother had dressed immodestly, dyed her hair, and permitted a transgender man to reside in her home with the children.

Supreme Court determined that there had been a change of circumstances caused by the mother's transition from an ultra Orthodox Hasidic lifestyle to a "more progressive, albeit Jewish, secular world." The court noted that the mother's conduct was in conflict with the parties' agreement, which "forbade living a secular way of life in front of the children or while at their schools." The court posited that had there been no agreement it might have considered the parties' arguments differently; however, "given the existence of the Agreement's very clear directives, [the] Court was obligated to consider the religious upbringing of the children as a paramount factor in any custody determination". Supreme Court awarded him sole legal and residential custody of the children, as well as final decision-making authority over medical and dental issues, and issues of mental health, with supervised therapeutic visitation to the mother. The court stayed the provision of the order limiting the mother's visitation to supervised therapeutic visits, conditioned upon, inter alia, her compliance with the religious upbringing clause. Supreme Court enforced the religious upbringing clause so as to require the mother to direct the children to practice full religious observance in accordance with the Hasidic practices of ultra Orthodoxy at all times. The court ordered that during any period of visitation or during any appearance at the childrens' schools "the [mother] must practice full religious observance in accordance with the Hasidic practices of ultra Orthodoxy."

The Appellate Division modified the order. It observed that to the extent the mother's sexual orientation was raised at the hearing, courts must remain neutral toward such matters, such that the focus remains on the continued best interests and welfare of the children. The Appellate Division found that a change of circumstances had occurred, such that a modification of the stipulation of settlement was necessary. However, Supreme Court's determination to modify the stipulation of settlement so as to, inter alia, award the father sole legal and residential custody of the children, lacked a sound and substantial basis in the record. In pertinent part, the court gave undue weight to the parties' religious upbringing clause, finding it to be a "paramount factor" in its custody determination. It held that when presented as an issue, religion may be considered as one of the factors in determining the best interest of a child, although it alone may not be the determinative factor. Clauses in custody agreements that provide for a specific religious upbringing for the children will only be enforced so long as the agreement is in the best interests of the children. It found that the mother had been the children's primary caretaker since birth, and their emotional and intellectual development was closely tied to their relationship with her. The mother took care of the children's physical and emotional needs both during and after the marriage, while the father consistently failed to fully exercise his visitation rights or fulfill his most basic financial obligations to the children after the parties' separation. Aside from objecting to her decision to expose the children to views to which he personally objected, the father expressed no doubts whatsoever about the mother's ability to care and provide for the children. The weight of the evidence established that awarding the father full legal and residential custody of the children with limited visitation to the mother would be harmful to the children's relationship with her.

Furthermore, the Supreme Court improperly directed that enforcement of the parties' stipulation of settlement which required the mother to practice full religious observance in accordance with the Hasidic practices of ultra Orthodoxy during any period in which she has physical custody of the children and at any appearance at the children's schools. The plain language of the parties' agreement was "to give the children a Hasidic upbringing". The parties' agreement did not require the mother to practice any type of religion, to dress in any particular way, or to hide her views or identity from the children. Nor may the courts compel any person to adopt any particular religious lifestyle. At a minimum, the Constitution guarantees that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise" (Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. at 587). Thus, it held that a religious upbringing clause should not, and cannot, be enforced to the extent that it violates a parent's legitimate due process right to express oneself and live freely (see Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 574. The parties themselves agreed in the stipulation of settlement that they "shall [each] be free from interference, authority and control, direct or indirect, by the other" (emphasis added). The weight of the evidence did not support the conclusion that it was in the children's best interests to have their mother categorically conceal the true nature of her feelings and beliefs from them at all times and in all respects, or to otherwise force her to adhere to practices and beliefs that she no longer shares. There was no indication or allegation that the mother's feelings and beliefs were not sincerely held, or that they were adopted for the purpose of subverting the religious upbringing clause, and there had been no showing that they are inherently harmful to the children's well-being.

The evidence at the hearing established that the children spent their entire lives in the Hasidic community, they attend Hasidic schools, and their extended families are Hasidic. The weight of the evidence demonstrated that it was in the children's best interests to continue to permit the father to exercise final decision-making authority over the children's education and to continue to permit him to require the children to practice full religious observance in accordance with the Hasidic practices of ultra Orthodoxy while they are in his custody, or in the custody of a school that requires adherence to such practices. It directed the mother to make all reasonable efforts to ensure that the children's appearance and conduct comply with the Hasidic religious requirements of the father and of the children's schools while the children are in the physical custody of their father or their respective schools.

Where Wife Violated Automatic Orders by Ceasing to Pay Premiums for Husbands Whole Life Insurance Policy, Motion to Hold Wife in Civil and Criminal Contempt Properly Denied Based upon Husbands Admitted Use of His Whole Life Insurance Policy as a "Savings Plan"

In Savel v Savel, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 3611679, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 06309 (2d Dept., 2017) the plaintiff served a summons with notice accompanied by the “automatic orders” of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(2)(b), which require, inter alia, that both parties maintain existing life insurance policies in full force and effect. The plaintiff moved to hold the defendant in civil and criminal contempt, alleging that she violated the automatic orders by ceasing to pay the premiums for his whole life insurance policy. He further sought an order directing the defendant to maintain the policy during the pendency of the action. In opposition, the defendant conceded that she ceased paying the premiums for the plaintiff’s whole life insurance policy, but argued that she did not violate the automatic orders and that, even if she did, the plaintiff was not prejudiced thereby. The parties had $12 million in term life insurance benefitting their children, in addition to each of their whole life insurance policies. The defendant argued that the whole life insurance policies were intended as savings vehicles that should not be subject to the automatic orders, and she should not have to contribute her post-commencement earnings to a savings vehicle for the plaintiff. The Supreme Court denied the plaintiff’s motion to hold the defendant in contempt and to direct her to maintain the subject policy during the pendency of the action, determining that, under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff’s whole life insurance policy was a savings vehicle and not life insurance subject to the automatic orders. The Appellate Division held that “under the particular circumstances of this case, including the $12 million in term life insurance on the parties, an additional $7.6 million in whole life insurance on the defendant, and the plaintiff’s admitted use of his whole life insurance policy as a “savings plan,” the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in declining to hold the defendant in contempt”, and properly denied the plaintiff’s motion to hold the defendant in contempt and to direct her to maintain the subject policy during the pendency of the action.

Seven Month Hiatus Between Plaintiff's Receipt, Retention, and Lack of Specific Objection to Defendants' Bills, Including Partial Payment Thereon, Implied an Account Stated

In Costopoulos v DeCoursey, 151 A.D.3d 1452 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of Supreme Court that awarded defendants summary judgment on the theory that defendants had established an account stated with plaintiff. "An attorney can recover fees on an account stated with proof that a bill was issued to a client and held by the client without objection for an unreasonable period of time". The defendants need not establish the reasonableness of the fee since the client's act of holding the statement without objection will be construed as acquiescence as to its correctness. In support of their motion, defendants submitted the retainer agreement, copies of the monthly unpaid invoices sent to plaintiff, and copies of email correspondence between defendant Nicole Helmer Simon and plaintiff. These documents demonstrated plaintiff's receipt of the invoices, partial payment thereon and lack of specific objections to the invoices. These "submissions satisfied [defendants'] prima facie burden to show that accounts were submitted and retained without objection, thus shifting the burden to [plaintiff] to demonstrate the existence of triable issues of fact. In opposition, plaintiff submitted her affidavit and copies of emails between her and Simon. Review of the proof offered by plaintiff showed that, in March 2015, plaintiff expressed questions about general billing policies set forth in the retainer agreement, including the time charged to her for sending and receiving emails. After an exchange of emails between plaintiff and Simon, these concerns were resolved by a credit on plaintiff's next monthly bill. Thereafter, defendants sent plaintiff monthly bills that were received and retained by plaintiff, and upon which plaintiff made periodic payments, with the last payment made on September 21, 2015. During the period between March 2015 and October 20, 2015, plaintiff received and retained seven monthly bills that detailed the hourly rate, hours expended and the services rendered. During this period, plaintiff failed to articulate any questions directed at specific instances where she found the bills to be in error, and this lack of specific objection establishes the correctness and reasonableness of the fees. The emails upon which plaintiff relied to establish her objections to the amount due revealed that plaintiff "failed to rebut the inference that [she] agreed to the account by tendering evidentiary proof of circumstances tending to show a contrary inference" and "were insufficient to raise a triable issue of fact as to the existence of an account stated" (Schlenker v. Cascino, 124 A.D.3d at 1153, 2 N.Y.S.3d 292). The emails and, plaintiff's own affidavit revealed only generalized objections relating to the escalating expenses due to delays in the litigation outside the control of defendants. The long hiatus between plaintiff's receipt, retention, and the lack of specific objection to defendants' bills, including her partial payment thereon, implied an account stated since, when no timely objection is raised after an account is presented, silence is deemed acquiescence and warrants enforcement of the implied agreement to pay. As is relevant here, the retainer agreement provided that, "[u]pon receipt of our bill, you are expected to review the bill and promptly bring to our attention any objections you may have to the bill."

Court Erred in Issuing Orders of Protection That Did Not Expire until the Children's 18th Birthdays Where Respondent Was a Parent Substitute Who Was Responsible for the Children's Care

In Matter of Nevaeh T., 151 A.D.3d 1766, 56 N.Y.S.3d 757, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 04725 (4th Dept., 2017) Petitioner commenced neglect proceedings against Wilbert J., III (respondent) and respondent mother. The mother admitted that she neglected the children, and orders were issued granting her an adjournment in contemplation of dismissal. The petitions against respondent proceeded to a hearing, after which Family Court issued an order finding that respondent was a parent substitute who was responsible for the children's care and finding that he neglected the children. After a dispositional hearing, the court issued orders of protection in favor of the children until their 18th birthdays.

The Appellate Division held that the court properly found that he was a person legally responsible for the care of the children. The testimony at the hearing established that respondent was at the mother's residence on at least a regular basis, if not actually living there. However, it agreed with respondent that the court erred in issuing orders of protection that did not expire until the children's 18th birthdays. Pursuant to Family Court Act § 1056(1), the court may issue an order of protection in an article 10 proceeding, but such order of protection shall expire no later than the expiration date of "such other order made under this part, except as provided in subdivision four of this section." Subdivision (4) allows a court to issue an order of protection until a child's 18th birthday, but only against a person "who was a member of the child's household or a person legally responsible ..., and who is no longer a member of such household at the time of the disposition and who is not related by blood or marriage to the child or a member of the child's household." Here, respondent was found to be a person legally responsible for the children and, at the time of the dispositional hearing, he no longer lived with the mother. He was also not related by blood or marriage to the children, but he was related to a member of their household. Petitioner's caseworker testified at the dispositional hearing that respondent was the father of the mother's recently-born child, who lived in the mother's home. Subdivision (4) was therefore inapplicable on its face. Inasmuch as the only other dispositional orders issued with respect to the children at the time the court issued the orders of protection had expiration dates of March 26, 2015, it modified the orders of protection issued in these proceedings to expire on that same date.

Where Court Appointed Forensic Evaluator Directed to Submit an Updated Report on Remittur Supreme Court Should Have Permitted Plaintiff to Cross-examine the Forensic Evaluator with Respect to the Updated Report

In EV v. RV, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 3272238, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05994 (2d Dept., 2017) upon remittitur from the Appellate Division in this custody modification proceeding, the court-appointed forensic evaluator performed a new evaluation and submitted an updated forensic mental health report. The plaintiff then moved, inter alia, for leave to cross-examine the forensic evaluator regarding the updated report. Supreme Court denied the motion, and granted defendant's cross motion to modify the prior orders of custody and visitation so as to award him sole legal and physical custody of the child. The Appellate Division noted that the matter had been remitted to the Supreme Court for the limited purpose of receiving the updated forensic mental health evaluation and an in camera examination of the child (see E.V. v. R.V., 130 AD3d at 921). However, in receiving the updated report pursuant to this Court's order, the Supreme Court should have permitted the plaintiff to cross-examine the forensic evaluator with respect to the updated report (see 22 NYCRR 202.16[g][2]; Ekstra v. Ekstra, 49 AD3d 594, 595). It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for the sole purpose of permitting cross-examination of the forensic evaluator with respect to the updated report. It held the appeal in abeyance and directed that the Supreme Court shall issue a report setting forth its findings derived from the cross-examination and setting forth whether the testimony received would have changed its determination set forth in the order appealed from.

Where Party Has Paid Other Party's Share of Marital Debt, Such as Mortgage, Taxes, and Insurance on the Marital Residence, Reimbursement Is Required.

In Morales v Carvajal, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 3273299, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 059459 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that plaintiff was entitled to receive a credit against the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence for the money that he paid to reduce the balance of the mortgage during the pendency of the action.. The plaintiff made these payments without any contribution from the defendant. Where, as here, a party has paid the other party's share of what proves to be marital debt, such as the mortgage, taxes, and insurance on the marital residence, reimbursement is required.

The Court also held that credit card debt incurred prior to the commencement of a matrimonial action constitutes marital debt and should be equally shared by the parties.

No appeal of right from order denying an ex parte motion to issue order to show cause

Slip Op. 05641 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that an appeal from an order denying an ex parte motion to issue an order to show cause must be dismissed as such order is not appealable as of right (see CPLR 5701[a][2])

Where Custody of Child under Supervision of DSS Is Transferred to the Custody of a Parent or Relative in Another State, the Provisions of the ICPC Apply Even Where There Is a Pending Family Ct Act Article 6 Petition for Custody

In Matter of Dawn N., v Schenectady County Department of Social Services, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2017 WL 2870414, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05482 (3d Dept., 2017) Petitioner (grandmother) was the maternal grandmother of the child (born in 2010) and a resident of North Carolina. In May 2014, respondent Schenectady County Department of Social Services (DSS) effectuated an emergency removal of the child and commenced a neglect proceeding against the mother. The grandmother commenced a Family Ct Act article 6 proceeding against DSS and the mother seeking custody of the child. The mother was sentenced to a term of imprisonment. In response to the grandmother's custody petition, DSS asked that its North Carolina counterpart perform a home study to determine whether, under the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (see Social Services Law § 374-a [hereinafter ICPC]), the grandmother was a suitable resource for the child. After completion of the home study the North Carolina authorities advised DSS that it did not recommend placement of the subject child with the grandmother. Family Court conducted a fact-finding hearing. The mother appeared and voiced her support for the grandmother's petition—prompting Family Court to dispense with an extraordinary circumstances inquiry. At the conclusion of that hearing, Family Court dismissed the grandmother's petition, finding that it was not in the child's best interests to award custody to the grandmother.

The Appellate Division affirmed for reasons other than those expressed by Family Court. Although Family Court acknowledged in its written decision that North Carolina had not recommended placement of the child with the grandmother, the court did not address whether, as a threshold matter, the ICPC applied where, as here, a relative was seeking custody of the child pursuant to a petition brought under Family Ct Act article 6 or whether custody of the child could be awarded to the grandmother in the absence of approval from North Carolina authorities. As the ICPC applied to this proceeding, and in light of the statutory prohibition against placing a child in another jurisdiction if that jurisdiction determines that such placement would not be in the child's best interests (Social Services Law § 374-a [1] [art III] [d]), Family Court properly dismissed the grandmother's petition for custody. The Appellate Division observed that the ICPC provides, in relevant part, that “[n]o sending agency shall send, bring, or cause to be sent or brought into any other party state any child for placement in foster care or as a preliminary to a possible adoption unless the sending agency shall comply with each and every requirement set forth in this article and with the applicable laws of the receiving state governing the placement of children therein” (Social Services Law § 374-a [1] [art III] [a]). To that end, the statute expressly provides that “[t]he child shall not be sent, brought, or caused to be sent or brought into the receiving state until the appropriate public authorities in the receiving state shall notify the sending agency, in writing, to the effect that the proposed placement does not appear to be contrary to the interests of the child” (Social Services Law § 374-a [1] [art III][d]).

The Appellate Division rejected the grandmothers argument that the ICPC did not apply at all because custody of the subject child is being sought in the context of a Family Ct Act article 6 proceeding (rather than in conjunction with the related Family Ct Act article 10 neglect proceeding against the mother). At the time that the grandmother's custody petition was filed, DSS had custody of the child in the context of the then-pending Family Ct Act article 10 proceeding. To that end, where the custody of a child who is under the supervision of [DSS] is transferred to the custody of a parent or relative in another state, the provisions of the ICPC apply (Matter of Alexis M. v. Jenelle F., 91 AD3d 648, 650–651 [2012])—even where, as here, there is a pending Family Ct Act article 6 petition for custody (see Matter of Faison v. Capozello, 50 AD3d 797, 797–798 [2008]; but see Matter of Louis N. [Dawn O.], 98 AD3d 918, 919 [2012]; Matter of Marcy RR., 2 AD3d 1199, 1200–1201 [2003]). Permitting a court to award custody of a child (who is in the care and custody of a social services agency) to an out-of-state relative in the context of a Family Ct Act article 6 proceeding (while there is a related Family Ct Act article 10 proceeding in play) not only subverts the goals of the ICPC, but allows a court to effectively circumvent the procedures and requirements set forth therein—a result that is contrary to the expressed purpose of the statute. It agreed with DSS that the provisions of the ICPC applied and, absent approval from authorities in North Carolina, Family Court could not grant the grandmother's petition for custody.

Parties May Chart Their Own Litigation Course by Agreement Which Courts Are Bound to Enforce.

Waiver of Physician-patient Privilege in Contesting Custody Requires Showing That Resolution of Custody Issue Requires Revelation of Protected Material

In Bruzzese v Bruzzese, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2961475, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05579 (2d Dept., 2017) the plaintiff commenced an action for a divorce, and the defendant counterclaimed for a divorce. Prior to trial, the parties stipulated to a divorce on the ground of an irretrievable breakdown of the marital relationship pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7). After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the defendant a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding the defendant a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. "Parties by their stipulations may in many ways make the law for any legal proceeding to which they are parties, which not only binds them, but which the courts are bound to enforce" (Matter of New York, Lackawanna & W. R.R. Co., 98 N.Y. 447, 453). There was no showing of cause sufficient to invalidate the parties' stipulation to a divorce on the ground of an irretrievable breakdown of the marital relationship. Accordingly, the court should have awarded the defendant a divorce on this ground.

The Appellate Division found, inter alia, that the Supreme Court, relying on the physician-patient privilege, improperly precluded testimony of two witnesses who were doctors, regarding the defendant's mental health. It noted that in a matrimonial action, a party waives the physician-patient privilege concerning his or her mental or physical condition by actively contesting custody. However, there "first must be a showing beyond mere conclusory statements that resolution of the custody issue requires revelation of the protected material" (McDonald v. McDonald, 196 A.D.2d 7, 13; see Baecher v. Baecher, 58 A.D.2d 821). Since the defendant actively contested custody, and the plaintiff made the requisite showing that resolution of the custody issue required revelation of the protected material, the court should not have precluded the testimony of the doctors regarding the defendant's mental health.

Authors note: In McDonald v. McDonald, 196 A.D.2d 7, 13 (2d Dept., 1994) the Second Department adopted the requirement of Perry v Fiumano, 61 AD2d 512, 519 that before the court may find that there has been a waiver of the physician-patient privilege "[t]here first must be a showing beyond 'mere conclusory statements' that resolution of the custody issue requires revelation of the protected material" (Perry v Fiumano, 61 AD2d 512, 519).

Proper to Award Spouse Credit for Half of Mortgage Payments Made after Commencement. Both Parties Are Responsible for Mainlining Marital Residence after Commencement.

In Brinkmann v Brinkmann, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 3045864, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05702 (2d Dept., 2017) the plaintiff and the defendant were married in 1975. In August 2011, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. The Appellate Division held that the court did not err in granting the plaintiff a credit for one-half of the payments that he made towards the mortgage on the marital residence following the commencement of the action. Generally, it is the responsibility of both parties to maintain the marital residence during the pendency of a matrimonial action. Here, the defendant voluntarily moved out of the marital residence in 2010, and the plaintiff had been solely responsible for the mortgage payments on the residence since that time.

The Appellate Division dismissed the appeal from so much of the judgment as awarded the defendant counsel fees in the sum of $5,000. It is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal. Here, the defendant failed to include any of the papers submitted to the Supreme Court in connection with her application for counsel fees in the record on appeal. Since the record was inadequate for this Court to review the issues raised by the defendant as to this award, it dismissed the appeal from this portion of the judgment.

Where Stipulation Fails to Identify Who Submits QDRO it Is Generally the Responsibility of the Party Seeking Approval of QDRO

In Scheriff v Scheriff, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 3044528, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05760 (2d Dept., 2017) the parties stipulation provided that the defendant was entitled to 50% of the marital portion of the plaintiff's pension and that the parties were to cooperate with each other in obtaining a Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO) to divide the pension, that they would equally share the cost of preparing the QDRO, and that the defendant's share would be determined pursuant to the formula set forth in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481). The defendant moved, inter alia, "for a set-off against plaintiff's entitlement to his equity share of the former marital home in an amount equal to all monies owed for QDRO arrears. Supreme Court denied the motion and directed the defendant to prepare and submit "an appropriate Domestic Relations Order." The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that under the defendant was entitled to her equitable share of the plaintiff's pension and that payment of her share was to be effectuated through the submission of a QDRO. Although the stipulation failed to identify the party who would be responsible for submitting the QDRO, "it is generally the responsibility of the party seeking approval of the QDRO to submit it to the court with notice of settlement" (Kraus v. Kraus, 131 AD3d at 101). Thus, the defendant should have prepared and submitted a proposed QDRO to the Supreme Court with a copy to the defendant's employer. In the absence of a QDRO, there were no "QDRO arrears."

Where Children's Wishes Are Product of Influence AFC Justified in Advocating for a Position Contrary to Those Wishes

In Matter of Cunningham v Talbot, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2977187, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05637 2017 WL 2977187 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that as the evidence supported a finding that the children's wishes were both a product of the father's influence and "likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to [them]," the attorney for the children was justified in advocating for a position contrary to those wishes where the attorney for the children properly informed Supreme Court that the children had expressed a desire not to visit the mother (see 22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]).

Appellate Division Vacates Provision of Judgment for Visitation with Parties Dog. Judgement must Conform Strictly to Courts Decision

In Minervini v Minervini, 2017 WL 3045586 (2d Dept., 2017) after the parties submitted stipulations of agreed-upon facts and requests for relief in lieu of trial, the court issued a decision and order resolving the issue of equitable distribution and directed that, in accordance with the parties' agreement, all pensions and retirement accounts would be divided "in accordance with the Majauskas rule" (see Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481). The court subsequently issued a judgment of divorce, which, did not include a provision awarding the defendant his proportionate share of the plaintiff's pension and retirement accounts pursuant to the formula established in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481). In addition, the judgment awarded the plaintiff visitation with the parties' dog. The Appellate Division observed that a judgment or order must conform strictly to the court's decision. Where there is an inconsistency between a judgment or order and the decision upon which it is based, the decision controls. It found that the defendant correctly contended that the judgment of divorce had to be modified to conform to the Supreme Court's decision. The decision and order did not contain a provision awarding the plaintiff visitation with the parties' dog, and that provision of the judgment had to be deleted. The judgment failed to include a provision awarding the defendant his proportionate share of the plaintiff's pension and retirement accounts, and a provision doing so had to be added.

Father Properly Precluded from Offering Evidence as to Financial Ability for Failure to Accompany the Affidavit with Documentation Required by Family Court Act § 424-a

In the Matter of Suffolk County Department of Social Services, ex rel Calliendo v Block, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2855673, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05445 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that Family Court did not err in denying the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order granting the petition for child support. It observed that where a respondent in a child support proceeding fails, without good cause, to comply with the compulsory financial disclosure mandated by Family Court Act § 424-a, "the court on its own motion or on application shall grant the relief demanded in the petition or shall order that, for purposes of the support proceeding, the respondent shall be precluded from offering evidence as to respondent's financial ability to pay support" (Family Ct Act § 424-a[b]). While the father submitted a sworn financial affidavit, he failed to accompany the affidavit with any of the documentation required by Family Court Act § 424-a. Since the father failed, without good cause, to comply with the compulsory financial disclosure mandated by Family Court Act § 424-a, the Family Court did not err in precluding him from offering evidence as to his financial ability to pay and providently exercised its discretion in determining the amount of support based on the needs of the child, which were established by the petitioner as the customary grant for one child on public assistance..

Where No Party Moved for a Change in Custody Court May Not Modify Existing Custody Order in Non-emergency Situation Absent Notice and Opportunity to Present Evidence

In Noel v Melle, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2800796, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05226 (2d Dept., 2017) the mother was awarded sole custody of the child, with visitation to the father. The father filed a violation petition alleging that the mother had violated the order by relocating with the child and by denying him visitation. After three court appearances, the matter was scheduled for a hearing. On that date, the Supreme Court denied a request by the mother to appear by telephone, and, without the father having made an application for custody of the child or the benefit of an evidentiary hearing, awarded the father custody of the child. The court also issued a warrant for the mother's arrest. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for further proceedings on the father's violation petition. It cautioned the Supreme Court to be mindful that determining the best interest of a child is a weighty responsibility, and that it ordinarily should not make such a determination without conducting an evidentiary hearing. It held that in order to modify a consent order granting sole custody to a parent, there must be a showing of a change in circumstances such that modification is required to protect the best interests of the child'. Custody determinations should generally be made only after a full and plenary hearing and inquiry. Reversal or modification of an existing custody order should not be a weapon wielded as a means of punishing a recalcitrant or contemptuous parent. Moreover, where no party has moved for a change in custody, a court may not modify an existing custody order in a non-emergency situation absent notice to the parties, and without affording the custodial parent an opportunity to present evidence and to call and cross-examine witnesses. Supreme Court improperly modified the consent order by changing custody from the mother to the father without the father having sought that relief in the petition, and without any apparent consideration of the child's best interests (see S.L. v. J.R., 27 NY3d at 563). The court's award of custody to the father under the circumstances of this case also was improper in light of the father's statements during the proceedings that he did not have a steady place to live with the child and that he did not wish to make an application for custody.

Court must Conduct Family Ct Act § 1089(d) Age-appropriate Consultation Before Modifying Permanency Plan

In Matter of Dawn M, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2801050, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in failing to conduct the age-appropriate consultation with the children as mandated by Family Ct Act § 1089(d), before modifying the permanency plan from return to parent to termination of parental rights and freeing the children for adoption. There was nothing in the record indicating that Family Court fulfilled its obligation to conduct such consultation. While a personal consultation is not required, “the court is required to find some age-appropriate means of ascertaining their wishes” (Matter of Julian P. [Melissa P.-Zachary L.], 106 AD3d 1383, 1385 [2013]; see Matter of Dakota F. [Angela F.], 92 AD3d 1097, 1098 [2012]). The mere participation at the hearing and the giving of a closing statement, without more, by the attorney who represented Dawn, Summer and Samantha did not satisfy the age-appropriate consultation requirement of Family Ct Act § 1089(d). The closing statement by the attorney for the three younger children was devoid of any statement indicating the preferences of Dawn, Summer or Samantha. Nor did the attorney for the three younger children point to any other evidence in the record that reflected their wishes. The Legislature has made it explicitly clear that a permanency hearing “shall” include an age-appropriate consultation (Family Ct Act § 1089[d]; see 22 NYCRR 205.17 [d]). In light of this statutory command, the children’s wishes, although not dispositive (see Matter of Alexis SS. [Chezy SS.], 125 AD3d 1141, 1143 n. 2 [2015]), carry significance and cannot be lightly overlooked. Given that the record did not disclose the wishes of Dawn, Summer or Samantha, the matter was remitted so that Family Court could conduct the age-appropriate consultation under Family Ct Act § 1089(d) with respect to these children.

Enforcement of a Charging Lien Properly Pursued by Way of Motion Within Action to Which it Pertains

In Sprole v Sprole, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2674271 (Mem), 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05135 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division rejected the wife’s argument that Supreme Court erred in denying her cross motion for dismissal on the basis that her former attorney Gingold, who represented her during the action in 2010, inter alia, improperly commenced the action by motion. A charging lien is a creature of statute and provides an attorney compensation for his or her unpaid services, where applicable, by way of an “equitable ownership interest in a client’s cause of action”. The amount of the charging lien may be determined prior to the outcome of the underlying action. Enforcement of a charging lien is properly pursued by way of motion within the action to which it pertains.

U

Mandatory Arbitration Provisions of 22 NYCRR Part 137 Do Not Apply to Application for Charging Lien for More than $50,000

In Sprole v Sprole, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2674291, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05131 (3d Dept., 2017) after a judgment of divorce was granted in September 2015, Richard B. Alderman, who represented defendant (wife) in the divorce action from September 2011 until his discharge on June 10, 2015, moved to secure a charging lien. The court, granted the request for a charging lien in the sum of $52,173.43, directed that the award was enforceable against the wife's equitable distribution award and ordered that a $2,200 check that plaintiff had issued to the wife as her share of credit card points be reissued by plaintiff to Alderman. The Appellate Division rejected the wife's argument that she discharged Alderman for cause. When discharged "for cause," an "attorney has no right to compensation or to a retaining lien" (Teichner v. W & J Holsteins, 64 N.Y.2d 977, 979 [1985]). A 'for cause' termination must be based on more than a client's general dissatisfaction with the attorney's performance and typically involves a significant breach of legal duty such that the client can establish that the attorney's conduct constituted a failure to properly represent the client's interests. (Doviak v. Lowe's Home Ctrs., Inc., 134 AD3d 1324, 1326 [2015]).

Alderman appeared as counsel on the wife's behalf and, as such, he was entitled to assert a retaining lien on the file after his discharge (see D'Ambrosio v. Racanelli, 129 AD3d 900, 901 [2015]). Having moved within this action to secure a charging lien pursuant to Judiciary Law § 475, Alderman was not bound by the arbitration notice provisions of 22 NYCRR 137.6(b). The fee dispute program set forth in 22 NYCRR part 137 does not apply to disputes for more than $50,000 (see 22 NYCRR 137.1 [b][2]).

Court Erred in Dismissing Support Petition Based on a Nonparty's Refusal to Disclose Financial Information Voluntarily

In Matter of Deshotel v Mandile, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2604482, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 04972 (4th Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which imputed income to the mother finding that the record supported the determination that the mother "has access to, and receives, financial support from" her paramour, with whom she resided. The Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate erred in dismissing the mother's cross petition for a downward modification of child support. The sole justification for that dismissal was the mother's failure to provide financial disclosure from her paramour, a nonparty, who had filed an affidavit stating that he refused to provide financial disclosure to the court. While certain penalties or sanctions may be appropriate for the individual conduct of the mother it was apparent that the actions of a nonparty weighed heavily in the decision to invoke the 'ultimate penalty' (Fox v. Fox, 9 AD3d 549, 550). Under the circumstances of this case, it concluded that the court erred in dismissing the cross petition based on a nonparty's refusal to disclose financial information voluntarily. It modified the order by reinstating the mother's cross petition for a downward modification of child support, and remitted the matter to Family Court for a new hearing on the cross petition.

Child in a Custody Matter Does Not Have “Full-party” Status and Cannot Appeal from Denial of Mothers Modification Petition Where She Does Not Appeal.

In Matter of Lawrence v Lawrence, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2604311 (Mem), 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 05023 (4th Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division dismissed the appeal taken by the Attorney for the Child representing the parties' oldest child from an order dismissing the mother's petition seeking modification of a custody order. Inasmuch as the mother had not taken an appeal from that order, the child, while dissatisfied with the order, cannot force the mother to litigate a petition that she has since abandoned. It held that a child in a custody matter does not have "full-party status" (Matter of McDermott v. Bale, 94 AD3d 1542, 1543), and it declined to permit the child's desires to chart the course of litigation.

Placement in a Juvenile Delinquency Matter Does Not Satisfy Dependency Requirement for a Sijs Finding

In Matter of K.S.,--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2727027, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 27212 (Fam Ct, 2017) Family Court held that a placement in a juvenile delinquency matter does not satisfy the dependency requirement necessary for a SIJS finding as set forth in 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(27)(j) and 8 CFR § 204.11. It found no Appellate authority in this State to support a finding that a juvenile delinquency proceeding constitutes a dependency upon the Family Court for special findings in a SIJS matter. Respondent's request for a SIJS finding was denied.

Testimonial Evidence is not sufficient to overcome marital property presumption

In Schacter v Schacter, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2366242, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 04372 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that Plaintiff's brief testimony that a piano was gifted to him during the marriage did not suffice to overcome the marital property presumption; thus, the court properly deemed the piano marital property to be sold and the net proceeds divided equally between the parties (see DRL § 236[B][1][c]; Bernard v. Bernard, 126 AD3d 658, 659 [2d Dept 2015])

Net Value of Each Asset must Be Determined Before Distribution

In Rudish v Rudish, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2346529, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 04307 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division reiterated the rule that “A determination must be made as to the net value of each asset before determining the distribution thereof” (D’Amato v. D’Amato, 96 A.D.2d 849, 850; see Van Dood v. Van Dood, 142 AD3d 661, 662). Here, the defendant failed to establish his entitlement to equitable distribution of the parties’ sailboat and the contents of the marital home, as he failed to offer any evidence as to the value of these items. The Supreme Court properly declined to award the defendant a credit for the vehicle purchased by him prior to the marriage since he failed to establish its value.

Where Counsel Believes Client May Give False Testimony, Counsel Should Attempt to Dissuade the Client from Testifying And, Failing That, Present the Client’s Testimony in a Narrative Fashion

In Matter of Yanique S v Frederick T, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2467068, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 04515 (3d Dept., 2017) a family offense proceeding, the Appellate Division observed that an attorney's duty to zealously represent a client is circumscribed by an 'equally solemn duty to comply with the law and standards of professional conduct ... to prevent and disclose frauds upon the court' " (People v. DePallo, 96 N.Y.2d 437, 441 [2001]). To that end, the Rules of Professional Conduct expressly prohibit an attorney from, among other things, "mak[ing] a false statement of fact or law to a tribunal" "offer[ing] or us[ing] evidence that [he or she] knows to be false", "suppress[ing] any evidence that [he or she] or the client has a legal obligation to reveal or produce", "knowingly us[ing] perjured testimony or false evidence" or otherwise "knowingly engag[ing] in other illegal conduct". Where counsel knows that his or her client or a witness called by counsel has either "offered material [false] evidence" or is engaging, has engaged or intends to engage "in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding" appropriate remedial efforts—including making a disclosure to the tribunal (see People v. DePallo, 96 N.Y.2d at 441; Rules of Professional Conduct [22 NYCRR 1200.0] rule 3.4[a][3]; [b]). Absent such knowledge, however, counsel may only do precisely what respondent's counsel did here—inform the court, without elaboration, that he or she has an ethical dilemma, attempt to dissuade the client from testifying and, failing that, present the client's testimony in a narrative fashion. As the Second Department recently reiterated, an attorney confronted with counsel's situation here "must contend with competing considerations—duties of zealous advocacy, confidentiality and loyalty to the client on the one hand, and a responsibility to the courts and our truth-seeking system of justice on the other. Requiring counsel to put on the record his or her reasons [underlying the stated ethical dilemma] and the advice offered to the [client] related to his or her testimony would not strike the appropriate balance between these competing considerations but rather, would present too great a risk that ... counsel would be forced to reveal client confidences" (People v. Wesley, 134 AD3d at 965. Contrary to respondent's claim, the foregoing procedure did not deprive him of the effective assistance of counsel, and, given that counsel otherwise cross-examined petitioner, made appropriate objections, advanced a plausible defense and presented a cogent closing statement, it rejected respondent's assertion that he was denied meaningful representation.

Attorney for the Child Violated Ethical Duty When He Advocated for Result That Was Contrary to Child's Expressed Wishes

In Matter of Kleinbach v Cullerton, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 2491351, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 04641 (4th Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division, inter alia, agreed with the father that the initial Attorney for the Child (AFC) violated his ethical duty to determine the subject child's position and advocate zealously in support of the child's wishes, because that AFC advocated for a result that was contrary to the child's expressed wishes in the absence of any justification for doing so. It held that there are only two circumstances in which an AFC is authorized to substitute his or her own judgment for that of the child: "[w]hen the [AFC] is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child. (Matter of Swinson v. Dobson, 101 AD3d 1686, 1687 quoting 22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]), neither of which was present here. In addition, although an AFC should not have a particular position or decision in mind at the outset of the case before the gathering of evidence" (Matter of Carballeira v. Shumway, 273 A.D.2d 753, 756; see Matter of Brown v. Simon, 123 AD3d 1120, 1123), the initial AFC indicated during his first court appearance, before he spoke with the child or gathered evidence regarding the petitions, that he would be substituting his judgment for that of the child.

Chief Administrative Judge Adopts New Rules for Matrimonial Actions

By Administrative Order A/O/100/17, 22 NYCRR §202.50 (b) was amended to add a new section 202.50 (b)(3).

The new section requires that every Uncontested and Contested Judgment of Divorce contain certain decretal paragraphs, including one concerning the venue where post judgment applications for modification or enforcement in Supreme Court should be brought. 22 NYCRR §202.50 (b)(3), which is effective August 1, 2017, provides as follows:

202.50. Proposed Judgments in Matrimonial Actions; Forms

* * *

(b) Approved Forms.

* * *

(3) Additional Requirement with Respect to Uncontested and Contested Judgments of Divorce. In addition to satisfying the requirements of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subdivision, every judgment of divorce, whether uncontested or contested, shall include language substantially in accordance with the following decretal paragraphs which shall supersede any inconsistent decretal paragraphs currently required for such forms:

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that the Settlement Agreement entered into between the parties on the ___ day of ____, [] an original OR [] a transcript of which is on file with this Court and incorporated herein by reference, shall survive and shall not be merged into this judgment, * and the parties are hereby directed to comply with all legally enforceable terms and conditions of said agreement as if such terms and conditions were set forth in their entirety herein; and it is further

* In contested actions, this paragraph may read either [shall survive and shall not be merged into this judgment] or [shall not survive and shall be merged into this judgment].

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that the Supreme Court shall retain jurisdiction to hear any applications to enforce the provisions of said Settlement Agreement or to enforce or modify the provisions of this judgment, provided the court retains jurisdiction of the matter concurrently with the Family Court for the purpose of specifically enforcing, such of the provisions of that (separation agreement) (stipulation agreement) as are capable of specific enforcement, to the extent permitted by law, and of modifying such judgment with respect to maintenance, support, custody or visitation to the extent permitted by law, or both; and it is further

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that any applications brought in Supreme Court to enforce the provisions of said Settlement Agreement or to enforce or modify the provisions of this judgment shall be brought in a County wherein one of the parties resides; provided that if there are minor children of the marriage, such applications shall be brought in a county wherein one of the parties or the child or children reside, except. in the discretion of the judge, for good cause. Good cause applications shall be made by motion or order to show cause. Where the address of either party and any child or children is unknown and not a matter of public record, or is subject to an existing confidentiality order pursuant to DRL § 254 or FCA § 154-b, such applications may be brought in the county where the judgment was entered; and it is further

By Administrative Order A/O/99/17, 22 NYCRR §202 was amended to add a new section 202.16-b.

The new section addresses the submission of written applications in contested matrimonial actions.

The new rules contain limitations which are applicable to the submission of papers on pendente lite applications for alimony, maintenance, counsel fees, child support, exclusive occupancy, custody and visitation unless the requirements are waived by the judge for good cause shown. Among other things, all orders to show cause and motions must be in Times New Roman, font 12 and double spaced. The supporting affidavit or affidavit in opposition or attorney affirmation in support or opposition or memorandum of law may not exceed twenty (20) pages. Any expert affidavit may not exceed eight (8) additional pages. Reply affidavits or affirmations may not exceed ten (10) pages. Surreply affidavits can only be submitted with prior court permission. 22 NYCRR 202.16 - b, which is effective July 1, 2017, provides as follows:

§202.16-b Submission of Written Applications in Contested Matrimonial Actions.

(1) Applicability. This section shall be applicable to all contested matrimonial actions and proceedings in Supreme Court authorized by subdivision (2) of Part B of section 236 of the Domestic Relations Law.

(2) Unless otherwise expressly provided by any provision of the CPLR or other statute, and in addition to the requirements of 22 NYCRR §202.16 (k) where applicable, the following rules and limitations are required for the submission of papers on pendente lite applications for alimony, maintenance, counsel fees, child support, exclusive occupancy, custody and visitation unless said requirements are waived by the judge for good cause shown:

(i) Applications that are deemed an emergency must comply with 22 NYCRR §202.7 and provide for notice, where applicable, in accordance with same. These emergency applications shall receive a preference by the clerk for processing and the court for signature. Designating an application as an emergency without good cause may be punishable by the issuance of sanctions pursuant to Part 130 of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge. Any application designated as an emergency without good cause shall be processed and considered in the ordinary course of local court procedures.

(ii) Where practicable, all orders to show cause, motions or crossmotions for relief should be made in one order to show cause or motion or cross-motion.

(iii) All orders to show cause and motions or cross motions shall be submitted on one-sided copy except as otherwise provided in 22 NYCRR §202.5(at or electronically where authorized, with one-inch margins on eight and one half by eleven (8.5 x 11) inch paper with all additional exhibits tabbed. They shall be in Times New Roman font 12 and double spaced. They must be of sufficient quality ink to allow for the reading and proper scanning of the documents. Self-represented litigants may submit handwritten applications provided that the handwriting is legible and otherwise in conformity with these rules.

(iv) The supporting affidavit or affidavit in opposition or attorney affirmation in support or opposition or memorandum of law shall not exceed twenty (20) pages. Any expert affidavit required shall not exceed eight (8) additional pages. Any attorney affirmation in support or opposition or memorandum of law shall contain only discussion and argument on issues of law except for facts known only to the attorney. Any reply affidavits or affirmations to the extent permitted shall not exceed ten (10) pages. Surreply affidavits can only be submitted with prior court permission.

(v) Except for affidavits of net worth (pursuant to 22 NYCRR §202.16 (b)), retainer agreements (pursuant to Rule 1400.3 of the Joint Rules of the Appellate Division), maintenance guidelines worksheets and/or child support worksheets, or counsel fee billing statements or affirmations or affidavits related to counsel fees (pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237 and 22 NYCRR §202.16(k))' all of which may include attachments thereto, all exhibits annexed to any motion, cross motion, order to show cause, opposition or reply may not be greater than three (3) inches thick without prior permission of the court. All exhibits must contain exhibit tabs.

(vi) If the application or responsive papers exceed the page or size limitation provided in this section, counsel or the self-represented litigant must certify in good faith the need to exceed such limitation, and the court may reject or require revision of the application if the court deems the reasons insufficient.

(3) Nothing contained herein shall prevent a judge or justice of the court or of a judicial district within which the court sits from establishing local part rules to the contrary or in addition to these rules.

By Administrative Order A/O 102/17, the Uncontested Divorce Packet Forms were modified to reflect the increases as of March 1, 2017 in the Self Support Reserve to $16,281 and in the Poverty Level Income for a single person to $12,060. Conditional Order of Preclusion Becomes Absolute upon Failure to Comply with It, Unless Reasonable Excuse for Failure to Comply Existence of a Potentially Meritorious Cause of Action or Defense Shown.

In Luo v Yang, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1657478, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 03504 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed a protective order pursuant to CPLR 3103(a) preventing the defendant from seeking to obtain any information about the plaintiff, whether financial or otherwise, and quashed any subpoenas issued prior to the order appealed from on behalf of the defendant seeking any financial or other information of the plaintiff on the ground he was precluded from offering any evidence at trial in this action following his husband's failure to respond to the plaintiff wife's discovery. It pointed out that a conditional order of preclusion requires a party to provide certain discovery by a date certain, or face the sanctions specified in the order". Here, the so-ordered stipulation entered into by the parties in this action functioned as a conditional order of preclusion, which became absolute upon the defendant's failure to comply with it, unless the defendant demonstrated a reasonable excuse for failure to comply with its terms and the existence of a potentially meritorious cause of action or defense. The defendant, who offered bare allegations of neglect by his prior counsel, failed to demonstrate a reasonable excuse for his failure to comply with the so-ordered stipulation.

Physician Permitted to Lay Foundation under CPLR 4518(a) for Entries That He Did Not Personally Enter

In Spence-Burke v Burke, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1484047, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 03210 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held, inter alia, that a child's excessive absences from school may be relevant to the best interests analysis. At trial, the plaintiff sought to admit uncertified medical records from the child's pediatrician's office. Of these records, several entries were written by Innis O'Rourke, a physician who testified at trial, and the remaining entries were written by nontestifying physicians who worked in the same medical practice as Dr. O'Rourke. The Supreme Court precluded the entries written by the nontestifying physicians on the basis that Dr. O'Rourke was permitted to lay a foundation under CPLR 4518(a) only for the entries that he had written. This was error, as a physician is permitted to lay a foundation under CPLR 4518(a) even for entries that he did not personally enter into a patient's medical records.

Once Child Turns 21 Court "Is Divested of Subject Matter Jurisdiction over Guardianship Petition

In Matter of Jose D. H.-P. v. Maria M.N. DE P. 148 A.D.3d 1020, 49 N.Y.S.3d 730, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02038 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division dismissed the appeals as academic. It held that where a child who consented to the appointment of a guardian after his or her 18th birthday turns 21, the term of appointment of the guardian "expires on the child's twenty-first birthday" (SCPA 1707[2]). Consequently, once the child turns 21, the court "is divested of subject matter jurisdiction, and cannot exercise such jurisdiction by virtue of an order nunc pro tunc" Thus, the guardianship petition could not be granted since the child was now 21. Furthermore, since guardianship status, which the Family Court can only grant to individuals under 21, is a condition precedent to a declaration allowing a child to seek SIJS, the petitioner's motion for the issuance of an order declaring that the child is dependent on the Family Court and making the requisite specific findings so as to enable him to petition for SIJS was rendered academic.

Support Magistrate Has Authority to Require Respondent to Participate in Rehabilitative Services

In Matter of Cortland County Department of Social Services v. Perry, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1712813, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 03581 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate had authority to impose sanctions, such as participation in rehabilitative services as was ordered here, for respondent's willful violation of the support order. Family Ct Act § 439(a) sets forth in detail the powers of support magistrates and provides, in pertinent part, that "support magistrates shall be empowered to hear, determine and grant any relief within the powers of the court in any proceeding under this article." Under Family Ct Act § 454(3)(b), which is encompassed by the foregoing provision, courts have the authority, upon the willful violation of a support order, to require a respondent's participation in rehabilitative programs such as "work preparation and skills programs." Family Ct Act § 439(a) only requires the confirmation by Family Court of a sanction where a support magistrate recommends the commitment of a respondent, who has willfully violated a support order, to a period of incarceration. The Support Magistrate clearly acted within her authority in imposing a sanction that required respondent to participate in rehabilitative services and it was not necessary for the matter to be referred to Family Court for this purpose.

Parent Has a Continuing Obligation to Support Child in Foster Care

In Matter of Smith v Jefferson County Dept of Social Services, -- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1528548, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 03318 (4th Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that when a child is placed in foster care, the child's parent has a continuing obligation to provide financial support (see Social Services Law § 398[6] [d]; Family Ct Act §§ 415, 422). That obligation is governed by the guidelines delineated in the CSSA, which apply even in residential or foster care reimbursement contexts.

First Department Affirms Award of Costs of Higher Education, Including College, for 7 Year Old Child Because it Appeared to Be an Inevitable Expense for this Child

In Klauer v Abeliovich, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1450277, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 03110 (1st Dept., 2017) the parties were married in December 2008 and there was one child of the marriage, born in 2010.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly rejected the Referee's recommendation as to basic child support when it determined that in setting the basic child support obligation the parties' combined income above the $141,000 statutory cap should be taken into consideration (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f]). In deciding to utilize the parties' combined income up to $800,000 in setting support, the court examined whether the capped support "adequately reflects a support level that meets the needs and continuation of the child[s] lifestyle" and concluded that it did not (Beroza v. Hendler, 109 AD3d 498, 500–501 [2d Dept 2013]).

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court, under the circumstances, providently exercised its discretion in ordering that the husband pay 20% of the child's educational expenses, including college, until the child attains age 21 (see Cimons v. Cimons, 53 AD3d 125, 131 [2d Dept 2008]). The court took into consideration several factors, including the high educational achievements of both parties and their professions. Plaintiff, a financial analyst, has a B.A. from Georgetown and an MBA from Columbia Business School; she also holds series 3 and 7 licenses. Defendant, an associate professor of medicine at Columbia University Medical School, has a B.A. from Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a M.D./Ph.D. from Harvard. During the marriage the parties agreed the child would be privately educated and their enrollment of the child in a private nursery school when he was only nine months old reflects their agreement. There was no indication that defendant could not afford to pay his share of private school tuition, and his argument that the child was too young for the court to have addressed higher education issues does not warrant modification of Supreme Court's order. There was no reason to delay resolution of the issue of higher education, including college, because it appeared to be an inevitable expense for this child, given the parties' apparent commitment to an enriched education, the parties' means and their high level of educational achievements. It affirmed the award because it was not an improvident exercise of the court's discretion.

The Appellate Division held that absent an agreement to the contrary, or without engaging in a proper analysis under the paragraph "(f)" factors of the Domestic Relations Law, the court should not have ordered defendant to pay for summer and/or extracurricular activities (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f]; Michael J.D., 138 AD3d at 154). Unlike health care and child care expenses, these "add-on" expenses are not separately enumerated under the CSSA and it is usually anticipated that they will be paid from the basic child support award ordered by the court. Furthermore, without explaining why, Supreme Court allocated these add-ons in the same manner it allocated educational expenses (i.e. 20% to defendant as opposed to 10.5%). Because the court made its determination before the Court's decision in Michael J.D., where it clarified how these add-ons should be analyzed and separately justified under paragraph (f), it remitted to Supreme Court the issue of how summer and/or any other extracurricular activities not specifically agreed to by the parties will be allocated between them, if at all.

The Appellate Division modified to eliminate the award of the separate property credit to plaintiff in the amount of $350,000 and otherwise affirm Supreme Court's denial of any further separate property credit to plaintiff in the amount of $932,000 for payments toward the principal and/or renovation costs of their Fifth Avenue coop. It held that Plaintiff was not entitled to a separate property credit for the $350,000 downpayment or the additional sum of $932,000 the parties applied towards the purchase price of the Fifth Avenue coop. The conveyance of separate funds under these circumstances resulted in the separate assets becoming presumptively marital and partial use of separate funds to acquire a marital asset does not mandate that plaintiff be credited for any separate funds she committed (see Fields, 15 NY3d at 167).

The Appellate Division held that the court correctly determined that plaintiff's bonus, although paid after the action was commenced, was compensation for her past performance, not tied to future performance (see DeJesus v. DeJesus, 90 N.Y.2d 643, 652 [1997]). As a general rule, bonuses paid as compensation for past services are marital property and subject to equitable distribution (see Ropiecki v. Ropiecki, 94 AD3d 734, 736 [2d Dept 2012]). The court properly prorated the bonus to reflect that although it was paid for the 2011 calendar year, the parties separated in May 2011, meaning only 40% of the total amount could be considered marital.

The Appellate Division held that while it was a provident exercise of the court's discretion to permit plaintiff to make payments to defendant of his distributive share of the marital assets in installments, post-decision interest is mandatory on the distributive award pursuant to CPLR 5002, and should be awarded (see Moyal v. Moyal, 85 AD3d 614, 615 [1st Dept 2011]).

Judgment of Divorce Vacated Where No Provision for Equitable Distribution

In Serao, v. Bench–Serao, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1450010, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 03135 (1st Dept.,2017) the Appellate Division found that Defendant established prima facie that the judgment of divorce had to be vacated because it was devoid of any provision addressing the equitable distribution of the parties’ marital assets or debts (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5] [a]; Wong v. Wong, 300 A.D.2d 473 [2d Dept 2002]) and that the judgment was correctly vacated to the extent necessary to determine equitable distribution.

Husband Awarded 1% of the Wife’s Monthly Pension Benefits Where Parties Separated 37 Years Given That the Value of Wife’s Pension Was Due Almost Entirely to Her Sole Efforts.

In Campbell v Campbell, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1377813, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02956 (1st Dept., 2017) the parties, who were married on August 24, 1973, lived together as husband and wife for only 52 months, before husband vacated the marital residence in 1978. The parties’ son remained with wife. For the next 37 years, the parties lived separate and apart, with neither seeking a formal separation. In 2011, wife retired from her job at Lincoln Hospital, where she began working in 1973, the same year as the marriage. She collected $4,241.95 per month in pension benefits, and, apart from her social security benefits, she had no other source of income. In 2013, wife commenced an action for divorce. The Wife’s pension was the parties’ primary marital asset. The Appellate Division held that the trial court erred in awarding husband 50% of wife’s pension accumulated during the time they lived together between the date of the parties’ marriage on August 24, 1973, and the date of their separation on or about January 1, 1978. The wife’s pension benefits from the date of marriage to commencement of the divorce action constituted marital property, subject to equitable distribution. Equitable distribution does not mean equal (see Arvantides v. Arvantides, 64 N.Y.2d 1033, 1034 [1985]), and “an unequal distribution is appropriate when a party has not contributed to the marital asset in question” (Del Villar v. Del Villar, 73 AD3d 651, 652 [1st Dept 2010]). The court found that the wife testified credibly that after the husband moved out of the marital residence on or about January 1, 1978, she and their son received no further economic or non-economic support from him, to which she would have surely been entitled. Given that the value of wife’s pension was due almost entirely to her sole efforts, the Appellate Division awarded the husband as his distributive share 1% of the wife’s monthly pension benefits.

Counsel Fees Denied Where Counsel Failed to Submit Detailed Billing Records

In Massina v Massina, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1394158, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02978 (2d Dept.,2017) a post-judgment enforcement proceeding the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff an award of counsel fees, as there was no documentation submitted of the value of services performed by her attorney. The plaintiff sought an award of counsel fees of $5,000, and the court failed to explain how it determined that the “reasonable” fees incurred by the plaintiff amounted to $3,500, in light of the fact that the plaintiff’s counsel failed to submit detailed billing records showing the legal services performed, and the time expended on each service (see Marshall v. Marshall, 1 AD3d at 324; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 300 A.D.2d at 646).

First Department Holds That Invoices Standing Alone May Not Be Regarded as Evidence of Title or Ownership of Property.

In Anonymous v. Anonymous,--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1234201, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02613 (1st Dept., 2017) the parties prenuptial agreement did not specifically address how the parties should divide their art collection upon dissolution of the marriage. It provided that any property owned on the date of execution of the prenuptial agreement, April 21, 1992, or "hereafter...acquired" by one party remains that party's separate property. It provided that "[n]o contribution of either party to the care, maintenance, improvement, custody or repair of... [the other's party]...shall in any way alter or convert any of such property...to marital property. The prenuptial agreement further provided that "any property acquired after the date of the marriage that is jointly held in the names of both parties" shall, upon dissolution of the marriage — which occurred on March 25, 2014 — be divided equally between the parties. Under the heading, Non-Marital Property, the agreement provided: "No property hereafter acquired by the parties or by either of them...shall constitute marital property...unless (a) pursuant to a subscribed and acknowledged written agreement, the parties expressly designate said property as marital property...or (b) title to said property is jointly held in the names of both parties." During the marriage, the parties agreed to acquire certain art as a joint collection, including pieces acquired through Art Advisory Services, Luhring Augustine, and The Kitchen. The husband moved, inter alia, for a declaratory judgment that, "consistent with the Prenuptial Agreement, the title to the art purchased during the marriage determines whether it is marital or separate property, regardless of the source of funds used to acquire it or the alleged intent behind the purchase." He argued that title should be determined based solely on the invoice or bill of sale. The motion court relied on the invoices as proof of whether the art was jointly or individually held in granting his motion. The Appellate Division held to the contrary, that invoices, standing alone, may not be regarded as evidence of title or ownership of the art. An invoice is defined as "[a] list of goods sent or services provided, with a statement of the sum due for these" (Oxford Living Dictionaries [<https://en.oxforddictionaries.com/definition/invoice>]). "An invoice...is not a bill of sale, nor is it evidence of a sale. It is a mere detailed statement of the nature, quantity, or cost of the goods, or price of the things invoiced, and it is as appropriate to a bailment as a sale. Hence, standing alone, it is never regarded as "evidence of title" (Sturm v. Boker, 150 US 312, 328 [1893]). An invoice cannot be said to be dispositive of ownership. The purpose of the invoice is not to identify the titled owner. The unreliability of an invoice as sole proof of title was evidenced by various invoices in the record. The Appellate Division concluded that title to personalty cannot be determined by relying solely upon an invoice. In determining title to the artwork in question, all the facts and circumstances of the acquisition and indicia of ownership must also be considered. Accordingly, the order was reversed, on the law, the declaration vacated, and the matter remanded for further proceedings, including discovery and an evidentiary hearing to determine the ownership of the disputed art.

Separation Agreement Violated Rule That When Children's Rights Are Involved the Contract Yields to the Welfare of the Children

In Keller-Goldman v Goldman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1272107, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02723 (1st Dept., 2017) the parties settlement agreement provided that "During the period in which a Child is attending a college and residing away from the residences of the parties and [the father] is contributing towards the room and board expenses of that Child, [the father] shall be entitled to a credit against his child support obligations in an amount equal to the amount [the father] is paying for that Child's room and board." The father paid approximately $12,000 for the latter expense and sought a credit towards his total monthly child support obligation of $2,500 for the parties 3 children, in the amount of approximately $1,200. The Appellate Division held that as a matter of public policy, the agreement could not be enforced as written. Ooke parties cannot contract away the duty of child support. Despite the fact that a separation agreement is entitled to the solemnity and obligation of a contract,. The duty of a parent to support his or her child shall not be eliminated or diminished by the terms of a separation agreement when children's rights are involved the contract yields to the welfare of the children, nor can it be abrogated by contract” (Matter of Thomas B. v. Lydia D., 69 AD3d 24, 30 [1st Dept 2009]. It found that the agreement here violated this rule. The credit sought by the father took away that portion of child support intended for the welfare of the other two children. Taken to its logical end, the agreement threatened to completely deprive the other children of any support whatsoever, if monthly room and board costs for one child were to exceed $2,500. The Court also found that the reasonable expectation of the parties when they executed the agreement, based on its plain language, was that the father would support each child individually until that child was emancipated. This could be deduced from the fact that the agreement reduced the total support amount after the emancipation of the first, and then the second, child. Insofar as the credit provision was the one that immediately followed, it was reasonable for the mother to interpret that provision as making clear that attendance at college or a gap year program was effectively a “temporary emancipation,” where no support payment was necessary for the child because the child was not a financial burden on the mother. At the same time, the credit provision prevented the mother from realizing a windfall by collecting child support for a child who, temporarily, is not a household expense. Reading the agreement this way, the two provisions could be understood as being in harmony with each other, which is a goal when construing any contract (see Gessin Elec. Contrs. Inc. v. 95 Wall Assoc., LLC, 74 AD3d 516, 518 [1st Dept 2010]). The Court was unaware of any rule of construction limiting the ability to harmonize two or more separate contraction clauses to instances where they explicitly cross-reference each other. To interpret the credit provision as negating the child support promised for each child in the preceding provision would be an untenable construction, and an absurd result. (Two Justices dissented)

A Party for Whom a Guardian Ad Litem Has Been Appointed, May Only Appear in an Action by That Guardian Ad Litem

In Yerushalmi v Yerushalmi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1239382, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02691 (2d Dept., 2017) an action for a divorce, the defendant suffered a stroke in September 2015, prior to the completion of continued hearing on his motion to terminate his temporary maintenance obligation. When the defendant appeared pro se for the continuation of the hearing Supreme Court determined that he was no longer competent, and a guardian ad litem was appointed on the defendant's behalf. Three days later, the defendant retained attorney Anthony A. Capetola to represent him in the action. Supreme Court denied plaintiff's motion to disqualify Capetola from representing the defendant. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in denying the motion to disqualify Capetola from representing the defendant in this action. A party who has been deemed by the court to be incapable of defending his or her rights, and for whom a guardian ad litem has been appointed, may only appear in an action by that guardian ad litem (see CPLR 321(a), 1201; Caruso v. Caputo, 143 A.D.2d 795, 796). Since a guardian ad litem had already been appointed on behalf of the defendant, the defendant lacked authority to select and retain Capetola as his attorney.

A Financial Obligation Incurred by One Party During the Marriage in Pursuit of His or Her Separate Interests Should Remain That Party's Separate Liability

In Marin v Marin, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1157567, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02415 (2d Dept., 2017) the parties were married in July 1989, and had two children together, born in 1992 and 1996. After the birth of their first child in 1992, the plaintiff stopped working outside the home and was the primary caregiver of the children. The defendant, a doctor of osteopathy with his own medical practice, was the sole source of financial support for the family since that time. In June 2008, the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce. The Appellate Division, inter alia, rejected the plaintiff's contention that since some of the proceeds from certain loans were used to finance the defendant's medical practice, which was not treated as marital property, the Supreme Court should have allocated this debt to the defendant as his separate responsibility, rather than allocating it equally between the parties. It observed that Supreme Court is given broad discretion in allocating the assets and debts of the parties to a marriage, and may consider the entirety of the marital estate in apportioning responsibility for debts. While outstanding financial obligations incurred during the marriage which are not solely the liability of either spouse may be deemed marital obligations, a financial obligation incurred by one party in pursuit of his or her separate interests should remain that party's separate liability" (Corless v. Corless, 18 AD3d at 494). Here, the funds at issue were used to benefit the defendant's medical practice, which was the sole means of financial support for the entire family. Therefore, under the circumstances, it could not be said that this debt was incurred for the defendant's sole benefit. As such, contrary to the plaintiff's contentions, the court's decision to distribute this debt equally among the parties was not an improvident exercise of discretion.

Where a Child Lacks a Home State at the Time a Neglect Proceeding Is Commenced, an Alternate Basis for Subject Matter Jurisdiction under Uccjea Exists under Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][b]

In Matter of Milani X, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1253198, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02714 (3d Dept., 2017) the Respondent, a resident of New York gave birth to a daughter at a hospital in Pennsylvania in May 2016. Allegations emerged that respondent had used drugs during the pregnancy and that the child was experiencing withdrawal following her birth, prompting petitioner to commence a neglect proceeding while the child was still hospitalized. Respondents motion to dismiss the proceeding which was based upon, among other things, the ground that Family Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to adjudicate a child who had never lived in New York to be neglected, was denied.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that Family Court is granted "original jurisdiction over [neglect] proceedings" (Family Ct Act § 1013[a]; see N.Y. Const, art VI, § 13[b]), and its subject matter jurisdiction does not depend upon the situs of the neglect. However, it does depend upon satisfying the standards put in place by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act. Several bases exist for the exercise of subject matter jurisdiction in a new neglect proceeding, the first being that New York is “the home state of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding” (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a]). The home state of a child less than six months old, such as the child here, is “the state in which the child lived from birth with” a parent or person acting as a parent (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [7]). Here, the child was born in a Pennsylvania hospital and was still hospitalized when the proceeding was commenced. The fact that the child was hospitalized in another state had little relevance in determining where she lived, as “persons removing to hospitals or other institutions for treatment” do not “gain or lose a residence simply because they are away from home” (Matter of Seitelman v. Lavine, 36 N.Y.2d 165, 171 [1975]). Moreover, inasmuch as the hospital had only treated the child for a few weeks and was not “awarded legal custody [of her] by a court,” the hospital could not be considered a person acting as a parent within the meaning of Domestic Relations Law § 75-a (7) (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [13]). Having been born into the sort of “temporary absence” that plays no role in identifying her home state (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a [7]), and not having had the opportunity to live with respondent, her father or another person acting as a parent, the child had no home state under UCCJEA. The Court observed that where a child lacks a home state at the time a neglect proceeding is commenced, an alternate basis for subject matter jurisdiction under UCCJEA exists where “(i) the child and the child’s parents, or the child and at least one parent or a person acting as a parent, have a significant connection with this state other than mere physical presence; and (ii) substantial evidence is available in this state concerning the child’s care, protection, training, and personal relationships” (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][b]). Respondent and the child’s father had significant connections to New York. While the child was hospitalized in Pennsylvania after her birth, child protective officials in New York became involved with her, and evidence regarding her parents’ ability to care for her and her relationship with other relatives was in New York. New York therefore had the types of contacts with the child and her family that permitted the exercise of jurisdiction in this proceeding and, as a result, Family Court properly denied respondent’s motion to dismiss.

2017 Child Support Standards Chart Released

The 2017 combined parental income amount (“statutory cap”) is $143,000. The 2017 self-support reserve is $16,281 and the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person is $12,060.

See https://www.childsupport.ny.gov/child_support_standards.html

The child support standards chart, released March 17, 2017 is available at <https://www.childsupport.ny.gov/dcse/pdfs/CSSA.pdf>

Since January 31, 2016 the income cap of the maintenance payor for temporary and final (post-divorce) maintenance increased from $175,000 to $178,000 per year. By Administrative Order A/O 12/16, Revised Instructions and Forms for Use in Matrimonial Actions in Supreme Court were adopted effective January 31, 2016. The revised forms reflect the increase in the annual income cap of the maintenance payor for temporary and final (post-divorce) maintenance from $175,000 to $178,000 per year based on CPI increases as required by the 2015 Maintenance Guidelines Law (L. 2015, ch. 269), and clarify instructions regarding use of the UD-Packet forms. Family Ct Act § 437–a Not Dispositive Where Father Employed During Pendency Social Security Disability Benefits Application

In Matter of Anthony S v Monique TB, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1137109, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02365 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in not imputing to the father as income the $500 per month he was earning from his part-time employment in 2012 solely on the basis of Family Ct Act § 437-a, which bars the Family Court from requiring a recipient of social security disability benefits to engage in certain employment related activities. That statute was not dispositive in this case where the father had been employed during the pendency of his social security disability benefits application and did not show that he was unable to continue to be employed in any capacity after he began receiving benefits. The matter was remanded for a new determination as to the amount of child support, including a new determination as to whether the $500 per month should be imputed to the father.

Hearing Not Always Required on Contempt Application

In Matter of Chichra v Chichra, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 986570, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01851 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that a hearing is not mandated in every instance where a finding of contempt is sought. It need only be conducted if a factual dispute exists which cannot be resolved on the papers alone.

Overpayments of Child Support May Not Be Recouped Against Child Support Obligation, but May Be Used to Offset Share of Add-on Expenses

In Matter of McGovern v McGovern, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 986497, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01862 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division observed, in affirming an order which denied the father recoupment of overpayments of child support, that there is strong public policy in this state, which the Child Support Standards Act did not alter, against restitution or recoupment of the overpayment of child support. The reason for this policy is that child support payments are 'deemed to have been devoted to that purpose, and no funds exist from which one may recoup moneys so expended' if the award is thereafter reversed or modified. Thus, recoupment of child support payments is only appropriate under "limited circumstances" which were not present here. However, while child support overpayments may not be recovered by reducing future support payments, public policy does not forbid offsetting add-on expenses against an overpayment.. Thus, although the overpayments may not be applied to the father's child support obligation, he may use the overpayments to offset his share of the add-on expenses, such as the educational expenses.

Paternal Stepgrandfather Has No Standing to Seek Visitation Within the Meaning of Domestic Relations Law § 72

In Matter of B.S. v. B.T. , --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1068091, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02044 (2d Dept., 2017) the paternal grandmother and paternal stepgrandfather of the child commenced a proceeding for visitation with the child. After a hearing, the Supreme Court granted the petition and set forth a visitation schedule. The Appellate Division held, inter alia, that since the paternal stepgrandfather was not the biological grandfather of the child or the legal grandfather by virtue of adoption, he was not the child's grandparent within the meaning of Domestic Relations Law § 72 and, therefore, he had no standing to seek visitation, and, the petition for visitation should have been dismissed insofar as asserted by him.

Where Petition Dismissed Sua Sponte Court Is Required to Accept Allegations as True

In Matter of Burdick v Boehm, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1082848, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02107 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division observed that on a motion to dismiss pursuant to CPLR 3211(a), the facts as alleged in the petition are accepted as true (see Matter of Leon v. Martinez, 84 N.Y.2d 83, 87–88 [1994]). It held that here, where the petition was dismissed without a motion, sua sponte, the Family Court was bound to credit the father’s allegations in his petition.

Appellate Division Construes Dum Custa Provision in Agreement (cohabitation with an unrelated adult male pursuant to New York State Domestic Relations Law § 248) Not to Require Holding Self out as Another Man’s Wife

In Perez v Perez-Brache, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 1116108, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 02258 (4th Dept., 2017) the parties’ support and property settlement agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, provided that defendant’s “maintenance obligation shall be sooner terminated upon [defendant]’s death, or [plaintiff]’s death. ADDITIONALLY, after the fourth (4th) year of such payments, [defendant]’s maintenance obligation shall also terminate upon either [plaintiff]’s remarriage, or [plaintiff]’s cohabitation with an unrelated adult male pursuant to New York State Domestic Relations Law [§] 248.” The Appellate Division held that the court erred in determining that, pursuant to the terms of the agreement, defendant was required to establish that plaintiff held herself out as another man’s wife. “It is well settled that the parties to a matrimonial agreement may condition a husband’s obligation to support his wife solely on her refraining from living with another man without the necessity of the husband also proving that she habitually holds herself out as the other man’s wife as Domestic Relations § 248 requires’. Here, “the fact that the agreement refers only to the cohabitation prong of Domestic Relations Law § 248 compelled it to conclude that the parties did not intend to include the second prong of plaintiff holding herself out as another man’s wife” (id. at 1298). The reference to Domestic Relations Law § 248 in the parties’ agreement was “solely for the purpose of defining cohabitation, i.e., “habitually living with another person” (§ 248).

Oral Stipulation Which Did Not Include Statement Precise Amount of Presumptive Child Support under Cssa Held Valid Where it Stated That Parties Entered into Agreement “After Having Been Advised of the Calculations Pursuant to the [Cssa]”

In Bitic v Bitic, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 776986, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01529 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly found that the child support provisions of the parties' stipulation were valid and enforceable. It was undisputed that the oral stipulation otherwise complied with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(h), except that it did not include an on-the-record statement of the precise amount of the presumptive child support under the CSSA. Instead, it recited that the parties were entering into the agreement "after having been advised of the calculations pursuant to the [CSSA]," and each party had received a copy of the CSSA and was "fully aware" of the amount the court would award if applying the CSSA based upon the parties' respective incomes. The agreement to deviate from the CSSA was made in exchange for concessions in the distribution of certain marital assets. The plaintiff stated on the record that she understood the terms of the stipulation, which were clear to her, and she had discussed them with her attorney. In addition, the parties' respective federal income tax returns and statements of net worth were incorporated into the record for the purpose of demonstrating "calculations of income for purposes of CSSA." It held that while the better practice would have been to state for the record the number reflected by those calculations, the statutory requirement was satisfied here, and the record demonstrated that the plaintiff's agreement to the child support provisions of the stipulation was made knowingly.

Custody Awarded to Grandmother Based upon Extraordinary Circumstances Where Prolonged Separation of Six Years

In Matter of Williams v Frank, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 902408, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01702 (2d Dept., 2017) the child, who was born in 2003, was in the exclusive care of the maternal grandmother since he was approximately 10 months old. In March 2004, the maternal grandmother was granted custody upon the default of the mother and the father. The mother had been arrested for shoplifting in 2004, and was deported in 2005 based on her illegal status. The mother returned to the United States legally in March 2011, and filed a petition to modify the order dated December 9, 2004, so as to her award her sole custody of the child. Family Court, inter alia, awarded sole legal and residential custody to the maternal grandmother. The Appellate Division affirmed. It found that Family Court properly determined that the maternal grandmother sustained her burden of demonstrating extraordinary circumstances based upon the mother's prolonged separation from the subject child, and the maternal grandmother having provided for the child's financial, educational, emotional, and medical needs, with no contribution from the mother.

Improper to Rely Entirely on Therapists Recommendation in Making Visitation Determination

In Matter of Jennifer JH v Artrio, JR, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 902463, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01694 (2d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division reversed an order which denied the mothers petition for visitation without a hearing, relying on the recommendation of the child's therapist, who indicated that there should be no visitation between the mother and the child at that time. It held that a hearing was necessary to determine whether the totality of the circumstances warranted a modification of the visitation order and whether such a change was in the best interests of the child (citing Matter of Athena H.M. v. Samuel M., 143 AD3d 561; see also S.L. v. J.R., 27 NY3d 558, 564). Moreover, it was improper for the Family Court to rely exclusively on the therapist's recommendation in making the visitation determination.

Slip Op. 01747 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held that a valid charging lien is an "equitable ownership interest in [a] client's cause of action" (*Cranbourne & Parke, LLP v. Family Court Holds Medical Records Exception to Hearsay Rules Includes Statements by the Patient about Who Caused the Injuries and Statements Made by a Third Party to a Patient's Treatment Providers

In Matter of Raheem D., Slip Copy, 2017 WL 952700 (Table), 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 50298(U) (Fam Ct., 2017) a juvenile delinquency proceeding, Family Court observed that under the medical records exception to the hearsay rule statements made by a patient that are germane to medical treatment are considered to be exceptions to the hearsay rule and therefore admissible for their truth. See People v. Ortega, 15 NY3d 610 (2010); Williams v. Alexander, 309 N.Y. 283 (1955). Traditionally, this exception did not include statements by the patient about who caused the injuries, as that was not viewed as relevant to the treatment of the physical injury. It noted that in recent years, New York State courts have broadened this exception considerably to include not only statements about the injuries themselves, but also statements identifying the perpetrator and the context of how the injury occurred. See, e.g., Ortega, 15 NY3d at 617; People v. Duhs, 16 NY3d 405 (2011) (holding the same and also that admission of such statements in a criminal case did not violate the 6th Amendment right to cross-examination). It held that, a patient's statements about who caused the injury and under what circumstances may be admissible in these types of cases.

Family Court also held that the medical records exception to the hearsay rule was broad enough to cover statements made by a third party to a patient's treatment providers. It observed that in Matter of A.M., 44 Misc.3d 514 (Bronx Co. Family Court 2014) the Court reviewed and agreed with the holdings in Matter of Dolan, 35 Misc.3d 781 (Nassau Co. Sup.Ct. 2012), and Feinstein v. Goebel, 144 Misc.2d 462 (Sup.Ct. Queens Co.1989), admitting into evidence statements in medical records made by someone other than the patient. In Dolan, a civil proceeding about whether ongoing treatment was necessary for a patient, the trial court admitted statements reflected in medical records made by (1) the patient's son, (2) an outpatient program representative, and (3) the patient's caseworker outside of the hospital. In analyzing the issue, the court cited Justice Smith's concurrence in Ortega: "when a patient has a mental health problem, it may often be true that almost any statement about his or her history will be within the hearsay exception." Dolan, 35 Misc.3d at 783. It then held that these third party statements were "relevant to [the patient's] treatment, and could be used to develop a discharge plan that would ensure his safety." Id. at 784. In Feinstein, the court ruled in a civil action that statements made by a patient's son were admissible under the exception, holding that the son was under a duty to relate truthful information in order to insure the appropriate treatment for his parent. That court found that "[t]he trustworthiness of the son's statements to the house doctor are [sic] unquestionable," following the logic of Williams v. Alexander's holding that statements which are "helpful to an understanding of the medical or surgical aspects of [the hospitalization]" should be admitted. 144 Misc.2d at 465-66; see also 20-22 Prince LLC v. Tsue Kwai Yen, 32 Misc.3d 1224(A) (Sup.Ct. N.Y. Co.2011) (third party declarations admissible as germane to medical treatment). Family Court found that the statements made by the complainant's mother to the treatment providers, contained within the child's medical records, were relevant and germane to the child's treatment and admissible under the medical records exception to the hearsay rule.

Family Court Is Permitted to Issue a New Order of Protection If the Respondents Conduct Is in Violation of a Valid Order of Protection.

In Matter of Lisa T v King ET, 2017 WL 758243 (1st Dept., 2017) the Family Court found, on the record after a hearing, that respondent had willfully violated the temporary order of protection with his April 3, 2014 emails containing statements clearly intended to harass petitioner. As a result of this determination, the Family Court conducted a dispositional hearing on respondent's violation of the temporary order of protection, and thereafter issued a new order of protection. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court adhered to the prescribed procedure and did not exceed its jurisdiction by issuing this final order of protection. It observed that Family Court Act § 846-a, "Powers on failure to obey order," is "punitive [in] nature"; it prescribes the procedure and penalties for failing to obey a temporary order of protection. The court is permitted to issue a new order of protection if the respondent is "brought before the court for failure to obey [a] ... temporary order of protection issued pursuant to this act ... and if, after hearing, the court is satisfied by competent proof that the respondent has willfully failed to obey ... such order." Under Family Court Act § 846-a the new order of protection must be in accordance with Family Court Act § 842, which permits a court to issue such an order upon a finding "on the record that the conduct alleged in the petition is in violation of a valid order of protection." The majority rejected the contention of the dissent that Family Court Act § 846-a must be read to provide that a "final" order of protection can only be issued upon the Family Court's determination that: (1) the respondent willfully violated a final order of protection that itself was issued upon a finding that a family offense was committed; or (2) the respondent's violation of a temporary order of protection constituted a family offense; or (3) the respondent's violation of a final order of protection constituted a family offense. There is no support in the statute or in the case law for this proposition. The dissent's argument would require this Court to read language into the statute that is, simply, not there. Family Court Act § 846-a does not require a finding of the commission of a family offense.

Where Sufficient Economic Data Available, Temporary Child Support That Deviates from the Guidelines Amount May Constitute an Improvident Exercise of Discretion, Absent an Adequate Reason for the Deviation

In Kashman v Kashman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 690969, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01343 (2d Dept.,2017) the Appellate Division observed that in determining an award of pendente lite child support, courts may, in their discretion, apply the Child Support Standards Act (hereinafter CSSA) standards and guidelines, but they are not required to do so. However, under some circumstances, particularly where sufficient economic data is available, an award of temporary child support that deviates from the level that would result if the provisions of the CSSA were applied may constitute an improvident exercise of discretion, absent the existence of an adequate reason for the deviation. (Davydova v. Sasonov, 109 AD3d at 957). As the court failed to provide any explanation as to how it determined the amount of the award of pendente lite child support the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for a calculation of the defendant's pendente lite child support obligation and a new determination of that branch of the plaintiff's motion which was for pendente lite child support. Should the court determine not to apply the CSSA in calculating the new award, the determination shall include an explanation as to why the court declined to do so and the basis for the new award.

Third Department Holds That Where Neither Party Submitted Proof of Value of Home it Was Not Error to Credit Husband's Testimony as to its Value. Given Husband's Testimony That He Had "No Idea" What Vehicle Was Worth, Not an Abuse of Discretion to Determine it Had No Value.

In Barnhart v Barnhart, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 803885, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 01611 (3d Dept., 2017) Plaintiff (husband) and defendant (the wife) were married in 2002. In 2014, the husband brought this action for divorce. A trial was held in May 2015. Neither party complied with 22 NYCRR 202.16(h), which required them to submit statements of proposed distribution. Neither party made opening or closing statements at trial and neither party submitted expert evidence or evidence in the form of financial documentation or title documentation related to any asset at issue. The parties were the only witnesses at the trial. Supreme Court granted the wife $250 a week in maintenance for an approximately 11-year period and determined equitable distribution. The court ordered the husband to "take all necessary steps to place" a specified amount of his retirement account in the wife's name, which, according to the court's valuations, led to an overall equal division of the marital property.

The Appellate Division found that when examined at trial about the value of the marital home, the husband testified that the home was worth "$50,000[,] we decided on that." Neither party submitted any other proof that would allow for a more precise valuation of the home or any proof that would indicate, contrary to the husband's testimony, that the $50,000 valuation of the home was even contested. Accordingly, it could not say that the court abused its discretion by, in the absence of any opposing proof, crediting the husband's testimony as to the value of the home.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in attributing no value to a 2012 Chevy Suburban vehicle that the court awarded to the wife, subject to any debt against it. The proof established that the vehicle was marital property, and the husband put forward no documentary evidence establishing that the vehicle was titled to him. Moreover, he conceded both that the vehicle was within the wife's possession and that she was paying the lien on it. Thus, the husband "had the burden of proving the asset's value so as to afford the court a sufficient basis upon which to make a distributive award" (Alper v. Alper, 77 AD3d 694, 696 [2010]; see Iwahara v. Iwahara, 226 A.D.2d 346, 347 [1996]). Particularly given the husband's testimony that he had "no idea" what the vehicle was worth, Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that it had no value for the purpose of equitable distribution.

The Appellate Division held that the court also erred when it determined that the husband had two retirement accounts that were marital property and that were, at the time of the commencement of the proceeding, collectively valued at $160,000. The only proof regarding these accounts was the husband's admissions that he, at one point, had two retirement accounts, each worth $80,000, and his further acknowledgment that the wife was entitled to half his retirement savings. The husband specified, however, that the parties, "when [they] were together during the marriage," removed assets from the second of the accounts so that only $8,000 remained. As there was no contradictory proof in the record that would support the factual conclusion that the aforementioned account was valued at more than $8,000 at the time of the commencement of the action or at any point thereafter, the proof only supported the conclusion that the husband's two accounts collectively represented $88,000 worth of marital assets subject to equitable distribution. It modified the judgment accordingly.

Supreme Court Awards Custody of Child Born of Husbands Sexual Relationship with Couples Friend to Husband, Wife and Friend.

In Dawn M v Michael M, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 923725, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 27073 (Sup. Ct., 2017) the plaintiff, Dawn M., who was "the non-biological, non-adoptive parent, " was awarded "tri-custody" of defendant Michael M.'s ten-year-old biological son J.M. whose mother was Audria. Dawn M. and Michael M. were married on July 9, 1994. Audria moved in with plaintiff and defendant, and the three began to engage in sexual relations. Audria, plaintiff and defendant began to consider themselves a "family" and decided to have a child together. They decided they would try to conceive a child naturally by defendant and Audria engaging in sexual relations with him. It was agreed, before a child was conceived, that plaintiff, Audria and defendant would all raise the child together as parents. Audria became pregnant and J.M. was born on January 25, 2007. For more than eighteen months after J.M.'s birth, defendant, plaintiff and Audria continued to live together. Audria and plaintiff shared duties as J.M.'s mother including taking turns getting up during the night to feed J.M. and taking him to doctor visits, In October of 2008, Audria and plaintiff moved out of the marital residence with J.M. The divorce action was commenced by plaintiff against defendant in 2011. Prior to this divorce, a custody case was commenced by defendant against Audria. Defendant and Audria settled their custody proceeding by agreeing to joint custody; residential custody with Audria and liberal visitation accorded to defendant. The plaintiff still resided with Audria and J.M., and saw J.M. on a daily basis. She testified that she brought the action to assure continued visitation and to secure custody rights for J.M. because she feared that without court-ordered visitation and shared custody, her ability to remain in J.M.'s life would be solely dependent upon obtaining the consent of either Audria or the defendant.

Supreme Court observed that pursuant to DRL § 70, a parent may apply to the court for custody based solely upon what is for the best interest of the child, and what will promote his welfare and happiness. The Court of Appeals in Brooke S.B. stressed that its decision only addressed the ability of a person who was not a biological or adoptive parent to establish standing as a parent to petition for custody and visitation, and that the ultimate determination of whether to grant those rights rests in the sound discretion of trial courts in determining the best interests of the child (28 N.Y.3d at 28, 39 N.Y.S.3d 89, 61 N.E.3d 488). The evidence established that the plaintiff acted as a defacto joint custodial parent with defendant and Audria and shared in making all major decisions in J.M.'s life. The Court found that based on the evidence adduced the best interests of J.M. would be served by granting plaintiff's application for shared legal custody with defendant. Such joint legal custody would actually be a tri-custodial arrangement as Audria and defendant already shared joint legal custody. As it appeared from Audria's testimony that she whole-heartedly supported such an arrangement, this Court found no issue with regards to Audria's rights in granting this relief.

In a footnote the Court pointed out that Defendant contended that Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651 [1991]), required the court to deny plaintiff's requested relief for custody and visitation based on her lack of standing, and that prior to the Court of Appeals' decision in Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A.C.C. (28 N.Y.3d 1 [2016]), the court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment based upon the Marriage Equality Act and the Court's analysis of Vermont Law in Debra H. v. Janice R. (14 N.Y.3d 576 [2010]), and found plaintiff had standing as a parent. It also stated that under Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A.C.C. (28 N.Y.3d 1, 39 N.Y.S.3d 89, 61 N.E.3d 488), relying heavily on the dissent written by Chief Judge Judith Kaye in Allison D. (77 N.Y.2d 651, 657[1991]), the law states "where a partner shows by clear & convincing evidence that the parties agreed to conceive a child and to raise the child together, the non-biological, non-adoptive parent has standing to seek visitation and custody under DRL 70." This case represents the logical next step.

Assinging Day Care Responsibilities to Relative Not a Ground to Deprive Parent of Custody

In Matter of Hendrickson v Hendrickson, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 539237 (4th Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division held, inter alia, that "a more fit parent will not be deprived of custody simply because the parent assigns day-care responsibilities to a relative owing to work obligations" (Matter of Chyreck v. Swift, 144 AD3d 1517, 1518).

Appellate Division Holds It is Error to Refuse to Allow Parties to enter Settlement Agreement During Trial.

In Keegan v Keegan, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 460544, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 00869 2017 WL 460544 (4th Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division found that the judgment of divorce failed to conform with the mandatory provisions of the Domestic Relations Law and was deficient as it pertained to the issues of custody, visitation, child support, and equitable distribution. It modified the judgment by vacating every decretal paragraph therein, except for the decretal paragraph granting the divorce, the decretal paragraph allowing the parties to resume the use of their premarriage surnames and the decretal paragraph regarding service and granted a new trial on the issues before a different justice.

The Appellate Division found that the court erred in refusing to allow the parties to enter into a settlement agreement. In the midst of trial, the parties' attorneys indicated that an agreement had been reached granting custody to defendant and regular visitation to plaintiff. The court stated that it was "very unhappy" with the length of the trial and immediately terminated all discussions concerning the parties' agreement. The trial continued and, after the close of proof that same day, the court granted custody to plaintiff without regular visitation to defendant. Under the unusual circumstances of this case, i.e., where the parties evinced their agreement in open court to the material terms of a settlement agreement, there were no indicia of fraud or manifest injustice, and the court prevented the parties from ratifying their agreement but instead made a ruling directly contrary to the terms of that agreement, the court erred in granting primary physical custody to plaintiff. That error was compounded when the court entered a visitation schedule that erroneously denied meaningful visitation to defendant.

The Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court also erred in failing to award child support retroactive to [August 23, 2013], the date of the application therefor.” Moreover, the final judgment contained no provision at all for child support and the judgment was deficient because the court did not “determine the respective rights of the parties in their separate or marital property, and ...provide for the disposition thereof in the final judgment”

Family Court Act § 1046(a)(vi) is explicitly limited to child protective proceedings under articles 10 and 10-A, and has no application to family offense proceedings

In Matter of Dhanmatie G v Zarmin B, 2017 WL 82279 (1st Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which dismissed without prejudice petitioner’s family offense petition finding that Petitioner’s allegations that respondent paternal uncle inappropriately touched one or more of the children were supported only by the inadmissible hearsay statements of the children (Family Court Act § 834). Family Court Act § 1046(a)(vi), which allows such testimony, is explicitly limited to child protective proceedings under articles 10 and 10-A, and has no application to family offense proceedings under article 8. The application of that provision in child custody proceedings under article 6 has been confined to situations in which the custody proceeding is founded upon abuse or neglect, rendering the issues “inextricably interwoven” (Matter of Khan-Soleil v. Rashad, 108 AD3d 544, 546 [2d Dept 2013]). Moreover, the mere repetition of the statements does not constitute corroboration (id. at 878; see also Matter of Nicole V., 71 N.Y.2d 112, 124 [1987]).

No Change of Custody Where Child’s Bond to the Alienating Parent, and Her Alienation from the Father, Was So Strong But Child Support Suspended

In Matter of Sullivan v Plotnick, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7445000, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08873 (2d Dept., 2016) Family Court, inter alia, found that the mother had alienated the children, and vacated the fathers support obligation to the extent of directing him to pay 50% of his child support obligation to the mother, and to pay the remaining 50% of his child support obligation to the mother's attorney to hold in an escrow account, pending the mother's active participation in restoring the parental access rights of the father. Subsequently, after a violation hearing, the Family Court confirmed the report of the Judicial Hearing Officer finding that the mother wilfully violated the order by failing to affirmatively act to restore the parental access rights of the father and interfering with the children's relationship with the father, and made an order terminating the father's support obligation, directing that funds received by the mother's attorney as partial payment of the father's support obligation be refunded to the father, denying the father's petition to modify the custody orders, and vacated the prior orders directing parental access for the father.

The Appellate Division found that while one parent's alienation of a child from the other parent is an act inconsistent with the best interests of the child here, the child's bond to the alienating parent, and her alienation from the father, was so strong, with, among other factors, both parents contributing to the deterioration of that relationship, that a change of custody would be harmful to her. There was, thus, no basis to disturb the Family Court's determination, made after a hearing and an in camera interview with the child, that a change of custody would not be in the child's best interests (see Matter of Lew v. Sobel, 46 AD3d 893, 895).

The Court also held that the evidence adduced at the hearings justified a suspension of the father's obligation to make future child support payments. There was evidence that the mother deliberately frustrated the court-ordered therapeutic visitation in many ways, including unnecessarily canceling a number of sessions, discussing the court proceedings and the therapeutic visits with the children and telling the son that it was up to him as to whether he participated in the therapeutic visits, and referring negatively to the father in the presence of the children. These deliberate efforts by the mother influenced the children to view visitation with the father negatively and contributed to the failure of therapeutic visitation. The mother further failed to make an effort to have a therapist address the children's negative feelings toward their father and made no effort to assist the children in restoring their relationship with the father. Thus, the evidence supported the finding that the mother, by her example, her actions, and her inaction, manipulated the children's loyalty, encouraged the estrangement of the father and children, and deliberately frustrated visitation. Under these circumstances, it was appropriate to suspend the father's current child support obligations.

When Determining an Appropriate Amount of Child Support, a Court Should Consider a Child's Actual Needs and the Amount Required for Him or Her to Live an Appropriate Lifestyle.

In Matter of Peddycoart v McKay, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7479458, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08974 (2d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division reduced the amount of child support awarded by the Family Court. It held that Family Court must articulate an explanation of the basis for its calculation of child support based on parental income in excess of the statutory cap. This articulation should reflect a careful consideration of the stated basis for its exercise of discretion, the parties' circumstances, and its reasoning why there should or should not be a departure from the prescribed percentage. In addition a court "must relate that record articulation" to the factors set forth in Family Court Act § 413(1)(f). The Support Magistrate's reasons for applying the statutory percentage to the combined parental income in excess of $141,000 must be sufficiently related to the statutory factors. Furthermore, when determining an appropriate amount of child support, a court should consider a child's actual needs and the amount required for him or her to live an appropriate lifestyle. Here, the Support Magistrate's conclusory determination that the child was in need of the full measure of child support—i.e., application of the statutory percentage to the combined parental income in excess of the statutory cap—was belied by the record.

Once the Child Turns 21, the Court Is Divested of Subject Matter Jurisdiction And Cannot Exercise Such Jurisdiction to Grant Special Immigrant Juvenile Status

In the Matter of Lourdes B.V.I., v Jose R.D.L.C.Q.144 A.D.3d 909, 42 N.Y.S.3d 41, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07648 (2d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division dismissed, as academic, the appeal from the an order denying the application for an order declaring that the child iwas dependent on the Family Court and making specific findings so as to enable him to petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status pursuant to 8 USC § 1101 (a) (27) (J). During the pendency of the appeal the child turned 21. The Appellate Division held that where, as here, a child who consented to the appointment of a guardian after his or her 18th birthday turns 21, the term of appointment of the guardian “expires on [the child’s] twenty-first birthday, or after such other shorter period as the court establishes upon good cause shown” (SCPA 1707 [2]). Consequently, once the child turns 21, the court “is divested of subject matter jurisdiction, [and] cannot exercise such jurisdiction by virtue of an order nunc pro tunc” (Matter of Maria C.R. v Rafael G., 142 AD3d 165, 170 [2016]; see Davis v State of New York, 22 AD2d 733 [1964]). Thus, the guardianship petition could not be granted at this juncture.

Party Bound by Representations in Statement of Proposed Disposition

In Sprole v Sprole, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7469547, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08911 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division held that inasmuch as the wife represented to Supreme Court in her statement of proposed disposition that the parties credit card debt was a marital liability, she could not now be heard to complain that the court erred in treating it as such (Robinson v. Robinson, 133 AD3d at 1190).

Third Department Holds Court May, in its Discretion, Impose Sanctions upon a Party That Fails to Comply with a Scheduling Order Specifying That the Parties Provide a Witness List

In Matter of Jesse E. v Lucia F., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7469542, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08912 (3d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division, in affirming a custody award to the father, held that Family Court did not abuse its discretion in precluding certain witnesses from testifying as to the mother's supervision of the child, the mother's progress in treatment and recovery and the mother's fiancé's compliance with probation and the work that he had done on his relationship with the mother. Family Court may, in its discretion, impose sanctions upon a party that fails to comply with a disclosure order (see CPLR 3126; Matter of Landrigen v. Landrigen, 173 A.D.2d 1011, 1012 [1991]). "The general rule is that a court should only impose a sanction commensurate with the particular disobedience it is designed to punish, and to go no further" (Matter of Landrigen v. Landrigen, 173 A.D.2d at 1012; see Matter of Arcidino v. McCarthy, 16 AD3d 1132, 1132 [2005]). The mother failed to comply with a scheduling order specifying that the parties were required to provide a witness list one week before the trial date. The court allowed the mother to testify to the aforementioned topics, but foreclosed testimony from the witnesses who were not disclosed to the other parties. The court did not abuse its discretion in imposing this commensurate remedy. The child's right to have issues fully explored would have been impeded if the mother presented witnesses without providing the father and the attorney for the child the court-ordered notice that would have permitted them to prepare for examination of such witnesses, and the mother was allowed to—and did—testify to the underlying issues. Curiously, the court state that in any event, given that Family Court explicitly credited the mother's testimony on the important topic of her recovery and ongoing sobriety, any error would be harmless.

Third Department Holds That Failure to Effectuate Proper Service of a Motion Deprives the Court of Jurisdiction to Entertain the Motion

In Matter of Gariel v Morse, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7469484 (Mem), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08921 (3d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division held that the father's letter to the court had to be treated as a motion for voluntary discontinuance pursuant to CPLR 3217(b) (see Family Ct Act § 165[a]) and, as such, it had to comply with the applicable service requirements. Inasmuch as the father's failure to effectuate proper service "deprive[d] the court of jurisdiction to entertain the motion"(Lee v. I-Sheng Li, 129 AD3d 923, 923 [2015]; see Matter of Lydia DD., 94 AD3d at 1386; Bianco v. LiGreci, 298 A.D.2d 482, 482 [2002]; Adames v. New York City Tr. Auth., 126 A.D.2d 462, 462 [1987]; Burstin v. Public Serv. Mut. Ins. Co., 98 A.D.2d 928, 929 [1983]), it found that Family Court erred in dismissing the petition.

Violation of a Visitation Order May Not Be Willful If it Is Due to the Child's Resistance to Visitation

In Matter of James XX v Tracey YY, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2017 WL 52838, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 00052 (3d Dept., 2017) the Appellate Division, inter alia, affirmed an order which dismissed the father's violation petition which alleged that the mother had failed to honor the visitation schedule. It observed that the father, as a proponent of a violation petition, was obligated to show the existence of a lawful court order in effect with a clear and unequivocal mandate, that the mother had actual knowledge of the conditions of the order, and that the mother's "actions or failure to act defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced" the father's rights, and that the alleged violation was willful (Matter of Prefario v. Gladhill, 140 AD3d 1235, 1236 [2016]). The father testified concerning an incident that occurred when he was unable to exercise his visitation rights. The record showed that the father arrived at the mother's residence to pick up the children, but the children refused to go with him. The mother claimed that the children told her that they did not want to see the father. A witness for the father testified to another instance of missed visitation. When the children did not arrive at the agreed meeting place, the witness called the mother, who told her that the children would not be coming. The Appellate Division held that a violation of a visitation schedule embodied in a court order may not be willful if it is due to the child's resistance to visitation (Matter of Prefario v. Gladhill, 140 AD3d at 1237). Family Court found that the relationship between the father and the children was often "toxic and volatile" and that, at times, there was a total breakdown of the relationship between the father and the children. The mother's testimony, and the record of the children's text messages to and from the father, provided ample evidence that the children often vehemently resisted visiting the father. Family Court found that the children simply would not attend visitation with the father unless it was convenient for them. Accordingly, Family Court correctly found that, although there were violations of the modified order, they were not willful on the part of the mother, but, rather, due to the children's resistance to visitation.

Appellate Division Affirms Equitable Distribution Award Reduced Because of Husband's Egregious Misconduct

In Pierre v Pierre, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7394496 (Mem), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08596 (1st Dept, 2016) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which reduced the defendant's equitable distribution award based upon his misconduct. It observed that defendant stabbed plaintiff wife two times with a steak knife, slammed her head against the toilet and put it into the bowl, causing her to enter a coma, require months of hospitalization and five surgeries, and rendering her disabled. He pleaded guilty to attempted assault in the first degree. The Appellate Division held that marital fault can only be considered under Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(d)(14), where the misconduct is "so egregious or uncivilized as to bespeak of a blatant disregard of the marital relationship—misconduct that 'shocks the conscience' of the court, thereby compelling it to invoke its equitable power to do justice between the parties" (Howard S. v. Lillian S., 62 AD3d 187, 190–191 [1st Dept 2009], affd 14 NY3d 431 [2010]). To be deemed egregious, the conduct must callously imperil the value society places on human life and " 'the integrity of the human body' " (Havell v. Islam, 301 A.D.2d 339, 345 [1st Dept 2002]). It held that this conduct was so egregious as to warrant a reduction in the equitable distribution award to defendant husband.

First Department Holds Party seeking to declare child of "ceremonial marriage" illegitimate required to rebut the presumption of legitimacy by clear and convincing evidence.

In Commissioner of Social Services ex rel N.Q. v B.C., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7393608, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08613 (1st Dept, 2016) the Appellate Division held that Family Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that respondent father and the child's mother entered into a "ceremonial marriage", thereby giving rise to the presumption that the child was a legitimate child of the marriage who was entitled to support under Family Court Act § 417. It observed that there is an established legal presumption that every person is born legitimate," a presumption which "operates ... in any case in which legitimacy is in issue" (Matter of Fay, 44 N.Y.2d 137, 141–142 [1978]). It is " 'one of the strongest and most persuasive [presumptions] known to the law' " (id. at 142, quoting Matter of Findlay, 253 N.Y. 1, 7 [1930]). In Findlay, the Court of Appeals made clear that the presumption may be rebutted, but only if "common sense and reason are outraged by a holding that it abides". The presumption of legitimacy has since been codified in the Family Court Act, which provides, "A child born of parents who at any time prior or subsequent to the birth of said child shall have entered into a ceremonial marriage shall be deemed the legitimate child of both parents for all purposes of [support proceedings] regardless of the validity of such marriage" (Family Court Act § 417). A ceremonial marriage need not take any particular form, provided that the parties solemnly declare in the presence of a clergyman or magistrate, and at least one witness, that they intend to be married (Domestic Relations Law § 12). Findlay notwithstanding, the statute's use of the word "deemed" appears to make a child's legitimacy un rebuttable when the parents have entered into a ceremonial marriage. However, New York courts have continued to treat the presumption as a rebuttable one. To rebut the presumption, the challenger must disprove legitimacy by clear and convincing evidence (Barbara S., 24 AD3d at 452; Ghaznavi, 163 A.D.2d at 195). The court's determination after a hearing that respondent and N.Q. entered into a ceremonial marriage was supported by the evidence and the court's credibility determinations. Therefore, it affirmed the court's factual determination that a ceremonial marriage took place. It rejected Respondent's contention that petitioner was required to prove the ceremonial marriage by clear and convincing evidence. It was respondent's burden to rebut the presumption of legitimacy by clear and convincing evidence. He failed to carry that burden. The Court rejected respondent's argument that the ceremony did not comply with the requirements of Islam (because there was no written marriage contract). The child's legitimacy did not depend on the validity of the marriage (Family Court Act § 417). As long as respondent and N.Q. entered into a ceremonial marriage, the child is presumed to be legitimate and, therefore, entitled to support.

Second Department Holds that Party Seeking Counsel Fees Must Demonstrate, Prima Facie, attorney substantially complied with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3

In Piza v Baez-Piza, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7224738, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08384 (2d Dept., 2016) following a trial, the defendant sought additional attorney's fees, and, the Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the defendant the sum of $7,500 in attorney's fees for legal services provided following the earlier award of $3,500 in attorney's fees. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding the defendant total attorney's fees in excess of the $7,500 retainer that she paid to her attorney, as she did not demonstrate, prima facie, that her attorney substantially complied with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3 (see Vitale v. Vitale, 112 AD3d 614, 615). It modified the judgment to provide that the additional award of attorney's fees for legal services provided following the prior award of $3,500 be limited to the sum of $4,000 (see Mulcahy v. Mulcahy, 285 A.D.2d 587, 588–589).

Appellate Division Considers Factor [6] “the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household in awarding Maintenance

In Kaprov v Stalinsky, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7380951, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08509 (2d Dept., 2016) the husband argued, inter alia, that as the Supreme Court had already ordered him to pay, pursuant to a pendente lite order, $3,000 per month in temporary maintenance retroactive to November 12, 2010, the date on which the wife filed her complaint seeking a divorce, the Court, in awarding maintenance for seven years from the date of judgment this effectively granted the wife an 11-year maintenance award, which is excessive in duration given that the marriage lasted only 12 years and the parties had no children together. The Appellate Division rejected this argument observing that a party's maintenance obligation is retroactive to the date the application for maintenance was first made (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][a]). However, the party is also entitled to a credit for any amount of temporary maintenance ... already paid” (Huffman v. Huffman, 84 AD3d 875, 876). In arguing that the maintenance award was out of proportion to the duration of the marriage, the husband failed to recognize that, pursuant to the version of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(6)(a) in effect at the time of the commencement of this action, one of the factors a court should take into account in deciding the amount and duration of a maintenance award is “the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household” (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][a][6]). The wife testified that the couple lived together from 1984 to 2010, approximately 26 years. Thus, an 11-year award of maintenance was not out of proportion with the duration of the joint household. The maintenance award was appropriate for the wife to become self-supporting given the factors involved, including the duration of the pre-marital joint household, as well as the wife's age, absence from the workforce, reduced earning capacity, and limited education (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][a]).

Surrogate's Court Lacks Authority under Domestic Relations Law § 111–c to Deny Recognition of Foreign Adoption Order

In Matter of Child A, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7380939, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08510 (2d Dept., 2016) the petitioners commenced proceedings seeking an order “denying recognition” of a foreign adoption order pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 111–c, or, in the alternative, vacating the adoption order pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 114(3) on the grounds of fraud and newly discovered evidence (children’s mental health issues). The Appellate Division affirmed the order which dismissed the proceedings. It held the Surrogate’s Court lacked authority under Domestic Relations Law § 111–c to deny recognition of the adoption order. Although a court may deny a petition for registration of a foreign adoption order on the ground that it does not satisfy the requirements set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 111–c(1) (see Domestic Relations Law § 111–c[3]), the statute, by its plain language, was not intended to function as a means to abrogate a foreign adoption or deny recognition of a foreign adoption order on the basis of fraud. Rather, Domestic Relations Law § 111–c requires New York courts to recognize and give full legal force and effect to foreign adoption orders provided that certain conditions are met, and provides a mechanism for New York residents to validate foreign adoption orders. The Surrogate’s Court similarly lacked authority under Domestic Relations Law § 114(3) to vacate the adoption order. That statute provides that, “[i]n like manner as a court of general jurisdiction exercises such powers, a judge or surrogate of a court in which the order of adoption was made may open, vacate or set aside such order of adoption for fraud, newly discovered evidence or other sufficient cause.” (Domestic Relations Law § 114[3]). The plain language of that statute only empowers a New York court to vacate its own adoption orders, and not those issued in a foreign sovereign nation (see Matter of Walker, 64 N.Y.2d 354, 360).

Third Department Holds that Equitable Distribution, Maintenance and Interim Support Awards to Wife Rebut “Less Monied Spouse” Presumption

In Macaluso v Macaluso, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7234697, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08418 (3d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division, inter alia, rejected the wife’s argument that Supreme Court abused its discretion in denying her request for $20,000 in counsel fees. It observed that because this action was “commenced on or after October 12, 2010, there was a statutory ‘rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse’ . It found that the equitable distribution, maintenance and substantial interim award of fees, including temporary support payments that allowed the wife to amass several thousand dollars in savings, and durational maintenance giving her time to obtain a job commensurate with her impressive qualifications and a $5,000 interim award applied toward approximately $20,000 in legal bills that were only related to the divorce in part (the invoices also included services related to the parties agreement and Family Court proceedings), rebutted the presumption. After considering “the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, the Court was unpersuaded that the wife demonstrated the need for a further award of counsel fees. It noted that Supreme Court also pointed out that the wife did not provide required affidavits or otherwise detail the degree to which the legal expenses incurred by her were attributable to the divorce.

Family Court Has the Authority to Award an Attorney's Fee in Custody Proceedings Based on the Financial Circumstances of the Parties and the Circumstances of the Case.

In Matter of Catto v Howell, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6991671, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08072(2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court which denied the mother's motion for an award of an attorney's fee. After the parties reached a settlement resolving several petitions, inter alia, to modify an existing court-sanctioned custody arrangement, the mother moved for an award of an attorney's fee in the sum of $33,471.32. The Appellate Division observed that the Family Court has the authority to award an attorney's fee in custody proceedings when warranted under the circumstances of the case" (Family Ct Act § 651[b]; Domestic Relations Law § 237[b]; Matter of Feng Lucy Luo v. Yang, 104 AD3d 852, 852). The award of reasonable counsel fees is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court. Any such award 'is to be based on the financial circumstances of the parties and the circumstances of the case as a whole, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions, but should not be predicated solely on who won and who lost. It found that given the relative merits of the parties' positions, and their respective financial circumstances, an award of an attorney's fee to the mother in the sum of $33,471.32 was appropriate.

Prior Dismissal of Appeal for Want of Prosecution Acts as Bar to a Subsequent Appeal as to All Questions That Were Presented on the Earlier Appeal

In Horn v Horn, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7109263, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08198 (2d Dept., 2016) the parties were married in 1991 and they had two children. The Appellate Division held, inter alia, that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in directing the defendant to pay two-thirds of the balance of a home equity line of credit. In general, expenses incurred prior to the commencement of a divorce action constitute marital debt and should be equally shared by the parties. However, a financial obligation incurred by one party in pursuit of his or her separate interests should remain that party's separate liability. Inasmuch as the evidence established that the debt was incurred for the dual purpose of improving the marital residence and paying bills as well as funding the defendant's separate business interest in which the plaintiff had no share, the defendant failed to show that the debt as to the defendant's separate business interest should be shared equally.

The Appellate Division held that to the extent that defendant contested the propriety of the pendente lite relief awarded in a 2009, order, review of that issue was barred by the doctrine of Bray v. Cox (which held that a prior dismissal for want of prosecution acts as a bar to a subsequent appeal as to all questions that were presented on the earlier appeal.)

(38 N.Y.2d 350). It found that defendant could have raised that issue in his prior appeal from that order, which was dismissed by the Court for failure to perfect in accordance with the rules of the Court, and that dismissal constituted an adjudication on the merits with respect to all issues which could have been reviewed on that appeal. It declined to exercise its discretion to determine the propriety of the pendente lite relief awarded in the 2009 order.

Family Court Not Authorized under Family Court Act § 352.3(1) to Issue an Order of Protection in Favor of a Witness

In Matter of Richard H., 40 N.Y.S.3d 551, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07322 (2d Dept., 2016) Family Court, adjudicated Richard H. a juvenile delinquent, and issued an order of protections which directed Richard H. to stay away from Rey J. and his home, school, and place of employment, and to refrain from harassing, intimidating, threatening, or otherwise interfering with Rey J. The Appellate Division reversed holding that Family Court was not authorized under Family Court Act § 352.3(1) to issue an order of protection in favor of Rey J., who was a witness to, but not a victim of, the offenses (see Matter of Elias E., 83 A.D.3d at 834, 921 N.Y.S.2d 276; Family Ct. Act § 352.3[1]).

Appellate Division Explains Doctrine of Ripeness in Finding Claim Is Nonjusticiable

In Allard v Allard, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7129129, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08288 (3d Dept., 2016) the parties 1989 separation agreement that was incorporated, but not merged, into a their judgment of divorce provided that plaintiff was “entitled to sole and exclusive possession, use and ownership of the marital residence,” which was transferred to her and that “[w]hen and if the house is sold,” defendant and plaintiff are to share equally the equity or profit from the sale. In 2014, defendant filed a motion to enforce the separation agreement, seeking an order directing the immediate sale of the property or, in the alternative, directing plaintiff to pay off the mortgages on the property, alleging that plaintiff breached the agreement by obtaining the additional loans and thereby encumbering his contingent interest in the property. Supreme Court denied defendant’s motion as moot. The Appellate Division found that defendant’s motion was properly denied, upon distinct but similar grounds. It found that under the plain language of the agreement, defendant was entitled to a share of the equity or profits resulting from a sale of the marital residence only “[w]hen and if” the residence is sold. Thus, plaintiff was under no obligation to sell the home. Supreme Court correctly found that defendant was seeking an opinion with regard to a possible future event that has not yet occurred, and that there was no presently existing case or controversy to be adjudicated. Under the doctrine of ripeness, where the harm sought to be enjoined is contingent upon events which may not come to pass, a claim to enjoin the purported hazard is nonjusticiable as wholly speculative and abstract. Here, the harm that defendant sought to avoid, that is, the diminution of his share of the equity or profit that might someday result from a sale of the residence because of the encumbrances of plaintiff’s loans, would occur only if the residence was eventually sold, a future contingency that may never come to pass. Moreover, as plaintiff stated that she planned to keep the property and leave it to her children in her will, there was no practical likelihood that the future contingency will occur. Accordingly, defendant's contentions were not ripe for review and were not justiciable.

Court Denies Wife's Application for Service of the Summons for Divorce by Publication to Facebook Where No Demonstration That Service by Facebook Was Reasonably Calculated to Apprise Defendant of Matrimonial Action.

In Qaza v Alshalabi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 7109698, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26402 (Sup. Ct., 2016) Supreme Court denied the wife's application pursuant to CPLR 308(5) for service of the summons for divorce by publication to the facebook social networking website. In her affidavit in support plaintiff alleged that she and defendant were married on June 22, 2011 in New York State but that defendant left the marital residence in September 2011 without providing her any contact information. Plaintiff argued that defendant had been deported and that she believes he was living in Saudi Arabia. She alleged that she "made every effort to locate" defendant to personally serve him with the summons for divorce but had not been successful. She contended that Saudi Arabia was not a signatory to The Hague Convention and, therefore, plaintiff could not ensure service in the foreign jurisdiction. She argued that she only discovered that defendant was in Saudi Arabia because defendant maintained two (2) profiles on Facebook listing that as his location. Supreme Court found that the facts and circumstances were distinguishable from Safadjou v. Mohammadi relied upon by plaintiff. In Safadjou v. Mohammadi the Court permitted service by e-mail pursuant to CPLR 308(5). However, there the record established that the plaintiff and defendant had been communicating by e-mail and, therefore, the Court found that "plaintiff made the requisite showing that service by e-mail was 'reasonably calculated to apprise defendant of the pending lawsuit and thus satisfie[d] due process'" (Safadjou v. Mohammadi, 105 A.D.3d 1423, 1425, 964 N.Y.S.2d 801 [4 Dept.,2013], citing Harkness v. Doe, 261 A.D.2d 846, 847, 689 N.Y.S.2d 586 [4th Dept.,1999]). Supreme Court found that plaintiff failed to sufficiently authenticate the Facebook profile as being that of defendant and did not show, assuming arguendo that it was defendant's Facebook profile, that defendant actually used this Facebook page for communicating. There was no indication that the profile had been used since April 2014, and no sworn statement that she communicated with defendant through this profile. As such, plaintiff did not demonstrate that, under the facts presented, service by Facebook was reasonably calculated to apprise defendant of the matrimonial action.

Youthful Offender Adjudications Are Adult Proceeding and Do Not Qualify a Person as "Dependent" on a "Juvenile Court" Within the Meaning of 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(27)(J)

In the Matter of Jose H. 40 N.Y.S.3d 710 (Sup. Ct., 2016) Supreme Court denied the application of Jose H. for an order setting out Special Findings that would make him eligible for Special Immigrant Juvenile status which, if granted by immigration authorities, would permit him to stay in the United States. See 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(27)(J); 8 C.F.R. § 204.11. The petitioner argued that he was “dependent” on a “juvenile court” because he was “legally committed to, or placed under the custody of, an agency or department of a State” when this Court—after the petitioner’s conviction of felony assault for ambushing and hacking an unarmed man with a machete—adjudicated him a Youthful Offender and sentenced him to state prison. Supreme Court found that this strained interpretation of the federal statute failed and denied the application. It observed that the “juvenile court” in New York state is the Family Court. While the New York Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction and a judge of the Supreme Court may sit to adjudicate a Family Court case, this Supreme Court judge did not do that in the petitioner’s case. Family Court was without jurisdiction to entertain the petitioner’s case because he was charged, as an adult, with a felony. In other words, the petitioner was not legally committed or placed in custody by a “juvenile court,” as required for Special Immigrant Juvenile status, see 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(27)(J), because this Court was not exercising “juvenile court” jurisdiction when it sent him to state prison. Youthful Offender adjudications are adult, rather than juvenile, proceedings in New York. Consequently, the petitioner did not qualify as “dependent” on a “juvenile court” within the meaning of the federal statute.

Absent Provision Barring Family Court Enforcement of Divorce Judgment it May Be Enforced in Supreme Court or Family Court

In Castello v Castello, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6605162, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07287 (2d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division observed when the Supreme Court signed the proposed judgment of divorce, it struck a provision which would have expressly granted concurrent jurisdiction to the Family Court with respect to the issues of child support and maintenance. The Appellate Division held that the striking of that provision does not bar the Family Court from exercising concurrent jurisdiction. Unless the Supreme Court expressly retains exclusive jurisdiction to enforce the terms of a judgment of divorce, the support provisions of the judgment may be enforced in the Family Court as well. The judgment of divorce did not contain a provision limiting enforcement jurisdiction to the Supreme Court.

Appellate Division Holds Postnuptial Agreement Which Was Not Properly Acknowledged as Required by Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3) Was Ratified by Accepting its Benefits

In Gardella v Remizov, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6885860, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07924 (2d Dept., 2016) the parties to this matrimonial action were married in 2000. In October 2002, the parties entered into a postnuptial agreement, which provided, among other things, that the marital residence and the plaintiff’s private medical practice were the plaintiff’s separate property. In 2006, the parties entered into a second postnuptial agreement, which provided that four parcels of real property in Florida acquired by the parties during the marriage had been purchased with the plaintiff's separate property, and further addressed the distribution of those four parcels in the event of a divorce. In 2010, the parties entered into a separation agreement, which addressed, inter alia, issues of maintenance and equitable distribution of the parties' respective assets. At the time, the plaintiff, a neurologist, was earning approximately $600,000 per year, and the defendant, a wine salesman, was earning approximately $40,000. The separation agreement provided, among other things, that the defendant would have no interest in any of the assets acquired during the parties' marriage, including six parcels of real property, the plaintiff's partnership interest in a neurological practice, and the plaintiff's bank and brokerage accounts, and that he waived his right to spousal maintenance. The defendant was not represented by counsel when he executed the separation agreement. In November 2011, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. Supreme Court granted plaintiff's motion for summary judgment dismissing the defendant's counterclaims to set aside the agreement, and denied defendant's cross motion for summary judgment on his counterclaims to set aside the agreements, to nullify the 2002 postnuptial agreement for lack of acknowledgment, and for financial disclosure. The Appellate Division found that given the vast disparity in the parties' earnings, the evidence that the defendant had no assets of value, and the defendant's documented medical condition which inhibits his future earning capacity, the defendant's submissions were sufficient to create an inference that the separation agreement was unconscionable. In addition, the defendant's evidence indicating that the plaintiff sold almost $1 million in securities in the months preceding his execution of the separation agreement, the value of which were not accounted for in the list of her bank and brokerage accounts therein, raised a triable issue of fact as to whether the plaintiff concealed assets. It held that under these circumstances, the Supreme Court should have exercised its equitable powers and directed further financial disclosure, to be followed by a hearing to test the validity of the separation agreement.

The Appellate Division further found, that the 2006 agreement was valid, and that while the defendant correctly contended that the 2002 postnuptial agreement was not properly acknowledged in the manner required by Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3) (see Galetta v. Galetta, 21 NY3d 186, 192), the evidence established that the defendant ratified that agreement by accepting the benefits of it and by waiting more than eight years to seek its nullification. No inquiry into the validity of the 2002 postnuptial agreement or the 2006 postnuptial agreement would be necessary or warranted.

Parent Who Obtains Order Compelling Another Person to Pay Child Support Will Be Judicially Estopped from Taking Inconsistent Position That Other Person Was Not a Parent to the Child for Purposes of Visitation

In Paese v Paese, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6604674, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07304 (2d Dept., 2016) the defendant had three children from prior relationships, including the subject child. The plaintiff moved in with the defendant and her children and raised the subject child as his daughter. The plaintiff and the defendant later married and then separated. After the separation, the defendant filed a petition in the Family Court seeking child support from the plaintiff for all of her children, including the subject child. A Support Magistrate found that the plaintiff was chargeable with the support of the subject child and his two biological children, and directed him to pay child support and contribute to child care expenses. In May 2013, the plaintiff commenced an action for a divorce. The Supreme Court consolidated the Family Court proceeding with the Supreme Court action and issued a temporary access order pursuant to which the plaintiff had access to the subject child and his biological children. In January 2015, the defendant moved, inter alia, to remove the subject child from the temporary access order, declare the plaintiff a third-party stranger to the subject child. Supreme Court denied the motion, determining that the defendant was judicially estopped from arguing that the plaintiff was not the subject child's parent for the purpose of visitation because she previously sought and obtained an award of child support for the child. During the trial, when asked about the order denying her motion to remove the subject child from the temporary access order, the defendant testified that she did not agree with the order because, among other things, she did not believe that the plaintiff should be paying support for the subject child. The trial was to resume several weeks later, at which time the Supreme Court informed the parties that based on the defendant's clear and unequivocal waiver of child support for the subject child, the court would not direct the plaintiff to pay child support for the subject child, which was the sole basis of its judicial estoppel ruling. Therefore, the court ruled, the plaintiff did not have standing to seek visitation, his request for access to the subject child was denied, and there was no need to complete the trial with respect to visitation. The court issued an order accordingly.

The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for completion of the trial with respect to visitation. It observed that one way that an individual may obtain standing to proceed as a "parent" is through the doctrine of judicial estoppel (see Matter of Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A. C.C., 28 NY3d 1). Under the doctrine of judicial estoppel, "a party who assumes a certain position in a prior legal proceeding and secures a favorable judgment therein is precluded from assuming a contrary position in another action simply because his or her interests have changed". Thus, where a parent obtains an order compelling another person to pay child support based on the parent's successful argument that the other person was a parent to the child, the parent who obtained child support will be judicially estopped from taking the inconsistent position that the other person was not, in fact, a parent to the child for purposes of visitation. It held that Supreme Court erred in finding that the plaintiff lacked standing to seek visitation with the subject child. The defendant was judicially estopped from arguing that the plaintiff was not a parent for the purpose of visitation. First, by asserting in her child support petition that the plaintiff was chargeable with support for the subject child, the plaintiff assumed the position before the Family Court that the plaintiff was the subject child's parent, as it is parents who are chargeable with the support of their children (Family Ct Act § 413[1][a]). Next, based on her assertion that the plaintiff was chargeable with the subject child's support, the defendant successfully obtained an order compelling the plaintiff to pay child support for the subject child. Under this order, the plaintiff was required to pay child support for his children, including the subject child. Furthermore, the record did not support the court's finding that the defendant unequivocally waived the right to child support. Therefore, the defendant was judicially estopped from arguing that the plaintiff is not a parent for the purpose of visitation.

Unauthenticated Recording of a Telephone Conversation Between the Mother and the Child Was Inadmissible in Custody Proceeding

In Matter of Williams v Rolf, 2016 WL 6884034 (3d Dept.,2016) a proceeding to modify a prior custody order, the Appellate Division held that a recording of a telephone conversation between the mother and the child was inadmissible. In November 2012 the child had initiated a telephone call to her attorney and the call was answered by the attorney's answering service. After a brief conversation with an answering service employee, the connection was not terminated and the child's ensuing conversation with the mother was inadvertently monitored and recorded by the answering service. The recording was subsequently disclosed to the child's attorney, who then furnished a compact disc of the recorded conversation to the attorneys for both the mother and the father. The recording was played at the hearing and received into evidence over the objection of the mother's attorney. The Appellate Division agreed with the mother that the recording of her conversation with the child should not have been received into evidence because the recording was not properly authenticated. The Appellate Division observed that the predicate for admission of tape recordings in evidence is clear and convincing proof that the tapes are genuine and that they have not been altered. Absent such proof, the [witness's] concession that the voice on the tapes is his or hers and that he or she recalls making some of the statements on the tapes does not exclude the possibility of alteration and, therefore, does not sufficiently establish authenticity to make the tapes admissible" (People v. Ely, 68 N.Y.2d 520, 522 [1986]). The foundation laid for the introduction of the recording into evidence was the mother's testimony that the telephone call was made by the child using the mother's cell phone, the voices on the recording were hers and the child's, she listened to the recording "[q]uite a few" times and her friend, Amanda Coon, was present when the recording was made. After this testimony, Family Court admitted the recording into evidence. The mother's testimony was insufficient to authenticate the recording because she did not testify as to whether or not the recording was the complete and unaltered conversation between her and the child, and "there was no attempt to offer proof about who recorded the conversation, how it was recorded (e.g., the equipment used) or the chain of custody" (Grucci v. Grucci, 20 NY3d at 897).

Date of Commencement of the Foreign Action Could Not Serve as the Valuation Date for Equitable Distribution of Marital Property in Action for Equitable Distribution Following Foreign Judgment of Divorce.

In Drake v Mundrick, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6816775, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07792 (4th Dept., 2016) On September 12, 2011, plaintiff commenced a action for equitable distribution following the issuance of an amended foreign judgment of divorce. Before the trial commenced, Supreme Court informed the parties that the court would use the date of commencement of the foreign action of divorce, i.e., May 1, 2007, as the date for valuation of the marital property. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted. It held that the court erred in using the 2007 date instead of the 2011 date as the valuation date. Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(4)(b) provides that, the "valuation date or dates may be anytime from the date of commencement of the action to the date of trial". Although both the action for dissolution of the marriage in 2007 and this action “to obtain ... distribution of marital property following a foreign judgment of divorce” are included in the statutory section entitled “[m]atrimonial actions” (§ 236[B][2][a]) it concluded that the date of commencement of the foreign action could not serve as the valuation date for equitable distribution of the marital property because the foreign action for divorce was not “an action in which equitable distribution [was] available,” and the foreign court in this case thus lacked jurisdiction over any of the parties’ marital assets. A new trial on equitable distribution is required where, as here, we have determined that the court used an incorrect valuation date.

Net Worth Affidavit Form Revised Effective August 1, 2016

The Affidavit of Net Worth Form which is required to be served by both parties, pursuant to DRL §236 [B] [2] and 22 NYCRR §202.16(b), was revised effective August 1, 2016. The new form, which is gender neutral, includes new categories of expenses and removes certain expense categories. The most significant change is that it requires that the value of assets and the amount of liabilities and debts shall be listed as of “date of commencement” of the action in addition to the “current amount.”

Other significant changes in the form include new sections under “Liabilities” for “Credit Card Debt” and “Home Equity and Other Lines of Credit;” former Item VII, Support Requirements, was removed; and former item VIII Counsel Fees was removed and replaced with the following:

“VII. LEGAL & EXPERT FEES

Please state the amount you have paid to all lawyers and experts retained in connection with your marital dissolution, including name of professional, amounts and dates paid, and source of funds. Attach retainer agreement for your present attorney.”

The parties are now required to indicate if the net worth statement is not the first one they have filed. The following language appears at the end of the form: “This is the _____ Statement of Net Worth I have filed in this proceeding.”

It appears that item 12.1 Contingent Interests (stock options, interests subject to life estates, prospective inheritances) contains a confusing typographical error. It requires the affiant to list “g. source of acquisition to acquire.” However, it is clear from the balance of the assets portion of the form that this was meant to read “Source of funds to acquire”, a term used throughout the form.

The Net Worth Affidavit form can be downloaded in pdf, word and fallible format from <http://www.nycourts.gov/divorce/forms.shtml>

Preliminary Conference Stipulation/Order Form Revised Effective August 1, 2016

The Preliminary Conference Stipulation/Order form required to be served pursuant to 22 NYCRR §202.16(f) was revised effective August 1, 2016. It was re-formatted and contains new provisions related to the post-divorce maintenance guidelines and notice of the automatic orders.

DRL §236 [B] [6] [g], which is applicable in actions commenced on or after January 25, 2016 (Laws of 2015, Ch 269) provides that where either or both parties are unrepresented, the court shall not enter a maintenance order or judgment unless the court informs the unrepresented party or parties of the post-divorce maintenance guideline obligation. Subdivision M. titled “NOTICE OF GUIDELINE MAINTENANCE” contains a notice intended to comply with DRL §236 [B] [6] [g], in cases where there is an unrepresented party. The Notice advises the parties that under the Maintenance Guidelines Law there is an obligation to award the guideline amount of maintenance on income up to $178,000 to be paid by the party with the higher income (the maintenance payor) to the party with the lower income (the maintenance payee) according to a formula, unless the parties agree otherwise or waive this right.

The new form contains a new Subdivision J titled AUTOMATIC STATUTORY RESTRAINTS (DRL §236[B][2]), in which each party acknowledges that he or she has received a copy of the Automatic Statutory Restraints/Automatic Orders required by DRL §236[B][2], and that he or she understands that he or she is bound by those Restraints/Orders during the pendency of this action, unless terminated, modified, or amended by order of the Court upon motion of either party or upon written agreement between the parties duly executed and acknowledged.

The other significant changes in the form are as follows:

BACKGROUND INFORMATION, was moved to Item A, at the beginning of the form and the information formerly at the beginning of the form was moved into item A.5. That part of Item A which requires the parties to identify and state the nature of any premarital, marital, separation and other agreements was modified to add “and/or Orders which affect the rights of either of the parties in this action.” Like the former preliminary conference statement it also contains a space to include a date for either party to “challenge the agreement”. However, unlike the former form, the new form contains a waiver provision which specifies that if “No challenge is asserted by that date, it is waived unless good cause is shown.”

Subdivision B GROUNDS FOR DIVORCE (1-3) contains spaces for the parties to insert the dates the pleadings were served or will be served. Subdivision B (4) which is where the parties indicate that the issue of grounds “is unresolved” was modified to remove “a jury is or is not required". In the new form Subdivision B (4) specifies that if "the issue of grounds is resolved, the parties agree that Plaintiff/Defendant will proceed on an uncontested basis to obtain a divorce on the grounds of DRL § 170(7) and the parties waive the right to serve a Notice to Discontinue pursuant to CPLR 3217(a) unless on consent of the parties."

That part of former Subdivision C, which stated that "The issue of custody is resolved __ unresolved__" was removed from the form, and the references to a "parenting plan" in the event custody issues are resolved or unresolved were removed.

The following was added to Subdivision C CUSTODY, as (3):

ATTORNEY FOR CHILD(REN) or GUARDIAN AD LITEM: Subject to judicial approval, the parties request that the Court appoint an Attorney for the parties' minor child(ren) ("AFC"). The cost of the AFC's services shall be paid as follows:

FORENSIC: Subject to judicial approval, the parties request that the Court appoint a neutral forensic expert to conduct a custody/parental access evaluation of the parties and their child(ren). Subject to Judicial approval, the cost of the forensic evaluation shall be paid as follows:_____.

The following was added to Subdivision D FINANCIAL: "(4) Counsel Fees are resolved unresolved."

Subdivision G. (1) titled Preservation of Evidence was modified to add the requirement that a party shall maintain not only all financial records in his or her possession but all financial records "under his or her control" through the date of the entry of a judgment of divorce.

Subdivision G (2) titled Document Production was also modified to remove the 45 day period to exchange records and require the exchange of checking account, brokerage account and savings account records for both "joint and individual accounts."

The following language was removed from Subdivision G: "Any costs associated with the use of the authorization shall be paid by _____ OR reserved for the Court once the amount is determined.

No later than _____, the parties shall notify the Court of all items to be provided above that have not been provided.

Spaces were added to Subdivision G (2) for the parties to list the dates for both parties to respond to notices of discovery and inspection, and interrogatories.

Spaces that were in the former preliminary conference order for the parties to list the dates that party depositions and third party depositions were to be completed have been removed.

"Compliance with discovery demands shall be on a timely basis pursuant to the CPLR" was removed from Subdivision G.

Subdivision H, VALUATION/FINANCIAL was re-written but is substantially the same as in the former form.

The checklist for assets requiring valuation in former Item 1 was removed as well as the sentence :” The date of valuation be _____ for items _____ and shall be the date of commencement of this action for items _____.”

The words “no later than _____” were removed from the following sentence in Item 1: ‘If a party requires fees to retain an expert and the parties cannot agree upon the source of the funds, an application for fees shall be made.’

The time limitations for the exchange of expert reports in Item 2, Experts to be Retained by a Party, where there is no date specified, was modified to extend the time to exchange expert reports: “Absent any date specified, they are to be exchanged 60 days prior to trial or” 30 days after receipt of the report of the neutral expert, whichever is later.”

Subdivision I, ” Confidentiality/Non-Disclosure Agreement “ which appeared in the former form, was removed.

Finally, the following was added to subdivision N: “All discovery as set forth herein above is expected to be completed prior to the compliance conference.”

The Preliminary Conference form can be downloaded in pdf, word and fallible format from <http://www.nycourts.gov/divorce/forms.shtml>

Court of Appeals

Court of Appeals Holds that Mail Service of Order on Party Represented by Counsel is Ineffective for Purposes of Filing Objections to Family Court Support Order

In Matter of Odunbaku v Odunbaku, 2016 NY Slip Op 07705 (2016) the Court of Appeals held that if a party is represented by counsel, the time requirements set out in Family Court Act § 439 (e) for objections to a support magistrate's final order, when the order is served by mail, do not begin to run until the order is mailed to counsel.

The mother retained Staten Island Legal Services to represent her in her efforts to obtain child support from respondent father, with whom she had a son. Through counsel, who represented her throughout the proceedings she obtained a support order. Subsequently a different support magistrate granted the father's petition for downward modification and reduced the father's child support obligation. The order and findings, dated July 24, 2013, was mailed by the Clerk of Family Court directly to the father and to the mother, but not to the father's lawyer or the mother's lawyer. On September 3, 2013, 41 days after the orders were mailed, the mother, through counsel, filed objections. Family Court denied the objections as untimely, relying on Family Court Act § 439 (e), which provides that

"[s]pecific written objections to a final order of a support magistrate may be filed by either party with the court within thirty days after receipt of the order in court or by personal service, or, if the objecting party or parties did not receive the order in court or by personal service, thirty-five days after mailing of the order to such party or parties" (emphasis added). The Court ruled that "the mailing of a copy of the order and findings of fact to a party of the proceedings satisfied the requirements of § 439 (e) and [22 NYCRR] 205.36 (b)" and that "neither the Family Court Act nor [22 NYCRR 205.36 (b)] specifically requires that the Clerk of Court shall mail a copy of the Support Magistrate's order and decision to a party's attorney."

The mother appealed relying on Matter of Bianca v Frank (43 NY2d 168 [1977]). The Appellate Division affirmed relying on 22 NYCRR 205.36 (b) which provides that "[a]t the time of the entry of the order of support, the clerk of [Family Court] shall cause a copy of the findings of fact and order of support to be served either in person or by mail upon the parties to the proceeding or their attorneys."

The Court of Appeals reversed holding that Matter of Bianca v Frank was dispositive. There, it held that once counsel has appeared in a matter a Statute of Limitations or time requirement cannot begin to run unless that counsel is served with the determination or the order or judgment sought to be reviewed". The Bianca Court recognized that this principle would not apply if a legislative enactment specifically excluded the necessity of serving counsel by stating the legislative "intention to depart from the standard practice . . . in unmistakable terms" . The Court noted that the rationale of Bianca is straightforward. "[O]nce a party chooses to be represented by counsel in an action or proceeding, whether administrative or judicial, the attorney is deemed to act as his agent in all respects relevant to the proceeding. Thus any documents, particularly those purporting to have legal effect on the proceeding, should be served on the attorney the party has chosen to handle the matter on his behalf."

The Court held that Bianca governed and the reference to the mailing of the order to a "party or parties" in Family Court Act § 439 (e) must be read to require that the order be mailed to the party's counsel, in order for the statutory time requirement to commence. While section 439 (e) uses the term "party," the statute does not convey in language that could not be mistaken that mailing to a represented party is dispositive for time requirement purposes and mailing to counsel is unnecessary, notwithstanding Bianca.

Denial of Visitation Warranted Where Compelling Reasons and Substantial Evidence Show Visitation Would Be Detrimental to the Child.

In Harry S v Olivia S, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 5935054, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 06761 (1st Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the fathers request for visitation with the children. It held that although denial of visitation is a "drastic remedy," it is warranted where compelling reasons and substantial evidence show that visitation would be detrimental to the child. The father had a history of violence against the mother and there was an extant order of protection in favor of the mother and both children. The father made no effort to foster and maintain a relationship with the children during the extended period of time (6 years for the younger child, 5 years for the older) the children lived with relatives abroad, an arrangement that the father himself proposed. Despite Family Court's determination that physical, in person visitation with their father would have a negative impact on the children's well being, evident in the emotional distress they were exhibiting, the court nonetheless encouraged the father to repair his relationship with the children by, among other things communicating with them by electronic or telephonic means, and sending them gifts. The court specifically ordered the mother to encourage, not discourage, such contact and it also ordered the mother to enroll the children in individual therapy for the purpose of attempting to foster a relationship between them and their father. The court also recommended that the father participate in therapy to address his anger issues and learn how to engage with the children in a positive manner. Though the father's contact was limited at the present time, it was in line with the children's wishes and very strong preferences.

Appellate Division Holds The Agreement Provision Granting Childs Therapist the Right to Determine Visitation is Void

In Matter of Rogan v Guida, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 5928789, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 06716 (2d Dept.,2016) in March 2012, the father filed a petition for visitation with the parties' child, who was living with the mother. On March 29, 2013, the parties consented to the entry of an order directing, in relevant part, "that there shall be no contact between the father and the child except as recommended by the child's therapist." In August 2014, the father petitioned the Family Court to vacate or modify the order, alleging that it was unenforceable as drafted, and sought a modification on the ground that a change in circumstances had occurred. Family dismissed the father's petition, and denied the father's application. The Appellate Division found that the father's factual assertions in support of an alleged change in circumstances were unsubstantiated and conclusory, and that he failed to make the requisite showing for modification. However, there was merit to his argument that the order dated March 29, 2013, as drafted, improperly delegated to the child's therapist sole authority to determine whether the father would be permitted to have any future contact with the child. Therefore, it held that the Family Court should have denied the mother's motion to dismiss the father's petition as sought to vacate the paragraph of the order which directed "that there shall be no contact between the father and the child except as recommended by the child's therapist," and granted that branch of the father's petition. The Appellate Division observed that since the entry of the order dated March 29, 2013, the father had no visitation with the subject child, and that this situation could not be allowed to continue indefinitely. It observed that it was for the Family Court—not the child's therapist—to exercise its own discretion to determine how, when, and under what terms and conditions the father's visitation with the child, pursuant to the order dated March 29, 2013, was to resume. It directed the Family Court to determine the circumstances under which visitation was to resume if the parties could not agree on such a plan.

Counsel Fees Denied Wife Without Prejudice Where Submissions Did Not Contain Statements Demonstrating Compliance with 60 Day Rule in 22 NYCRR 1400.2

In Montoya v Montoya, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6089190, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 06807 (2d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which denied the plaintiff's application for counsel fees without prejudice because the plaintiff's submissions did not contain proper itemized billing statements from her attorney demonstrating that she was billed at least every 60 days, as required by 22 NYCRR 1400.2. It observed that court rules impose certain requirements upon attorneys who represent clients in domestic relations matters (see 22 NYCRR part 1400). These rules were designed to address abuses in the practice of matrimonial law and to protect the public, and the failure to substantially comply with them will preclude an attorney's recovery of a legal fee from his or her client or from the adversary spouse (see Rosado v. Rosado, 100 AD3d 856; Wagman v. Wagman, 8 AD3d 263). A showing of substantial compliance must be made on a prima facie basis as part of the moving party's papers. The evidence proffered by the plaintiff in support of her application demonstrated that her attorney failed to substantially comply with the rules requiring periodic billing statements at least every 60 days. Accordingly, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying, without prejudice, her application for an award of counsel fees.

Authors Note:

Compare with Vitale v. Vitale, 112 A.D.3d 614, 615, 977 N.Y.S.2d 258, 260 (2d Dept., 2013) where the motion by the plaintiff's first attorney was denied because there was no significant disparity in the parties' financial circumstances. There the Court did not state it was "without prejudice" as in Montoya. The Court added: "In addition, the failure of the plaintiff's former attorney to substantially comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3 precluded him from seeking unpaid fees from the plaintiff and, therefore, the defendant may not be compelled to pay such fees (see Rosado v Rosado, 100 AD3d 856 [2012])."

We note that the Montoya Court's initial reliance on Wagman to preclude an attorney's recovery of a legal fee from the adversary spouse appears to be misplaced. Wagman dealt solely with the recovery of legal fees from a client, not from an adversary spouse. Rosado relied on Wagman and appears to have extended the rule to applications for counsel fees from the adversary spouse. See Verkowitz v. Torres, 2009 N.Y. Slip Op. 31124(U), 2009 WL 1455303.

Third Department Underscores Child's Right to Confidentiality.

In Matter of John V v Sarah W, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6106560, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op.

06911 (3d Dept., 2016) a custody modification proceeding, the Appellate Division, mother argued that Family Court committed reversible error by allowing the child to testify as a fact witness in the presence of counsel but not the parties, and by not sealing the child's testimony. Although this argument was not preserved for review, the Court took the opportunity to underscore the importance of protecting a child's right to confidentiality, which is paramount and superior to the rights of the parties. Even if, as occurred here, a child assents to his or her testimony being shared with his or her parents, Family Court must not put a child in the position of having his or her relationship with either parent further jeopardized by having to publicly relate his or her difficulties with them or be required to openly choose between them. Moreover, because the mother corroborated the father's hearsay account of the incident that occurred between the child and her fiancé, it perceived no reason for the child to have testified as a fact witness and reiterated that such a practice should be used sparingly and only when absolutely necessary.

Appellate Division Emphasizes That Calling a Child to Testify in Custody Proceeding Is Generally Neither Necessary Nor Appropriate

In Matter of Rutland v O'Brien, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6106584, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 06908 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division, inter alia, rejected the mother's contention that Family Court erred in admitting text messages, obtained by him from the mother's Facebook account, since the account was available on the son's iPod without password protection (see generally CPLR 4506). It agreed with the mother's assertion that Family Court erred in permitting the father to call the daughter's counselor, a licensed clinical social worker, to testify about confidential, privileged matters in the absence of a knowing waiver from the daughter (see CPLR 4508[a][1]), notwithstanding the absence of any objection by the attorney for the children. However, given the abundant evidence of conflict between the parties, it found the error was harmless.

In a footnote the Appellate Division observed that during the trial testimony of the children, who were called as witnesses by the father, the parents remained outside the courtroom, but the record was not sealed. The children were required to testify at length, subject to extensive cross-examination by counsel, as well as extensive questioning by Family Court. It emphatically reemphasize[d] that calling a child to testify in a Family Ct Act article 6 proceeding is generally neither necessary nor appropriate. It noted that to the extent that the children were questioned as to their preferences, by all counsel and the court, such questioning should have been confined to the Lincoln hearing.

Third Department Holds Strict Adherence to Family Court Act § 439[e] Deadline for Objections Not Required.

In Matter of Hobbs v Wansley, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 6106371, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 06933 (3d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court which dismissed the mother's objections to its support order without consideration of the merits based on her untimely filing. It held that Family Court ought to have considered the merits of her objections despite the fact that they were untimely filed on the first morning that the courthouse was open after the objections had been due. It found that the circumstances that caused the untimely filing were “extraordinary” for the purposes of excusing the untimeliness. It held that strict adherence to the deadline in Family Court Act § 439[e] is not required. Family Court has discretion to overlook a minor failure to comply with the statutory requirements regarding filing objections and address the merits. (Citing Matter of Ryan v. Ryan, 110 AD3d 1176, 1178 [2013]; see Matter of Riley v. Riley, 84 AD3d 1473, 1474 [2011]). The uncontested evidence established that the mother attempted to file her objections on the afternoon of the final day upon which the objections would be timely. She averred that she arrived at the courthouse at 4:45 p.m. to file the objections, having relied on the hours of operation for that courthouse as listed on the New York State Unified Court System (NYSUCS) website. NYSUCS advertised the hours of operation of the courthouse as being from “9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.” Despite these advertised hours, the courthouse was closed when the mother arrived. The parties agreed that the actual regular hours of operation of the courthouse included the courthouse closing at 4:30 p.m., which explained its closure when the mother arrived. Considering the proof establishing that the mother would have timely submitted her objections but for the inaccurate information provided by the NYSUCS website, Family Court ought to have excused her untimely filing. It remitted for Family Court to consider the mother’s objections on the merits.

Fathers Right to Visitation Denied Where Compelling Reasons and Substantial Evidence Show That Visitation Would Be Detrimental to the Child

Order Issued on Fathers Consent That "There Shall Be No Contact Between the Father and the Child Except as Recommended by the Child's Therapist" Held Improper

Recent Legislation

Domestic Relations Law § 245 amended effective September 29, 2016

Domestic Relations Law § 245, which authorizes the remedy of contempt, pursuant to Judiciary Law §756 et. seq., to enforce a judgment or order for the payment of a sum of money awarded in a matrimonial action, was amended to allow an application for contempt to be made without any prior application for enforcement by any other means. The amendment eliminates the requirement of demonstrating presumptively, to the satisfaction of the court, in the order to show cause bringing on the application, that payment cannot be enforced pursuant to DRL§ 243, DRL§ 244, CPLR 5241 or CPLR 5242.

Domestic Relations Law § 245, as amended provides:

§ 245. Enforcement by contempt proceedings of judgment or order in action for divorce, separation or annulment. Where a spouse, in an action for divorce, separation, annulment or declaration of nullity of a void marriage, or for the enforcement in this state of a judgment for divorce, separation, annulment or declaration of nullity of a void marriage rendered in another state, makes default in paying any sum of money as required by the judgment or order directing the payment thereof, the aggrieved spouse may make application pursuant to the provisions of section seven hundred fifty-six of the judiciary law to punish the defaulting spouse for contempt, and where the judgment or order directs the payment to be made in installments, or at stated intervals, failure to make such single payment or installment may be punished as therein provided, and such punishment, either by fine or commitment, shall not be a bar to a subsequent proceeding to punish the defaulting spouse as for a contempt for failure to pay subsequent installments, but for such purpose such spouse may be proceeded against under the said order in the same manner and with the same effect as though such installment payment was directed to be paid by a separate and distinct order, and the provisions of the civil rights law are hereby superseded so far as they are in conflict therewith. Such application may also be made without any previous sequestration or direction to give security or any application for enforcement by any other means. No demand of any kind upon the defaulting spouse shall be necessary in order that he or she be proceeded against and punished for failure to make any such payment or to pay any such installment; personal service upon the defaulting spouse of an uncertified copy of the judgment or order under which the default has occurred shall be sufficient. (Laws of 2016, Ch 345, § 1, enacted September 29, 2016, and effective immediately as provided in §2.)

Doctrine of Inconsistent Positions Does Not Estop Wife from Maintenance Where She Filed Two Separate Bankruptcy Petitions, Which Alleged, in Part, That She Was Not Entitled to Any Alimony, Maintenance, or Support Payments.

In Canzona v Canzona, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 5107999, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 06055 (2d Dept.,2016), the Appellate Division observed that “Judicial estoppel, or the doctrine of inconsistent positions, precludes a party who assumed a certain position in a prior legal proceeding and who secured a judgment in his or her favor from assuming a contrary position in another action simply because his or her interests have changed". "The doctrine is invoked to estop parties from adopting such contrary positions because the judicial system cannot tolerate this playing fast and loose with the courts". It held that the Supreme Court properly determined that the defendant was not judicially estopped from seeking an award of maintenance because she previously filed two separate bankruptcy petitions, which alleged, in part, that she was not entitled to any alimony, maintenance, or support payments. The parties were still married at the time the bankruptcy petitions were filed, and the defendant was not required to list any possible future rights to maintenance payments in the bankruptcy petitions, which were filed years before the judgment of divorce was issued. Moreover, while the doctrine of judicial estoppel has been applied in matrimonial actions, its application in this case to prevent the defendant from presenting evidence regarding her needs would not have been appropriate.

Service by email pursuant to CPLR § 308(5) authorized in Termination of Parental Rights Case

In Matter of JT, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4766643, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26286 (Fam. Ct., 2016) the County DCFS filed a petition seeking to terminate the parental rights of the respondent to the child, J. T., alleging that he had abandoned the child. The County moved for an order granting substituted service of the summons and petition by electronic means pursuant to CPLR § 308(5). Family Court granted the motion. It observed that Family Court Act § 617 governs the service requirements for proceedings brought to terminate parental rights and sets forth that a summons and petition shall be delivered to the person summoned at least twenty days before the time designated for an appearance before the Court. FCA § 617 permits alternative means of service after reasonable efforts have been undertaken for personal service. Family Court Act § 617(c) states that personal service on an individual in a foreign country shall be made in accordance with the provisions of Surrogate's Court Procedure Act § 307. It is only after a finding that personal service would be impracticable under SCPA § 307(3)(c) that the Court may then order substituted service in such manner as the Court directs pursuant to CPLR § 308(5). Upon such a finding CPLR § 308(5) vests a court with the discretion to direct an alternative method for service of process. Upon the initial finding that personal service is impractical the Court has broad discretion in determining an alternative means of service. It noted that New York Courts have granted e-mail service of process as an appropriate method when statutory methods have proven to be ineffective or impossible. (See Safadjou v. Mohammadi, 105 AD3d 1423; Alfred E. Mann Living Trust v. ETRIC Aviation S.A.R.L., 78 A.D.3d 137, 910 N.Y.S.2d 418; Baidoo v. Blood-Dzraku, 48 Misc.3d 309, 5 N.Y.S.3d 709; Alfred E. Mann Living Trust v. ETRIC Aviation S.A.R.L., 78 A.D.3d 137, 910 N.Y.S.2d 418; Matter of Keith X., 124 A.D.3d 1056, 2 N.Y.S.3d 268) Due process requires that the method of service granted must be reasonably calculated under all of the circumstances. In granting the motion, the Family Court found that the father was deported from the United States to Jordan prior to the child being removed from the mother's care and his exact whereabouts were unknown. Upon the child being removed from the mother's care the caseworker maintained communication with the father through electronic mail and the father requested additional information pertaining to the Court proceedings in e-mail transmissions. At no time did the father provide any further information as to his physical address to the caseworker. Based upon these findings the County had sufficiently demonstrated that it was impractical for personal service of process to be effectuated. The Court found that upon the commencement of the underlying neglect petition the caseworker had multiple communications with the father through electronic means and none of the transmissions were returned as undeliverable'. The father acknowledged receipt of information via e-mail during the pendency of the neglect proceeding and made requests for additional documentation from the caseworker. The father did not provide the caseworker with a physical address nor any other reasonable means of communication besides the e-mail address which was utilized to facilitate communication between them.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Appellate Division Holds Supreme Court Properly Rejected Contention Constructive Trust Should Be in Amount of $1,000,000, the Amount of Life Insurance Policy Required under Divorce Judgment. Purpose of DRL § 236[B][8][a] Is to Ensure That the Spouse or Children Receive the Economic Support for Payments That Would Have Been Due Had the Payor Spouse Survived.

In Mayer v Mayer, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4533573, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05911 (2d Dept., 2016) the plaintiff was the second wife of Paul S. Mayer (the father). Their judgment of divorce dated October 23, 2000 obligated him to pay child support and educational expenses for the children of that marriage, Alanna and Matthew, and maintain a term life insurance policy in the face amount of $1,000,000 for the benefit of Alanna and Matthew, with the plaintiff being named as trustee on their behalf, "until such time as his support obligation is fully satisfied." In 2001, the father married the defendant Kristen M. Mayer (Kristen). The father and Kristen had two children, Jonah and Ryan. In 2005, due to the father's claimed inability to pay the premiums on the $1,000,000 policy required under the judgment of divorce, the policy was converted into two policies insuring his life, both of which were issued by the defendant New York Life Insurance and Annuity Corporation (NYLIAC). One policy, with a face amount of $200,000, listed the father as the owner and the plaintiff as the beneficiary. The other policy, with a face amount of $100,000, listed the plaintiff as both the owner and the beneficiary. The plaintiff paid the premiums on the $100,000 NYLIAC policy. In 2006, Family Court held the father in contempt for, failing to maintain the $1,000,000 policy required by the judgment of divorce and directed him to comply with the life insurance provision of the judgment of divorce. There was evidence that the father could not obtain a new policy in the amount of $1,000,000 because of ill health. There also was evidence, that in addition to the $100,000 and $200,000 NYLIAC policies, the father maintained other life insurance policies totaling $750,000, which listed various beneficiaries: Kristen, Jonah, and Ryan; Alanna and Matthew; and the two children of the father's first marriage, Scott and Jonathan. The Family Court's order provided that if the father could not obtain a $1,000,000 policy, he would be required to change the beneficiaries on those other policies to name Alanna and Matthew as the sole beneficiaries.

When the father died in 2011 he was significantly in arrears in the support he was obligated to pay with respect to Alanna and Matthew, and the plaintiff discovered that he had failed to comply with the directive in the Family Court's May 2006 order that he either maintain a $1,000,000 policy for the benefit of Alanna and Matthew or that he change the beneficiaries of his existing policies (other than the two NYLIAC policies) to Alanna and Matthew as sole beneficiaries. The plaintiff also discovered that in 2010 the father changed the beneficiary on the $200,000 NYLIAC policy and removed the plaintiff as beneficiary and named as beneficiaries Kristen (60%), Jonah (5%), and Ryan (5%); Alanna (5%) and Matthew (5%); and Scott (10%) and Jonathan (10%).

In this action to impose a constructive trust upon the proceeds of the life insurance policies that insured the life of the father the Supreme Court granted plaintiff's motion for summary judgment to the extent of imposing a trust upon some of the proceeds of the life insurance policies on the father's life. The Court determined that the proper amount of the proceeds subject to the trust should be equal to the father's child support and educational expense obligations under the judgment of divorce and what he would have been required to pay had he lived. The court also determined that the trust amount would not be reduced by the proceeds the plaintiff had received under the $100,000 NYLIAC policy. Further, the court concluded that issues of fact remained as to the actual amount of the father's support obligations under the judgment of divorce. The court denied all other requests for relief. Upon reargument it adhered to so much of its prior determination as imposed a constructive trust upon the proceeds of certain life insurance policies insuring the father's life in an amount equal to the father's child support and educational expense obligations under the judgment of divorce, including the amounts for which he would have been responsible had he lived. The court concluded that the life insurance provision was not intended as a stand-alone entitlement. Next, the court agreed with Kristen that the proceeds the plaintiff received from the $100,000 NYLIAC policy should be taken into account in determining the amount of insurance proceeds subject to the constructive trust, to the extent that the proceeds from the $100,000 NYLIAC policy would be applied ratably with the proceeds of the father's other policies to satisfy his child support and educational expense obligations. The court determined, however, that the plaintiff was entitled to a credit for the premiums she had paid to implement and maintain the $100,000 NYLIAC policy. Finally, the court vacated its prior determination denying the New York Life defendants' motion for summary judgment dismissing the amended complaint insofar as asserted against them and granted that motion.

The Appellate Division observed that a party's obligation to pay maintenance and child support terminates upon that party's death (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][1] [a]; [5-a][g]; [6][f][3]). The purpose of Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][8][a] is not to provide an alternative award of maintenance or child support, but solely to ensure that the spouse or children will receive the economic support for payments that would have been due had the payor spouse survived. Accordingly, where life insurance is appropriate, it should be set in an amount sufficient to achieve that purpose. It should not be in an amount that would provide a windfall. It held that Supreme Court correctly interpreted Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(8)(a) in determining that the amount of the insurance proceeds subject to the constructive trust should be the amount of the father's child support and educational expense obligations had he lived. The court properly rejected the plaintiff's contention that the proceeds subject to the trust should equal the face amount of the life insurance policy required under the judgment of divorce, $1,000,000, minus the life insurance proceeds Alanna and Matthew had received. Additionally, the court did not err in determining that the proceeds of the $100,000 NYLIAC policy, reduced by the premiums the plaintiff paid on that policy, should be taken into account ratably in determining the amount of the constructive trust. The purpose of the $100,000 NYLIAC policy was to ensure that the father's death would not cause economic injury to Alanna and Matthew in the form of the loss of their support and payment of their educational expenses.

Second Department Holds that Contributing Spouse Must Trace Source of Contribution to get Separate Property Credit. (Corrected)

In Shkreli v Shkreli, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4198586, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05752 2016 WL 4198586 (2d Dept., 2016) the parties were married on June 30, 1984. In May 2012, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. In early 2012, prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff liquidated a retirement account and obtained a $250,000 mortgage on the marital residence. He used $100,000 of the mortgage proceeds to repay his sister-in-law, who had lent him that amount of money to pay off the previous mortgage on the marital residence.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court also properly determined that the marital residence, which was purchased during the marriage, was marital property. Where one spouse contributed monies derived from separate property toward the acquisition of the marital residence," he or she generally will receive "a credit for that contribution" (Fields v. Fields, 15 N.Y.3d 158, 166, 905 N.Y.S.2d 783, 931 N.E.2d 1039). Here, the plaintiff failed to establish the value of his separate property contribution to the purchase of the marital residence. He presented no evidence as to how much money he contributed to the purchase of the house he co-owned with his brother prior to the marriage or the value of his interest in the house when he acquired it. With respect to the sum of money that was used to purchase the property on which the marital residence was built, the plaintiff presented no evidence as to whether the money was separate or marital property. Under the circumstances, the court properly determined that the marital residence was marital property.

The Appellate Division also held that Supreme Court properly found that the plaintiff wastefully dissipated certain marital assets and awarded the defendant a credit for the wasteful dissipation of such assets. Other than the $100,000 payment to his sister-in-law and the payment of certain dental expenses for himself and the parties' daughter, the plaintiff presented no evidence as to what he did with the remaining proceeds from the $250,000 mortgage he obtained just prior to the commencement of the action and the money from the liquidated retirement account. Further, he failed to provide any credible explanation for the source of funds, in excess of $125,000, that he deposited in a separate bank account in his name in February 2012, with subsequent unexplained cash withdrawals.

Second Department Holds Non-biological, Non-adoptive Partner Has Standing to Seek Visitation and Custody under Drl § 70(a) Where He Demonstrated That He and Partner Entered into Pre-conception Agreement to Conceive Children and to Raise Them Together as Their Parents

In Matter of Frank G v Renee P.-F., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4646017, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05946 (2d Dept.,2016) Joseph P. and Frank G. were domestic partners who asked Joseph's sister, Renee P.-F. to act as a surrogate. Renee executed a surrogacy contract in which she agreed to be impregnated with Frank's sperm and to surrender her parental rights in order for Joseph to adopt the child or children. The understanding between herself, Joseph, and Frank was that Joseph and Frank would be the parents of the children, and that she would remain a part of the children's lives. After undergoing in vitro fertilization, Renee gave birth to fraternal twins in February 2010. During the first four years of the children's lives, Joseph and Frank equally shared the rights and responsibilities of parenthood, although Joseph did not legally adopt the children. The children regarded both of them as their parents. In early 2014, Joseph and Frank separated, and the children continued to reside with Frank. Joseph, acting in a parental role, visited and cared for the children on a daily basis. In May 2014, Frank suddenly refused to allow Joseph or Renee to have any access to the children, and in December 2014, Frank moved to Florida with the children. Renee filed for custody, and Joseph subsequently sought custody of the children. Family Court denied Frank's motion, in effect, to dismiss Joseph's custody petition on the ground, inter alia, that Joseph lacked standing under Domestic Relations Law § 70.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that Domestic Relations Law § 70 does not define "parent." In Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M., 77 N.Y.2d 651, the Court of Appeals supplied a definition of "parent" to mean solely the biological mother or biological father, or a legal parent by virtue of an adoption but during the pendency of this appeal, the Court of Appeals, in Matter of Brooke S.B. v. Elizabeth A. C.C., --- N.Y.3d ----, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, ---N.E.3d ----, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05903 (2016), overruled Alison D. because, inter alia, its definition of "parent" had "become unworkable when applied to increasingly varied familial relationships". In Brooke S.B., the Court held that, where a partner to a biological parent "shows by clear and convincing evidence that the parties agreed to conceive a child and to raise the child together, the non-biological, non-adoptive partner has standing to seek visitation and custody under Domestic Relations Law § 70(a)" It found that Joseph sufficiently demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that he and Frank entered into a pre-conception agreement to conceive the children and to raise them together as their parents. Although the surrogacy contract is not enforceable as against Renee to deprive her of standing under Domestic Relations Law § 70 (see Domestic Relations Law § 124[1]), it was evidence of the parties' unequivocal intention that Frank and Joseph become the parents of the children. Moreover, Frank and Joseph equally shared the rights and responsibilities of parenthood, and were equally regarded by the children as their parents. Therefore, Joseph established standing to seek custody or visitation under Domestic Relations Law § 70

In a related case, Matter of Giavonna F. G.-G., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4645460, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05948 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division held that for the reasons stated in its decision and order on a related appeal from an order dated August 21, 2015 (see Matter of G. v. P.-F., ---AD3d ----, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4646017) Family Court properly, in effect, denied Frank G.'s motion to vacate the award of temporary visitation to Joseph P. made on March 16, 2015. It held that contrary to Frank G.'s contentions, Renee P.-F.'s parental rights were not terminated by virtue of her entering into a surrogacy contract. Surrogate parenting contracts have been declared contrary to the public policy, and are void and unenforceable (see Domestic Relations Law § 122). Moreover, Domestic Relations Law § 124(1) expressly states that "the court shall not consider the birth mother's participation in a surrogate parenting contract as adverse to her parental rights, status, or obligations."

The Appellate Division also held that Frank G.'s motion for permission to relocate with the children to Florida could not be granted without an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the relocation is in the children's best interests. In this regard, Frank G., the parent seeking to relocate with the children, had the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that the proposed move would be in the children's best interests.

Court of Appeals

Court of Appeals Overrules Alison D. and Re-defines "Parent" for Custody and Visitation Purposes

In Matter of Brooke S.B., v Elizabeth A. C.C., two related cases, the Court of Appeals revisited Matter of Alison D. v Virginia M. (77 NY2d 651 [1991]) which held that in an unmarried couple, a partner without a biological or adoptive relation to a child is not that child's "parent" for purposes of standing to seek custody or visitation under Domestic Relations Law § 70 (a), notwithstanding their "established relationship with the child". The Court of Appeals agreed that the Petitioners in these cases, who similarly lacked any biological or adoptive connection to the children, should have standing to seek custody and visitation pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 70 (a) in light of more recently delineated legal principles, which required it to conclude that that definition of "parent" established by it in Alison D. has become unworkable when applied to increasingly varied familial relationships. The Court, in an opinion by Judge Abdus-Salaam overruled Alison D. and held that where a partner shows by clear and convincing evidence that the parties agreed to conceive a child and to raise the child together, the non-biological, non-adoptive partner has standing to seek visitation and custody under Domestic Relations Law § 70.

The Court of Appeals pointed out that the petitioners had argued that its holding that Domestic Relations Law § 70 permits a non-biological, non-adoptive parent to achieve standing to petition for custody and visitation requires it to specify the limited circumstances in which such a person has standing as a "parent" under Domestic Relations Law § 70. It observed that because of the fundamental rights to which biological and adoptive parents are entitled, any encroachment on the rights of such parents and, especially, any test to expand who is a parent, must be appropriately narrow. It rejected the premise that it must now declare that one test would be appropriate for all situations, or that the competing tests proffered by Petitioners and amici were the only options that should be considered. It noted that the Petitioners had alleged in both cases before it that the parties entered into a pre-conception agreement to conceive and raise a child as co-parents. It held that these allegations, if proven by clear and convincing evidence, were sufficient to establish standing. Because it decided these cases based on the facts presented to it, it was premature for the Court to consider adopting a test for situations in which a couple did not enter into a pre-conception agreement. The Court specified that it did not decide whether, in a case where a biological or adoptive parent consented to the creation of a parent-like relationship between his or her partner and child after conception, the partner can establish standing to seek visitation and custody. Inasmuch as the conception test applied here, it did not opine on the proper test, if any, to be applied in situations in which a couple has not entered into a pre-conception agreement. It merely concluded that, where a petitioner proves by clear and convincing evidence that he or she has agreed with the biological parent of the child to conceive and raise the child as co-parents, the petitioner has presented sufficient evidence to achieve standing to seek custody and visitation of the child. Whether a partner without such an agreement can establish standing and if so, what factors a petitioner must establish to achieve standing based on equitable estoppel was a matter left for another day, upon a different record. The Court stressed that its decision addressed only the ability of a person to establish standing as a parent to petition for custody or visitation; the ultimate determination of whether those rights shall be granted rests in the sound discretion of the court, which will determine the best interests of the child.

Second Department Holds that Contributing Spouse Must Trace Source of Contribution to get Separate Property Credit.

In Shkreli v Shkreli, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4198586, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05752 2016 WL 4198586 (2d Dept., 2016) the parties were married on June 30, 1984. Here, the plaintiff failed to establish the value of his separate property contribution to the purchase of the marital residence. He presented no evidence as to how much money he contributed to the purchase of the house he co-owned with his brother prior to the marriage or the value of his interest in the house when he acquired it. Preliminary Conference Stipulation Which Is "So Ordered" Is Void Where it Does Not Comply with Domestic Relations Law former § 236(B)(5-a)

In Anonymous v Anonymous, 2016 WL 4131751 (1st Dept.,2016) Plaintiff commenced the action for divorce in June 2011. On October 5, 2011, the parties signed a preliminary conference stipulation, which was so-ordered by the court, which directed defendant to pay temporary maintenance of $250 per week, plaintiff's cell phone expenses up to 1,000 minutes, all fixed and other household expenses, and all costs of the child, including but not limited to private nursery school tuition and health costs.

The wife moved for an upward modification of maintenance based upon documentation she had subpoenaed showing that the husbands income was greater than he had indicated. The motion court concluded that the PC order was unenforceable, because it did not state that the parties were advised of the temporary maintenance calculations under Domestic Relations Law former § 236(B)(5-a), did not state the presumptive amount pursuant to that calculation, and did not state the reason for deviating from that amount. It determined that the entire stipulation was invalid, because its remaining financial terms were intertwined with the temporary maintenance terms. The court next calculated the appropriate temporary maintenance, applying the formula set forth in the DRL, which is based on the parties' gross income. Defendant had also submitted a letter from his accountant estimating his 2014 income at $300,000 and the court deemed defendant's income to be $300,000 for the purposes of calculating temporary maintenance. The court concluded that defendant should pay plaintiff temporary maintenance in the sum of $7,500 per month, retroactive to the date of plaintiff's motion. The court clarified that that sum was intended to cover all of plaintiff's reasonable expenses, including housing; thus, the court did not order defendant to pay any expenses to third parties on plaintiff's behalf, such as the maintenance fees on the marital apartment, which he had been paying. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the preliminary conference stipulation was invalid as a matter of law, because it failed to comply with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law former § 236(B)(5-a)(f). That statute required that, where, as here, a "validly executed agreement or stipulation voluntarily entered into between the parties in an action commenced [on or after October 13, 2010] ... deviates from the presumptive award of temporary maintenance, the agreement or stipulation must specify the amount that such presumptive award of temporary maintenance would have been and the reason or reasons that such agreement or stipulation does not provide for payment of that amount" (former Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][f]). This provision of the statute "may not be waived by either party or counsel" and because the remaining terms of the PC order were intertwined with the temporary maintenance terms, the entire order was invalid.

Proper to Impute Income Where Paid Expenses Exceed Income Substantially and No Explanation for the Difference

In Fench v Fench, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2016 WL 4007328, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05624 (2d Dept., 2016) the parties were married in 2000 and they had one child together. In 2011, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. Supreme Court, inter alia, determined that the defendant should be awarded sole custody of the child, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintenance of $500 per month for 42 months, and that the defendant "is responsible to prepare and pay for" a Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO) for the equitable distribution of gains and losses on his pension. Thereafter, the court entered a judgment of divorce, which directed the plaintiff to file the QDRO at her sole cost and expense.

The Appellate Division held, inter alia, that the court erred in imputing only $55,000 of income per year to the defendant. The defendant's statement of net worth disclosed expenses of $99,588 per year, not inclusive of additional expenses attributed to certain Spring Street properties. While a portion of the defendant's expenses might account for certain credit card debt, the remainder of those expenses were paid, indicating that the defendant's income exceeded the $55,000 annual amount determined by the court. In his testimony, the defendant was unable to explain how his reported pension and rental incomes enabled him to cover his expenses. It increased the maintenance payable to the plaintiff to the sum of $1,500 per month for 54 months.

The Appellate Division modified the judgment to conform to the decision. The judgment failed to conform to the decision upon which it was based, to the extent that the judgment directed the plaintiff to file a QDRO at her sole cost and expense, whereas the decision, as held that the defendant "is responsible to prepare and pay for" any QDRO. When there is an inconsistency between a judgment and the decision upon which it is based, the decision controls, and such inconsistency may be corrected on appeal.

Biological Grandparent may seek Visitation Even after Parental Rights Terminated

In Matter of Weiss v Orange County DSS, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4099227, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05716(2d Dept.,2016), the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court which dismissed the maternal grandmother's petition for visitation, without a hearing, on the basis that she lacked standing to seek visitation as a result of a previous termination of the mother's parental rights. This was error. A biological grandparent may seek visitation with a child even after parental rights have been terminated or the child has been freed for adoption (see People ex rel. Sibley v. Sheppard, 54 N.Y.2d 320, 326) In any event, the dispositional portions of the orders terminating the mother's parental rights were vacated on the mother's related appeal (see Matter of Isabella R. W., --- AD3d ----).

Family Court

Family Court holds the fact that a child has witnessed domestic violence is not alone sufficient to establish neglect.

In Matter of Jubilee S., -- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3981110, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26231 (Fam. Ct.,2016) Family Court observed that Domestic violence in the presence of a child may be a permissible basis upon which to make a finding of neglect. However, exposing a child to acts of domestic violence "is not presumptively neglectful. Not every child exposed to domestic violence is at risk of impairment" (Nicholson v. Scopetta, 3 N.Y.3d at 375). Proof that the child's physical, mental, or emotional condition was impaired or was in danger of becoming impaired as a result of witnessing the domestic violence is required to support a finding of neglect. A child's out-of-court statements may form the basis for a finding of neglect if they are sufficiently corroborated by other evidence tending to support their reliability (see FCA § 1046[a][vi]) Unlike physical injury, which can be observed or established by medical records, whether a child's mental or emotional condition has been impaired or placed at risk of impairment “may be murky” The fact that a child has witnessed domestic violence is not sufficient to establish that the child’s mental or emotional condition has been actually impaired or placed in imminent risk of impairment. “Impairment of mental or emotional condition,” is specifically defined to include “a state of substantially diminished psychological or intellectual functioning in relation to, but not limited to, such factors as failure to thrive, control of aggressive or self-destructive impulses, ability to think and reason, or acting out or misbehavior, including incorrigibility, ungovernability or habitual truancy; provided, however, that such impairment must be clearly attributable to the inability of the respondent to exercise a minimum degree of care toward the child.” (FCA § 1012(f)). The fact that the child allegedly reported that she and the other children were “scared” and ran to the bedroom when fights between the parents broke out did not support a finding of “substantially diminished psychological or intellectual functioning” as described in the statute. Something more substantial is required. As ACS failed to provide competent evidence to corroborate the child’s hearsay statement or to prove that any of the children suffered any actual harm to their physical, mental, or emotional condition or that they were placed in imminent risk of suffering any such harm, the petition was dismissed.

Family Court Holds That Referee to Hear and Report Does Not Have Jurisdiction to Grant Temporary Order to Show Cause for an Order of Protection, but Sustains Order of Protection Granted Pursuant to That Order to Show Cause

In J.B., v. C.C., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 4070400, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26241 (Fam Ct, 2016) an order of reference directed that a Referee hear and report on the father’s petition seeking to modify an order of custody. During the course of the proceedings, the mother filed an order to show cause seeking an order of protection against the petitioner in favor of her and the child. The father argued that the Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to grant the order of protection recommended on the ground, inter alia: 1) that the mother failed to allege a family offense within the meaning of F.C.A. § 812; 2) the order to show cause failed to state a cause of action; 3) the referee did not have the power to hear and determine and therefore could not grant a temporary order to show cause; and 4) there was no petition or counter-claim filed for an order of protection as required by F.C.A. §§ 154–b and 656. It agreed that the referee did not have the power to grant a temporary order to show cause for an order of protection, but rejected the argument that an order of protection may not be granted because the mother did not file either a petition or a counter-claim for the order of protection. It observed that F.C.A. § 656 states that: “No order of protection may direct any party to observe conditions of behavior unless the party requesting the order of protection has served and filed a petition or counter-claim in accordance with section one hundred fifty-four-b of this act.” It held that the mother’s order to show cause was equivalent to a petition, or at the very least, to a counter-claim and therefore, an order of protection may issue. It noted that an order of protection under Article Six of the Family Court Act may be issued by a court “in assistance or as a condition of any other order made under this part.” F.C.A. § 656. The section allowing for such an order of protection does not delineate the same requirements for an order of protection as one issued pursuant to Article Eight of the Family Court Act. Under Article Eight, a petition must set forth, inter alia, an allegation that the respondent committed certain specified acts such as assault, attempted assault, disorderly conduct, harassment, etc., the relationship between the petitioner and the respondent, the name of any child in the household, and a request for an order of protection. F.C.A. § 821. Section 656 does not list these requirements, but only states that a petition or a counter-claim filed in response to a petition requesting an order of protection must be filed. In this case, although the mother filed an answer to the father's petition, she did not file a counter-claim requesting an order of protection. The mother moved for an order of protection by order to show cause. Her order to show cause met all the requirements of a petition under Article Eight. The father had notice that the mother was seeking an order of protection until the child's 18th birthday and was provided with sworn allegations that formed the basis for her request. The father responded to the order to show cause and, as described in the referee's report, the order to show cause was fully litigated in the course of the hearing held before her. Thus, the order to show cause filed by the mother met the due process requirements for an order of protection issued under Article Six.

Editors comment: The court held that the Referee lacked jurisdiction to sign the order to show cause which brought on the motion for the order of protection. Therefore, there was no motion for an order of protection for the Referee to grant.

Denial of Right to Rebut Mother's Affidavits and Evidence Warrants New Trial

In Matter of Hezi v Hezi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3704443, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05498 (2d Dept.,2016) when the hearing on the mother's petition to enforce the college expenses provisions of the parties' stipulation of settlement was shortened due to time constraints, the Support Magistrate permitted the parties to submit two-page closing arguments in writing. The mother submitted three lengthy affidavits and numerous exhibits not presented at the hearing, which the Support Magistrate considered and partially relied upon in granting the mother's petition. The Appellate Division reversed. The father had no opportunity to cross-examine the mother regarding her post-hearing statements, or to object to her exhibits. Family Court Act § 433(a) requires that a respondent "shall be given opportunity to be heard and to present witnesses." A hearing must consist of an adducement of proof coupled with an opportunity to rebut it. The Support Magistrate erred in considering the mother's affidavits and unverified financial information, rather than testimony supported by appropriate documentary evidence, in determining the mother's petition. As the father was deprived of the opportunity to rebut the mother's affidavits and exhibits, the matter was remitted for a new hearing and determination.

Courts Must Determine On A Case-By-Case Basis What Qualifies As An Intimate Relationship Within The Meaning Of FCA § 812(1)

In Matter of Singh v DiFrancisco, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3703191, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05504 (2d Dept.,2016) appellant commenced a proceeding seeking an order of protection against the father of the appellant's grandson. The appellant alleged, inter alia, that he resided with the child and his daughter, the mother of the child, in the second floor apartment of the same building where the respondent resided on the first floor, and that on several dates in December 2014, the respondent pushed him, impeded his access to his home, and threatened him. In June 2015, the respondent moved, in effect, to dismiss the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction on the ground that the relationship between himself and the appellant did not qualify as an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e). Family Court granted the motion and dismissed the petition with prejudice. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that the legislature left it to the courts to determine on a case-by-case basis what qualifies as an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), based upon consideration of factors such as 'the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship. The determination as to whether persons are or have been in an 'intimate relationship' within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e) is a fact-specific determination which may require a hearing. It held that in light of the parties' conflicting allegations as to whether they had an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), the Family Court, prior to determining the respondent's motion, in effect, to dismiss, should have conducted a hearing on that issue. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a hearing to determine whether the Family Court had subject matter jurisdiction under Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), for a new determination thereafter of the respondent's motion, and further proceedings thereafter, if warranted.

Family Court May Not Make Special Findings and Allow Child To Petition USCIS For SIJS Where Child Has Reached 21 Years Of Age But No Order Of Guardianship Has Been Obtained.

In Matter of Maria C.R. v Rafael G, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3703194, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05503 (2d Dept.,2016) on July 30, 2014, the petitioner filed a petition in the Family Court to be appointed as guardian of a child who was then 20 years old. The petitioner also sought an order making special findings so as to allow the child to apply for special immigrant juvenile status under federal law. A hearing on the petition was repeatedly adjourned for various reasons, and ultimately scheduled to take place in January 2015. However, on October 16, 2014, the child attained the age of 21 years. Family Court, without a hearing, dismissed the guardianship petition "due to lack of jurisdiction." The Appellate Division affirmed. In an opinion by Justice Sgroi, it observed that Family Court Act § 661(a) which governs "[g]uardianship of the person of a minor or infant" provides, in pertinent part, that "[f]or purposes of appointment of a guardian of the person pursuant to this part, the terms infant or minor shall include a person who is less than twenty-one years old who consents to the appointment or continuation of a guardian after the age of eighteen." By the clear wording of the statute, the Family Court's subject matter jurisdiction to grant the guardianship petition expired on the date of the child's 21st birthday, or October 16, 2014.

Nor was there any authority for the court to issue Letters of Guardianship nunc pro tunc to the date of the filing of the petition. Where a court is divested of subject matter jurisdiction, it cannot exercise such jurisdiction by virtue of an order nunc pro tunc (see Davis v. State of New York, 22 A.D.2d 733, 733; see also Stock v. Mann, 255 N.Y. 100, 103).

The Court observed that a “special immigrant” is a resident alien who is under 21 years old, is unmarried, and has been either declared dependent on a juvenile court or legally committed to the custody of an individual appointed by a state or juvenile court (see 8 USC § 1101[a][27][J][i]; 8 CFR 204.11). In New York, a child may request that the Family Court, recognized as a juvenile court under federal regulations, issue an order making special findings and a declaration as part of the process to petition USCIS for SIJS. The findings of fact must establish that: (1) the child is under 21 years of age; (2) the child is unmarried; (3) the child is dependent upon a juvenile court or legally committed to an individual appointed by a state or juvenile court; (4) reunification with one or both parents is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis; and (5) it is not in the child’s best interests to be returned to his or her home country. With the declaration and special findings, the eligible child may then seek the consent of the Department of Homeland Security for SIJS. Moreover, pursuant to federal law, a child “may not be denied special immigrant status under SIJS after December 23, 2008 based on age if the alien was a child on the date on which the alien applied for such status”. “The term ‘child’ for purposes of this statute means an unmarried person under twenty-one years of age”.

The Appellate Division concluded that a New York Family Court may not issue an order making special findings and a declaration allowing a child to petition the USCIS for SIJS where, as here, the child has reached 21 years of age but no order of guardianship has yet been obtained. Guardianship status, which the Family Court can only grant to individuals under 21, is a condition precedent to a declaration allowing a child to seek SIJS. It held that once the child turned 21 years old, the Family Court no longer possessed authority to determine the guardianship petition. Furthermore, since dependency upon a juvenile court is a prerequisite for the issuance of an order making the declaration and specific findings to enable a child to petition for SIJS, the Family Court also properly denied the petitioner’s SIJS motion.

New Evidence May Not Be Submitted In Support Of Objections To Support Violation Petition.

In Matter of Loveless v Goldbloom, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3910575, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05571 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division in observing, inter alia, that Family Court properly denied the mother’s objections to the dismissal of her child support violation petition, that the court properly refused to consider the emails the mother submitted with her objections since new evidence may not be submitted in support of objections.

Not Improper To Consider Depreciation In Valuing Assets Of A Business Or To Value Other Equipment By Halving Its Cost Basis

In Cervoni v Cervoni, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3748133, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05538 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division rejected the husbands argument that the valuation of certain company equipment and the method of division was improper. Most of the company's equipment was valued by an expert appraiser, and Supreme Court valued some other equipment by halving its cost basis as listed on a 2013 equipment depreciation schedule in evidence. It held that there is nothing improper in considering depreciation in valuing the assets of a business and, given that "valuation is an exercise properly within the fact-finding power of the trial courts," it could not say that Supreme Court erred in valuing those items as it did. However, it did reduce the award by the value of half of the equipment whose value was erroneously double counted by the court.

Appearance by Counsel at Family Offense Hearing Is Not a Default

In Matter of Leighann W v Thomas X, 2016 WL 3748567 (3d Dept.,2016) the father appealed from a custody order and order of protection, as well as from the denial of his subsequent motion to vacate those orders. The Appellate Division held that while the order of protection and custody order were ostensibly entered on the father's default, no default occurred. The father appeared for the first part of the fact-finding hearing and, while he was absent for the final day of the hearing, his counsel was in attendance. His counsel declined Family Court's offer for him to refrain from participating and render the father's absence a "pure default," and then engaged fully by, among other things, cross-examining a witness. The orders that ensued were therefore not issued upon default, and the father was free to appeal from them

Finding Of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Requires Proponent Demonstrate He Was Deprived Of Reasonably Competent and, thus, Meaningful Representation

In Matter of Bennett v Abbey, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3748562, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05524 (3d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division rejected the mother's argument that she was denied the effective assistance of counsel in this custody proceeding. The Appellate Division observed that a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel requires that the proponent demonstrate that he or she was deprived of reasonably competent and, thus, meaningful representation. Counsel's representation need not be perfect and, as it is not the role of the Court to second-guess counsel's trial strategy or tactics, a party seeking to prevail on an ineffective assistance of counsel claim must do something more than engage in hindsight speculation as to the viability of counsel's strategy. Although the mother chastised counsel for failing to subpoena certain child protective services records, counsel may well have made a tactical decision that, in light of the mother's admission that she previously had been under the supervision of the local department of social services, production of such records would not reflect favorably upon his client. As for counsel's performance at the hearing, counsel's decision to forgo an opening statement is not necessarily indicative of ineffective legal representation. Similarly, the failure to call particular witnesses does not necessarily constitute ineffective assistance of counsel—particularly where the record fails to reflect that the desired testimony would have been favorable.

Recipient of Maintenance and Child Support Directed To Wife To Mortgage, Utilities And All Carrying Charges Associated With The Home And All Of Her Own Personal Expenses, Pendente Lite, So Long As She Lived There

In CG v FG, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3748767, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26220 (Sup Ct, 2016) the wife sought an award of pendente lite maintenance and child support. The Court found that presumptive amount of guidelines maintenance was $24,479 a year, and the Husband's child support obligation under the CSSA guidelines was $21, 879 a year. The Court observed that awards of temporary maintenance and child support are intended to be all inclusive. See Woodford v. Woodford, 100 AD3d 875 (2d Dept.2012); See also, Harris v. Harris, 97 AD3d 534 (2d Dept.2012). The recipient of guidelines maintenance and child support is required to pay all of his or her own reasonable expenses including, but not limited to, any mortgage or rent, and all carrying charges, after receiving the amount awarded. See Khaira v. Khaira, 93 AD3d 194 (1st Dept.2012); See also, Francis v. Francis, 111 AD3d 454 (1st Dept.2013). It therefore directed the wife to pay the mortgage, utilities and all carrying charges associated with the home where she resided together with all of her own personal expenses, pendente lite, so long as she lived there.

Judgment of Divorce Vacated after Seven Years for Untimely submission of Proposed Judgment

In Robert v Robert, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3545275 (Mem), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05241 (1st Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted defendant's motion to reopen the judgment of divorce, to the extent of vacating the judgment and dismissing the case for failure to prosecute. It held that irrespective of the applicability of CPLR 3216 or whether the numerous conditions precedent to dismissal therein were satisfied prior to dismissal here, the untimely submission of the proposed judgment of divorce violated the Uniform Rules for Trial Courts (22 NYCRR) ' 202.48, which provides, in pertinent part, that A[p]roposed orders or judgments, with proof of service on all parties where the order is directed to be settled or submitted on notice, must be submitted for signature, unless otherwise directed by the court, within 60 days after the signing and filing of the decision directing that the order be settled or submitted@ and that A[f]ailure to submit the order or judgment timely shall be deemed an abandonment of the motion or action, unless for good cause shown.@ The court directed plaintiff to settle judgment, which he failed to do. With respect to the seven-year delay, the court found that there was no good cause shown as plaintiff had failed to provide any explanation for the delay. Accordingly, the court was correct in vacating the erroneously signed judgment of divorce and dismissing the case as abandoned.

Appellate Division Finds Waiver Of Private School Payments By Acceptance Of 50% For Nine Years

In Matter of Murphy v Murphy, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3532867, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05154 (2d Dept.,2016) the parties separation agreement dated August 25, 2000, which was incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce dated May 28, 2002 provided that the father would pay a pro rata share, set at the time of the agreement at 70%, of private school and college tuition for the children. For the next nine years, the father paid 50% of the children=s educational expenses. When the father stopped making any payment for educational expenses, the mother commenced a proceeding, inter alia, to enforce the provisions of the separation agreement pertaining to those expenses. The Appellate Division held that the Family Court should have granted the father=s objection to the order which fixed arrears for those expenses on the ground that the mother waived her right to a 70% contribution to tuition from the 2001/2002 school year until the filing of her enforcement petition. A waiver, which does not require consideration, constitutes no more than the voluntary and intentional abandonment of a known right which, but for the waiver, would have been enforceable. It may arise by either an express agreement or by such conduct or failure to act as to evince an intent not to claim the purported advantage. The mother acknowledged at the hearing that she had affirmatively requested that the father pay half of the children=s tuition bills, including making the notation Ayour half@ or similar direction, on some, though not all, of the tuition statements she sent to the father. This evidence, coupled with the mother=s acceptance of the 50% payments for nine years, demonstrated that she intentionally abandoned her right to a 70% contribution prior to the filing of her enforcement petition. Accordingly, it held that in calculating the father=s arrears for educational expenses, the Support Magistrate should not have included the difference between 50% and 70% of the children=s tuition for the years preceding the filing of the enforcement petition.

Best Evidence Rule Explained by Appellate Division

In Miller v Miller, 2016 WL 3562298 (4th Dept.,2016) a proceeding to modify a custody order, the Appellate Division, in reversing an order which dismissed the petition, agreed with the father and the AFC that the JHO erred in refusing to admit in evidence the report of the court-appointed psychologist on the ground that the report was not the Abest evidence@ because the psychologist was available to testify. The A >oft-mentioned and much misunderstood= best evidence rule simply requires the production of an original writing where its contents are in dispute and sought to be proven@ (Schozer v. William Penn Life Ins. Co. of N.Y., 84 N.Y.2d 639, 643), and thus that rule was not applicable here. It rejected the contention of the AFC that the court erred in requiring the admission in evidence of three cellular telephones as the best evidence of the content of text messages between, inter alia, the parties, particularly in view of the father=s failure to offer in evidence an authenticated Acopy-and-paste document of [the] text message conversation[s]@ (People v. Agudelo, 96 AD3d 611, 611B612, lv denied 20 NY3d 1095)

Appellate Divison May Take Notice Of New Facts Which Indicate That Record No Longer Sufficient For Determining Child's Best Interests

In Matter of Amrane v Belkhir, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3560818, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 05249 (4th Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division=s order determining the appeal pointed out that the attorney for the three older children informed the Court at oral argument that, in a subsequent proceeding commenced after the appeal was perfected, Family Court awarded the father temporary custody of the second and third eldest of the minor children; the eldest of the minor children remained with the mother and will be 18 years old in July. It noted that it may take notice of new facts to the extent they indicate that the record before it is no longer sufficient for determining the best interests of the second and third eldest of the minor children, and that was the case here. It therefore directed Family Court on remittal to determine the best interests of those children.

Medical Bills coupled with Testimony Sufficient Prima Facie Evidence of Nonpayment

In Matter of Schiero v Perrotta, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3265463, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04722 (2d Dept.,2016) the mother filed a violation petition alleging, inter alia, that the father had failed to pay his pro rata share of the children's unreimbursed medical expenses. At the hearing, the mother testified that she had incurred $980 in medical expenses for the children, and she attempted to offer into evidence copies of medical bills and proof of payment. The Support Magistrate refused to admit the medical invoices into evidence on the ground that the medical invoices were hearsay, and were not admissible through the mother's testimony, and concluded that the mother failed to demonstrate the amounts of each individual medical expense or when they were incurred and, therefore, dismissed her petition for reimbursement. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Support Magistrate improperly precluded the mother from introducing evidence to support that branch of her petition which sought payment from the father for his pro rata share of the children's unreimbursed medical expenses. The mother's testimony provided a sufficient foundation for the admission of the medical bills and her proof of payment of those bills, as she had personal knowledge of their contents. Consequently, the mother should have been permitted to meet her initial burden of presenting prima facie evidence of the father's nonpayment through the submission of the medical bills and her sworn testimony (see Matter of Rutuelo v. Rutuelo, 98 AD3d 518, 518; Matter of Palmer v. Palmer, 71 AD3d 1152, 1152; Matter of Uriarte v. Ippolito, 54 AD3d 379, 379).

Family Court Violated Fundamental Due Process Rights When it Instructed Mother Not to Consult with Her Attorney During Recesses

In Matter of Turner v Valdespino, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3265444, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04724 (2d Dept.,2016) the mother's hearing testimony in this custody proceeding spanned several court dates and took place over a period of months. At the end of four hearing dates, while the mother's testimony was continuing, the Family Court instructed the mother not to discuss her testimony with her attorney during the recess. One of these recesses was overnight, two recesses were for approximately one week, and one recess was more than three months. Family Court granted the father's petition for sole legal and physical custody and, in effect, denied the mother's petition. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for a new hearing. It held that Family Court violated the mother's fundamental due process rights when it instructed her not to consult with her attorney during recesses, which resulted in her being unable to speak to her attorney over extended periods of time. Although the issue was unpreserved for appellate review, it exercised its power to reach it in the interest of justice because the Family Court's conduct deprived the mother of due process (see Altshuler Shaham Provident Funds, Ltd. v. GML Tower, LLC, 21 NY3d 352, 361 n 4; Martin v. City of Cohoes, 37 N.Y.2d 162, 165).

Failure to Afford the Mother Opportunity to Cross-examine Key Witness Constituted Denial of Due Process, Which Required Reversal

In Matter of Dominic B., 138 A.D.3d 1395, 30 N.Y.S.3d 769, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 03287 (4th Dept., 2016) a neglect proceeding, the Appellate Division held, in reversing the order appealed from, that in granting the petition Family Court erred in relying on a psychological evaluation of the mother that was not received in evidence. It held that it is a fundamental requirement of due process that the decision maker's conclusions must rest solely on legal rules and the evidence adduced at the hearing" (Matter of Kurzon v. Kurzon, 246 A.D.2d 693, 695, 668 N.Y.S.2d 242). Although the parties had expressly stipulated that the evaluation would not be used as evidence in any fact-finding hearing in this matter, or as a basis for seeking to amend the neglect petition, the court relied heavily upon the evaluation in reaching its determination. It also concluded that the court's failure to afford the mother the opportunity to cross-examine a key witness, i.e., a caseworker for petitioner, constituted a denial of her right to due process, which also required reversal (see Matter of Middlemiss v. Pratt, 86 A.D.3d 658, 659, 926 N.Y.S.2d 720).

Denial of Right to Testify and Present Witnesses Constitutes Denial of Due Process Which Warrants Reversal

In Matter of Gerhardt v Baker, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3202538, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04531 (4th Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court on the ground that the father was not properly advised of his right to counsel and the Support Magistrate erred in failing to conduct a proper hearing on the father's modification petition. It held that while a hearing on a petition for modification of a support obligation need not follow any particular format the hearing in this matter was "inherently flawed' ". The father was not offered an opportunity to testify, nor was he permitted to present the sworn testimony of any other witnesses, and the cursory handling of this matter by the Support Magistrate did not provide a substitute for the meaningful hearing to which the father was entitled.

Court of Appeals Rejected Adequate Relevant Information Test in Custody Disputes

In S.L. v J.R., ___NY3d ___, 2016 WL 3188982 (2016) the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Garcia, reversed an order of the Appellate Division, which affirmed Supreme Court's decision in a custody case not to conduct an evidentiary hearing based on its determination that the court possessed "adequate relevant information to enable it to make an informed and provident determination as to the child's best interest." The Court rejected the "undefined and imprecise" adequate relevant information" standard applied by the courts below which tolerates an unacceptably-high risk of yielding custody determinations that do not conform to the best interest of a child nor adequately protect a parent whose fundamental right, the right to control the upbringing of a child, hangs in the balance. The Court observed that in rendering a final custody award without a hearing, Supreme Court appeared to rely on, among other things, hearsay statements and the conclusion of a court-appointed forensic evaluator whose opinions and credibility were untested by either party. It pointed out that a decision regarding child custody should be based on admissible evidence, and there was no indication that a "best interest" determination was ever made based on anything more reliable than mere "information." Moreover, while Supreme Court purported to rely on allegations that were "not controverted," the affidavit filed by Mother plainly called into question or sought to explain the circumstances surrounding many of the alleged "incidents of disturbing behavior." The Court of Appeals held that these circumstances do not fit within the narrow exception to the general right to a hearing. It reaffirmed the principle that, as a general matter, custody determinations should be rendered only after a full and plenary hearing. It declined, to fashion a "one size fits all" rule mandating a hearing in every custody case statewide. However, where, as here, facts material to the best interest analysis, and the circumstances surrounding such facts, remain in dispute, a custody hearing is required. Significantly, the Court held that " a court opting to forego a plenary hearing must take care to clearly articulate which factors were, or were not, material to its determination, and the evidence supporting its decision." Under the circumstances of this case, a plenary hearing was necessary.

In the absence of proof of value, the Referee’s in kind distribution of personal property was not disturbed.

Appellate Division Construes Family Court Act Article 5–b, a New Version of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act

In Ardell v Ardell, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3177140, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04409 (2d Dept.,2016) the parties had three children together, all of whom were born in New York. In 2004, the family moved to Sweden. The father was a Swedish citizen. The parties were divorced in June 2011 pursuant to a partial judgment of the Attunda District Court, Sollentuna, Sweden. In July 2012, the Svea Court of Appeal, Stockholm, Sweden, awarded the parties joint legal custody of the children, with the mother having primary physical custody of the children and the father having visitation. In October 2012, the mother moved to New York with the children. The father remained in Sweden, although he later moved to Singapore in connection with his employment. He retained his Swedish citizenship and remained registered with the Swedish authorities at his home address in Stockholm. In 2013, the parties entered into a child support agreement that was entered as a judgment by the Attunda District Court on September 23, 2013. In July 2015, the mother commenced a proceeding in the Family Court for a de novo award of child support or, in the alternative, to modify the Swedish support order. The father moved to dismiss the petition on the ground, inter alia, of lack of jurisdiction. Family Court denied the motion. The Appellate Division reversed.

The Appellate Division observed that in 2015, New York adopted, as Family Court Act article 5–B, a new version of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act , that, among other things, incorporates the Hague Convention on the International Recovery of Child Support and Other Forms of Family Maintenance, of which Sweden is a member. Although the new version became effective January 1, 2016, Family Court Act § 580–903 provides that the new version “shall apply to any action or proceeding filed or order issued on or before the effective date.”

The Appellate Division noted that Family Court Act § 580–201(a) provides that, in a proceeding to establish or enforce a support order, a tribunal of this state may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident individual if, among other things, the individual resided with the child in this state, the individual resided in this state and provided prenatal expenses or support for the child, or the individual engaged in sexual intercourse in this state and the child may have been conceived by that act of intercourse (see Family Ct Act § 580-201[a] [3], [4], [6]. It was undisputed that the children were conceived in New York, that the father lived with them in New York, and that he presently paid support for them. However, Family Court Act § 580-201(b) provides that the bases for personal jurisdiction set forth in Family Court Act § 580-201(a) “may not be used to acquire personal jurisdiction for a tribunal of this state to modify a ... foreign support order ... unless the requirements of [Family Court Act §] 580-615 ... are met.” Family Court Act § 580-615 allows tribunals of this state to modify foreign child support orders in certain circumstances, “[e]xcept as otherwise provided in [Family Court Act §] 580-711.” Family Court Act § 580-711(a) provides: “A tribunal of this state may not modify a Convention child support order if the obligee remains a resident of the foreign country where the support order was issued unless: “(1) the obligee submits to the jurisdiction of a tribunal of this state, either expressly or by defending on the merits of the case without objecting to the jurisdiction at the first available opportunity; or “(2) the foreign tribunal lacks or refuses to exercise jurisdiction to modify its support order or issue a new support order.” Any child support order issued after a prior child support order has been issued constitutes a “modification” of the prior child support order within the meaning of the UIFSA (see Matter of Spencer v. Spencer, 10 NY3d 60, 67-68).

The Appellate Division rejected the mother’s contention that, after the father moved to Singapore, he was no longer “a resident of the foreign country where the support order was issued,” and that Family Court Act § 580-711(a) therefore did not apply. The father submitted evidence demonstrating that, notwithstanding his move to Singapore, he remained registered as a resident of Stockholm pursuant to the laws of Sweden. It was also clear that the father did not expressly submit to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, and that he objected to the jurisdiction at the first available opportunity. Also the record did not demonstrate that the courts of Sweden lack or refused to exercise jurisdiction to modify the Swedish support order or issue a new support order. Accordingly, the courts of this state do not have jurisdiction to issue a new support order unless there was a reason not to recognize the Swedish support order (see Family Ct Act § 580-711[b]; 580-708[c]). Family Court Act § 580-708 provides that tribunals of this state shall recognize registered support orders issued by tribunals located in members of the Convention except under certain specified circumstances, including where recognition of the order “is manifestly incompatible with public policy, including the failure of the issuing tribunal to observe minimum standards of due process, which include notice and an opportunity to be heard” (Family Ct Act § 580-708[b][1]). Here the mother failed to demonstrate that recognition of the Swedish support order was manifestly incompatible with public policy.

Fundamental Right to Due Process Violated by Denying Mother Right to Confer with Counsel

In Matter of Turner v Valdespino, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3265444, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04724 (2d Dept.,2016) the mother’s hearing testimony in this custody proceeding spanned several court dates and took place over a period of months. At the end of four hearing dates, while the mother's testimony was continuing, the Family Court instructed the mother not to discuss her testimony with her attorney during the recess. One of these recesses was overnight, two recesses were for approximately one week, and one recess was more than three months. Family Court granted the father's petition for sole legal and physical custody and, in effect, denied the mother's petition. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for a new hearing. It held that Family Court violated the mother's fundamental due process rights when it instructed her not to consult with her attorney during recesses, which resulted in her being unable to speak to her attorney over extended periods of time. Although the issue was unpreserved for appellate review, it exercised its power to reach it in the interest of justice because the Family Court's conduct deprived the mother of due process (see Altshuler Shaham Provident Funds, Ltd. v. GML Tower, LLC, 21 NY3d 352, 361 n 4; Martin v. City of Cohoes, 37 N.Y.2d 162, 165).

Denial of Due Process Due to Inherently Flawed Hearing

In Matter of Gerhardt v Baker, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3202538, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04531 (4th Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court on the ground that the father was not properly advised of his right to counsel and the Support Magistrate erred in failing to conduct a proper hearing on the father's modification petition. It held that while a hearing on a petition for modification of a support obligation need not follow any particular format the hearing in this matter was "inherently flawed" . The father was not offered an opportunity to testify, nor was he permitted to present the sworn testimony of any other witnesses, and the cursory handling of this matter by the Support Magistrate did not provide a substitute for the meaningful hearing to which the father was entitled.

Respondent Who Fails to Appear Personally but Is Represented by Counsel Who Is Present When the Case Is Called Is Not in Default

In Matter of Daniels v Davis, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 3202918, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04593 (4th Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order of protection requiring appellant to refrain from offensive conduct toward petitioner. It held that Family Court erred in disposing of the matter on the basis of respondent's purported default. A respondent who fails to appear personally in a matter but nonetheless is represented by counsel who is present when the case is called is not in default in that matter

Doctrine of Necessaries in Alive and Well in New York - Creditor seeking to recover debt against nondebtor spouse must demonstrate primary debtor unable to satisfy the debt out of own resources, that necessaries furnished on nondebtor spouse's credit, and that nondebtor spouse has ability to satisfy debt

In Jones LLP v Sitomer, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 2726532, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 03709 (2d Dept, 2016) an action to recover legal fees against the wife of the decedent under a theory of common-law necessities the Supreme Court granted the defendant summary judgment dismissing the complaint. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that under the common-law doctrine of necessities, a spouse who receives necessary goods or services is primarily liable for payment. A creditor seeking to recover a debt against the nondebtor spouse must demonstrate that the primary debtor was unable to satisfy the debt out of his or her own resources, that necessities were furnished on the nondebtor spouse's credit, and that the nondebtor spouse has the ability to satisfy the debt. Legal services provided to a spouse in a matrimonial action have been considered necessities. Here, the defendant established that the plaintiff's services were not furnished on her credit. Rather, the services were furnished in the expectation of "the proceeds" of the litigation, specifically articulated in the charging lien which the husband had agreed to during the litigation which terminated upon his death. Since the action abated, there were no proceeds of the litigation. Further, it was clear from this record that, although the husband may have had sufficient resources to pay the plaintiff, which included marital assets appropriated by him and court-ordered spousal support, he was unwilling to voluntarily pay the plaintiff, owing to their adversarial relationship.

Second Department Holds Public Policy Does Not Forbid Offsetting Add-on Expenses Against an Overpayment of Child Support

In Matter of Goehringer v Voza-Nicholosi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 2890099 (Mem), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 03880(2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division found that as the father demonstrated both that his loss of employment constituted a substantial change in circumstances and that he made a good-faith effort to obtain new employment which was commensurate with his qualifications and experience he was properly granted a downward modification of his child support obligation. The court pointed out that while child support overpayments may not be recovered by reducing future support payment, "public policy does not forbid offsetting add-on expenses against an overpayment" (Coull v. Rottman, 35 A.D.3d 198, 201, 828 N.Y.S.2d 295).

Second Department Holds That in Absence of Clear Indication That One Party Was More Culpable than Other, Parties Should Share Equally in Paying the Fees of Parenting Coordinator

In Matter of Headley v Headley, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 2726323, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 03740 (2d Dept., 2016) the mother moved, in effect, to vacate so much of the orders dated October 6, 2014, and October 28, 2014, as directed her to share equally in the costs of the parenting coordinator, based upon her financial circumstances. The court denied the mother's motion. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that in custody and visitation matters, a court may appoint a parenting coordinator to mediate between the parties and oversee the implementation of their court-ordered parenting plan. In the absence of any clear indication that one party was more culpable than the other, the parties should share equally in paying the fees of the parenting coordinator". Since the record contained no indication that the mother was the less culpable party, the Supreme Court correctly determined that the parties should share equally the costs of the parenting coordinator. Contrary to the mother's contention, nothing in the record demonstrated that the court failed to consider the parties' financial situations in reaching this determination, or that this outcome was inequitable.

Appellate Division Affirms Order Denying Visitation to Grandparent Who Had Standing Was Not in Child's Best Interests

In Matter of Andenburg v Vandenburg, 137 A.D.3d 1498, 28 N.Y.S.3d 736, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02488 (3d Dept., 2016) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which concluded that petitioner grandmother had established standing to seek visitation, but that visitation was not in the child's best interests. It observed that the determination of whether visitation with a grandparent is in the child's best interests requires evaluation of a variety of factors, including the nature and extent of the existing relationship between the grandparent and child, the basis and reasonableness of the parent's objections, the grandparent's nurturing skills and attitude toward the parents, the attorney for the child's assessment and the child's wishes. Courts should not lightly intrude on the family relationship against a fit parent's wishes as the presumption that a fit parent's decisions are in the child's best interests is a strong one. (Matter of E.S. v. P.D., 8 N.Y.3d at 157). The record established a breakdown of the relationship between petitioner and the mother and that efforts to repair their relationship had been unsuccessful. One attempt to resolve their differences nearly led to a physical altercation. While the existence of animosity between petitioner and the mother was not, in isolation, sufficient to support denying petitioner visitation with the child, several witnesses consistently testified that petitioner had a quick temper, used foul language in the presence of her grandchildren and often directed disparaging or demeaning comments at various members of her family, including children. Considering the testimony, which was credited by Family Court, and the attorney for the child's support for the denial of visitation to petitioner, it concluded that there was a sound and substantial basis for Family Court's determination that an order of visitation, in the face of respondents' objections, was not in the child's best interests.

Imposition of Sanctions Requires That Court Provide a Reasonable Opportunity to Be Heard

In Oppedisano v Oppedisano, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1652314, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 03148 (2d Dept., 2016) the Supreme Court held a hearing as to whether to impose sanctions against the plaintiff because it suspected that a person who allegedly was both a relative of the plaintiff and a court employee was trying to influence the court and interfere with the action. After terminating the hearing without testimony from the person in question, the court imposed sanctions of $5,000 each against the plaintiff and his counsel, nonparty Andrew Wigler. The court found that the plaintiff had violated a court order prohibiting discussion about the case with anyone who was not a party. The court also found that the plaintiff and Wigler had intentionally filed a frivolous CPLR article 78 proceeding in order to derail the hearing and also concluded that Wigler had made a frivolous application to exclude the plaintiff's prior counsel from the courtroom during the hearing. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in imposing sanctions against the plaintiff for violating its order not to discuss the case with any nonparty. 22 NYCRR 130-1.1(d) provides that sanctions may be imposed only after a reasonable opportunity to be heard. By denying the plaintiff the right to cross-examine the person with whom the plaintiff allegedly spoke about this case, and who allegedly tried to influence the court, the court failed to give the plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to be heard. It also improvidently exercised its discretion in imposing sanctions against the plaintiff and Wigler for filing a CPLR article 78 proceeding and making a request to exclude the plaintiff's former counsel from the courtroom during the hearing because it did not give the plaintiff or Wigler a reasonable opportunity to be heard as to whether this conduct constituted frivolous conduct subject to sanctions, and did not give the plaintiff or his counsel notice that they could be sanctioned for such conduct. Furthermore, the court failed to set forth in its order why it found the offending conduct of the plaintiff or his counsel to be frivolous, and why the amount imposed was appropriate.

Supreme Court Holds No Authority Mandates a Party, Who Denies Possessing Requested Documents, to Obtain Records, from a Third Party, for the Benefit of the Opposing Party

In Sanon v Sanon, Slip Copy, 2016 WL 1688596 (Table), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 50657(U) (Sup. Ct., 2016) the husband claimed he had nothing further to disclose because he swore that he did not have many of the requested documents in his possession. Supreme Court observed that CPLR 3120 compels production of documents not only in the possession of a party but under their "control." Fugazy v. Time, Inc., 24 A.D.2d 443, 260 N.Y.S.2d 853 (1st Dept.1965). Conversely, a party may not be compelled to produce information that does not exist or which he does not possess. Rosado v. Mercedes-Benz of North America, Inc., 103 A.D.2d 395, 480 N.Y.S.2d 124 (2nd Dept.1984). Disclosure is required if plaintiff currently retains possession and control, items must be preexisting and tangible to be subject to discovery and production, and a party cannot be compelled to create new documents or items in response to a disclosure demand. Heins v. Public Stor., 36 Misc.3d 1217(A) (Sup.Ct. Suffolk Cty.2012); Gatz v. Layburn, 9 A.D.3d 348, 780 N.Y.S.2d 157 (2nd Dept.2004); Castillo v. Henry Schein, Inc., 259 A.D.2d 651, 686 N.Y.S.2d 818 (2nd Dept.1999).

Supreme Court rejected the wife's argument that the husband had "control" over the accounts and other information because "these are his accounts with his name on them." The court held that the term "control" as used in CPLR 3120 is most often applied to instances in which a party has direct control over records or personnel such as successor corporations or corporate subsidiaries of parties. It has also been applied to require discovery from employees of a party. The court found no authority that mandates a party, who denies possessing requested documents, is required to obtain corporate records, possessed by a third party, for the benefit of the opposing party under CPLR 3101 or CPLR 3120.

The court held that the corporate records of the husband's dental practice, while corporate records owned and controlled by the corporation, were still under the husband's control because they were the records of a corporate entity over which he had control and hence, he was obligated to disclose those records.

The court rejected the argument, advanced by the husband, that he could evade his disclosure obligations by suggesting that his wife has control of certain requested documents or that documents are equally accessible to her. The Court held that if he had the documents, he must produce them, regardless of whether the wife had access to the documents or even if she has the same documents in her possession.

The Court held that the wife was entitled to documents which related to the husband's financial activities and valuation of marital property after the date of commencement of the action. Dorsa v. Dorsa, 50 A.D.3d 842, 856 N.Y.S.2d 208 (2nd Dept.2008); Lennon v. Lennon, 124 A.D.2d 788, 508 N.Y.S.2d 507 (2nd Dept.1986). However, the wife in this case had no marital interest in documents detailing separate property expenses incurred after the commencement of the action. Although she did have a legitimate interest in documents which demonstrated the income of the husband after the commencement.

Second Department Holds Rule Against Double Counting Does Not Apply Where the Asset to Be Distributed Is a 'Tangible Income-producing Asset,' Such as a Medical Practice, Rather than an Intangible Asset, Such as a Professional License, the Value of Which Can Only Be Determined Based on Projected Earnings.

In Palydowycz v Paldowycz, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1442123, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02793 (2d Dept.,2016) the parties were married in 1989. The defendant was an eye surgeon who owned two medical practices and a 9.7561% interest in an ambulatory surgical center. Pursuant to a trial stipulation the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff $14,000 per month for a period of six years, which would be denominated as spousal maintenance, although they were also intended to satisfy the defendant's child support obligation. During the trial the plaintiff's expert had concluded that the combined value of the two medical practices was $1,830,000, and that the value of the defendant's 9.7561% interest in the surgical center was $638,000. During the trial Supreme Court granted a motion which denied the plaintiff any distributive award based upon the value of his medical practices and interest in the ambulatory surgical center reasoning that awarding the plaintiff a distributive share of these assets would constitute double counting because the income stream the plaintiff's expert used to value the defendant's medical practices and interest in the ambulatory surgical center was the same income stream used to determine his maintenance obligation. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the rule against double counting applies where the projected earnings used to value an intangible asset, such as a professional license, are also used to calculate a maintenance award (see Keane v. Keane, 8 NY3d 115, 121; Grunfeld v. Grunfeld, 94 N.Y.2d 696, 704). However, it is only where the asset is totally indistinguishable and has no existence separate from the income stream] from which it is derived' that double counting results. In Keane, the Court of Appeals cautioned against applying a bright line rule that "any income-producing asset distributed as marital property may not also be considered a source of income for maintenance purposes" (8 NY3d at 121). In cases decided by the Court subsequent to the Court of Appeals' decision in Keane, it has repeatedly concluded that distributing a party's business and awarding maintenance based upon the income earned from that business does not constitute impermissible double counting because a business is a tangible, income-producing asset. It also extended this rationale to the distribution of a medical practice in Griggs v. Griggs (44 AD3d 710, 713), it stated that the rule against double counting "does not apply where, as here, the asset to be distributed is a 'tangible income-producing asset,' rather than an intangible asset, such as a professional license, the value of which can only be determined based on projected earnings." It found that the defendant's medical practices, which employed other individuals including several doctors, and his interest in an ambulatory surgical center, were not intangible assets which are "totally indistinguishable" from the income stream upon which his maintenance obligation was based, and the valuation method used by the plaintiff's expert to determine the fair market value of these assets did not change their essential nature. Accordingly, the Supreme Court erred in concluding that it had no discretion to award the plaintiff any distributive share of the value of these assets because the parties considered the defendant's entire 2010 income in reaching a stipulation as to his maintenance obligation. It held that to the extent that Rodriguez v. Rodriguez (70 AD3d 799) is inconsistent with its determination, it should no longer be followed.

Appellate Division Affirms Provision Increasing Durational Maintenance Award to Wife by $100 per Week to Adjust for Adverse Economic Consequences Which Would Result to Her from Defendant's Refusal to Grant Her a Get.

In Mizrahi-Srour v Srpur, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1442274, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $100 per week for five years, which would be increased to $200 per week if the defendant did not provide a Get to the plaintiff within 60 days, distributed 70% of the marital assets to the plaintiff, and awarded the plaintiff $70,000 counsel fees. The parties were married on October 13, 1996, and had four children. On October 21, 2009, the plaintiff commenced this action for divorce. During the marriage, the parties operated a business called the Mosso Group. The plaintiff held a 50% interest in that business. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in precluding the defendant from introducing evidence of business finances. The defendant's repeated failures to comply with court orders relating to discovery were willful and contumacious, and justified the sanction imposed. It also held that the provision increasing the durational maintenance award to the plaintiff by $100 per week to adjust for the adverse economic consequences which would result to her from the defendant's refusal to grant her a Get was proper and was not an impermissible interference with religion. Considering the economic misconduct of the defendant and his frustration of any attempt to value the family business, which he apparently abandoned, the Supreme Court properly awarded the plaintiff 70% of the known marital estate, which consisted of the marital residence, two life insurance policies, and retirement funds. The record supported Supreme Court's finding that the defendant dissipated marital assets by choosing to abandon the business until the litigation concluded. The award of counsel fees to the plaintiff was warranted, since "[t]here shall be a rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse" (Domestic Relations Law § 237[a]). Further, the defendant generated substantial fees with his obstructive litigation tactics.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Mere Fact That a Party's Request for Interim Counsel Fees Is Denied at the Outset of the Litigation Does Not Preclude a Court from Making Such an Award at the Conclusion Thereof

In Teaney v Teaney, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1452764, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02896 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division observed that pendente lite awards necessarily represent a snapshot of a party's financial circumstances and corresponding need at a particular point in time. The mere fact that a party's request for interim counsel fees is denied at the outset of the litigation does not preclude a court from making such an award at the conclusion thereof, after taking into consideration, among other things, the counsel fees incurred, the length and complexity of the case and how the parties ultimately fared after issues of equitable distribution and child support were finally resolved. In this regard, Domestic Relations Law § 237(a) expressly contemplates that multiple applications for counsel fees may be made by a party. Although each application necessarily must be assessed upon its own merits, the denial of a party's request for interim relief simply does not limit or preclude a party's subsequent request for counsel fees at the conclusion of the litigation. It noted that comments made by the court during an appearance where it characterized prior orders denying the wife's applications for interim counsel fees as law of the case and indicating that the wife's subsequent application should be limited to fees incurred after the date of the last order denying fees, "while constituting a slight misstatement of the law, is not appealable, and nothing on the face of Supreme Court's written order reflect[ed] that the court actually employed this restrictive analysis."

Defendants Refusal to File a Joint Income Tax Return with Wife Held to Be Wasteful

In E.R.S. v. B.C.S., Slip Copy, 2016 WL 1438814 (Table), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 50529(U)(Sup. Ct.,2016) Plaintiff alleged that he was forced to file a married, filing separately tax return because defendant refused to file a joint return, and as a result, he incurred a tax liability of $10,000 instead of a tax refund of $2,000. The parties had filed jointly for 15 years. He claimed defendant owed him $6,000 due to her refusal to file jointly with him. Supreme Court found, inter alia, that Defendant failed to defeat plaintiff's claim that her refusal to file a joint income tax return with her was anything but wasteful. In accordance with Levitt v. Levitt, 97 AD3d 543 (2nd Dept.2012), the Court gave defendant the opportunity to file an amended return with plaintiff on or before April 15, 2016 for the tax year 2014 and directed that the parties shall share equally the return, giving plaintiff a credit for the sums he paid in excess of the approximately $2,000 expected return. It directed that if defendant failed to file an amended joint 2014 tax return with plaintiff, she shall pay plaintiff the sum of $6,000. (50% of the amount of the refund they would have received plus 50% of the tax liability plaintiff incurred by filing separately.)

Court of Appeals Holds That Consent to Record Conversation of Child with Another Person Includes Vicarious Consent, on Behalf of a Minor Child

In People v Badalamenti, 2016 WL 1306683 (2016) the Court of Appeals held that the definition of consent, in the context of "mechanical overhearing of a conversation" pursuant to Penal Law § 250.00(2), includes vicarious consent, on behalf of a minor child. It established a "narrowly tailored" test for vicarious consent that requires a court to determine (1) that a parent or guardian had a good faith belief that the recording of a conversation to which the child was a party was necessary to serve the best interests of the child and (2) that there was an objectively reasonable basis for this belief. The Court cautioned that its holding should not be interpreted as a vehicle to attempt to avoid criminal liability for the crime of eavesdropping when a parent acts in bad faith and lacks an objectively reasonable belief that a recording is necessary in order to serve the best interests of his or her minor child. Penal Law § 250.05 and CPLR 4506 cannot be so easily circumvented. The procedural vehicles of pretrial hearings must be used to determine the admissibility of any recordings and will result in the suppression of any parent's recording that a court determines did not meet the narrowly tailored and objective test. In making this admissibility determination, a court should consider the relevant factors, which include, but are not limited to, the parent's motive or purpose for making the recording, the necessity of the recording to serve the child's best interests, and the child's age, maturity, and ability to formulate well-reasoned judgments of his or her own regarding best interests.

In 2008, defendant lived with his girlfriend and her five-year-old son on the second floor of a two-family house. On May 6, 2008, the father tried to reach the mother on her cellphone, using his own cellphone. He called several times without reaching her; the calls went directly to voicemail. Finally, a call went through, but no-one said anything to the father. However, the line was open, and the father was able to hear what was occurring in defendant's apartment. Defendant and the child's mother were yelling at the child, who was crying. Defendant threatened to beat him and punch him in the face. The father, using another cellphone, tried to call the landline telephone in the apartment, but no-one answered. At this point, the father decided to record what he was hearing using a voice memo function on his cellphone. On the recording, which was played to the jury at defendant's trial, defendant told the five-year-old boy that he was going to hit him 14 times for lying and that this would hurt more than a previous beating. The father saved the recording on his cellphone. He did not contact the police.

In a subsequent prosecution for, inter alia, endangering the welfare of a child, the Court allowed the father's recording into evidence at trial, over the objection of the Defendant protested that the making of the recording amounted to eavesdropping, prohibited by Penal Law § 250.05, and that the recording was therefore inadmissible pursuant to CPLR 4506(1).

The Court of Appeals pointed out that generally, in New York, "[t]he contents of any overheard or recorded communication, conversation or discussion, or evidence derived therefrom, which has been obtained by conduct constituting the crime of eavesdropping, as defined by section 250.05 of the penal law, may not be received in evidence in any trial, hearing or proceeding before any court or grand jury" (CPLR 4506[1]). Penal Law § 250.05, in turn, provides that "[a] person is guilty of eavesdropping when he unlawfully engages in wiretapping, mechanical overhearing of a conversation, or intercepting or accessing of an electronic communication." Eavesdropping is a class E felony. Wiretapping is defined as "the intentional overhearing or recording of a telephonic or telegraphic communication by a person other than a sender or receiver thereof, without the consent of either the sender or receiver, by means of any instrument, device or equipment" (Penal Law § 250.00[1]). " 'Mechanical overhearing of a conversation' means the intentional overhearing or recording of a conversation or discussion, without the consent of at least one party thereto, by a person not present thereat, by means of any instrument, device or equipment" (Penal Law § 250.00[2]).¹

The Court held that the father's actions on his cellphone did not constitute "wiretapping" because, with respect to the telephonic communication he recorded, he was "a sender or receiver thereof" (Penal Law § 250.00[1]). It rejected Defendant's argument that the father's actions amounted to the crime of "mechanical overhearing of a conversation" (Penal Law §§ 250.05, 250.00[2]), and that the recording was consequently inadmissible. The Court agreed that the father's actions matched the statutory elements. It concluded that the father gave consent to the recording on behalf of his child. It held that if a parent or guardian has a good faith, objectively reasonable basis to believe that it is necessary, in order to serve the best interests of his or her minor child, to create an audio or video recording of a conversation to which the child is a party, the parent or guardian may vicariously consent on behalf of the child to the recording.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Doctrine of Comity Applied to Properly Recognize Petitioner as a Parent, Thereby Conferring Standing for Her to Seek Visitation with the Children, Notwithstanding Failure to Comply with California's Artificial Insemination Law

In Matter of Kelly S v Farah M., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1355552, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02676(2d Dept., 2016) Kelly S. and Farah M. entered into a registered domestic partnership in California. In 2004, they decided to start a family, and asked nonparty Anthony S., if he would be willing to donate his sperm. He agreed to donate his sperm, and Kelly S. became pregnant through artificial insemination, and gave birth to I.S., who was not a subject of this appeal. Farah M. legally adopted I.S. The parties subsequently decided to have another child, and Anthony S. again agreed to be the sperm donor. On this occasion, Farah M. became pregnant by artificial insemination. The artificial insemination procedure was performed at home by Farah M., rather than by a physician, and the parties did not draft or sign a written consent agreement. On March 24, 2007, Farah M. gave birth to the Z.S. The child was given Kelly S.'s surname, and Kelly S. was listed as a parent on the child's birth certificate. In August 2008, the parties were legally married in California. That same year, they decided to have a third child, and Farah M. became pregnant through artificial insemination, with Anthony S. donating the sperm. The artificial insemination procedure was again performed at home by Farah M., and not by a physician. Farah M. gave birth to the child E.S. on April 27, 2009. E.S. was given Kelly S.'s surname, and Kelly S. was listed as a parent on the child's birth certificate. In or around 2012, the parties relocated with the three children to New York. The parties subsequently separated, and Kelly S. moved to Arizona in or around the summer of 2013, while Farah M. remained in New York with the three children.

In May 2014, Kelly S. filed a visitation petition in the Family Court seeking visitation with Z.S. and E.S. Family Court denied Farah M.'s motion to dismiss the petition on the ground of lack of standing, concluding that since both children were born when the parties were registered domestic partners or married, Kelly S. was presumed to be a parent under California law, and that presumption should be afforded comity. The court, sua sponte, dismissed paternity petitions to declare Anthony S the father, filed by Farah M. As a matter of comity, the Family Court recognized Kelly S.'s parentage of Z.S. and E.S., and held that Kelly S. had standing to seek custody and visitation with the subject children at a best interests hearing.

The Appellate Division held that as a matter of comity, the Family Court properly recognized Kelly S. as a parent of the children under New York law, thereby conferring standing for her to seek visitation with the children, notwithstanding the parties' failure to comply with California's artificial insemination law. It observed that in Obergefell v. Hodges (--- U.S. ----, ----, 135 S.Ct. 2584, 2607-2608, 192 L.Ed.2d 609), the United States Supreme Court granted same-sex couples the fundamental right to marry in all states, and declared that there is no lawful basis for a state to refuse to recognize a lawful same-sex marriage performed in another state based solely on its same-sex character. The Appellate Division reasoned that if Kelly S. was the parent of the children under California law, principles of comity required her to be recognized as a parent in New York. It found that under California law, Kelly S. was presumed to be the natural parent of E.S. by virtue of the parties' marriage pursuant to California Family Code § 7611(a). Furthermore, the Family Court, as a matter of comity, properly recognized Kelly S. as the parent of the children under New York law (citing Debra H. v. Janice R., 14 N.Y.3d at 600–601, 904 N.Y.S.2d 263, 930 N.E.2d 184; Counihan v. Bishop, 111 A.D.3d at 595, 974 N.Y.S.2d 137).

The Appellate Division held that the parties' failure to comply with California's artificial insemination law did not preclude the recognition of Kelly S.'s parentage under California law. The version of California Family Code § 7613 in effect at the time the order appealed from was issued provided that the parties' failure to comply with the requirements of California Family Code § 7613 only meant that the presumption established by that statute may not be relied upon to establish Kelly S.'s parentage. Kelly S. was still entitled to the presumption of parentage arising under California Family Code §§ 297.5(d), and 7611(a) and (c)(1). The Court rejected Farah M.'s argument that since the parties failed to satisfy the requirements of New York's artificial insemination law, Domestic Relations Law § 73, "the public policy of Domestic Relations Law § 73 would prohibit" recognition of Kelly S. as the parent of the children. The Appellate Division held that the failure to comply with Domestic Relations Law § 73 does not automatically preclude recognition of parental rights. In Laura WW. v. Peter WW. (51 A.D.3d 211, 856 N.Y.S.2d 258), the Appellate Division, Third Department found that "[n]either the language nor legislative history of Domestic Relations Law § 73 suggests that it was intended to be the exclusive means to establish paternity of a child born through the [artificial insemination by donor] procedure". The court relied, instead, on the common law "rebuttable presumption that ... a child born to a married woman, is the legitimate child of both parties," which the court recognized was "one of the strongest and most persuasive known to the law. It found that the decision in Laura WW. reflects that New York public policy does not preclude recognition of parental rights based upon the failure to strictly comply with Domestic Relations Law § 73. The Appellate Division also held that under the circumstances presented, the court properly determined that Farah M. may not rebut the presumption of parentage in favor of Kelly S. arising under California law by filing paternity petitions against the sperm donor, and correctly determined that Kelly S. has standing to seek visitation with the children at a best interests hearing.

U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit

Second Circuit Holds That in Determining Whether to Award Costs and Expenses under International Child Abduction Remedies Act, District Courts must Weigh Relevant Equitable Factors, Including Intimate Partner Violence.

In Souratgar v Fair, 2016 WL 1168733 (2d Cir., 2016) the Second Circuit reversed a judgment ordering Respondent Lee Jen Fair to pay to the prevailing petitioner-appellee, Abdollah Naghash Souratgar, $283,066.62 in expenses under the International Child Abduction Remedies Act, which directs district courts to issue such an order "unless the respondent establishes that such order would be clearly inappropriate.” 22 U.S.C. § 9007(b)(3). It held that the determination requires district courts to weigh relevant equitable factors, including intimate partner violence. Having reviewed all relevant equitable factors, it concluded that, because the respondent showed that the petitioner engaged in multiple, unilateral acts of intimate partner violence against her and that her removal of the child from the habitual country was related to that violence, and because there were no countervailing factors in the record in favor of the petitioner, such an award would be “clearly inappropriate.”

After Lee departed Singapore, Souratgar filed a petition in the Southern District of New York seeking the return of Shayan to Singapore as provided by the Hague Convention and ICARA. After a hearing the district court granted the petition after concluding that Souratgar had established a prima facie case under the Hague Convention and that Lee had failed to prove either of her two asserted affirmative defenses. See Souratgar I, 2012 WL 6700214, at *4–17. Lee appealed, and the Court affirmed the judgment. Souratgar II, 720 F.3d at 100. Souratgar then moved in the district court for an order directing Lee to pay his expenses related to Shayan’s return to Singapore. Lee argued that an order directing her to pay Souratgar’s expenses would be clearly inappropriate for two reasons: (1) “Souratgar’s past abusive behavior” against Lee and (2) Lee’s “inability to pay.” The district court determined that neither argument was persuasive.

Lee had argued that Article 13(b) should apply as a defense to return because, if returned to Singapore, Shayan would face a grave risk of physical and psychological harm due to Souratgar’s violence. The district court ultimately disagreed, finding no risk of physical or psychological harm to Shayan. In coming to this conclusion, the district court considered and made numerous factual findings about each party’s allegations of abuse at the hands of the other.

The district court considered Lee’s allegations that Souratgar: (1) on May 31, 2008, when Lee was pregnant, “hit and kicked her on her head and body,” ; (2) in March 2009, “struck her multiple times on her right shoulder while the child was breastfeeding in her arms,” ; (3) during an argument in late 2009 or early 2010, “took the child out of her arms and started to beat her on the head and back,” ; (4) on January 5, 2010, followed Lee to a neighbor’s house and pulled her back into the marital home, where Souratgar “continued to beat her” causing “scratches and redness on her arms where he had grabbed her,” ; (5) on August 15, 2011, when Lee met Souratgar at his office to pick up packages that belonged to her, “pulled [Lee’s] hands and also pushed” her, from which she “suffered some bruises and scratches on” her chest and hands,; (6) on November 22, 2011, chased Lee by car, attempting to overtake her vehicle “in a reckless and dangerous manner,” and (7) “forced [Lee] to engage in certain sexual acts,” The district court discredited some of these allegations, including the allegation of sexual assault, but found most of them to be credible. The district court made a factual finding that Souratgar perpetrated repeated acts of intimate partner violence against Lee.

By contrast, the district court considered Souratgar’s allegation that Lee “had tried to attack him with a knife and chopper a few times,” but found Souratgar’s “account to be exaggerated and not credible. Nowhere in the district court’s decision is there any other suggestion that Lee had committed any violence, nor have we found any in our independent review of the record.

The Second Circuit observed that ICARA's presumption of an award of expenses to a prevailing petitioner is subject to a broad caveat denoted by the words, 'clearly inappropriate.' " Whallon v. Lynn, 356 F.3d 138, 140 (1st Cir.2004). This caveat retains "the equitable nature of cost awards," so that a prevailing petitioner's presumptive entitlement to an award of expenses is "subject to the application of equitable principles by the district court." Generally, in determining whether expenses are "clearly inappropriate," courts have considered the degree to which the petitioner bears responsibility for the circumstances giving rise to the fees and costs associated with a petition. Where, as here, the respondent's removal of the child from the habitual country is related to intimate partner violence perpetrated by the petitioner against the respondent, the petitioner bears some responsibility for the circumstances giving rise to the petition. In line with this reasoning, district courts in other circuits have concluded that "family violence perpetrated by a parent is an appropriate consideration in assessing fees in a Hague case."

The Second Circuit held that the district court was therefore correct to consider Souratgar's unilateral violence in its determination of whether to order Lee to pay expenses under ICARA. See Souratgar III, 2014 WL 704037, at *9. However, it concluded that the district court exceeded its discretion in awarding expenses to Souratgar in light of its fact-finding and its related analysis of the relevant equitable factors. In the course of reviewing the petition, the district court made explicit factual findings that Lee had not committed the violent acts alleged by Souratgar but that Souratgar had repeatedly perpetrated violence against her. Souratgar I, 2012 WL 6700214, at *11. But because Lee had fled the marital home to her sister's home within Singapore before fleeing the country, the district court found that she "ha[d] not established that the past abuse of her was causally related to her decision to leave Singapore." Souratgar III, 2014 WL 704037, at *9. The Second Circuit differed with the district court's conclusion on this point. First, this finding was belied by the record: The district court found that Souratgar's violence toward Lee did not stop when she left their home. See Souratgar I, 2012 WL 6700214, at *9, *11 (discussing violent incidents in August 2011 and November 2011, after her May 2011 departure from the marital home). Second, it found that Lee's testimony showed, and Souratgar did not genuinely dispute, that her departure was related to Souratgar's history of intimate partner violence. Therefore, it found that Souratgar bears some responsibility for the circumstances giving rise to the petition.

Having reviewed all relevant equitable factors, because the respondent had shown that the petitioner engaged in multiple, unilateral acts of intimate partner violence against her and that her removal of the child from the habitual country was related to that violence, and because there were no countervailing factors in the record in favor of the petitioner, the Second Circuit held that an award of expenses would be "clearly inappropriate."

In so holding, the Court expressed no opinion about circumstances beyond the facts of this appeal, particularly where countervailing equitable factors are present. It specified that it did not attempt to catalog the possible countervailing equitable factors that a district court may properly weigh. This task is better left to the district courts to develop on a case-by-case basis so that they retain "broad discretion" in applying equitable principles to implement "the Hague Convention consistently with our own laws and standards." As a matter of clarification, it agreed with the district court that a respondent's inability to pay an award is a relevant equitable factor for courts to consider in awarding expenses under ICARA. It noted that intimate partner violence in any form is deplorable, but found that it need not determine in this matter what quantum of violence must have occurred to warrant a finding that fees are “clearly inappropriate,” given the repeated violence established in the record here. Those determinations it left to be resolved as they arise in future cases.

Given the record in this case, rather than remand, it could not envision any scenario where an award of expenses would not be clearly inappropriate, and therefore reversed the order and vacated the judgment.

Appellate Division Uphold Sanction Against Husband for Commencing Frivolous Action

In Gottlieb v Gottlieb, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2016 WL 1137304, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02135 (1st Dept.,2016) the parties, who were married in 2005, had one child, a daughter born in 2007. The parties previously stipulated that plaintiff would have primary custody of the child, and defendant withdrew his special proceeding to enjoin plaintiff from obtaining a religious divorce before a Beth Din. The Appellate Division held, inter alia, by filing and continuing a special proceeding to enjoin proceedings before the Beth Din of America, defendant engaged in frivolous within the meaning of the Part 130 rules because the action had no legal or factual merit (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c]). Plaintiff was proceeding before the Beth Din for a religious divorce based upon a binding arbitration agreement (BAA) she claimed had been signed by the parties prior to their marriage and years before defendant's stroke. Instead of examining the BAA when he was notified by the Beth Din of the hearing, defendant immediately claimed it was a forgery, largely based on his recollection that he was not in Jamaica Estates (Queens County) on November 29, 2004, the date on which the BAA was executed. Defendant seized upon certain scrivener's errors in the BAA to bolster his forgery claim, ignoring sworn attestations by two witnesses who saw him sign the BAA, the notarization, and his ability to identify the physical signature as his own, even though he had having no specific memory of its execution. It was not until one year later, at his deposition, that defendant finally acknowledged the signature was his, essentially conceding that his claim of forgery had absolutely no merit. Even then defendant delayed withdrawing his petition, waiting until the very day of the hearing to do so. By failing to fully investigate whether this claim had any legal or factual basis, defendant forced plaintiff to expend unnecessary legal fees in opposing the meritless petition. This required plaintiff's counsel to conduct discovery, including defendant's deposition, and also prepare for an unnecessary trial, that never went forward. The trial court properly awarded plaintiff legal fees incurred to defend the special proceeding as the appropriate sanction amount (22 NYCRR 130-1.1 [a]). No hearing was required to determine the amount of the fees, because the parties stipulated in writing that the issue of counsel fees could be decided upon written submissions.

The Appellate Division reversed the sanctions attributable to defendant's failure to pay his share of the forensic evaluator's fees in time for the originally scheduled trial. Defendant claimed he could not afford the expense. The trial court rejected the proffered excuse because defendant's parents were paying most of his other litigation fees. Defendant's parents, however, were under no legal or contractual obligation to pay the forensic evaluator's fees. Therefore, it was immaterial whether or not they could have done so. The trial court made no finding that defendant's expressed inability to individually pay the forensic evaluator's fees was untrue. There was no evidence that defendant, who was disabled and unable to work, had other monies available to him from which to pay the forensic evaluator's trial retainer and other fees. When the court notified both sides that the trial would not take place until the forensic evaluator's fees were paid in full, defendant offered to have these fees deducted from his remaining share of the escrowed funds. The Court held that defendant's conduct did not meet the definition of frivolous conduct (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c]), and to the extent the sanctions awarded by the trial court were attributable to the late payment of the forensic evaluator's fees, they were vacated.

The Appellate Division deemed defendant's Notice of Appeal to include his parents (who were held in contempt and fined for failure to comply with a subpoena) because they had "a united and inseverable interest in the judgment's subject matter, which itself permits no inconsistent application among the parties" (Hecht v. City of New York, 60 N.Y.2d 57, 62 [1983]). Moreover, on rare occasions, in granting relief to an appealing party, the nonappealing party may also benefit (see Cover v. Cohen, 61 N.Y.2d 261, 277-278 [1984]), particularly where, as here, the issues are hopelessly entangled (see Citnalta Constr. Corp. v. Caristo Assoc. Elec. Contr., 244 A.D.2d 252, 254 [1st Dept 1997]). Upon doing so and in consideration of the merits, it affirmed the trial court's finding of contempt in connection with defendant's parents' failure to comply with trial subpoenas and court orders directing them to produce documents for trial.

Appellate Division Holds That Supreme Court Did Not Improvidently Exercise its Discretion in Providing That the Award of Spousal Maintenance Would Be Prospective Only

In Brody v Brody, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 886300, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01630 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division affirmed, as a proper exercise of discretion, a judgment which awarded the defendant the sum of $13,000 per month in spousal maintenance for a period of 24 months. It found that the parties had been married for approximately 6½ years when the plaintiff commenced this action; the defendant was 48 years old at the time of the divorce, that she will not be the primary caretaker for the children, and she could pursue full-time employment. She was awarded $8,000 in monthly child support payments. The Supreme Courts found that that the defendant had not utilized the child support award primarily for the benefit of the children. The court additionally found that the defendant had not, over the course of this very lengthy litigation, taken any steps to prepare herself for a career despite having had the ability and opportunity to do so were supported by the record.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in providing that the award of spousal maintenance would be prospective only, and that the plaintiff would not be required to reimburse the defendant for the cost of medical insurance premiums and unreimbursed medical expenses that she paid. These determinations were supported by, among other things, the court's findings that: the defendant utilized a significant portion of the $8,000 per month child support payments to cover her own personal expenses; the defendant had the ability to become self-supporting during the litigation, but "made other choices"; and the plaintiff adequately provided for the needs of the defendant and the parties' children during the entire pendency of this litigation (citing Grumet v. Grumet, 37 AD3d 534, 536; Markopoulos v. Markopoulos, 274 A.D.2d 457, 459).

Pendente Lite Maintenance Denied Where Parties Married Two Years and Action for Divorce Pending Four Years.

In Jin C v Juliana L, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1126083, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02045 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly denied the mother's motion for pendente lite maintenance. It found that Supreme Court correctly noted that the parties were married for less than two years, that the litigation had continued for almost four years, and that after the commencement of this action, the mother transferred more than $100,000 to her family in Indonesia.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly denied the mother's motion for permission to take the child to visit Indonesia. At the custody hearing, the mother admitted leaving the marital residence with the child on December 7, 2009, and not contacting the father for the next two months to ask if he wanted to see the child. The Supreme Court properly determined that the mother was a flight risk.

Subsequent Commencement of Matrimonial Action Is Not a Ground to Dismiss a Prior Family Offense Proceeding Commenced in Family Court

In Matter of Hassan v Hassan, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 886166, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01671 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order of Family Court which dismissed the Family Offense petition, over petitioners objection, on the ground that there was a pending matrimonial action in Supreme Court. The Appellate Division observed that Domestic Relations Law § 252(1) provides that in a matrimonial action, both the Supreme Court and the Family Court "shall" entertain applications for orders of protection. Where a matrimonial action is pending in the Supreme Court, the Family Court continues to have jurisdiction over a family offense proceeding, although the Supreme Court in a matrimonial action may also adjudicate whether a spouse has committed a family offense. The subsequent commencement of the matrimonial action was not a ground to dismiss the family offense proceeding commenced in the Family Court, which should have been adjudicated on the merits, since it was commenced in a proper forum.

Support Magistrate Exceeded His Authority by Actually Providing Evidence to the Mother During the Hearing and Using His Questions to Ensure That She Introduced That Evidence

In Matter of Washington v Edwards, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 902241, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01706 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division reversed an order which held respondent in violation of a support order. It observed that a support magistrate shall conduct the hearing in the same manner as a court trying an issue without a jury in conformance with the procedures set forth in the [CPLR]" (22 NYCRR 205.35[a]; see Family Ct Act § 439[d]). After the mother testified that the father had only paid approximately $100 a year in support since the order, she said she did not have any documentary evidence to support her allegation. At the conclusion of her testimony, the Support Magistrate questioned the mother as to whether she had any further evidence in regard to her petition. After she answered in the negative, the Support Magistrate provided her with a copy of the Broome County Office of Child Support Enforcement Support Obligation Summary, which summarized the amounts owed and the payment history regarding the 2010 order and indicated that the father was in arrears. Over the father's objection, the Support Magistrate then questioned the mother regarding the contents of the summary. At the conclusion of the case, the Support Magistrate repeated his question to the mother as to whether she had any documents that she would like to enter into evidence. After she again answered in the negative, the Support Magistrate inquired whether the mother was requesting that the summary report be admitted into evidence, at which point she answered affirmatively and, over the father's continued objections, the document was admitted into evidence. The Support Magistrate thereafter used the contents of the summary report as the basis for his calculation of the amount that the father was in arrears. The Appellate Division held that while a Support Magistrate "may properly question witnesses to insure that a proper foundation is made for the admission of evidence and question a witness in an effort to clarify confusing testimony as well as to facilitate the orderly and expeditious progress of the hearing" the Support Magistrate exceeded his authority here. By actually providing the evidence to the mother during the hearing and using his questions to ensure that she introduced that evidence, it could not say that the Support Magistrate was merely ensuring that a proper foundation was set for the admission of the evidence or facilitating the expeditious progress of the hearing.

Failure to Submit Affidavits Required by Domestic Relations Law § 237 Warrants Denial of Counsel Fees

In Stuart v Stuart, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1165330, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02185 (4th Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division found that the trial court failed to comply with Domestic Relations Law § 237 when it ordered plaintiff to pay $2,000 in counsel fees without an affidavit from either party "detailing the financial agreement[] between the party and the attorney. Such affidavit shall include the amount of any retainer, the amounts paid and still owing thereunder, the hourly amount charged by the attorney, the amounts paid, or to be paid, any experts, and any additional costs, disbursements or expenses." An affidavit of that type is not included in the record for either party. Because [defendant] did not submit documentation identifying the services rendered by her attorney or the fees incurred, the court was precluded from awarding attorney's fees to her.

Appellate Division Holds That Petitioner's Reaction to Communications Alleged to Constitute Harassment Is Immaterial in Establishing Respondent's Intent to Commit That Family Offense

In Matter of Shephard v Ray, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 1164779, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 02239 (4th Dept.,2016) the order of protection was based upon the Referee's finding that respondent told petitioner during a lengthy telephone call that he did not know what he would do if he saw her with another man, sent her two or three text messages stating that he hoped to reconcile with her, and then left on petitioner's car several mementos that petitioner had given him along with the message that he would "never forget [her], bye." The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that under Penal Law § 240.26[3] "A person is guilty of harassment in the second degree when, with intent to harass, annoy or alarm another person ... [h]e or she engages in a course of conduct or repeatedly commits acts which alarm or seriously annoy such other person and which serve no legitimate purpose" . The intent element may be inferred from conduct as well as the surrounding circumstances. (People v. Kelly, 79 AD3d 1642, 1642). It found that the evidence of intent was legally insufficient. Notwithstanding the Referee's implicit finding that petitioner was upset by the communications, her reaction is immaterial in establishing respondent's intent (People v. Caulkins, 82 AD3d 1506, 1507). Furthermore, the circumstances failed to establish that respondent acted with the requisite intent. The conduct was comprised of relatively innocuous acts that were insufficient to establish that respondent engaged in a course of conduct with the intent to harass, alarm or annoy petitioner.

Appellate Division Holds That While Visitation to Parent Conditioned on Child's Wishes Is Disfavored Giving Daughter Discretion with Respect to Her Mid-week Visitation Did Not Tend Unnecessarily to Defeat Right of Visitation.

In Anonymous 2011-1 v Anonymous 2011-2, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 718286, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01275 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which modified the custody provisions of the parties judgment of divorce which provided that the parties shared residential custody of the children on alternating weeks, to award the mother primary residential custody of parties' two children, and awarded the parties joint legal custody and decision-making authority. The Appellate Division held that although the parties were antagonistic toward one another the record supported the court's finding that, despite their antagonism, the parties had been able to agree on most decisions concerning the children. The record supported the court's finding that if either parent were awarded sole decision-making authority, there would be a danger that it would be used to exclude the other parent from meaningful participation in the children's lives. In addition, the court appointed a parenting coordinator, who could assist the parents in resolving any disputes they may have concerning decisions about the children.

The Appellate Division rejected the father's contention that the Supreme Court erred in giving the daughter discretion with respect to her mid-week visitation with him. It stated that it is true that awarding visitation to a parent conditioned on the child's wishes is disfavored where it "tends unnecessarily to defeat the right of visitation." However, in this case, the Supreme Court awarded the father mid-week visitation with the daughter in the weeks before the mother's weekends, with the daughter to have "the option to spend either Wednesday night or Thursday night, or both, at the father's home." It found that while the provision conferred upon the daughter a limited measure of flexibility regarding the timing and duration of her mid-week visitation with the father, it did not tend unnecessarily to defeat the right of visitation.

Postnuptial Agreement Signed by Notary Public Was Not Properly Acknowledged, and Therefore Was Unenforceable.

In Ballesteros v Ballesteros, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 803152, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01450 (2d Dept.,2016) prior to their marriage the parties signed a prenuptial agreement "opting-out" of New York's statutory scheme governing maintenance and equitable distribution. In 2009, after they were married the husband agreed to sign a document entitled "Promissory Note" in which he agreed to purchase a condominium for the wife, in the event of a divorce, in an amount not less than $250,000. The wife drafted the agreement, and both she and the husband signed it. The husband told the wife he would return the agreement to her after he had it notarized. A notary signed the agreement but did not attach a certificate of acknowledgment. In reversing the judgement which enforced the agreement, the Appellate Division found that the agreement, despite its title of a "Promissory Note," was an agreement between spouses subject to Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3). Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3), "[a]n agreement by the parties, made before or during the marriage, shall be valid and enforceable in a matrimonial action if such agreement is in writing, subscribed by the parties, and acknowledged or proven in the manner required to entitle a deed to be recorded." A written agreement between parties made before or during a marriage which does not meet the formalities of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3) is not enforceable (Galetta v. Galetta, 21 N.Y.3d 186; Matisoff v. Dobi, 90 N.Y.2d 127). Therefore, a postnuptial agreement that is signed but not acknowledged is invalid and unenforceable in a matrimonial action. Here, although the postnuptial agreement was signed by a notary public, it was not properly acknowledged. Therefore, the agreement was unenforceable.

Appeals That Are Not Based upon Complete and Proper Records must Be Dismissed.

In Bousson v Bousson, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 718254 (Mem), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01279 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division dismissed the appeal from an order which failed to award appellant counsel fees. It pointed out that it is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal that contains all of the relevant papers; appeals that are not based upon complete and proper records must be dismissed. The appendix submitted by the appellant did not include the trial transcript which was the basis for the court's determination after trial, with respect to his motion for an award of counsel fees. Since the appellant has failed to submit a record that would enable the Court to render an informed decision on the merits, the appeal from that portion of the judgment was dismissed

Error to Delegate to Father Authority to Determine If Mother Should Have Visitation

In Matter of Harrell v Fox, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 818912, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01534 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division held, inter alia, that it is error to delegate to the father complete authority to determine whether there should be any visitation between the mother and children and under what conditions such contact should occur.

Court's "Mixed Record" Format Utilized to Obtain the Child's Testimony in Custody Proceeding Improper. Practice of Calling Child as Witness Discourage.

In Matter of Gonzalez v Hunter, 2016 WL 819016 (3d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division pointed out that several weeks before the trial commenced the Family Court conducted what it referred to as an "in camera" appearance with the child during which counsel for the parties and the attorney for the child were present, but not the parents. The court characterized the proceeding as a "mixed record," in that the court would consider the child's testimony in making findings of fact, but the record would be sealed to the extent that neither party would have access. The attorney for the child reminded the court at the start that the father's attorney was calling the child as a fact witness. No objections were raised, and the child was questioned under oath on both direct and cross-examination as to certain visitation events, as well as her preferences for continued visitation with the mother and where she wanted to live. The Appellate Division expressed its concern with Court's "mixed record" format utilized to obtain the child's testimony noting that in the context of a Family

Ct Act article 6 proceeding, the Court has emphasized that a Lincoln hearing is the preferred manner for ascertaining a child's wishes. The fundamental reason is that a child being asked to explain his or her preferences should not be placed in the position of having [his or her] relationship with either parent further jeopardized by having to publicly relate [his or her] difficulties with them or be required to openly choose between them. (Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d 270, 272 [1969]) A true Lincoln hearing is conducted in confidence with the court, with only the attorney for the child in attendance. While the premise for this hearing was the father's request to present the child as a fact witness, calling a child to testify in a Family Ct Act article 6 proceeding is generally neither necessary nor appropriate. This format does not adequately protect the child's right to confidentiality or foster the primary purpose of a Lincoln hearing that allows a child to openly share his or her concerns with the court. The Court concluded: "Going forward, absent a defined reason for calling the child as a fact witness, we discourage this practice."

Trial Court Must Follow Precise Requirements of CSSA in Determining Whether to Direct Payment For Cost of Private School Education, and Summer, Extracurricular and Weekend Activities

In Michael J.D. v Carolina E.P., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 634821, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01252 (1st Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division held that because the trial court did not follow the precise requirements of the CSSA in determining that the plaintiff-father pay certain expenses over basic child support, consisting of private school education, and summer, extracurricular and weekend activities over and above basic child support and that because there otherwise was insufficient support in the record for their payment, the trial court decision on child support should be modified.

The Court observed that CSSA first requires a calculation of child support amount (Domestic Relations Laws 240[1-b][b][3]). It then allows for the payment of certain categories of enumerated add on expenses, prorated according to the parents' relative incomes. The add on expenses expressly addressed in the CSSA are: (1) child care; (2) health insurance and unreimbursed medical expenses; and (3) educational expenses. Not expressly delineated as add on expenses in the statute are summer, extra curricular and/or weekend activities. Basic child support, when calculated properly, is presumed to meet all the child's basic needs. Thus, the expenses of leisure, extracurricular and enrichment activities, such as after school clubs, sporting activities, etc., are usually not awarded separately, but are encompassed within the basic child support award. A court cannot order a parent to pay for these expenses over and above basic child support. If a court does so, however, it is a deviation from the basic statutory formula and requires an analysis under the commonly referred to paragraph "f" factors. Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f] (Family Court Act § 413[1][f]) "[u]nless the court finds that the non-custodial parent[s] pro-rata share of the basic child support obligation is unjust or inappropriate, which finding shall be based upon consideration of [certain] factors” enumerated in the CSSA, the child support calculation under the statute is presumptively correct. There are 10 enumerated factors to consider before deviating (Family Court Act § [1][f]; Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f]). Although all the factors do not have to present, the court needs to articulate its reasons for making such a deviation from basic child support and relate those reasons to the statutory paragraph f factors.

At the support trial defendant testified that plaintiff had enrolled the child (then only a few months old), in swimming classes with a private instructor, as well as in a weekend music class and a song and stories class. According to defendant, plaintiff had told her he wanted the child to attend a private school, such as Trinity, which she believed cost $22,000 per year. Once she and plaintiff separated, however, the lessons stopped. At the time of trial the child, then two years old, was not enrolled in any school program. Defendant testified that she intended to be a full time mother to their son.

The trial court determined that plaintiff's adjusted gross income for child support purposes was $128,741.40., and that the parties' combined parental income was $128,741.40 and that the basic child support obligation was $21,886.04 per annum ($1,823.84 per month). This obligation was prorated 100% to plaintiff and 0% to defendant. Add on costs, for health insurance, unreimbursed medical costs, education and extracurricular activities were awarded to be paid over and above basic child support and were allocated 100% to plaintiff and 0% to defendant.

The trial court ordered that commencing with the 2013–14 academic year until the child's graduation from high school, plaintiff was required to contribute 100% of private school tuition up to the cost of tuition for Trinity School in New York City. Education expenses are an expressly enumerated add on expense that may be awarded according to the specific statutory standard. Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][c][7] (Family Court Act § 413[1][c][7]). The Appellate Division held that while a court may direct a parent to contribute to a child's educational expenses, “even in the absence of special circumstances or a voluntary agreement of the parties, in order to do so, the court must consider the circumstances of the case, the circumstances of the respective parties, the best interests of the children, and the requirements of justice (see Family Court Act § 413[1][c][7]; Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f]; Manno v. Manno, 196 A.D.2d 488, 491 [2d Dept 1993]). The trial court articulated no reason for ordering plaintiff to pay for private school, other than the informal discussions the parties had about their son's future while they briefly lived together, when the child was only a few months old. At the time of trial, the child was not yet school age, he was not enrolled in any regular educational program, and there was no record that the child has any special needs or gifts. The Court held that the circumstances of these parties and their son did not present a justifiable basis to impose a private school obligation on plaintiff. Plaintiff's income, as it was determined by the trial court even after drawing adverse inferences to his claims, was not at a sufficiently high level that it alone provided a sufficient basis for requiring private school for the child.

The court also ordered that, commencing with the 2012–13 academic year until the child's graduation from high school, plaintiff was responsible for paying 100% of the child's extracurricular activities including after school, weekend and summer activities. No benchmark was provided on what these activities could include and there was no cap on how much they could cost. These expenses are not expressly enumerated add on expenses in the CSSA and the trial court failed to articulate why a deviation requiring their separate payment was appropriate in this case. While under certain circumstances these expenses may appropriately be considered an add on for child care (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][4]; Family Court Act § 413[1][c][4]), here no recovery of child care costs was requested or warranted because defendant did not work or go to school and it was not her intention to do so. Consequently, in order for these additional expenses to be properly added to basic child support, the trial court needed to articulate the basis for the deviation.. Given the parties' brief time living as a family, it could not be said that a standard of living was established for the child. The trial court primarily based its award on the conclusion that had the family remained intact, the child, as the son of a lawyer, would have probably enjoyed a certain standard of living. The consideration of this solitary factor, coupled with the court's own determination of the parties' financial resources, did not, however, support the addition of unlimited add on extracurricular expenses that deviate from basic child support.

Transfer of Residence to Qualified Personal Residence Trust During Marriage Insufficient to Change its Character as Marital Property

In Yerushalmi v Yerushalmi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 514225, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 00969 (2d Dept.,2016) during the parties marriage the plaintiff transferred title to the marital residence, which was bought during the marriage, to a qualified personal residence trust (QPRT). The parties continued to reside at the marital residence during the marriage. The QPRT provided that it would terminate upon the death of the plaintiff or after 23 years, whichever occurred first. If the plaintiff died prior to the expiration of the 23-year period, the property would be disposed of as part of the plaintiff's estate. If the QPRT terminated after 23 years, the property would revert to the beneficiaries. The parties were initially co-trustees of the QPRT, and the beneficiary of the QPRT is another trust, of which the defendant was the grantor. In June 2013, after the commencement of this action for divorce, before the parties were divorced, the defendant listed the marital residence for sale. The plaintiff moved to direct the defendant to remove the marital residence from the real estate market and enjoin him from selling or transferring the marital residence, and for an award of attorneys' fees. The Supreme Court, held that it was not a marital asset because it was owned by the QPRT, and not by the parties, denied the motion. The Appellate Division reversed. It pointed out that Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(1)(c) defines marital property as "all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the ... commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held." Since the marital residence was purchased by the parties during their marriage, using marital funds, it was presumed to be marital property. The fact that title had been transferred to the QPRT, allegedly for estate planning purposes, while the parties continued to reside at the marital residence, was, under the circumstances here, insufficient to rebut the presumption.

Appellate Division Holds There Is No Statutory Authority Expressly Granting Jurisdiction to Family Court to Litigate Issue of Child Support Arrears after the Death of a Parent-obligor

In Matter of Haber v Strax, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 618932, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 01179 (2d Dept.,2016) a Supreme Court order, which incorporated but did not merge with the parties stipulation of settlement, directed the father to pay 2/3 of the unreimbursed nonelective medical expenses of the parties' two children. It provided that the Supreme Court retained "jurisdiction of the matter concurrently with the Family Court for the purpose of specifically enforcing such of the provisions of the [stipulation of settlement] as are capable of specific enforcement to the extent permitted by law, and of making such further judgment with respect to support, custody, or visitation as it finds appropriate under the circumstances existing at the time application for that purpose is made to it." In 2011 the mother filed a cross petition in the Family Court, seeking to collect the father's 2/3 share of the unreimbursed medical expenses. The father died while the mother's cross petition was still pending. The Support Magistrate dismissed the cross petition on the ground that the Family Court no longer had subject matter jurisdiction to entertain it pursuant to Family Court Act § 451 since the mother was not seeking to enforce a Family Court order, but rather to enforce the March 30, 1998, Supreme Court order. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that Family Court Act § 451 gives the Family Court continuing jurisdiction over any order it issued relating to child support. Here, Family Court Act § 451 did not confer continuing jurisdiction on the Family Court because the mother's cross petition sought to enforce a Supreme Court order, not a Family Court order. In addition, while the 1998, Supreme Court order granted concurrent jurisdiction to the Family Court to enforce the provisions of the parties' stipulation of settlement, it expressly gave the Family Court jurisdiction, only "to the extent permitted by law," to enforce those provisions which were capable of specific enforcement. Because the Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction, it may only exercise those powers specifically granted to it by statute (see Matter of Silver v. Silver, 36 N.Y.2d 324, 325). There is no statutory authority expressly granting jurisdiction to the Family Court to litigate the issue of child support arrears after the death of a parent-obligor. Thus, the mother failed to establish that, after the father's death, the Family Court was "permitted by law" to enforce the support provisions of the March 30, 1998, Supreme Court order.

Fourth Department Holds Wife Entitled to Recoupment of Child Support Payments

In Weidner v Weidner, 2016 WL 534002 (4th Dept.,2016) Supreme Court directed the plaintiff husband to pay the wife $3,000 per month in maintenance for a period of three years, directed the wife to pay $142.53 per week in child support, and awarded defendant wife $5,000 in counsel fees. The Appellate Division held that the court "erred in including the amount of maintenance awarded to the wife in determining her income for the purpose of calculating the amount of child support that she was required to pay to plaintiff. When the amount of maintenance was omitted from the calculation of defendant's income, defendant's income fell below the poverty line, and thus the court erred in directing defendant to pay plaintiff more than the sum of $25 per month in child support (see Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][d]).

The Appellate Division held that the wife was entitled to recoupment of her child support overpayments, and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to determine the amount of recoupment that plaintiff owed to defendant. Although there is a strong public policy against recoupment of child support overpayments it concluded that recoupment was appropriate under the limited circumstances of this case. The defendant's income was below the poverty level, and that plaintiff held a high-income job. Requiring plaintiff to repay the child support erroneously ordered by the court would not detract from plaintiff fulfilling the needs of the children while they were in his care and, would restore needed funds to defendant that would assist her in maintaining a suitable household for the children and in meeting their reasonable needs during visitation.

Party Challenging Agreement as Manifestly Unfair Due to Husband's Overreaching must Show Overreaching in the Execution, Such Concealment of Facts, Misrepresentation, Cunning, Cheating, Sharp Practice, or Some Other Form of Deception; and That the Overreaching Resulted in Terms So Manifestly Unfair as to Warrant Equity's Intervention.

In Gottlieb v Gottlieb, 2016 WL 325517 (1st Dept.,2016) in anticipation of their planned marriage, plaintiff husband and defendant the wife entered into a prenuptial agreement, which was the product of months of negotiations among the parties and their attorneys. Prior to the agreement's execution, the wife's counsel, an experienced matrimonial practitioner, advised her not to sign it, but the wife ignored that advice.

The wife moved to set aside the agreement, claiming, inter alia, it was the product of overreaching resulting in manifestly unfair terms. The motion court dismissed the wife's claim that the entire agreement was unenforceable, but reserved for trial the issue of whether the agreement's maintenance provisions were fair and reasonable when entered into and whether they were unconscionable at present. The Appellate Division sustained the validity of the entire agreement, including the maintenance provisions.

The wife had not worked outside the home for several years. The husband, was the majority owner of a hedge fund. Prior to the engagement, the husband told the wife that he would not marry her unless there was a prenuptial agreement, and the parties began to discuss terms. In October 2005, while negotiations were ongoing, the wife learned that she was pregnant. In early 2007, the husband's counsel sent a draft agreement to the wife's counsel. In a letter dated March 2, 2007, the wife's attorney proposed changes to the draft, many of which were incorporated into the final agreement. The letter stated that the wife "understands all that she is potentially giving up by virtue of this Agreement." In April 2007, the wife learned that she was pregnant again, and told her counsel that she wanted to execute a prenuptial agreement as soon as possible. In a letter dated April 20, 2007, the husband's counsel sent the wife's counsel a list of revisions to the draft agreement, incorporating many of the changes that had been proposed by the wife's counsel. The husband's counsel also sent a statement outlining the husband's financial circumstances. On April 27, 2007, the wife went to her counsel's office and signed the agreement. The wife ignored her counsel's advice not to sign the agreement. Several days later, the husband executed the agreement. The parties were married in May 2007 and their second daughter was born in November 2007.

The prenuptial agreement contained all of the usual boilerplate clauses. Although each party waived any right to equitable distribution, the agreement provided that, for each year of the marriage (up to a maximum of 15 years), the husband agreed to deposit into an investment account the sum of $300,000. In the event of divorce, the wife would receive these funds along with any accrued interest. The parties agreed to divide equally all wedding gifts, and real property and financial accounts registered in both parties' names. Any other marital property would be divided in proportion to each party's financial contribution to the asset. If there were minor children of the marriage at the time of divorce, the husband agreed to purchase, at his total cost and expense, an apartment for the use of the wife and the children. The apartment was required to be in a full-service doorman building located between 60th and 80th Streets and Third Avenue and Broadway, above the third floor and with one bedroom each for the wife and the children. The husband agreed to pay the maintenance charges, utilities, and other expenses of the apartment, until all of the children reached the age of majority, at which point the wife would vacate the apartment. The husband also was obligated to pay the wife's and children's moving expenses to the apartment. The agreement also provided that two specified Manhattan apartments, including the residence occupied by the parties during their relationship, shall remain the husband's separate property. With respect to spousal support, the parties each acknowledged that in light of his or her assets, education, employment history, and rights under the agreement, he or she is "self-supporting and has sufficient ability to maintain a reasonable and satisfactory standard of living." Nevertheless, in the event of divorce, the husband agreed to pay the wife, as taxable maintenance, the sum of $12,500 per month, as long as there was a child of the marriage under the age of four. This amount was in addition to the husband's agreement to purchase, and pay all costs for, an apartment for the wife to live in. The husband also agreed to pay, as nontaxable maintenance, the wife's health insurance, until the parties' children were emancipated. Aside from these provisions, the parties waived any additional spousal maintenance and acknowledged that such waiver was fair and reasonable. In the spousal support section of the agreement, the wife waived any right to counsel fees, both interim and final. In the event of divorce, the husband agreed to leave, either outright or in trust, a specified percentage of his estate to the children of the marriage. Financial statements annexed to the agreement listed each parties' assets, liabilities and net worth, although the parties' incomes were not included. The husband and the wife explicitly acknowledged that, upon being advised by counsel, each fully understood the financial information provided by the other, and recognized that their financial circumstances could be considerably different at the time of dissolution of the marriage.

The Appellate Division observed that a prenuptial agreement is presumed to be valid and controlling unless and until the party challenging it meets his or her very high burden to set it aside (Anonymous v. Anonymous, 123 A.D.3d 581, 582, 999 N.Y.S.2d 386 [1st Dept 2014]). Setting aside of a prenuptial agreement is "the exception rather than the rule," and the burden of establishing fraud, duress or overreaching is on the party seeking to set aside the agreement. The wife's only claim was that the agreement was manifestly unfair due to the husband's overreaching (see Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 72). Although no actual fraud need be shown to set aside the agreement on this ground, the challenging party must show overreaching in the execution, such as the concealment of facts, misrepresentation, cunning, cheating, sharp practice, or some other form of deception. In addition, the challenging party must show that the overreaching resulted in terms so manifestly unfair as to warrant equity's intervention.

The Court held that judged by these standards, the wife failed to meet her heavy burden to set aside the prenuptial agreement. The wife complained that she was unaware of the husband's exact income at the time she executed the agreement. However, the mere fact that the husband did not include his income in his financial disclosure, standing alone, is not a basis to set the agreement aside (see Strong, 48 A.D.3d at 233, 851 N.Y.S.2d 428. There was no claim by the wife that the husband concealed or misrepresented his income. The wife lived with the husband and was aware of the luxurious lifestyle his income and assets afforded, even if the precise amount of the income was unknown to her. The substantial financial disparity between the parties was fully disclosed at the time the agreement was executed in a statement attached to the agreement. The wife, who has a degree in economics and had worked in the finance field, specifically acknowledged in the agreement that she fully understood the information provided.

There was no merit to the wife's contention that the husband's behavior during her two pregnancies warranted setting aside the agreement. According to the wife, the husband told her that he would not enter into a prenuptial agreement, and thus would not marry her, until after the birth of their first child. The wife alleged that the husband told her that he would end their relationship if she terminated her second pregnancy. The Court pointed out that it had held that similar behavior is insufficient to invalidate a prenuptial agreement. For example, it held that a threat to a pregnant woman to cancel the wedding if she refused to sign the agreement provided no basis to set the agreement aside. Likewise, it declined to invalidate a prenuptial agreement where the wife believed that there would be no wedding if she did not sign the agreement. The wife's argument that she had no meaningful choice due to the husband's actions was belied by the fact that she knowingly entered into the agreement against the advice of her counsel.

The Court noted that the wife failed to make the requisite showing that the agreement's terms were manifestly unfair. Viewing the parties' prenuptial agreement in its entirety, it could not be said that its terms were manifestly unfair. For the purpose of the decision, the Court accepted as true the wife's description of the circumstances underlying the execution of the agreement, and conclude that her claims did not support a finding of overreaching.

The wife's description of herself as being in the "precarious position of negotiating as an unmarried mother," was at odds with the fact that she was represented by experienced matrimonial counsel who negotiated the agreement over an extended period of time. Likewise, the dissent all but ignored the fact that the wife, an educated college graduate, signed the agreement against the express advice of her own counsel. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the dissent's implication, the Court of Appeals' decision in Christian (42 N.Y.2d at 63) does not hold that a prenuptial agreement is manifestly unfair when it does not result in a continuation of the marital standard of living. It disagreed with the concurrence's view that because the parties were not married at the time the agreement was executed, the manifest unfairness standard set forth in Christian (42 N.Y.2d at 63) had no applicability here.

The Court found that the maintenance provisions here were neither unfair nor unreasonable at the time the agreement was entered into. Nor were the maintenance provisions unconscionable as applied to the present circumstances. An agreement will be viewed as unconscionable only if the inequality is so strong and manifest as to shock the conscience and confound the judgment of any person of common sense. An unconscionable agreement is one which no person in his or her senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and which no honest and fair person would accept on the other. Judged by these standards, no unconscionability existed.

The motion court granted the wife interim counsel fees in the amount of $50,000. The Appellate Division rejected the husband's contention that the wife's waiver in the prenuptial agreement of interim and final counsel fees barred any fee award. Because the prenuptial agreement did not cover child-related matters, the waiver did not preclude an award of counsel fees connected to litigating the child support issues raised in the motion (see Vinik v. Lee, 96 A.D.3d 522, 523, 947 N.Y.S.2d 424 [1st Dept 2012]). Likewise, legal fees related to the exclusive occupancy aspect of the motion were recoverable because the heart of that dispute was the children's best interests, and the place where the children will be living, which are child-related matters. However, because it was not clear what portion of the $50,000 sought is connected to child-related issues, the matter was remanded for further development of the record as to how much of the fee request involved those issues.

Offensive Remarks on Memo Portion of Check Violates Order of Protection Which Prohibited Any Form of Communication

In Matter of Clovis v Clovis, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 400156 (Mem), 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 00682 (2d Dept.,2016) the mother testified that the father violated the terms of an order of protection dated January 3, 2013, by communicating with her by mail. Specifically, instead of making his child support payments through alternate means, she alleged that the father knowingly and intentionally mailed to her seven checks for child support and that, on three of the checks, he had written offensive remarks in the memo portion. After a hearing, the Family Court stated that the memos on three checks "may be offensive" but dismissed the petition.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the mother established by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the father, by mailing the child support checks, three of which contained offensive comments to the mother, willfully violated the order of protection, which expressly prohibited any form of communication by the father with the mother, including the use of mail. The father admitted at the hearing that he had communicated with the mother by mail, despite being aware that the order of protection prohibited such communication.

Email Attached to Post-hearing Submission Is Not Competent Proof

In Wagner v Wagner, N.Y.S.3d ---, 2016 WL 444677, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 00847(4th Dept, 2016) the Appellate Division restated the general rule that expenses incurred prior to the commencement of a divorce action constitute marital debt and should be equally shared by the parties. Where, however, the indebtedness is incurred by one party for his or her exclusive benefit or in pursuit of his or her separate interests, the obligation should remain that party's separate liability. It held that the court erred in considering an email, from plaintiff to his counsel, calculating the amount of accrued interest incurred on defendant's share of the marital debt, as sufficient proof of the offset amount which resulted in defendant owing plaintiff money. Such an "unauthenticated document appended to plaintiff's post-hearing submission and not received in evidence at trial was not competent proof and, therefore, should not have been relied upon by the court.

Second Department Opinion Construes the terms "good cause" for an extension of an Order of Protection for a "reasonable period of time" in Family Court Act §842

In Molloy v Molloy, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 229641, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 00366 (2d Dept.,2016) family Court found that the respondent committed family offenses and issued a two-year order of protection in favor of the petitioner and the parties' child.. As the expiration date of the order of protection approached, the petitioner moved to extend it for five years, arguing that there was "good cause" for the extension, citing Family Court Act § 842. In her supporting affidavit, the petitioner alleged that the respondent had violated the order of protection by, for example, showing up at her apartment and banging on the door, and driving his vehicle too closely to the petitioner, a wheelchair user, while she was on her way to a police station for a custody exchange. Fearing for her safety, she reported some of these incidents to the police. She alleged that he had recently been arrested for violating the order of protection, and that the case was pending in the Criminal Court. The petitioner also claimed that the respondent's girlfriend warned her that the respondent said that when the petitioner's order of protection expired he would return to her residence, and he threatened to kill her. The petitioner also noted that because she and the respondent had a child in common they had to frequently interact regarding the child's visitation. The petitioner claimed that the respondent's conduct during the course of their interactions over the past several years had so terrified her that she carried a panic alarm whenever she left her home. She feared that once the order of protection expired the respondent would begin harassing her again and might harm or kill her. Family Court denied the petitioner's motion to extend the Family Court order of protection, holding that because the petitioner had by then already been granted a two-year order of protection in Criminal Court, the goal behind Family Court Act § 842 was accomplished and, thus, the petitioner had not demonstrated good cause to extend the order of protection.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Criminal Court's issuance of an order of protection did not negate or otherwise render superfluous the petitioner's request for an extension of her Family Court order of protection. Each court has the authority to issue temporary or final orders of protection.

The Appellate Division observed that Family Court Act §842 provides, in pertinent part, that a court "may ..., upon motion, extend [an] order of protection for a reasonable period of time upon a showing of good cause or consent of the parties." The Appellate Division held that in determining whether good cause has been established, courts should consider, but are not limited by, the following factors: the nature of the relationship between the parties, taking into account their former relationship, the circumstances leading up to the entry of the initial order of protection, and the state of the relationship at the time of the request for an extension; the frequency of interaction between the parties; any subsequent instances of domestic violence or violations of the existing order of protection; and whether the current circumstances are such that concern for the safety and well-being of the petitioner is reasonable.

Here, the petitioner stated that, because they had a child in common, and the parties continued to interact. They come into contact during litigation over custody and visitation issues and when they exchange the child at the drop-off location at the police station. The respondent also had a history of assaulting the petitioner, and their on-going discord continued. There was no evidence in the record to suggest that the petitioner's more serious allegations were contrived. Since the entry of the order of protection, the respondent had pleaded guilty in the Criminal Court to disorderly conduct, and the Criminal Court has issued a two-year order of protection in favor of the petitioner. Therefore, it was clear from the record that the petitioner's fear that the respondent may stalk, harass, or attack her was well-founded, and that the unavoidable interactions between the parties may subject her to a reoccurrence of violence. Accordingly, it found that there was good cause to extend the order of protection.

The Appellate Division noted that Family Court Act § 842 grants a court the discretion to extend the order of protection for a "reasonable period of time." It was evident from the Legislature's use of the term "reasonable" that it wanted to give the courts flexibility to fashion an appropriate time period for the order of protection based on the particular circumstances of the parties. The court held that the length of an extension should be viewed in the context of the facts of the case. Here there was a prior finding that the respondent committed family offenses against the petitioner that led to the initial order of protection. While the request for an extension of that order of protection was pending, the respondent pleaded guilty to disorderly conduct and a two-year order of protection was issued in Criminal Court in favor of the petitioner. The parties will continue to interact when exchanging the child so that the respondent may visit with him, and when litigating over custody and visitation issues. Considering these circumstances, the Appellate Division concluded that five years was a reasonable period of time to extend the order of protection.

Second Department Holds That Unacknowledged Mahr Agreement Signed by the Parties and Two Witnesses and Incorporated into Foreign Judgment of Divorce Properly Recognized under Principles of Comity, as No Strong Public Policy of New York Was Violated

In Badawi v Badawi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 230400, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. (2d Dept.,2016) the parties were married in New York in a civil ceremony, and, thereafter, were married in New York in a religious ceremony under Islamic law. As part of the religious ceremony, the parties signed a mahr agreement requiring the defendant to make an advanced payment to the plaintiff in the amount of $5,000 and, in the event of divorce, a deferred payment in the amount of $250,000. While the parties were living in Abu Dhabi, the plaintiff sought and obtained a judgment of divorce against the defendant in the Abu Dhabi courts, which awarded the plaintiff custody of the parties' children and financial relief, including an award of $250,000 pursuant to the mahr agreement. The plaintiff commenced an action, inter alia, for a judgment declaring that the foreign judgment of divorce was valid and enforceable in New York. Her motion to enforce the judgment of divorce and for an attorney's fee with respect to the prosecution of the motion was granted and the Appellate Division affirmed.

The Appellate Division held that although not required to do so, the courts of this State generally will accord recognition to the judgments rendered in a foreign country under the doctrine of comity which is the equivalent of full faith and credit given by the courts to judgments of our sister States". Comity should be extended to uphold the validity of a foreign divorce decree absent a showing of fraud in its procurement or that recognition of the judgment would do violence to a strong public policy of New York. In extending comity to uphold the validity of a foreign divorce decree, New York courts will generally recognize all the provisions of such decrees, including any agreement which may have been incorporated therein, unless modification is required by reason of some compelling public policy. Here, the mahr agreement, although not acknowledged in accordance with Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(3), was signed by the parties and two witnesses, as well as the Imam of the Islamic Cultural Center of New York. It held that under the circumstances presented, Supreme Court properly recognized so much of the foreign judgment of divorce as incorporated the mahr agreement under the principles of comity, as no strong public policy of New York was violated thereby (see Greschler v. Greschler, 51 N.Y.2d 368; Rabbani v. Rabbani, 178 A.D.2d 637).

Pro Se Litigant Not entitled to Greater Rights than Litigant Represented by Counsel

In Matter of Chana J.A. v Barry S., 2016 WL 143508 (2d Dept.,2016) the Appellate Division, in rejecting the fathers contentions that he was denied a fair hearing due to his status as a pro se litigant, held that a litigant does not, by appearing pro se, have any greater right than any other litigant. Moreover, a litigant may not use his or her pro se status as an excuse for depriving opposing parties of their own procedural rights (see Mirzoeff v. Nagar, 52 AD3d 789).

Family Court

Family Court Holds that Party is Entitled to Bill of Particulars in Family Offense Case

In Carlos L v Sandy C., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2016 WL 300817, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26019 Fam. Ct., 2016), a family offense proceeding , the Family Court granted the respondents, motion for an order compelling the petitioner, to serve a bill of particulars in response to respondent's demand. It rejected petitioner's argument that Civil Practice Law and Rules § 408 requires that leave of court be obtained prior to seeking disclosure in a family offense proceeding. Respondent served a demand for a bill of particulars concerning the family offense petition. The purpose of a bill of particulars is to amplify the pleadings, limit the proof, and prevent surprise at trial. Under such circumstances, leave of court is unnecessary to serve a demand for a bill of particulars, regardless of whether a family offense proceeding constitutes a "special proceeding".

Petition By Non-biological Father to Vacate Acknowledgment of Attorney Dismissed Where Best Interest of Child Warrants Petitioner Be Equitably Estopped from Denying Paternity

In Matter of Luis Hugo O. v. Paola O., 129 A.D.3d 976, 12 N.Y.S.3d 183, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 05195 (2d Dept., 2015) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, after a hearing, dismissed the petition to vacate an acknowledgment of paternity which was executed by the petitioner based upon a mistake of fact. It pointed out that a party seeking to challenge an acknowledgment of paternity more than 60 days after its execution must prove that it was signed by reason of fraud, duress, or material mistake of fact (Family Ct. Act § 516-a[b][ii]). If the petitioner meets this burden, the court is required to conduct a further inquiry to determine whether the petitioner should be estopped, in accordance with the child's best interests, from challenging paternity (Matter of Derrick H. v. Martha J., 82 A.D.3d 1236, 1237, 922 N.Y.S.2d 83). Family Court correctly determined, after a hearing, that the petitioner established that he executed the acknowledgment of paternity based upon a material mistake of fact. However, Family Court did not err in determining, based upon the evidence presented at the same hearing, that the best interests of the child necessitated that the petitioner be equitably estopped from denying paternity. The hearing evidence demonstrated that the petitioner lived with the child from the time of her birth in March 2005, until 2011. After the parties separated in 2011, the petitioner continued to visit with the child approximately one to two times per week. According to the petitioner, the child is free to visit with him whenever she wants. Although the child knew that the petitioner was not her biological father, she did not refer to or think of anyone else as her father. The child had a strong relationship with the petitioner and wanted to spend more time with him and his son, whom she regarded as her brother. The evidence established that, up to the time of the hearing, there had been a recognized and operative parent-child relationship between the petitioner and the child in existence all of the child's life. Therefore, the Family Court properly dismissed the petition to vacate the acknowledgment of paternity.

Appellate Division Sustains Damage Award for Breach of Stipulation Holding That When a Contract Does Not Specify Time of Performance, the Law Implies a Reasonable Time.

In Klein v Klein, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 9486302, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 09652 (2d Dept., 2015) the parties' stipulations of settlement, which were incorporated into the judgment of divorce, provided that three of their timeshares would be transferred to the plaintiff after the plaintiff paid the defendant the balance of a distributive award in the amount of $191,000. The Stipulation provided that the defendant would cooperate and sign any documents required to effectuate the transfers. The plaintiff tendered payment of the $191,000 on July 1, 2013, and the defendant deposited it on July 2, 2013. Although the defendant had been in possession of the transfer documents since May 3, 2013, she had a dispute with the plaintiff on another issue and improperly exercised self-help by holding onto the transfer documents until that issue was resolved. As such, she did not return the transfer documents until October 2013. Since the window of opportunity for the plaintiff to sell back the timeshares to the vacation club had expired, he was forced to pay additional maintenance charges. The Appellate Division pointed out that when a contract does not specify time of performance, the law implies a reasonable time. (Savasta v. 470 Newport Assoc., 82 N.Y.2d 763, 765; see Erazo v. Cabeza, 35 AD3d 651, 652). What constitutes a reasonable time for performance depends upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case (Savasta v. 470 Newport Assoc., 82 N.Y.2d at 765). Here, in the stipulation, the parties clearly agreed that once the plaintiff paid $191,000 as the balance of a distributive award, the obligation to effectuate the transfer of the timeshares was triggered. Under such circumstances, the Supreme Court properly awarded damages to the plaintiff as a result of the defendant's unreasonable delay in providing the executed transfer documents to the plaintiff's counsel.

To Warrant Downward Modification of Child Support Parent must Use Best Efforts to Obtain Employment Commensurate with Qualifications and Experience, or Demonstrate That Current Income Is Commensurate with Earning Capacity

In Matter of Fanau v Fantau, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 9486095, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 09682 (2d Dept., 2015) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the fathers application for a downward modification of child support. It pointed out that a reduction in income is not considered as a ground for modification unless it was involuntary and the party has made diligent attempts to secure employment commensurate with his or her education, ability, and experience. The record supported the Family Court's determination that the father "failed to establish that he used his best efforts to obtain employment which was commensurate with his qualifications and experience, or that his current income was commensurate with his earning capacity so as to warrant a downward modification of his child support obligation." It noted that the father failed to submit evidence such as résumés that he had sent to potential employers, or proof that he had been on any interviews in search of employment commensurate with his education, ability, and experience.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Third Department Holds That That "Nondisclosure Is Not the Equivalent of Fraud" in Upholding Stipulation of Settlement

In Fermon v Fermon, 2016 WL 71243 (3d Dept.,2016) the judgment of divorce which incorporated the stipulation of settlement that not merged with the judgment provided, inter alia, for no payments of basic child support and directed the husband to transfer a portion of his individual retirement account to the wife.

The Appellate Division found that the terms of the stipulation regarding basic child support were unfair when they were entered into, as they were premised upon the husbands fraudulent misrepresentation that his annual income was $136,106 when, as the wife belatedly discovered, he had accepted a position that paid $170,000 a year plus bonuses. Supreme Court therefore acted appropriately in modifying the award of child support.

The Appellate Division agreed with the husband that Supreme Court erred in modifying the agreed-upon division of assets in his individual retirement account. The parties agreed to distribute the husband's individual retirement account based upon its December 2011 value, the point at which the most recent account statement had been issued. The account had grown considerably by the time the stipulation was executed in March 2012, but the husband admittedly made no effort to learn the value of the account at that time and did not know that the appreciation had occurred. It is well settled "that nondisclosure is not the equivalent of fraud" and, given that the wife acknowledged in the stipulation that she did not require further information from the husband in order to knowingly proceed, Supreme Court erred in setting aside that part of the stipulation dealing with equitable distribution of the husband's individual retirement account.

Recent Legislation

Laws of 2015, Chapter 567 (effective June 18, 2016)

Domestic Relations Law§ 240, subdivision 1 (a) was amended and subdivision (c-1) was added to Family Court Act § 651 (c-1). The purpose of the legislation was to underscore that custody standards apply in cases where custody and visitation petitions brought under these sections are heard jointly with child protective dispositional or permanency hearings in Family Court under Article 10 or 10-A of the Family Court Act.

The following provision was inserted into Domestic Relations Law§ 240 subdivision 1 (a):

Where a proceeding filed pursuant to article ten or ten-A of the family court act is pending at the same time as a proceeding brought in the supreme court involving the custody of, or right to visitation with, any child of a marriage, the court presiding over the proceeding under article ten or ten-A of the family court act may jointly hear the dispositional hearing on the petition under article ten or the permanency hearing under article ten-A of the family court act and, upon referral from the supreme court, the hearing to resolve the matter of custody or visitation in the proceeding pending in the supreme court; provided however, the court must determine custody or visitation in accordance with the terms of this section.

The following provision was added to Family Court Act §651:

(c-1) Where a proceeding filed pursuant to article ten or ten-A of this act is pending at the same time as a proceeding brought in the family court pursuant to this article, the court presiding over the proceeding under article ten or ten-A of this act may jointly hear the hearing on the custody and visitation petition under this article and the dispositional hearing on the petition under article ten or the permanency hearing under article ten-A of this act; provided, however, the court must determine the custody and visitation petition in accordance with the terms of this article.

Laws of 2015, Ch 447

Laws of 2015, Ch 447 amended Domestic Relations Law §237 (a) effective November 20, 2015, and applicable to all actions whenever commenced, to provide that an unrepresented litigant shall not be required to file an affidavit detailing fee arrangements when making an application for an award of counsel fees and expenses. However, as a condition precedent to not being required to file such affidavit the unrepresented litigant must have submitted an affidavit that he or she is unable to afford counsel with supporting proof, including a statement of net worth, and, if available, W-2 statements and income tax returns for himself or herself.

According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of the Legislation the purpose of the amendment was "to make clear that indigent pro se litigants may make an application for an award of fees necessary to obtain counsel without the formal requirement of an affidavit detailing fee arrangements with counsel, provided proof has been submitted of an inability to afford counsel."

Laws of 2015, Ch 387, approved October 26, 2015, effective January 24, 2016.

The statutory provisions for child support have been amended to reflect the fact that spousal maintenance is money no longer available as income to the payor, but constitutes income to the payee, so long as the order or agreement for such maintenance lasts.

Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(5)(iii) and Family Court Act § 413(1)(b)(5)(iii) were amended to add a new subclause (l) to each that requires that alimony or spousal maintenance actually paid to a spouse who is a party to the action must be added to the recipient spouse's income, provided that the order contains an automatic adjustment to take effect upon the termination of the maintenance award. According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of Legislation this addition would be based upon an amount already paid, e.g., an amount reported on the recipient spouse's last income tax return, and would not simply be an estimate of future payments.

Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(5)(vii)(C) and Family Court Act § 413(1)(b)(5)(vii)(C) were amended to clarify that, where spousal maintenance payments are deducted from the payor's income, the order must contain a specific provision adjusting the child support amount automatically upon the termination of the spousal maintenance award. According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of Legislation this relieves the custodial parent of the burden of moving for a modification of the child support order upon the termination of maintenance but leaves open the possibility for either or both parties to seek a modification of the automatic adjustment if, at the point where maintenance terminates, the income of either of the parties has changed in an amount that would qualify for modification under Family Court Act § 451(3)(b)(ii) or Domestic Relations Law § 236B(9)(b)(2)(ii), e.g., in excess of 15% or a lapse of three years or more. The specific adjustment in the amount of child support is without prejudice to either party's right to seek a modification in accordance with Family Court Act § 451(3) or Domestic Relations Law § 236B(9)(b)(2) with the proviso that in a subsequent action for modification, the inclusion of the specific adjustment shall not by itself constitute a "substantial change of circumstances."

Laws of 2015, Ch 347, § 1 amended Social Services Law § 111-i to align the timing of the adjustment of the Combined Parental Income Adjustment with the adjustment of the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person and the self-support reserve.

Court of Appeals

Court of Appeals, in Opinion by Judge Leslie Stein, Explains Meaning of Extended Disruption of Custody in Domestic Relations Law § 72 (2)

In Suarez v Williams, --- N.E.3d ----, 2015 WL 8788195 (N.Y.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 09231, the Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Leslie Stein, held that grandparents may demonstrate standing to seek custody, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 72 (2) and the Court's decision in Matter of Bennett v Jeffreys (40 NY2d 543 [1976]) based on extraordinary circumstances where the child has lived with the grandparents for a prolonged period of time, even if the child had contact with, and spent time with, a parent while the child lived with the grandparents. In addition, a parent need not relinquish all care and control of the child. Even if the parent exercises some control over the child, for example during visitation, a parent may still, as a general matter, have voluntarily relinquished care and control of the child to the grandparent to the extent that the grandparent is, in essence, acting as a parent with primary physical custody.

The child (born 2002) lived with his paternal grandparents, beginning when he was less than 10 days old and continuing until he was almost 10 years old. The child's father moved out of state in 2004 and has had visitation since then. The child's mother lived approximately 12 miles from the grandparents for the child's first few years, until the grandparents moved the mother into a trailer they purchased, in a trailer park across the street from their residence. In 2006 proceeding the child's parents obtained a consent order awarding the parents joint legal custody, with primary physical custody to the mother, but the child continued to reside with the grandparents. In 2006, the grandparents moved to an adjoining county and in 2008 the grandparents again helped her move closer to them. The grandparents kept the mother informed of the child's activities almost daily. The mother saw the child regularly including, at times, weekly overnight visits and vacations. In 2012 she refused to return the child to the grandparents after a visit, relying on the 2006 custody order granting her primary physical custody. At that time, the mother told the grandparents that they had the child for many years, it was her "turn now," and they could no longer see him. As a result, the grandparents commenced a proceeding seeking primary physical custody of the child. Following a 10-day hearing, Family Court found that there had been an extended disruption of custody between the mother and the child, and that the mother voluntarily relinquished care and control of him to the grandparents -- through three written documents and through her behavior -- and concluded that this amounted to extraordinary circumstances. The court then considered the child's best interest and granted joint custody to the grandparents and the father, with primary physical custody to the grandparents and visitation to each parent. The Appellate Division reversed and dismissed the grandparents' petition (128 AD3d 20 [4th Dept 2015]). The Court held that the grandparents failed to demonstrate extraordinary circumstances, in light of the mother's presence in the child's life, even though he was primarily living with the grandparents. The Court concluded that the grandparents lacked standing to seek custody and dismissed their petition.

Judge Stein observed that in Matter of Bennett v Jeffreys, the Court created a two-prong inquiry for determining whether a nonparent may obtain custody as against a parent (see 40 NY2d at 546-548). First, the nonparent must prove the existence of "extraordinary circumstances" such as "surrender, abandonment, persisting neglect, unfitness, and unfortunate or involuntary disruption of custody over an extended period of time, "or other like extraordinary circumstances". Second, if extraordinary circumstances are established such that the nonparent has standing to seek custody, the court must make an award of custody based on the best interest of the child. Consistent with that case, Domestic Relations Law § 72 (2) contains a specific example of extraordinary circumstances. That subdivision provides that “[w]here a grandparent . . . of a minor child . . . can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the court the existence of extraordinary circumstances, such grandparent . . . may apply to family court [for custody],” and the court “may make such directions as the best interests of the child may require, for custody rights for such grandparent . . . in respect to such child. An extended disruption of custody, as such term is defined in this section, shall constitute an extraordinary circumstance”. The statute then defines “extended disruption of custody” to “include, but not be limited to, a prolonged separation of the respondent parent and the child for at least [24] continuous months during which the parent voluntarily relinquished care and control of the child and the child resided in the household of the petitioner grandparent or grandparents, provided, however, that the court may find that extraordinary circumstances exist should the prolonged separation have lasted for less than [24] months”.

Judge Stein noted that Domestic Relations Law § 72 (2) sets forth three “elements” required to demonstrate the extraordinary circumstance of an “extended disruption of custody,” specifically: (1) a 24-month separation of the parent and child, which is identified as “prolonged,” (2) the parent’s voluntary relinquishment of care and control of the child during such period, and (3) the residence of the child in the grandparents’ household. Only the first two elements were seriously in dispute here. She rejected the mothers argument that the separation of the parent and child must be nearly complete and that the parent must relinquish all care and control, with little or no contact between the parent and child, in order for the first two elements to be established. The Court found that a lack of contact is not a separate element under the statute. The quality and quantity of contact between the parent and child are simply factors to be considered in the context of the totality of the circumstances when determining whether the parent voluntarily relinquished care and control of the child, and whether the child actually resided with the grandparents for the required “prolonged” period of time. It would be illogical to construe the statute to mean that, in order to establish an extended disruption of custody, the grandparent must demonstrate that the parent had no contact with the child for 24 months. If that were the case, the statute would be superfluous or redundant of the extraordinary circumstances specifically enumerated in Matter of Bennett v Jeffreys. The Court held that to give meaning to the separate statutory avenue of establishing standing, Domestic Relations Law § 72 (2) must be available for a grandparent even if the parent has had some contact with the child during the requisite 24-month period. While courts must determine on a case-by-case basis whether the level of contact between the parent and child precludes a finding of extraordinary circumstances, it is sufficient to show that the parent has permitted an “extended disruption of custody” (Domestic Relations Law § 72 [2] [a]).

The Court held that for essentially the same reasons, a parent need not relinquish all care and control of the child. Even if the parent exercises some control over the child, for example during visitation, a parent may still, as a general matter, have voluntarily relinquished care and control of the child to the grandparent to the extent that the grandparent is, in essence, acting as a parent with primary physical custody. The key is whether the parent makes important decisions affecting the child’s life, as opposed to merely providing routine care on visits.

Here, the evidence comported with Family Court’s finding that the mother voluntarily relinquished care and control of the child for more than 24 months, even though she had regular contact and visitation with him . The mother allowed the grandparents to assume control over, and responsibility for the care of, the child while he resided with them for a prolonged period of years, during which she assumed the role of a noncustodial parent in virtually every way. The grandparents established their standing to seek custody of the child by demonstrating extraordinary circumstances, namely an extended disruption of the mother's custody. The Appellate Division order was reversed and the matter remitted to that court for further proceedings.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Where Attorney's Services Do Not Create Any Proceeds, but Consist Solely of Defending a Title or Interest Already Held by the Client, There Is No Lien on That Title or Interest

In Charnow v Charnow, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 8828877, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 09241 (2d Dept., 2015) the nonparty McCarthy Fingar LLP represented the plaintiff during divorce proceedings that were eventually resolved by a stipulation of settlement and subsequent judgment of divorce. Pursuant to the terms of the settlement and the judgment, the defendant was to pay $150,000 directly to McCarthy Fingar to cover the plaintiff's legal fees. When the defendant failed to make the payments, McCarthy Fingar moved to enforce a charging lien against the plaintiff's one-half share of the net proceeds from the future sale of the marital residence. The Supreme Court denied the motion on the ground that under the terms of the settlement agreement, McCarthy Fingar's sole recourse was to look to the defendant for payment. The Appellate Division affirmed for a different reason. It observed that in a matrimonial action, a charging lien will be available to the extent that an equitable distribution award reflects the creation of a new fund by an attorney greater than the value of the interests already held by the client (Moody v. Sorokina, 50 AD3d 1522, 1523). However, where the attorney's services do not create any proceeds, but consist solely of defending a title or interest already held by the client, there is no lien on that title or interest. (Theroux v. Theroux, 145 A.D.2d 625, 627-628). The plaintiff and the defendant already owned the marital residence jointly as tenants by the entirety. Thus, the parties' settlement agreement merely permitted the plaintiff to retain her existing interest in the marital residence. Although the nature of the property was converted from realty into dollars, her interest remained the same. Thus, no equitable distribution fund to which a charging lien could attach was created by the efforts of the plaintiff's attorney.

Supreme Court

Supreme Court Holds That There Should Be a Presumption in Favor of Release of Entire Contents of the Court-appointed Forensic Evaluator's File

In K. C. v. J. C., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 9261184, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 25421 (Sup. Ct., 2015) the Plaintiff moved, inter alia, for the release to her counsel and retained expert of the entire contents of the Court-appointed forensic evaluator's file, including the notes, test results and raw data used to prepare his report. Defendant objected to the release of the file, contending that Plaintiff had not demonstrated any special circumstances that warrant its release. Supreme Court noted that the Appellate Division had yet to examine this particular issue. It surveyed the case law in this area, including Feuerman v. Feuerman, 112 Misc.2d 961 [Sup Ct, Nassau County 1982]; Ochs v. Ochs, 193 Misc.2d 502 [Sup Ct, Westchester County 2002]; CP v. AP, 32 Misc.3d 1210(A) [Sup Ct, New York County 2011]; R.L. v. L.T., 3406–12, NYLJ 1202672096267 [Sup Ct, Westchester County 2014]; S.C. v. H.B., 9 Misc.3d 1110(A) [Family Ct, Rockland County 2005] all of which denied such request and J.F.D. v. J.D., 45 Misc.3d 1212(A) [Sup Ct, Nassau County 2014], which adopted the recommendation of Bill A8342–2013,5 which proposed amending Domestic Relations Law §§ 70 and 240 to allow disclosure, pursuant to a demand made under CPLR § 3120, of a forensic evaluator’s entire file, including raw data, notes, tests and test results. The Court found no reasonable justification to withhold such critical information from counsel and the parties. It adopted the rebuttable presumption standard in favor of full disclosure of the neutral forensic evaluator’s entire file. The Court held that the neutral forensic evaluator’s file would be made available to the parties and counsel in the same manner in which they are provided access to a forensic report. It directed the forensic evaluator to provide the Court with a copy of the entire contents of his file and copies for all counsel, and required all counsel to execute a confidentiality affidavit that they could only show it to their clients (only in counsel’s office), allow the client to take notes, but not pictures or copies of any kind, for purposes of assisting with trial preparation. It directed that Counsel may provide a copy of the file to an expert privately retained by them to review and assess the forensic evaluator’s report, who shall execute a confidentiality affidavit similar to the one executed by counsel, prior to receipt of the forensic evaluator’s file.

Family Court Holds Cplr 3126 Remedies Not Available in a Child Support Proceeding for Failure to Comply with Family Court Act §424-a

In Matter of Yemi O. v Amanda Q., 2015 WL 9241477 (Fam. Ct., 2015) the Support Magistrate denied the mother’s request for yet another adjournment of the hearing and dismissed the mother’s application for child support for failure to comply with Family Court Act §424-a which required her, as the custodial parent to submit her most recently filed income tax returns and her W-2 wage and tax statements for 2014. The Court observed that § 424–a (a) requires the filing of such documents and that subdivision (c) provides that when a petitioner other than a social services official fails, without good cause, to file a sworn statement of net worth, a current and representative paycheck stub and the most recently filed state and federal income tax returns, as provided in subdivision (a), the court may on its own motion or on application of any party adjourn the proceeding until such time as the petitioner files with the court such statements and tax returns. The Court held that the remedies in Civil Practice Law and Rules § 3126 are not available in a child support proceeding where the petitioner or custodial parent seeking support fails to comply with the statutory directive that there be compulsory financial disclosure by both parties. The only remedy afforded for the custodial parent’s failure to comply with the disclosure requirements of Family Court Act § 424–a, is the adjournment of the proceeding until such time as that parent has complied with that section or with court orders which direct disclosure (Fam. Ct. Act § 424–a [c]). Dismissal of the application for child support is not authorized by Family Court Act § 424–a (Matter of Malcolm v. Trupiano, 94 AD3d 1380, 1381 [2012]). It held that the Support Magistrate’s dismissal of the custodial parent’s application for child support was erroneous.

New Legislation Amending Domestic Relations Law and Family Court Act

Laws of 2015, Chapter 567 (effective June 18, 2016)

Domestic Relations Law § 240, subdivision 1 (a) was amended and subdivision (c-1) was added to Family Court Act § 651 (c-1). The purpose of the legislation was to underscore that custody standards apply in cases where custody and visitation petitions brought under these sections are heard jointly with child protective dispositional or permanency hearings in Family Court under Article 10 or 10-A of the Family Court Act.

The following provision was inserted into Domestic Relations Law § 240 subdivision 1 (a):

Where a proceeding filed pursuant to article ten or ten-A of the family court act is pending at the same time as a proceeding brought in the supreme court involving the custody of, or right to visitation with, any child of a marriage, the court presiding over the proceeding under article ten or ten-A of the family court act may jointly hear the dispositional hearing on the petition under article ten or the permanency hearing under article ten-A of the family court act and, upon referral from the supreme court, the hearing to resolve the matter of custody or visitation in the proceeding pending in the supreme court; provided however, the court must determine custody or visitation in accordance with the terms of this section.

The following provision was added to Family Court Act §651:

(c-1) Where a proceeding filed pursuant to article ten or ten-A of this act is pending at the same time as a proceeding brought in the family court pursuant to this article, the court presiding over the proceeding under article ten or ten-A of this act may jointly hear the hearing on the custody and visitation petition under this article and the dispositional hearing on the petition under article ten or the permanency hearing under article ten-A of this act; provided, however, the court must determine the custody and visitation petition in accordance with the terms of this article.

Laws of 2015, Ch 447

Laws of 2015, Ch 447 amended Domestic Relations Law §237 (a) effective November 20, 2015, and applicable to all actions whenever commenced, to provide that an unrepresented litigant shall not be required to file an affidavit detailing fee arrangements when making an application for an award of counsel fees and expenses. However, as a condition precedent to not being required to file such affidavit the unrepresented litigant must have submitted an affidavit that he or she is unable to afford counsel with supporting proof, including a statement of net worth, and, if available, W-2 statements and income tax returns for himself or herself.

According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of the Legislation the purpose of the amendment was “to make clear that indigent pro se litigants may make an application for an award of fees necessary to obtain counsel without the formal requirement of an affidavit detailing fee arrangements with counsel, provided proof has been submitted of an inability to afford counsel.”

Laws of 2015, Ch 387, approved October 26, 2015, effective January 24, 2016.

The statutory provisions for child support have been amended to reflect the fact that spousal maintenance is money no longer available as income to the payor, but constitutes income to the payee, so long as the order or agreement for such maintenance lasts.

Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(5)(iii) and Family Court Act § 413(1)(b)(5)(iii) were amended to add a new subclause (l) to each that requires that alimony or spousal maintenance actually paid to a spouse who is a party to the action must be added to the recipient spouse's income, provided that the order contains an automatic adjustment to take effect upon the termination of the maintenance award. According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of Legislation this addition would be based upon an amount already paid, e.g., an amount reported on the recipient spouse's last income tax return, and would not simply be an estimate of future payments.

Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(5)(vii)(C) and Family Court Act § 413(1)(b)(5)(vii)(C) were amended to clarify that, where spousal maintenance payments are deducted from the payor's income, the order must contain a specific provision adjusting the child support amount automatically upon the termination of the spousal maintenance award. According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of Legislation this relieves the custodial parent of the burden of moving for a modification of the child support order upon the termination of maintenance but leaves open the possibility for either or both parties to seek a modification of the automatic adjustment if, at the point where maintenance terminates, the income of either of the parties has changed in an amount that would qualify for modification under Family Court Act § 451(3)(b)(ii) or Domestic Relations Law § 236B(9)(b)(2)(ii), e.g., in excess of 15% or a lapse of three years or more. The specific adjustment in the amount of child support is without prejudice to either party's right to seek a modification in accordance with Family Court Act § 451(3) or Domestic Relations Law § 236B(9)(b)(2) with the proviso that in a subsequent action for modification, the inclusion of the specific adjustment shall not by itself constitute a "substantial change of circumstances."

Laws of 2015, Ch 347, § 1 amended Social Services Law § 111-i to align the timing of the adjustment of the Combined Parental Income Adjustment with the adjustment of the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person and the self-support reserve.

Laws of 2015, Ch 369

Laws of 2015, Ch 369, § 2 repealed Article 5-B of the Family Court Act and enacted the 2008 version of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA) as a new Article 5-B of the Family Court Act. Chapter 369 was signed into law on September 25, 2015. Section 1 is effective on December 24, 2015. New Article 5-B to the Family Court Act applies to any action or proceeding filed or order issued on or before the effective date of new Article 5-B, consistent with new section 580-903 of the Family Court Act which shall be effective on January 1, 2016.

Laws of 2015, Ch 269

Laws of 2015, Ch 269 amended Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][1][a], Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][5][d][7], Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][6], Domestic Relations Law § 248, Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][9][1], Family Court Act § 412, effective January 23, 2016, and amended Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5-a], effective October 25, 2015.

Appellate Division, First Department

Not Abuse of Discretion to Allow Counsel Fee to Attorney for Children Who Sent One Bill to Parents after 14 Months of Representation . He Was Entitled to Compensation “even in the Absence of Perfect Compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.2.”

In Matter of Donna Marie C. v Kuni C., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7766799, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08907 (1st Dept., 2015) the the mother filed a petition in Family Court seeking custody of the parties’ children and the Family Court referee appointed an attorney for the children. In its October 4, 2012 order of appointment, the court directed that each parent pay attorney O’Hern an initial sum of $3,750, against which his hourly fee of $300 would be deducted. The court also ordered, based upon the parties’ initial financial disclosures, that the children’s legal fees would be paid equally, 50% by the father and 50% by the mother. Although the order of appointment directed the initial sum be paid within 10 days, it did not direct periodic billing. After the parties settled their custody dispute O’Hern sent the parties an itemized invoice for the 14 month period that he had represented the children. The bill was for a total of 54 hours, at his court-set hourly rate of $300. Applying credits for the payments that each parent had already made, the father’s share of the bill was $9,840.00. He refused to pay and O’Hern moved to enforce payment. After conducting a testimonial hearing, Family Court held that O’Hern was entitled to collect the full amount he billed the father for legal services on the children’s behalf. The Appellate Division affirmed rejecting the claim that no legal fees are warranted because the attorney for the children was biased against him and otherwise did not comply with billing and other requirements of the Court Rules (22 NYCRR 1400.2). It did not believe it was an abuse of discretion for the Family Court to conclude that O’Hern was entitled to compensation for the reasonable value of his services, even in the absence of perfect compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 (see Moyal v. Moyal, 85 A.D.3d 614, 927 N.Y.S.2d 19 [1st Dept 2011]). Although there was only one itemized bill, and not one bill sent every 60 days, the court not only set the hourly amount that could be charged, it also conducted a testimonial hearing concerning the reasonableness of the fees. The same referee presided over the matter for its duration, thereby giving the fees that were ultimately awarded the high level of scrutiny required. It declined to disturb that award. The Court noted in a footnote that it was not argued and not decided “whether, and if so, how and to what extent 22 NYCRR 1400.2 applies to a privately paid Attorney for the Child appointed pursuant to court order.”

In a footnote the Court pointed out that the form order utilized by the Unified Court System for privately paid “law guardians” (Order Appointing Law Guardian–UCS 880), contains the following decretal language: “ORDERED that no less often than every 60 days from the date of this order of appointment the Law Guardian shall send to counsel for the parties bills for compensation and the reimbursement of disbursements.” Family Court used an abbreviated version of this order which did not contain this particular language. It also pointed out in another footnote:

Authors Comment: This decision appears to apply a different standard for compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 by the attorney for the children, than that applicable to other attorneys, permitting him to recover legal fees, although he did not send the parties one bill during the course of his 14 month representation of the children. The Appellate Division describe this as ‘the absence of perfect compliance.

Family Court Lacks Authority to Invalidate a Stipulation

In re Georgette D. v. Gary N. R., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7726357, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. (1st Dept.,2015) the Support Magistrate denied respondent’s objections to an order denying his motion to dismiss the petition for upward modification of his child support obligation, and directing a de novo hearing on the issue of child support. Although Respondent’s objections to the order were untimely (Family Court Act § 439[e]), and he failed to proffer a reasonable excuse for the delay, the Appellate Division exercised its discretion to entertain the appeal (see Family Court Act § 1112), since it concerned Family Court’s subject matter jurisdiction.

The Appellate Division held that although the Support Magistrate stated that she was not “invalidating” the child support provision of the parties’ stipulation, which was incorporated but not merged into the judgment of divorce, her sua sponte determination that the stipulation’s noncompliance with the requirements of the Child Support Standards Act provided a basis for a de novo hearing on child support was tantamount to invalidating the stipulation, which is beyond the power of Family Court. (Family Court Act § 461). It vacated the direction for a hearing.

Appellate Division affirms order Denying Mothers Application to Relocate from East Hampton to West Hampton Beach, a Distance of about 32 miles.

In Quinn v Quinn, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7739666, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08818 (2d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which granted the father’s motion to enjoin the mother from relocating with the parties’ children from the former marital residence in East Hampton to Westhampton Beach, New York. The parties agreement which was incorporated into the judgment of divorce provided for joint custody, with the mother to have residential custody of the children, subject to a schedule of joint parenting. That schedule gave the father visitation from 4:00 p.m. to 6:00 p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, from 4:00 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. on Wednesdays, and on alternate weekends.

The father testified at the hearing on his motion that he normally worked from 8:00 a.m. until 4:00 p.m. on weekdays. He testified that it usually took him about five minutes after finishing work to drive to the former marital residence in East Hampton to pick up the children for visitation. He further testified that, on the night of August 24, 2013, he received an email from the mother stating that she and the children had moved from East Hampton to Westhampton Beach—a distance of about 32 miles. He testified that it takes him 50 minutes to drive from his home in East Hampton to the mother's new home in Westhampton Beach. The mother testified that she moved because she had voluntarily changed jobs from a bank located in Bridgehampton to a bank located in Medford, and that the move cut 30 minutes off her new commute in each direction. She testified that her total compensation at the new job was comparable to her total compensation at her old job. She further testified that she moved to be closer to her parents in Riverhead. She testified that the children saw her parents about twice a month when they lived in the former marital residence in East Hampton, and about once a week after the move to Westhampton Beach. The Appellate Division found that the mother's move from East Hampton to Westhampton Beach significantly limited the father's contact with the children. By lengthening the father's commute from a few minutes to almost an hour, the move effectively cut the father's weekday visitation in half. The mother also failed to demonstrate, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the children's lives would be enhanced economically, emotionally, or educationally by the move. Thus, the Supreme Court properly granted the father's motion.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Third Department Holds That While it Has Not Proscribed Averaging Competing Appraisals in Valuing a Marital Asset, it Is Improper to Mechanically Average Values Set Forth in Competing Appraisals Without Articulating a Reason for Doing So.

In Robinson v Robinson, 2015 WL 7460002 (3d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in determining the amount of the marital home's appreciation. The parties submitted competing appraisals valuing the property both on the date of the marriage and the date of commencement of this action. In determining the appreciation, Supreme Court averaged the values set forth in the parties' respective date of marriage appraisals, averaged the values set forth in their date of commencement appraisals, and then subtracted the former figure from the latter. While the Court had declined to impose an absolute proscription against the procedure of averaging competing appraisals in valuing a marital asset (see Hoyt v. Hoyt, 166 A.D.2d 800, 802 [1990]), blindly employing such a technique without articulating a reason for doing so cannot be condoned. Mechanically averaging values set forth in competing appraisals may well result in a speculative valuation that is not founded in economic reality. Supreme Court failed to set forth any reason for rejecting the valuations advanced by the parties' appraisers. Indeed, the court's decision to average the appraisals was particularly problematic given the circumstances present here. The wife's date of marriage appraisal valued the marital home at $36,000 based on her representations that the substantial improvements at issue were performed during the marriage, while the husband's appraisal valued it at $140,000 based upon his representations that such improvements were performed prior to the marriage.¹

Thus, the determination as to the value of the marital home on the date of the marriage necessarily hinged upon the resolution of factual disputes and issues of credibility, which could not be accomplished by simply averaging the parties' wildly divergent appraisals.

Third Department Holds That Generally, the Custodial Parent for Purposes of Child Support Is the Parent Who Has Physical Custody of a Child for the Majority of the Time "Based upon the Reality of the Situation."

In Matter of Mitchell v Mitchell, 2015 WL 7762137 (3d Dept, 2015) the parties' agreement which was incorporated but not merged into the December 2005 judgment of divorce provided that the parties shared legal and physical custody and virtually equal parenting time. In May 2007, the parties agreed to an order that provided that the child would be with the father, who worked for the school district, during scheduled school holidays, provided that the mother did not also have the day off. In September 2013, the father commenced a proceeding seeking a modification of child support claiming that because his parenting time had increased, he had become the child's primary physical custodian. The Appellate Division rejected his argument that the mother should be directed to pay child support to him because he was the custodial parent or that his child support obligation should be reduced based on the expenses resulting from the increased parenting time. Generally, the custodial parent for purposes of child support is the parent who has physical custody of a child for the majority of the time "based upon the reality of the situation." If the parenting time is shared equally, then the parent with greater income is deemed to be the noncustodial parent for purposes of calculating child support. During the school year, the child spent an equal number of overnights at each party's home and, during the summer months, the child was with the mother eight nights and the father six nights. Consequently, Family Court properly determined that because the parents' have "close to equally shared physical custody," the father, as the more monied spouse, was the noncustodial parent. It rejected the father's argument that he had physical custody of the child a majority of the time because, pursuant to the 2007 order, the child was with him eight full days, six nights and two half days during any 14-day period in the summer months. The flaw in this argument is that "shared" custody need not be "equal". With the exception of the days during the summer weeks when the mother was unavailable and the father was available to exercise parenting time, the custodial schedule was unchanged, and the Court declined to accord greater weight to the custodial days as compared to the overnight custodial period. Based on the "reality of the situation" (Riemersma v. Riemersma, 84 AD3d at 1476), there was no error in Family Court's determination that the parties shared "close to equally shared physical custody of the child."

The Appellate Division rejected the father's argument that because he had "significant expenses during his extensive visitation" with the child, the strict application of the CSSA leads to an unjust or inappropriate result. The father claimed that his grocery bill was higher, that he purchased clothes for the child, that he had to transport the child to more social activities and that he paid for two camps for the child. The Appellate Division pointed out that it had consistently held that "[t]he costs of providing suitable housing, clothing and food for [a child] during custodial periods do not qualify as extraordinary expenses so as to justify a deviation from the presumptive amount."

Domestic Relations Law §237 (a) Amended effective November 20, 2015

Laws of 2015, Ch 447 amended Domestic Relations Law §237 (a) effective November 20, 2015, and applicable to all actions whenever commenced. The amendment added the following sentence to subdivision (a): “An unrepresented litigant shall not be required to file such an affidavit detailing fee arrangements when making an application for an award of counsel fees and expenses; provided he or she has submitted an affidavit that he or she is unable to afford counsel with supporting proof, including a statement of net worth, and, if available, W-2 statements and income tax returns for himself or herself.” In order for the unrepresented litigant to avoid the requirement that he or she file an affidavit detailing his or her fee arrangements with his or her attorney, the unrepresented individual must serve and file an affidavit that he or she is unable to afford counsel with supporting proof, including a statement of net worth, and, if available, W-2 statements and income tax returns for himself or herself.

According to the New York Assembly Memorandum in Support of the Legislation the purpose of the amendment was “to make clear that indigent pro se litigants may make an application for an award of fees necessary to obtain counsel without the formal requirement of an affidavit detailing fee arrangements with counsel, provided proof has been submitted of an inability to afford counsel.”

Prior to the amendment, if a litigant did not have an attorney he was not required to file an affidavit with the court “detailing the financial agreement between the party and the attorney”, as provided in the previous sentence of Domestic Relations Law §237 (a). Both before and after the amendment the unrepresented litigant, seeking a counsel fee award to hire an attorney, was and still is required to comply with 22 NYCRR 202.16 (k). It requires an applicant for counsel fees to file a statement of net worth, and if available, W-2 statements and income tax returns for himself or herself. For that reason this amendment to Domestic Relations Law §237 (a) makes no sense.

No corresponding amendment was made to Domestic Relations Law §237 (b) which applies to any application to enforce, annul or modify an order or judgment for alimony, maintenance, distributive award, distribution of marital property or for custody, visitation, or maintenance of a child, made, or upon any application by writ of habeas corpus or by petition and order to show cause concerning custody, visitation or maintenance of a child.

Wife Properly Denied Maintenance Award Where She Was Guilty of Egregious Economic Fault in Claiming to Have Given Away and Jewelry Property Worth over $10 Million
In Stewart v Stewart, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7202221, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08348 (1st Dept., 2015) the Appellate Division observed the plaintiff was guilty of egregious economic fault in claiming to have given away jewelry and property worth over $10 million, failing to disclose her offshore and foreign accounts, and secreting millions more in assets. If found no error in the award to plaintiff of $4,207,775 in Agravina stock because the shares' value was established when the parties agreed to adopt their son-in-law's valuation of the shares. The award to plaintiff of jewelry valued at $8,520,000 was properly based on a jewelry appraisal based on a "hypothetical fair market valuation." It held that Plaintiff could not complain about this valuation method, since she secreted the very jewelry she complained was missing from the valuation.

The Appellate Division held that the court's denial of a maintenance award to plaintiff was supported by the record and was a provident exercise of its discretion as the court considered the relevant factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][a], including the marital standard of living, the length of the marriage and age of the parties, that plaintiff would continue to receive substantial income from her ownership interest in Agravina and from the parties' Income Trust, that she was to receive millions of dollars of assets in equitable distribution, and that she had secreted millions more in marital assets.

Exclusive Occupancy Pendente Lite affirmed on appeal where Husband Established Alternative Residence

In Amato v Amato, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7270773, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08372 (2d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division observed that courts are statutorily empowered to award one spouse temporary exclusive use and occupancy of the marital residence during the pendency of divorce proceedings (see Domestic Relations Law § 234). Such an order is appropriate only upon a showing that the relief is necessary to protect the safety of persons or property, or one spouse has voluntarily established an alternative residence and a return would cause domestic strife (see e.g. Taub v. Taub, 33 AD3d 612). It held that in light of the plaintiff's voluntary establishment of an alternative residence for himself, the existence of an acrimonious relationship between the parties, and the potential turmoil which might result from the plaintiff's return to the marital home, the Supreme Court properly granted the defendant's motion for exclusive use and occupancy of the marital residence and use of its contents for herself and the parties' children during the pendency of this matrimonial action (see Preston v. Preston, 147 A.D.2d 464, 465; Kristiansen v. Kristiansen, 144 A.D.2d 441, 442; Wolfe v. Wolfe, 111 A.D.2d 809, 810).

Party Seeking Modification of Unallocated Child Support Based upon Emancipation of One Child must Prove That Remaining Amount Excessive Based upon Needs of Children.

In Matter of Pettit v Goodman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 6994422, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08144 (2d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division held that a party seeking a downward modification of an unallocated order of child support based on the emancipation of one of the children has the burden of proving that the amount of unallocated child support is excessive based on the needs of the remaining children (Lamassa v. Lamassa, 106 AD3d at 959).

Family Court Lacks Authority to Enter Finding of Neglect Without a Hearing Based upon a Certificate of Disposition

In Matter of Vincent M., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 6989635, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08170 (2d Dept.,2015) at a conference held on January 15, 2013, the Family Court received a copy of a certificate of disposition from the Dobbs Ferry Village Court which stated that on April 12, 2012, the mother was convicted of two crimes relating to an arrest that took place on July 1, 2011. One of the crimes the mother was convicted of was criminal possession of a controlled substance in the seventh degree. Without proceeding to a hearing, the Family Court took judicial notice of the certificate of disposition and entered a finding of neglect against the mother, finding that the date of arrest and the conviction of criminal possession of a controlled substance in the seventh degree matched the date of arrest and one of the crimes alleged in the petition. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that Family Court Act § 1051(a) provides that the Family Court may enter an order finding that a child is an abused child or a neglected child on the consent of all parties and the attorney for the child, or following the completion of a fact-finding hearing at which the petitioning agency establishes the allegations of abuse or neglect by a preponderance of the evidence (see Family Ct Act §§ 1044, 1046[b][l]). Further, in appropriate cases, the Family Court may also enter an order finding that a child is an abused child or a neglected child on a motion for summary judgment in lieu of holding a fact-finding hearing, upon the petitioning agency's prima facie showing of neglect or abuse as a matter of law, and the respondent's failure to raise a triable issue of fact in opposition to the motion. Here, the Family Court did not enter the finding of neglect on the consent of all parties and the attorney for the child, or following the completion of a fact-finding hearing (see Family Ct Act § 1051[a]), nor did Family Court enter the finding of neglect upon a motion by the DSS for summary judgment. Thus, the Family Court, which simply took judicial notice at a conference of a certificate of disposition, lacked the authority to enter a finding of neglect.

Failure to Raise Counsel Fee Issue in Main Brief Precludes Attempt to Raise it In Reply Brief
In Matter of Keyes v Watson, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7268585, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08415 (2d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division held that by failing to contest it in her main brief on the appeal, the mother had abandoned her challenge to the Court's award of attorneys' fees to the father, despite her attempt to raise the issue in her reply brief (citing Shaw v. Bluepers Family Billiards, 94 AD3d 858, 860; Kane v. Triborough Bridge & Tunnel Auth., 8 AD3d 239, 242; Khalona v. New York City Tr. Auth., 215 A.D.2d 630, 631)

Severance Payment Received after Employment Terminated after Judgment of Divorce Is Separate Property. Hearing Ordered on Modification of Maintenance Even Though Husband Failed to Provide Papers Required by 22 NYCRR 202.16(k)
In Harold v Harold, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 7305835, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 08596 2015 WL 7305835 (4th Dept.,2015) approximately one year after the entry of the judgment of divorce, defendant lost his job and received a severance payment from his employer. The Appellate Division concluded that the severance payments were defendant's separate property inasmuch as his right to receive those payments did not exist either during the marriage or prior to the commencement of this action, nor did the severance payments constitute compensation for past services.

The Appellate Division rejected Plaintiffs argument that the court should have denied defendant's cross motion to modify maintenance. Although defendant failed to include a sworn statement of net worth with his cross-moving papers as required by 22 NYCRR 202.16(k)(2), the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering a hearing on the issue of maintenance inasmuch as the court would have the opportunity to consider the parties' relative financial circumstances at the hearing.

Civil Contempt Determination Does Not Require Finding Wilful Violation of Underlying Order. Court Could Draw a Negative Inference from Defendant's Invocation of Fifth Amendment at Contempt Hearing, Where There Was a Joint Hearing on the Issues of Both Criminal and Civil Contempt.

In El-Dehdan v El-Dehdan, --- N.E.3d ----, 2015 WL 6128760, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07579 (2015) the Court of Appeals affirmed a determination holding the defendant in civil contempt failure to comply with a January 2010 order issued in the course of the parties' matrimonial proceeding, that required him to deposit in escrow the proceeds of the sale of properties which were the subject of a prior equitable distribution determination in favor of plaintiff. It held that a civil contempt determination does not require a finding of a contemnor's wilful violation of the underlying order, and that Supreme Court could draw a negative inference from defendant's invocation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination at the contempt hearing, where there was a joint hearing on the issues of both criminal and civil contempt, where the defendant did nothing to seek bifurcation of the issues before the contempt hearing.

After plaintiff's attorney learned defendant had transferred certain properties which were awarded to the defendant in a judgment of divorce, she filed an order to show cause in January 2010 seeking, inter alia, that defendant be held in civil contempt for violation of an October 2008 order, (which the parties mistakenly believed restrained the transfer of those properties. and that he be required to deposit the proceeds from the transfers with plaintiff's attorney.) The order to show cause, in addition to scheduling a hearing on plaintiff's contempt motion, directed defendant to immediately deposit with plaintiff's counsel the net proceeds of the transfers, reduced by broker's fees, taxes and mortgage payments. Defendant was personally served with this order to show cause. In August 2010, plaintiff filed a motion to hold defendant in civil and criminal contempt for his failure to deposit the proceeds with plaintiff's attorney as required by the January 2010 order. Defendant cross moved to vacate that order, arguing that it was void because it was obtained by plaintiff's fraud upon the court, namely her misrepresentations that the October 2008 order prohibited defendant's transfer of the properties.

At the contempt hearing Plaintiff testified on her own behalf that she received none of the proceeds from the transfer of the Brooklyn property and submitted into evidence proof of the transfer, including defendant's contract of sale and closing. Plaintiff further submitted into evidence an affidavit of personal service for the January 2010 order. Plaintiff also called defendant as a witness. During his testimony he refused to answer any questions related to the proceeds from the transfer, and invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. Specifically, he refused to explain what he did with the proceeds from the transfer and whether he was currently in possession of the money.

In the Court of Appeals defendant challenged the Appellate Division's decision on three grounds: plaintiff failed to establish the necessary elements of civil contempt, including defendant's wilful violation of a lawful court order; he was denied the opportunity to collaterally attack the January 2010 order; and in the context of a hearing on a joint civil and criminal contempt motion, Supreme Court may not draw a negative inference from defendant's invocation of his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent.

The Court of Appeals rejected each of these arguments. It observed that in Matter of McCormick v. Axelrod (59 N.Y.2d 574 [1983]), it described the elements necessary to support a finding of civil contempt. First, "it must be determined that a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, was in effect". Second, "[i]t must appear, with reasonable certainty, that the order has been disobeyed" Third, "the party to be held in contempt must have had knowledge of the court's order, although it is not necessary that the order actually have been served upon the party" Fourth, "prejudice to the right of a party to the litigation must be demonstrated". In order to carry her burden, plaintiff had to establish by clear and convincing evidence defendant's violation of the January 2010 order. The Court found that "a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, was in effect." The signed January 2010 order explicitly stated that the defendant "shall deposit immediately with the Plaintiff's attorney the sum of nine hundred fifty thousand ($950,000.00) dollars which is the sum of money he purportedly received from the transfer of [the property] 171 Ainslie Street, Brooklyn, New York and 64-17 60th Road, Maspeth, New York, minus the money paid for [the] real estate broker, transfer taxes and payment of the underlying mortgage." The Court held that this unambiguous directive, constituted "a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, [that] was in effect").

The Court held that to the extent defendant complained that the January 2010 order is invalid because it was issued ex parte, the law is clear that a court is authorized to issue an order to preserve marital property, both in advance of, and upon, a determination of equitable distribution. Referring to Domestic Relations Law § 234, the court held that the January 2010 order to deposit the proceeds from the transfer was well within the court's authority. Inasmuch as the court awarded plaintiff the Brooklyn and Maspeth properties in its equitable distribution determination it was perfectly lawful for the court to require defendant to deposit the proceeds of his transfer of those properties with plaintiff's counsel, regardless of whether the initial transfer of the properties violated any court order.

The Court rejected defendant's argument that the finding of contempt was not supported by the record because the evidence failed to establish that he wilfully disobeyed the January 2010 order. Nowhere in Judiciary Law § 753 [A][3] is wilfulness explicitly set forth as an element of civil contempt. It held that wilfulness is not an element of civil contempt. It agreed with the Appellate Division that civil contempt is established, regardless of the contemnor's motive, when disobedience of the court's order "defeats, impairs, impedes, or prejudices the rights or remedies of a party".

Once plaintiff met her burden and established that defendant violated the order to deposit the proceeds from the transfer, it was incumbent upon defendant to proffer evidence of his inability to pay. Nonetheless, defendant failed to submit evidence that he could not pay due to a lack of sufficient funds, economic distress or financial hardship, or some other obstacle to his compliance with the January 2010 order to deposit the proceeds. Instead, he submitted an affidavit containing bald face statements that by January 29, 2010, he "was no longer in possession of the proceeds of the March, 2009 sale, and that he received nothing from the transfer of the Maspeth property as he was merely holding it in his name for friends. The Court held that such vague and conclusory allegations of ... inability to pay or perform are not acceptable. Rather, courts have required a more specific showing of the contemnor's economic status

The Court rejected defendant's argument that Supreme Court improperly drew a negative inference from his invocation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination during the contempt hearing. He maintained that by holding one hearing on plaintiff's joint motion for civil and criminal contempt he was forced to choose between protecting himself against civil liability by testifying as to his lack of funds, and exercising his rights under the Fifth Amendment to remain silent so as to avoid criminal contempt. The Court found this argument unpersuasive and concluded that under the circumstances of this case, where defendant failed to take steps to avoid the alleged dilemma complained of here, Supreme Court acted within its authority to draw a negative inference, and in so doing did not violate defendant's constitutional rights. The Court observed that, the right against self incrimination does not automatically insulate a party to a civil action from potential liability. Both the United States Supreme Court, in Baxter v. Palmigiano (425 U.S. 308, 318 [1976]), and the Court of Appeals , in Marine Midland Bank v. Russo Produce (50 N.Y.2d 31, 42 [1980]), have held that a negative inference may be drawn in the civil context when a party invokes the right against self incrimination. Defendant could invoke the privilege, but that did not relieve him of his burden to present adequate evidence of his financial inability to comply with the January 2010 order so as to avoid civil contempt liability. Defendant relied on his conclusory statements that he no longer had the proceeds of the transfers and that he has no funds to deposit with the respondent's attorney. He could not seek to avoid the consequences of this failure to proffer sufficient evidence by invoking his Fifth Amendment right. The Court pointed out that it might have viewed this case differently if defendant had sought relief from Supreme Court to avoid the prejudice he claimed was the result of a joint civil and criminal contempt hearing. If defendant was concerned about the spill-over effect of invoking his Fifth Amendment right, he could have sought to bifurcate the hearing so that the court would first consider plaintiff's criminal contempt allegations. He chose not to do so. Because he failed to seek this relief before Supreme Court, in the first instance, he could not complain that Supreme Court erred in drawing negative inferences specifically allowed by law.

Error to Grant Relief Not Requested by the Parties Where Relief Granted Is Unlike Relief Sought and There Is Prejudice to a Party

In Calderon v Esenova, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 5945348, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07462 (2d Dept.,2015) shortly after serving an answer demanding maintenance, equitable distribution of the marital property, and counsel fees, the defendant moved, inter alia, for an award of temporary maintenance and interim counsel fees. Following a hearing, in an order dated December 16, 2013, the Supreme Court denied those branches of the defendant's motion and determined that the defendant was not entitled to a final award of maintenance or counsel fees and that there was no marital property subject to equitable distribution. After the defendant consented to the grounds for divorce, a judgment was entered granting the plaintiff a divorce, which incorporated by reference the order dated December 16, 2013. The Appellate Division held that the court erred in granting relief that was not requested by the parties. Generally, a court may, in its discretion, grant relief that is warranted by the facts plainly appearing on the papers on both sides, if the relief granted is not too dramatically unlike the relief sought, the proof offered supports it, and there is no prejudice to any party. As the defendant only requested pendente lite relief and was not given notice that the hearing would resolve the case, she was not afforded an opportunity to address the ultimate issues regarding equitable distribution, maintenance, and counsel fees.

The Appellate Division held that a new determination was required on the motion for temporary maintenance. Although the court may deviate from the presumptive award if it is "unjust or inappropriate, the court must set forth in a written order the amount of the presumptive award of temporary maintenance, the factors it considered, and the reasons that it adjusted the presumptive award of temporary maintenance (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][e][2]). Supreme Court failed to comply with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) when it denied that branch of the defendant's motion which was for temporary maintenance.

Denial of Right to Counsel Warrants Reversal. Family Court must Conduct a 'Searching Inquiry' to Ensure That a Waiver Is Unequivocal, Voluntary, and Intelligent

In Matter of Tarnai v Buchbinder, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 6160756, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07671 (2d Dept.,2015) the mother was found to be indigent and entitled to assigned counsel by the family court. An attorney was appointed to represent her. Less than six months later, the Family Court granted counsels application to be relieved, and assigned the mother a new attorney to represent her. Less than one year later, Family Court granted the application of the mother's second attorney to be relieved, and made a third assignment of counsel. During the course of the hearings her third attorney was relieved of the assignment to represent her. The mother did not join in that application. The Family Court then refused to assign the mother a new attorney, and told the mother that she was required to either hire a new attorney at her own expense, or represent herself in the proceedings. On the next hearing date, the mother indicated that she was unable to find an attorney to represent her. When asked if she was "representing herself at this point," she replied that she was "in search of an attorney but for the time being [she would] fill in." The mother represented herself for the remainder of the hearing. The Appellate Division reversed the order awarding the father custody and remitted to determine if she waived her right to counsel. It observed that a parent in a custody proceeding (Family Ct Act § 262[a]) has the right to counsel and that an indigent party has a right to assigned counsel. Where an indigent party has a right to assigned counsel, this entitlement does not encompass the right to counsel of one's own choosing. An application by an indigent person for the assignment of new counsel may be granted only "upon [a] showing [of] good cause for a substitution. The fact that the mother's three attorneys successfully sought to be relieved of their assignment did not serve to extinguish the mother's right to have an attorney assigned to represent her. A party to a Family Court proceeding who has the right to be represented by counsel may only proceed without counsel if that party has validly waived his or her right to representation. To determine whether a party is validly waiving the statutory right to counsel, the Family Court must conduct a 'searching inquiry' to ensure that the waiver is unequivocal, voluntary, and intelligent. The deprivation of a party's fundamental right to counsel in a custody or visitation proceeding is a denial of due process which requires reversal, regardless of the merits of the unrepresented party's position. The record did not demonstrate that the mother waived her right to counsel. Family Court never determined, in the first instance, whether the mother wanted to waive her right to have an attorney assigned to represent her. It conducted no inquiry to determine whether the mother was waiving her right to counsel and the record demonstrated that the mother "did not wish to proceed pro se, but was forced to do so" even though she was entitled to have an attorney assigned to represent her. Since the mother did not knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waive her right to counsel, the Family Court's order had to be reversed.

Lack of Previous Sexual Relationship with an Alleged Offender Not Dispositive in Determining If There Is "Intimate Relationship" Subject Matter Jurisdiction in Family Court Within the Meaning of Family Ct Act § 812(1)(e)

In Matter of Arita v Goodman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 6181499, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07719 (3d Dept., 2015) Petitioner and respondent lived together as roommates in an apartment from August 2013 until April 2014, at which time petitioner left the residence as result of alleged incidents of domestic violence perpetrated upon her by respondent. Petitioner then commenced a family offense proceeding. Upon learning that petitioner identified as a heterosexual female and that respondent identified as a homosexual male, Family Court granted respondent's oral motion to dismiss the petition, finding on that basis that the parties did not have an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Ct Act § 812(1)(e), and upon the additional conclusion that petitioner had failed to allege any family offense. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for further proceedings. It observed that petitioner's pleadings unambiguously alleged that respondent committed family offenses. It agreed with petitioner that her implicit acknowledgment that she had not had a sexual relationship with respondent did not justify Family Court ruling, as a matter of law, that the two did not have an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Ct Act § 812(1)(e). Factors relevant to determining the existence of an intimate relationship "include but are not limited to: the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship" (Family Ct Act § 812[1][e]). The Legislature unambiguously established that the phrase "intimate relationship" is not limited to relationships that include sexual intimacy. Family Court's determination that the lack of a previous sexual relationship with an alleged offender was dispositive in establishing a lack of subject matter jurisdiction was inconsistent with the plain meaning of Family Ct Act § 812(1)(e). Given Family Court's summary ruling, the record was not sufficiently developed to permit it to determine whether the parties have an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e).

Attorney Held in Contempt of Court For Interrupting Court Entitled to reasonable opportunity to make a statement in defense or in extenuation of conduct.

In Matter of Davidson v Visitacion-Lewis, 131 A.D.3d 888 131 A.D.3d 888, 16 N.Y.S.3d 552, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 06974(1st Dept.,2015) during a one-day hearing respondent ordered petitioner to be quiet, and warned petitioner that if she continued interrupting the court, she would be found in contempt. Later in the hearing, respondent issued the two contempt citations when petitioner spoke before the court had completed its statements. These summary contempt findings were not supported by sufficient evidence; counsel's perceived misconduct can be best described as petty transgressions, in which counsel prematurely sought to explain her client's position or dispute a factual assertion by the court. Counsel's conduct did not rise to the level contemplated by 22 NYCRR § 604.2(a)(1). The Court noted that even if the nature of counsel's conduct had justified a contempt finding under 22 NYCRR § 604.2(a)(1), respondent failed to comply with 22 NYCRR § 604.2(a)(3), which requires that a person accused of contempt be afforded "a reasonable opportunity to make a statement in his defense or in extenuation of his conduct.” “The record was devoid of the essential proffer in open court’ to the accused prior to imposition of the sanction. It also agreed with petitioner’s assertion that she was deprived of her constitutional right to due process by the lack of an opportunity to be heard on this matter affecting her reputation (see Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433, 437, 91 S.Ct. 507, 27 L.Ed.2d 515 [1971]).

Matrimonial Lawyer Who Represented Himself in Divorce Act Sanctioned for Frivolous Conduct

In Borstein v Henneberry, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 5928262, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07425 (1st Dept.,2015) the parties were divorced in December 2009. Plaintiff husband, an experienced matrimonial lawyer, who represented himself in the divorce proceeding was sanctioned twice during that action. In the parties post-trial memoranda, the husband claimed that he loaned the wife “$27,000 during the years after the filing for divorce” to allow her to finance a business venture. The courts decision did not specifically address the $27,000 loan, but stated that “[a]ny arguments raised by the parties which have not been expressly addressed in this decision are rejected.” The husband then commenced an action against the wife seeking recovery of the same $27,000. The wife’s counsel sent the husband a letter asking him to discontinue the action voluntarily because the divorce action had determined his rights regarding the loan in light of the court’s ruling on the husband’s request for credits. Supreme Court granted the wife’s motion and dismissed the complaint, concluding that the loan was “fully and actively litigated by [the husband]” in the divorce action. The wife’s subsequent motion for attorneys fees and sanctions due to the husband’s “frivolous and improperly motivated” lawsuit was denied. The Appellate Division reversed and imposed sanctions of $5000 and defendant awarded reasonable costs and attorneys’ fees associated with defending the action and with the appeal, in an amount to be determined on remand. It found that after the husband made a claim in the divorce action for repayment of the $27,000 “loan,” and Supreme Court rejected it, he then failed to challenge that finding on direct appeal. It is well settled that “res judicata bars a subsequent plenary action concerning an issue of marital property which could have been, but was not, raised in the prior matrimonial action”. The Appellate Division observed that it was required to consider “the circumstances under which the conduct took place” when reviewing a sanctions motion (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c]). Here, the circumstances were that the husband, an experienced divorce lawyer, ignored a long-standing principle of matrimonial jurisprudence. Thus, his decision to commence an action that he knew, or should have known, was futile from its inception, weighed heavily in favor of a finding that his conduct was intended solely to harass the wife. The Appellate Division held that aside from the blatant lack of merit to the complaint, other factors justifying sanctions and attorneys’ fees were present. First, the wife expressly informed the husband that she considered the action barred by res judicata and urged him to discontinue it, but he pressed on, forcing her to expend unnecessary resources. Such unreasonable persistence in a position that has been demonstrated to be frivolous warrants the imposition of sanctions. Further, this was not the first instance in which the husband has taken a position that was not legally tenable. Coupled with these earlier incidents, the commencement of this action exhibited a “broad pattern ... of delay, harassment and obfuscation” that warranted the imposition of sanctions and attorneys’ fees.

Parties Entitled to Notice of Filing of Referees Report and Opportunity to Object

In Matter of Witzigman v Witzigman, 2015 WL 5893746 (4th Dept., 2015) the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in adopting the Referee's report without providing the parties with notice of the filing of the report and affording them an opportunity to object to it (see 22 NYCRR 202.44[a]). The record established that the Referee was authorized only to hear the matter and issue a report inasmuch as the mother did not consent to the referral to the Referee for a final determination on the father's petition. It reversed the order, and remitted the matter to Family Court for compliance with 22 NYCRR 202.44.

Family Court Act § 454(3) Allows Court a Choice of Probation or Jail upon Finding of a Willful Violation of a Support Order, but it Does Not Authorize Both Probation and a Jail Term

In Matter of Heffner v. Jaskowiak, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 5894021, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07413 (4th Dept., 2015) the Appellate Division affirmed an order finding that the father willfully violated an order of child support. Although the father did not challenge the legality of his sentence, it noted that the sentence imposed sentence of three months in jail and three years' probation was illegal. Family Court Act § 454(3) explicitly allows the court a choice of probation or jail upon a finding of a willful violation of a support order, but it does not authorize both probation and a jail term. The Appellate Division observed that it has inherent authority to correct an illegal sentence and may consider the legality of the sentence despite the father's failure to raise the issue in Family Court "because it involves a court's 'essential' authority to incarcerate, as legally prescribed” (Matter of Walker v. Walker, 86 N.Y.2d 624, 627). The record established that the father had completed his three-month jail term, and it vacated the additional sentence of probation.

Laws of 2015, Ch 347

Laws of 2015, Ch 347, § 1 amended Social Services Law § 111-i to align the timing of the adjustment of the Combined Parental Income Adjustment with the adjustment of the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person and the self-support reserve.

Laws of 2015, Ch 369

Laws of 2105, Ch 369, § 2 repealed Article 5-B of the Family Court Act and enacted the 2008 version of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA) as a new Article 5-B of the Family Court Act. Chapter 369 was signed into law on September 25, 2015. Section 1 is effective on December 24, 2015. New Article 5-B to the Family Court Act applies to any action or proceeding filed or order issued on or before the effective date of new Article 5-B, consistent with new section 580-903 of the Family Court Act which shall be effective on January 1, 2016.

Court of Appeals Reaffirms Holding That Contempt of Court Does Not Require a Finding of Wilfulness

In El-Dehdan v El-Dehdan, --- N.E.3d ----, 2015 WL 6128760, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 07579 (2015) the Court of Appeals affirmed a determination holding the defendant in civil contempt failure to comply with a January 2010 order issued in the course of the parties' matrimonial proceeding, that required him to deposit in escrow the proceeds of the sale of properties which were the subject of a prior equitable distribution determination in favor of plaintiff. It held that a civil contempt determination does not require a finding of a contemnor's wilful violation of the underlying order, and that Supreme Court could draw a negative inference from defendant's invocation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination at the contempt hearing, where there was a joint hearing on the issues of both criminal and civil contempt, where the defendant did nothing to seek bifurcation of the issues before the contempt hearing.

After plaintiff's attorney learned defendant had transferred certain properties which were awarded to the defendant in a judgment of divorce, she filed an order to show cause in January 2010 seeking, inter alia, that defendant be held in civil contempt for violation of an October 2008 order,(which the parties mistakenly believed restrained the transfer of those properties. and that he be required to deposit the proceeds from the transfers with plaintiff's attorney.) The order to show cause, in addition to scheduling a hearing on plaintiff's contempt motion, directed defendant to immediately deposit with plaintiff's counsel the net proceeds of the transfers, reduced by broker's fees, taxes and mortgage payments. Defendant was personally served with this order to show cause. In August 2010, plaintiff filed a motion to hold defendant in civil and criminal contempt for his failure to deposit the proceeds with plaintiff's attorney as required by the January 2010 order. Defendant cross moved to vacate that order, arguing that it was void because it was obtained by plaintiff's fraud upon the court, namely her misrepresentations that the October 2008 order prohibited defendant's transfer of the properties.

At the contempt hearing Plaintiff testified on her own behalf that she received none of the proceeds from the transfer of the Brooklyn property and submitted into evidence proof of the transfer, including defendant's contract of sale and closing. Plaintiff further submitted into evidence an affidavit of personal service for the January 2010 order. Plaintiff also called defendant as a witness. During his testimony he refused to answer any questions related to the proceeds from the transfer, and invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. Specifically, he refused to explain what he did with the proceeds from the transfer and whether he was currently in possession of the money.

In the Court of Appeals defendant challenged the Appellate Division's decision on three grounds: plaintiff failed to establish the necessary elements of civil contempt, including defendant's wilful violation of a lawful court order; he was denied the opportunity to collaterally attack the January 2010 order; and in the context of a hearing on a joint civil and criminal contempt motion, Supreme Court may not draw a negative inference from defendant's invocation of his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent.

The Court of Appeals rejected each of these arguments. It observed that in Matter of McCormick v. Axelrod (59 N.Y.2d 574 [1983]), it described the elements necessary to support a finding of civil contempt. First, "it must be determined that a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, was in effect" . Second, "[i]t must appear, with reasonable certainty, that the order has been disobeyed" Third, "the party to be held in contempt must have had knowledge of the court's order, although it is not necessary that the order actually have been served upon the party" Fourth, "prejudice to the right of a party to the litigation must be demonstrated". In order to carry her burden, plaintiff had to establish by clear and convincing evidence defendant's violation of the January 2010 order. The Court found that "a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, was in effect." The signed January 2010 order explicitly stated that the defendant "shall deposit immediately with the Plaintiff's attorney the sum of nine hundred fifty thousand ($950,000.00) dollars which is the sum of money he purportedly received from the transfer of [the property] 171 Ainslie Street, Brooklyn, New York and 64-17 60th Road, Maspeth, New York, minus the money paid for [the] real estate broker, transfer taxes and payment of the underlying mortgage." The Court held that this unambiguous directive, constituted "a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, [that] was in effect").

The Court held that to the extent defendant complained that the January 2010 order is invalid because it was issued ex parte, the law is clear that a court is authorized to issue an order to preserve marital property, both in advance of, and upon, a determination of equitable distribution. Referring to Domestic Relations Law § 234, the court held that the January 2010 order to deposit the proceeds from the transfer was well within the court's authority. Inasmuch as the court awarded plaintiff the Brooklyn and Maspeth properties in its equitable distribution determination it was perfectly lawful for the court to require defendant to deposit the proceeds of his transfer of those properties with plaintiff's counsel, regardless of whether the initial transfer of the properties violated any court order.

The Court rejected defendant's argument that the finding of contempt was not supported by the record because the evidence failed to establish that he wilfully disobeyed the January 2010 order.. Nowhere in Judiciary Law § 753 [A][3] is wilfulness explicitly set forth as an element of civil contempt It held that wilfulness is not an element of civil contempt. It agreed with the Appellate Division that civil contempt is established, regardless of the contemnor's motive, when disobedience of the court's order "defeats, impairs, impedes, or prejudices the rights or remedies of a party".

Once plaintiff met her burden and established that defendant violated the order to deposit the proceeds from the transfer, it was incumbent upon defendant to proffer evidence of his inability to pay. Nonetheless, defendant failed to submit evidence that he could not pay due to a lack of sufficient funds, economic distress or financial hardship, or some other obstacle to his compliance with the January 2010 order to deposit the proceeds. Instead, he submitted an affidavit containing bald face statements that by January 29, 2010, he “was no longer in possession of the proceeds of the March, 2009 sale, and that he received nothing from the transfer of the Maspeth property as he was merely holding it in his name for friends. The Court held that such vague and conclusory allegations of ... inability to pay or perform are not acceptable. Rather, courts have required a more specific showing of the contemnor’s economic status

The Court rejected defendants argument that Supreme Court improperly drew a negative inference from his invocation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination during the contempt hearing. He maintained that by holding one hearing on plaintiff’s joint motion for civil and criminal contempt he was forced to choose between protecting himself against civil liability by testifying as to his lack of funds, and exercising his rights under the Fifth Amendment to remain silent so as to avoid criminal contempt. The Court found this argument unpersuasive and concluded that under the circumstances of this case, where defendant failed to take steps to avoid the alleged dilemma complained of here, Supreme Court acted within its authority to draw a negative inference, and in so doing did not violate defendant’s constitutional rights. The Court observed that, the right against self incrimination does not automatically insulate a party to a civil action from potential liability. Both the United States Supreme Court, in Baxter v. Palmigiano (425 U.S. 308, 318 [1976]), and the Court of Appeals , in Marine Midland Bank v. Russo Produce (50 N.Y.2d 31, 42 [1980]), have held that a negative inference may be drawn in the civil context when a party invokes the right against self incrimination. Defendant could invoke the privilege, but that did not relieve him of his burden to present adequate evidence of his financial inability to comply with the January 2010 order so as to avoid civil contempt liability. Defendant relied on his conclusory statements that he no longer had the proceeds of the transfers and that he has no funds to deposit with the respondent’s attorney. He could not seek to avoid the consequences of this failure to proffer sufficient evidence by invoking his Fifth Amendment right. The Court pointed out that it might have viewed this case differently if defendant had sought relief from Supreme Court to avoid the prejudice he claimed was the result of a joint civil and criminal contempt hearing. If defendant was concerned about the spill-over effect of invoking his Fifth Amendment right, he could have sought to bifurcate the hearing so that the court would first consider plaintiff’s criminal contempt allegations. He chose not to do so. Because he failed to seek this relief before Supreme Court, in the first instance, he could not complain that Supreme Court erred in drawing negative inferences specifically allowed by law.

Summary of the Amendments

The amendments eliminated “enhanced earning capacity as a marital asset” for purposes of equitable distribution (Domestic Relations Law §236 [B] [5] [d] [7]) but did not eliminate as a factor the direct or indirect contributions to the development during the marriage of the enhanced earning capacity of the other spouse. They adopted mandatory guidelines with formulas for the calculation of maintenance and spousal support awards, (Domestic Relations Law §236 [B] [6] and Family Court Act § 412), added actual or partial retirement as a ground for modification of post-divorce maintenance where it results in a substantial diminution of income. (Domestic Relations Law §236 [B] [9] [1]) and made Domestic Relations Law § 248 gender neutral.

Income Cap Lowered

The amendments lowered the income cap for the formula portion of temporary maintenance awards, (Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [5-a]) from the current $543,000 to $175,000 of the payor's income.

An income cap of $175,000 cap applies to post-divorce maintenance awards and spousal support awards.

Temporary Maintenance

There is a new formula for determining temporary maintenance.

In determining temporary maintenance, the court can allocate the responsibility for payment of specific family expenses between the parties.

The temporary maintenance award must terminate no later than the issuance of a judgment of divorce or the death of either party. This amendment is intended to clarify that the Supreme Court has the power to limit the duration of temporary maintenance.

New Formulas for Calculating Temporary Maintenance, Post-Divorce Maintenance and Spousal Support

There now mandatory formulas for the calculation of maintenance and spousal support awards.

There are two formulas to be used in calculating maintenance and spousal support: one where child support will be paid and where the temporary maintenance payor, post-divorce maintenance payor or spousal support payor is also the non-custodial parent for child support purposes; and one where child support will not be paid, or where it will be paid but the temporary maintenance payor, post-divorce maintenance payor or spousal support payor is the custodial parent for child support purposes.

Those formulas are as follows:

a. With child support where the temporary maintenance payor, post-divorce maintenance payor or spousal support payor is also the non-custodial parent for child support purposes: (i) subtract 25% of the maintenance payee's income from 20% of the maintenance payor's income; (ii) multiply the sum of the maintenance payor's income and the maintenance payee's income by 40% and subtract the maintenance payee's income from the result; (iii) the lower of the two amounts will be the guideline amount of maintenance;

b. Without child support, or with child support but where the temporary maintenance payor, post-divorce maintenance payor or spousal support payor is the custodial parent for child support purposes: (i) subtract 20% of the maintenance payee's income from 30% of the maintenance payor's income; (ii) multiply the sum of the maintenance payor's income and the maintenance payee's income by 40% and subtract the maintenance payee's income from the result; (iii) the lower of the two amounts will be the guideline amount of maintenance.

C

Post-Divorce Maintenance Guidelines

The definition of income for post-divorce maintenance includes income from income-producing property that is being equitably distributed.

Factors the court may consider in post-divorce maintenance now include termination of child support, and income or imputed income on assets being equitably distributed. c

There is an "advisory" durational formula for determining the duration of post-divorce maintenance awards. However, nothing prevents the court from awarding non-durational, post-divorce maintenance in an appropriate case. In determining the duration of maintenance, the court is required to consider anticipated retirement assets, benefits and retirement eligibility age.

Modification of Post-Divorce Maintenance

cActual or partial retirement is a ground for modification of post-divorce maintenance assuming it results in a substantial diminution of income.

Spousal Support Guidelines for Family Court

cSpousal support guidelines are established for Family Court using the same two formulas set forth for maintenance guidelines, as follows: one where child support will be paid and where the spousal support payor is also the non-custodial parent for child support purposes; and one where child support will not be paid, or where child support will be paid but the spousal support payor is the custodial parent for child support purposes. The $175,000 income cap applies.

The court may adjust the guideline amount of spousal support up to the income cap where it finds that the guideline amount of spousal support is unjust or inappropriate after consideration of one or more factors, which shall be set forth in the court's written or on the record decision.

Where there is income over the cap, additional spousal support may be awarded after consideration of one or more factors, which shall be set forth in the court's written or on the record decision.

A new factor for the court to consider in spousal support awards as well as maintenance awards is termination of a child support award.

The Family Court may modify an order of spousal support upon a showing of a substantial change in circumstances. Unless so modified, spousal support orders set pursuant to the guidelines shall continue until the earliest to occur of a written or oral stipulation/agreement on the record, issuance of a judgment of divorce or other order in a matrimonial proceeding, or the death of either party. This is not intended to change current law with respect to Family Court's ability to terminate spousal support. (See NY Legis. Memo 237 (2015)).

Effective Date

The amendments become effective January 25, 2015 and apply to all matrimonial and Family Court actions for spousal support commenced on or after such effective date, including the provisions regarding post-divorce maintenance and spousal support awards. However, the provisions regarding temporary maintenance take effect October 25, 2015.

Commentary

Laws of 2015, Ch 269, effective January 23, 2016, amended Domestic Relations Law §236[B][5][d][7] - The Demise of O'Brien

In O'Brien v O'Brien, (1985) 66 NY2d 576, 498 NYS2d 743, 489 NE2d 712, on remand (2d Dept) 120 App Div 2d 656, 502 NYS2d 250 the Court of Appeals charted the future course of the Equitable Distribution Law. In doing so it mandated that the statute be given a liberal interpretation in order to achieve its objective of an equitable division of family assets upon divorce. In O'Brien the husband's medical degree or license was classified as "marital property" because at the time of divorce he was still in residency and had no medical practice. The timing of the commencement of the divorce action in O'Brien precluded any distributive award based upon a medical practice, which had not yet been established. Dr. O'Brien had acquired a medical degree and license during his 9-year marriage, but he had no medical practice. The court did not award Mrs. O'Brien any interest in the husband's future medical practice nor did it mortgage his professional future.

The Court of Appeals expanded the O'Brien rule when it decided McSparron v McSparron (1995) 87 NY2d 275, 639 NYS2d 265, 662 NE2d 745. In a resounding reaffirmation of O'Brien the court concluded that even after a license has been exploited by the licensee to establish and maintain a career, it does not "merge" with the career or ever lose its character as a separate, distributable asset.

The Court of Appeals revisited, reaffirmed and refined its McSparron holding in Grunfeld v. Grunfeld 94 N.Y.2d 696, 709 N.Y.S.2d 486, 731 N.E.2d 142 (2000). The Court of Appeals held that, to comply with McSparron, Supreme Court had to reduce either the income available to make maintenance payments or the marital assets available for distribution, or some combination of the two. Once a court converts a specific stream of income into an asset, that income may no longer be calculated into the maintenance formula and payout. It stated that where license income is considered in setting maintenance, a court can avoid double counting by reducing the distributive award based on that same income.

Domestic Relations Law §236[B] [5] [d] [7] was amended, thirty years after the O'Brien decision to eliminate enhanced earning capacity as a marital asset. The amendment added the following paragraph to factor 7 for property distribution: The court shall not consider as marital property subject to distribution the value of a spouse's enhanced earning capacity arising from a license, degree, celebrity goodwill, or career enhancement. However, in arriving at an equitable division of marital property, the court shall consider the direct or indirect contributions to the development during the marriage of the enhanced earning capacity of the other spouse.

The amendment was intended to eliminate enhanced earning capacity as a marital asset, thus, legislatively overruling McSparron and Grunfeld too. However, vestiges of O'Brien remain. In arriving at an equitable division of marital property, the court may consider the direct or indirect contributions to the development during the marriage of the enhanced earning capacity of the other spouse. This requires the spouse requesting the court to consider his or her contributions to the development of the enhanced earning capacity of the other spouse to establish: (1) that the other spouse has an enhanced earning capacity attributable to a license, degree, celebrity goodwill, or career enhancement and (2) the value of such enhanced earning capacity, before the court can consider his or her contributions to the development of such enhanced earning capacity.

Laws of 2015, Ch 269, amended Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [6] effective January 23, 2016. – Post-Divorce Maintenance

Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][6] was amended by establishing post-divorce maintenance guidelines and a statutory formula for determining the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance awards, with factors for deviation, where the award is unjust or inappropriate.

The application of the post-divorce maintenance guidelines is mandatory. In any matrimonial action the court must make its award for post-divorce maintenance pursuant to the provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6], except where the parties have entered into an agreement pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][3] providing for maintenance.

Under the guidelines "Payor" means the spouse with the higher income. " Payee" means the spouse with the lower income.

"Length of marriage" means the period from the date of marriage until the date of commencement of action.

"Income cap" means up to and including $175,000 of the payor's annual income. However, beginning January 31, 2016 and every two years thereafter, the income cap amount will increase by the sum of the average annual percentage changes in the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) as published by the united states department of labor bureau of labor statistics for the prior two years multiplied by the then income cap and then rounded to the nearest one thousand dollars. The office of court administration is required to determine and publish the income cap.

The court must first determine the income of the parties before determining the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance.

"Income" means: (a) income as defined in Domestic Relations Law § 240 and Family Court Act § 413 without subtracting alimony or maintenance actually paid or to be paid to a spouse that is a party to the action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240 [1-b] [b][5][vii][c] and Family Court Act § 413[b][5][vii][c] and without subtracting spousal support paid pursuant to Family Court Act § 412; and (b) income from income-producing property distributed or to be distributed pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5].

To determine the post-divorce maintenance guideline amount, the court must compare two calculations of the spouses' annual incomes, up to an income cap of $175,000 on the payor's income.

A. Where the Payor's income is lower than or equal to the income cap

I. Where child support is paid and where the maintenance payor is also the non-custodial parent for child support purposes the following calculation is done:

- (a) subtract 25% of the payee's income from 20% of the payor's income;
- (b) multiply the sum of the payor's income and the payee's income by 40%;
- (c) subtract the payee's income from the result;
- (d) determine the lower of these two amounts.

The guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance is the amount determined by Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][c][1][d]. However, if the amount determined by Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][c][1][d] is less than or equal to zero, the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance is zero dollars.

If child support will be paid for children of the marriage but the payor is the custodial parent, post-divorce maintenance must be calculated prior to child support because the amount of post-divorce maintenance must be subtracted from the payor's income and added to the payee's income as part of the calculation of the child support obligation.

II. Where the payor's income exceeds the income cap, the court must determine the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance as follows.

The court must perform the calculations set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6][c] for the income of the payor up to and including the income cap;

For income exceeding the cap, the amount of additional maintenance awarded, if any, is within the discretion of the court which must take into consideration any one or more of the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][e][1].

The factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][e][1] are:

- (a) the age and health of the parties;
- (b) the present or future earning capacity of the parties, including a history of limited participation in the workforce;
- (c) the need of one party to incur education or training expenses;
- (d) the termination of a child support award before the termination of the maintenance award when the calculation of maintenance was based upon child support being awarded which resulted in a maintenance award lower than it would have been had child support not been awarded;
- (e) the wasteful dissipation of marital property, including transfers or encumbrances made in contemplation of a matrimonial action without fair consideration;
- (f) the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household;
- (g) acts by one party against another that have inhibited or continue to inhibit a party's earning capacity or ability to obtain meaningful employment. Such acts include but are not limited to acts of domestic violence as provided in section four hundred fifty-nine-a of the social services law;
- (h) the availability and cost of medical insurance for the parties;
- (i) the care of children or stepchildren, disabled adult children or stepchildren, elderly parents or in-laws provided during the marriage that inhibits a party's earning capacity;
- (j) the tax consequences to each party;
- (k) the standard of living of the parties established during the marriage;
- (l) the reduced or lost earning capacity of the payee as a result of having forgone or delayed education, training, employment or career opportunities during the marriage;
- (m) the equitable distribution of marital property and the income or imputed income on the assets so distributed;
- (n) the contributions and services of the payee as a spouse, parent, wage earner and homemaker and to the career or career potential of the other party; and
- (o) any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper.

Unjust or Inappropriate

The court must order the post-divorce maintenance guideline obligation up to the income cap in accordance with Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][c], unless the court finds that the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance is unjust or inappropriate based upon consideration of any one or more of the factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][e][1], and the court adjusts the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance accordingly based upon such considerations.

The factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][e][1] are set forth above.

Where the court finds that the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance is unjust or inappropriate based upon consideration of any one or more of the factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][e][1], and the court adjusts the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance accordingly the court must set forth, in a written decision or on the record, the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance, the factors it considered, and the reasons that the court adjusted the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance. The decision, whether in writing or on the record, may not be waived by either party or counsel.

The "Self-support reserve" means the self-support reserve as defined in the child support standards act and codified in Domestic Relations Law § 240 and Family Court Act § 413.

Where the guideline amount of post-divorce maintenance would reduce the payor's income below the self-support reserve for a single person, the guideline amount of the post-divorce maintenance is the difference between the payor's income and the self-support reserve. If the payor's income is below the self-support reserve, there is a rebuttable presumption that no post-divorce maintenance is to be awarded.

Duration of Post-Divorce Maintenance

The court may, but is not required to determine the duration of post-divorce maintenance in accordance with the following advisory schedule:

Length of the marriage	percent of the length of the marriage for which maintenance will be payable
0 up to and including 15 years	15% - 30%
More than 15 up to and including 20 years	30% - 40%
More than 20 years	35% - 50%

In determining the duration of post-divorce maintenance, whether or not the court utilizes the advisory schedule, it must consider the factors listed in Domestic Relations Law §236[B][6][e][1] and must set forth, in a written decision or on the record, the factors it considered. The decision may not be waived by either party or counsel. Nothing shall prevent the court from awarding non-durational maintenance in an appropriate case.

The factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [6][f][2] are set forth above.

Post-divorce maintenance terminates upon the death of either party or upon the payee's valid or invalid marriage, or upon modification pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][9][b] or Domestic Relations Law § 248.

When determining the duration of post-divorce maintenance, the court must take into consideration anticipated retirement assets, benefits, and retirement eligibility age of both parties if ascertainable at the time of decision. If not ascertainable at the time of decision, the actual full or partial retirement of the payor with substantial diminution of income is a basis for a modification of the award.

Opting Out of Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][6]

The parties have the right to voluntarily enter into validly executed agreements or stipulations which deviate from the post-divorce maintenance guideline obligation.

Laws of 2015, Ch 269 amended Family Court Act § 412 effective January 23, 2016 – Spousal support

Family Court Act § 412 was amended by establishing spousal support guidelines and a statutory formula for determining the guideline amount of spousal support awards, with factors for deviation, where the award is unjust or inappropriate.

The application of the spousal support guidelines is mandatory. A married person is chargeable with the support of his or her spouse and, except where the parties have entered into an agreement pursuant to Family Court Act §425 providing for support, the court, upon application by a party, must make its award for spousal support pursuant to the provisions of Part 1 of Article 4 of the Family Court Act.

Under the guidelines "Payor" means the spouse with the higher income. "Payee" means the spouse with the lower income. "

"Income cap" means up to and including $175,000 of the payor's annual income.

The court must first determine the income of the parties before determining the guideline amount of spousal support.

"Income" means income as defined in Domestic Relations Law § 240 and Family Court Act § 413 without subtracting alimony or maintenance actually paid or to be paid to a spouse that is a party to the action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240 [1-b] [b][5][vii][c] and Family Court Act § 413[b][5][vii][c].

To determine the spousal support guideline amount, the court must compare two calculations of the spouses' annual incomes, up to an income cap of $175,000 on the payor's income.

A. Where the payor's income is lower than or equal to the income cap

I. Where child support is paid and where the maintenance payor is also the non-custodial parent for child support purposes the following calculation is done:

- (a) subtract 25% of the payee's income from 20% of the payor's income;
- (b) multiply the sum of the payor's income and the payee's income by 40%;
- (c) subtract the payee's income from the result;
- (d) determine the lower of these two amounts.

The guideline amount of spousal support is the amount determined by Family Court Act §412 [3][a] [4]. However, if the amount determined by Family Court Act §412 [3][a] [4] is less than or equal to zero, the guideline amount of spousal support is zero dollars.

Spousal support must be calculated prior to child support because the amount of spousal support shall be subtracted from the payor's income and added to the payee's income as part of the calculation of the child support obligation.

II. Where child support is not paid or where child support is paid but the maintenance payor is the custodial parent for child support purposes the following calculation is done:

- (a) subtract 20% of the payee's income from 30% of the payor's income;
- (b) multiply the sum of the payor's income and the payee's income by 40%;
- (c) subtract the payee's income from the result;
- (d) the lower of the two amounts will be the guideline amount of spousal support.

The guideline amount of spousal support is the amount determined by Family Court Act §412 [3][b][4]. However, if the amount determined by Family Court Act §412 [3][b] [4] is less than or equal to zero, the guideline amount of spousal support is zero dollars.

If child support will be paid for children of the marriage but the payor is the custodial parent pursuant to the child support standards act, spousal support must be calculated prior to child support because the amount of spousal support must be subtracted from the payor's income and added to the payee's income as part of the calculation of the child support obligation.

B. Where the payor's income exceeds the income cap, the court must determine the guideline amount of spousal support as follows:

- (a) The court must perform the calculations set forth in Family Court Act §412 [3] for the income of the payor up to and including the income cap; and

(b)For income exceeding the cap, the amount of additional spousal support awarded, if any, shall be within the discretion of the court which must take into consideration any one or more of the factors set forth in Family Court Act §412[6][a]; and

The factors in in Family Court Act §412[6][a] are:

- (1)the age and health of the parties;
- (2)the present or future earning capacity of the parties, including a history of limited participation in the workforce;
- (3)the need of one party to incur education or training expenses;
- (4)the termination of a child support award during the pendency of the spousal support award when the calculation of spousal support was based upon child support being awarded which resulted in a spousal support award lower than it would have been had child support not been awarded;
- (5)the wasteful dissipation of marital property, including transfers or encumbrances made in contemplation of a support proceeding without fair consideration;
- (6)the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-support proceedings separate household;
- (7)acts by one party against another that have inhibited or continue to inhibit a party's earning capacity or ability to obtain meaningful employment. Such acts include but are not limited to acts of domestic violence as provided in section four hundred fifty-nine-a of the social services law;
- (8)the availability and cost of medical insurance for the parties;
- (9)the care of children or stepchildren, disabled adult children or stepchildren, elderly parents or in-laws provided during the marriage that inhibits a party's earning capacity;
- (10)the tax consequences to each party;
- (11)the standard of living of the parties established during the marriage;
- (12)the reduced or lost earning capacity of the payee as a result of having forgone or delayed education, training, employment or career opportunities during the marriage;
- (13)the contributions and services of the payee as a spouse, parent, wage earner and homemaker and to the career or career potential of the other party;
- (14)any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper.

The court must set forth the factors it considered and the reasons for its decision in writing or on the record. Such decision, whether in writing or on the record, may not be waived by either party or counsel.

Unjust or Inappropriate

The court must order the guideline amount of spousal support up to the cap in accordance with Family Court Act § 412 [3], unless the court finds that the guideline amount of spousal support is unjust or inappropriate, which finding must be based upon consideration of any one or more of the factors in Family Court Act § 412 [6][a], and adjusts the guideline amount of spousal support accordingly based upon consideration of the factors in Family Court Act § 412 [6][a], set forth above.

Where the court finds that the guideline amount of spousal support is unjust or inappropriate and the court adjusts the guideline amount of spousal support pursuant to Family Court Act §412 [6][a] the court must set forth, in a written decision or on the record, the guideline amount of spousal support, the factors it considered, and the reasons that the court adjusted the guideline amount of spousal support. The decision, whether in writing or on the record, may not be waived by either party or counsel.

Self-Support Reserve - Rebuttable presumption that no temporary maintenance is awarded.

The "Self-support reserve" means the self-support reserve as defined in the child support standards act and codified in Domestic Relations Law § 240 and Family Court Act § 413.

Where the guideline amount of spousal support would reduce the payor's income below the self-support reserve for a single person, the guideline amount of spousal support is the difference between the payor's income and the self-support reserve. If the payor's income is below the self-support reserve, there is a rebuttable presumption that no spousal support is to be awarded.

Modification of Spousal Support Order

The court may modify an order of spousal support upon a showing of a substantial change in circumstances. Unless so modified, any order for spousal support issued pursuant to Family Court Act § 412 section shall continue until the earliest to occur of the following:

- (a) a written stipulation or agreement between the parties;
- (b) an oral stipulation or agreement between the parties entered into on the record in open court;
- (c) issuance of a judgment of divorce or other order in a matrimonial proceeding;
- (d) the death of either party.

Laws of 2015, Ch 269 amended Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [5-a], effective October 25, 2015 – Temporary Maintenance

Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [5-a] was amended by establishing a new formula for determining the guideline amount of temporary maintenance awards, with factors for deviation, where the award is unjust or inappropriate.

The application of the temporary maintenance guidelines is mandatory. In any matrimonial action the court must make its award for temporary maintenance pursuant to the provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [5-a], except where the parties have entered into an agreement pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [3] providing for maintenance.

Under the guidelines "Payor" means the spouse with the higher income." Payee" means the spouse with the lower income.

"Length of marriage" means the period from the date of marriage until the date of commencement of action.

"Income cap" means up to and including $175,000 of the payor's annual income. However, beginning January 31, 2016 and every two years thereafter, the income cap amount will increase by the sum of the average annual percentage changes in the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) as published by the United States department of labor bureau of labor statistics for the prior two years multiplied by the then income cap and then rounded to the nearest one thousand dollars. The office of court administration is required to determine and publish the income cap.

Determine the Income of the Parties

The court must first determine the income of the parties before determining the guideline amount of temporary maintenance.

"Income" means income as defined in Domestic Relations Law § 240 and Family Court Act § 413 without subtracting alimony or maintenance actually paid or to be paid to a spouse that is a party to the action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240 [1-b] [b][5][vii][c] and Family Court Act § 413[b][5][vii][c] and without subtracting spousal support paid pursuant to Family Court Act § 412.

To determine the temporary maintenance guideline amount, the court must compare two calculations of the spouses' annual incomes, up to an income cap of $175,000 on the payor's income.

A. Where the payor's income is lower than or equal to the Income Cap

I. Where child support is paid and where the payor is also the non-custodial parent pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act the following calculation is done:

- (a) subtract 25% of the payee's income from 20% of the payor's income;
- (b) multiply the sum of the payor's income and the payee's income by 40%;
- (c) subtract the maintenance payee's income from the result;
- (d) The lower of these two amounts is the temporary maintenance guideline amount.

The guideline amount of temporary maintenance is the amount determined by Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c][1][d]. However, if the amount determined by Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c][1][d] is less than or equal to zero, the guideline amount of temporary maintenance is zero dollars.

Temporary maintenance must be calculated prior to child support because the amount of temporary maintenance must be subtracted from the payor's income and added to the payee's income as part of the calculation of the child support obligation.

II. Where child support will not be paid for children of the marriage or where child support will be paid for children of the marriage but the payor is the custodial parent pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act the following calculation is done:

- (a) subtract 20% of the payee's income from 30% of the payor's income;
- (b) multiply the sum of the payor's income and the payee's income by 40%;
- (c) subtract the payee's income from the result;
- (d) determine the lower of the two amounts.

The court must select the lower of these two amounts as the temporary maintenance guideline amount.

The guideline amount of temporary maintenance is the amount determined by Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c][2][d]. However, if the amount determined by Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c][2][d] is less than or equal to zero, the guideline amount of temporary maintenance is zero dollars.

If child support will be paid for children of the marriage but the payor is the custodial parent pursuant to the child support standards act, temporary maintenance must be calculated prior to child support because the amount of temporary maintenance must be subtracted from the payor's income and added to the payee's income as part of the calculation of the child support obligation.

B. Where Payor's Income Exceeds the Income Cap

Where the payor's income exceeds the income cap, the court must determine the guideline amount of temporary maintenance as follows.

- (a) Perform the calculations set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c] for the income of the payor up to and including the income cap.
- (b) For income exceeding the cap, the amount of additional maintenance awarded, if any, is within the discretion of the court. In exercising its discretion the court must take into consideration any one or more of the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][h][1].

The factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [5-a][h][1] are:

- (a) the age and health of the parties;
- (b) the present or future earning capacity of the parties, including a history of limited participation in the workforce;
- (c) the need of one party to incur education or training expenses;
- (d) the termination of a child support award during the pendency of the temporary maintenance award when the calculation of temporary maintenance was based upon child support being awarded and which resulted in a maintenance award lower than it would have been had child support not been awarded;
- (e) the wasteful dissipation of marital property, including transfers or encumbrances made in contemplation of a matrimonial action without fair consideration;
- (f) the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household;
- (g) acts by one party against another that have inhibited or continue to inhibit a party's earning capacity or ability to obtain meaningful employment. Such acts include but are not limited to acts of domestic violence as provided in section four hundred fifty-nine-a of the social services law;
- (h) the availability and cost of medical insurance for the parties;
- (i) the care of children or stepchildren, disabled adult children or stepchildren, elderly parents or in-laws provided during the marriage that inhibits a party's earning capacity;
- (j) the tax consequences to each party;
- (k) the standard of living of the parties established during the marriage;
- (l) the reduced or lost earning capacity of the payee as a result of having forgone or delayed education, training, employment or career opportunities during the marriage; and
- (m) any other factor which the court shall expressly find to be just and proper.

The court must set forth the factors it considered and the reasons for its decision in writing or on the record. The decision, whether in writing or on the record, may not be waived by either party or counsel.

Unjust and Inappropriate

The court must order the guideline amount of temporary maintenance up to the income cap in accordance with Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c], unless the court finds that the guideline amount of temporary maintenance is unjust or inappropriate, based upon consideration of one or more of the factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [5-a][h]1, and adjusts the guideline amount of temporary maintenance accordingly based upon such consideration.

The factors in Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [5-a][h]1 are set forth above.

Where the court finds that the guideline amount of temporary maintenance is unjust or inappropriate and the court adjusts the guideline amount of temporary maintenance pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236[B] [5-a][h]1, the court must set forth, in a written decision or on the record, the guideline amount of temporary maintenance, the factors it considered, and the reasons that the court adjusted the guideline amount of temporary maintenance. The decision, whether in writing or on the record, may not be waived by either party or counsel.

Self-Support Reserve - Rebuttable presumption that no temporary maintenance is awarded.

The "Self-support reserve" means the self-support reserve as defined in the child support standards act and codified in Domestic Relations Law § 240 and Family Court Act § 413.

Where the guideline amount of temporary maintenance would reduce the payor's income below the self-support reserve for a single person, the presumptive amount of the guideline amount of temporary maintenance is the difference between the payor's income and the self-support reserve. If the payor's income is below the self-support reserve, there is a rebuttable presumption that no temporary maintenance is to be awarded.

Duration of Temporary Maintenance

The court must determine the duration of temporary maintenance by considering the length of the marriage. "Length of marriage" means the period from the date of marriage until the date of commencement of action. Historically, temporary awards were made during the entire pendency of the action. This language indicates that it was the intention of the legislature to give the court discretion to award temporary maintenance for a limited period of time, rather than for the entire pendency of the action.

Temporary maintenance must terminate no later than the issuance of the judgment of divorce or the death of either party, whichever occurs first.

Opting Out of Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][5-a]

The parties have the right to voluntarily enter into agreements or stipulations as defined in Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][3] which deviate from the presumptive award of temporary maintenance.

Allocation of Family Expenses

In determining temporary maintenance, the court must consider and allocate, where appropriate, the responsibilities of the respective spouses for the family's expenses during the pendency of the proceeding.

Effect Upon Post-Divorce Maintenance Award

The temporary maintenance order may not prejudice the rights of either party regarding a post-divorce maintenance award.

Laws of 2015, Ch 269, amended Domestic Relations Law § 248 effective January 24, 2016.

Domestic Relations Law § 248 was amended to make the section gender neutral and substitute the terms spouse, payor, payee and personal for the terms husband, wife and man.

Laws of 2015, Ch 269 - Modification of Maintenance Awards - Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][9][b][1]

Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][9][b][1] as amended added an additional basis for the court to annul or modify any prior order or judgment for maintenance made after trial upon a showing of a substantial change in circumstance: "actual full or partial retirement of the payor if the retirement results in a substantial change in financial circumstances."

Upon application by either party, the court may annul or modify any prior order or judgment made after trial as to maintenance, upon a showing of the payee's inability to be self-supporting or upon a showing of a substantial change in circumstance, including financial hardship or upon actual full or partial retirement of the payor if the retirement results in a substantial change in financial circumstances.

Where, after the effective date of this part, an agreement remains in force, no modification of an order or judgment incorporating the terms of the agreement may be made as to maintenance without a showing of extreme hardship on either party, in which event the judgment or order as modified shall supersede the terms of the prior agreement and judgment for such period of time and under such circumstances as the court determines.

The court may shall not reduce or annul any arrears of maintenance which have been reduced to final judgment pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §244. No other arrears of maintenance which have accrued prior to the making of the application shall be subject to modification or annulment unless the defaulting party shows good cause for failure to make application for relief from the judgment or order directing such payment prior to the accrual of such arrears and the facts and circumstances constituting good cause are set forth in a written memorandum of decision.

The modification may increase maintenance nunc pro tunc as of the date of application based on newly discovered evidence.

Any retroactive amount of maintenance due shall, except as provided for herein, be paid in one sum or periodic sums, as the court directs, taking into account any temporary or partial payments which have been made.

The provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B][9][b][1] do not apply to a separation agreement made prior to its effective date.

Improper to Base Significant Portion of Custody Decision on off the Record Conferences.

In Minjin Lee v Jianchuang Xu, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 5437333, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 06784 (2d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division observed that as a general rule, it is error to make an order respecting custody based upon controverted allegations without the benefit of a full hearing. Supreme Court, after holding “extensive” in camera discussions with counsel on the issues of excessive corporal punishment and parental alienation, refused to allow testimony on these controverted issues, stating that they were “sporadic and inconsequential.” Instead, the Supreme Court directed that only “positive” aspects of the parties’ parenting be presented on the record. The Appellate Division held that this was error, requiring a new trial, since the court cannot base a significant portion of its decision on off-the-record conferences.

Counsel Fees Denied Wife for Failure to Comply with Uniform Rules. Presumptive Child Support Award Reduced Where Husband Established That Income on Tax Returns Not Reflective of Typical Annual Income

In AG v LG, 2015 WL 5294817 (Table), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 51310(U) (Sup.Ct.,2015) the parties were married on April 26, 2008 and had one child. Defendant vacated the marital residence in June 2015 and plaintiff then commenced an action for a no-fault divorce on July 16, 2015, simultaneously filing a motion for pendente lite relief. Plaintiff was employed at Elizabethtown Community Hospital and defendant operated a dairy farm in Essex County. According to the parties’ 2014 tax return, plaintiff earned $20,887.00 per year and defendant earned $113,305.00 per year. Based upon these figures, plaintiff calculated the presumptively correct amount of temporary child support to be $254.00 per week (DRL § 240[1-b][c]). Defendant opposed plaintiff’s request for temporary child support in this amount, contending that the income on his tax returns was not reflective of his typical annual income: “My income is produced solely from the sale of milk generated on the farm. I sell milk exclusively to AgriMark, Inc., who pays me bi-weekly. “My income is not consistent. It depends exclusively upon milk production and the price that AgriMark, Inc., will pay for milk. My income as it appears on my 2014 state and federal tax returns is not reflective of my typical annual income. It also is not reflective of my anticipated earnings for 2015. In 2014, milk prices were significantly higher than they are for 2015.” In support of these contentions, defendant submitted two monthly statements from AgriMark, Inc., one dated July 18, 2014 and the other dated July 20, 2015, which demonstrated a reduction in the price of milk from $24.7519 per hundred pounds in 2014 to $17.5105 per hundred pounds in 2015. Defendant submitted copies of the parties’ 2012 and 2013 tax returns which listed his annual income as $17,802.00 and $54,653.00, respectively. He also submitted a detailed list of his income and expenses to date for 2015, projecting that his income for the year would be approximately $22,480.00. Defendant requested that the Court calculate temporary child support using plaintiff’s annual salary of $20,887.00 and his projected annual salary of $22,480.00. In view of the evidence submitted by defendant the Court found that an income of $22,480.00 should be used in calculating temporary child support and held that the presumptively correct amount of temporary child support from defendant to plaintiff was $63.69 per week Plaintiff sought interim counsel fees in the amount of $3,000.00, which amount she paid to her attorneys as an initial retainer. In support of this request, plaintiff submitted a copy of the retainer agreement and an affidavit in which she stated that “[b]ecause of the complexity of the issues in this case, including the necessity [of] valu[ing] a farm business, [she] is requesting an interim award of counsel fees in the amount of $3,000[.00].” Counsel for plaintiff did not submit an affirmation of services in support of the request, nor did plaintiff submit a statement of net worth. Supreme Court observed that Uniform Rules for Trial Courts 22 NYCRR) § 202.5(k)(2) provides that no motion for counsel fees pendente lite “shall be heard unless the moving papers include a statement of net worth....” Uniform Rules for Trial Courts (22 NYCRR) § 202.5(k)(3) further provides that no such motion “shall be heard unless the moving papers also include the affidavit of the movant’s attorney stating the moneys, if any, received on account of such attorney’s fee from the movant or any other person on behalf of the movant, the hourly amount charged by the attorney, the amounts paid, or to be paid, to counsel and any experts, and any additional costs, disbursements or expenses, and the moneys such attorney has been promised by, or the agreement made with, the movant or other persons on behalf of the movant, concerning or in payment of the fee. Based upon the foregoing, the Court found that plaintiff was not entitled to the requested award of interim counsel fees.

[Authors note: We believe the court was referring to Uniform Rules for Trial Courts (22 NYCRR) § 202.16, not §202.5]]

In Weissman v Weissman, 2015 WL 4743845 (2d Dept, 2015) the Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court properly held the plaintiff in contempt, for violating the confidentiality provision of a stipulation of settlement that was incorporated into the judgment of divorce which prohibited either party from disclosing to third parties, other than medical or other professionals who were treating or assisting that party in their professional capacity, any of the allegations of misconduct by the parties which had been litigated in the action. However, Supreme Court exceeded its statutory authority by suspending the defendant's obligation to make his maintenance payments of $10,000 per month to the plaintiff for a period of eight months, and by imposing a fine upon the plaintiff in the sum of $7,500. Pursuant to Judiciary Law § 753, a court punishing a party for contempt can impose a fine or imprisonment, or both. Where no actual damages are shown, the amount of a fine for a civil contempt cannot exceed $250 (Judiciary Law § 773). The Supreme Court exceeds its authority when it fashions a remedy not contemplated by the statute. The defendant failed to make any showing of actual damages. Since the plaintiff sent copies of a the letter violating the confidentiality provision to eleven third parties, this was a case in which separate fines may be imposed for multiple acts of disobedience. The amount of the fine imposed was reduced to the statutory maximum of $250 per third party, for a total of $2,750. Supreme Court properly awarded the defendant an attorney's fee pursuant to Judiciary Law § 773.

Threat to Cancel Wedding If Prenuptial Agreement Not Signed Did Not Establish Duress

In Hof v Hof, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 4923395, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 06573 (2d Dept.,2015) the Appellate Division held that the husband's threat to cancel their wedding if the prenuptial agreement was not signed did not establish duress (see Weinstein v. Weinstein, 36 A.D.3d 797, 799, 830 N.Y.S.2d 179). The order, which after a hearing, denied the wife's application to invalidate the prenuptial agreement, was affirmed.

The Appellate Division observed that a court may deviate from the presumptive award of temporary maintenance if that presumptive award is 'unjust or inappropriate. (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][e][2]).Supreme Court downwardly deviated from the presumptive award by awarding the wife the sum of only $1,500 per month in pendente lite maintenance. Contrary to the conclusion of the court, the fact that the husband was maintaining the marital residence where he was living after the wife vacated the marital residence with the children, and the fact that the wife stayed home during a portion of the marriage to take care of the children, did not render the presumptive award of pendente lite maintenance unjust or inappropriate. It modified the award of pendente lite maintenance to provide the wife with the presumptive award of $2,549.70 per month based upon the husband's representation that he had an annual income of $110,020, and the court's deduction of $8,032 for federal insurance contributions act (FICA) taxes.

Former Foster Parent of a Child Does Not Have Standing to File an Adoption Petition or Seek Guardianship Without Agency's Consent

In Matter of Davon D., Slip Copy, 2015 WL 4997885 (Table), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 51264(U) (Fam Ct 2015), a neglect proceeding, the child's former foster parents filed a petition for Guardianship of the child, and in the interim, they sought expanded, overnight visitation with the child. The Family Court held that it could not cannot pursue an eventual return of the child to the foster parents without the consent of the foster care agency. A former foster parent of a child does not have standing to either (1) file an adoption petition for the child or (2) seek guardianship of the child. The Court of Appeals and First Department specifically prohibits both options without the agency's consent. See Matter of Yari, 100 AD3d 200, 206 (1st Dept.2012) ("[T]he agency is the only entity having lawful care and custody of the child, and there is no individual in the position of parent or guardian who has the right to consent, or withhold consent, to an adoption of the child. Consequently, we conclude that adoption of the child in this instance must satisfy the provisions of sections 112 through 114 [of the Domestic Relations Law], covering authorized agency adoptions, and that the framework for private placements adoptions is not applicable here." Likewise, the courts have held that foster parents may not file a custody or guardianship petition under these circumstances, because even if a child's best interests might warrant it, custody and/or guardianship are not proper permanency outcomes at this stage of a case.") Mary Liza J. v. Orange County Dep't of Social Servs., 198 A.D.2d 350 (2nd Dept.1993); In re Michael B., 80 N.Y.2d 299 (1992). The Guardianship petition was dismissed, and the application for overnight visitation was denied.

Supreme Court Permits Discovery of Discovery of Social Media Relevant to the Issue of Custody

In A.D. v C.A. --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 4946422, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 25283 (Sup. Ct., 2015) the defendant moved, inter alia, for an order directing defendant to turn over printouts of all pictures, posts and information posted on her Facebook pages over the past four (4) years or, in the alternative, should defendant not voluntarily produce said records, that defendant be directed to turn over all computer hard drives, data storage systems, flash drive/memory sticks and CD/DVDs created by defendant to plaintiff's retained expert; directing defendant to turn over a copy of the SD card of defendant's smartphone or iPhone. In this action the parties challenged the amount of time the other has spent with the child since his birth and until the commencement of this action. During this time frame, plaintiff worked locally as a social worker counselor. Defendant worked as a medical doctor and psychiatrist. She had been required to travel frequently outside of New York for work. Supreme Court observed that a party demanding access to social networking accounts must demonstrate that the request will lead to “the disclosure of relevant evidence or is reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of information bearing on the claims.” Abrams v. Pecile, 83 AD3d 527, 528 [1st Dept 2011]. A person’s use of privacy settings on social media, such as Facebook, restricting the general public’s access to private postings does not, in and of itself, shield the information from disclosure if portions of the material are material and relevant to the issues of the action. See Patterson v. Turner Construction Company, 88 AD3d 617 [1st Dept 2011]; Richards v. Hertz Corp., 100 AD3d 728, 730 [2d Dept 728], citing Patterson, supra. Courts will not, however, condone what amounts to a fishing expedition. Supreme Court found that the time spent by the parties with the child may be relevant and material to its ultimate determination of custody, and therefore found that the discovery sought herein was properly before the court. S.R.E.B. v. E.K.E.B., 2015 N.Y. Slip Op 51158(U) [Sup.Ct., Kings Co. August 6, 2015]. Defendant denied that her Facebook postings were preserved on her computer’s hard drive, flash drive/memory sticks, CD/DVDs, or other data systems. She denied that her iPhone had an SD card. She also urges the necessity of protecting her privacy and the confidentiality of her patients. The Court directed that defendant take steps to produce printouts of her Facebook postings depicting or describing her whereabouts, outside the New York City area, from the time of the child’s birth through the commencement of the proceeding, whether of her alone, or together with the parties’ child. These postings were to be delivered to the court, for in camera review. Defendant was also directed to submit an authorization permitting the court to have access to her Facebook postings during the applicable time frame. The court sua sponte directed that plaintiff produce any of defendant’s postings he possessed or has access to with an affidavit stating they represented all such Facebook postings possessed by or available to defendant in their entirety during the above time period.

Supreme Court Permits Discovery of Discovery of Travel Records and Audio and Video Files Relevant to the Issue of Custody

In S.R.E.B. v. E.K.E.B., 48 Misc.3d 1217(A), 2015 WL 4726491 (Table), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 51158(U) (Sup.Ct., Kings Co. 2015) prior to the trial of a contested custody proceeding the wife’s attorney served the husband’s attorney with a Notice for Discovery and Inspection, requesting, inter alia, frequent flyer applications, copies of frequent flyer cards and statements, and other travel loyalty accounts, domestic or foreign, in which the husband participated, from January 2008 to October 2014 (Item 30), and any and all records showing flight, train, bus, car rental and accommodation bookings, including frequent flyer trips made by the husband for domestic or foreign work, or vacation travel during the six (6) years preceding the date of notice (Item 32). The husband's Response to Defendant's Notice for Discovery and Inspection, responded to Item 30 with printouts of homepages to frequent flyer and travel loyalty accounts. The pages reflected only introductory information without any details. The husband's response to Item 32 indicated that the documents were provided on October 15, 2014 to the extent that they were in the husband's possession or control, in compliance with the Preliminary Conference Order. The wife, through her counsel, served a second request for copies of the husband's current and most recently canceled Australian and Irish passports, American Airline frequent flyer records from 2003 to date, copies of all itineraries for employment and/or recreational related travel from 2003 to January 1, 2015. The wife also requested all audio and video tape recordings made by the husband in the marital residence. After the husband's attorney filed the Note of Issue the wife's attorney requested that the Court sign a "So Ordered" Trial Subpoena, again demanding copies of the husband's current and most recently canceled Australian and Irish passports, copies of all of the husband's travel itineraries for the period from 2003 through January 1, 2015, and all audio and video recordings made by the plaintiff in the marital residence. The Court "So Ordered" the Trial Subpoena, and required that the documents be provided by April 1, 2015. The wife moved for an order pursuant to CPLR 3126(1) and 3126(2) (1) to draw a negative inference against the husband for failing to produce his personal and business travel records (2) and/or to accept as true all testimony given by the wife regarding the husband's travel during the marriage, and (3) to accept as true all the wife's testimony regarding video and audio recorded events at the marital residence during the marriage.

Supreme Court granted the motion. It observed that is established policy in the First and Second Judicial Department that generally, pretrial discovery is not allowed absent court permission. The rule has been predicated upon the theory that the potential for abuse of discovery is so great in matrimonial actions that the Court is given broad discretionary power to grant a protective order " to prevent unreasonable annoyance, expense, embarrassment, disadvantage, or other prejudice to any person or the courts" (Wegman v. Wegman, 37 NY 940, 941, 380 N.Y.S.2d 649 [1975], quoting CPLR 3103). It noted that in Burgel v. Burgel, the Second Department permitted discovery in the form of drug testing where the mental and physical condition of the parent was at issue and where there was no increased potential of abusing the discovery process (Burgel v. Burgel, 141 AD2d 215 [2 Dept, 1988]). In Johnson v. Johnson, the First Department found that the trial court properly denied the "defendant's motion for a protective order as to those tapes that were not submitted to the court, and directed that defendant turn them over to plaintiff, finding that discovery of this material was appropriate in the circumstances of the custody dispute between the parties" (Johnson v. Johnson, 235 AD2d 217, 652 N.Y.S.2d 504, 505 [1 Dept., 1997]) [The court found that the tapes were appropriate discovery material in the context of a custody dispute. The court also found that in maintaining the children's best interest as the dominant consideration and considering the potential of undermining the trust and confidence that should exist between parent and child, the trial court should use its discretion in determining whether and how the material should be used]. Moreover, in Kosovsky v. Zahl, the Court granted the defendant's motion for the films, videotapes, audiotapes, transcripts and memoranda to be turned over immediately and found that there was a need for the materials that were in the plaintiff's possession where the defendant could not acquire the equivalent himself (Kosovsky v. Zahl, 165 Misc 2d 164 [Sup. Ct., 1995]). Under the limited facts and circumstances presented here, the Court found that the discovery of travel records and audio and video files were relevant to the issue of custody and necessary to the Court's final determination on the issue of custody. The wife was unable to acquire these documents on her own and her discovery request did not raise the concerns that the rule against discovery in custody trials seeks to prevent. If the husband were allowed to make allegations and insulate evidence that is relevant to the wife's defense, applying the rule would compromise the integrity of the adversarial process. In an exercise of discretion, the Court allowed the discovery of travel records, audio files, and video files because the disclosure was material to the husband's claim and wife's defense, there were reasonable grounds for the disclosure, and the disclosure was minimally intrusive. The Court held that once the husband received notice that discovery of the audio and video recordings were needed for litigation, he had an obligation to preserve the materials and prevent the lapse of these files. The Court directed the husband to produce the documents and recordings, and indicated that his failure to do so could result in the requested orders.

Court of Appeals Holds That There Is No Exception to Physician Patient Privilege for Abuse Admitted to Psychiatrist Even If a Patient Is Cognizant of Psychiatrist's Reporting Obligations under Child Protection Statutes,

In People v. David Rivera, No. 20, NYLJ 1202725546913, at *1 (Ct. of App., Decided May 5, 2015) defendant, while seeking treatment from a psychiatrist, admitted to sexually abusing an 11 year old relative. The psychiatrist notified the Administration for Children's Services (ACS) of defendant's admission. Following an in camera review of the records, Supreme Court held that the admissions defendant made to his psychiatrist were privileged because they were made in the course of diagnosis and treatment of his condition. However, the court, while refusing to allow "the full extent of defendant's admissions" to be used, held that, because the psychiatrist had disclosed the reported abuse to ACS, the fact that defendant had admitted to the abuse was admissible. The Court of Appeals held that the trial court's ruling ran afoul of the physician patient privilege (see CPLR 4504 [a]). It rejected the People's claim that, because defendant's admission related to the sexual abuse of a child, it was not privileged since defendant had no reason to believe that it would remain confidential. The Court of Appeals held that regardless of whether a physician is required or permitted by law to report instances of abuse or threatened future harm to authorities, which may involve the disclosure of confidential information, it does not follow that such disclosure necessarily constitutes an abrogation of the evidentiary privilege a criminal defendant enjoys under CPLR 4504 (a). CPLR 4504 contains the exceptions to the privilege.

The

Court of Appeals observed that when the Legislature has sought to either limit or abrogate the privilege beyond the confines of section 4504, it has been clear in its intent. Although the physician patient privilege is in derogation of the common law, it should be afforded a broad and liberal construction to carry out its policy of encouraging full disclosure by patients so that they may secure treatment. Conversely, exceptions that limit the privilege are afforded a narrow construction. The Legislature has not created an express exception permitting a psychiatrist to testify concerning an admission made by a criminal defendant during the course of a professional relationship where the admission was made for purposes of diagnosis and treatment. Even if a patient is cognizant of his psychiatrist's reporting obligations under child protection statutes, that does not mean that he should have any expectation that statements made during treatment will be used against him in a criminal matter. Defendant, who was admitted to CPH based upon the diagnoses of depression and suicidal ideation, allegedly made admissions to his psychiatrist for the purpose of treatment. Thus, defendant's admission was subject to the physician patient privilege and, absent any waiver or exception (neither of which was present here), its admission in evidence through the testimony of defendant's psychiatrist violated section 4504 (a).

Credit Against the Distributive Award in the Amount of Difference Between Excessive Pendente

Lite Award and the Final Child Support Award May Be Granted But Is Not Mandatory

In Walker v Walker, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 4254048 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division rejected defendant's contention, that he was entitled to a credit against the distributive award in the amount of the difference between the pendente lite award and the final child support award. When a pendente lite award of maintenance is found at trial to be excessive or inequitable, the Court may make an appropriate adjustment in the equitable distribution award. (Johnson v. Chapin, 12 NY3d 461, 466). Although such a credit may be granted, it is not mandatory. Here, there was no evidence presented warranting the defendant's recoupment of any portion of the unallocated pendente lite award. The defendant was not entitled to a credit for his payment, during the pendency of the action, of amounts owed in connection with the parties' home equity line of credit. In general, expenses incurred prior to the commencement of a divorce action constitute marital debt and should be equally shared by the parties. Supreme Court directed the defendant to make the home equity line of credit payments and the plaintiff to make the mortgage payments in connection with the marital residence. Since the amounts that the defendant paid in connection with the home equity line of credit were less than the mortgage payments made by the plaintiff, he was not entitled to a credit for such payments.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in declining to impose a SUNY cap on the defendant's obligation to contribute to the costs of the children's college education.

Whether to impose a SUNY cap is determined on a case-by-case basis, considering the parties' means and the children's educational needs. Under the circumstances of this case, where the children had always attended private school, the parties each attended private colleges and graduate school, and the parties had the financial ability to pay, it was not an improvident exercise of discretion for the court to decline to impose a SUNY cap.

Default Does Not Diminish Court's Primary Responsibility to Ensure That Custody Award Is Predicated on Child's Best Interests, upon Consideration of Totality of Circumstances, after Full and Comprehensive Hearing and Careful Analysis of All Relevant Factors

In Matter of Sims v Boykin, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 4254562 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that where, as here, a parent repeatedly fails to appear at scheduled hearings and to comply with the court's directives, the court has the authority to proceed by default. However, this authority in no way diminishes the court's primary responsibility to ensure that an award of custody is predicated on the child's best interests, upon consideration of the totality of the circumstances, after a full and comprehensive hearing and a careful analysis of all relevant factors. Here, upon the mother's failure to appear at a hearing on the father's petition for custody of the child, the Family Court made a custody determination after a brief inquest at which the evidence was insufficient to make an informed best interests determination. No specific findings of fact were made by the court, the attorney for the child was not afforded an opportunity to meet with her client before custody was decided, and the court failed to award the mother any visitation. The Appellate Division observed that the parents did not live in the same state, yet the record did not indicate whether the Family Court fully considered the impact of moving the child away from his mother, who had been the child's primary caregiver since birth, his siblings, and his maternal grandmother, to live with the father and paternal grandparents in Pennsylvania. The fact that the child would be required to relocate to Pennsylvania upon an award of final custody to the father should have been considered as one of many factors in determining what is in the child's best interests. The child had special medical needs, yet there was scant evidence in the record to show that this important factor was adequately considered. While the record indicated that the father's custody petition was prompted by a pending investigation of medical neglect against the mother, the record did not indicate what, if anything, transpired from that investigation. The record did not reveal whether the father was capable of providing an acceptable course of treatment for the child's special medical needs in light of all the surrounding circumstances, nor whether the mother had deprived the child of adequate medical care. While the Family Court's concern that the mother was actively seeking to alienate the child from the father was very serious this factor alone could not justify the court's custody determination. It held that under the circumstances presented, the mother's motion to vacate the final order of custody should have been granted in the interest of justice as the final custody order lacked a sound and substantial basis in the record.

Counsel Fees - Award - Appeal - Right to Seek Counsel Fees Includes Right to Appeal Denial of Such Fees - Court's Analysis of Who Is Monied Spouse Unduly Relied on Current Incomes of the Parties and Did Not Sufficiently Consider the Value of Their and Earning History and Earning Potential of Both Parties.

In Saunders v Guberman, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 4208594 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the nonparty appellant law firm had standing to appeal the denial of a motion for counsel fees pendente lite. The right to seek counsel fees under DRL § 237(a) includes the right to appeal the denial of such fees. Following the order denying the motion, the firm timely served and filed a notice of appeal on defendant's behalf and may, on this basis, maintain the appeal even after having been granted leave to withdraw from representation for nonpayment of counsel fees. The firm was not required to file a separate notice of appeal to establish and maintain standing to appeal the order, and defendant may not cause the firm, which timely served and filed a notice of appeal on its own behalf from a second order denying counsel fees, to lose standing by withdrawing his separately filed notice of cross appeal of that order.

The Appellate Division held that the applications for interim counsel fees were improperly denied. DRL § 237(a) contains a rebuttable presumption that "counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse". The court erred by failing to designate defendant as the less monied spouse, and therefore presumptively entitled to counsel fees. The court's analysis unduly relied on the current incomes of the parties and did not sufficiently consider the value of their assets. Instead of focusing simply on their current incomes, the court should have also weighed the earning history and earning potential of both parties. Although plaintiff was unemployed at the time the motions were made, she earned considerably more than defendant during the course of their relationship, and according to the court's own finding, expected to earn more than defendant upon finding new employment. While the court recognized that plaintiff had more assets than defendant, it reasoned that the assets were "unlikely to produce an income that is equal to [defendant's]" and mistakenly exempted them from its analysis. As it did here, excluding assets merely because they do not generate income can severely distort the financial positions of the parties. Plaintiff had vastly outspent defendant over the course of this action, incurring twice as many counsel fees as defendant, and paying five times more to her attorneys than defendant has paid to his. It reversed the orders and granted interim counsel fees of $125,000.

Instructive Opinion From Second Department Holds That Submission of Proposed QDRO May Be Utilized to Obtain Pension Arrears - Application or Motion for Issuance of a

QDRO Not Barred by Statute of Limitations - No Requirement under 22 NYCRR 202.48 That Proposed QDRO Be Submitted Within 60 Days - Plaintiff's Majauskas Share May Not Be Reduced by Virtue of Loan Secured Defendant Against His Pension, Which Was Not Repaid at the Time of Retirement, and Which Reduced Amount of Monthly Payments to Both Parties -

In Kraus v Kraus, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 4097055 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division, Second Department, in an opinion by Justice Dillon, held that the submission for judicial approval of a proposed qualified domestic relations order (QDRO), instead of a motion made on notice, may be employed by a party to a matrimonial action to obtain pension arrears.

In 1995, the parties settled their matrimonial action,, pursuant to which each spouse was entitled to a marital share of the other spouse's pension in accordance with the formula set forth in Majauskas v. Majauskas (61 N.Y.2d 481). The stipulation of settlement expressly provided that "[a] Qualified Domestic Relations Order shall be prepared in the course of any divorce and forwarded to the Court for signature and filed with the Husband's employer." A judgment of divorce was signed by the Supreme Court in 1996, which incorporated, but did not merge, the stipulation. Less than a year after entry of the judgment, the defendant submitted a proposed Qualified Domestic Relations Order (QDRO) to the court in order to effectuate payment of his share of the plaintiff's pension and it was signed by the court on January 24, 1997. The defendant remarried and continued to work for the Fire Department in New York until his retirement on March 1, 2008. After the divorce was finalized, but prior to his retirement, the defendant took out a loan against his pension, which had an outstanding balance of $8,503.24 at the time of his retirement. To repay the loan, the defendant's overall retirement pension was therefore reduced by the plan administrator of the New York Fire Department Pension Fund (FDNY pension plan) by the sum of $848.58 per year. The maximum possible pension was further reduced by the defendant's election of a survivorship benefit in favor of his second wife. The loan repayment and survivorship deductions reduced the annual pension benefits received by the defendant from a maximum amount of $65,926.56 to $58,887.03. The reduction concomitantly reduced the plaintiff's share of the defendant's overall pension, which was calculated, according to the terms of the parties' stipulation, as 22.3% of the total.

On August 29, 2012, approximately 6 ½ years after the Supreme Court signed the judgment of divorce and 4 ½ years after the defendant's retirement, the plaintiff learned of the defendant's retirement, and submitted a proposed QDRO to the Supreme Court for settlement and signature. During the time between the defendant's retirement and the plaintiff's submission of the proposed QDRO, the defendant had been receiving his pension without any deduction for the plaintiff's share under the Majauskas formula, as contemplated by the stipulation and final judgment of divorce. The plaintiff's proposed QDRO called for two mathematical calculations, to account for the loan and pension arrears, which the defendant objected. The defendant opposed the plaintiff's proposed QDRO and submitted his own proposed QDRO, with cross notice of settlement. The defendant's proposed QDRO directed payment to the plaintiff of her Majauskas share of the actual, reduced retirement benefit, necessarily reflecting the deductions for the pension loan repayments and election of the survivorship option.

Supreme Court signed the defendant's proposed QDRO, and that QDRO was entered on April 19, 2013. The plaintiff began receiving her Majauskas share of the defendant's pension, as reduced by the loan repayment and by the defendant's election to take his pension benefits subject to his second wife's right of survivorship. However, the Supreme Court did not direct the defendant to pay any arrears to the plaintiff.

The Appellate Division modified the QDRO to the extent of awarding the plaintiff pension arrears accumulated between the defendant's retirement on March 1, 2008, and March 26, 2013, the date that the QDRO appealed from was signed. It also directed that the plaintiff's share of the defendant's pension benefits be calculated as if there were no reduction in monthly benefits arising from the loan made to the defendant.

The Appellate Division observed that when the distribution of pension benefits between former spouses is accomplished through a QDRO obtained pursuant to a stipulation, such QDRO can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. If a QDRO is inconsistent with the provisions of a stipulation or judgment of divorce, courts possess the authority to amend the QDRO to accurately reflect the provisions of the stipulation pertaining to the pension benefits. Thus, a court cannot issue a QDRO "encompassing rights not provided in the underlying stipulation, or one that is more expansive than the stipulation. Although the stipulation in this matter failed to identify the party who would be responsible for submitting the proposed QDROs to the Supreme Court, it is generally the responsibility of the party seeking approval of the QDRO to submit it to the court with notice of settlement. A logical reading of the relevant language lead to the conclusion that plaintiff was to prepare and submit, to the Supreme Court, a proposed QDRO with respect to the defendant's pension.

Despite the plaintiff's delay in submitting a proposed QDRO to the Supreme Court, the Appellate Division rejected the defendant's contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to the arrears in pension benefits that accumulated between March 1, 2008, the date that the defendant retired from the FDNY, to March 26, 2013, the date that the Supreme Court signed the plaintiff's proposed QDRO. An action to enforce a distributive award in a matrimonial action is governed by a six-year statute of limitations (CPLR 213[1], [2]). However, the precedent established by the court held that since a QDRO is derived from the bargain struck by the parties, there is no need to commence a separate, plenary action to formalize the agreement, and that "an application or motion for the issuance of a QDRO is not barred by the statute of limitations" (Denaro v. Denaro, 84 AD3d at 1149; see Bayen v. Bayen, 81 AD3d at 866; Duhamel v. Duhamel, 4 AD3d 739, 741). It adopted the rule of the Appellate Division, Third Department, in Boylan v. Dodge (42 AD3d 632), which expressly stated that a request for judicial approval of "a QDRO is the proper method for plaintiff to collect the pension arrears in this case".

The Third Department relied upon its own earlier precedent in Peek v. Peek (301 A.D.2d 201), in which it rejected a defendant's contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to receive arrears because she failed to submit a proposed QDRO to the court, as directed by the separation agreement. The Third Department determined that the plaintiff did not waive her right to receive "her property interest in defendant's pension beginning in March 1998" merely by failing to file a proposed QDRO immediately after the judgment of divorce was finalized, and that the submission of a proposed QDRO to the court with the final divorce papers "is not a condition precedent to plaintiff receiving her property interest in defendant's pension". The Court rejected the holding of the Appellate Division, Fourth Department, in Bielecki v. Bielecki (106 AD3d 1454), which reached a different conclusion on the issue of whether the statute of limitations applied to a plaintiff's postjudgment motion seeking arrears for her share of the defendant's pension benefits. The Fourth Department expressly concluded that the six-year statute of limitations applied, and began to run when defendant began receiving his pension in March 1991. However, because the defendant had an ongoing obligation to the plaintiff, the statute began to run anew with each missed payment. Thus, the Fourth Department determined that the plaintiff's claim was timely to the extent that it sought payments missed within six years prior to her October 2010 motion. The Appellate Division adhered to its precedent in Bayen, and agreed with the Third Department's reasoning in Boylan v. Dodge and Peek v. Peek, which warranted its conclusion that the QDRO here in dispute be modified to reflect the plaintiff's entitlement to her distributive share of the defendant's pension, pursuant to the Majauskas formula, from March 1, 2008, until March 26, 2013. The parties' stipulation expressly provided that the plaintiff would receive her proportionate marital share of the defendant's pension at the time the defendant retired. Thus, like the plaintiff in Peek, the plaintiff here acquired a property interest in the defendant's pension at the time he retired and started receiving benefits. By receiving payments referable to that period of time, the plaintiff would not be enjoying a windfall, but will simply be receiving the property that she was entitled to receive from March 2008 forward, pursuant to the clear language of the stipulation. It further noted that even if the six-year statute of limitations applied to a postjudgment motion in a matrimonial action, the plaintiff's claim would not be time-barred because she submitted her proposed QDRO to the Supreme Court in July 2012, just four years after the defendant retired in March 2008.

The Appellate Division pointed out that there is also no requirement under 22 NYCRR 202.48 or otherwise that proposed QDROs be submitted within 60 days of the execution of a stipulation of settlement of a matrimonial action or the issuance of a judgment of divorce, as QDROs are merely procedural mechanisms for effectuating payment of a spouse's share of the other spouse's pension (see Denaro v. Denaro, 84 AD3d at 1149; Lawton v. Lawton, 239 A.D.2d 866). The Appellate Division agreed with the plaintiff that her share should be calculated without reference to the reduction in benefits resulting from the loan made to the defendant.

Inasmuch as the stipulation did not contain any provision directing that the plaintiff's share of the defendant's pension benefits be calculated on the maximum value that the pension would have had without the defendant's provision of post-divorce survivor benefits to his second wife, the Supreme Court, and the Appellate Division were without authority to grant the plaintiff the greater rights she sought. The stipulation did not contain any expressed prohibition against the defendant obtaining a loan against the pension or providing a survivor benefit to a future spouse. The Court of Appeals, in McCoy v. Feinman (99 N.Y.2d 295), made clear that where a stipulation is not ambiguous and does not cover certain benefits-in that case, pre-retirement death benefits-the plaintiff is not entitled to receive those benefits. "A proper QDRO obtained pursuant to a stipulation of settlement can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. Thus, it is improper for a court to issue any qualified domestic relations order that encompasses rights that were not provided in the underlying stipulation. Here, inasmuch as the stipulation did not contain any provision directing that the plaintiff's share of the defendant's pension benefits be calculated on the maximum value that the pension would have had without the defendant's provision of post-divorce survivor benefits to his second wife, the Court was without authority to grant the plaintiff the greater rights she sought.

In 1993, the Court of Appeals, in Olivo v. Olivo (82 N.Y.2d 202), addressed the effect that postjudgment events have upon the amount of pension benefits later paid to nontitled ex-spouses. Olivo acknowledged that there are a number of postjudgment events that may increase or decrease the amount of a pension's payout. In Lemesis v. Lemesis (38 AD3d 1331), the Fourth Department addressed the circumstance relevant here, where the employed spouse remarried and provided his new wife with a survivorship benefit that reduced the pension's monthly payout upon retirement. The Fourth Department held there that the husband's ex-wife was not entitled to have her Majauskas share of the pension calculated upon the pension's highest potential amount, as if there had been no survivorship benefit provided to the second wife, since there was no provision expressed in the separation agreement providing for such relief. In another Fourth Department decision, Unser v. Fox (83 AD3d 1429), the husband began receiving a police pension that was split with his ex-wife, and then commenced new employment that was later reclassified as state employment that suspended his pension benefits. The Fourth Department held that the wife was not entitled to a money judgment equal to her share of the suspended pension payments, as the wife was entitled only to a share of the pension that is ultimately obtained by the pensioner. Applying the foregoing analysis, the Appellate Division held that the plaintiff was not entitled to a recalculation of the defendant's pension benefits so as to negate the survivorship benefit bestowed by the defendant on his second wife (see Olivo v. Olivo, 82 N.Y.2d at 210; Unser v. Fox, 83 AD3d at 1431; Lemesis v. Lemesis, 38 AD3d at 1332). The reduction in the monthly payouts occasioned by the provision of survivorship pension rights to the defendant's second wife was not prohibited by the negotiated terms of the stipulation, and the detriment arising from the reduction in the payout amount was mutually shared by both the plaintiff and the defendant. Accordingly, the effect occasioned by the defendant's provision of survivorship benefits to his second wife should be treated no differently than had the defendant retired early, accepted a retirement incentive, worked additional years, or been subject to an employer's lawful amendment of the underlying pension plan.

The Appellate Division took a different view with respect to the loan that was secured by the defendant against his pension, which was not repaid at the time of his retirement, and which reduced the amount of monthly payments to both parties, and concluded that the plaintiff's Majauskas share may not be reduced by virtue of the loan. The reason was that, with respect to the loan, the parties did not receive any mutual benefit from the defendant's receipt of the loan proceeds. The loan proceeds were paid to and used solely by the defendant, yet the plaintiff, who derived no benefit from the loan proceeds, was being required to share in its cost by virtue of her receipt of reduced monthly payments for so long as the pension benefits are paid to her. The circumstances under which the defendant secured the loan were distinctly different from those where an employee takes early retirement, works additional years, elects a survivorship benefit, accepts a retirement incentive package, or is subject to changes to the pension imposed by the employer, as, in all of those instances, the gains or losses are mutually shared by the retiree and by the ex-spouse receiving a marital share of the benefits. The defendant's loan, by contrast, was not grounded in mutuality, as the loan proceeds that reduced the value of the defendant's pension were not shared with the plaintiff. Were the court to hold that spouses may take loans against their pensions and retain 100% of the loan proceeds, and thereby reduce their obligation to ex-spouses, employees might be given the incentive to unilaterally strip their pensions of value at the partial expense of their ex-spouse. The reasonable expectations of the parties, as discerned from their stipulation, cannot be construed as permitting the consequences urged by the defendant, where both parties incur a reduction in the monthly payout of pension benefits by virtue of a loan, but the defendant derives 100% of the benefit of the loan proceeds.

"He Who Represents Himself..." - Divorce - Sanctions - Matrimonial Attorney Who Represented Himself Sanctioned For Delay Harassment and Obfuscation

In Borstein v Henneberry, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 3851807 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), after trial the parties submitted post-trial memoranda. In a section entitled "Assets and Liabilities Claimed to be Marital," the husband, an experienced matrimonial lawyer, claimed that he loaned the wife "$27,000 during the years after the filing for divorce" to allow her to finance a business venture. He also listed the loan as the sixth of nine credits totaling $1,184,500, and stated that he had "loaned to [the wife] about $27,000 after the filing for divorce and should receive a credit for the full $27,000." In addition, his Statement of Proposed Disposition listed the loan in a section titled, "Assets claimed to be marital property." The decision after trial and an order, did not specifically address the $27,000 loan. However, the concluding paragraph to the decision stated that "[a]ny arguments raised by the parties which have not been expressly addressed in this decision are rejected. The husband then commenced this action against the wife seeking recovery of the same $27,000 sought by the husband as a credit in the divorce action. The wife's counsel sent the husband a letter asking him to discontinue the action voluntarily because the divorce action had determined his rights regarding the loan in light of the court's ruling on the husband's request for credits. The supreme Court then granted the wife's motion for summary judgment dismissing the complaint. She had argued, inter alia, that the husband's claim was barred by res judicata principles because it had been fully litigated in the divorce action. Supreme Court rejected the husband's argument that the issue was never fully litigated because there was no formal finding that the source of the loan was marital property. The wife subsequently moved, for an order awarding her attorneys' fees, costs, disbursements, and sanctions due to the husband's "frivolous and improperly motivated" lawsuit. The court held that the husband's conduct in seeking repayment of the loan was not so frivolous as to warrant sanctions pursuant to 22 NYCRR part 130; however, as the court had dismissed the action in its entirety, it awarded the wife costs and disbursements in successfully defending the action.

The Appellate Division modified the order on the law and the facts, to impose sanctions on plaintiff in the amount of $5,000, and to award defendant reasonable costs and attorneys' fees associated with the motion and the appeal, payable by plaintiff in an amount to be determined on remand, and otherwise affirmed the order. It found that the husband made a claim in the divorce action for repayment of the $27,000 "loan," and Supreme Court rejected it. He then failed to challenge that finding on direct appeal. Any argument that Supreme Court did not actually decide the issue of the "loan" because it did not specifically address it was rejected, since the court included the "catch-all" language that any claims not discussed were denied. It is well settled that "res judicata bars a subsequent plenary action concerning an issue of marital property which could have been, but was not, raised in the prior matrimonial action" (Boronow v. Boronow, 71 N.Y.2d 284, 289 [1988]). The Appellate Division pointed out that it was required to consider "the circumstances under which the conduct took place" when reviewing a sanctions motion (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c]). Here, the circumstances were that the husband, an experienced divorce lawyer, ignored a long-standing principle of matrimonial jurisprudence. Thus, his decision to commence an action that he knew, or should have known, was futile from its inception, weighed heavily in favor of a finding that his conduct was intended solely to harass the wife. The Court observed that a court must be careful not to confuse legal arguments that may appear at first blush to be frivolous with good faith efforts to modify existing law (see W.J. Nolan & Co. v. Daly, 170 A.D.2d 320, 321 [1st Dept 1991]). Here, the issue was not whether the husband should have prevailed on his claim in the matrimonial action, but whether he had any grounds for pursuing the matter after that action became final. It simply defied logic that, as the husband argued, the court in the matrimonial action would have implicitly ruled that the loan was separate property, when he conceded before it that the source of the funds was marital property. Further, the husband utterly failed to account for the court's explicit statement that any arguments it did not address should be considered rejected.

Aside from the blatant lack of merit to the complaint, other factors justifying sanctions and attorneys' fees were present here. First, the wife expressly informed the husband that she considered the action barred by res judicata and urged him to discontinue it, but he pressed on, forcing her to expend unnecessary resources. Such unreasonable persistence in a position that has been demonstrated to be frivolous warrants the imposition of sanctions (see Cattani v. Marfuggi, 74 AD3d 553 [1st Dept 2010] [plaintiff insisted on pursuing action against defendant that he had been advised was cloaked with absolute immunity from suit]). Further, it could not ignore that this was not the first instance in which the husband had taken a position that was not legally tenable. He was ordered in the matrimonial action to pay the wife's legal fees in connection with his noncompliance with a temporary support order. Later in the action, however, the court explicitly stated that the husband had "frivolously" asked it to "re-write its decision" regarding the forced sale of a boat so as to make his actions, which failed to comply with the decision, compliant nunc pro tunc. Coupled with these earlier incidents, the commencement of this action exhibited a "broad pattern ... of delay, harassment and obfuscation" that warranted the imposition of sanctions and attorneys' fees (Levy v. Carol Mgt. Corp., 260 A.D.2d 27, 33 [1st Dept 1999]).

Child Support - Award - Calculation of Income - Food Stamps are Income For Purposes of Child Support Calculation But Not Future Maintenance Payments

In Lattuca v Lattuca, --- N.Y.S.3d ---, 2015 WL 3796404 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division rejected the defendant husband's argument on appeal from a judgment of divorce that, inter alia, confirmed the Report and Recommendation of the Referee that the Referee erred in excluding plaintiff's maintenance award from the wife's income in calculating her child support obligation. There is no authority in the Child Support Standards Act (CSSA) for adding future maintenance payments to the recipient's income for the purpose of calculating child support.

The Appellate Division agreed with the defendant that the Referee erred in failing to include the value of plaintiff's food stamps in her yearly income for purposes of calculating her child support obligation. Food stamps are not "public assistance" to be deducted from income pursuant to Domestic Relations Law s 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(E) inasmuch as Social Services Law article 5, which governs public assistance, refers to "public assistance or food stamps" (Social Services Law s 131[12]), thereby distinguishing the two. Because plaintiff's income did not fall below the poverty income guidelines when the value of her food stamps was included, it modified the judgment by vacating the award of child support, and remitted the matter to Supreme Court to recalculate plaintiff's child support obligation in compliance with the CSSA.

Custody - UCCJEA - Order Denying the Mother's Motion to Dismiss Reversed Where New York Did Not Have Temporary Emergency Jurisdiction and Had Not Complied with the Communication Requirements of DRL§ 76-c.

In Matter of Bretzinger v Hatcher, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 3796509 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), pursuant to an order of custody issued by a Texas court, petitioner father had the exclusive right to designate the primary residence of the child. The father, who was in the military, thereafter relocated with the child to Fort Drum in New York, where he was stationed. Pursuant to the order, respondent mother had visitation with the child, and the father was to pay for the transportation of the child to the mother three times per year. In May 2013, the child's paternal grandmother filed a petition to modify the custody order by suspending the visitation rights of the mother, who still resided in Texas. The petition was later amended to name the father as the petitioner once he returned from deployment overseas. In August 2013, the mother moved to dismiss the petition for lack of jurisdiction, which Family Court denied. In October 2013, the court communicated with a Texas court, which declined jurisdiction. At a court appearance in April 2014, the mother indicated by telephone that she would not be able to appear personally for the hearing set later that month because of financial constraints, the court disconnected the call, and the father moved for a default order based on the mother's statements. The court granted the father's motion.

The Appellate Division held that the Family Court abused its discretion in granting the motion of the mother's attorney, made before the court took testimony from the father upon the default, to withdraw as counsel for the mother without notice to her, and because the purported withdrawal of counsel was ineffective, the order entered by the court was improperly entered as a default order and appeal therefrom was not precluded.

The Appellate Division agreed with the mother that the court erred in denying her motion to dismiss the petition. Texas had exclusive, continuing jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-a at the time of the filing of the petition, and the father's allegations in the petition were insufficient for the court to exercise temporary emergency jurisdiction pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-c. In any event, the court did not "immediately" communicate with the Texas court, as required by section 76-c (4).

Furthermore, the court erred in requiring the mother to seek an order from a Texas court inasmuch as it was the father's burden to do so (DRL § 76-c [3]). Although the court later acquired jurisdiction when it communicated with the Texas court, which declined jurisdiction over the petition (DRL § 76-b [1]), at the time the court issued its order denying the mother's motion to dismiss, it did not have temporary emergency jurisdiction and had not complied with the requirements of section 76-c. It reversed the order, denied the father's motion for a default order, and granted the mother's motion to dismiss.

Custody - Attorney for Child - No Duty to Advocate for Child's Wishes Where it is is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child - Error in declining to release report of a court-appointed psychological expert and the expert's notes was harmless.

In Matter of Viscuso v Viscuso, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 3798030 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division rejected the mothers argument that the Attorney for the Child (AFC) violated her ethical duty to determine the child's position and advocate zealously in support of the child's wishes, because the AFC advocated for a result that was contrary to the child's expressed wishes in the absence of any justification for doing so. It held where, as here, the AFC is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child the AFC would be justified in advocating a position that is contrary to the child's wishes" (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]). The evidence supported the court's conclusion that to follow the child's wishes would be tantamount to severing her relationship with her father, and that result would not be in the child's best interests. It concluded that the mother's persistent and pervasive pattern of alienating the child from the father was likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]), and that the AFC acted in accordance with her ethical duties.

The court's determination to award custody of the child to the father was supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record. It is well settled that a " 'concerted effort by one parent to interfere with the other parent's contact with the child is so inimical to the best interests of the child ... as to, per se, raise a strong probability that [the interfering parent] is unfit to act as custodial parent' " The mother interfered with the father's relationship with the child by, inter alia, blatantly and repeatedly violating the court's directive not to discuss the litigation with the child, attempting to instill in the child a fear of the father, and encouraging the child to medicate herself before going to visit the father.

The Court rejected the mother's contention that the court erred in denying her pretrial request to release certain materials, i.e., the report of a court-appointed psychological expert and the expert's notes. The potential for abuse in matrimonial and custody cases is great, and the court has broad discretionary power to limit disclosure and grant protective orders. The court did not abuse its discretion in denying the mother's request, particularly in light of the mother's repeated violations of the court's orders prohibiting her from disclosing confidential materials. Moreover, the court denied the request without prejudice to renewal, and thus the mother could have reapplied for release of the materials upon submitting evidence demonstrating that she had actually retained an expert who required access to the report prior to trial. In any event, any error in declining to release the materials prior to trial was harmless. The mother introduced the materials in evidence several months before the trial ended, and she therefore had more than ample access to the materials in time to use them at trial. She had the use of the materials for cross-examination purposes, and thus there was no denial of due process.

Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(F) - Stay of Civil Court Holdover Proceeding Brought by Husbands Brother Proper Even Though He Was Not a Party to the Divorce Action and Was Not Served with Plaintiff's Motion for a Stay

In Yu Dan Wong v. Kenneth Ming Wei Wong, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2364930 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order in an action for a divorce, which denied the nonparty-appellant's motion to vacate Supreme Court's stay of a Civil Court holdover proceeding. Appellant, defendant's brother, brought the holdover proceeding against plaintiff, defendant's wife, to remove her from a cooperative apartment she used to share with defendant and their child. The Appellate Division held that the stay was proper and did not violate appellant's due process rights, even though he was not a party to the divorce action and was not served with plaintiff's motion for a stay. Appellant had knowledge of the stay and the court was presented with sufficient evidence that he and defendant were acting together to evict plaintiff from the apartment (Ricatto v. Ricatto, 4 AD3d 514, 516 [2d Dept 2004]). Moreover, appellant's counsel was able to argue against the stay before and after it was issued It found that a stay was warranted to avoid plaintiff's eviction pending resolution of the divorce proceeding. Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(f) permits a court to issue an order regarding the use and occupancy of the marital home, "without regard to the form of ownership of such property." It had not yet been determined in the divorce action whether the apartment was marital property and, if it is, how it might be equitably distributed. Appellant had not shown that the property was not marital property, as there was evidence in the record that defendant acquired the property during his marriage with plaintiff.

Child Support - Enforcement - No Exception to Rule that Child Support Arrears May be Modified Retroactively

In Commissioner of Social Services of City of New York ex rel. Melvenia H. v. Juan H.M., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2236930 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that the law is well settled that child support arrears cannot be modified retroactively (see Matter of Dox v. Tynon, 90 N.Y.2d 166, 173-174 [1997]) and that there is no exception for arrears accrued during a period of incarceration (Matter of Zaid S. v. Yolanda N.A.A., 24 AD3d 118 [1st Dept 2005]).

Appellate Division - Second Department

Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][e][2] - Temporary Maintenance - Child Support - Award - Unjust and Inappropriate to direct plaintiff to pay all of the carrying costs associated with the marital residence plus presumptive award of temporary maintenance.

In Su v Su--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2400234 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), defendant moved for pendente lite relief seeking, inter alia, temporary spousal maintenance of $4,500.15 per month and to compel the plaintiff to pay all of the carrying costs associated with the marital residence, where both he and the plaintiff continued to reside. Supreme Court, inter alia, directed the plaintiff to pay 100% of the carrying costs associated with the marital residence, totaling $5,003 per month. The court also calculated the defendant's presumptive award of temporary maintenance to be $2,057 per month, but found that "it would be unjust and inappropriate" to direct the plaintiff to pay all of the carrying costs associated with the marital residence plus the presumptive award of temporary maintenance. Therefore, the court downwardly deviated from that presumptive award of temporary maintenance, and awarded him $200 per month. The Appellate Division affirmed. The Appellate Division observed that a court may deviate from the presumptive award of temporary maintenance if that presumptive award is 'unjust or inappropriate.' (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][e][2]).The Appellate Division found that the Supreme Court's calculation of the presumptive award of temporary maintenance was erroneous. In performing the calculation required by Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a), a court must begin with the parties' gross income as reflected in their most recent federal tax returns, less, among other things, "federal insurance contributions act (FICA) taxes actually paid" (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][b][5][vii][H]; Domestic Relations Law §§ 240[1-b][b][5][i]; 236[B][5-a][b][4]). Here, in performing the calculation required by Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a), the court erroneously used the plaintiff's anticipated gross income for 2014, which the court found to be $118,066, rather than the plaintiff's gross income as reported on her 2013 federal income tax return, which was $131,121.49. However, in light of the Supreme Court's appropriate and significant downward deviation from any presumptive award of temporary maintenance, this error did not require reversal. The formula to determine temporary spousal maintenance that is outlined in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a)(c) is intended to cover all of the payee spouse's basic living expenses, including housing costs of food and clothing, and other usual expenses. In addition, where both parties continue to reside in the marital residence and one party is ordered to pay the carrying costs, the payor spouse may be credited with half those costs. Here, nearly all of the defendant's basic living expenses which would be included in the presumptive award of temporary maintenance would already be paid by so much of the order as directed the plaintiff to pay 100% of the carrying costs associated with the marital residence, as the court calculated these carrying costs to include the monthly costs for the mortgage, gas, electricity, telephone, water, groceries, home entertainment, household repairs, appliances, laundry, gardening/landscaping, and snow removal. Moreover, the defendant failed to demonstrate that the pendente lite award of $200 per month has left him unable to meet his financial obligations. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court properly concluded that it would be unjust and inappropriate for the plaintiff to pay all of the monthly carrying charges on the marital residence plus the presumptive award of pendente lite maintenance, and appropriately downwardly deviated from the presumptive award of temporary maintenance to award the defendant $200 per month.

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act §413[1][B][5][I] - Child Support must Be Based upon Income Reflected on Most Recently Filed Income Tax Return

In Matter of Cordwell v. Clarke,--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2387378 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division reduced the child support award the father was directed to pay on the ground that the Support Magistrate's calculation of the mother's income was incorrect. It observed that the Child Support Standards Act requires the court to establish the parties' basic child support obligation as a function of the "gross (total) income" that is, or should have been, reflected on the parties' most recently filed income tax return (Family Ct Act §413[1][b][5][i]). The Support Magistrate, applying the information set forth on the mother's 2012 W-2 form, found that her income was $70,439, but her 2012 federal income tax return shows that her income was $92,846. Thus, the Support Magistrate should have calculated the mother's gross adjusted income based upon her reported income of $92,846.

Family Court

Family Offense - Standing - Fam. Ct. Act § 812[1] - Members of the Same Family or Household - Aunt, by Marriage, of Respondent Lacks Standing to Petition for Order of Protection - Not Related by Affinity.

In Matter of Anita C. v Johana S., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2190680 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) the family offense petition alleged, inter alia, that Anita C. was “the aunt (by marriage) of the respondent” Johana S. and that the parties resided in different apartments in the same building in College Point. Petitioner testified that she and the respondent “are related” and that respondent was “married to Raul who is petitioner’s husband’s half-sister’s son.” Petitioner conceded that she and the respondent had no personal relationship. The Court pointed out that it is vested with jurisdiction over family offenses occurring “between ...members of the same family or household” (Fam. Ct. Act § 812[1]). The statute defines “members of the same family or household” as, inter alia,: “(a) persons related by consanguinity or affinity. Petitioner asserted that the Family Court had jurisdiction because she was “related” to the respondent through her marriage, in other words, that she and the respondent were related by affinity.

Family Court explained that affinity is “a connection formed by marriage.” Kelly v. Neely, 12 Ark 657 [Sup Ct 1852]; see also, Matter of Bibeau v. Ackey, 56 AD3d 971, 972 [2008]; Matter of Anstey v. Palmatier, 23 AD3d 780 [2005]. “Affinity properly means the tie which arises, from marriage, betwixt the husband and the blood relatives of the wife, and between the husband and the blood relatives of the husband. And the blood relatives of the wife, while the marriage continues, stand in the same degree of affinity to the husband as they do in consanguinity to her” (Paddock v. Wells, 2 Barb Ch 331 [1847]; see also, Higbe v. Leonard, 1 Denio 186, 187 [1845]; Anstey, 23 AD3d at 780; Weisinger v. Van Rensselaer, 79 Misc2d 1023, 1024 [1974]). “Affinity is an artificial relationship” (Tegarden v. Phillips, 14 Ind App 27, 42 NE 549, 551 [1895]), and it “is the tie which exists between one of the spouses with the kindred of the other” , but the “relationship by affinity always depends upon the blood of the two spouses, and cannot extend beyond such blood kindred” (id. [emphasis added]). Thus, the Tegarden court explained, affinity “exclude[s] the affinity relatives of the respective spouses. My wife’s brother’s wife is related to my wife by affinity, because of the blood relationship existing between my wife and her brother; but she is not related to me by affinity, because there is no blood in common between us. In other words, the affinity relatives of my wife are not my affinity relatives, nor vice versa.” Thus “an affine of one spouse is not related to an affine of the other spouse.

The Court noted that respondent, Johana S., was married to “Raul” who is the son of the half-sister of petitioner’s husband. It would appear then that the petitioner was the sister-in-law of her husband’s half-sister by virtue of her marriage, and consequently that she was the paternal aunt (by marriage or affinity) of “Raul”, the son of her husband’s half-sister, as petitioner stood in the same degree of affinity as her husband stands by consanguinity to her husband’s blood relatives. However, because a relationship of affinity does not extend to the spouses of affines, it was clear that respondent has no relationship of affinity to the wife of her husband’s uncle, and vice versa. The Court held that the parties were not related at all and were not “members of the same family or household”. It found that it had no subject matter jurisdiction over this proceeding, and the petition was dismissed.

Court of Appeals, Construing Family Court Act § 1012(g), Holds That Uncle Is a "Person Legally Responsible."

In re Trenasia J., --- N.Y.3d ----, 2015 WL 1979291 (N.Y.) the primary issue in the appeal was whether appellant Frank J. was a "person legally responsible" (PLR) as defined by Family Court Act § 1012(g) and in accordance with the courts decision in Matter of Yolanda D. (88 N.Y.2d 790 [1996]). Frank J. was the uncle of the child through marriage, and the father of three children (the J Children). In February 2011, the Administration for Children's Services (ACS) filed petitions against Frank J. alleging that according to statements made by the subject child, Frank J. "forcibly attempted to have sexual intercourse" with her "after entering the bathroom while she was taking a shower" during an overnight visit at Frank J.'s home on December 31, 2010. The child, who was 11 years old at the time of incident, alleged that while she was taking a shower, Frank J. entered the bathroom and asked her if she wanted to make $5, warning her against telling her mother. The child alleged that Frank J. forcibly grabbed her by her hips, pulled her towards him, and attempted to pull out his penis. The child then ran crying to her cousin's room, put on some clothes and ran out of the house to a nearby supermarket where an ambulance was called.

The Court of Appeals observed that the Family Court Act defines a "respondent" in a child protective proceeding as "any parent or other person legally responsible for a child's care who is alleged to have abused or neglected such child" (Family Court Act § 1012 [a]). A person legally responsible for a child is defined as "the child's custodian, guardian, [or] any other person responsible for the child's care at the relevant time. Custodian may include any person continually or at regular intervals found in the same household as the child when the conduct of such person causes or contributes to the abuse or neglect of the child" (Family Court Act § 1012[g]). Frank J. moved to dismiss the petition for want of jurisdiction, arguing that he was not a PLR because he was neither the guardian nor custodian of the child, and she was never a member of his household. The attorney for the J Children supported Frank J.'s motion to dismiss. After a hearing on the motion to dismiss, where the court heard testimony from the responding police officer and the child's mother, Family Court, Kings County, denied Frank J.'s motion to dismiss, stating that there was no "serious question that [Frank J.] is a [PLR] within ... the meaning" of the statute.

The Court of Appeals observed that Matter of Yolanda D. (88 N.Y.2d 790 [1996]) was the Court's seminal decision on the factors to consider in determining who is a PLR under Family Court Act § 1012(g). In that case the Court recognized "that parenting functions are not always performed by a parent but may be discharged by other persons, including custodians, guardians and paramours, who perform caretaking duties commonly associated with parents. Thus, the common thread running through the various categories of persons legally responsible for a child's care is that these persons serve as the functional equivalent of parents." It held that deciding whether "a particular person has acted as the functional equivalent of a parent is a discretionary, fact-intensive inquiry which will vary according to the particular circumstances of each case". It listed factors to be considered when determining who is a PLR, which include (1) "the frequency and nature of the contact," (2) "the nature and extent of the control exercised by the respondent over the child's environment," (3) "the duration of the respondent's contact with the child," and (4) "the respondent's relationship to the child's parents" (id.). The Court also stated that "article 10 should not be construed to include persons who assume fleeting or temporary care of a child such as a supervisor of a play-date or an overnight visitor or those persons who provide extended daily care of children in institutional settings, such as teachers".

The Court found that based on the evidence admitted during Frank J.'s hearing, there was record support for Family Court's affirmed finding of fact that Frank J. was a PLR under Family Court Act § 1012(g) and Yolanda D. With respect to "the frequency and nature of the contact," and "the duration of the respondent's contact with the child," under Yolanda D, the responding police officer testified without objection that the child informed her that she had been staying at Frank J.'s home for a week prior to the incident. The child's mother testified that during the year before this incident, the child had visited Frank J.'s home eight or nine times and four of those occasions were overnight visits. There was also testimony that Frank J. and the child interacted at family functions such as family reunions, holidays and birthday parties. Thus, the total contacts between Frank J. and the child were significant. As to "the nature and extent of the control exercised by the respondent over the child's environment," this incident occurred in Frank J.'s home during an overnight visit, and he was the only adult present at the time. Additionally, Family Court noted in its oral decision denying Frank J.'s motion to dismiss that the child's mother "testified that she expected her sister to care for the child, but if the sister wasn't there then [Frank J.] was expected to care for the child." Finally, in considering "respondent's relationship to the child's parents," Frank J. was related to the child through marriage, as his wife's sister was the child's mother. Although the existence of a familial relationship is not dispositive, it is appropriately considered in determining whether a respondent is a PLR. Applying the Yolanda D. factors to these facts record support existed for the lower courts' determination that Frank J. was a PLR under Family Court Act § 1012(g).

Appellate Division, Second Department

Appellate Division Holds Courts Retain Discretion to Entertain Requests for Affirmative Relief That Do Not Meet Requirements of CPLR 2215

In Smulczeski v Smulczeski, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2076021 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. the Appellate Division held that to the extent the Supreme Court concluded that it lacked discretion to consider the plaintiff's request for affirmative relief, which was not presented in a proper cross motion pursuant to CPLR 2215, its conclusion was erroneous. Although "a party seeking relief in connection with another party's motion is, as a general rule, required to do so by way of a cross motion," courts "retain discretion to entertain requests for affirmative relief that do not meet the requirements of CPLR 2215" (Fried v. Jacob Holding, Inc., 110 AD3d 56, 64, 65). Nonetheless, the plaintiff would not have been entitled to the requested relief had she made a cross motion under CPLR 2215. The plaintiff sought to alter the equitable distribution provisions of the parties' judgment of divorce, but the Supreme Court lacked the authority to do so (see Wasserman v. Wasserman, 103 AD3d793).

Child Support - Award - Annual Income - Proper to Use Pay Stubs Pay Period Figure Multiplied by 26 to Determine Annual Income.

In Matter of Thomson-Fleming v Fleming--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2077958 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that the Family Court's award of child support was based upon, inter alia, the Support Magistrate's calculation of the father's annual income. In calculating the father's income, the Support Magistrate apparently relied upon the year-to-date figures on a pay stub for a two-week period ending on July 13, 2013, but failed to take into account that the father began his employment on March 28, 2013. It held that under these circumstances, the Support Magistrate should have taken the pay stub's pay period figure and multiplied that figure by 26 to determine the father's annual income, rather than rely upon the year-to-date figure.

Termination of Parental Rights - Domestic Relations Law § 111-a and Social Services Law § 384-c - Where Paternity Not Ascertained in Fact or by Law, Court May Not Conclusorily Find Respondent Is Not a "Consent Father," or That His Consent, While Otherwise Required, Has Been Forfeited.

In re Heaven A.A.--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2078685 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 03833 the Appellate Division held that the Family Court may not render a determination that a putative father has abandoned a child so as to free the child for adoption, unless there is a threshold finding that the putative father is, in fact, the father of the child. It concluded that where paternity is not ascertained in fact or by law, the Family Court may not conclusorily find that a respondent is not a "consent father," or that his consent, while otherwise required, has been forfeited by reason of his abandonment of the child.

The petitioner, filed a petition to, inter alia, terminate the parental rights of the respondent putative father, Tyrone W. on the ground of abandonment. There was one child, Heaven, who was born on February 22, 2008. The petition specifically alleged that the appellant's consent to the child's adoption was not required under Domestic Relations Law § 111-a and Social Services Law § 384-c, because he was never married to the mother, had maintained no substantial and continuous contact with the child, had not claimed paternity, was not named on the child's birth certificate, was not openly living with the child, and was not listed in the Putative Father Registry. The appellant appeared in the Family Court on April 2, 2013, with court-appointed counsel, and requested a DNA test to determine paternity. The request was denied, and the matter was adjourned to May 29, 2013, for an estoppel hearing. On May 29, 2013, the appellant again requested a DNA test, which the Family Court denied. The court explained that, subject to a hearing, the appellant's parental rights could be terminated regardless of whether he was the biological father. A hearing commenced. The case worker, Robin Torres, testified that the child had been placed into foster care shortly after she turned one year old, and that during the six months preceding the filing of the petition, the appellant had no contact with either the child or the petitioner and had provided no support for the child. During cross-examination, Torres was asked the basis for the petitioner's belief that the appellant was the father, and she responded that the appellant was listed "in the [Putative Father] Registry." However, no documentation from the Putative Father Registry was proffered. The foster mother, Ketsie R., testified and corroborated that the appellant had no contact with the child during the six months preceding the filing of the petition. The appellant testified that he was unaware of the child's existence until he was served with a copy of the petition while he was incarcerated. Although he stated that his paternity was a possibility, he was not sure, as the mother never told him that she was pregnant, and he never observed her to be in that condition. The Family Court held in favor of the petitioner. It reasoned that, pursuant to established case authority, the appellant bore the responsibility of confirming whether he was the father of the child born of the mother with whom he had sexual relations. Having failed to fulfill that responsibility, the court found that the father had abandoned the subject child. The Family Court terminated the parental rights of both the mother and the appellant, and determined that it was in the child's best interests to remain in foster care.

The Appellate Division reversed the order of disposition insofar as appealed from, and the petition was dismissed insofar as asserted against the appellant. The Court observed that Social Services Law §384-b provides that guardianship and custody of a child may be transferred to a social services agency to free the child for adoption, if, inter alia, the parent or parents, whose consent to the adoption of the child would otherwise be required, abandoned the child for the six-month period immediately preceding the filing of the petition (Social Services Law § 384-b[4][b]). Abandonment, as it pertains to adoption, is conduct by the parent that evinces a purposeful ridding of parental obligations and the foregoing of parental rights. The burden of proving abandonment is on the presentment agency by a clear and convincing evidence standard, although proof of a parent's failure to visit or communicate with the child for the requisite six-month period creates a rebuttable presumption of abandonment. The Social Services Law expressly incorporates Domestic Relations Law § 111, which provides that the "consent" of the father of a child born out of wedlock is required for an adoption if the father has "maintained substantial and continuous or repeated contact with the child," such as by paying child support, visiting the child, or communicating with the agency or person providing care and custody of the child (Domestic Relations Law s 111[1][d]). However, consent is not required if the parent is unable to adequately care for the child as a result of mental illness or mental retardation (Social Services Law § 384-b[4][c]). All four Judicial Departments have held, in sum and substance, that proceedings to terminate parental rights on the ground of abandonment are unnecessary where the consent of the person whose parental rights are being terminated is not required. In other words, if an out-of-wedlock father does not qualify for consent rights in connection with a proceeding pursuant to Social Services Law § 384-b to terminate parental rights, there is no need for or purpose served by a proceeding to terminate parental rights on the ground of abandonment (see Matter of Daryl D., 6 AD3d 1196; Matter of Carrie GG., 273 A.D.2d 561, 562; Matter of Kasiem H., 230 A.D.2d 796,797; Matter of Christy R., 183 A.D.2d 434, 434; Matter of Catholic Child Care Socy. of Diocese of Brooklyn, 112 A.D.2d 1039, 1040-1041).

The Appellate Division pointed out that the appellant consistently disputed whether he was the child's father, sought DNA testing, and expressed concern that the stigma of an abandonment could negatively impact his relationship with his four children, who apparently resided with his aunt. The petitioner provided no proof of the appellant's paternity. While Torres testified that the appellant was listed as the child's father in the Putative Father Registry, the petition expressly alleged that the father was not listed in the Putative Father Registry. The child's birth certificate did not name the appellant as the father, no sworn statement from the mother identified the appellant as the father, and the appellant's paternity had never been adjudicated by any court.

The Court rejected petitioners argument that it was under no obligation to prove the appellant's paternity, which relied upon Matter of Robert O. v. Russell K. (173 A.D.2d 30, affd 80 N.Y.2d 254), wherein the Court of Appeals specifically reasoned that the prompt assertion of parental responsibilities should be measured not from the father's awareness of the child, but from the beginning of the child's life (see Matter of Robert O. v. Russell K., 80 N.Y.2d at 264). The father in Matter of Robert O. was held to have forfeited his right to contest the subject adoption proceeding as he had failed to earlier and promptly assert his paternal rights by learning of the child and developing a protectable custodial relationship. It distinguished Matter of Robert O. from this proceeding as there was no question that the unwed father in Robert O. was the biological father of the child. Here, in contrast, the appellant challenged his paternity and such paternity was never established by the petitioner. Thus, the appellant was not attempting to assert parental rights as much as he is attempting to ascertain whether he has any parental rights to assert in the first instance.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court should have granted the appellant's request for DNA testing to determine if he was the biological father of the child. If the results of such testing demonstrated that the appellant was not the child's biological father, then there would have been no need to commence a termination of parental rights proceeding against him. However, if the results of the DNA testing demonstrated that the appellant was the biological father, they would support the Family Court's conclusion that he was not a "consent father" under Domestic Relations Law § 111(1)(d), and Matter of Robert O., or that his consent would otherwise be required but his right thereto had been forfeited by his abandonment of the child pursuant to Social Services Law §384-b(4)(b). Neither determination could be properly reached absent the DNA evidence, which the appellant had requested. Without the benefit of DNA testing, the appellant would be subject to the stigma of an abandonment finding as to a child for whom he may not have any parental rights or responsibilities. Moreover, such finding might negatively affect the appellant's status in potential future court proceedings.

Child Support - Enforcement - Ineffective Assistance of Counsel - Counsel's Failure to Present Sufficient Evidence Regarding Defense Constituted Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Warranting Reversal of Commitment

In Matter of Albert v Terpening,--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 2097576 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), , petitioner (mother) filed a violation petition alleging that the father had failed to pay child support as required by a 2012 support order. The father later filed a petition seeking a downward modification of child support, claiming that he was disabled. At the hearing on the mother's petition, a representative from the Support Collection Unit testified that the father had accumulated additional arrears since the 2012 order. The father testified that he was disabled and unable to work due to back problems that had prevented him from maintaining employment and for which he had upcoming surgery, and his medical records were introduced into evidence. Family Court found that the medical evidence did not establish the father's inability to work during "most of the relevant period" in issue and, at most, demonstrated his temporary disability for certain "short periods." The court issued an order, inter alia, committing him to the County jail to be suspended after 30 days if the father made specified payments.

The Father argued on appeal that his assigned counsel's failure to present sufficient evidence to satisfy his burden to offer, in response, "some competent, credible evidence of his inability to make the required payments" (Matter of Powers v. Powers, 86 N.Y.2d 63, 69-70 [1995]) constituted ineffective representation. The Appellate Division held that to succeed on this claim, he had to demonstrate that, viewing the record in its totality, counsel did not provide meaningful representation.

Its review of the father's medical records disclosed that, during the period at issue, the father had ongoing medical care and treatment for ongoing back problems, had a pending disability benefits claim for which he was awaiting a hearing, underwent a surgical block injection and had a second one planned. There were several documented periods in which he was directed not to work by his treating physicians for periods of between four and six weeks or for unspecified periods of time. Counsel submitted these subpoenaed medical records into evidence at the hearing, arguing that the records demonstrated that the father had been unable to work for much of the time since the 2012 order. However, these records were submitted in an unsorted mass and without the benefit of any corresponding testimony, explanation or development in any meaningful manner so as to aid Family Court in reviewing and determining the pertinent documentation of disability. The court made an effort to conduct a meaningful review of the records, which were found to contain certain deficiencies that counsel should have addressed prior to the hearing; counsel's request for an adjournment to obtain medical testimony at that juncture was properly denied. Additionally, in the course of this review, when the court asserted that the records failed to reveal a "permanent disability," counsel failed to object that this was an incorrect standard. The Court noted that ideally, medical testimony would be available and proffered but it was not unmindful of the real world difficulties and the attendant costs of obtaining such evidence, and that it is not currently possible to achieve this in every legal proceeding. Nonetheless, other methods of presenting pertinent medical evidence were available, for example, by obtaining a medical affidavit. It stated that at a minimum, an attorney may be expected to organize and present the disability documentation found within a medical file, accompanied with explanatory argument as to the legal significance of said documents. It found that the marshaling of the evidence was not adequate to appropriately present an available defense and, thus, fell below the requisite standard. It found that had the available proof been properly submitted, accompanied by appropriate legal arguments, the father may have been able to demonstrate support for his testimony that, for at least some parts of the relevant period, he was unable to work and, at a minimum, the resulting penalty might have been mitigated. Accordingly, it held that counsel's failure to present sufficient evidence regarding his medical condition and inability to work constituted ineffective assistance of counsel (Matter of Templeton v. Templeton, 74 AD3d at 1513; Matter of Martin v. Martin, 46 AD3d 1243, 1246 [2007]) and reversed the orders on the law, and remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

Attorneys - Liens - Charging Lien - Fourth Department Observes That No New York Appellate Court Has Held That Child Support Awards Are Categorically Excluded from an Attorney's Charging Lien.

In Mura v Mura, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1949276 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. Plaintiff and defendant were divorced in 1993. The judgment of divorce awarded plaintiff child support and ordered defendant to pay $25,226.72 in child support arrears that had accrued from the commencement of the divorce action through entry of the judgment. For 16 years, the child support obligation was not enforced. In April 2011, plaintiff hired Bezinque to recover the accumulated child support arrears that, with interest, totaled $549,403.62 as of September 2011. At the time, defendant owned real property in Ontario County, and the judgment of divorce was filed in Monroe County. Bezinque filed the judgment in Ontario County and commenced actions in both Ontario County and Monroe County to restrain the sale of the Ontario property. While those proceedings were ongoing, defendant sold the property in violation of a court order. Upon Bezinque's motion, defendant's share of the proceeds from the sale of the home was placed in escrow "in anticipation of a final judgment for unpaid child support" (escrowed funds). In July 2012, the court awarded interim attorney's fees to White and Bezinque to be paid from the escrowed funds. No appeal was taken from that order. Bezinque referred plaintiff to another law firm for the preparation of executions and levies against the escrowed funds held by defendant's then attorneys, and requested payment of the outstanding balance of his legal fees from those funds. Plaintiff did not respond to that request. Bezinque thereafter moved by order to show cause seeking, inter alia, a charging lien pursuant to Judiciary Law §475 against the escrowed funds sufficient to cover his outstanding fees. Plaintiff opposed Bezinque's motion and cross-moved for an order directing Bezinque and White to return the counsel fees they received pursuant to the interim order. Supreme Court granted Bezinque's motion.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that Judiciary Law § 475 "codifies and extends the common-law charging lien." The lien comes into existence, without notice or filing, upon commencement of the action or proceeding," and gives the attorney an equitable ownership interest in the client's cause of action" (LMWT Realty Corp. v. Davis Agency, 85 N.Y.2d 462, 467). The only exception contained in the statute is for proceedings before "a department of labor" (Judiciary Law s 475). In addition to that statutory exception, the Court of Appeals has held that, as a matter of public policy, a charging lien may not attach to an award of alimony or maintenance (see Turner v. Woolworth, 221 N.Y. 425, 429-430; see also Matter of Balanoff v. Niosi, 16 AD3d 53, 63; Cohen v. Cohen, 160 A.D.2d 571, 572; Theroux v. Theroux, 145 A.D.2d 625, 627). Plaintiff contended that child support awards should likewise be immune from attachment under Judiciary Law § 475, relying solely on Shipman v. City of N.Y. Support Collection Unit (183 Misc.2d 478, 485). The Appellate Division found that contrary to plaintiff's characterization, the funds at issue were not a "child support award" or "child support arrears." Rather, the escrowed funds constituted defendant's share of the net proceeds of the sale of his residence and, as the trial court recognized, "[t]here has been no determination [as to] what amount of the house sale proceeds are necessary to pay any child support arrears owed by [defendant]." In any event, it noted that no New York appellate court has cited Shipman for the proposition relied upon by plaintiff, i.e., that child support awards are categorically excluded from an attorney's charging lien, and it concluded that Shipman was unpersuasive, particularly in the context of this case. Even assuming, arguendo, that there is a general public policy precluding the enforcement of a charging lien upon a child support award, it concluded that such a policy was not implicated under the unique circumstances of this case. The plaintiff did not seek to enforce the 16-year-old support obligation until the parties' children, who were the intended beneficiaries of the support, were either emancipated or nearly emancipated. This was therefore not a situation in which the enforcement of a lien pursuant to Judiciary Law s 475 would result in the depletion of monies necessary for the ongoing support of a minor child or children (see Shipman, 183 Misc.2d at 487).

It concluded that Bezinque established his prima facie entitlement to a charging lien in the amount of $30,545.91 by submitting, inter alia, his most recent billing statement and an affirmation in which he averred that he sent monthly billing statements to plaintiff, that plaintiff never raised an objection to those statements, and that she "repeatedly and persistently promised payment out of the proceeds of this litigation" (see Wasserman v. Wasserman, 119 AD3d 932, 934). It further concluded that the court properly denied plaintiff's cross motion for disgorgement of funds paid to Bezinque and White. The funds from which Bezinque and White were paid in 2012 did not constitute "child support ." Moreover, the interim fee award was made upon plaintiff's motion, and no appeal was taken from that order. In any event, it agreed with the court that plaintiff provided no factual or legal basis to support the equitable remedy of disgorgement (see generally Law Off. of Sheldon Eisenberger v. Blisko, 106 AD3d 650, 652).

Agreements - Counsel Fee Provision - Appellate Division Construes Counsel Fee Provision of Agreement in Favor of Attorney

In Myles v Perry, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1781740 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court correctly held that the settlement agreement between the parties authorized defendant's firm to seek counsel fees from plaintiff. The Agreement stated that the parties "agree that, with respect to the unpaid legal fees and disbursements each party owes to his or her attorneys ... requests may be made for same to the Court upon papers ... Notwithstanding the foregoing, each party shall be responsible for and shall pay his or her respective counsel ... fees ..." The Agreement then provided that each party is "solely responsible" for his counsel's fees and that each party agrees to indemnify the adversary spouse against third-party claims for those fees. The Appellate Division held that relying on its prior order, the court correctly interpreted the provision thus: "first, to allow counsel to seek any unpaid legal fees from the adversary spouse upon motion to the court, and second, in the event the court awarded only part of the legal fees, to obligate the spouse to pay his remaining portion. Similarly, as the spouse remains solely responsible for the remaining portion, he must indemnify the adversary spouse if that remaining portion is sought from her."

It rejected plaintiff's argument on appeal that the Agreement allowed counsel to seek fees from her own client only, not from the adversary spouse. As the Supreme Court noted, there was no apparent reason to include such an agreement between an attorney and her client in a settlement agreement between adversary spouses.

Counsel Fees - Award - Domestic Relations Law § 237(b) Expressly Grants the Court Discretion to Award Attorney's Fees in Custody Disputes to a Parent

In Evgeny F. v. Inessa B., --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1897193 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which, after a hearing, granted respondent mother's application for an interim award of attorney's fees in the amount of $525,000 and expert's fees of $38,000 from petitioner father. It found that in this child custody proceeding, the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding respondent counsel fees and expert fees based on the relative financial circumstances of the parties and the circumstances of the case as a whole. The evidence established that petitioner was in a superior financial position and that he heavily litigated this matter to purposely delay the proceedings in an effort to cause respondent to spend her more limited resources on the case. Thus the Referee properly exercised her discretion in determining that respondent should be completely reimbursed for the legal and expert fees she incurred, which were supported by her attorney's testimony and records. It rejected the petitioners argument that the court's determination was undermined by its reference to the "rebuttable presumption" language of Domestic Relations Law § 237(b), which petitioner maintained applies only when attorney's fees are sought by a "spouse." The statute expressly grants the court discretion to award attorney's fees in custody disputes to a "spouse or parent".

Domestic Relations Law 236[B][6-a] - Temporary Maintenance - Award - Court Not Required to Set Forth Factors and Reason for its Decision Where Cap Not Exceeded.

In Lundgren v Lundgren, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1652357 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order of Supreme Court that directed the defendant to pay temporary maintenance and temporary child. The Appellate Division held that since the court awarded the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance, calculated based upon income that did not exceed the specified income cap, the court was not required to set forth the factors it considered and the reason for its decision.

Agreements - Set Aside - Appellate Division Holds Plenary Action Not Required to Challenge Validity of the Separation Agreement Where No Judgment of Divorce Entered in Divorce Action

In Kuznetsov v Kuznetsov, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1810427 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were married in Russia in 1991 and emigrated to the United States in 1997. In 2007, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce and in 2012, the defendant moved for a declaration that the parties' separation agreement dated December 16, 2002, was valid, and, in effect, that an ex parte judgment of divorce obtained by the plaintiff in Russia in 2003 was valid insofar as it terminated the marital status of the parties. The plaintiff cross-moved for declarations that the separation agreement and the Russian judgment of divorce were invalid. The Supreme Court granted the defendant's motion and denied the plaintiff's cross motion.

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the defendant's contention, the plaintiff was not required to bring a plenary action in order to challenge the validity of the separation agreement because no judgment of divorce had been entered in this action (citing Petracca v. Petracca, 101 AD3d 695; Kabir v. Kabir, 85 AD3d 1127; Arato v. Arato, 15 AD3d 511; cf. Thelander v. Thelander, 42 AD3d 495, 496; Sloboda v. Sloboda, 24 AD3d 533, 534; Luisi v. Luisi, 6 AD3d 398, 401; Spataro v. Spataro, 268 A.D.2d 467, 468; Dombrowski v. Dombrowski, 239 A.D.2d 460, 460).

The Appellate Division also held that Supreme Court correctly declared that the ex parte Russian judgment of divorce obtained by the plaintiff was valid to the extent the judgment terminated the marital status of the parties. Generally, the courts of this State will "accord recognition to the judgments rendered in a foreign country under the doctrine of comity which is the equivalent of full faith and credit given by the courts to judgments of our sister States." Here, it was not the defendant who sought to invalidate the judgment of divorce obtained in Russia, but the plaintiff, who procured that judgment in 2003. A "party who properly appeared in the action is precluded from attacking the validity of the foreign country judgment in a collateral proceeding brought in the courts of this State." (Greshler v. Greshler, 51 N.Y.2d at 376).

Supreme Court

Family Offense - Order of Protection - Defendant's E-mails Containing Gratuitous Vile and Offensive Language Constituted Harassment Warranting Order of Protection for Committing Family Offense.

In L.T. v K.T., 2015 WL 1783716 (N.Y.Sup.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 50557(U) after the parties had entered into a "so ordered" custody stipulation, but before the judgment of divorce was entered, Plaintiff, inter alia, sought an Order of Protection pursuant to DRL § 252, prohibiting Defendant from: "Committing a family offense as defined in subdivision one of section 530.11 of the Criminal Procedure Law or any criminal offense against the Plaintiff and to refrain from harassing, intimidating, or threatening the Plaintiff."

The basis for order of protection, and a Contempt finding was a series of embarrassing and harassing e-mails from Defendant to Plaintiff, set forth in the moving papers, which showed Defendant insolently mentioning issues between the parties and then repeatedly and gratuitously adding language one would expect to hear from drunken sailors or college students at a fraternity party. They included: September 29, 2014: "you may be the stupidest person I ever encountered ... Holy crap ... fuck you ... funk your family ... btw did I say fuck you ... btw ... you look pregnant; October 14, 2014: I DON'T GIVE A FUCK!!!!... good luck in life dummy, you will need it ... btw if you don't get this shit soon I will have it dropped off in your parents driveway ... also fuck you if that was not clear lol ... I don't know how to get this through your dented head.I'm the competent parentas always, fuck you.; October 28, 2014: E-mail No.1: The kids are sleeping, do you really want me to wake them up because you are a bad mother? Also fuck younasty bitchwhen the kids need money for college ... first carsweddings....I will show them what you did....soooooo fuck you, they will get off the bus at your parents house tomorrow....I can't wait till the kids tell you they want to stay at my house cuz you are living in a basement apartment, like a divorced woman loseryou fuckin disgrace. E-mail # 2: They are sleeping....I guess your masters degree doesn't cover reading comprehension.now leave me alone bitch.I don't have to take your mouth anymore....btw fuck you!!!!!!!god I love to say that.

The Court held that a hearing was not required because Defendant did not deny the content of the e-mails or that he wrote and sent them to Plaintiff. Instead, he tried to justify his conduct. Supreme Court observed that for the Court to issue an Order of Protection, there must exist a family offense as described in FCA § 812, DRL § 252. The selected statutes follow the Penal Law wording, except to the extent that "disorderly conduct" (PL §240.20) includes disorderly conduct not in a public place. Plaintiff asserted that defendant's e-mails constituted a form of harassment. Defendant conceded e-mails can be the basis of a family offense. Julie G. v. Yu-Jen G., 81 AD3d 1079 (3rd Dept.2011). The court found that Harassment in the Second Degree (PL § 240.26) approximated the conduct and should be applied here. For PL § 240.26(3) to apply, Defendant must, "with intent to harass annoy or harm another person ... engage[] in a course of conduct or repeatedly commits acts which alarm or seriously annoy such other person and which serve no legitimate purpose." The parties, in their "so-ordered" Stipulation, limited their communication to "one e-mail a day for the purpose of discussing issues concerning the children." It followed then, that any content of the e-mail that did not concern the children was gratuitous and served "no legitimate purpose" within the meaning of PL § 240.26(3). The court found that the numerous e-mails sent between September 29, 2014 and November 19, 2014 established a course of conduct. Their communications were limited to issues concerning the children, and the inquiries and responses must remain within those bounds. Any e-mail which did not involve an issue concerning the children (or individual child of the parties) did not belong in the e-mail as it did not serve the legitimate purpose defined by the parties. An Order of Protection was issued in favor of Plaintiff and against Defendant.

Custody - Assignment of Counsel - Judiciary Law § 35(8) - Unemployed Defendant with MBA Entitled to Assignment of Counsel in Supreme Court

In Abadi v Abadi, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1648777 (N.Y.Sup.) the father, who held an MBA degree from the Wharton School of Business of the University of Pennsylvania, moved for an order that this court appoint an attorney utilizing public funds to represent him in post-judgment litigation concerning access to the parties' children and restrictions sought by plaintiff his former wife. The defendant claimed that his earnings were $18,371.00 for the year 2014, and he was unable to obtain counsel because of his inability to pay legal fees. He asserted that he had total debt in student loans of $40,388.03. He had another debt from Banistmo S.A. the amount of $29,521.15. He also had credit card debt in the amount of $24,095.36. Additionally, he had liabilities in the form of counsel fees in the amount of $84,022.66. He asserted that he was unable to obtain employment commensurate with his abilities and education.

Supreme Court observed that the assignment of counsel to represent adult who are unable to afford counsel is provided for in the Judiciary Law § 35(8) which states, "whenever supreme court shall exercise jurisdiction over a matter which the family court might have exercised jurisdiction had such action or proceeding been commenced in family court or referred thereto pursuant to law, and under circumstances whereby, if such proceedings were pending in family court, such court would be required by section two hundred sixty-two of the family court act to appoint counsel, supreme court shall also appoint counsel and such counsel shall be compensated in accordance with the provisions of this section." It found that the defendant also met the requirements under the Family Court Act § 262(a)(v) which states, "(a) Each of the persons described below in this subdivision has the right to the assistance of counsel... (v) the parent of any child seeking custody or contesting the substantial infringement of his or her right to custody of such child, in any proceeding before the court in which the court has jurisdiction to determine such custody;" Defendant also met the requirements under Family Court Act § 262(b) which states, "(b) Assignment of counsel in other cases. In addition to the cases listed in subdivision (a) of this section, a judge may assign counsel to represent any adult in a proceeding under this act if he determines that such assignment of counsel is mandated by the constitution of the state of New York or of the United States, and includes such determination in the order assigning counsel."

Thus, under Judiciary Law § 35(8) defendant was eligible for the assignment of counsel. Defendant made a sufficient threshold showing that would warrant government funds to be utilized to provide defendant with legal representation and by separate order the appointed an attorney to represent him.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Award - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) - Imputed Income - Wife Denied Award Where Income Imputed Equal to Husbands Income. Pendente Lite Child Support Modified.

In Finn v Piesco, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1636653 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in imputing income of $75,000, to plaintiff based on her work history, education, and skills, thus deeming her income equal to that reported on defendant's tax return and denying plaintiff's request for temporary maintenance. Supreme Court correctly concluded that plaintiff failed to explain why, as an experienced attorney with a master's degree in public administration and a real estate license, she earned no income in 2012. Plaintiff failed to submit any evidence to refute defendant's claim that she held a valid real estate license. She also failed to explain how the Ninth Judicial District Grievance Committee's investigation into complaints against her, which seem to have been fairly limited in scope and did not result in any disciplinary suspensions, would prevent her from operating her law practice or otherwise earning any income for years at a time, as she claims. She also failed to submit documentation to support her claim that defendant, a carpenter, made $125,000, rather than the $75,000 reported on his tax return.

The Appellate Division held that plaintiff 's pendente lite application for an upward modification of the child support award entered by the Family Court, should have been granted. In the Family Court proceeding, the parties had consented to an award of $153 per week for the parties' two children, based on the husband having an adjusted annual income of about $30,000. In opposition to plaintiff's application in the instant proceeding, however, he submitted a net worth statement and tax return disclosing at least $75,000 in adjusted gross income. Plaintiff also submitted evidence that she and the children were receiving food stamps, and that she had substantial outstanding bills for household necessities and the children's expenses. In light of the substantial discrepancy between the amount of income attributed to the husband in the Family Court order and the amount disclosed subsequently, the Supreme Court erred in concluding that the amount agreed upon in Family Court was appropriate. The application was granted to the extent of remanding for further proceedings, to redetermine the award of temporary child support with a final award to be made after trial Matter of Brescia v. Fitts, 56 N.Y.2d 132, 138, 141 [1982])

Child Custody - Visitation - Grandparent Visitation - Domestic Relations Law §72 - Visitation Denied Where Mother Did Not Prevent Voluntary Visitation with the Children

In Matter of Troiano v Marotta, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1542194 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied a petition pursuant for grandparent visitation. The Court found that the Family Court properly determined that the grandfather lacked standing to seek visitation with the grandchildren. The grandfather failed to demonstrate that the mother frustrated his visitation with the grandchildren (see Matter of Bender v. Cendali, 107 AD3d at 982). It was undisputed that the mother had asked the grandfather to visit with the grandchildren, and that he only refused because the mother did not want the grandmother to accompany him.

Maintenance - Award - Denied Where Mother Cohabiting with Boyfriend and Received Adequate Support-

In Heydt -Benjamin v Heydt-Benjamin, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1542466 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division found that the Supreme Court properly concluded that there was insufficient evidence presented to support the defendant's application for equitable distribution of the plaintiff's pension. The document which the defendant sought to admit to show the existence of a pension was written in German and not accompanied by the requisite translator's attestation (see Martinez v. 123-16 Liberty Ave. Realty Corp., 47 AD3d 901, 902; CPLR 2101[b]).

The court properly determined that the defendant alone was required to bear the obligation of repayment of the balance of her student loan because no benefit inured to the marriage (see Dashnaw v. Dashnaw, 11 AD3d 732, 735; see also Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 NY3d 415, 422 n).

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in declining to award maintenance to the defendant. The defendant admitted at trial that she had been cohabiting with her boyfriend and their child for more than two years, and that she received adequate economic support.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Jurisdiction - Members of Same Family or Household - Intimate Relationship Established Where Appellant's Children Were Residing with the Petitioner.

In Matter of Winston v Edwards - Clarke--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1447096 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), at a fact-finding hearing on the family offense petition, the petitioner described herself as the fiancée of the appellant's ex-husband (the ex-husband). The ex-husband was the father of one of the petitioner's children and had custody of the appellant's children. The ex-husband and his children lived in the same household as the petitioner and her children. The petitioner functioned as stepmother to the appellant's children, and helped to arrange for the appellant's visitation with her children. The hearing evidence established that the appellant engaged in a public disturbance regarding the conditions of her visitation with her children outside of the home shared by the petitioner and the ex-husband. At the hearing, the petitioner acknowledged that she and the appellant did not live together, and that they did not spend time together as a family. However, when the appellant made an application, in effect, to dismiss the proceeding for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the Family Court concluded that it had jurisdiction over the controversy since the parties "have an ongoing relationship by virtue of the children" and the appellant's children were residing with the petitioner. At the conclusion of the fact-finding hearing, the Family Court found that the appellant had committed the family offense of disorderly conduct.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the Family Court properly concluded that it had subject matter jurisdiction over this proceeding. Family Court Act § 812(1) gives the Family Court jurisdiction over family offenses committed "... between members of the same family or household. Family Court Act § 812(1) includes: "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time. Factors the court may consider in determining whether a relationship is an 'intimate relationship' include but are not limited to: the nature or type of relationship, regardless of whether the relationship is sexual in nature; the frequency of interaction between the persons; and the duration of the relationship. Neither a casual acquaintance nor ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts shall be deemed to constitute an 'intimate relationship' " (Family Ct Act §812[1] [e]). A determination as to whether persons are or have been in an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e) is "a fact-specific determination." Generally, the "relationship should be direct, not one based upon a connection with a third party," such as a child or a common boyfriend or girlfriend (Matter of Jose M. v. Angel V., 99 AD3d at 247). Here an intimate relationship was established by the fact that the petitioner was living with the appellant's children and their father, who had custody of them, and was acting as a stepmother to the appellant's children. Frequency of contact is a significant factor in determining whether there is an "intimate relationship" within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), and it appeared from the record that there was frequent contact between the appellant and the petitioner in order to arrange for the appellant's visitation with her children.

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Where Parties Never Came to a "Meeting of the Minds as to the Essential Terms of The" Stipulation, it Was Not a Binding Agreement in Any Respect

In Fulginiti v Fulginiti, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1565661 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the Plaintiff (wife) and defendant (husband) were married in 1991 and were the parents of three children. The wife commenced the divorce action in August 2010, alleging that she had been subjected to cruel and inhuman treatment. The husband answered and counterclaimed for divorce upon the same grounds. The parties appeared before Supreme Court in July 2012 and entered into a stipulation which allegedly included a commitment by the husband to withdraw his answer and permit a divorce on the ground stated in the wife's complaint. Supreme Court issued a decision after trial in May 2013, finding, inter alia, that the wife was entitled to a divorce on the ground stated in the complaint and granting ancillary relief. The husband moved for renewal and/or reargument in July 2013 and asserted, among other things, that he had never agreed to withdraw his answer and permit a divorce on the ground stated in the complaint. Supreme Court adhered to its original decision.

The Appellate Division observed that while CPLR 2104 refers to open court stipulations made by counsel, the husband was free to enter into such a stipulation without counsel given that he knowingly elected to proceed pro se. It noted that a valid stipulation must be construed "as an independent contract subject to settled principles of contractual interpretation" (McCoy v. Feinman, 99 N.Y.2d 295, 302 [2002]). The record was essentially silent as to the fate of the husband's answer. The only reference thereto was a brief comment by counsel for the wife, who expressed his belief that the husband had agreed to withdraw his answer and "go forward" on the complaint. The husband never confirmed that belief, nor were its implications explained to him. Silence by a pro se litigant on a seemingly offhand remark in the midst of involved negotiations cannot be said to be misleading and "may not be translated into acceptance merely because the offer purports to attach that effect to it," creating an ambiguity in the terms of the stipulation (Matter of Albrecht Chem. Co. [Anderson Trading Corp.], 298 N.Y. 437 [1949]). The husband gave no indication that he understood the stipulation to include a commitment to withdraw his answer, telling Supreme Court that he found the stipulation as a whole acceptable despite having "[a] million" questions about it. Thereafter, while the husband retained counsel and submitted to a trial on unresolved economic issues, he repeatedly asserted that he had not withdrawn his answer and sought reargument of Supreme Court's finding that he had done so. Given the paucity of evidence to suggest that the husband actually agreed to withdraw his answer as part of the stipulation, Supreme Court erred in construing the stipulation in that manner. As the record established that the parties never came to a "meeting of the minds as to the essential terms of the" stipulation, it was not a binding agreement in any respect (May v. Wilcox, 182 A.D.2d 939, 939, 582 N.Y.S.2d 294 [1992]). Accordingly, there was no proper finding as to whether a divorce was appropriate .The Appellate Division held that a trial was required on the fundamental issue of grounds, and that the husband's remaining arguments "cannot be addressed at this juncture."The judgment and order were reversed, on the law, and matter remitted to the Supreme Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

Maintenance - Modification - DRL § 236(B)(9)(b) -Surviving Agreement - Downward - Extreme Hardship -Undisputed Proof Indicating That the Husband Earned, after Taxes, less than His Monthly Support Obligation Was Sufficient to Demonstrate Prima Facie Evidence of Extreme Hardship

In McKelvey v McKelvey,--- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1470793 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff (wife) and defendant (husband) were married in 1980. In October 2009, when the wife commenced the action for a divorce, the parties had one unemancipated child. In November 2009, a Support Magistrate issued an order directing the husband to pay child support of $1,213 per month and nondurational spousal support of $2,787 per month. In June 2010, after the husband defaulted, Supreme Court held an inquest and, granted the wife a judgment of divorce. It was apparent from the terms of the judgment, that the parties appeared at the inquest and "agreed on financial issues." The judgment reflected that the parties agreed to incorporate the Support Magistrate's November 2009 order with regard to spousal and child support into the judgment. In September 2013, the father moved for an order to modify and/or partially vacate the spousal support provision of the judgment. Supreme Court denied the motion without a hearing. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that to the extent that the husband sought to modify the spousal support provision of the agreement that was incorporated into the judgment, Supreme Court should not have denied his request without a hearing. Generally, a party is entitled to a hearing upon such a request if he or she is able to show prima facie evidence of "extreme hardship". The husband presented tax returns for years 2008 through 2011. The husband was the former owner of a successful corporation and that, due to his default, his support obligation was based on the wife's statement of net worth and the parties' 2008 tax returns. That year, the parties' reported income of $92,647 and the corporation reported profit of $548,357. The husband claimed that, at some point, the corporation "collapsed" and its property was sold in foreclosure. In 2012, the husband reported income of $24,800 and, in 2013, he was earning $800 per week working for the company that purchased "the shell" of his former corporation. The undisputed proof indicating that the husband earned, after taxes, less than his monthly support obligation was sufficient to demonstrate prima facie evidence of extreme hardship, and Supreme Court should have held a hearing on his request to modify his support obligation. The matter remitted to the Supreme Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

Counsel Fees Are Not Authorized on Motion to Compel the Wife to Comply with the Alleged Status Quo Regarding Holiday Visitation

In Hauer v Patel, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1035891 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), shortly after the action for a divorce was commenced, the husband moved to compel the wife to comply with the alleged status quo the parties had maintained during their separation regarding holiday visitation. The husband also sought counsel fees incurred with respect to the motion. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the Supreme Court's determination, the husband did not move for an award of interim counsel fees pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 237(a), and thus, the Supreme Court erred in granting such an award. Further, counsel fees were not authorized in connection with the relief the husband requested in his motion (cf. Domestic Relations Law §237[b]). The husband's motion which was for an award of counsel fees incurred in connection with his motion should have been denied.

Enhanced Earning Capacity Attributable to Academic Degrees and Professional Licenses Is Not Marital Property Subject to Equitable Distribution Absent a Substantial Contribution to its Acquisition by the Non-titled Spouse.

Pendente Lite Support Order May Not Be Reviewed on Appeal from Judgment of Divorce.

In Badwell v Badwell, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1036049 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in determining that the plaintiff's nursing license was not marital property subject to equitable distribution. Although the enhanced earnings from academic degrees and professional licenses attained during the marriage are subject to equitable distribution, it is incumbent upon the nontitled party seeking a distributive share of such assets to demonstrate a substantial contribution to the titled party's acquisition of that marital asset. Where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree or professional license, and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. Here, there was no evidence that the defendant made a substantial contribution to the plaintiff's acquisition of her nursing degree. There was no evidence that the defendant made career sacrifices or assumed a disproportionate share of household work as a consequence of the plaintiff's education; his contributions were minor.

The Appellate Division held that the propriety of the pendente lite child support order may not be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment of divorce (see Anderson v. Anderson, 50 AD3d 610; Samuelson v. Samuelson, 124 A.D.2d 650).

Strict Compliance with Court-directed Methods of Service Pursuant to CPLR 308(5) Is Necessary in Order for the Court to Obtain Personal Jurisdiction over a Respondent/defendant

In Matter of Keith X v Kristin Y, 124 A.D.3d 1056, 2 N.Y.S.3d 268 (3d Dept, 2015) after petitioner commenced two proceedings to establish paternity and gain joint legal and physical custody of an eight-year-old boy who he alleged was his child, petitioner was unable to effectuate service upon respondent despite numerous attempts to do so. Upon his motion Family Court made an order pursuant to CPLR 308(5) establishing specific alternative methods of personal service. After having determined that petitioner failed to conform to its prescribed methods of service, Family Court dismissed the petitions without prejudice. The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that strict compliance with court-directed methods of service is necessary in order for the court to obtain personal jurisdiction over a respondent/defendant. The order required that the amended orders to show cause and petitions be served on two attorneys who had represented respondent in unrelated litigation and, that substituted service be completed as follows: "2. By serving [respondent] at [two known] email addresses [and] by including with such emails copies of the [p]etitions, this [o]rder, and the [o]rders to show cause filed by [p]etitioner in support of the [p]etitions, in PDF format, each of such emails to be sent on or before April 28, 2014; and 3. By sending [respondent] an SMS/text message at [a known] subscriber number ... advising her of the pendency of the two above-captioned proceedings and advising her to access her email addresses as set forth in paragraph 2 herein, to review this [o]rder and the contents of the attached PDF files and to contact her attorneys ... for copies of the [o]rders to show cause and

[p]etitions upon whom these papers have been served on her behalf, said text to be sent on or before April 28, 2014."

The Appellate Division found that petitioner's compliance with the terms of the order was lacking. As to the email requirement, petitioner's affidavit of service stated that respondent was served on April 28, 2014 via two separate email addresses, as per Family Court's order, and that both emails were returned as undeliverable. While neither dictates of due process nor Family Court's order required proof that respondent actually received notice of the proceedings the affidavit of email service failed to state that the documents were, in fact, delivered to respondent in a PDF format. As to the manner in which petitioner conducted service by text message, petitioner's process server averred that, on April 28, 2014, he sent respondent a text message stating that "[p]aternity and custody petitions have been filed by [petitioner] regarding [the child]. Your court date in [Family Court] is May 21, 2014 at 9AM. Your failure to appear may result in a custody order and default. Contact [respondent's attorneys] for copies of these documents." Having neglected to state in the text message, as expressly required in Family Court's order, that respondent should access her email accounts to review the documents that had been served in a PDF format by email and that the text message was being sent by virtue of Family Court's order, the Appellate Division agreed with Family Court's determination that such substituted service was insufficient to confer personal jurisdiction over respondent.

A Medical Income Execution Pursuant to CPLR 5241(b)(2) Can Be Issued Only Where a Court Has Ordered a Parent to Provide Health Insurance Benefits. Dss May Not Issue a Medical Income Execution to a New Employer of the Parent Without Going to Court

In Chautauqua County Dept. of Health and Human Services, ex rel. Matteson v. Matteson, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1280444 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that Family Court Act § 416(c) requires child support orders to include a provision that, if a parent currently or in the future has health insurance benefits available that may be extended or obtained to cover the child, the parent is required to exercise the option of additional coverage in favor of the child. The term "[a]vailable health insurance benefits" is defined as health insurance benefits that are "reasonable in cost," which in turn is defined as costs that do not exceed five percent of the combined parental gross income (FCA §416[d][2], [3]). A court, however, may also find that the cost is not reasonable considering "the circumstances of the case" (FCA §416[d] [3]). The benefits are not "reasonable" in cost if the "parent's share of the cost of extending such coverage would reduce the income of that parent below the self-support reserve". CPLR 5241(b)(2)(i) provides in relevant part that, where the court "orders the [parent] to provide health insurance benefits for specified dependents, an execution for medical support enforcement may ... be issued by the support collection unit." CPLR 5241(b)(2)(ii) provides in relevant part that, where a child support order requires the parent "to provide health insurance benefits for specified dependents, and where the [parent] provides such coverage and then changes employment, and the new employer provides health care coverage, an amended execution for medical support enforcement may be issued by the support collection unit ... without any return to court."

The Appellate Division rejected DSS argument that, pursuant to CPLR 5241(b)(2)(ii), it may issue a medical income execution to a new employer of the parent without going to court, and it was therefore error for the Support Magistrate to include the provision that a medical income execution "shall not [be issued] without such Court Order." A plain reading of that statute showed that it was not applicable here because neither parent provided health insurance coverage for the child at the time the Support Magistrate issued the order. The statute specifically provides that, "where the [parent] provides such coverage and then changes employment," an amended medical income execution may be issued by petitioner without returning to court. Inasmuch as there was no medical income execution that was issued in this case, there was nothing to "amend." Contrary to DSS further argument a medical income execution can be issued only where a court has ordered a parent to provide health insurance benefits, and that had not occurred inasmuch as the Support Magistrate determined that such benefits were not available (CPLR 5241[b][2][i]).

Supreme Court Holds That Settlement Provision Waiving Counsel Fees Bars Subsequent Counsel Fee Application by Attorney.

In LP v RP, --- N.Y.S.3d ----, 2015 WL 1241134 (N.Y.Sup.), on December 11, 2014, the parties settled all issues in their matrimonial action and placed the terms of the settlement on the record before the court. In the stipulation of settlement, the parties agreed that with regard to the fees of their own attorneys, "[n]either party will seek any fees from the other, no counsel fees, costs or expenses. They both agree to be responsible for [their] own counsel fees, costs and expenses." Before the settlement was placed on the record, the Court stated: "My understanding is ... the parties have now reached an agreement which will alleviate from me the obligation to write a post-trial decision and will also obviate from me the obligation to decide the pending fee application which was submitted by Mr.

Lieberman in connection with my decision and order of November 26, 2014 which found Mrs. P. to be in contempt." After the Stipulation was placed on the record the court allocuted the parties on the terms of the settlement. Each party agreed to the terms, including the counsel fee provisions. A month after the parties' settlement, relying upon the independent right of counsel to seek fees the wife's attorneys moved for an order directing Defendant to pay an amount no less than $230,000" in interim counsel fees and costs incurred by Plaintiff pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237(a). The Court observed that the statute allows the court to order payment of counsel fees to be made "directly to the attorney of the other spouse"; and that an "application for fees and expenses may be maintained by the attorney for either spouse in his own name in the same proceeding." The latter provision gives the attorney an independent right to proceed against the monied spouse for an award of fees in a matrimonial action. Plaintiff's counsel contended that her application was not barred by Plaintiff's waiver of her right to seek counsel fees in the parties' stipulation of settlement. Counsel asserted that "[w]hile the parties agreed to be responsible for their own fees, the Appellate Division, Second Department, made clear in Gregory v. Gregory, 109 AD3d 616, 618 [2nd Dept 2013]) that a stipulation of settlement is not binding upon the attorney for a litigant, who was not a party to the stipulation.

Supreme Court observed that in Gregory counsel for the wife moved for fees against the husband based upon FCA §438, which provides that "the court may allow counsel fees at any stage of the proceeding, to the attorney representing the spouse, former spouse or person on behalf of the children. Prior to disposition of counsel's motion, the wife, without the knowledge or involvement of her counsel, entered into a written stipulation of settlement with her husband, which provided that each of them shall pay their own counsel fees and indemnify and hold each other harmless against any claims for fees. Thereafter, the Family Court denied counsel's fee application on the ground that it was barred by the terms of the stipulation of settlement. The Appellate Division reversed, finding that counsel, who was discharged by the wife, was not bound by a stipulation to which he was not a party. Supreme Court held, inter alia, that the salient fact that distinguished the two cases was that the attorney in Gregory was a complete stranger to, and ignorant of, the stipulation by which he was ostensibly deprived of the opportunity that was authorized by the court to obtain fees from the husband/respondent. In this case, although not a "party" to the stipulation of settlement in the technical sense, Plaintiff's counsel negotiated the settlement and was present for, and participated in, placing the settlement in the record and the allocution of the parties as to the terms of the settlement. Thus, unlike the attorney in Gregory, Plaintiff's counsel was not a stranger to the parties' fee waiver. But for the settlement, Plaintiff's counsel's fee application, which was raised almost daily during the trial, would have been addressed in the Court's post-trial decision.

The Court declined to follow Maher v. Maher, 999 N.Y.S.2d 727 [Sup.Ct., Rockland County 2014], where the parties, acting through counsel, settled their divorce action and all ancillary issues and submitted a copy of the written stipulation of settlement to the court. Following the parties' execution of the stipulation of settlement, the wife discharged her counsel without cause. The wife's counsel then filed an application against the husband to recover counsel fees incurred by the wife in the divorce action. Relying on Gregory, the court in Maher stated that "the law is clear that simply because the parties agree that they will not seek counsel fees from the other, an attorney is not barred from making an application for fees from the adverse spouse where appropriate." The court then determined that counsel had standing to seek fees from the husband despite the explicit waiver by his former client in the stipulation of settlement, which counsel prepared, of her right to seek counsel fees against her spouse. Supreme Court declined to follow Maher on this point, because it did not believe that a counsel fee award was appropriate under the circumstances in Maher.

Supreme Court held that where, as here, counsel actively participates in a settlement of an action that includes the client's waiver of her right to seek fees from the other spouse, counsel must inform the parties of counsel's intention to seek fees prior to finalizing the settlement in order to preserve that right. Plaintiff's counsel waived her right to seek an award of counsel fees by remaining silent during the settlement proceedings as to her intent to seek fees. Plaintiff's counsel's motion for counsel fees was denied.

Authors Comment: We believe that the decision in Maher v. Maher, 999 N.Y.S.2d 727 [Sup.Ct., Rockland County 2014], is the correct result. "The law is clear that simply because the parties agree that they will not seek counsel fees from the other, an attorney is not barred from making an application for fees from the adverse spouse where appropriate."

Counsel Fees - DRL §237 - Wife Denied Counsel Fees for Failing to File Copy of the Retainer Agreement and a Detailed Affidavit Setting Forth the Charges Incurred.

In Curley v Curley, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2015 WL 790337 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the parties were married in 1979 and had no children together. On June 16, 2009, plaintiff (wife) commenced this action. Supreme Court ordered the husband to pay $900 per month maintenance starting upon the date of the wife's commencement of the action in June 2009 through December 2012, and $500 per month thereafter from January 2013 through December 2013, at which time the husband's maintenance obligation would end. The Appellate Division affirmed the award. Supreme Court properly considered the relevant statutory factors, and provided a reasoned analysis of those upon which it had based the award. The court noted that the parties had no children, were both in good health, and had been married for nearly 30 years. During most of that time, the wife worked full time and also contributed to the household by doing most of the cooking, cleaning, and laundering. The wife had a high school degree; during the marriage, the husband returned to school to obtain a Master's degree, while the wife continued to work. At the time of trial, the wife had retired, while the husband was still working as an engineer. The court noted the wife's testimony that she believed her position was in jeopardy when she accepted an early retirement incentive and, without expressly crediting this testimony, further noted that the position had not been filled in the two years between the retirement and the date of trial. However, in light of the wife's further testimony that she did not intend to seek alternate employment, and in accord with the purpose of maintenance to promote self-sufficiency, the court limited the duration of the husband's obligation and provided for the amount paid to substantially decrease over time.

The Appellate Division found that in exchange for agreeing to retire from her position as a university administrator and surrender her accrued vacation and sick leave, the wife was paid a lump sum of money shortly after commencement of the divorce action. The wife's eligibility for the retirement incentive benefits was derived from her employment during the marriage and, as such, the benefits should have been subject to equitable distribution.

Benefits received in consideration for an early retirement will constitute marital property if the right to the payments arose during the marriage, or where the incentive is intended as compensation for past services rendered by the employee-spouse during the marriage (see Olivo v. Olivo, 82 N.Y.2d 202, 207-208 [1993])). Here, the wife's inclusion in the retirement incentive program was based, at least in part, on the number of years of service to her employer. The wife testified that she accepted inclusion in the early retirement program in April 2009. The court found that the wife's entitlement to the early retirement benefits vested during the marriage. The mere fact that the incentive benefits were not paid until following the commencement of the proceedings did not alter their status as marital property subject to equitable distribution.

The Appellate Division rejected the husband's claim that Supreme Court erred in allowing the wife to receive her distributive share from the proceeds of the sale of the parties' marital home without regard for the resulting tax consequences to the husband. The husband presented no evidence with respect to any alleged tax consequences, and the court was not required to independently analyze the myriad of potential tax ramifications on the parties.

The Appellate Division found that the the wife did not properly support her claim for counsel fees by filing a copy of the retainer agreement and a detailed affidavit setting forth the charges incurred (Domestic Relations Law § 237[a]; 22 NYCRR 1400.3). An award of counsel fees requires that an evidentiary basis be established as to two elements: the parties' respective financial circumstances and the value of the legal services rendered. The wife's testimony at trial as to the amount she had expended, without more, failed to furnish a meaningful way to gauge the value of the services rendered. It reversed the award rendered in the judgment, while specifically noting that this did not affect an earlier award of pendente lite counsel fees.

Divorce - Grounds - DRL § 170(7) - Summary Judgment of Divorce Granted Based upon Estoppel

In Alvarado v Alvarado, 46 Misc.3d 1220(A), 2015 WL 734897 (N.Y.Sup.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op.50130(U) the Court granted Husband's application for summary judgment of divorce as there was no material issue of fact regarding the grounds for divorce. In support of his application Husband swore under oath that the marriage had broken down irretrievably for a period of six months in compliance with the plain language of DRL § 170(7). Moreover, the Court held that Wife was estopped from denying that the marriage was broken down irretrievably as she had previously sworn that it had in both her initial Summons and Complaint and in both the Preliminary Conference Order and a separate Grounds Order. While summary judgment was granted to Husband, the granting of a judgment of divorce was held in abeyance pending the resolution of ancillary issues.

Court of Appeals Holds Appeal from a Contested Order of Protection Issued by Family Court, Based upon a Finding That the Subject Individual Has Committed a Family Offense, Is Not Mooted Solely by the Expiration of the Order.

In Matter of Veronica P. v. Radcliff A., --- N.E.3d ----, 2015 WL 566677 (N.Y.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 01300 the Court of Appeals held that an appeal from a contested order of protection issued by Family Court, based upon a finding that the subject individual has committed a family offense, is not mooted solely by the expiration of the order.

Petitioner sought an order adjudging respondent guilty of the charged offenses, as well as an order of protection against him pursuant to Family Court Act § 842. At the hearing, both sides called witnesses to testify to the relevant events, and respondent vigorously opposed the entry of an order of protection or any other adverse adjudication. In an oral decision rendered on February 4, 2011, the court found that respondent was guilty of a family offense, concluding that he had committed acts constituting harassment in the second degree. That same day, the court entered a written two-year order of protection against respondent. The written order stated that a family offense petition had been filed in the case, listed the date of the petition and noted that the order was being issued after a hearing at which respondent had been present. The order directed respondent to stay away from petitioner's home and to refrain from committing assault, harassment, stalking and certain other offenses against her. (The written did not declare that respondent was guilty of a family offense.)

Respondent appealed, but while the appeal was pending, the order of protection expired. The Appellate Division unanimously dismissed the appeal as moot, citing the expiration of the order (Matter of Veronica P. v. Radcliff A., 110 AD3d 486, 486 [1st Dept 2013]). The Court of Appeals reversed. It observed that in general an appeal will be considered moot unless the rights of the parties will be directly affected by the determination of the appeal and the interest of the parties is an immediate consequence of the judgment. The ability of an appellate decision to directly and immediately impact the parties' rights and interests is among the most important aspects of the mootness analysis, for otherwise the analysis might turn on inchoate or speculative matters, making mootness an unwieldy doctrine of a thousand "what ifs." On the other hand, even where the resolution of an appeal may not immediately relieve a party from a currently ongoing court-ordered penalty or obligation to pay a judgment, the appeal is not moot if an appellate decision will eliminate readily ascertainable and legally significant enduring consequences that befall a party as a result of the order which the party seeks to appeal. In this case, the expiration of the order of protection did not moot the appeal because the order still imposed significant enduring consequences upon respondent, who might receive relief from those consequences upon a favorable appellate decision. Because the order of protection on its face strongly suggested that respondent committed a family offense, the court in a future criminal case or Family Court proceeding would likely rely on the order to enhance a sentence or adverse civil adjudication against respondent. Although the order did not declare respondent guilty of a family offense in so many words, the order noted that it was issued after a hearing in a family offense proceeding, and it expressly barred respondent from victimizing petitioner by committing a variety of crimes nearly identical to those charged in the family offense petition. Thus, a court examining the order may readily discern that Family Court found respondent guilty of committing a family offense against petitioner and issued an order of protection to prevent him from continuing to offend against her. Armed with that information, the court in a future case may increase the severity of any applicable criminal sentence or civil judgment against respondent. In the face of the substantial probability that the order of protection would prompt severely deleterious future legal rulings against respondent, an appellate decision in his favor would directly vindicate his interest in avoiding that consequence of the order. The Court found that the the order of protection had other potential legal consequences that render it susceptible to appellate review. Beyond its legal consequences, the order of protection placed a severe stigma on respondent, and he can escape that stigma by prevailing on appeal Rubenstein. The order essentially labeled respondent a family offender. Given the totality of the enduring legal and reputational consequences of the contested order of protection, respondent's appeal from that order was not moot.

Respondent urged the Court to hold that an appeal from any expired order of protection, other than one entered upon stipulation, is not moot. The Court expressed no view on the correctness of that proposed holding because it was unnecessary to resolve the case. The order was reversed and the matter remitted to the Appellate Division for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law § 237 - Plaintiff Was Not Precluded from Recovering Legal Fees for Services Provided in Opposing Defendant's Affirmative Defense Predicated on Prenuptial Agreement - Failure to Attach a Statement of Net Worth (22 Nycrr 202.16[k][2] Warrants Denial of Motion.

In Karg v Kern, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2015 WL 686046 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 01550 the Appellate Division affirmed an April 3, 2014 order which granted plaintiff wife's application for interim counsel fees in the amount of $136,000, and directed defendant husband to pay the real estate taxes on the parties' farm property. It held Supreme Court properly awarded the wife interim counsel fees after considering the financial positions of the parties and the circumstances of the case. Plaintiff was the less monied spouse, the disparity between the parties' respective income and assets was significant. The Court held that to the extent the legal fees awarded an April 3, 2014 order may have related to the litigation over the parties' prenuptial agreement and to the extent the court awarded fees in connection with that litigation in its June 5, 2014 order, awarding additional counsel fees, the awards were proper. Plaintiff was not precluded from recovering legal fees under Domestic Relations Law § 237 for services provided in opposing defendant's affirmative defense predicated on the prenuptial agreement (see Van Kipnis v. Van Kipnis, 11 NY3d 573, 579 [2008]).

The Appellate Division held that the court correctly denied the part of defendant's motion seeking a downward modification of the support award since defendant failed to attach a statement of net worth (22 NYCRR 202.16[k][2]). In any event, defendant failed to show exigent circumstances or that the court failed to consider the relevant factors.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly vacated the automatic stay of the April 3, 2014 order obtained by defendant's posting of an undertaking to secure his obligation to pay interim counsel fees (CPLR 5519[c]; Wechsler v. Wechsler, 8 Misc.3d 328 [Sup Ct, N.Y. County 2005]). The court was appropriately concerned that defendant was taking advantage of the automatic stay to prevent plaintiff from receiving interim counsel fees, thereby preventing an even playing field in the litigation. Further, defendant could recoup the counsel fee award from plaintiff's share of equitable distribution, while plaintiff would be severely prejudiced if she were forced to wait months to obtain the interim award.

Family Court - Support - Article 4 - Payments under Support Order Issued in Favor of a Social Services District as Assignee Pursuant to Family Ct Act § 571(1) Continue to Be Made to the Support Collection Unit, When Public Assistance Terminates, Unless the Person or Family Requests Otherwise

In Matter of Broome County Dept. of Social Services ex rel. Wheeler v. Kelley, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 685913 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner, the assignee of the mother of a minor child commenced a child support proceeding in May 2013 pursuant to Family Court Act article 4. Petitioner became the assignee of the mother's right to receive support for her minor child upon the mother's receipt of public assistance. The Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate did not have the authority to limit the duration of an order of support obtained by petitioner for "so long as [the mother] receives temporary assistance" because the statute does not permit Family Court to terminate a support order upon the termination of public assistance. After concluding that there is "nothing in the Family Court Act that says the order shall continue" upon the termination of public assistance, the Support Magistrate held that it was not appropriate to continue the order once the mother's public assistance case closed because the mother did not appear at the proceeding. This was error. While the court may have placed the mother on notice of the hearing, she was not a party nor was she joined as a necessary party to the proceeding (see Family Ct Act § 571[2]). Moreover, the statute clearly provides that a support order issued in favor of a social services district as assignee pursuant to Family Ct Act § 571(1)"shall direct that payments be made directly to the support collection unit, ... so long as there is in effect an assignment of support rights to such district. Further, the order shall provide that when the person or family no longer receives public assistance, payments shall continue to be made to the support collection unit, unless the person or family requests otherwise" (Family Ct Act § 571[3][a]). This statutory directive avoids a gap in payment, while providing a mechanism for payments to be made directly to the recipient parent. While the statute entitles the mother to commence a de novo support proceeding upon the cessation of her public assistance benefits there was discern no basis for Family Court's conclusion that the order of support automatically terminates.

Divorce - Grounds - Domestic Relations Law § 230 - an Allegation That the Parties' Marriage Has Been Irretrievably Broken for a Period of Six Months or More and That the "Breakdown" Occurred in New York," Does Not Meet the Requirements of DRL § 230(3).

In Stancil v Stancil, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 669334 (N.Y.Sup.), 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 25045 the Supreme Court observed that DRL §230 mandates that the plaintiff or the defendant in a matrimonial action live in this state continuously for one year if certain other conditions are present. One such condition is if "the cause occurred in the state." The parties were married in 1998 in Norfolk, Virginia and lived there. Shortly thereafter defendant, who was a member of the United States Navy, was deployed. In January 2011, defendant returned to Virginia. In February 2013, plaintiff, who was now in graduate school in South Carolina, accepted an internship at St. Luke's Roosevelt Hospital in New York. She moved to New York with the parties child in June 2013, having rented the South Carolina residence. It did not appear that defendant has ever visited plaintiff or the child in New York. In August 2014, 14 months after moving to New York, plaintiff commenced an action using New York's no-fault divorce ground. Defendant, claimed that the parties could not divorce in New York because they did not meet New York's residency requirement. Plaintiff contended that pursuant to New York's no-fault divorce provision the parties' marriage has been irretrievably broken for a period of six months or more and that the "breakdown" occurred in New York, thereby meeting the requirements of DRL § 230(3). After a review of the language and purpose of DRL §230, the legislative history of DRL §170(7), and the case law resolving other inconsistencies that have arisen from the legislature's adopting DRL §170(7), the court concluded that the legislature did not intend for the no-fault divorce ground to constitute a "cause" sufficient to satisfy the durational residency requirement in DRL §230(3). The Court held that irretrievable breakdown of the parties marriage did not amount to "cause" within meaning of DRL§ 230 providing a one-year residency requirement for bringing a divorce action if the "cause" occurred in the state.

Equitable Distribution - Husband Committed Waste of Assets by Failure to Account for More than $2 Million in Assets, as Well as His Failure to Disclose Various Accounts, and the Fact That He Increased the Encumbrances on the Marital Home in Violation of a Court Order - Court Properly Imputed to Defendant Income of $1 Million Annually Based on the Fact That He Earned in Excess of $1 Million Annually from 2000 Through 2009.

In Branche v Holloway, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 358132 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court's unequal distribution of marital property in plaintiff's favor was amply supported by the record. The court carefully considered all relevant factors, including the parties' 18cyear marriage, the parties' joint decision that plaintiff would take care of the children and home to the detriment of her career, the gross disparity in the parties' current and probable future incomes, the parties' age at the time of trial, defendant was 59 and plaintiff was 55, and their respective good health. The court also properly considered defendant's egregious economic fault in liquidating, dissipating, or failing to account for more than $2 million in assets, which represented approximately 25% of the marital estate, as well as his failure to disclose various accounts, and the fact that he increased the encumbrances on the marital home in violation of a court order. It found that the court properly imputed to defendant income of $1 million annually based on the fact that he earned in excess of $1 million annually from 2000 through 2009. The report and testimony of a vocational expert showed that defendant's present and future earning potential was $1 million annually and that defendant had failed to conduct a reasonable job search after his employment was terminated in 2009. Moreover, while defendant's base salary in the position for which he was hired in 2011 was $350,000, he was eligible for two bonuses that would bring his total salary to $1 million. The finding of criminal contempt against defendant was overwhelmingly supported by the record, which included evidence of his willful failure to pay the child and spousal support ordered in the pendente lite order and his failure to demonstrate any genuine attempt to obtain employment (see Judiciary Law § 750; see Spector v. Spector, 18 AD3d 380 [1st Dept 2005]).

Res Judicata - A party may not litigate a claim where a judgment on the merits exists from a prior action between the same parties involving the same subject matter. The rule applies not only to claims actually litigated but also to claims that could have been raised in the prior litigation"

In Matter of Singer v Windfield, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 446487 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother and the father entered a stipulation of settlement settling all issues between them. Those stipulations were incorporated but not merged into a judgment of divorce dated August 26, 2010. On or about March 1, 2011, the mother commenced a proceeding, alleging, inter alia, that the father had violated the terms of the stipulation of settlement by failing to pay Bar Mitzvah fees, which were detailed in the earlier stipulations. The mother also sought an award of an attorney's fee. The Support Magistrate granted the mother's cross motion for summary judgment. The Appellate Division held that the mother's claim for reimbursement of Bar Mitzvah fees was precluded by the doctrine of res judicata. "Under the doctrine of res judicata, a party may not litigate a claim where a judgment on the merits exists from a prior action between the same parties involving the same subject matter. The rule applies not only to claims actually litigated but also to claims that could have been raised in the prior litigation" (Matter of Hunter, 4 NY3d 260, 269). Under New York's transactional approach to res judicata, "once a claim is brought to a final conclusion, all other claims arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions are barred, even if based upon different theories or if seeking a different remedy" (O'Brien v. City of Syracuse, 54 N.Y.2d 353, 357). Family Court properly granted the father's objection to that portion of the Support Magistrate's order which awarded the mother reimbursement of Bar Mitzvah fees. The father presented evidence showing that the mother's claim against him arose from the same operative facts as a claim which was decided on the merits in the Supreme Court matrimonial action, in which she sought, inter alia, a finding of contempt against him for his nonpayment of the same Bar Mitzvah fees. The father thus demonstrated that the claim for Bar Mitzvah fees that was asserted against him in this proceeding could have been raised in the Supreme Court action. Thus, this claim was properly dismissed as barred by the doctrine of res judicata.

Custody- Mental Health Professionals Certification Committee for the First and Second Judicial Departments - Mental Health Professionals Panel - Knowledge That the Court-appointed Forensic Evaluator Had Been Removed from the List of Those Mental Health Professionals Deemed Qualified Was Basis for Removal.

In Carlin v. Carlin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 361116 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly granted defendant's motion for leave to renew her prior motion to remove the court-appointed forensic evaluator, and, upon renewal, in effect, granted that motion. In support of her renewal motion, she submitted a letter dated July 3, 2012, from the Mental Health Professionals Certification Committee for the First and Second Judicial Departments to the court-appointed forensic evaluator, informing him that he had been removed from the Mental Health Professionals Panel. The defendant established that this letter was not available to her when she made her prior motion, or when the court held oral argument on the prior motion. The Mental Health Professionals Panel was established by the Appellate Division, First and Second Judicial Departments, to ensure that courts and parties have access to qualified mental health professionals who are available to evaluate the parties and to assist courts in reaching appropriate decisions as to, inter alia, custody and visitation (22 NYCRR 623.1; see Lieberman v. Lieberman, 112 AD3d 583). The Committee is tasked with the responsibility of recommending eligible mental health professionals for appointment to the panel, investigating complaints against panel members, and recommending removal of panel members to the Presiding Justices of the First and Second Judicial Departments (22 NYCRR 623.3, 623.4[c]; 623.9). Thus, knowledge that the court-appointed forensic evaluator had been removed from the list of those mental health professionals deemed qualified by the Committee to assist courts in reaching an appropriate decision as to custody and visitation would have changed the court's prior determination.

Equitable Distribution - Maintenance - Child Support - Counsel Fees Award - Not an Abuse of Discretion to Adjusting the Distributive Award in Lieu of Requiring Husband to Contribute to Attorney's Fees - in Light of Husband's Prior Voluntary Maintenance Payments, and Considering Husband's Share of Marital Debt Court Properly Determined That the Wife Was Not Entitled to Retroactive Spousal Maintenance.

In Antinora v Antinora, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 496320 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division agreed with the husband that the court failed to articulate a proper basis for applying the Child Support Standards Act (CSSA) to the combined parental income in excess of the statutory cap, which was $136,000 at the time. The court failed to indicate how the children's actual needs would not be met if it had calculated child support at the statutory cap. It is well settled that "blind application of the statutory formula to [combined parental income] over [$136,000], without any express findings or record evidence of the children's actual needs, constitutes an abdication of judicial responsibility and renders meaningless the statutory provision setting a cap on strict application of the formula' " The court also erred in failing to order that child support be adjusted upon termination of maintenance, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(C). It modified the judgment by vacating the award of child support, and remit the matter to Supreme Court to determine the husband's present and prospective child support obligations in compliance with the CSSA, following a further hearing, if necessary, and to order that child support be adjusted upon termination of maintenance.

The Appellate Division found that the court did not abuse its discretion in adjusting the distributive award in lieu of requiring the husband to contribute to her attorney's fees. Inasmuch as the wife was the less monied spouse, thereby triggering the rebuttable presumption entitling her to attorney's fees, the court was required to articulate why it was not awarding attorney's fees to the wife. The court sufficiently articulated its rationale when it explained that, instead of having the husband contribute to the wife's attorney's fees, it would increase the distributive award to the wife by granting her, inter alia, the proceeds of an unsold luxury automobile and relieving her of her share of the marital credit card debt.

The Appellate Division held that with respect to the value of the marital residence, the court erred in simply averaging the values set forth in the appraisals of the parties' experts without articulating its reason for doing so. It modified the judgment by vacating the paragraph concerning the marital residence, and remitted to Supreme Court for "appropriate findings of fact and conclusions of law as required by statute" with respect to the valuation of the marital residence.

The Appellate Division held that in light of the husband's prior voluntary maintenance payments, and considering the husband's share of marital debt the court properly determined that the wife was not entitled to retroactive spousal maintenance.

The Court rejected the wife's contention that she was entitled to a credit for the statutory add-on expenses permitted in addition to the basic child support obligation under the CSSA, which include child care and uninsured health care expenses (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][4]-[5]). Although she was entitled to a pro rata share of such payments from the husband, the husband was entitled to a credit against such future expenses based on his past voluntary maintenance and child support payments (see Lester v. Lester, 237 A.D.2d 872, 873), and it therefore modified that part of the judgment awarding child support.

The Appellate Division rejected the wife's contention that the court erred in awarding the husband certain benefits under her New York State pension. In pertinent part, those benefits included post retirement cost of living adjustments, pre retirement survivorship protection, post retirement joint and survivor protection, and an early retirement subsidy. It is well settled that "[vested rights in a noncontributory pension plan are marital property to the extent that they were acquired between the date of the marriage and the commencement of a matrimonial action, even though the rights are unmaturing at the time the action is begun" (Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 485-486). Therefore, the court properly awarded the husband postretirement cost of living adjustments, inasmuch as they "are merely supplements and enhancements to already existing pension benefits". Additionally, the court properly required the wife to elect a preretirement and postretirement survivorship annuity option in her pension to benefit the husband, inasmuch as the wife has the option of electing a maximum payment to herself, which would deny surviving beneficiaries any payment from the pension. Finally, the court properly awarded the husband a right to any early retirement subsidy elected by the wife under the pension. Although the wife had not yet had an opportunity to elect an early retirement subsidy, any enhanced retirement income received as a result of a subsidy, other than a Social Security bridge payment or separation payment, would be considered compensation and marital property subject to equitable distribution.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel - Fourth Department Overrules Prior Holdings Required a Showing of Actual Prejudice to Prevail on a Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel

In Matter of Brown v Gandy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 498746 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that because the potential consequences are so drastic, the Family Court Act affords protections equivalent to the constitutional standard of effective assistance of counsel afforded defendants in criminal proceedings. Thus, to the extent that previous decisions of the Court have required a showing of actual prejudice to prevail on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel under the New York Constitution, those cases are no longer to be followed (see e.g. Matter of Jada G. [Marcella G.], 113 AD3d 1138, 1138; Matter of Alisa E. [Wendy F.], 98 AD3d 1296, 1296; Matter of Michael C., 82 AD3d 1651, 1652, lv denied 17 NY3d 704).

Supreme Court

Child Support - Emancipation - Child's Conduct, Which Constructively Emancipated Him, Obviated His Mother's Obligation to Pay for the Son's College Expenses. Vulgar Words, Voiced by a Son Against His Mother Justified Discontinuing the Mother's Obligation to Support the Ungrateful Child. Husband Was Entitled to Recoup His Overpayment of Child Support.

In Cornell v Cornell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 463959 (N.Y.Sup.) the father sought child support from the mother, a recoupment of child support paid while the parties negotiated a temporary order, and payment for college expenses. In defense of these claims, the mother argued that her obligations to pay any support-including the cost of college education-is obviated because of the child's calculated estrangement from her. She claimed that her son has described her as a "douche bag" and an "asshole," and that this, among other behavior, caused alienation between her and the son. The parties entered a separation agreement in 1998. A post-judgment order, issued in 2004, required the father to pay child support because the child lived with his mother. The child changed residences in September 2013 and the father subsequently moved to terminate his support obligation and seek support from the mother. The father also sought the mother's proportionate contribution to college costs for the child, which he claimed he paid in full. The demand to pay college expenses arose under a 1999 order, which provided that both parents will contribute to college expenses in "an amount proportionate to their incomes," provided that the child attends full-time, and that both parents approve the college and the course of study. The mother claimed she was never consulted regarding the son's choice of colleges or his course of study, and as a result, has no obligation for his college expenses.

The evidence before the court established that the child repeatedly used the word "fuck" in discussing issues with his mother. Based just on the mother's testimony, the court could not conclude that this word, although used repeatedly, was "deeply offensive". She never suggested she was offended or disturbed by her son's repeated use of this term. However, the proof of the son's language easily became "deeply offensive" when the court's evaluated text messages introduced at trial. The mother and son exchanged these messages either slightly before, contemporaneously with, or slightly after the son's decision to move into his father's home. The text messages are only portions of longer messages, but from the text admitted before the court, the son referred to his mother as an "asshole" on several occasions, and a "douche bag" on another. In these text exchanges, before the court, there was no justification for a high school graduate and college-student to refer to his mother in such terms. The Court observed that other Courts that have commented on these two terms and described them as displaying an utter lack of taste and propriety. Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41, 49 (2d Cir.2008) (use of the phrase "douche bag" was vulgar and offensive); Finkel v. Dauber, 29 Misc.3d 325, 906 N.Y.S.2d 697 (Sup.Ct. Nassau Cty.2010). Lopaka Curtis Bounds v. Pinnacle Special Police, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98170 (EDNC 2006) (the use of the term "douche bag" is a form of "rudely insulting others"); Gilbert v. Daimler-Chrysler Corp., 2002 Mich.App. LEXIS 1168, n. 26 (Ct App. Mich.2002) (citing Random House Webster's College Dictionary [2d ed], p. 80, that "asshole" is a "vulgar" term referring to a "stupid, mean or contemptible person" or "the worst part of a place or thing"); The utterance of these terms has been held to constitute a hostile work environment. Bader v. Special Metals Corp., 985 F.Supp.2d 291,330 (NDNY 2013); Gross v. Burggraf Const. Co., 53 F.3d 1531, 1539 (10th Cir.1995) ("It is beyond dispute that evidence that a woman was subjected to a steady stream of vulgar and offensive epithets because of her gender would be sufficient to establish a claim under Title VII"); see also Matter of Melody M. v. Robert M., 103 A.D.3d 932, 962 N.Y.S.2d 364 (3rd Dept.2013) (charitably stated, a mother's use of the term "asshole" to describe her 10-year-old child reflected a lack of insight as to the nature of her conduct toward her oldest child).

The Court found that the use of these terms were indicative of a substantial hatred and/or disrespect for the mother. In the court's view, a child who utters such terms about their parent cannot realistically expect this court to ignore such conduct and order the maligned parent to pay any form of support for the child. A child over the age of 18, seeking reimbursement for college expenses, cannot use such language toward a parent and then, either directly or through his other parent, seek child support, and/or payment of college expenses. No one should be permitted to refer to their mother in such fashion, and then, without recanting or asking for forgiveness, seek the court's assistance to have that person support their future life. The court refused to condone such actions by an unworthy son. In addition, there was substantial and uncontroverted evidence that the child had refused all contact with his mother. The court held that constructive emancipation exists even if the proof failed to establish that the father, who would be paid the support, did not support or condone the child's alienating behaviors. The court also held that the child's conduct, which constructively emancipated him, obviates his mother's obligation, as part of her support, to pay for the son's college expenses. The father's request for the mother's contribution to college expenses was denied. The child, having severed his ties to his mother in a despicable fashion, was emancipated, as far as the mother is concerned, as his conduct has caused an alienation which cannot be rewarded. The mother has no obligation to pay support for person-over the age of 18-who acts in this manner. Vulgar words, voiced by a son against his mother easily justify discontinuing the mother's obligation to support the ungrateful child. The Court held that the husband was entitled to recoup his overpayment of child support. The husband was entitled to stop paying support on September 1, 2013, when the child did not return to his mother's home, as the parties agreement provided. The wife was directed repay this amount.

Agreements - Child Custody - Arbitration - Disputes Concerning Child Custody and Visitation Are Not Subject to Arbitration

In Goldberg v Goldberg, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 249835 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Raisie Goldberg (mother) and Shmuel Z.B. Goldberg (father) entered into an agreement pursuant to which they agreed to arbitrate all marital issues between them before a rabbinical arbitration tribunal, the Beth Din Kollel Avreichem and Yeshiva (Badatz) (Beth Din). Thereafter, the Beth Din issued a decision, inter alia, awarding the parties joint legal custody of the parties' children, awarding the mother residential custody, awarding the father certain visitation, and determining the father's child support obligation. The mother commenced a proceeding pursuant to CPLR 7510 to confirm the Beth Din award. Supreme Court, inter alia, granted those branches of the petition which were to confirm so much of the award as determined custody and visitation and so much of the award as determined the father's child support obligation. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that although the parties consented to arbitration of custody and visitation matters, they had no power to do so. "Disputes concerning child custody and visitation are not subject to arbitration as 'the court's role as parens patriae must not be usurped' " (Matter of Hirsch v. Hirsch, 4 AD3d 451, 452, quoting Glauber v. Glauber, 192 A.D.2d 94, 98). Accordingly, that branch of the petition which was to confirm the custody and visitation provisions of the arbitration award should have been denied, and the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for a hearing and determination as to the issues of custody and visitation.

Family Offenses - Order of Protection - Extension - Family Court Act §842 - Good Cause Found Where Parties Continued to Have Disputes over the Father's Visitation with the Children

In Matter of Ellen Z, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 232731 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) respondent consented to the entry of an order of protection in favor of the petitioner without any admission of wrongdoing. The order of protection directed, inter alia, that respondent "stay away" from petitioner, her home, school, place of business or employment, that respondent commit no family offenses against her, and that the order of protection was subject to the terms of the order of visitation as to the parties' two children issued under other docket numbers. The Court further directed that the parties have no contact except contact incidental to the exchange of the children for visitation, and further that the parties could communicate about visitation via text messaging. Counsel for the mother submitted a proposed order to show cause requesting that this Court extend the November 7, 2013 order of protection

"until December 31, 2015". In support of the motion petitioner referred to the acts of domestic violence she alleged were committed by respondent in the petition she filed in 2013, and she asserted that based upon the "long history of domestic violence perpetrated by" the respondent against her, she "is fearful for her safety as she continues to have regular contact with [respondent] during court appearances and visitation exchanges." Petitioner claimed that respondent became verbally aggressive towards her during an exchange of the children at the police precinct in late November 2014 which made her "feel scared and intimidated", and that respondent "continues to harass and intimidate [her] by filing an enforcement petition for visitation" which she asserted was baseless as the allegations in that petition were false.

The Court found good cause to grant the mother's motion to extend the order of protection for two years. It observed that Family Court Act §842 authorizes the extension of an order of protection "upon motion ... for a reasonable period of time upon a showing of good cause or consent of the parties" (L 2010, ch 325). The statute specifically provides that "[t]he fact that abuse has not occurred during the pendency of an order shall not, in itself, constitute sufficient ground for denying or failing to extend the order. The record demonstrated that the parties continued to have disputes over the father's visitation with the children pursuant to the order which directed that the children be exchanged by the parents inside of a police precinct for reasons of safety. These disputes led to the father's filing of an enforcement petition alleging that the mother violated the order of visitation, as well as his filing of the family offense petition which the Court dismissed. Based upon the prior incidents of domestic violence as alleged in the underlying family offense petition filed by the mother, the continuing friction surrounding the father's visitation with the parties' children as set forth in counsel's affirmation, the mother's affidavit, and the father's family offense petition, the Court credited the mother's claim that she continued to have a fear that the father may commit additional acts of domestic violence against her should the order of protection not be extended and credited her claim that her recent interactions with the father had caused her to "feel scared and intimidated." Family Court Act §842 permits extension of an order of protection for a "reasonable period of time" for the purpose of preventing a recurrence of domestic violence, whether or not violence has occurred during the existence of the order. In light of the age of the parties' children and the fact that the parties would continue to have face-to-face contact when they exchange the children, the Court concluded that it was reasonable to extend the order of protection for an additional two years, as that is the maximum duration of an order of protection in a case such as this which does not involve a finding that aggravating circumstances exist.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Second Department Holds That it Is Only Appropriate for an Attorney for a Child to Form an Opinion as to What Would Be in the Child's Best Interest, after Gathering Evidence and Making a Complete Investigation.

In Matter of Brown v Simon,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 7392499 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties entered into an agreement to share joint custody of the child, with the mother to have residential custody, which was embodied in an order entered on consent of the parties. Shortly after the agreement was entered into, the child's day care provider reported to the father that the child was not allowing herself to be cleaned when her diaper was being changed, and her resistance had gotten worse. Although an examination of the child by her pediatrician revealed no physical evidence of sexual abuse, the day care provider reported her concerns to the Office of Child Protective Services (CPS). The father and mother each filed a petition seeking sole custody of the child. Before a hearing on the petitions was held, the attorney for the child, based on the out-of-court statements of the day care provider, made an application for the father to be awarded temporary custody of the child. The Family Court granted that application. The Appellate Division pointed out that such an award was improper, as it was based on the disputed hearsay allegations (Matter of Swinson v. Brewington, 84 AD3d 1251).

The Appellate Division held that during the hearing on the petitions, the Family Court erred in permitting the father to testify that the child told him that the mother's other daughter "did it." The father's testimony was intended to show that the mother's other daughter might have sexually abused the subject child. The statement was inadmissible hearsay, and did not qualify as either prompt outcry evidence, or as a spontaneous declaration. The admission of this hearsay statement could not be deemed to be harmless, as this hearsay statement was the only evidence presented to support the allegations that the child had been sexually assaulted and that the sexual assault was committed by the child's older sibling. Both CPS and the Administration for Children's Services investigated the allegations and concluded that the allegations were unfounded, and an expert in the area of child abuse concluded that there was no evidence that the child had been physically or sexually abused.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court also erred in overruling the mother's objection to the testimony of her other daughter's treating physician about his treatment of that child on the ground that the Privacy Rule standard of the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 (HIPAA) for disclosure of her other daughter's medical information was not met (45 CFR 164.512 [e][1][i], [ii]). The mother's other daughter was not a party to the proceeding, and permitting her treating physician to testify in violation of HIPAA directly impaired the interest protected by the HIPAA Privacy Rule of keeping one's own medical records private. As such, the Family Court should have sustained the mother's objection to this testimony, This error could not be deemed harmless, as the physician's testimony was used by the father and the attorney for the subject child to portray the mother's other daughter as seriously disturbed.

Significantly, the Second Department held that an attorney for the child should not have a particular position or decision in mind at the outset of the case before the gathering of evidence (citing Matter of Carballeira v. Shumway, 273 A.D.2d 753, 756 where the Third Department said that: "A Law Guardian should not have a particular position or decision in mind at the outset of the case before the gathering of evidence.") It is only appropriate for an attorney for a child to form an opinion as to what would be in the child's best interest, after such inquiry. Here, it was inappropriate for the attorney for the child to have advocated for a temporary change in custody without having conducted a complete investigation. The attorney for the child acknowledged that his application was based solely on his discussion with the father and the child's day care provider, which was located near the father's residence, and that he did not speak to the mother or the child's other day care provider closer to the mother's residence.

It remitted the matter to the Family Court for a de novo hearing and directed the Family Court to appoint a new attorney for the child.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Third Department Holds Equitable Distribution Law Does Not Purport to Address Financial Transactions Prior to Their Marriage. Such Contributions by the Wife, Made Before the Marriage, Does Not Transform the Husband's Premarital, Separate Property into Marital Property

In Ceravolo v DeSantis,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 94661 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in July 1996 and had a daughter (born in 2001). Plaintiff (wife) commenced the action for divorce in June 2010. After trial, Supreme Court determined, among other things, that the marital residence, which had been purchased by defendant (husband) prior to the marriage, was marital property and awarded the wife, among other things, half of its value. In addition, the court awarded the wife durational spousal support and child support. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in classifying the marital residence as marital property. The husband purchased the marital residence in January 1994-2 ½ years prior to the parties' marriage-paying $130,000 of his own funds and borrowing an additional $100,000 from his father, secured by a note and mortgage. Although the wife contributed $30,000 of her separate funds to the initial purchase of the residence, she did not attend the closing and the husband took title to the property in his name alone. The wife paid the mortgage for more than two years prior to the marriage, as well as after the parties were married through 2003, when a satisfaction of mortgage was issued, notwithstanding a principal balance remaining of approximately $52,000.

Supreme Court determined that the wife's contributions transformed the residence from the husband's separate property into marital property, which was subject to equitable distribution. The Appellate Division disagreed. It observed that the Equitable Distribution

Law does not purport to address financial transactions between persons prior to their marriage, which cannot be considered to have been the product of the marital enterprise. While Supreme Court's finding that the wife made certain substantial contributions of money and effort toward the acquisition and maintenance of the marital residence was amply supported by the record, the effect of such contributions by the wife, particularly those she made before the marriage, was not to transform the husband's premarital, separate property into marital property. For this same reason, equitable distribution does not afford the wife any remedy with respect to the $30,000 that she contributed towards the down payment of the house or the premarriage mortgage payments that she made. It noted that she could have, but did not, bring a claim for the imposition of a constructive trust and/or for unjust enrichment. The Court held that to the extent that Matwiczuk v. Matwiczuk (261 A.D.2d 784 [1999]) and Ciaffone v. Ciaffone (228 A.D.2d 949 [1996]) held that separate property contributions made by a nontitled spouse toward the acquisition or improvement of premarital property can serve to transform such property into a marital asset, they should no longer be followed. In Matwiczuk it held, citing Ciaffone v. Ciaffone (228 A.D.2d 949 [1996]), that the use of marital funds, together with the nontitled spouse's efforts and contributions of separate funds toward the construction of the marital residence (which began before the marriage on land purchased by the titled spouse a few months earlier) "in furtherance of the marital partnership" were sufficient to transform the residence, including the land, into marital property. In Ciaffone, it determined that the parties' investment of marital funds to construct a two-family house on land purchased by the husband with his premarital funds rendered the property a marital asset subject to equitable distribution, with a credit given to the husband for the premarital funds that he used to purchase the land.

The Appellate Division noted, however, that separate property contributions by a nontitled spouse could result in an appreciation of the value of the titled spouse's separate property during the marriage, which appreciation would be subject to equitable distribution. Here, the wife conceded that she was not seeking equitable distribution of the property's value based upon its appreciation. The majority pointed out that title is a critical consideration in identifying the nature of real property acquired before the marriage. Therefore, in its view, the circumstances surrounding the purchase of the residence and the parties' intent relative thereto are irrelevant to the legal classification of the residence as separate or marital property.

The Appellate Division agreed with the wife's alternative argument that she was entitled to recoup her equitable share of marital funds paid toward the mortgage. It is well settled that, in determining the equitable distribution of marital property, a court has the authority to effectively recoup marital funds applied to the reduction of one party's separate indebtedness. The wife testified that she paid the mortgage on the marital residence from the date of the marriage until a satisfaction of mortgage was issued. Although it is not evident from the record what funds were used to make these payments, it could be presumed that marital funds were used. Thus, the wife was entitled to an equitable share of the marital funds that were used to pay the husband's separate indebtedness-the mortgage-during the marriage, and the matter was remitted to Supreme Court to determine the wife's share thereof and reconsideration of the equitable distribution and maintenance awards. Two Judges dissented.

No change in circumstances must be established to support a relocation petition. Improper for Court to fail to seal transcript and permit the presence of counsel other than the attorney for the children during confidential interview with children.

In Matter of Julie E v David E, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 94774 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Petitioner (mother) had a daughter and a son (born respectively in 2007 and 2004). Respondent (father) was the daughter's biological father, and he shared joint custody of both children with the mother pursuant to a 2010 order; the children's primary residence was with the mother. In December 2011, the father filed for modification and the mother cross-petitioned for leave to relocate with the children to Texas. Following a fact-finding hearing and an interview with the children, Family Court dismissed the relocation and modification petitions. The Appellate Division affirmed.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court applied the incorrect standard in dismissing the relocation petition on the ground that the mother had failed to show a sufficient change in circumstances to warrant modification. No change in circumstances must be established to support a relocation petition, as the planned move itself is accepted as such.. Instead, the parent who wishes to relocate bears the burden of establishing that the proposed move is in the best interests of the children. The Appellate Division examined the record and concluded that the mother did not meet her burden of demonstrating that relocation to Texas would be in their best interests.

The Appellate Division noted that Family Court conducted what was described as a "modified" Lincoln hearing, in which counsel for both parents were permitted to be present during the court's interview with the children. The transcript of the interview was not sealed, and was included in full in the appellate record. Neither the presence of counsel other than the attorney for the children during the interview nor the failure to seal the transcript was proper. It reiterated that the right to confidentiality during a Lincoln hearing belongs to the child and is superior to the rights or preferences of the parents. A child who is explaining the reasons for his or her preference in custody or visitation proceedings should not be placed in the position of having [his or her] relationship with either parent further jeopardized by having to publicly relate [his or her] difficulties with them or be required to openly choose between them. It addressed this issue recognizing that, in the course of practice, confusion may have resulted from the different procedure followed during Family Ct Act article 10 proceedings, in which the presence of the parties' counsel during an in camera interview with a child may be permissible due to the fundamental right of litigants in such proceedings to confront their accusers. Although these interviews have sometimes been inaccurately referred to as Lincoln hearings, they are conducted for entirely different purposes than the confidential interviews conducted during custody and visitation proceedings. For the court to fulfill its primary responsibility of protecting the welfare and interests of a child in the context of a Family Ct Act article 6 proceeding, protecting the child's right to confidentiality remains a paramount obligation (see Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d at 271-272).

Exclusive Occupancy of Marital Residence - Law reflects a preference for allowing custodial parent to remain in the marital residence until youngest child becomes 18 unless such parent can obtain comparable housing at a lower cost or is financially incapable of maintaining the marital residence, or either spouse is in immediate need of his or her share of the sale proceeds.

In Albertalli v Albertalli, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 94752 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff (husband) and defendant (wife) were married in 2005 and had two children, born in 2004 and 2007. The husband commenced this action for divorce in 2011. The main asset to be distributed was the marital residence, purchased five months after the marriage. The proof at trial established that the husband contributed $33,000 of his separate property into a joint account created one month prior to the purchase of the residence. The parties then used $24,915 from the joint account as a down payment on the purchase price of $71,000 and mortgaged the balance. At the time of trial, the residence was encumbered by a remaining balance on the mortgage of approximately $45,000 and a home equity loan of approximately $6,500. The evidence at trial established that, in its current condition, the home would be listed for sale at $64,500 and expected to sell in the low $60,000 range. In distributing the residence, Supreme Court concluded that the funds used for the down payment were the separate property of the husband and granted him a credit for that amount. The court also directed that the home be listed for immediate sale.

The Appellate Division held it was within Supreme Court's discretion to determine whether to credit the husband for the use of his separate property in acquiring the marital residence. While partial use of separate funds to acquire a marital asset does not mandate that a credit for separate funds be given it found no basis to disturb Supreme Court's exercise of its discretion here.

The Appellate Division agreed with the wife's contention that Supreme Court erred in directing that the marital residence be listed for sale. It observed that case law reflects a preference for allowing a custodial parent to remain in the marital residence until the youngest child becomes 18 unless such parent can obtain comparable housing at a lower cost or is financially incapable of maintaining the marital residence, or either spouse is in immediate need of his or her share of the sale proceeds. Proof at trial established that the parties' young children resided with the wife in the marital residence and, although she had the means to pay the mortgage, she was unable to refinance or purchase another residence. No evidence was adduced that the wife could obtain comparable housing at a lower cost or that either party was in immediate need to recoup their equitable share of the marital residence. Under these circumstances, it found that Supreme Court abused its discretion in directing that the marital residence should be listed for sale and held that the wife was entitled to exclusive possession of the residence until the youngest child reaches the age of 18.

Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine - Appeal Reinstated Where Fugitive Parent Post an Undertaking in Amount of Support Arrears

In Matter of Shehatou v Louka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2015 WL 25926 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that it had previously dismissed respondent's appeal from an "order of dismissal" entered by Family Court upon declining to sign an order to show cause seeking to vacate two orders entered on respondent's default. One of the orders determined that respondent was in willful violation of a child support order, and the other order committed him to a term of six months of incarceration (Matter of Shehatou v. Louka, 118 A.D.3d 1357, 987 N.Y.S.2d 746). The court also issued a warrant for respondent's arrest. It determined that the fugitive disentitlement theory applied both to respondent's order to show cause to vacate the default orders and to the subsequent appeal (id. at 1358, 987 N.Y.S.2d 746). It nevertheless granted respondent leave to move to reinstate his appeal upon the posting of an undertaking in the amount of $25,000 with the court within 60 days of service of our order with notice of entry. Respondent timely posted the undertaking and his motion to reinstate the appeal was granted by this Court. The Appellate Division concluded that by posting an undertaking in the amount of the child support arrears, respondent demonstrated that he was not flouting the judicial process and has provided a means of enforcement of the court's order determining the amount of child support arrears in the event that the court's determination is unchanged. It concluded that the fugitive disentitlement theory no longer applied to respondent (See Wechsler v. Wechsler, 58 A.D.3d 62, 65,). It reversed the order and remitted the matter to Family Court to determine respondent's application to vacate the orders entered on his default and the warrant for his arrest.

Agreements - Prenuptial - Failure to Disclose Entirety of Financial Interests Not a Reason to Vitiate the Contract.

Counsel Fees- Award - DRL§ 237 - Fee Waiver in Prenuptial Agreement May Be Set Aside, in Order to Ensure a Level Playing Field

In Anonymous v Anonymous, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 7084762 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) plaintiff wife sought, among other things, to set aside the parties' prenuptial agreement. The Appellate Division found that the court correctly determined that plaintiff did not meet her burden of establishing grounds to set aside the agreement as a whole. The agreement was negotiated over approximately four weeks. Plaintiff was represented throughout that time by highly competent and experienced matrimonial counsel. The agreement went through 6 drafts before a final copy was signed and changes in the terms of the agreement requested by plaintiff's counsel were incorporated into the final document. The agreement expressly disclaimed any reliance on representations other than those set forth in the agreement, and extrinsic evidence regarding the parties' intent may not be considered unless a court first finds that the agreement is ambiguous, which in this case it is not (Van Kipnis v. Van Kipnis, 11 NY3d 573, 577 [2008]).

The Appellate Division found that Defendant's failure to disclose the entirety of his financial interests was also not a reason to vitiate the contract. Plaintiff was well acquainted with defendant's assets, and she specifically acknowledged in the agreement that the amounts she would receive "are so significantly less than either [defendant's] assets or annual income that the precise amount of [his] assets and income is irrelevant to her decision to enter into this Agreement and the enforceability of this Agreement." The parties anticipated at the time of the agreement that defendant's assets would continue to rise significantly. In the face of such an acknowledgment, she could not claim that the agreement is invalid based on a failure to disclose assets.

The Appellate Division held that the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding plaintiff $300,000 in interim counsel fees for trial preparation on child-related issues on condition that she present documentation of legal work within 30 days after trial (Domestic Relations Law § 237). Supreme Court denied counsel fees for any issues other than child-related matters, in view of plaintiff's waiver of counsel fees contained in the prenuptial agreement. Despite that fee waiver, the Appellate Division directed Supreme Court to determine at trial whether the fee waiver may be set aside. Given the unique procedural posture of this case and the great disparity between the parties' finances both at the time of the execution of the prenuptial agreement and at the time of the commencement of this action, plaintiff's request for counsel fees beyond those incurred for child-related issues was an issue appropriate to leave for trial (Kessler v Kessler, 33 AD3d 42, at 47-48). As Supreme Court had ruled that plaintiff was entitled to a hearing on her challenge to the maintenance provisions of the prenuptial agreement, and, that ruling was not challenged on appeal, an award of counsel fees may be necessary despite the fee waiver, "as justice requires" (Domestic Relations Law § 237[a]) in order to ensure a level playing field to litigate her claim. Accordingly, it directed that the question of the validity of the counsel fee provision for non-child-related issues in the parties' agreement should be considered at trial.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Custody - Visitation - DRL § 170 - Standing - Nonparent - Second Department Finds Nonparent Has Standing to Seek Visitation on Judicial Estoppel Grounds Where Biological Mother Sought and Obtained Child Support from Nonparent.

In Matter of Arriaga v Dukoff, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 7332764 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Estrellita Arriaga and Jennifer L. Dukoff registered as domestic partners in 2007, and thereafter decided to have a child through artificial insemination. Dukoff gave birth to a daughter in November 2008. Dukoff and Arriaga shared in the responsibilities of taking care of the child, and they agreed she would call Dukoff "mommy" and Arriaga "mama." Arriaga never adopted the child. Dukoff and Arriaga ended their relationship in May 2012, and Arriaga moved out of their home in September 2012, when the child was almost four years old. After Arriaga moved out, she continued visiting with the child several days a week. In October 2012, Dukoff filed a petition seeking child support from Arriaga. Following a hearing on the issue of equitable estoppel, the Family Court issued an order where it determined that "the uncontroverted facts establish" that Arriaga "is a parent to [the child]; and as such is chargeable with the support of the child." Arriaga commenced a proceeding pursuant to DRL §70 seeking custody or visitation and filed an amended petition after Family Court issued the order in the support proceeding, asserting that she had been adjudicated a parent of the child in the support proceeding and was therefore seeking custody or visitation as the child's "adjudicated parent." Family Court denied Dukoff's motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that Arriaga did not have standing to commence such a proceeding, since she was not a biological or adoptive parent of the child holding that Dukoff was judicially estopped from arguing in that Arriaga was not a parent of the child, since she had asserted in the support proceeding that Arriaga was a parent of the child, and had secured a child support award on that basis (see Estrellita A. v. Jennifer D., 40 Misc.3d 219 [Fam Ct, Suffolk County]). After a best interests hearing, Family Court granted Arriaga visitation with the child and directed that Dukoff shall retain legal and physical custody of the child and final decision-making authority "after thoughtful consideration of [Arriaga's] input before making a decision."

The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected Dukoff's argument that Family Courts finding that Arriaga had standing to commence the proceeding was contrary to the Court of Appeals' holdings in Debra H. v. Janice R. (14 NY3d 576) and Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M. (77 N.Y.2d 651). It noted that Domestic Relations Law § 70(a) provides, in part, that "either parent may apply to the supreme court for a writ of habeas corpus to have such minor child brought before such court; and [the court] may award the natural guardianship, charge and custody of such child to either parent ... as the case may require" This statute has also been construed to grant standing to " 'either parent' " to apply for a writ of habeas corpus to determine the issue of visitation rights (Matter of Alison D. v. Virginia M., 155 A.D.2d 11, 13, affd 77 N.Y.2d 651). The Court observed that in Debra H., the Court of Appeals reaffirmed its holding in Matter of Alison D. that the term "parent" in Domestic Relations Law § 70 encompasses only the biological parent of a child or a legal parent by virtue of adoption and that a "de facto parent" or "parent by estoppel" could not seek visitation with a child who is in the custody of a fit parent. In Debra H., however, the Court analyzed the significance of the civil union the parties had entered into in Vermont prior to the child's birth. The Court determined that, under Vermont law, a child born during a civil union was a child of both partners. Thus, it concluded, Debra H. was the child's parent under Vermont law. As a matter of comity, the Court recognized her as the child's parent under New York law as well, thereby conferring standing for her to seek visitation and custody at a best interests hearing. In this proceeding, Arriaga asserted that she had standing as a parent of the child pursuant to the doctrine of judicial estoppel. Under that doctrine, "a party who assumes a certain position in a prior legal proceeding and secures a favorable judgment therein is precluded from assuming a contrary position in another action simply because his or her interests have changed. The Appellate Division held that the concerns expressed by the Court of Appeals in Debra H. were not implicated in the present case, where Arriaga invoked the doctrine of judicial estoppel, not equitable estoppel. The adjudication of Arriaga as a parent of the child required the biological mother's affirmative legal consent. Dukoff was the party who sought to have Arriaga adjudicated a parent. Although Dukoff did not consent to adjudicating Arriaga a parent of the child for the purposes of visitation rights, the biological mother in Debra H. also did not do so. In Debra H., the biological mother argued that she entered into the legal union in Vermont believing that it was of no legal significance in New York. Dukoff emphasized that the Court of Appeals stated in Debra H. that it saw "no inconsistency in applying equitable estoppel to determine filiation for purposes of support, but not to create standing when visitation and custody are sought". The Appellate Division found that here, the Family Court did not rely on equitable estoppel to establish standing. It relied on the doctrine of judicial estoppel, which differs from establishing parentage by equitable estoppel. It held that Family Court properly denied Dukoff's motion to dismiss the petition.

Agreements - Enforcement - Waiver - to the Extent That it Has Been Executed a Waiver, Cannot Be Expunged But, Can, to the Extent That it Is Executory, Be Withdrawn

In Stassa v Stassa, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6910551 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the plaintiff and the defendant executed a stipulation of settlement in 1983 resolving all issues in their then-pending divorce action. Parts XI(A)(1) and (B) of the stipulation provided, in relevant part, that "[s]o long as both parties shall live and the [plaintiff] shall not have remarried," the defendant would pay maintenance to the plaintiff which would be adjusted to reflect a cost of living adjustment (COLA) as of the first Monday of each May commencing in 1984. Part VII(6) of the stipulation provided, in relevant part, that "[t]he failure of either party to insist in one or more instances upon the strict performance of any of the terms of this Agreement to be performed by the other party shall not be construed as a waiver or relinquishment for the future of any such term or terms, and the same shall continue in full force and effect." The parties were divorced by judgment entered September 16, 1983. The stipulation was not incorporated into the judgment of divorce. In May 2008, the plaintiff commenced this action alleging that the defendant breached the stipulation by failing to adjust his maintenance payments to include the annual COLA increases as provided for in part XI(B) of the stipulation. At a nonjury trial, the plaintiff testified that she made oral demands of the defendant on 10 or 12 occasions, beginning in 1984, to adjust the maintenance payments so as to include the COLA increases, but that the defendant always responded that he was unable to pay the increase at that time and would pay the money in the future. On cross-examination, she acknowledged that she never refused any of the maintenance checks given to her by the defendant and that, in her responses to the defendant's interrogatories, she had stated that she consulted with an attorney in 1998 for a reason other than to discuss the COLA increases and decided not to pursue the COLA increases after that meeting. The defendant testified that he did not have any conversations with the plaintiff about increasing his maintenance payments to her in accordance with the COLA provision of the stipulation. The Supreme Court dismissed the complaint, finding that the plaintiff waived her right to COLA increases.

The Appellate Division reversed. It pointed out that waiver, which is the voluntary and intentional relinquishment of a contract right, should not be lightly presumed and must be based on 'a clear manifestation of intent' to relinquish a contractual protection. It may be accomplished by affirmative conduct or failure to act so as to evince an intent not to claim the purported advantage. The mere existence of a nonwaiver clause does not preclude waiver of a contract clause. However, a waiver is not created by negligence, oversight, or thoughtlessness, and cannot be inferred from mere silence. The Appellate Division found that plaintiff voluntarily relinquished her right to receive maintenance COLA increases as provided in the parties' 1983 stipulation from 1984 through May 2008, when her waiver was withdrawn. A waiver, to the extent that it has been executed, cannot be expunged or recalled, but, not being a binding agreement, can, to the extent that it is executory, be withdrawn, provided the party whose performance has been waived is given notice of withdrawal and a reasonable time after notice within which to perform. Since the stipulation was an executory contract between the parties pursuant to which the defendant remained under a continuing obligation to pay maintenance to the plaintiff, upon the plaintiff's filing of the summons and complaint in this action, such waiver was withdrawn. It reversed the judgment, and remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, for a determination of the COLA increases owed to the plaintiff by the defendant from the date of commencement of the action to the present, with prejudgment interest calculated thereon from May 2008 pursuant to CPLR 5001, and for the entry of an appropriate amended judgment thereafter.

Custody - Foreign Judgment of Divorce and Custody - DRL §77-d - Registration -Singapore Judgment of Divorce Entitled to Be Registered in New York as Custody Order Pursuant to DRL§ 77-d.

In Chue v Clarke, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6980560 (N.Y.Sup.), in September, 2011, the husband commenced a divorce action in Singapore under Singapore law. As part of the litigation, the wife went with her husband to an attorney, where she signed a consent to grant judgment on three years separation on October 19, Three days later, on October 30, 2011, the wife left Singapore and took her children with her. The consent to grant judgment, signed by the wife, was converted into an "interim judgment" on November 17, 2011. Neither party was present when the interim judgment was rendered. The judgment gave "care and control" of the children to the wife and then indicated that the wife could remove the children from Singapore. The judgment gave the husband the "liberal unsupervised visitation" including overnight access, reasonable vacations periods during holidays, electronic access through Skype, and other means and the right for the husband to bring the children back to Singapore on vacation. He was required to give two weeks notice of his visitation and to pay the travel expenses. Thereafter, a final judgment of divorce was issued in 2012. The final judgment made no reference to the father's visitation or consent by either party-it simply dissolved the marriage.

The husband then brought an application in Supreme Court requesting that the court register the foreign judgment of divorce and the custody order pursuant to DRL§ 77-d, and the wife moved to vacate the visitation provisions of the Singapore judgment, and make 12 changes.

Supreme Court observed that failure to disclose the entirety of his financial interests was also not a reason to vitiate the contract, and a predicate to any contempt proceeding. "The UCCJEA is mandatory and provides that a child custody determination made in a foreign country under factual circumstances in substantial conformity with the jurisdictional standards of this article must be recognized and enforced,' except where the child custody law of a foreign country as written or as applied violates fundamental principles of human rights'. The UCCJEA defines "child custody determination" as an order of a court providing for visitation with respect to a child. The Singapore interim judgment was a "child custody determination" within the meaning of the UCCJEA. There was no claim by the wife that the Singapore court improperly applied the laws of Singapore in adding the language which spelled out the husband's visitation rights. The core of the wife's complaint was that the interim judgment of divorce, which contains the specific description of the husband's "liberal" access rights, was modified without either the wife's consent or the findings of a court after a hearing and she claimed the divorce was procured, in part, as a result of domestic violence against her. The Court held that to deny registration on the first ground, the wife had to establish that the insertion of the specific terms of visitation, without her consent or a hearing, was not undertaken in "substantial conformity" with "jurisdictional standards" embodied in Article Five of the Domestic Relations Law or otherwise violates "fundamental human rights." DRL § 75-d(2). The clear import of the phrase "in substantial conformity with jurisdictional standards" is that the state or foreign government that issued the child custody order must have met some minimum contacts over the parties in order to register a child custody order from outside New York. The wife's complaint that she never signed any document agreeing to the exact terms of the visitation could not be characterized as a "jurisdictional dispute" under the UCCJEA. The wife, by signing the consent to grant judgment, acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Singapore courts and could not invoke this concept to upend the terms of the interim judgment. In the court's view, the Singapore court's incorporation of the "liberal and unsupervised" visitation terms, even if the wife never gave her written consent to those terms, did not violate the wife's "fundamental human rights." The interim judgment of divorce gave the wife a three-month period of time to object to any term of the interim judgment. The wife never filed any objections. Having been given the opportunity to object and have the Singapore court consider her objections, the wife never said a word, even though, throughout all of this time, she was living with her children in the United States. Thus, if the wife had the right to object to the specific terms of the visitation under the interim judgment, she waived it by failing to do so. The court also held that the allegations of domestic abuse, alleged to have occurred before the wife signed the consent to grant judgment, were not within the scope of "fundamental human rights" within the UCCJEA and that the Singapore judgment and its custody order were recognized and registered pursuant to Section 77-d of the Domestic Relations Law.

Temporary Maintenance - Award - DRL §236[B][5-a] - Presumptive Award Unjust and Inappropriate Where it Did Not Factor in High Costs of Maintaining Marital Residence. DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(q) Allowed Court to Consider Cost of Expensive Home and Household in Making Upward Deviation.

In Harlan v Harlan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6992453 (N.Y.Sup.), the husband moved to, inter alia, set his temporary maintenance award to the wife at $2,500 per month. The wife cross-moved, inter alia, for maintenance pendente lite and counsel fees. The wife asserted that the upkeep costs, mortgage, insurance, taxes, and utilities of the home were more than $4,000 per month. The wife asked the husband to pay $1,600 per month in maintenance, and an additional $4,500 per month for household expenses. These expenses and the living allowance described as maintenance, would total approximately $6,000 per month or more than $70,000 annually.

The husband's W-2 statement from his employer listed his gross pay as $152,673.03. The statute requires that his social security payments be deducted. DRL § 236B (5-a)(b)(4)(a). His W-2 revealed $7,049.40 in FICA payments in 2013. His resulting income for purposes of the temporary calculation was $145,623.63. The Court held that the party seeking to have income imputed bears the burden of proof and must prove by the preponderance of the evidence that the party, against whom imputation is sought, is underemployed, has spurned employment, or is otherwise responsible for their reporting less income than their earned income potential. The wife acknowledged that prior to the summer of 2013, she earned "up to $15,000 per year," working a part-time job in the public schools. The court found that the wife retired and that her retreat from the workplace was a decision in the context of the marriage and the husband could now be heard to complain that his wife has left the job market. Given that fact and the conclusion that the husband failed to meet his burden of proof, the court declined to impute any income to the wife. The court used the husband's income of $145,623.63 and the resulting calculation of temporary maintenance was $3,640.57 per month.

The wife sought an upward deviation from this amount, arguing that the calculated presumptive temporary maintenance was too meager. The court held that the wife bears the initial burden of proof to show that the calculated temporary maintenance is unjust or inappropriate. DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1). In the court's view, the calculation was unjust, as it did not factor in the high costs of the marital residence. Given these expenses and the wife's lack of employment during the pendency of the action, the court held that the amount derived from the temporary maintenance calculation was unjust and inappropriate.

The court explored the 17 factors which, by statute, permit the court to adjust the presumptive award of temporary maintenance. Several factors under the temporary guidelines pointed in the direction of an upward modification. The couple enjoyed a high standard of living. DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(a). The couple was relatively older, but in good health. DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(b). The wife's earning capacity was, she claimed, diminished because she recently retired. It was undisputed that she had few job skills, while the husband had an advanced degree and significant skills. DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(c). Because there was no evidence that she attempted to secure employment, the court could not draw any conclusion that her employment opportunities were circumscribed as a result of the factors listed in DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(o).

The court instead focused on DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(q): the statute's attempt to reserve to the court a seemingly endless equitable power to achieve a "just and proper" temporary maintenance allocation. Having considered the calculated "presumptive amount to be unjust and inappropriate," this court concluded that several factors require an upward deviation of this amount. The wife's age, her support for the husband during the marriage, and DRL § 236B (5-a)(e)(1)(q) clearly justify the upward deviation, even though the wife failed to meet her burden of proof under the other employment-related factors. The (q) factor also allowed this court to consider the cost of the expensive home and household, which the husband, during the marriage, maintained and subsidized. He subsidized an expensive lifestyle-and an expensive house-for his wife and his children. The Court held that these factors supported an upward deviation to $5,000 per month in temporary maintenance. However, upon receipt of the payments, the wife was entirely responsible for all household expenses listed in her statement of net worth and was directed to pay all joint obligations associated with the house-mortgage, HELOC and taxes-with this monthly payment until either a final maintenance award or the house is sold, whichever first occurs. This amount was driven upward by the costs associated with the house and household. Because the wife was the less-monied spouse, she was awarded $5,000 in legal fees.

Domestic Relations Law §237 - Counsel Fees Pendente Lite - Inability to Determine Nonmonied Spouse Does Not Prevent Counsel Fee Award to Party Who Did Not Control Assets.

In Murjani v Murjani, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6754257 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the court providently exercised its discretion in granting plaintiff an award of interim counsel fees (see Domestic Relations Law §237[a]). While the court was unable to determine, based on the papers submitted, which party was the monied spouse, it determined that defendant had unnecessarily delayed discovery in the action and had removed the parties' art collection to London in contravention of court orders. Further, defendant controlled the parties' liquid assets, including the art collection and real property in New York, and the court reasonably ordered her to sell or encumber that property in order to permit plaintiff to carry on this action. The fee award was not made solely to punish defendant for delaying the case.

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act § 413[1][k] - Failure to Provide Sufficient Financial Information Warrants Award Based Upon Needs.

In Matter of Weiss v Rosenthal, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6676731 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that although the father submitted a financial disclosure affidavit and various financial records to the Family Court, his affidavit and the accompanying records did not contain adequate information for the Support Magistrate to determine his income and assets, and that, therefor, the Family Court properly denied his father's objection to the Support Magistrate's determination to base his support obligation only on the child's needs (Family Ct Act § 413[1][k]).

Custody - Award - Effect of Temporary Custody Award - Only One Factor to Consider

In McDonald v McDonald,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6677192 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the existence of an interim order awarding the wife physical custody of the child, which was made without a hearing, did not require the court to engage in a change of circumstances analysis in determining the permanent award after a hearing had been held. The award of temporary custody to a parent before a hearing is conducted is only one factor to be considered in awarding permanent custody; the permanent award made after a hearing is treated as an initial custody determination, and the court is not required to engage in a change of circumstances analysis before awarding custody to the other parent.

Child Support - Award - Recoupment - Proper to Award Plaintiff $17,348.80, Representing Overpayment of Child Support, Made Pursuant to Judgment That Was Later Reversed on Appeal

In Cabral v Cabral, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6677296 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), after remand, the Appellate Division found that in this long-term marriage, both parties made significant contributions to the marriage. The plaintiff established an insurance agency and developed it as a source of the family's income, and the defendant was employed by Westchester County. The plaintiff's insurance license was revoked in 1991 after he was convicted of felony drug charges, but the defendant continued to derive income from the agency, and obtained her own insurance license in 1997. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in dividing the income from the insurance agency, and the pension which resulted from the defendant's employment with the County, equally between the parties for purposes of equitable distribution. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly awarded the plaintiff $17,348.80, representing his overpayment of child support, as the overpayment was made pursuant to a judgment that was later reversed on appeal (Cabral v. Cabral, 87 AD3d at 606; see also People ex rel. Breitstein v. Aaronson, 3 AD3d 588, 589).

Authors note: In People ex rel. Breitstein ex rel. Aaronson v. Aaronson, 3 A.D.3d 588, 589-90, 771 N.Y.S.2d 159 (2d Dept 2004) the Appellate Division held that "Recoupment is, however, appropriate under limited circumstances, where, as here, the father was temporarily compelled to pay excess support solely due to the Supreme Court's improper application of the CSSA (see Tuchrello v Tuchrello, 233 AD2d 917 [1996]; Matter of Thomas v Commissioner of Social Servs., 287 AD2d 642 [2001]; Matter of Niewiadomski v Dower, 286 AD2d 948 [2001]; Hamza v Hamza, 268 AD2d 459 [2000])."

Paternity - Civil Death - Sentence to Death is Not the Same as Civil Death For Purposes of Paternity Proceeding

In Matter of Ronell W v Nancy G, 121 A.D.3d 912, 994 N.Y.S.2d 376 (2d Dept 2014) petitioner, who was convicted of federal crimes in federal court and sentenced to death, filed a paternity petition seeking to be declared the father of the child. The mother made an oral application to dismiss the petition on the ground that the petitioner was "civilly dead" pursuant to Civil Rights Law § 79-a(1), or, in the alternative, for a hearing on the issue of whether a declaration of paternity would be in the child's best interests. The Family Court dismissed the petition on the ground that the petitioner was civilly dead pursuant to Civil Rights Law § 79-a(1) without considering the mother's alternative request for a best interests hearing. The Appellate Division reversed holding that the civil death provision of Civil Rights Law § 79-a(1) did not apply to the petitioner since he was sentenced to death in federal court, rather than state court (Matter of Malik, 108 Misc.2d 774, 438 N.Y.S.2d 888 [Fam. Ct., N.Y. County]; Winston v. United States, 305 F.2d 253, 255 n. 2 [2d Cir.], affd. sub nom. United States v. Muniz, 374 U.S. 150, 83 S.Ct. 1850, 10 L.Ed.2d 805; see also Hayashi v. Lorenz, 42 Cal.2d 848, 271 P.2d 18). Moreover, although Civil Rights Law § 79-a(1) declares civilly dead any person sentenced to imprisonment for life, it contains no provision pertaining to a person subject to a sentence of death, and it is not for the courts to expand terms beyond the plain language of statutes. It reinstated the petition and remitted the matter to the Family Court for further proceeding on the petition, including a determination of whether a declaration of paternity would be in the child's best interests.

Appeals - Record on Appeal - Obligation to Assemble Proper Record - Failure to Assemble Proper Record Results in Denial of Review

In Taylor v Taylor, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6778526 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a marriage characterized by the Appellate Division as a long marriage, the Appellate Division found no merit to the defendant's contention that the Supreme Court should have equally distributed the parties' bank accounts as of the commencement of the action in 2008, since the parties had not functioned as an economic partnership for many years. The Appellate Division held that the defendant's contention that the Supreme Court improperly awarded the plaintiff a Florida condominium as her separate property could not be reviewed on this record. "It is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal" (Gaffney v. Gaffney, 29 AD3d 857, 857). The plaintiff caused to be admitted into evidence at trial certain documentation in support of her contention that the money used to purchase the condominium was a gift from her father and son. The defendant's failure to provide this Court with copies of that evidence precludes it from rendering an informed decision on the merits on the issue of whether the plaintiff sustained her burden of proving that the Florida condominium was her separate property.

Custody - Visitation - Visitation with Noncustodial Parent in Prison Presumed to Be in Best Interests of Child

In Matter of Georghakis v. Matarazzo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6779113 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Family Court declined to sign the mother's order to show cause accompanying her petition for visitation. The Appellate Division, on its own motion, deemed the notice of appeal an application for leave to appeal, and granted leave to appeal is granted (see CPLR 5701[c]). It pointed out that generally, since visitation with a noncustodial parent is presumed to be in the best interests of a child, even when that parent is incarcerated (Matter of Granger v. Misercola, 21 N.Y.3d 86, 90, 967 N.Y.S.2d 872, 990 N.E.2d 110) the Family Court erred in declining to sign the mother's order to show cause accompanying her petition for visitation. It reversed the order, on the law, and remitted to the Family Court, to sign the mother's order to show cause commencing a visitation proceeding.

Family Offenses - Violation Proceeding - Burden of Proof - Third Department Adopts Beyond a Reasonable Doubt Rule

In Matter of Stuart LL v Aimee KK, 995 N.Y.S.2d 317, 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 07222 (3d Dept, 2014) the contentious breakup of the parties' relationship resulted in Family Court ordering each party, in September 2012, to refrain from any communication with the other party for two years. Respondent thereafter attempted on several occasions to call petitioner at his various phone numbers. An enforcement proceeding ensued and, at the hearing, proof included documentation and a witness from the phone company establishing calls made during the time the protective order was in effect from respondent's phone to petitioner's phones. Family Court determined that clear and convincing evidence established that respondent had willfully violated the order of protection and, among other things, ordered a mental health evaluation and sentenced her to 75 days in jail. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that where, as here, a person who has violated an order of protection is incarcerated as a punitive remedy for a definite period-with no avenue to shorten the term by acts that extinguish the contempt-then that aspect of the Family Court Act article 8 proceeding "is one involving criminal contempt and the standard of proof that must be met to establish that the individual willfully violated the court's order is beyond a reasonable doubt" (citing Matter of Rubackin v. Rubackin, 62 A.D.3d at 21, 875 N.Y.S.2d 90). It held that its cases indicating otherwise should no longer be followed. Its review of the record reveals proof of a willful violation beyond a reasonable doubt. Nonetheless, under the particular circumstances of this case, it found that a sentence of time served with the remaining days of respondent's sentence suspended was appropriate, provided that respondent complete within 30 days-if not already completed-the ordered mental health evaluation and otherwise comply with Family Court's order.

Omission or Redaction of Confidential Personal Information

The Uniform Civil Rules of the Supreme and County Courts were amended to require the omission or redaction of Confidential Personal Information from papers filed with the court. See 22 NYCRR 202.5(e), relating to the omission or redaction of confidential personal information, effective January 1, 2015. Compliance with this rule is voluntary from January 1 through February 28, 2015, and mandatory thereafter. See 2014 New York Court Order (C.O. 00290), NY Order 14-0029. The rules do not apply to a matrimonial action. 22 NYCRR 202.5(e)(1). In addition, the rules do not apply in a proceeding in surrogate's court, or a proceeding pursuant to article 81 of the mental hygiene law, or as otherwise provided by rule or law or court order.

The Civil Practice Law and Rules defines the term "matrimonial action" to include actions for a separation, for an annulment or dissolution of a marriage, for a divorce, for a declaration of the nullity of a void marriage, for a declaration of the validity or nullity of a foreign judgment of divorce and for a declaration of the validity or nullity of a marriage.⁷⁸ The definition of "matrimonial action" in the civil practice law and rules does not include an action to set aside or declare void a prenuptial agreement, separation agreement or postnuptial agreement, an action to declare the validity of such an agreement, nor an action for a declaratory judgment with regards to, specific enforcement or breach of such an agreement. Nor does it include an action to declare the legitimacy of a child commenced in the Supreme Court, a visitation proceeding commenced pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 72, or an action for child support. Thus, parties in such actions are required to comply with this rule.

The parties are required to omit or redact confidential personal information ("CPI") in papers submitted to the court for filing as defined in the rules Confidential personal information ("CPI") means: the taxpayer identification number of an individual or an entity, including a social security number, an employer identification number, and an individual taxpayer identification number, except the last four digits thereof; the date of an individual's birth, except the year thereof; the full name of an individual known to be a minor, except the minor's initials; and a financial account number, including a credit and/or debit card number, a bank account number, an investment account number, and/or an insurance account number, except the last four digits or letters thereof. 22 NYCRR 202.5(e)(1).

Family Offense Proceedings - Subject Matter Jurisdiction - Family Court Act § 812(1)(E) - Intimate Relationship - Proceeding Dismissed Where No Intimate Relationship Against Respondent, Petitioner's Former Girlfriend's Live-in-boyfriend.

In Matter of Johnson v Carter,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6462097 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking an order of protection against the respondent, his former girlfriend's live-in-boyfriend. The petitioner and his former girlfriend had a child in common who resided with the respondent and the petitioner's former girlfriend. The petition alleged, among other things, that the respondent threatened to shoot the petitioner and his current girlfriend. Family Court, in effect, dismissed the petition on the ground that the petitioner had failed to establish that the parties had an "intimate relationship" pursuant to Family Court Act § 812(1)(e). The Appellate Division affirmed. Pursuant to Family Court Act § 812(1), the Family Court's jurisdiction in family offense proceedings is limited to certain enumerated acts that occur "between spouses or former spouses, or between parent and child or between members of the same family or household." Included within the definition of "members of the same family or household" is, among others, "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time" (Family Ct Act §812[1][e]). The Legislature expressly excluded from the definition of "intimate relationship" a "casual acquaintance" and "ordinary fraternization between two individuals in business or social contexts". Beyond those delineated exclusions, the Legislature left it to the courts to determine, on a case-by-case basis, what qualifies as an intimate relationship. Here, the evidence adduced at the hearing demonstrated that the parties had no direct relationship and were connected solely through the child. The contact between the parties was minimal and only related to the child. Accordingly, the Family Court properly concluded that the parties did not have an "intimate relationship" with the meaning of Family Court Act § 812(1)(e), and properly, in effect, dismissed the petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Child Support - Interference with Visitation - Domestic Relations Law § 241 - Not an Abuse of Discretion to permit child support payments to be held in escrow pending determination of the issue of interference, and then Retroactively Suspend Child Support for Interference with Visitation and refunding escrow payments.

In Whitaker v Case. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5856837 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), the parties were married in September 1994 and had a daughter (born in 1995) and a son (born in 1998). Shortly after defendant (wife) left the marital residence in April 2008, plaintiff (husband) commenced a divorce action. After trial, Supreme Court issued an order in September 2012 which, as pertinent here, granted the parties a divorce, classified and ordered the equitable distribution of the parties' marital property, granted the husband sole legal and physical custody of the children without any award of visitation to the wife, retroactively suspended the wife's obligation to pay child support, directed that certain child support payments be returned to the wife, and directed the husband to pay the wife limited costs.

The Appellate Division affirmed Supreme Court's directive retroactively suspending the wife's child support obligation and refunding certain child support made. It observed that a noncustodial parent's duty to support his or her children until the age of 21 (see Family Ct Act § 413[1][a]) may be suspended where he or she establishes that the custodial parent "wrongfully interfered with or withheld visitation" (Matter of Luke v. Luke, 90 AD3d 1179 [2011]; Domestic Relations Law § 241; Usack v. Usack, 17 AD3d 736). Supreme Court's decision described a household rife with animosity and overtones of domestic violence. The protracted hostility between the parties led the court to grant a mutual divorce pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §170(1) because "both [were] batterers and BOTH [were] victims." After one particularly abusive event, the wife left the household and the court ordered her and the children to engage in therapeutic visitation, with the husband's assistance. These sessions failed and were discontinued in March 2010, and the children refused further contact with the wife. The husband behaved badly in both his demeanor and his efforts to promote therapeutic counseling. The initial therapeutic counselor asserted that he undermined the therapeutic process, and the court-appointed psychologist went even further, describing the husband as a "parent alienator" who "brainwashed" the children against the wife. Accordingly, it found a a reasoned basis in this record for Supreme Court's determination to suspend the wife's child support obligations pending the husband's demonstration of a good faith effort to assist in the therapeutic process needed to reunite the wife with the children. There was no indication that this remedy presented any risk to the children becoming public charges. Upon its finding of interference, Supreme Court was authorized to suspend child support payments. Here, during the pendency of her application to suspend her child support obligation, the wife paid child support directly to the husband from November 2009 through April 22, 2011. Thereafter, pursuant to an order entered May 5, 2011, the wife paid child support to the support collection unit to be held pending resolution of her interference claim. Under the circumstances presented, there was no abuse of discretion in the court's determination to permit the wife's child support payments to be held in escrow during the pendency of the issue (see Matter of Lew v. Sobel, 91 AD3d 648, 648 [2012]). Similarly, we find that, under the circumstances, the court properly suspended her child support obligation retroactively, but only to the date the escrow fund was established (compare Matter of Luke v. Luke, 90 AD3d at 1182; Matter of Alexander v. Alexander, 129 A.D.2d 882, 884 [1987]) and directed the return of the escrowed monies to her. In contrast, it found that Supreme Court improperly adjusted the distributive award payable to the wife to reimburse her for the child support payments that she actually made to the husband for the benefit of the children during the pendency of her application. This adjustment violated the strong public policy against restitution or recoupment of support overpayments.

Family Offense Proceedings - Subject Matter Jurisdiction - Family Court Act § 812(1)(E) - Intimate Relationship - Intimate Relationship Found Where Respondent and Daughter Were

Each 13 Years Old When Petition Was Filed, and They Had Been in an On-and-off Dating Relationship for Several Years.

In Matter of Samantha I. ex. rel. Emily K v Lisa K.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6475474 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), petitioner commenced an article 8 proceeding on behalf of her daughter (born in 1999), alleging that respondent had committed various family offenses against the daughter. Respondent and the daughter were each 13 years old when the petition was filed, and they had been in an on-and-off dating relationship for several years. Family Court granted the petition, finding that the daughter and respondent were in an intimate relationship within the meaning of Family Ct Act § 812(1)(e) and that respondent had committed the family offenses of forcible touching and sexual misconduct, and issued a two-year order of protection in the daughter's favor. The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected respondent argument that his relationship with the daughter did not fall within the parameters of Family Ct Act § 812(1). This provision, as pertinent here, provides that Family Court has jurisdiction over family offense proceedings arising from certain acts committed by a respondent against a "member[] of the same family or household." That definition includes "persons who are not related by consanguinity or affinity and who are or have been in an intimate relationship regardless of whether such persons have lived together at any time" (Family Ct Act s 812[1][e]). Where, as here, a parent brings a family offense proceeding on behalf of a child, the focus of the jurisdictional analysis is on the child's relationship with the respondent, rather than that of the parent. The daughter testified that she and respondent had been classmates since kindergarten and began a "boyfriend-girlfriend" relationship in fifth grade that continued, on and off, through eighth grade. At first, the relationship consisted of holding hands, kissing and exchanging texts and phone calls. By sixth grade, according to the daughter, respondent was texting or calling her 5 or 10 times daily and becoming jealous, "controlling" and "isolat[ing]." The daughter testified that she and respondent had some sexual contact in sixth grade, including an incident in which he allegedly caused her to touch his erect penis at school in the presence of other students, and another in which he put his hand down her shirt to touch her breasts without her permission. According to the daughter, she and respondent did not date for most of seventh grade. However, late in that year they began talking again, and in eighth grade they met twice, each time at respondent's request. The daughter testified that during the first encounter, she reluctantly acceded to respondent's request for oral sex, believing that he would "leave [her] alone" if she did so. When they met the second time, they had sexual intercourse; the daughter testified that she asked respondent to stop and that he complied at first, but then continued. The daughter distanced herself from respondent after these events, and reported them to petitioner after she began having suicidal thoughts. Respondent did not dispute the factual accuracy of this testimony. The Appellate Division held that the youth of the participants does not preclude a determination that their relationship was intimate within the meaning of the statute; Family Ct Act § 812(1) expressly extends its jurisdiction to include respondents who are too young to be held criminally responsible, and nothing in the statutory language excludes young victims as participants in intimate relationships (Family Ct Act § 812[1]). Further, as the legislation expressly directs that such a relationship may exist between persons who have never lived together, the fact that the participants lived in their parents' separate households did not exclude them from the ambit of the statute (Family Ct Act § 812[1][e]). The record supported Family Court's determination that the intermittent dating relationship between respondent and the daughter qualified as an intimate relationship within the expanded reach of the revised statute. Accordingly, Family Court had subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding.

Child Support - Modification - Not Error to Deny Application to Modify Where Defendant Failed to Provide Updated Statement of Net Worth

In Rech v Rech, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5903137 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the court did not err in summarily denying defendant's motion to reduce his child support obligation inasmuch as defendant failed to provide an updated statement of net worth in support of his motion (22 NYCRR 202.16[k][2]; Garcia v. Garcia, 104 AD3d 806, 806).

Divorce - Grounds - Domestic Relations Law § 170 (7) - opposing spouse in divorce action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) not entitled to litigate the other spouse's sworn statement under Oath That the Marriage Was Irretrievably Broken for a Period of Six Months

Temporary Maintenance - Express Waiver of Temporary Alimony in Prenuptial Agreement Bars Award of Temporary Maintenance

In Trbovich v Trbovich,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 6497983 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment seeking a divorce pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7). It agreed with plaintiff that the relationship has broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months opposing spouse in a no-fault divorce action pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) is not entitled to litigate the other spouse's sworn statement (citing Palermo v. Palermo, 35 Misc.3d 1211[A], 2011 N.Y. Slip Op 52506[U], affd for reasons stated 100 AD3d 1453; see e.g. Rinzler v. Rinzler, 97 AD3d 215, 218; A.C. v. D.R., 32 Misc.3d 293, 306), and indicated that to the extent that its decision in Tuper v. Tuper (98 AD3d 55, 59 n) suggested otherwise, it declined to follow it. Nevertheless, plaintiff was not entitled to summary judgment under Domestic Relations Law § 170(7) at this juncture of the litigation because the ancillary issues had not been resolved by the parties or determined by the court. The Appellate Division observed that the parties prenuptial agreement provided that "[i]n the event of an action for dissolution of the contemplated marriage, [defendant] and [plaintiff] each waives and releases any right she or he may have under the law now or hereinafter in effect for temporary alimony or attorneys' fees." Thus, the parties entered into a prenuptial agreement in which each waived and released any right to temporary maintenance and attorneys' fees after the institution of an action for dissolution of the marriage. That agreement was controlling unless and until it is set aside. Thus, the court erred in awarding temporary maintenance and attorneys' fees inasmuch as such awards are barred by the plain terms of the valid agreement.

Divorce - Grounds - Domestic Relations Law § 170 (7) -Statement under Oath That the Marriage Was Irretrievably Broken for a Period of Six Months Was Sufficient to Establish Cause of Action for Divorce. Non-compliance with Separation Agreement Is Not an Element of Domestic Relations Law §170(7).

In Hoffer-Adou v. Adou, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5471501 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.)the Appellate Division affirmed an order which sustained the validity of the parties separation agreement. It also held that contrary to the husband's contention, the wife was entitled to a judgment of divorce under the no-fault provision of DRL § 170(7), since her statement under oath that the marriage was irretrievably broken for a period of six months was sufficient to establish her cause of action for divorce as a matter of law (citing Townes v. Coker, 35 Misc.3d 543, 547 [Sup Ct, Nassau County 2012]). Supreme Court's granting of the divorce did not contradict DRL § 170(7)'s requirement that "[n]o judgment of divorce shall be granted under this subdivision unless and until the economic issues of equitable distribution of marital property, the payment or waiver of spousal support, the payment of child support, the payment of counsel and experts' fees and expenses as well as the custody and visitation with the infant children of the marriage have been resolved by the parties, or determined by the court and incorporated into the judgment of divorce." The parties' separation agreement resolved the issues of child custody and support. Their subsequent commencement in the Family Court of proceedings concerning these issues did not render the court without authority to grant the divorce, since non-compliance with/or enforcement of, the separation agreement is not an element of Domestic Relations Law §170(7).

Family Offenses - Evidence - Judicial Notice - Improper to Reject Mother's Request to Take Judicial Notice of Determination in Parties' Prior Custody Proceeding, in Same Court, in Which Father Made False Allegations.

In Spooner-Boyke v. Charles--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5461581 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Family Court found that the mother committed the family offenses of assault in the third degree, menacing in the third degree, disorderly conduct, and harassment in the second degree, and issued an order of protection directing the mother to, inter alia, stay away from the child. The Appellate Division reversed. It found that Family Court improperly rejected the mother's request that it take judicial notice of the determination in the parties' prior custody proceeding, in the same court, in which the father admittedly made false allegations. That proceeding, and the court's findings regarding the father, were relevant to the court's assessment of the father's credibility in this matter. It held that the court improvidently exercised its discretion in declining to take judicial notice of the prior custody proceeding. Additionally, the Family Court erred in drawing a negative inference based on the mother's failure to call the child's maternal grandmother as a witness. A party is entitled to a missing witness charge when the party establishes that an uncalled witness possessing information on a material issue would be expected to provide noncumulative testimony in favor of the opposing party and is under the control of and available to that party. The court sua sponte drew a negative inference based on the mother's failure to call the grandmother as a witness, and failed to advise the mother that it intended to do so. The mother, therefore, lacked the opportunity to explain her failure to call the grandmother as a witness, or to discuss whether the grandmother was even available to testify or under her control. It held that the evidence proffered at the hearing was insufficient to establish by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the mother committed the family offense of assault in the third degree. A person is guilty of assault in the third degree when with intent to cause physical injury to another person, he [or she] causes such injury to such person (Penal Law § 120.00[1]). Physical injury is defined as impairment of physical condition or substantial pain (Penal Law § 10.00 [9]). No evidence was presented that the child's physical condition was impaired, and there was insufficient evidence to establish that the child suffered substantial pain. The branch of the petition which alleged that the mother committed the family offense of assault in the third degree was dismissed, and the matter remitted to the Family Court, for a hearing and new determination of the remaining branches of the petition.

Custody - Disclosure - Forensic Evaluation Report - Raw Data - Forensic Evaluator's Raw Data, Recordings, Notes, Tests, Test Results, and All Material Relied upon and Created During the Evaluation Process Are Discoverable

In J.F.D v J.D., 2014 WL 5471648 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 51547(U) plaintiff Husband moved for an order, inter alia, directing the Court appointed forensic evaluator, to release her entire file in connection with her forensic evaluation, and the report issued further thereto, of the parties and their children to a forensic expert he retained. The Court had appointed the Forensic Evaluator to conduct a forensic examination regarding the parties and their children. The Court noted that New York courts have generally not allowed pretrial discovery of the notes, raw data and tests results of the forensic evaluator, absent special circumstances (citing CP v. AP, 32 Misc.3d 1210(A) [Sup. Ct, New York County 2011]; Ochs v. Ochs, 193 Misc.2d 502 [Sup.Ct., Westchester County 2002, Spolzino, J.]). Such "Special circumstances" would include a showing of bias on the part of the evaluator, or a deficiency in the report (Ochs, supra)." The court pointed out that limitations on access to the reports raised serious due process concerns including the inability of parents to adequately and effectively challenge the quality and trustworthiness of forensic reports. The Court held that the forensic evaluator's raw data, recordings, notes, tests, test results, and all material relied upon and created during the evaluation process were discoverable by both parties and by the Attorney for the Children. The court stated that it would " from this day forward", allow the parties themselves to read the report, as well as the raw material. However, the parties will not be provided a copy of the report or the raw materials, but will be allowed to review the report and raw materials in their attorney's office with an attorney present. They will be permitted to take notes, but will be precluded from taking photos and/or copies of the report and/or the raw data. This Court's orders appointing forensic evaluators for custody purposes will address the evaluator's responsibility to maintain and provide copies of all the raw data materials to the Court, which in turn, will provide same to counsel as set forth above with the signing of a Stipulation for Release and Use of Forensic Reports and Order as outlined above. The Husband's motion was granted in that the Forensic Evaluator was directed to provide the Court with copies of her raw data and material. Once received by the Court, the Court said it would notify counsel, who shall execute a confidentiality agreement, to be So-Ordered by the Court, allowing them to take a copy of the material, show it to the litigants, (only in counsel's office), allow the litigant to take notes, but not take any pictures or copies of any kind of the material, so they can assist with trial preparation. It was further order that the husband could provide a copy of the Forensic Evaluator's notes and raw material to his privately retained expert. However, the expert would have to execute a confidentiality agreement likened to the one executed by counsel for the parties, which must be filed with the Court prior to the release of the report and/or the Forensic Evaluator's raw data.

Marriage - Domestic Relations Law §5(3) -Incest - Court of Appeals Holds that Marriage Where husband half-brother of wife's mother is not incestuous

In Nguyen v Holder, --- N.E.3d ----, 2014 WL 5431014 (N.Y.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 07290 following certification of a question by the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and acceptance of the question by the Court of Appeals pursuant to section 500.27 of this Court's Rules of Practice, the Court of Appeals held that a marriage where a husband is the half-brother of the wife's mother is not void as incestuous under Domestic Relations Law § 5(3).

Appeals - Child Support - Second Department Adopts Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine to Dismiss Child Support Appeal By Mother.

In Allain v Allain, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5350479 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division, Second Department, dismissed the appeal, and in an opinion by Judge Roman, held that it was proper in the context of this child support proceeding to apply the fugitive disentitlement doctrine, which permits a court, under certain circumstances, to dismiss an appeal where the party seeking relief is a fugitive while the matter is pending.

In December 2009, the Family Court issued an order increasing the mother's monthly child support obligation to $1,467. In October 2011, the Commissioner of the Department of Social Services petitioned the Family Court on behalf of the father, alleging, inter alia, that the mother had willfully failed to obey the December 2009 support order, and that she then owed $46,184.18 in child support arrears. Pursuant to a summons dated November 4, 2011, the mother was summoned to appear at an initial hearing scheduled for November 21, 2011. On April 19, 2012 a Support Magistrate conducted a hearing on the petition, at which the mother was permitted to appear by telephone from Nigeria. Following the hearing, the Support Magistrate found that the mother had willfully violated the December 2009 order. The mother was directed to pay $28,363.31 in child support arrears as of April 15, 2012, and the Support Magistrate recommended that she be incarcerated. The matter was referred to a Family Court Judge for confirmation.

The mother filed written objections to the Support Magistrate's findings, which which Family Court determined were improper, inasmuch as the Support Magistrate's findings and recommendation were not final determinations to which objections could be made but were, respectively, a nonfinal finding and a recommendation that would only become binding upon confirmation by a Family Court Judge. The Family Court also denied the mother's application for further adjournment "due to the extensive and protracted history of litigation" and the mother's "repeated attempts to create undue delay of the resolution of this matter." The Family Court issued a warrant for the mother's arrest, based on her failure to appear, but stayed the issuance of the warrant until August 17, 2012, in order to provide the mother with an opportunity to appear before the court for a hearing. The mother never personally appeared.

The Appellate Division dismissed the appeal pursuant to the fugitive disentitlement doctrine, since the mother continued to evade the jurisdiction of the New York State courts. It held that an appellate court may dismiss the appeal of a defendant who is a fugitive from justice during the pendency of his or her appeal. To apply the fugitive disentitlement doctrine, there must be a connection between a defendant's fugitive status and the appellate process, sufficient to make an appellate sanction a reasonable response. The doctrine has been extended to the dismissal of appeals in civil cases provided there is likewise a nexus between the appellant's fugitive status and the appellate proceedings. The nexus requirement is satisfied in civil cases where the appellant's absence frustrates enforcement of the civil judgment. It noted that the "fugitive disentitlement doctrine" has been adopted by the Third and Fourth Judicial Departments. (see Matter of Shehatou v. Louka, 118 AD3d 1357; Matter of Skiff-Murray v. Murray, 305 A.D.2d at 752-753). Judge Roman pointed out that the Second Department, like the Court of Appeals and the Appellate Division in each of the other judicial departments, has dismissed appeals by fugitives in criminal proceedings "on the comparable ground that '[the] appellant is not presently available to obey the mandate of the Court in the event of an affirmance. The Court noted that it had also employed the "unavailable-to-obey" paradigm in dismissing an appeal in a juvenile delinquency proceeding, which, in contrast to a criminal prosecution, is civil in nature. In Matter of Magdalene N. (180 A.D.2d 799), the juvenile appellant had absconded from her placement, and a warrant was issued for her arrest. The Court concluded that dismissal of the juvenile's appeal was appropriate since she was "unavailable to obey the mandate of the court" (see Matter of Skiff-Murray v. Murray, 305 A.D.2d at 753 [noting that the Court of Appeals and the Appellate Division, First Department, have also used the "unavailable-to-obey" paradigm to dismiss fugitives' appeals in civil proceedings]).

The Court noted that the Appellate Division, Third Department, in Matter of Skiff-Murray v. Murray (305 A.D.2d at 751) became the first New York appellate court to apply the doctrine in a case involving child support. In Matter of Christie S. v. Marqueo S. (106 AD3d 592), the Appellate Division, First Department, dismissed an appeal from an order confirming a Support Magistrate's finding that the appellant had willfully violated an order of support. The Court, citing Matter of Skiff-Murray, noted that the appellant was presently a fugitive who was unavailable to obey the Family Court's mandate in the event of an affirmance, and concluded that "his appeal may not be heard". The Appellate Division, Fourth Department, also relied on the fugitive disentitlement doctrine to dismiss an appeal by a California resident subject to arrest for the willful violation of a New York support order who refused to return to this State (Matter of Shehatou v. Louka, 118 AD3d 1357).

Applying these principles here, the Appellate Division found that dismissal of the appeal was warranted pursuant to the fugitive disentitlement doctrine. The mother deliberately removed herself from the jurisdiction of the New York courts concomitant with the filing of a October 2011 violation petition, which alleged that she had willfully failed to obey the December 2009 child support order. She thereafter failed to personally appear before the Family Court, and a bench warrant was issued to secure her return. However, the mother continued to evade the court, rendering her a fugitive.

Additionally, there was a nexus between the mother's fugitive status and the appellate proceedings, since her fugitive status related to her failure to comply with the Family Court's prior orders and her refusal to personally appear before that court. By her default and absence, the mother was evading the very orders from which she sought appellate relief. The mother's absence from New York frustrated the father's efforts to enforce the prior child support orders (see Wechsler v.

Wechsler, 45 AD3d at 473-474). Application of the doctrine is appropriate where the appellant has willfully made himself or herself unavailable to obey a court's mandate in the event of affirmance. It is the flight or refusal to return in the face of judicial action that is the critical predicate to fugitive disentitlement". Following the Commissioner's filing of the enforcement petition, the Family Court attempted to secure the mother's appearance before it on several occasions, but the mother failed to appear. The the mother willfully and deliberately removed herself from the jurisdiction of the New York courts by leaving the state and failing to appear in subsequent proceedings to enforce the support orders. Under the circumstances of this case, "the principal rationales for the doctrine-imposing a penalty for flouting the judicial process, discouraging flights from justice and promoting the efficient operation of the courts, and avoiding prejudice to the nonfugitive party-would be vindicated by dismissing the appeal" (Wechsler v. Wechsler, 45 AD3d at 474).

Agreements - Prenuptial - Validity - Temporary Maintenance - Waiver of Maintenance in Agreement Does Not Bar Pendente Lite Maintenance During the Pendency of the Litigation Absent Express Provision in Agreement

In McKenna v Mckenna, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5151377 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married on February 14, 1997. Shortly before their marriage, they entered into a prenuptial agreement which provided, inter alia, that, in the event of separation or divorce, each party waived the right to the other's separate property, including property acquired from the proceeds of separate property acquired during marriage; the defendant waived any interest in the marital home, which had been owned by the plaintiff before the marriage, as well as any interest in the plaintiff's annual bonus and retirement account; and the plaintiff's maintenance obligation would be limited to a lump sum payment of between $5,000 and $25,000, depending on the length of the marriage. The agreement further provided that the plaintiff would pay the defendant's reasonable counsel fees in any matrimonial action, unless the defendant challenged the agreement. In December 2011, the plaintiff commenced the action for a divorce. Defendant moved to vacate the prenuptial agreement on the basis that it was unenforceable on the ground, among others, that the plaintiff never disclosed the value of his assets, and for an award of pendente lite maintenance and counsel fees. The plaintiff cross-moved for summary judgment declaring that the prenuptial agreement was valid and enforceable. The Supreme Court denied the defendant's motion, and granted the plaintiff's cross motion.

The Appellate Division modified by denying the cross motion, and remitting for a determination of defendant's motion for an award of pendente lite maintenance and counsel fees. It found that plaintiff demonstrated his prima facie entitlement to judgment as a matter of law by submitting, inter alia, the agreement, which appeared fair on its face and set forth express representations stating that, among other things, it was not a product of fraud or duress, each party had made full disclosure to the other and was represented by independent counsel, and they had fully discussed and understood its terms. In opposition, the defendant raised triable issues of fact with regard to, inter alia, the fairness of the agreement, the circumstances surrounding the negotiation and execution of the agreement, and the absence of any meaningful financial disclosure by the plaintiff. It was not possible to evaluate the fairness of the prenuptial agreement on its face, inasmuch as the plaintiff provided no financial disclosure as part of the agreement. The plaintiff's disclosure made in support of his motion was not sufficient to enable the Court to determine the fairness of the agreement at the time of its execution. Thus, notwithstanding that the agreement recited that there had been "full disclosure" and that it is "a fair Agreement" which "is not the result of any fraud, duress or undue influence," triable issues of fact existed.

Plaintiff's purported financial disclosure to the defendant during the five years the parties lived together prior to the execution of the prenuptial agreement was precluded from consideration pursuant to the merger clause in the agreement, since the representations were not included in and were extrinsic to the agreement (see Schron v. Troutman Sanders LLP, 20 NY3d 430, 433-434; Matter of Primex Intl. Corp. v. Wal-Mart Stores, 89 N.Y.2d 594, 599). The defendant's attorney was selected by the plaintiff and paid by him, and, according to the defendant, met with her only a short time before the execution of the agreement and failed to advise her of the legal consequences of the terms of agreement. Given the parties' conflicting claims as to the negotiation and execution of the prenuptial agreement summary judgment in favor of either party was unwarranted.

The Appellate Division found that notwithstanding that the prenuptial agreement contained a waiver of maintenance and equitable distribution, there was no provision for the waiver of pendente lite maintenance during the pendency of this litigation. While the parties' premarital agreement limited the defendant's rights to obtain spousal support and waived her rights to counsel fees, it did not bar temporary relief, including pendente lite maintenance and counsel fees. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a new determination of those branches of the defendant's motion.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Paternity - Child Support - Full Faith and Credit and Res Judicata Bars Paternity Proceeding in New York after Dismissal with Prejudice of Alabama Paternity Proceeding

In Matter of Starla D. V Jeremy E, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5285598 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in December 2001, petitioner, a resident of Alabama, commenced a proceeding in the District Court of Colbert County, Alabama against respondent, a New York resident, alleging that respondent was the biological father of the subject child (born in 2001) and seeking an award of child support. Respondent, appearing pro se, answered and thereafter underwent DNA testing. Petitioner, who did not complete her portion of the DNA testing, subsequently moved to dismiss the proceeding "with prejudice" and, in July 2004, the Alabama court granted her request. In January 2011, petitioner commenced a proceeding in New York against respondent pursuant to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (Family Ct Act art 5-B), seeking to establish paternity and, in conjunction therewith, an award of child support. Respondent moved to dismiss the petition contending, among other things, that the proceeding was barred by res judicata and/or equitable estoppel. Family Court dismissed respondent's equitable estoppel defense. Respondent answered and moved for summary judgment, again contending that this proceeding was barred by res judicata and equitable estoppel. The Support Magistrate rejected respondent's affirmative defenses and, based upon the evidence adduced at the hearing, issued the requested order of filiation and awarded child support. Family Court affirmed the Support Magistrate's orders in their entirety.

The Appellate Division reversed. It agreed with respondent's argument upon appeal that Family Court erred in failing to apply the Full Faith and Credit Clause and principles of res judicata to bar petitioner from maintaining the proceeding. It observed that "In New York, res judicata, or claim preclusion, bars successive litigation based upon the same transaction or series of connected transactions if: (i) there is a judgment on the merits rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and (ii) the party against whom the doctrine is invoked was a party to the previous action [or proceeding], or in privity with a party who was" (Matter of People v. Applied Card Sys., Inc., 11 NY3d 105, 122 [2008]. There was no dispute that the Alabama proceeding involved the same parties and underlying issues, i.e., paternity and child support. Additionally, under both Alabama and New York law, a dismissal "with prejudice" indeed constitutes an adjudication "on the merits" (see Matter of Coleman v. Coleman, 1 AD3d 833, 834 [2003]. Further, there was no question that the Alabama court had subject matter jurisdiction over the paternity and support proceeding. Accordingly, the only remaining issue was whether the Alabama court acquired personal jurisdiction over respondent. Personal jurisdiction is-under both New York and Alabama law-a waivable defense (CPLR 3211[a][8]; [e])). In this regard, although respondent raised lack of personal jurisdiction in his pro se answer, respondent testified at the paternity hearing that he did so only to avoid entry of a default judgment against him, and that he expressly advised the Alabama court that if there was going to be "a hearing with genetic testing that [he] would be a full participant." Respondent further testified that when the Alabama court declined to dismiss the proceeding for improper service, he affirmatively requested that he be allowed to undergo genetic testing in New York, that the Alabama court granted his request and that he subsequently underwent such testing. Under these circumstances, respondent waived his right to assert that the Alabama court lacked personal jurisdiction over him and expressly consented thereto. Accordingly, as all of the elements of res judicata were present, and Family Court erred in failing to dismiss petitioner's application upon this ground.

Temporary Custody, Child Support and Maintenance - Supreme Court Holds it Need Not Make Temporary Custody Determination Where No Exigent Circumstances - Non-custodial Parent Is Not Entitled to Receive Child Support from a Custodial Parent, Irrespective of Financial Positions of Parties - Custodial Parent Is Parent Who Has More Overnights - DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(c), and (e) Considered in Awarding Maintenance

In Joseph M v Lauren J, 2014 WL 5420618 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 51536(U) the parties were married in 1997 and had one child, a daughter, born in 2009. The couple separated eight months after the child's birth when, in May 2010, defendant left the marital residence in Yonkers to live with a man with whom she had been involved since before the pregnancy. They recently stopped living together because their church objected to them continuing to cohabit while she was still married to plaintiff. As a result, defendant had been living in a hostel in upper Manhattan. Plaintiff was a property manager of an office building in midtown Manhattan, earning, according to his most recently filed tax return, an annual salary of $150,880. Plaintiff continued to reside in the marital residence in Yonkers, and voluntarily paid defendant $650 per month in support since their separation. According to plaintiff, the $650 was intended to be used by defendant for the child's needs when the child is with her. Since the parties' separation, they agreed upon and followed a temporary parenting arrangement. Plaintiff commenced the action for divorce in 2013. Defendant filed her pendente lite motion on July 15, 2014, over four years after she left the marital residence.

Supreme Court held that custody is an ultimate issue to be determined after a full trial, and that a determination of custody on a temporary basis shall only be made when there are exigent circumstances (Acquard v. Acquard, 244 A.D.2d 1010, 1010, 666 N.Y.S.2d 57 [4th Dept 1997]). It found that no exigent circumstances were present here. Any allegations that the parties made against each other were not of such magnitude to necessitate an immediate change in the current parenting arrangement. Accordingly, the motions seeking temporary custody were denied without prejudice.

Defendant sought temporary child support of $2,019 per month. The Court found that in the First Department a non-custodial parent is not entitled to receive child support from a custodial parent, irrespective of the financial positions of the parties. DRL § 240(1-b)(f)(10) states: "the court shall order the non-custodial parent to pay his or her pro-rata share of the basic child support obligation." The First Department has held that a custodial parent who has the child a majority of the time cannot be directed to pay child support to a non-custodial parent (Rubin v. Della Salla, 107 A.D.3d 60, 62, [1st Dept 2013])." The Court found that neither party could be said to have legal custody of the child inasmuch as a custody determination may only be made following a full trial. Thus, for the purposes of determining temporary child support, the "custodial parent" must be deemed to be that parent who has the child "the majority of the time." In Rubin v. Della Salla, the First Department held that overnights, not "waking hours," dictate which parent has more time for purposes of determining the custodial and non-custodial parent. Based solely on the actual amount of overnights that the child spent with each party, Supreme Court concluded that plaintiff was the custodial parent and defendant was the non-custodial parent for the purposes of determining child support on a pendente lite basis. Defendant's request for temporary child support was denied.

Pursuant to DRL § 236[B] (5-a) the court arrived at a presumptive award of temporary maintenance. Plaintiff's income was $140,237 and defendant's income was $0. As such, plaintiff was deemed the "payor" spouse, and defendant was deemed the "payee" spouse. In accordance with DRL § 236B(c)(1), the Defendant, as the payee spouse, was presumptively entitled to $3,506 per month.

Two of the statutory factors for deviation listed under DRL §236 B(e)(1) required the court's consideration. The first was DRL § 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(c), "the earning capacity of the parties." The Court noted that in the more than four years since defendant has left the marital home, she made no attempt to re-enter the workforce. Instead, she proclaimed that it was her choice to do volunteer work rather than earn an income. Moreover, rather than teaching people about health and nutrition on an unpaid basis while seeking employment elsewhere, defendant spent her days, including many of her days with the child, outside of a Planned Parenthood health clinic, praying for patients and attempting to convince them not to obtain abortions. By dedicating herself to church and anti-abortion related activities, while at the same time demanding that plaintiff support her, defendant was in effect seeking to have plaintiff subsidize those activities. Moreover, she purposefully reduced her ability to be self-supporting, or at least to contribute towards her own support, by choosing not to take payment for health and nutrition services she provided, and by spending her days protesting outside of Planned Parenthood rather than obtaining or seeking to obtain meaningful employment (see DRL § 236B[5-a][e][1][k] ["the inability of one party to obtain meaningful employment due to age or absence from the workforce"]).

The other relevant factor was DRL § 236B(e)(1)(g), the "the existence and duration of a pre-marital joint household or a pre-divorce separate household." For the past four years defendant lived with and was supported by another man. Because of this relationship, she was able to live comfortably in an upscale neighborhood in Manhattan. She traveled extensively across the country and abroad, admitting that "[f]or the most part my travel has been paid for by the man I have been with". It was only now, after she was no longer living with the other man and, presumably, no longer being supported by him, that she looked to plaintiff to make up for the shortfall occasioned by the disruption of her "pre-divorce separate household."

Taking into consideration the relevant statutory factors, the court found ample reason to deviate from the presumptive award of $3,506 per month. Bearing in mind that the overriding purpose of temporary maintenance is "to maintain the status of the parties as far as can be accurately ascertained", the court concluded that, as plaintiff's temporary maintenance obligation, he must continue to pay defendant the $650 he had been voluntarily paying.

The International Child Abduction Remedies Act, 42 USC §§11601 - 11611 was editorially reclassified as sections 9001-9011 of Title 22. It can now be found in 22 U.S.C. §§ 9001-9011.

Family Court Act §451

Family Court Act §451(1), which was amended, effective December 22, 2014, provided that an application to modify an order of child support must be accompanied by "an affidavit and other evidentiary material sufficient to establish a prima facie case for the relief requested" in order to entitle the petitioner to a hearing on any material issues of fact. No hearing is required if an affidavit has not been submitted even if material issues are present in the case. The amendment removed the requirement of filing an affidavit with the petition by removing word "modify" from subdivision 1 and adding a new subdivision 2, which provides: "A proceeding to modify an order of support shall be commenced by the filing of a petition which shall allege facts sufficient to meet one or more of the grounds enumerated in subdivision three of this section. Former subdivision 2 has been renumbered subdivision 3. See Laws of 2014, Ch 373, effective December 22, 2014.

CPLR 2106 which previously allowed unsworn affirmations only by attorneys, physicians, osteopaths or dentists, was amended, effective January 1, 2015, to allow New York courts to consider unsworn affirmations by any person, when that person is physically located outside the geographic boundaries of the United States, Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, or any territory or insular possession subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The affirmation must be in substantially the following form: "I affirm this ... day of, .., under the penalties of perjury under the laws of New York, which may include a fine or imprisonment, that I am physically located outside the geographic boundaries of the United States, Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, or any territory or insular possession subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, that the foregoing is true, and I understand that this document may be filed in an action or proceeding in a court of law. (Signature) See Laws of 2014, Ch 380.

CPLR 3122-a

The Civil Practice Law and Rules was amended to provide that the certification authorized by CPLR 3122-a may be used as to business records produced by non-parties whether or not pursuant to a subpoena so long as the custodian or other qualified witness attests to the facts set forth in CPLR 3122-a, (1), (2) and (4) of subdivision (a) of this rule. Formerly CPLR 3122-a applied only to business records produced pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum under CPLR 3120. CPLR 3122-a was amended to add subdivision (d) allowing its certification procedures to apply to all business records produced by non-parties whether or not pursuant to subpoena. According to the legislative memorandum in support of the amendment, any party may object to the procedure set forth in CPLR 3122-a after receiving notice from the party intending to use that procedure to introduce business records at trial. If the court sustains the objection, the introducing party will need to bring in a witness at trial to testify to lay the foundation for admission of the documents. CPLR 3122-a does not supplant the procedure set forth in CPLR 2306 as to the introduction of hospital and municipal records at trial. A party seeking to introduce those records may still rely upon the procedure set forth in section 2306 or, alternatively, may follow the rule CPLR 3122-a procedures. CPLR 3122-a (d) added by Laws of 2014, Ch 314, § 2, effective immediately.

CPLR 3113 (1)

CPLR 3113 (1) (c) was amended to provide that a non-party deponent's counsel may participate in the deposition and make objections on behalf of his or her client in the same manner as counsel for a party. Laws of 2014, Ch 379, effective September 23, 2014

Temporary Maintenance - Award - Imputed Income - Court Is Justified in Imputing Income to a Spouse to Establish His Support Obligations When it Is Shown That His Account of His Finances Is Not Believable, and Lifestyle Was Such That There Was a Basis to Conclude That His Actual Income and Financial Resources Were Greater than What He Reported on His Tax Returns.

In Weitzner v Weitzner, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4723312 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed the defendant to pay temporary maintenance in the sum of $4,604 per month, interim child support in the sum of $3,530 per month, interim counsel fees in the sum of $30,000, and his pro rata share of playgroup fees for the youngest child. The Appellate Division stated that modifications of pendente lite awards should rarely be made by an appellate court and then only under exigent circumstances, such as where a party is unable to meet his or her financial obligations, or justice otherwise requires. The defendant did not demonstrate that any exigent circumstances exist, or that justice otherwise required modification of the pendente lite award. The proper mechanism to correct an error in a temporary award is a quick trial (Malik v. Malik, 66 A.D.3d at 968, 886 N.Y.S.2d 826; Levakis v. Levakis, 7 A.D.3d at 678, 776 N.Y.S.2d 510). The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in imputing income of $200,000 per year to the defendant for the purposes of computing pendente lite awards of maintenance and child support. A court is justified in imputing income to a spouse to establish a party's support obligations when it is shown that the marital lifestyle was such that, under the circumstances, there was a basis for the court to conclude that the spouse's actual income and financial resources were greater than what he or she reported on his or her tax returns. Supreme Court, in effect, found the defendant's account of his own finances was not believable, and was justified in imputing income to him that was far higher than he reported. Supreme Court did not err in imputing income to the plaintiff equivalent to only a ten-hour work week as an accountant for the purpose of calculating maintenance and child support. The plaintiff had custody of the parties' five children, then aged 16 and under, the youngest of whom was three at the time of the court's order. In addition, the plaintiff had not worked during the parties' marriage (Margaret A. v. Shawn B., 31 Misc.3d 769, 921 N.Y.S.2d 476 [Sup Ct.]).

Maintenance - Enforcement - Dismissal of Cause of Action for a Divorce Did Not Divest Supreme Court of Jurisdiction to Award Child Support Add-ons and Enforce Support Awards . Defaults in Child Support and Maintenance Obligations, but Not Counsel Fees, May Be Enforced by QDRO Against Pension and Retirement Plans.

In Lundon v Lundon, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4723475 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were married and had one child. In a judgment in 2009 Supreme Court, dismissed, in effect, the cause of action for a divorce, and awarded the defendant permanent maintenance and child support, including a portion of child support add-ons. After the plaintiff failed to make the agreed-upon payments, the defendant moved for enforcement relief. Supreme Court granted those branches of the defendant's motion which were for judgments for the unpaid counsel fees and arrears of child support and maintenance, and denied the remaining branches of the motion. The Appellate Division held that the dismissal, in effect, of the cause of action for a divorce did not divest the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to award child support add-ons and entertain the defendant's motion to enforce the award. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court also should have granted that the defendant's motion for a QDRO directing payments from the plaintiff's retirement plan to the defendant to satisfy the judgments for the arrears of child support and maintenance. Defaults in child support and maintenance obligations may be enforced by QDRO against pension and retirement plans. The requested order in favor of the defendant met the definitional requirements for a QDRO under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) and the Internal Revenue Code, as QDRO relate "to the provision of child support [and] alimony payments" and would assign to the defendant spouse, an "alternate payee," the right to receive benefits payable under the plaintiff's retirement plan. Moreover, since the awards of child support and maintenance in the 2009 judgment were authorized by Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(8)(b), the order aiding enforcement of those awards would be "made pursuant to a State domestic relations law" (26 USC § 414[p][1][B][iii]; 29 USC § 1056 [d][3][B][ii][II]; Boylan v. Dodge, 42 AD3d 632, 633; Adler v. Adler, 224 A.D.2d at 282-283). The Appellate Division also held that Supreme Court properly denied that branch of the defendant's motion which was for a QDRO directing payments from the plaintiff's retirement account to the defendant's attorney to satisfy unpaid counsel fees, since the attorney does not qualify as an "alternate payee" (26 USC § 414[p][8]; 29 USC § 1056[d] [3][K]; J.K.C. v. T.W.C., 39 Misc.3d 899, 913 [Sup Ct, Monroe County]).

Child Support - Award - Child Care Payments must Be in a Fixed Sum.

In Matter of Pitka v Pitka,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4938029 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division rejected the fathers argument that the Family Court Act requires payments for daycare expenses as a percentage, and the Support Magistrate therefore erred in requiring him to pay a sum certain for such expenses citing FCA § 413[c][6]).
Family Court

Family Court - International Child Abduction Remedies Act - Hague Convention - Dominican Republic - Habitual Residence

In Matter of MG v WZ, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 5026267 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 24296, the Family Court granted the motion of Respondent for an order reopening an Order of Custody on Default and allowing him to proceed on his petition for return of the Child to the Dominican Republic pursuant to the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, as implemented by the International Child Abduction Remedies Act, 42 United States Code § 11601, et seq. Upon Respondent's application, the Court permitted Respondent to testify and participate in the hearing via video hook-up from the Dominican Republic. The Court denied the petition for return. It found that the parties started residing together in 2004 in the Dominican Republic and Petitioner had a three year old non-subject son, A. The Child was born in March, 2004. In September, 2004, Petitioner immigrated to the United States where she was now a legal resident, leaving the Child and A in the Paternal Grandmother's care. In the beginning of 2006, the parties ended their relationship and shortly thereafter, Petitioner returned to the Dominican Republic for three weeks to a month and stayed with the maternal great grandmother. While Petitioner was in the Dominican Republic in 2006, the Paternal Grandmother petitioned for and was granted guardianship of the Child. Petitioner consented to the Paternal Grandmother having guardianship of the Child but Respondent did not consent. In May, 2010 Petitioner traveled to the Dominican Republic and returned to the United States with the Child. Petitioner testified that she needed Respondent's permission in order to leave the Dominican Republic with the Child and Respondent gave his written consent for the Child to travel to the United States. The night before Petitioner left the Dominican Republic with the Child, she and Respondent agreed not to make a final decision on whether the Child would remain in the United States rather than returning to the Dominican Republic. Instead the agreement was that they would wait to see if the Child obtained his permanent residency and whether he was adjusting to and liked life in the United States. The Child has been living in New York with Petitioner and A since May, 2010, and obtained his permanent residency status in October, 2010. The Child had not been back to the Dominican Republic since he left in May, 2010. The Child had been enrolled in P.S. 227 in the Bronx since 2010 where he has been consistently receiving high grades. The Child has been enrolled in a community based baseball league. The Child also enjoys playing basketball and will be enrolled in a community based baseball league. English is now the Child's dominant language although Petitioner and the Child more often communicate in Spanish. The Child has many school friends, and enjoys watching cartoons in English. Petitioner worked as a cashier and receives food stamps and medicaid for herself and the children. Petitioner's mother (the Child's maternal grandmother) lives five blocks from Petitioner and the Child with two of the Child's uncles and cousins. The Child has an aunt who has two children who live in the Bronx and another married aunt who has three children. All of these family members are on Petitioner's side of the family and live in the Bronx. The Child spends a great deal of time with his extended family.

The Family Court observed that where proceedings for return of a child have been commenced after the expiration of the period of one year [from the date of wrongful removal or retention], the court shall [] order the return of the child, unless it is demonstrated that the child is now settled in its new environment." Lozano v. Alvarez, 134 S Ct 1224, 1229 (2014) (quoting Article 12 of the Hague Convention). The "abducting parent" must establish that the exception to the return applies by a preponderance of the evidence. Id. Thus, the one year period is not a statute of limitations. It also observed that courts apply a two-part test to determine a child's country of habitual residence. "First, the court should inquire into the shared intent of [the parents] at the latest time that their intent was shared. In making this determination the court should look, as always in determining intent, at actions as well as declarations. Normally the shared intent of the parents should control the habitual residence of the child. Second, the court should inquire whether the evidence unequivocally points to the conclusion that the child has acclimatized to the new location and thus has acquired a new habitual residence, notwithstanding any conflict with the parents' latest shared intent. Hofmann v. Sender, 716 F3d at 291-92, quoting Gitter v. Gitter, 396 F3d at 34. The Court found that the the habitual residence of the Child was the United States. Initially, the parties agreed that Petitioner would precede the Child to the United States and that Respondent would follow by means of marrying a United States citizen who would then petition for he and the Child to come to the United States. Respondent eventually did marry a United States citizen who petitioned for Respondent to immigrate to the United States but according to Respondent that petition was never granted and in 2012 he and his wife divorced. Meanwhile, Petitioner grew frustrated with Respondent's lack of progress with his plans for immigrating to the United States via marriage to a United States citizen and initiated the process to petition for the Child to join her in the United States. While Respondent was initially upset that Petitioner filed a petition to have the Child join her in the United States, he gave his written, unqualified consent for Petitioner to travel with the Child to the United States on May 20, 2010. However, the night before Petitioner left the Dominican Republic with the Child in May, 2010, Respondent's unqualified or unconditional consent became conditional when the parties agreed that they would make a final determination on the Child's residency based on whether the Child obtained his permanent residency and whether he was adjusting to and liked life in the United States. Thus, the last time the parties shared their intent for the Child's place of residence, they conditionally agreed that it would be the United States. The condition on the Child residing in the United States was that he would have to be granted permanent residency and he would have to be adjusting to and liking his life in the United States. See Abbott v. Abbott, 560 U.S. at 11; Hoffmann v. Sender, 716 F3d at 293. The conditions placed on whether the Child would permanently reside in the United States have been met. The Child obtained his permanent residency status in the United States and he has fully adjusted to and enjoys his life in the United States. The Court found that the Child had fully adjusted to and enjoys his life in the United States because he consistently receives high grades in school, plays community based league sports, speaks predominantly English, and lives with his half brother A and has many relatives within close proximity with whom he spends a great deal of time. Consequently, the Child's habitual residence is the United States since the last time the parties' intent was shared, their shared intent was for the Child to reside in the United States upon his obtaining that which he now has obtained, permanent residency and a settled, enjoyable life in the United States. Hoffmann v. Sender, 716 F3d at 293.

The Family Court pointed out that where proceedings for return of a child have been commenced after the expiration of the period of one year from the date of wrongful removal or retention, the court shall order the return of the child, unless it is demonstrated that the child is now settled in its new environment." Lozano v. Alvarez, 134 S Ct 1224, 1229 (2014) (quoting Article 12 of the Hague Convention). The "abducting parent" must establish that the exception to the return applies by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the one year period is not a statute of limitations. The Family Court held that even if Respondent had established a prima facie case for return to the Dominican Republic it would not order the Child's return to the Dominican Republic because more than a year had passed since Petitioner "retained" the Child in the United States and the child was now settled in his new environment. See Taveras v. Morales, 2014 U.S. Dist Lexis 67892; 2014 WL 2038318 (SDNY, August 26, 2014); Jakubik v. Schmirer, 956 F Supp 2d 523 (SDNY 2013).

Editors comment:

In footnote 1 the court indicated that it had advised counsel that this “was not a custody hearing.” Hague Convention cases are not custody cases. The court is limited to adjudicating “only rights under the Convention” and may not decide “the merits of any underlying child custody claims. See Ozaltin v. Ozaltin, 708 F.3d 355, 360 (2d Cir. 2013). A petition for the return of a child commencing a civil action for the return of a child must be filed “in any court which has jurisdiction of such action.” 22 U.S.C. § 9003 (b), formerly cited as 42 USC § 11603 (b).

The Supreme Court has jurisdiction to hear these proceedings. N.Y. Const, art VI, § 7[a]. On the other hand, the Family Court is a court of limited jurisdiction, whose jurisdiction is proscribed by Article VI, § 13 of the New York State Constitution. It has not been conferred with jurisdiction under Article VI, § 13 of the New York state constitution to determine such cases. A court hearing a Hague Convention proceeding must have jurisdiction of the action and must be authorized to exercise its jurisdiction in the place where the child is located at the time the petition is filed. 22 U.S.C. § 9003 (b), formerly cited as 42 USC § 11603 (b). Family Court is not authorized to exercise such jurisdiction. While 22 U.S.C. § 9003, formerly cited as 42 USC § 11603, grants original jurisdiction of these proceedings to State and federal district courts, it does not grant jurisdiction to state courts of limited jurisdiction, such as the family court and surrogates court, nor does it purport to do so.

Moreover, Domestic Relations Law §77-a, the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which provides that a “court of this state may enforce an order for the return of the child made under the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction as if it were a child custody determination”, does not authorize the commencement of a civil action for the return of a child.

It appears that the Family Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction to hear Hague Convention cases. This has been confirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which has held that “ [t]he phrase “in any court which has jurisdiction of such action,” 42 U.S.C. § 11603(b), underscores that while § 11603(a) confers jurisdiction in a particular federal forum (i.e., in United States district courts), it does not confer jurisdiction in particular state courts (e.g., a family-law court; a juvenile court; or a court of general jurisdiction); the appropriate state forum for an action under the Hague Convention is an issue of state law. The court in which the petition is filed must also be “authorized to exercise its jurisdiction in the place where the child is located at the time the petition is filed.” Ozaltin v. Ozaltin, 708 F.3d 355, 360 (2d Cir. 2013). See footnote 25

Maintenance- Award - Domestic Relations Law §236 [B][6] - Defendant Awarded Maintenance Despite Her Refusal to Submit to a Complete Cross-examination on Financial Issues. When a Party, Through No Fault of its Own, "Is Deprived of the Benefit of the Cross-examination of a Witness," a Court May Strike That Witness's Direct Testimony in Whole or in Part

In Cohen v Cohen,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4452645 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Plaintiff husband was 79, and defendant was 54. Defendant was a documentary film maker and assistant director, and a citizen of Belgium and France. The parties met in France. In 1998, defendant became pregnant and stopped working. On April 30, 1999, plaintiff created the Second Stanley Cohen Irrevocable 1999 Family Trust (1999 Trust), primarily for the benefit of defendant and their issue. On June 7, 1999, the parties executed a prenuptial agreement in France, which provided that upon marriage, each party's premarital property would remain his or her separate property, that property titled in individual names acquired during the marriage would be the property of the person in whose name it was titled, and that jointly titled property acquired during the marriage would be jointly owned marital property. The parties married on June 14, 1999, and on July 10, 1999, their son was born. The parties separated in 2006, but plaintiff continued to provide defendant with financial support. Plaintiff commenced this divorce action in March 2009. In a prior appeal (93 AD3d 506 [1st Dept 2012]), the Court affirmed the order of the trial court that held that the French prenuptial agreement was valid. The trial was bifurcated, with specific days reserved for testimony regarding custody and other days for testimony about finances. Although defendant was cross-examined during the financial phase of the trial, on May 18, 2011, in the midst of her cross-examination on custody issues, she left New York and returned to Paris. Despite a three-week adjournment, defendant did not return to court, claiming that she was under doctor's orders not to travel. The court ended the trial on June 7, 2013. The court drew an adverse inference against defendant with respect to custody issues based on her failure to complete her cross-examination, but refused to default her or to strike her testimony in its entirety.

Defendant's net worth statement, excluding housing costs, listed monthly expenses of more than $62,000. The Appellate Division found that the award of $26,000 per month in non-durational maintenance was excessive, and reduced it to $22,500 per month. It observed that generally, the determination of maintenance is within the sound discretion of the trial court upon consideration of the relevant factors enumerated in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(6)(a) and the parties' pre-divorce standard of living. Defendant had the primary homemaking and child-raising responsibilities during the marriage. The parties enjoyed a lavish lifestyle, both before and, significantly, after their separation, and plaintiff assumed the role of financial provider, acquiescing in defendant's financial dependency. Defendant was not going to receive a distributive award, her own assets were limited, and the record did not contain evidence of the amount of income that she would receive from the 1999 Trust. Defendant also suffered from a mild cognitive impairment that compromised her ability to work, both within and outside of the film industry, and she was incapable of supporting herself at a standard of living approximating the marital standard. The defendant's assets were substantial and, along with plaintiff's annual income, were more than sufficient to provide for defendant's reasonable needs. On the other hand, defendant made little or no financial contribution to the marriage, and her efforts as a mother were diminished by her manipulation of the child. The costs listed in defendant's statement of net worth were based on her life in New York, including expenses for the child. Defendant failed to provide a specific account of the money she alone required, and the court improvidently made certain assumptions in that regard. Thus, taking into consideration the statutory factors, including the parties' extravagant lifestyle, defendant's dependence on plaintiff, the absence of a distributive award, and defendant's cognitive impairment insofar as it detrimentally affected her ability to become self-supporting, an award of non-durational maintenance of $22,500 per month was appropriate.

The Court rejected plaintiff's argument that defendant should not be awarded maintenance because of her refusal to submit to a complete cross-examination, which prevented the court from ascertaining her standard of living at the time of the divorce action, in contrast to the time earlier in the marriage when the parties co-resided. It held that when a party, through no fault of its own, "is deprived of the benefit of the cross-examination of a witness," a court may strike that witness's direct testimony in whole or in part (Gallagher v. Gallagher, 92 App.Div. 138, 140 [1904]; Diocese of Buffalo v. McCarthy, 91 A.D.2d 213, 220 [4th Dept 1983]. Although it did not condone defendant's failure to return to court to complete her cross-examination during the custody phase of the trial, it found that the court providently exercised its discretion when it drew a negative inference against defendant with respect to custody issues but declined to strike her testimony in its entirety. The court was familiar with the parties' lavish standard of living during the marriage and defendant testified and was cross-examined for a number of days during the financial phase of the trial. During this testimony, defendant acknowledged that her food and unreimbursed medical expenses had decreased, that many of the amounts in her net worth statement reflected the way the parties lived before separating, and that she had reduced her spending on many of these items. Accordingly, plaintiff's claims of prejudice were overstated, and a negative inference with respect to custody was an adequate sanction for defendant's misconduct.

Sanctions - 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 et seq. - Sanctions Reversed Where No Finding that Conduct Was Frivolous

In Nimkoff v Nimkoff, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4637880 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the court improperly imposed on defendant, "as sanctions," plaintiff's costs in responding to his motion for sanctions against her, since it set forth no finding that defendant's conduct was frivolous (22 NYCRR 130-1.2). Nor, assuming it intended to award costs, rather than sanctions, did the court provide the requisite explanation why the amount awarded was appropriate.

Counsel Fees - Award - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Improper to Award Counsel Fees Without Any Application for Such Relief, and Without Any Supporting Evidence

In McMahon v McMahon, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4627692 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division found that the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the principal sums of $22,480 and $22,520, respectively, for the plaintiff's counsel fees pursuant to DRL 237(a) in two money judgments. It noted that the plaintiff earned considerably less than the defendant, that the plaintiff was not receiving any significant equitable distributive award, and that the defendant's conduct throughout the proceedings, including his failure to abide by a pendente lite order, unnecessarily protracted the litigation. However, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in, sua sponte, awarding an additional $3,500 in counsel fees to the plaintiff for having had to defend against the defendant's motion for leave to reargue. The additional counsel fees were awarded without any application by the plaintiff for such relief, and without any supporting documentation or other evidence demonstrating the propriety thereof.

Maintenance - Award - Domestic Relations Law §236[B][6] - Temporary Guidelines Are Inapplicable to a Permanent Award of Maintenance

In Pratt v Pratt, 2014 WL 4548441 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 51383(U) the parties were married in 2004, while the wife was a medical resident at the University of Rochester. The husband, at the time of the marriage, was employed as a finance representative for a local money managing business. Soon after the wedding, while the wife was working and completing her medical training, the husband left his job, remained at home, caring for the first child (five years old) and eventually the second child (two years old). Both parents had advanced degrees. The wife held a medical degree, earned prior to the marriage. The husband held a master's degree in music education, obtained during the marriage. The couple had a wide disparity in their incomes: the wife's, at the time of the commencement, exceeded $160,000 and the husband, admittedly working only part-time, earned less than $8,000. In considering the maintenance factors set forth in the Domestic Relations Law, the Court concluded that the wife (approximately $160,000 annually) made substantially more income than the husband (less than $15,000 annually); the marriage was of a relatively short duration and during it, the wife completed her medical training and the husband changed jobs. He left a career in the financial industry to become a teacher, a move that was, in part, a reflection of the wife's higher potential earnings as a physician. Both parents were young and in good health; The wife's earning capacity was sizable, given her medical training. The husband had a capacity for a reasonable and sustainable future income, especially with a bachelor's and master's degree; the pre-divorce household was largely supported by the wife's income, at least at its later stages. The husband lived in a new residence, in the same community as the marital home, with a comparable-although not identical-standard of living; the husband did provide parenting services while the wife completed her medical education. He withdrew from the employment market and provided at-home child care services to support his wife's education and career. The husband, in arguing for maintenance, cited the temporary guidelines for maintenance enshrined in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a). Under these guidelines, the maintenance would total $3,801 per month, for a total of more than $47,000 annually. Supreme Court held that the temporary guidelines were inapplicable to a permanent award of maintenance. V.M. v. N.M., 43 Misc.3d 1204(A) at 13 (Sup.Ct. Albany Cty.2014). It directed that the husband be paid maintenance by the wife for a period of 40 months at the rate of $1,500 per month or $60,000. The wife was entitled to credit for the payments already made.

Custody - Award - Factors - Religion - Courts May Consider Religion but it May Not Be a Determinative Factor

In Gribeluk v Gribeluk, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3929084 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order which awarded custody to the father. It observed that courts may consider religion as one of the factors in determining the best interests of a child, but religion alone may not be the determinative factor (Matter of Gago v. Acevedo, 214 A.D.2d 565, 566; Aldous v. Aldous, 99 A.D.2d 197). New York courts will consider religion in a custody dispute when a child has developed actual religious ties to a specific religion and those needs can be served better by one parent than the other (Aldous v. Aldous, 99 A.D.2d at 199; Spring v. Glawon, 89 A.D.2d 980). It found that Family Court did not rely solely on religion and the mother's decision to leave the Hasidic Jewish community in making the determination to award the father custody of the parties' children. The Family Court expressly stated that it passed no judgment on either parent's religious beliefs and practices. The children's need for stability, and the potential impact of uprooting them from the only lifestyle which they had known, are important factors in making a custody determination. The Family Court also found the mother's repeated allegations of sexual abuse of the children by the father to be unfounded, which subjected the children to numerous interviews and examinations, casting doubt upon her fitness to be the custodial parent. Although the children expressed a preference to reside with the mother, and the attorney for the children advocated awarding custody to the mother, the children's preference and the recommendation of the attorney for the children are not determinative and do not usurp the judgment of the Family Court.

Custody - Award - Modification - Relocation - Amount of Time Between Mother's Filing of Petition and Court's Determination Should Not Be Weighed Against Mother Who Promptly Filed Petition for Custody

In Matter of Doyle v Debe, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 4086283 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties married in 2002. They had a child in 2006. The parties separated in May 2008. After this separation, the child initially lived with the mother, but, in August 2008, the child began living with the father. On or about September 12, 2008, the mother filed a petition for sole physical custody of the child. In her petition, the mother alleged that she had a letter from the father in which he stated that the mother could have sole custody of the child. On or about September 16, 2008, the father filed his own petition for sole physical custody of the child. In April 2010, while the petitions were pending, the mother moved to Georgia and began living with her then-fiance, whom she later married. In October 2010, the mother filed a petition for permission to relocate to Georgia with the child, alleging that she had moved due to the long history of domestic violence between the parties. She also alleged that, in Georgia, she would be able to provide housing and amenities for the child which were superior to those which she or the father could provide in New York. In December 2012, the Family Court held a fact-finding hearing. The mother testified that, when the parties separated in 2008, the father signed an "agreement," which was admitted into evidence. The document, entitled "Separation Agreement," provided that the mother would have sole physical custody of the child, that the father would pay child support in a certain amount, and that the father acknowledged that the mother would be relocating with the child. The document, signed by the parties, stated that the father "D[id] Not Want Custody of [the child]," and that the mother agreed to forego maintenance from him. The mother testified that the parties' divorce was finalized on July 26, 2010. She explained that, on the day they were in court with respect to their matrimonial action, the father approached her to resolve the outstanding custody issues. The parties entered into a "Custody Agreement," which was also admitted into evidence at the fact-finding hearing. That agreement, which was signed by the parties and notarized, provided, inter alia, that the child would "be in her mother's care during Georgia school year. [The child] will have visits with her father ... during summer [break] and spring [b]reak and every other Christmas." The mother testified that she filed her custody petition in September 2008 when the father refused to return the child after a visit, despite the parties' prior informal custody arrangement set forth in the "Separation Agreement." The mother explained that she attempted to have the police intervene, but that the father told them that the mother was trying to kidnap the child and the police instructed the mother to go to Family Court to find out if a custody proceeding had been commenced. She stated that the father had kept the child ever since that time.

Family Court denied the mother's custody and relocation petitions and granted the father's custody petition on the grounds that, although both parents were fit, the child should not be uprooted from the home she had known since 2008. The Appellate Division reversed. It found that the Family Court did not give appropriate weight to the credible evidence before it, including the testimony of the parties and witnesses, one of whom was a forensic evaluator. In determining that the child should remain with the father, the family court found that, while both parents were fit, the home atmosphere provided by the father was warm and congenial, with relatives residing within the home and nearby. The Appellate Division found that while the father had relatives living in the area, the living conditions provided by the father raised a significant concern since the child shared a bedroom with the grandmother in a one-bedroom apartment and lived with her father and two adult uncles. This situation was far from being in the child's best interests, especially as she grows older, in view of the fact that the child had her own bedroom in her mother's three-bedroom house which the child shared only with her mother and her mother's husband. Although the child had been residing with the father since 2008, the mother immediately filed a petition for sole physical custody in 2008. Thus, the fact that the child had been residing with the father and not the mother since that time was not a factor which weighed in favor of awarding custody to the father since the amount of time that elapsed between the filing of the mother's petition and the Family Court's determination on the petitions should not be weighed against the mother. The mother, who did not have custody during that time period, visited with the child in New York, and the child spent the summer of 2012 in Georgia with the mother. The mother also mailed the child packages of clothing, school supplies, and toys. While the recommendation of a court-appointed evaluator is not determinative, it is a factor to be considered and is entitled to some weight. Thus, the Family Court should have given more than minimal weight to the report and testimony of the forensic evaluator who interviewed the parties and the child, and conducted psychological testing. The forensic evaluator found that the child was at ease with her mother despite their separation, and concluded that the mother was the more appropriate custodial parent because she was in a stable relationship, employed, had gone to great lengths to regain custody, and would provide a stable home for the child. Significantly, the psychologist expressed detailed concerns about the father's psychological state, and the impact of his psychological state upon his parenting abilities, and noted that he minimized past incidents of domestic violence between the parties. In the forensic report, which was admitted in evidence, there were statements that, at the last minute, the father would cancel activities that the mother had planned in advance for the child. This evidence called into question the father's ability to continue to foster the child's relationship with the mother. Moreover, the parties entered into a "Custody Agreement" whereby they agreed that the child would live in Georgia during the school year. The father acknowledged that he executed this agreement. It did not appear that the Family Court gave any consideration to this agreement. In addition, the father's testimony as to why he did not abide by the agreement concerned the Court as to the father's ability to assure that there would continue to be meaningful contact between the mother and the child. Finally, the mother established by a preponderance of the evidence that moving to Georgia was in the child's best interests. In addition to being able to provide superior living conditions, the mother had already chosen a school and a medical care provider for the child, and she testified that she would promote liberal visitation with the father over almost all of the school breaks. The Appellate Division held that Family Court should have granted the mother's petitions for sole physical custody of the child and for permission to relocate to Georgia with the child.

Attorney's Fees - Charging Lien Available to Extent That Equitable Distribution Award Reflects Creation of a New Fund - Law Firm Not Entitled to a Money Judgment Absent Commencement of Plenary Action

In Wasserman v Wasserman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3732449 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the judgment of divorce directed that the defendant would receive a distributive award of $1,841,500. The law firm that represented the defendant in the matrimonial action, alleging that the defendant still owed it legal fees of $47,236.73 and that the defendant was about to sell the former marital residence, moved to establish a charging lien pursuant to Judiciary Law § 475 of $47,236.73, for leave to enter a money judgment in its favor and against the defendant, which included interest, in the sum of $69,133.86, and, upon the closing of sale of the former marital residence, to direct the defendant's real estate attorney, her agent, title company, or anyone acting on the defendant's behalf to hold in escrow the sum of $69,133.86 to be paid to the law firm. The defendant acknowledged that she owed the law firm money, but argued that she was waiting to receive her entire distributive award before paying the law firm. Supreme Court denied the law firm's motion. The Appellate Division modified the order. It observed that in a matrimonial action, a charging lien will be available 'to the extent that an equitable distribution award reflects the creation of a new fund by an attorney greater than the value of the interest already held by the client. It found that the firm established its prima facie entitlement to a charging lien of $47,236.73. It demonstrated that it entered into a retainer agreement with the defendant, which explained the term of its compensation and the nature of services; the firm showed that it regularly sent invoices to the defendant and that the defendant never objected to them; that the attorney client relationship ended upon mutual consent, with the entry of the judgment of divorce and that the defendant's award of the net proceeds from the sale of the former marital residence, which included an award for the defendant's interest in the plaintiff's business, was obtained during its representation of the defendant and was not an interest already held by the defendant. Therefore, Supreme Court should have granted the law firm's motion to establish a charging lien of $47,236.73. and an order directing, upon the closing of sale of the former marital residence, it be paid the sum of $47,236.73. The Appellate Division held that an attorney may enforce a charging lien simply by making a petition to the court in the proceeding where he or she appeared, rather than having to bring a separate plenary action. However, a law firm is not entitled to a money judgment against a former client pursuant to Judiciary Law § 475, absent the commencement of a plenary action. Therefore, the Court properly denied the law firm's motion for leave to enter a money judgment against the defendant, which included interest, in the sum of $69,133.86.

Divorce - Grounds - Domestic Relations Law §170(7) - Wife Judicially Estopped from Claiming Breakdown Not Irretrievable Based upon Sworn Admission in Complaint - Counsel Fees for Outstanding Fees Denied for Lack of Documentation

In Alvarado v Alvarado, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3718509 (N.Y.Sup.) the husband moved for summary judgment on the ground that the parties' marriage has broken down irretrievably for a period in excess of six months. He submitted an affidavit that the marriage had broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months. He stated in his affidavit that there is "absolutely no chance of a reconciliation" and that the marriage has been over for years. In his Verified Answer and Counterclaim he swore that the marriage has been irretrievably broken since October 1, 2011. The wife opposed the motion claiming that the marriage had not broken down irretrievably, and argued that this raised a triable question of fact. Supreme Court held that the wife was judicially estopped from making this claim. The doctrine of judicial estoppel prevents a party from taking an adverse or inconsistent position on an issue simply because their interests have changed. The wife argued that she was a religious Catholic and was opposed to divorce. However, in the her Verified Complaint she swore that the parties' marriage had broken down irretrievably for a period of at least six months prior to the commencement of the action. This sworn to admission was repeated in the Preliminary Conference Order, which stated that the issue of grounds was resolved in wife's favor under DRL §170(7). In addition, the parties' entered into a separate "Grounds Order", which reaffirmed that the issue of grounds was resolved with the understanding that a judgment could not be issued until the resolution of maintenance, equitable distribution and counsel fees. Supreme Court observed that under DRL§170(7) one party's sworn statement that the marriage has broken down irretrievably for a period of six months is sufficient to establish grounds. See Townes v. Coker, 35 Misc.3d 543 (Sup.Ct. Nassau County 2012); See also Filstein v. Bromberg, 36 Misc. 404 (Sup.Ct. New York County 2011); See also DRL § 170(7). The husband's motion for summary judgment was granted. The Court directed that judgment shall be held in abeyance until the issues of maintenance, equitable distribution, counsel fees, costs, and disbursements of this action have been resolved.

The Court denied the wife's requests for counsel fees relating to this motion on the ground that neither Wife, nor her counsel provided adequate documentation to show the nature of the legal services rendered. Thus, there was insufficient evidence to support an award for outstanding fees already incurred. Mimran v. Mimran, 83 AD3d 550 (1st Dept.2011). The retainer agreement alone is insufficient to obtain counsel fees. The wife's attorney provided an approximation of time spent in relation to the Motion. In order to receive an award of counsel fees there must be sufficient documentation in the form of time records, including the time expended relative to each service. Barson v. Barson, 32 AD3d 872 (2d Dept.2006); See also, Darvas v. Darvas, 242 A.D.2d 554 (2d Dept.1997). Counsel's affirmation in support of Wife's application, without supporting billing documentation, was insufficient to meet this burden. See Reynolds v. Reynolds, 300

A.D.2d 645 (2d Dept.2002). Therefore, the application for counsel fees was denied without prejudice to renew upon a proper showing at or before trial.

Maintenance Pendente Lite - Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a] - Award - Court Holds That Maintaining Status Quo (Pre-separation Standard of Living)Not a Basis for Maintenance Award in Case of this Magnitude.

In Westreich v Westreich, 2014 WL 3817585 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 51170(U) the parties were married in 2001 and had two unemancipated boys. The action was commenced on May 14, 2013 and on October 8, 2013 the parties executed a custody agreement where it was agreed that the parties would share parenting time and residential custody of the Children on a 50/50 basis. In the Custody Agreement, the parties agreed that the "Father shall pendente lite pay all house and home related bills consistent with the pre-separation past practices of the parties ...". Supreme Court found that the parties, during the marriage, amassed a substantial portfolio of real estate holdings as well as other significant assets. The parties lifestyle was described by the court as one of extreme excess. There was no limitation to the parties' spending. The Husband sought an order directing the Wife to return $2,053,976.35 removed from the parties joint account on April 12, 2013 to be utilized for the parties' living expenses and providing that those funds be placed back in the joint 237 Account and utilized solely by the Husband for the family's living expenses. Approximately one year prior to commencement, the Husband, at the Wife's request, transferred $1 million dollars from the 237 Park Account into the Wife's name alone. 32 days before the commencement of the action the Wife removed more than $2 million dollars from the 237 Park Account. The wife had over $3 million dollars in her control and possession, leaving $1.5 million dollars for the Husband to pay all of the family expenses from the 237 Park Account. The Husband claimed that the money has been exhausted which forced him to liquidate bonds purchased with 237 Park monies to fund the family expenses during this litigation. The Wife requested that the Husband maintain the status quo during the course of the litigation from his earnings. She further argued that the Husband was not providing sufficient spousal and child support to have the "lifestyle commensurate with their pre-separation lifestyle and that was forced to utilize her equitable distribution. The Wife alleged that the parties enjoyed an approximate $2.8 million dollar yearly lifestyle, not inclusive of the costs paid through the Husband's businesses. The Wife acknowledged that their lavish lifestyle was mainly funded by liquidation events and not typical yearly earnings. The Husband's request for an order directing the Wife to return and deposit $2,053,976.35 of the funds removed from the parties' 237 Park Account to be utilized solely by the Husband for family living expenses was denied. The Court calculated temporary maintenance based upon the statutory income cap using the payor's income of $543,000.00 to arrive at $162,900.00. The court considered the disparity in the parties income and the parties' pre-separation lifestyle, as well as the transfer of over $2 million dollars made by the Wife from the parties' 237 Park Account. It stated that the money removed by the Wife from the 237 Park Account was an advance of the Wife's equitable distribution, regardless of the fact that the parties' both admitted that they used the funds in this account, derived from the liquidation event of the sale of 237 Park Avenue, to fund their lifestyle. This was the reason why the Husband's motion seeking the return of the funds from the Wife was denied. The husband consented to pay a long list of expenses set forth in the courts decision on behalf of the wife and children, which cost approximately $136,000 a month, in amounts consistent with prior practice, without prejudice and on a pendente lite basis, which the Court directed him to pay .

The court, cognizant of the fact that the parties lived a lifestyle most people could hardly fathom, pointed out that the wife argued that the status quo must be maintained during this litigation. It was this Court's belief that the legislative intent of making the status quo a factor in determining temporary maintenance was not meant for a case of this magnitude. It was this Court's belief that the status quo was meant to maintain the comforts of the lifestyle to which one has become accustomed; however, there must be a limit to such comforts. The court directed that the Husband provide the Wife with temporary maintenance of $30,000.00 per month in direct spousal support. The Husband was ordered to pay the Wife's JP Morgan and American Express credit card in a timely manner, each month at $10,000.00 each per month. In addition, the Husband was directed to provide the Wife, on the first of each month with an additional $10,000.00. The Husband had been making all payments for all items for the Children. Since the Husband was making all payments for the Children, the Wife's request for child support was denied. The Husband was directed to pay and maintain all club memberships to which the parties were currently members.

Counsel Fees - Award - Improper to Direct Nonmonied Spouse, Pay a Substantial Portion of the Counsel Fees of the Monied Spouse.

Property Determination - Where a Party Fails to Trace Sources of Money Claimed to Be Separate Property, a Court May Treat it as Marital Property.

In Hymowitz v Hymowitz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3445051 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), plaintiff and the defendant were married on April 10, 1988, and had two children, both over the age of 21. Following 20 years of marriage, the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce. The Appellate Division found that the transfer of a 1/3 interest in Weinstein & Holtzman, Inc., a family-owned hardware store, to the plaintiff from his father and uncle which occurred during the marriage was tantamount to a "gift from a party other than the spouse" and, thus, was the separate property of the plaintiff not subject to equitable distribution (Domestic Relations Law s 236[B][1][d][1]). However, it found that the Supreme Court should have awarded the defendant a 25% share of the appreciation in the value of the plaintiff's interest in Weinstein & Holtzman to take into account the defendant's limited involvement in the plaintiff's business, while not ignoring the direct and indirect contributions she made as the primary caretaker of the parties' children, as a homemaker, and as a social companion to the plaintiff, while foregoing her career.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improperly classified the plaintiff's 1/3 interest in BSHPark Row, LLC, a holding company whose sole asset is a building located at 29 Park Row in lower Manhattan in which the hardware store was situated, as his separate property not subject to equitable distribution. Property acquired during the marriage is presumed to be marital property and the party seeking to overcome such presumption has the burden of proving that the property in dispute is separate property. BSH was formed and the building was acquired during the marriage, and the plaintiff failed to meet his burden of tracing the use of claimed separate funds to establish that they were used for the purchase of his portion of the property's acquisition costs. Where, as here, a party fails to trace sources of money claimed to be separate property, a court may treat it as marital property. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should have awarded the defendant a 25% share of the plaintiff's interest in BSH.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff a credit against the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence for 100% of the payments he made to reduce the principal balance of the mortgage during the divorce proceedings. The plaintiff was entitled to a credit of only 50% of the reduction in mortgage principal because generally, it is the responsibility of both parties to maintain the marital residence during the pendency of a matrimonial action.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should have awarded the defendant a credit against the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence for the amount of money the plaintiff withdrew from the parties' home equity line of credit account to pay his attorney's fees and expert's fees. This effectively made the defendant, the nonmonied spouse, pay a substantial portion of the counsel fees of the monied spouse, the plaintiff, in violation of Domestic Relations Law § 237 and, therefore, was improper.

The parties received a tax refund for tax year 2008 in the amount of $4,652, which was placed in escrow. The Appellate Division held that since the matrimonial action was commenced on October 27, 2008, 82.2% of the refund was marital property and that the distribution should be 50% to each party. Therefore, the defendant was entitled to a credit in the sum of $1,911.97.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in failing to direct that the plaintiff contribute his pro rata share of the younger child's unreimbursed reasonable health care expenses (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][c][5], and erred in refusing to award the defendant retroactive child support for the periods of time when the older child resided with her prior to the older child's emancipation and when the younger child resided with her. By statute, child support should be awarded retroactive to the date an application for such support was made, which, in this case, was the date upon which the defendant served her motion for pendente lite child support. It noted that in calculating the plaintiff's retroactive support obligation, the court should determine the amount of payments made by him on behalf of the defendant and children under the pendente lite order, which required him to pay the carrying charges for the marital residence. To the extent that these payments can appropriately be allocated to temporary child support rather than temporary maintenance, the plaintiff should be permitted to offset such payments against accrued arrears.

Counsel Fees - Award - Timeliness - under Domestic Relations Law §237, a Motion for an Award of Attorney's Fees must Be Made Prior to Final Judgment

In Matter of Silver v Green,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3450029 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), after a final order was rendered in connection with the father's petition to modify the visitation provisions of a so-ordered stipulation of settlement, the father moved for an award of an attorney's fee, mostly for services rendered after the proceeding for the modification of visitation had been determined. The mother cross-moved for an award of an attorney's fee for legal expenses that she incurred in opposing the petition seeking modification of visitation, as well as for legal services rendered after the proceeding had been determined. Family Court denied the father's motion, awarded the mother $40,000 "as and for the fees attributed to the modification of visitation" proceeding, and otherwise denied the mother's cross motion. The Appellate Division observed that Domestic Relations Law § 237(b) provides, that applications for the award of fees and expenses may be made at any time or times prior to final judgment. Under Domestic Relations Law §237, a motion for an award of attorney's fees must be made prior to final judgment. Postjudgment applications for fees may only be granted for legal services and expenses incurred after rendition of the final judgment. (Taylor v. Taylor, 120 A.D.2d 355, 356; see LeVigne v. LeVigne, 220 A.D.2d 561). It held that the mother's cross motion for an award of an attorney's fee in connection with her opposition to the petition seeking modification of visitation should have been denied as untimely, since the cross motion was made after a final order of visitation had been entered in the modification proceeding. To the extent that the mother also sought an award of an attorney's fee for services rendered in connection with matters that postdated the issuance of the final order of visitation in the modification proceeding, the Family Court did not improvidently deny that request. The father's motion for an award of an attorney's fee was properly denied, based on his failure to substantially comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.3 (Sherman v. Sherman, 34 AD3d 670, 671; Wagman v. Wagman, 8 AD3d 263).

Counsel Fees - Award - Although Plaintiff Wife's Income Was Higher than Defendants Income Judicial Hearing Officer Properly Awarded the Plaintiff Attorneys' Fees Where the Delays in Bringing the Action to Conclusion Were Directly Attributable to the Defendant.

In Odermatt v Odermatt,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3450168 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), under the parties 2010 agreement settling their divorce action, the parties waived a hearing on the plaintiff's prospective application for attorneys' fees. The plaintiff's attorney submitted an affirmation and invoices detailing the legal services provided to the plaintiff, and reflecting charges totaling $57,479. The plaintiff's attorney noted in his affirmation that the plaintiff had paid her previous attorney the sum of $5,420, raising her total legal fees to $62,899. The plaintiff also submitted an affidavit alleging that the defendant's conduct had delayed the litigation and caused her to incur substantial fees, and requesting that she be awarded the sum of $30,000, representing approximately one-half of the attorneys' fees she had expended in prosecuting the action. The defendant opposed the plaintiff's application for attorneys' fees, pointing out that her income was higher than his income, and alleging that it was her conduct that delayed the litigation. The Judicial Hearing Officer awarded the plaintiff attorneys' fees of $62,899, the full sum expended, finding that the delays in bringing the action to conclusion were directly attributable to the defendant. The Appellate Division observed that an award of attorney's fees pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 237(a) is controlled by the equities and circumstances of each particular case. In determining whether to award fees, the court should review the financial circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions and whether either party has engaged in conduct or taken positions resulting in a delay of the proceedings or unnecessary litigation. It held that although the plaintiff's income was higher than the defendant's, the Judicial Hearing Officer providently exercised his discretion in determining that she was entitled to attorneys' fees based on his finding that the defendant's conduct delayed the litigation. However, in light of the relative financial circumstances of the parties, the Judicial Hearing Officer should not have determined that the plaintiff was entitled to the full $62,899 in legal fees she incurred, rather than the $30,000 she requested. It modified the order appealed from, and the money judgment, by awarding the plaintiff the principal sum of $20,000, representing the $30,000 she requested minus a $10,000 credit to which the parties stipulated the defendant was entitled.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Agreements - Construction - "Cohabits" - Appellate Division Rejects Argument That "Cohabits" Should Be Read to Mean Merely That the Wife Reside with Any Other Person for the Requisite Time Period, with No Showing of Any Sexual, Romantic or Economic Relationship Required

In Vega v Papaleo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3360341 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Plaintiff (wife) and defendant (husband) were divorced in 2012 pursuant to a judgment that incorporated a September 2008 memorandum of understanding. The MOU included a provision by which the husband would make maintenance payments, scheduled to terminate after a set period or upon certain occurrences, including the wife's remarriage or cohabitation with another individual. In October 2012, the husband moved to cease making these payments based upon the wife's alleged cohabitation with her mother and stepfather. Supreme Court denied the motion. The Appellate affirmed. It observed that the agreement provided for maintenance payments in a specified sum until, as pertinent here, "[the wife] cohabits with an individual for any period in excess of 75 days within any 6-month period of time." The agreement failed to provide any definition of the term "cohabits." The husband contended that this provision unambiguously stated the parties' intention, and that "cohabits" should be read in this context to mean merely that the wife reside with any other person for the requisite time period, with no showing of any sexual, romantic or economic relationship required. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly rejected this argument, finding that the term could not be fairly read to encompass the husband's broad interpretation. It noted that the parties entered into this agreement following Graev v. Graev (11 NY3d 262 [2008]), in which the Court of Appeals carefully reviewed several potential definitions of the term "cohabitation." The Court held that neither case law nor dictionary usage provided an authoritative or plain meaning. However, while no single factor—such as residing at the same address, functioning as a single economic unit, or involvement in a romantic or sexual relationship, is determinative, the Court found that a "common element" in the various dictionary definitions is that they refer to people living together "in a relationship or manner resembling or suggestive of marriage". It found that there is no authoritative definition or customary usage of the term that could include residing with a parent. The husband's assertion that the phrase "with an individual" informs the term "cohabits" in such a manner as to omit a requirement of any showing of an intimate or romantic relationship was wholly contrary to the governing precedent, and unavailing.

Property Determination - Marital Property - Wife's Separate Property Became Marital Property Subject to Equitable Distribution upon Her Transfer of the Deed into the Parties' Joint Names. The Decision to Award a Separate Property Origination Credit in Such a Situation Is a Determination Left to the Sound Discretion of Supreme Court.

In Myers v Myers, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3360378 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), six years before the parties' marriage in June 2000, plaintiff (wife) became the sole owner of real property, which would later become the parties' marital residence. At the time of marriage, the wife owned the property free and clear of any liens or encumbrances. In 2005, in an effort to consolidate debt, defendant (husband) and the wife jointly applied for a mortgage on the property. To satisfy the requirements of the mortgage lender, the husband's name had to appear on the deed to the residence. On March 31, 2005, the wife executed a deed conveying ownership of the residence from her alone to both her and the husband. A mortgage was issued jointly to the parties that same day. In December 2011, the wife commenced the action for divorce on the basis that the parties' marriage was irretrievably broken. The parties executed an interim agreement, as well as a subsequent stipulation and opting out agreement, resolving all issues but the distribution of the marital residence and the debt attached thereto, which had amounted to approximately $160,000. After trial Supreme Court found that the marital residence and its accompanying debt should be equally divided between the parties. A judgment of divorce incorporated Supreme Court's findings. In denying the wife a separate property origination credit in the amount of $165,000 for the estimated value of the marital residence at the time that she transferred it to herself and the husband jointly Supreme Court indicated that it was bound by the decision in Campfield v. Campfield (95 AD3d 1429 [2012]). Supreme Court referred to the portion of Campfield that differentiated between a credit for marital property that is "acqui[red]" from separate property, i.e., by using the proceeds of the sale of separate property to purchase marital property, and marital property that originates from the "transmut[ation]" of separate property, i.e., by transferring the deed of separately held property into joint names (id. at 1430).

The wife appealed arguing that this portion of Campfield was inconsistent with the general principles of equitable distribution law. The Appellate Division observed that unlike the appellant in Campfield, the wife here admitted that the property in question was marital. She agreed that the residence became marital property subject to equitable distribution upon her transfer of the deed into the parties' joint names in 2005. Therefore, the case was distinguishable from Campfield. As such, the court did not have to address the wife's argument that transfer of the deed was intended " 'solely for the purpose of convenience,' " a consideration that is relevant only in determining whether property is marital or separate in the first instance. However, the Appellate Division held that to the limited extent that Campfield may be read to limit a court's discretion to award a separate property credit to a spouse, like the wife, who transmutes separate property into marital property without changing the nature of the property itself, it should no longer be followed. As the court subsequently noted without reference to the way in which a marital asset was acquired, credits are often given for the value of the former separate property. It had also subsequently explained that the decision to award a separate property origination credit in such a situation is a determination left to the sound discretion of Supreme Court (see Alecca v. Alecca, 111 AD3d at 1128; Murray v. Murray, 101 AD3d at 1321). Therefore, the Court's own jurisprudence subsequent to Campfield indicated that such credit is not precluded as a matter of law when separate property has been transmuted into marital property.

Despite the foregoing, the Appellate Division was unpersuaded that the denial of the wife's request for a separate property origination credit constituted an abuse of discretion. Supreme Court found that the overall picture was of the parties engaging generally in a financial partnership, of which the marital residence, and the loans thereupon, was simply one agreed-upon portion. The funds received from the mortgage, as well as the subsequent refinancing and home equity loan, enabled the wife and the husband to consolidate their debts, go on numerous family vacations, make improvements to the marital residence and, generally, live a lifestyle that may have been above their means. Notably, the wife's individual debt was eliminated by the proceeds of a new, jointly-held debt which, in turn, was primarily paid from the husband's income for a number of years. Inasmuch as a separate property origination credit "is not strictly mandated since the property is no longer separate, but is part of the total marital property it could not say that Supreme Court improperly denied the wife a credit. If also found no error in Supreme Court's determination that the marital residence and its associated debt should be equally divided between the parties.

Judgments - Required Notice - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(7)(d) - Failure to Provide Required Notice Does Not Require Reversal.

In Fridmann-Harkiewicz v. Harkiewicz--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 3377271 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that although defendant was correct that the court failed to include the required notice pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(7)(d) in the judgment, the court's failure does not require reversal (see Mejia v. Mejia, 106 A.D.3d 786, 789, 964 N.Y.S.2d 607). Rather, it modified by including that notice and added a provision pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(7)(d) notifying the parties of their right to seek a modification of the child support.

Divorce - Consent - Divorce Properly Granted on Consent of the Parties, Based upon So-ordered Stipulation Entered into Prior to Trial and an Affidavit of the Plaintiff

In Lewis v Lewis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2869065 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the defendant appealed from a judgment which awarded plaintiff a divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment, allocated the marital personal property and debt between the parties after directing the equitable distribution of marital personal property and debt, failed to equitably distribute the parties' real property, failed to award him maintenance, and directed him to pay 27% of the college costs of the parties' daughter.

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the plaintiff's contentions, the divorce was properly granted on the consent of the parties, based upon a so-ordered stipulation that had been entered into prior to trial and an affidavit of the plaintiff acknowledging that, for a period of at least one year prior to the commencement of this divorce action, the defendant willfully, unjustifiably, and continuously refused to engage in sexual relations with him despite his repeated requests.

It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court, for a new determination on the issue of the allocation of marital personal property and marital debt and a determination on the issue of the allocation of marital real property and for a new determination on the issue of maintenance.

It held that Supreme Court erred in directing defendant to pay college expenses for the parties' daughter, who was only 15 years old at the time of trial. While the court may direct a parent to contribute to a child's college education pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(c)(7), under the circumstances of this case, based upon the child's age, and the lack of evidence presented as to her interest in and possible choice of college, a directive compelling the plaintiff to pay for those expenses was premature and not supported by the evidence.

Family Offense Proceedings - Family Court Act § 262(a) - Right to Counsel - Order of Protection Reversed Where Father Denied Right to Counsel

In Matter of Cerquin v Visintin--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2869415 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order of protection where the appellant was denied his right to counsel. The appellant was advised of his right to counsel, in accordance with Family Court Act § 262(a), at his first court appearance on August 27, 2012. However, on August 30, 2012, after the Family Court determined that the appellant was ineligible for the assignment of counsel, he was advised that he would have to represent himself. When the hearing commenced on March 12, 2013, the appellant requested the assistance of counsel to defend himself against the petitioner's "strong accusations." The Family Court ascertained the petitioner's weekly salary, and advised him that he was ineligible for the assignment of counsel. The Family Court then proceeded with the hearing without conducting an inquiry to determine whether the appellant wished to represent himself, advising the appellant of the risks of proceeding pro se, or informing him that he could request an adjournment in order to attempt to secure counsel. The record indicated that the appellant clearly did not wish to proceed without counsel, did not initially realize that he was being required to represent himself, and did not have a basic understanding of court proceedings. Under these circumstances, the appellant was deprived of his statutory right to counsel.

Child Support - Downward Modification - Loss of Employment - Court Modifies Child Support Order but Denies Restitution Based upon Strong Public Policy

In Matter of Jaffie v Wickline, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2958438 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that in order to establish his entitlement to a downward modification of his child support obligation, the father had the burden of showing a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances since the time the parties executed their stipulation of settlement in 2006 (Family Ct. Act § 451[2][a]; L. 2010, ch. 182, s 13). A parent seeking a downward modification based upon loss of employment must submit evidence demonstrating that the termination occurred through no fault of the parent and that the parent has diligently sought re-employment. Here, the father demonstrated that his loss of employment and obtainment of new employment at a lesser salary constituted a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances, and that he made a good faith effort to obtain new employment which was commensurate with his qualifications and experience. Thus, the Support Magistrate's determination was supported by the evidence.

The Appellate Division held that in light of the circumstances of this case and the strong public policy against restitution or recoupment of support overpayments, the Family Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in sustaining the mother's objection to the Support Magistrate's determination that the father was entitled to a credit against his child support arrears based on his prior voluntary overpayments and, thereupon, in effect, granting the mother's enforcement petition to the extent of directing the entry of a money judgment in favor of the mother and against him in the principal sum of $8,950.

Custody - Award - Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Requires Reversal of Custody Order

In Matter of William O. v Michele A., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2973418 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Petitioner (father) and respondent Michele A. were the unmarried parents of three children (born in 2006, 2007 and 2009). While the father was incarcerated, custody of the children was awarded to the children's maternal grandparents, respondents John A. and Wanda A.. In anticipation of his release from prison, the father commenced a proceeding seeking custody of the youngest child. During subsequent appearances before Family Court, the court continued custody with the grandparents, but awarded the father supervised visitation with all three children. Finally, after an appearance before Family Court in July 2012, the court determined, without holding a fact-finding hearing, that the father was an untreated sex offender and entered an order that modified the supervised visitation schedule, but conditioned any consideration of future custody modification petitions filed by the father on his completing sex offender treatment.

The Appellate Division agreed with the father that he had been denied the effective assistance of counsel. Family Court continued supervised visitation and denied the father's custody application, without holding a fact-finding hearing, based upon its belief that he was an untreated sex offender. This belief came from information provided to Family Court by the attorney for the children that was based on evidence outside of the record, the accuracy of which was challenged by the father, and with no evidence presented as to whether a lack of treatment would be detrimental to the children. The record demonstrated that Family Court improperly relied upon the attorney for the children as both an investigative arm of the court and as an advisor, referring to her as the court's "quarterback" and regularly deferring to her recommendations in reaching its determinations (see Weiglhofer v. Weiglhofer, 1 AD3d 786, 788 n [2003]). The failure of the father's counsel to object to this improper use of the attorney for the children or to request a fact-finding hearing regarding the issues of sex offender treatment and the best interests of the children rendered the representation less than meaningful. Accordingly, Family Court's order had to be reversed and the matter remitted to the Family Court for further proceedings.

Special Relief - Life Insurance - Not an Abuse of Discretion to Direct a Party to Obtain Life Insurance in Absence of Evidence at Trial That the Party Was Currently Uninsurable Due to a Pre-existing Medical Condition

In Hainsworth v Hainsworth, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2594812 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly considered the relevant factors, which included the long duration of the marriage, the disparity in the parties' incomes, the plaintiff's limited earning potential, the plaintiff's limited assets, the insignificant distributive award, and the parties' predivorce standard of living, and providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff maintenance of $1,500 per month until the earlier of the plaintiff attaining the age of 62, her remarriage, or her death.

The Appellate Division observed that a court need not rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated future potential earnings. It held that Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in imputing defendant's 2008 reported income to him for the purpose of determining his child support obligation, as that amount was reflective of his "past income" and "demonstrated earning potential".

In the absence of any evidence at trial that the defendant was currently uninsurable due to a pre-existing medical condition, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in directing the defendant to maintain a life insurance policy to secure his maintenance and child support obligations. However, the judgment was modified to provide that the defendant's life insurance obligation shall terminate upon the termination of his maintenance and child support obligations.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Maintenance - Award - Durational - Although Plaintiff Did Not Submit Medical Evidence or Testimony Concerning Her Disability, Fact That the Social Security Administration Determined That She Was Disabled Coupled with Her Testimony Was Sufficient to Support Maintenance Determination

In Myers v Myers, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2619911 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division rejected defendant's contention that Supreme Court abused its discretion in awarding maintenance for a 10-year period. As the court noted, there was a "vast discrepancy" in the incomes of the parties, with plaintiff's sole source of income consisting of Social Security Disability payments. During most of the 13-year marriage, plaintiff raised the parties' two children while defendant was the sole wage earner. The parties enjoyed a relatively comfortable standard of living during the marriage. In setting the duration of maintenance, the court determined that, even if plaintiff were able to find a job, she would never approach her pre-divorce standard of living, while defendant "clearly can." Plaintiff testified at trial that she was permanently disabled as a result of bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome and a severed nerve in her left hand. Although plaintiff did not submit medical evidence or testimony concerning her disability, the undisputed fact that the Social Security Administration determined that she was disabled as of 2000 and that she continued to receive SSD, coupled with her testimony, was sufficient to support the court's maintenance determination.

Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine Applied to Family Court Application to Vacate Default and to Appeal from Denial of Motion

In Matter of Shehatou v Louka, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2620533 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), Family Court issued an order, entered upon respondent's default, in which it determined that respondent was in willful violation of a prior support order, and committing respondent to six months of incarceration, and also issued a warrant for respondent's arrest. Respondent filed an application to vacate both orders. The court refused to sign the order to show cause seeking to vacate the orders and, in its "order of dismissal," determined that the fugitive disentitlement doctrine applied to respondent inasmuch as respondent, a California resident who was now the subject of an arrest warrant in this State, but who refused to return to this State, was attempting to "evade the law while simultaneously seeking its protection" (Matter of Skiff-Murray v. Murray, 305 A.D.2d 751) The Appellate Division affirmed. It held that the court properly determined that the fugitive disentitlement theory applied to his application and concluded that the fugitive disentitlement doctrine also applied to the appeal. By respondent's "default and absence, he was evading the very orders from which [he] seeks appellate relief and 'has willfully made [himself] unavailable to obey the mandate of the [court] in the event of an affirmance.'" It dismissed the appeal and granted leave to respondent to move to reinstate it on the condition that, within 60 days of service of a copy of the order of this Court with notice of entry, he posts an undertaking with the court in the amount of $25,000, i.e., the amount of child support respondent owed at the time the court determined that he willfully violated the prior support order.

Child Support - Award - Calculation of Award - Error to Provide for Social Security Deduction on Full Amount of Imputed Income Which Was Higher than Social Security Wage Limit Allows

In Belkhir v Amrane-Belkhir,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2782129 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the court erred in two respects in the manner in which plaintiff's child support obligation was calculated. Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(5)(vii)(H), "federal insurance contributions act (FICA) taxes actually paid" shall be deducted from income prior to determining the combined parental income. The social security part of FICA is paid by taxpayers up to a specific income cap, and the amount of that cap generally increases year to year. Here, the court erred in its FICA calculation for 2011 because, after the court had imputed income of $140,000 to plaintiff for 2011, it calculated plaintiff's FICA deduction as if he would have paid the social security portion of FICA on the full amount of his imputed income, which was considerably higher than the social security wage limit in 2011. The Court also erred in deducting FICA from plaintiff's Canadian income before calculating child support given that those taxes were not paid on the income he earned in Canada. "Since FICA taxes should be deducted only from income upon which FICA taxes are actually paid' prior to applying the provisions of Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(c) , the child support calculations based on plaintiff's Canadian income were erroneous. Plaintiff argues that deducting FICA from his Canadian income was appropriate because he paid taxes in Canada that are the equivalent of FICA. It modified by increasing the amount of plaintiff's child support obligation based on the court's FICA errors with respect to plaintiff's 2011 imputed income and the income he earned in Canada, in a sum to be determined upon remittal of the matter to Supreme Court for recalculation in accordance with our decision herein.

Motion to Intervene -Cplr 1013 - Motion Denied Where Husband Judicially Estopped from Denying Ownership of Family Pizza Business

In Zito v Zito, 2014 WL 2776603 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 50939(U) plaintiff commenced the action seeking a judgment of divorce on June 7, 2011. The parties were married on July 8, 2001 and had two children. During the marriage, the parties lived in a three-floor home that plaintiff purchased from his parents before the marriage; plaintiff vacated the premises in January 2013. Plaintiff worked at the family owned Pizzeria, the ownership of which was in issue. Defendant was a licensed pharmacist; she claimed that she has been a full time homemaker and caretaker for the children since they were born. The children attended private school and participate in piano lessons, art classes, Tae Kwon Do and soccer.

Smiling Pizzeria argued that it should be granted leave to intervene in this action pursuant to CPLR 1013, because there were common questions of law and fact, since it was seeking to establish that the business belongs to Santo Zito, the plaintiff's father, and was not subject to equitable distribution. Defendant argued that plaintiff always referred to Smiling Pizzeria as "his" since she first met him in 1994. Further, he had complete control over the operation of the business, including but not limited to hiring and firing employees, doing the payroll, signing documents, writing checks and ordering products. The wife averred that her father-in-law, Santo Zito, was involved in the business, but only "on a semi-retired, part-time basis." Defendant asserted that plaintiff himself swore to his ownership of Smiling Pizzeria in his two (2) affidavits of net worth dated September 16, 2010 and November 20, 2012. In addition, it was uncontroverted that he testified under oath at his deposition on June 10, 2013, that he was an owner of the business. Plaintiff also consented to have Brisbane do a forensic evaluation of the business and he himself paid the retainer, as ordered. Defendant also relied upon a stock certificate dated April 1, 1999, which indicated that plaintiff was the owner of 100 shares of the stock of Smiling Pizzeria, along with other documents that established that he was elected the Director, Vice-President and Secretary and that Santo Zito was resigning; she asserted that these documents were provided to her attorney by plaintiff's former counsel. Defendant further contended that New York Life issued a life insurance policy insuring plaintiff, in the amount of $500,000, with Smiling Pizzeria as the beneficiary; she argued that this policy supported her assertion that plaintiff was an owner of the business. Plaintiff alleged that Smiling Pizzeria was an S corporation owned by his father. He further argued that this was corroborated by the testimony of the accountant for Smiling Pizzeria wherein he testified at a deposition that plaintiff's father received the K-1 tax forms regarding the corporation and that no shares of the business were ever passed to plaintiff.

The Supreme Court held that in view of plaintiff's continuing representation that he owned a 50% interest in Smiling Pizzeria in the two (2) affidavits of net worth that he prepared with counsel; in his deposition testimony; in his conduct in agreeing that Brisbane would value his interest in the business and in paying the appraiser; and in supplying his former attorneys with documents that evidence his ownership interest, which documents were provided to defendant in discovery, plaintiff would not now be permitted to change his position and argue that Smiling Pizzeria was solely owned by his father. The court held that such conduct was not permitted pursuant to the doctrine of judicial estoppel. Under the doctrine of judicial estoppel, or estoppel against inconsistent positions, a party is precluded from inequitably adopting a position directly contrary to or inconsistent with an earlier assumed position in the same proceeding" (Nestor v. Britt, 270 A.D.2d 192, 193, 707 N.Y.S.2d 11 [1 Dept., 2000], quoting Maas v. Cornell Univ., 253 A.D.2d 1, 5, 683 N.Y.S.2d 634 [3 Dept., 1999], affd 94 N.Y.2d 87, 699 N.Y.S.2d 716 [1999]).

Nevertheless, the court denied the motion to intervene. Since the court could consider the dollar amount of plaintiff's interest in Smiling Pizzeria, and was not required to make an award that gives defendant an ownership interest in the business, Smiling Pizzeria had no interests to protect that would warrant an order permitting it to intervene in this matrimonial action.

Appeals - Right to Appeal - No Appeal Lies from Dicta

In Waldorf v Waldorf, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2198799 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that the statement challenged by the defendant in the order appealed from, that the plaintiff "should be given an opportunity to rebut the presumption that [his] separate asset[s] transmuted into marital property" upon being deposited into the parties' joint accounts, is dicta. It dismissed the appeal, as no appeal lies from dicta.

Child Support - Award - Income - Failure to Make FICA and Medicare Deductions Not Error Where Child Support Obligation Based Entirely on the "Statutory Cap" of $130,000

the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff durational maintenance of $5,000 per month until the parties' younger son graduates from high school in June 2014 and the marital residence is to be sold, and $6,500 thereafter, for a total period of 83 ½ months, or approximately seven years. This award afforded the plaintiff an opportunity to become self-supporting, after having been the stay-at-home parent for approximately 15 years of the marriage.. Although the Supreme Court failed to make the appropriate FICA and Medicare deductions, as required by Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(H), modification of the child support award was not warranted in view of the court's calculation of the defendant's child support obligation based entirely on the "statutory cap" of $130,000, and not on his total gross income as imputed by the court.

Child Support - Award - Deductions - Where Supreme Court Did Not Apply CSSA in Fixing Pendente Lite Child Support, There Is No Requirement That the Court Deduct the Amount Awarded for Carrying Charges Before Determining the Appropriate Amount of Child Support.

In Margolin v Margolin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2198439 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the plaintiff contend on appeal that the Supreme Court erred in directing him to pay both child support and the carrying charges on the marital residence because this resulted in a double shelter allowance. The Appellate Division found plaintiff's argument without merit. Since the Supreme Court did not apply the Child Support Standards Act in fixing pendente lite child support, there is no requirement that the court deduct the amount awarded for carrying charges before determining the appropriate amount of child support.

Agreements - Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - QDRO and Retirement Benefits Cases - Where DRO Inconsistent with the Provisions of a Stipulation or Judgment Courts Possess Authority to Amend the DRO to Accurately Reflect Provisions of the Stipulation Pertaining Pension Benefits

In Mondshein v Mondshien, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2198460 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that where a domestic relations order is inconsistent with the provisions of a stipulation or judgment of divorce, courts possess the authority to amend the domestic relations order to accurately reflect the provisions of the stipulation pertaining to the pension benefits. A proper domestic relations order obtained pursuant to a stipulation of settlement can convey only those rights to which the parties stipulated as a basis for the judgment. Pension benefits to the extent that they are earned or acquired before marriage or after commencement of a matrimonial action, constitute marital property. It found that the plain language of the stipulation of settlement governing the defendant's pension stated, in effect, that the plaintiff was entitled to receive 50% of the defendant's "accrued benefits," multiplied by a fraction, which the parties did not dispute was 11.92/14.30, and which represented the benefits the defendant earned during the marriage. However, the subject domestic relations order directed that the plaintiff was to receive 50% of that same fraction of the defendant's "maximum accrued benefits," without any reference to a limitation based on the benefits which accrued to the defendant during the marriage. Thus, Supreme Court erred in denying the defendant's motion to conform the domestic relations order to the stipulation of settlement.

Child Custody - Award - Jurisdiction - Domestic Relations Law §76 - Denial By Dominican Republic Court of Father's Hague Convention Petition for a Return of Child to New York Did Not Preempt New York Custody Proceeding

In Matter of Katz v Katz, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2198516 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father filed a petition for custody in the Family Court alleging that, on October 2, 2011, the mother took the parties' child, who had been residing in the Bronx, to the Dominican Republic without his permission. The Family Court held the matter in abeyance pending a determination in the Dominican Republic with regard to the father's application there for a return of the child pursuant to the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. On October 5, 2012, the Civil Chamber of the Court of Children and Adolescents of the Judicial District of Santo Domingo rejected the father's request for a return of the child, and directed that the child remain in the company of the mother in the Dominican Republic, finding that if the child were returned to the United States she would be exposed to a violation of her fundamental rights due to issues of domestic violence. Family Court dismissed the father's petition for custody, concluding that it was bound to do so pursuant to the order issued by the court in the Dominican Republic.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (Domestic Relations Law art 5-A) governs a New York State court's jurisdiction in international child custody matters. Domestic Relations Law § 76, which establishes initial child custody jurisdiction, provides, inter alia, that a court of this State has jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination if this State is the home state of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding (Domestic Relations Law §76[a]). "Home state" is defined as the state in which a child lived with a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a[7]). Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 75-d[1], a "court of this state shall treat a foreign country as if it were a state of the United States". The Convention provides that a child abducted in violation of rights of custody must be returned to his or her country of habitual residence, unless certain exceptions apply. A decision under the Convention is not a determination on the merits of any custody issue, but leaves custodial decisions to the courts of the country of habitual residence. It was undisputed that the United States was the child's country of habitual residence, and that, at the time the petition was filed, New York was the child's "home state." Thus, the Family Court had jurisdiction to determine the father's petition for custody. Moreover, the denial, by the court in the Dominican Republic, of the father's application for a return of the child pursuant to the Convention, did not preempt his custody proceeding (see In re T.L.B., 272 P3d 1148 [Colo App]). Accordingly, it held that the Family Court erred in dismissing the father's petition.

Child Custody - Award - Jurisdiction - Domestic Relations Law §76-f(3) - Inconvenient Forum - Upon Finding New York Is Inconvenient Forum Court Must Stay Proceedings on Condition That Custody Proceeding Be Commenced in More Convenient Forum

In Matter of McCarthy v. Brittingham-Bank, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2198533 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Family Court, upon finding that the State of North Carolina was the more appropriate forum to determine any custody and visitation matters, dismissed the petition. The Appellate Division reversed. It agreed with the Family Court that North Carolina was the more appropriate and convenient forum. The child had been living in North Carolina since at least October 2012, and any evidence as to his care, well-being, and personal relationships was more readily available in North Carolina. It noted that Domestic Relations Law § 76-f(3) specifies that "[i]f a court of this state determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum, it shall stay the proceedings upon condition that a child custody proceeding be promptly commenced in another designated state." It held that Family Court erred in dismissing the petition. The petition was reinstated, and the matter was remitted to the Family Court, for further proceedings pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §76-f(3), including entry of an order staying all proceedings on condition that a child custody proceeding be promptly commenced in North Carolina.

Appeals - Failure to Preserve Argument for Review Results in Affirmance Without Review

In Matter of Bray v Bray, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2516662 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), a child support proceeding, the father filed an objection with Family Court, specifically contending that the Support Magistrate erred in imputing $100,000 income to the father. Family Court denied the objection. The father appealed, arguing that the court erred in basing the child support award on the children's needs, as the record contained sufficient evidence of his income. The Appellate Division affirmed without addressing the merits of the father's appeal. It held that the father did not preserve this argument for review, as he did not include it as a specific objection to Family Court from the Support Magistrate's findings.

Appeals - Appellate Division Considers Appeal Despite Defects in Notice -Although Appeal Does Not Lie from a Support Magistrate's Order Notice of Appeal Treated as Validly Appealing from Family Court's Order Dismissing Objections - Error to Dismiss Objections for Lack of Signature Without Giving Opportunity to Correct Error.

In Matter of Fifield v Whiting,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2516699 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), under the parties' custody and child support agreement, which was later incorporated into their judgment of divorce, respondent (father) was required to pay, among other things, 50% of the child-care expenses incurred by petitioner (mother) that were related to her education or employment. The mother filed a petition alleging that the father violated the child support agreement by failing to pay for child-care expenses. Following a hearing, the Support Magistrate required that he pay $3,300 plus interest for overdue child-care expenses, and required that he pay the mother's counsel fees. In an amended order, the Support Magistrate specified the exact amount of counsel fees. Before the amended order was entered, the father's counsel filed a notice of appeal from the Support Magistrate's original order. The father's counsel filed written objections to the Support Magistrate's original order and the father, who was dissatisfied with his representation, filed his own objections. By order entered March 4, 2013, Family Court dismissed the objections filed by the father's counsel, because counsel failed to file proof of service with the court. The court dismissed the father's pro se objections, because they were not signed by counsel. The father did not file a notice of appeal from that order.

The Appellate Division considered the father's appeal despite the defects in his notice of appeal. Although no appeal lies from an order that has been amended-because the amended order supercedes the original order-dismissal of the appeal was unnecessary where the amendment is immaterial to the appeal. It ignored that defect here, because the order was only amended to include the specific amount of counsel fees and that aspect of the order was not at issue on appeal (CPLR 5520[c]). More problematic was that an appeal does not lie from a Support Magistrate's order; the proper procedure is to file objections and then, if necessary, appeal from Family Court's order ruling on the objections (Family Ct Act § 439[e]). This Court indicated that it has the discretion to treat a notice of appeal as valid despite the notice being premature or containing an inaccurate description of the order being appealed (CPLR 5520[c]; see CPLR 5512 [permitting court to deem appeal taken from proper order if timely appeal is taken from something other than an appealable paper, no prejudice results and the proper paper is furnished to the appellate court]). Under the circumstances here, and inasmuch as the errors in filing an inaccurate notice of appeal were attributable to the father's counsel, it treated the notice of appeal as validly appealing from Family Court's order dismissing the objections.

It held that Family Court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the objections filed by the father's counsel. While the court had discretion to overlook counsel's failure to timely file proof of service of objections on the opposing party-despite such filing being required by statute (Family Ct Act § 439[e])- it could not find it to be an abuse of discretion for a court to demand that a party adhere to the statutory requirements. On the other hand, the court improperly dismissed the father's pro se objections. The court apparently relied upon 22 NYCRR 130-1.1a, which requires every paper served on a party or filed with the court to be signed by an attorney or by the pro se party (see 22 NYCRR 130-1.1a [a]). The rule requires the court to "strike any unsigned paper if the omission of the signature is not corrected promptly after being called to the attention of the attorney or party" (22 NYCRR 130-1.1a [a]). Because the record did not indicate that Family Court gave the father or his counsel an opportunity to correct the error through the simple addition of a signature, the court should not have dismissed the objections on this ground. As Family Court dismissed the objections on procedural grounds and never reviewed the merits, it remitted to allow the court to conduct such a review.

Marriage - Validity - Supreme Court holds that Marriage Void Where Contracted is Void in New York

In Ponorovskaya v. Stecklow, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2463042 (N.Y.Sup.), the couple had a wedding ceremony on a Mexican resort's beach. The ceremony was performed under a canopy. Certain Hebrew prayers were recited, vows were exchanged, and there was a glass-breaking ritual, as is customary at Jewish weddings. The ceremony was not performed by a rabbi, but was conducted by defendant's cousin, Dr. Keith Arbeitman, a dentist who lived in New York. In 2003, in order to perform a marriage for friends, he became an ordained minister of the Universal Life Church. Defendant argued that the Mexican wedding was purely symbolic and without any legal effect. He offered evidence that the parties filled out forms at the resort indicating it was a symbolic marriage. He moved to dismiss plaintiff's divorce action on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

The Supreme Court observed that the wedding ceremony did not comply with the dictates of the law of Mexico. The Civil Code of the State of Quintana Roo, at section 769(I), states: "When the marriage is not celebrated before an officer of the Civil Registry it is an absolute nullity." Defendant, relying on principles of comity, contended that since the marriage was not valid in Mexico, it is not valid in New York. Plaintiff argued that Section 25 of the New York State Domestic Relations Law nevertheless requires this court to recognize their Mexican wedding ceremony as having created a valid marriage. Section 25 states, in relevant part: "Nothing in this article contained shall be construed to render void by reason of a failure to procure a marriage license any marriage solemnized between persons of full age." According to plaintiff, in light of this section the parties need not have obtained a marriage license and need not have complied in any respect with the law of the jurisdiction where the wedding took place; so long as the marriage was solemnized in accordance with the DRL, the marriage is valid.

Supreme Court held that DRL §25 is not meant to apply to a marriage ceremony performed outside of New York, even when such a ceremony does not create a valid marriage under local law. New York has long recognized that, barring public policy concerns, the validity of a marriage is determined by the laws of the state or country in which it was performed (Matter of May, 305 N.Y. 486 [1953]; Moore v. Hegeman, 92 N.Y. 521 [1883]; Thorp v. Thorp, 90 N.Y. 602 [1882]; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N.Y. 18 [1881]). Thus, a marriage which is valid under the law of the state or country in which it is contracted will generally be recognized as valid. Conversely, if a marriage is invalid under the law of the place where contracted, it will generally be invalid wherever the question of its validity may arise. Thus, by applying the general rule to the facts presented, the purported marriage between the parties, a marriage which was "an absolute nullity" under Mexican law, is likewise invalid under New York law. The Court distinguished a decision from the Appellate Division, Second Department, in Matter of Farraj, 72 A.D.3d 1082, 900 N.Y.S.2d 340 (2d Dept, 2010) which involved an appeal from a decision of the County Surrogate's Court in a proceeding for a compulsory accounting in which the validity of the petitioner's marital status to the decedent was at issue (Matter of Farraj, 23 Misc.3d 1109(A) [Surr Ct, Kings County 2009]). It found no basis to apply either the holding in Farraj or Restatement of Conflicts section 283 to circumvent the general rule of comity. Accordingly, the validity of their marriage had to be determined by applicable Mexican law and not by DRL §25 or any other provision of New York law. Given these findings it is not of great moment whether Dr. Arbeitman was legally entitled under New York law to solemnize the marriage. All that mattered was that he was not an officer of the Civil Registry, the only officiant permitted to legally marry anybody in Quintana Roo, Mexico.

Equitable Distribution - Factors Considered - (11) the Tax Consequences to Each Party; tax Liability Should Be Borne in the Same Proportion as Each Party's Share of the Asset. Good Cause Existed to Deny That Part of Plaintiff's Motion Seeking a Money Judgment for Arrears.

In Theophilova v. Dentchev, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1924157 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the parties judgment of divorce ordered defendant former to pay plaintiff former wife an enhanced earning capacity award of $653,000 over a period of five years without interest, with the first payment of $130,600 due within 30 days of entry of the judgment; to pay plaintiff her equitable share of other marital assets, as well as $22,616 in child support arrears; and directed the parties to cooperate in equally dividing all cash and securities contained in the parties' jointly-held Ameriprise brokerage account. In November plaintiff moved, pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 244 , for a money judgment on the ground that defendant had failed to pay certain amounts required by the divorce judgment. Defendant contended that he could not pay the amounts due unless the Ameriprise account was liquidated and that plaintiff had failed to cooperate in dividing the account, and cross moved for an order directing plaintiff to sign the forms necessary to effect the division. The court orally denied plaintiff's motion for a money judgment, and made an order which directed Ameriprise to equally divide the cash and securities in the joint brokerage account into two separate accounts, one in plaintiff's sole name and the other in defendant's sole name. In a second order, the court directed defendant, upon the division of the joint account, to liquidate securities in his separate account sufficient to pay plaintiff the arrears. The second order directed the parties to share equally the capital gains tax assessed on the $339,035.89, and did not direct payment of any postjudgment interest.

The Appellate Division modified the second order to provide that defendant was solely responsible for the capital gains tax arising from the liquidation of the securities in his separate account. Upon the division of the joint account, each party will have a separate account containing half of the assets in the former joint account. Thus, each party should be responsible for payment of capital gains tax with respect to his or her sole account (see Teitler v. Teitler, 156 A.D.2d 314, 316 [1st Dept 1989], appeal dismissed 75 N.Y.2d 963 [1990] [tax liability should be borne in the same proportion as each party's share of the asset]). If and when plaintiff liquidates the securities in her separate account, she must bear any resulting tax liability herself.

The Appellate Division held that the motion court should have granted that part of plaintiff's motion seeking a money judgment for the $22,616 in child support arrears. Domestic Relations Law §244 mandates that [upon a default in paying] the court shall make an order directing the entry of judgment for the amount of arrears of child support, with no exception". Because the record did not reflect that defendant's default in paying the child support arrears was willful, an award of interest from the date payment was due was not warranted. In light of the parties' attempt to enter a stipulation as to the division of the Ameriprise account, good cause existed to deny that part of plaintiff's motion seeking a money judgment for the remaining sums.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Exclusive Occupancy - Exclusive possession of the marital residence is generally granted to the custodial parent. need of the custodial parent to occupy the marital residence must be weighed against the financial need of the parties.

In McCoy v McCoy,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1910486 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were married in 2002, and had two children. The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court did not err in failing to award the mother arrears for pendente lite child support in the judgment of divorce. It observed that a party to a matrimonial action may make an application for a judgment directing payment of child support arrears at any time prior to or subsequent to the entry of a judgment of divorce. However, the application must be made "upon such notice to the spouse or other person as the court may direct" (Domestic Relations Law § 244). Plaintiff's application was not made in accordance with that requirement. Accordingly, the application was not proper.

The Appellate Division held that the court should have awarded the plaintiff exclusive possession of the former marital residence until the parties' younger child attains the age of 18 or is otherwise emancipated. Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(f) provides that the court may, in its discretion, make an order regarding the use and occupancy of the marital residence "without regard to the form of ownership of such property. Exclusive possession of the marital residence is generally granted to the custodial parent. In determining whether the custodial parent should be granted exclusive occupancy of the marital home, the trial court should consider, inter alia, the needs of the children, whether the noncustodial parent is in need of the proceeds from the sale of that home, whether comparable housing is available to the custodial parent in the same area at a lower cost, and whether the parties are financially capable of maintaining the residence. As one factor, the "need of the custodial parent to occupy the marital residence must be weighed against the financial need of the parties. In light of factors including the educational and other needs of the parties' two children and the parties' financial circumstances, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing that the former marital residence be listed for immediate sale, or that the plaintiff could "buy out" the defendant's interest. It directed that during the period of exclusive occupancy of the residence, the plaintiff must pay the carrying charges for the home, including the first mortgage payments, property taxes, utilities, and upkeep costs.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Marital Debt - General Rule Is That Financial Obligations Incurred During Marriage Which Are Not Solely Responsibility of One Party Should Be Shared Equally by the Parties. However, a party is entitled to a credit for payments made to satisfy the other spouse's legal obligations.

In McKay v Groesbeck, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1910489 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division pointed out that a party's maintenance and child support obligations are retroactive to the date of the application therefor, and except as otherwise provided, any retroactive amount due shall be paid, as the court directs, taking into account any amount of temporary maintenance or child support which has been paid (DRL § 236[B][6][a]; DRL § 236[B][7][a]). Generally, voluntary payments made by a parent for the benefit of his or her children may not be credited against amounts due pursuant to a judgment of divorce. A party is not entitled to a credit for payments made to satisfy that party's own legal obligations that were not made pursuant to a pendente lite order of support. In this case, there was a pendente lite order for temporary child support of $1,000 per month issued in 2006, but no payments were made pursuant to that order. However, a party is entitled to a credit for payments made to satisfy the other spouse's legal obligations. It held that the defendant should have received a credit towards arrears for any payments he made toward the plaintiff's car payments and insurance, and for one half of the payments he made toward the mortgage and carrying charges on the marital home, as those payments were made to satisfy the plaintiff's legal obligations.

Appeals - Inadequate Record on Appeal - Effect upon Determination - Where Appendix Omitted Trial Transcripts, Appeal Dismissed Where Omission Inhibited Court's Ability to Render an Informed Decision Merits of the Appeal.

In Matter of Kessler v Kessler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1924144 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), a support proceeding pursuant to Family Court Act article 4, the mother appeals from an order of the Family Court which denied her objections to a support order. The Appellate Division dismissed the appeal. It observed that it is the obligation of the appellant to assemble a proper record on appeal. The failure to provide necessary transcripts inhibited the Court's ability to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal. The record submitted by the appellant to this Court included a transcript from a proceeding conducted on September 14, 2011, which included no testimony or evidence but, rather, only court colloquy. The appellant failed to include the transcript from the multiday fact-finding hearing held in connection with her petition. Since the papers provided were patently insufficient for the purpose of reviewing the issues that the appellant raised, the appeal was dismissed.

Court May Meet with Children to Confirm That Attorney for Children Was Adequately Reporting Their Wishes. Supreme Court Distinguishes Between "Lincoln Hearing" and "In Camera Interview" with Child.

In TEG v GTG, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 2016587 (N.Y.Sup.) plaintiff sought an order recusing the court from presiding over the matter because the court met in camera with the couple's children before trial to confirm whether the Attorney for the Children was accurately reporting their wishes. The plaintiff wife also sought a copy of the transcript of the in camera interview. The recusal motion was denied.

Supreme Court noted that although it repeatedly referred to the confidential closed-door interview with the two sons as a "Lincoln hearing." Matter of Lincoln v. Lincoln, 24 N.Y.2d 270, 273 (1969), its description of the confidential in camera meeting with two children in a contested custody matter, prior to trial, as a "Lincoln hearing" was incorrect. In Matter of Rush v. Roscoe, 99 AD3d 1053 (3rd Dept.2012) the court noted that there was confusion over whether an in camera interview with a child, conducted well before a trial, was a Lincoln hearing. The court held it was not a Lincoln hearing but, instead a permissive in camera interview with the child. The "purpose of a Lincoln hearing in a custody proceeding is to corroborate information acquired through testimonial or documentary evidence adduced during the fact-finding hearing" Matter of Spencer v. Spencer, 85 AD3d 1244 (3rd Dept.2011) (a true Lincoln hearing is held after, or during, a fact-finding hearing and adding there is no authority or legitimate purpose for courts to conduct such interviews in place of fact-finding hearings).The court stated that an in camera hearing is, by its terms, a conversation with the children in which they are questioned by the court and not subject to cross-examination by either counsel. The parents' attorneys do not attend: only the children's attorney attends.

The Court observed that the lesson from these cases is simple: the court may meet in camera with a child, in advance of a hearing, but the court, in deciding any question involving the children must hold a fact-finding hearing and thereafter, seek to corroborate any trial testimony by examining the children in a Lincoln hearing setting. In addition, as further case law suggests, the court should confer with the children if either counsel suggests-as occurred in this case-that the children's court-appointed attorney may not be accurately advocating for the children's preference in both temporary and permanent orders involving residence and visitation. Matter of Jessica B. v. Robert B., 104 AD3d 1077 (3rd Dept.2013) (noting that an in camera interview was justified because there was strong support for the claim that the child's wishes were not in fact accurately or adequately conveyed by her trial counsel).

The Court held that its in camera meeting with the children did not violate any precepts of the Lincoln hearing doctrine or any other rule or statute and simply exercised its discretion to meet with the children to confirm their then-existing preferences in this contested custody matter. The request to release the transcript of the discussion with the children was denied. Appellate courts have cautioned trial judges not to divulge comments made during in camera interviews with children in custody proceedings and urged courts to protect the children's right to confidentiality by avoiding disclosure. Matter of Spencer v. Spencer, 85 AD3d 1244 (3rd Dept.2011); Verry v. Verry, 63 AD3d 1228 (3rd Dept.2009) (what transpires at a Lincoln hearing as a general rule is confidential and "the child's right to confidentiality should remain paramount absent a direction to the contrary"); Matter of Carter v. Work, 100 AD3d 1557 (4th Dept.2012) (we agree with the AFC that the court improperly disclosed the child's statement at the Lincoln hearing).

Counsel Fees - Award - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Spouses Conduct in Litigation - Concept That Defendant Should Be Denied Counsel Fees to Prevent Litigation Is Inapposite to Domestic Relations Law §237

In Gutherz v. Gutherz, 2014 WL 2016592 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 50768(U) Defendant sought an order setting aside the parties Prenuptial Agreement. Supreme Court found that defendant failed to raise an issue of fact with regard to whether the Prenuptial Agreement should be invalidated on any ground. Plaintiff's cross motion seeking a judgment declaring the Prenuptial Agreement to be valid and enforcing its terms was granted. Defendant sought counsel fees pendente lite. Plaintiff argued that counsel fees may not be awarded in an action seeking to rescind the terms of a prenuptial agreement. The Court found that defendant's application included fees for legal work undertaken in her attempt to set aside the Prenuptial Agreement, work for which she could recover fees from plaintiff. Further, the court was not provided with billing information that was sufficient to determine the amount of fees incurred with regard to this or any other issue; although defendant annexed a copy of her retainer agreement to her moving papers, no billing statements were provided. Accordingly, defendant was not entitled to an award of interim attorneys' fees, since her application was not in compliance with controlling court rules. Moreover, in the absence of any billing information, the court was unable to determine the reasonableness of the fees incurred. Accordingly, defendant's motion for an award of pendente lite attorneys' fees was denied with leave to renew upon papers addressing the above issues.

The Court noted that plaintiff's position that the defendant should not be granted legal fees because he believed that she would abuse the litigation process by filing baseless motions was rejected. The court stated that it would not punish defendant for not settling the matter; "she has her right to a day in court (citing Comstock v. Comstock, 1 AD3d 307, 766 N.Y.S.2d 220 [2 Dept.,2003])["... an award of an attorney's fee is designed to redress the economic disparity between spouses. It is not intended to address a party's decision to proceed to trial rather than agree to a settlement (see O'Shea v. O'Shea, 93 N.Y.2d 187 (1999)"]. While defendant certainly would be held accountable if she failed to litigate properly or abuses the process the concept that defendant should not be awarded counsel fees to prevent litigation is inapposite to Domestic Relations Law §237" and was rejected.

Authors Comment:

The Court of Appeals has held that a mere request for a hearing or trial should not carry with it a label of intransigence. An award of an attorney's fee is designed to redress the economic disparity between the spouses. It is not intended to address a party's decision to proceed to trial rather than agree to a settlement. Although the relative merit of the parties positions and a spouses conduct in the litigation are among the factors to be considered by the court in determining a counsel fee application, the financial circumstances of both parties is the primary consideration.

In DeCabrera v. Cabrera-Rosete, 70 N.Y.2d 879, 881, 518 N.E.2d 1168 (1987) the Court of Appeals held that "...in exercising its discretionary power to award counsel fees, a court should review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions."

In O'Shea v O'Shea, 93 NY2d 187 [1999].., the Court of Appeals reversed an order of the Appellate Division which vacated, as a matter of law, a counsel fee award for the legal services rendered to obtain an award of counsel fees, and reinstated the award. The Court of Appeals held that "... courts have the discretion, in appropriate cases, to grant such awards, based on criteria that include the circumstances of the parties and the reasonableness of their positions. It further held that "the court had discretion to grant counsel fees to the wife for legal services in connection with the hearing to determine the amount of the fee award. This is not to say that awards for legal services for fee hearings should be routinely expected or freely granted any more than those for pre-action services.

Again, it is a matter of discretion, to be exercised in appropriate cases, to further the objectives of litigational parity, and to prevent the more affluent spouse from wearing down or financially punishing the opposition by recalcitrance, or by prolonging the litigationBecause a party is entitled to resist the opponent's fee application and has a right to a hearing ... a mere request for a hearing should not carry with it a label of intransigence. It is for the court to make such distinctions. Here Supreme Court acted as it did after concluding that the husband--the considerably more affluent spouse--was to blame for protracting the case." In Comstock v. Comstock, 1 A.D.3d 307, 308, 766 N.Y.S.2d 220 (2003) the Appellate Division stated: Under the circumstances of this case, the court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant a $45,144 credit against the plaintiff's distributive award for attorney's fees. The court concluded that the plaintiff unnecessarily exacerbated the cost of this litigation by proceeding to trial since "the evidence adduced . . . at trial merely bolstered the reasonableness of the [pre-trial] settlement proposal." However, an award of an attorney's fee is designed to redress the economic disparity between the spouses. It is not intended to address a party's decision to proceed to trial rather than agree to a settlement (see O'Shea v O'Shea, 93 NY2d 187 [1999])

Custody - Award - Although Express Wishes of the Child Are Not Controlling, They Are Entitled to Great Weight, Particularly Where the Child's Age and Maturity Would Make His or Her Input Particularly Meaningful. Supreme Court Failed to Give Sufficient Weight to the Mother's Role in the Alienation of Children's Affections, as Well as Her Inability to Accept Any Responsibility for the Deterioration of Her Relationship with Them.

In Melissa C.D. v. Rene I. D., Jr.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1699092 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the parties had three children, Pascal, born July 15, 1996, Scarlet, born March 21, 2000, and Tallulah, born December 11, 2008. On October 23, 2010, the mother left the marital home in Manhattan to move in with her lover on Long Island, taking Tallulah with her. Pascal and Scarlet continued to live with the father in Manhattan, and expressed a very strong preference to remain in his custody. Supreme Court awarded plaintiff mother sole physical and legal custody of Tallulah and Scarlet, and allowed Pascal to continue to live with defendant father, with the parties having joint decision-making authority with respect to Pascal's education and serious medical care, provided that plaintiff would have final decision-making authority in the event of a conflict or defendant's failure or refusal to communicate with plaintiff, and granted plaintiff the authority to change the children's therapists. The Appellate Division modified. It held that sole legal and physical custody of Scarlet should be awarded to the father, and the mother should be granted meaningful interaction and regular visitation. It vacated the award to the mother of final decision-making authority with respect to the selection of the children's therapist and medical and educational issues relating to Pascal, now 17, and awarded the father sole legal and physical custody of Pascal. It held that sole legal and physical custody of Tallulah would remain with the mother.

The Appellate Division observed that in considering issues of child custody, although the express wishes of the child are not controlling, they are entitled to great weight, particularly where the child's age and maturity would make his or her input particularly meaningful. It held that the court's finding that the best interests of Scarlet would be served by immediately awarding sole legal and physical custody to her mother, and that Scarlet be forbidden from having any contact with her brother and father for six weeks after the transfer of custody, lacked a sound and substantial basis in the record. It found it would not be in the best interests of Scarlet, now 14, to disrupt her life by removing her, against her wishes, from her father and brother in Manhattan, where she had always lived, and placing her with her mother and her mother's lover, a situation that she was not comfortable with, on Long Island, in a community that she did not know. In the absence of any expert testimony, Supreme Court's conclusion that this turmoil "will be temporary and far less emotionally destructive than abandoning her to an unfit parent, which may well leave her with permanent emotional scars," was speculative, as was the court's finding that "Scarlet still has a strong, albeit hidden, bond with her mother."

The Appellate Division found that in disregarding Scarlet's wishes and the importance of maintaining stability in her life, Supreme Court erred by placing undue emphasis on a single factor, the father's alleged alienation of Pascal and Scarlet, and erroneously found that Pascal and Scarlet were "vindictive, cruel, angry, and broken children," whose "expressed wishes ... are the product of Defendant's poisonous efforts to alienate them from their mother." The Court observed that a custodial parent's conduct may warrant a change of custody if it reaches "the level of deliberately frustrating, denying or interfering with" the parental rights of the noncustodial parent so as to raise doubts about the custodial parent's fitness (see Matter of Lawrence C. v. Anthea P., 79 AD3d 577, 579 [1st Dept 2010]). However, even egregious conduct in this regard must be viewed within the context of the child's best interests (Matter of Lew v. Sobel, 46 AD3d 893, 895 [2d Dept 2007] ["While one parent's alienation of a child from the other parent is an act inconsistent with the best interests of the child, here, the children's bond to the alienating parent is so strong that a change of custody would be harmful to the children without extraordinary efforts by both parents and extensive therapeutic, psychological intervention"]; Matter of Charpentier v. Rossman, 264 A.D.2d 393 [2d Dept 1999][father properly awarded sole custody, notwithstanding his interference with relationship between mother and child, based on strong preference for father expressed by 17-year-old child]). It found that the father's conduct did not rise to the level of deliberately frustrating, denying or interfering with the parental rights of the mother so as to raise doubts about his custodial fitness.

The Appellate Division found that Supreme Court failed to give sufficient weight to the mother's role in the alienation of Pascal and Scarlet's affections, as well as her inability to accept any responsibility for the deterioration of her relationship with them. (Matter of Muzzi v. Muzzi, 189 A.D.2d 1022, 1024 [3d Dept 1993] [it was inappropriate for Family Court to favor one party's contentions where neither party blameless]). The record demonstrated that while the mother was still married and living in the marital home, she confided to Pascal that she had rented a home with her lover on Long Island, and encouraged Pascal to keep it a secret, inappropriately placing him in the middle of the marital difficulties she had with the father. The mother also invited her lover to the marital home to meet Pascal, against his express wishes. When Scarlet asked the mother if she was going to move out, the mother falsely assured her that she would not be leaving.

The Supreme Court also failed to give any weight to the fact that during the course of visitation, the mother continued to engage in conduct that undermined Scarlet and Pascal's trust. For example, the mother assured Scarlet that she could continue to live with the father, while simultaneously seeking sole custody, and she used a visit that Pascal and Scarlet had with their sister Tallulah to secretly record their conversations. When Scarlet and Pascal discussed their feelings with the mother in therapy, the mother discounted those sentiments as the result of their father's brainwashing, which, as counsel for Tallulah recognized, "had to frustrate the older children and would make it reasonable for Scarlet to believe she wasn't being heard." In addition, the supervisor of therapeutic visitation testified that there were occasions when the mother made negative statements about the father, to which Pascal and Scarlet responded in a hurt manner. Although there were occasional problems with visitation, the record did not support a finding that they "the [father] intentionally interfered with visitation or that [his] conduct rose to such a level that [he] should be deprived of custody". The children attended 30 supervised visits with the mother, and the therapeutic visitation supervisor acknowledged that Pascal and Scarlet were not anxious to see her, and the father had to work very hard to get them to attend. While the children were occasionally late, the record supported the conclusion that this was due, at least in part, to their reluctance to engage with the mother, whose conduct, also contributed to the problems surrounding visitation. Furthermore, the court-appointed neutral forensic evaluator, the only disinterested witness who interviewed both parents and, the children, testified that there was no evidence that either Scarlet or Pascal had been subject to parental alienation, and the court improvidently disregarded her testimony and placed undue emphasis on the testimony of the mother's expert, who, unlike the court-appointed neutral evaluator, did not interview both parents and the children.

Insofar as Supreme Court found that the mother was virtually the exclusive caregiver for the children, the Court noted that Pascal and Scarlet were now mature teenagers who had lived with the father since October 2010. They had a very strong relationship, and the continuity and stability of the existing custody arrangement weighed in favor of the father.

Family Court - Article 10 Proceeding - Disclosure of Mental Health Treatment Records - Family Court Act § 1038(d) Requires the Court to Review Mental Health Records in Camera Before Making its Disclosure Ruling.

In re Dean T, Jr. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1884709 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), a neglect proceeding, Respondent father moved to subpoena the eldest child's (the child) mental health treatment records. The Family Court, without conducting an in camera review of the requested records, denied the motion. The Appellate Division observed that pursuant to Family Court Act § 1038(d), the court must conduct a balancing test (see Matter of B. Children, 23 Misc.3d 1119[A], 2009 N.Y. Slip Op 50841[U], *4 [Family Ct, Kings County 2009]). The statute requires that the court weigh "the need of the [moving] party for the discovery to assist in the preparation of the case" against "any potential harm to the child [arising] from the discovery." Here, the Family Court should have reviewed the child's mental health records in camera to determine if the records were relevant to the central issue of the child's credibility before making its disclosure ruling. The record indicated that the child's mental health records could be necessary to respondent's defense. The case was remanded for the Family Court to conduct an in camera review of the child's mental health treatment records in order to determine if there was any information in these records that supported the father's claim that the mother was coaching the child or that the child had mental issues that affected his truth-telling capacity, and to decide whether the potential harm arising from discovery outweighs respondent's need for the record.

Appeal - Appendix Method - Inadequate Appendix - Appeal Dismissed Because Inadequate Appendix Inhibited the Court's Ability to Render an Informed Decision on the Merits with Regard to Maintenance and Child Support.

In Deshuk-Flores v. Flores, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1687796 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Supreme Court granted the plaintiff a divorce on the ground of abandonment, equitably distributed certain marital property, awarded the plaintiff weekly nondurational maintenance of $300, and directed him to pay weekly child support of $928.46. The Plaintiff -Respondent moved to dismiss the appeal on the grounds that the appellant's appendix contained an altered document and that the appendix was inadequate. After argument of the appeal the Appellate Division affirmed the judgment and granted the motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appendix was inadequate, to the extent the defendant challenged the weekly nondurational maintenance and child support awards. It observed that an appellant who perfects an appeal by using the appendix method must file an appendix that contains all the relevant portions of the record in order to enable the court to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal. The appendix shall contain those portions of the record necessary to permit the court to fully consider the issues which will be raised by the appellant and the respondent. (22 NYCRR 670.10-b[c][1]; CPLR 5528[a][5]). The defendant omitted from his appendix relevant portions of the trial transcripts and trial exhibits. This omission inhibited the court's ability to render an informed decision on the merits of the appeal with regard to the issues of child support and maintenance. Accordingly, the defendant's appeal from so much of the judgment as awarded the plaintiff weekly nondurational maintenance of $300 and directed the defendant to pay weekly child support of $928.46 was dismissed. The Appellate Division pointed out that the "defendant blatantly misrepresents that the complaint was not properly executed and verified by the plaintiff", and included in his appendix a copy of a complaint that had been altered so as to delete the plaintiff's signature. The defendant's contention that the "loss of the trial court record compels the dismissal of the present action" was devoid of merit and constituted a material falsehood. The Supreme Court records were not lost and, had been provided to the Court.

Action for a Divorce - Voluntary Discontinuance - CPLR 3217 - Motion Denied Where Motion Is an Attempt to Avoid an Adverse Order and Discontinuance Would Result in Prejudice to Defendant

In Turco v Turco--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1798397 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that in the absence of special circumstances, such as prejudice to a substantial right of the defendant, or other improper consequences, a motion for a voluntary discontinuance should be granted" (Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Chaplin, 107 A.D.3d at 883, 969 N.Y.S.2d 67). Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying the plaintiff's application, in effect, to voluntarily discontinue the action, made on the first day of trial, since the record supported a finding that she was merely attempting to avoid an adverse order of the court, and there was a showing that the defendant would be prejudiced by such discontinuance.

Custody - Modification - Attorney for Child - Court Properly Denied Request to Appoint Separate Counsel Child Although Reasons for the Determination Could Not Be Stated in the Decision Given the Confidential Nature of the Lincoln Hearing.

In Matter of Shaw v Bice--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1855552 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), a custody modification proceeding, the Appellate Division rejected the mother's contention that Family Court erred in failing to appoint separate attorneys for the children when, during the trial, the parties' son expressed a desire to reside with the mother, which was not consistent with the daughter's expressed wishes. Both children had previously informed the Attorney for the Children (AFC) that they wanted to continue residing with the father, who had been granted temporary custody. During the trial, however, the AFC advised the court that the son, age nine, wanted to live with his mother because at her house "he can stay up late and he doesn't get in trouble."The AFC further stated that, in his view, the son's position was "immature and thus not controlling" upon the AFC. Following a Lincoln hearing, the court denied the mother's request to appoint a new attorney for the child for the son. At the conclusion of the trial, the court awarded custody of both children to the father, as advocated by the AFC. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that the Rules of the Chief Judge provide that "[w]hen the attorney for the child is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child, the attorney for the child would be justified in advocating a position that is contrary to the child's wishes. In these circumstances, the attorney for the child must inform the court of the child's articulated wishes if the child wants the attorney to do so, notwithstanding the attorney's position" (22 NYCRR 7.2[d][3]). It held that the court properly denied the mother's request to appoint separate counsel for the son. Although the reasons for the determination could not be stated in this decision given the confidential nature of the Lincoln hearing, it noted that the AFC on appeal asks it to affirm, thereby indicating that the son did not object to the court's failure to appoint separate counsel on his behalf.

Domestic Relations Law §24 (1) - Child Conceived by Consensual Artificial Insemination of Spouse of Same - Sex Marriage is legitimate Child of Both Parties

In Wendy GM v Erin GM, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1884485 (N.Y.Sup.), the birth mother and her spouse were married in a civil ceremony in Connecticut, before New York enacted its Marriage Equality Act. The couple decided to have a child and in October 2011, they both signed a consent form agreeing to artificial insemination procedures. In the consent form, the birth-mother authorized the physician to perform artificial insemination on her, and the spouse requested the doctor to perform the procedure. The document also reads: We declare that any child or children born as a result of a pregnancy following artificial insemination shall be accepted as the legal issue of our marriage. The document was signed by the birth-mother, the spouse, and the physician, but there was no acknowledgment to the signatures. The spouse paid for the sperm donation and executed a consent form that allowed the purchased sperm to be used for the artificial insemination of the birth-mother. Both parties underwent artificial insemination for almost two years, until the procedure succeeded on the birth-mother; the spouse then discontinued her treatments. The fertility clinic records demonstrate that the birth-mother and the spouse were both involved in appointments. The spouse attended the pre-birth classes, including breast feeding, baby care, and CPR classes. The spouse participated in the baby showers. The spouse was present at the birth of the child and the couple jointly decided the name of the child. When the hospital officials asked for information on the parents, both participated in the discussions and the birth mother acknowledged that the spouse was the parent of the child. The child was given a hyphenated surname of the two women, with the spouse's name listed first. The birth certificate for the child listed both as the parents of the child.

After the birth of the child, citing marital trouble, the spouse left the household. The child only lived in the same household with the two women for one week before they established separate households. The action for divorce was commenced by the birth-mother less than then three months after the birth of the child. Before and after commencement, the birth-mother would not permit her spouse to visit with the child. The spouse then filed the request for a variety of relief, including access to the child.

Supreme Court pointed out that New York's public policy strongly favors the legitimacy of children, and that "the presumption that a child born to a marriage is the legitimate child of both parents is one of the strongest and persuasive known to law." In re Estate of Fay, 44 N.Y.2d 137, 141 (1978) (there is an established legal presumption that every person is born legitimate); Matter of Findlay, 253 N.Y. 1, 7 (1930). The common law presumption of "legitimacy" to children born in a marriage finds a corollary in Domestic Relations Law §24 (1), which provides that a child born to married parents "is the legitimate child of both parents." See Family Court Act § 417. The intent of these statutes, and the common law presumption, is unambiguous: a child born in a marriage is the child of the couple. The Court concluded that the partner with no biological connection to the child is a parent, including that (she and the child's biological mother) were in a valid legal union at the time of the child's birth. Supreme Court concluded that the Court of Appeals decision in Debra H. v. Janice R. 14 NY2d at 599 opens the door for New York to recognize a partner, in a civil union, as a parent of a child born by artificial insemination during the civil union. The spouse is presumed, by virtue of the marriage and the rule in Matter of Findlay, to be a "parent" of the child. The spouse and birth mother share the same sex. The Marriage Equality Act eliminates that distinction. The Court held that the common law presumptions that link both spouses in a marriage to a child born of the marriage, the presumption of legitimacy within a marriage and the presumption of a spouse's consent to artificial insemination, applied to this couple. The Court held that the non-biological spouse is a parent of this child under the common law of New York as much as the birth-mother.

Supreme Court - Jurisdiction - Referees - Hear and Report - Authority of Referee Limited
By Order of Reference

In Karpov v Shiryaev, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1622370 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Plaintiff commenced a divorce action on the ground of constructive abandonment. In a so-ordered stipulation entered into at a preliminary conference, the parties agreed that defendant would assert a counterclaim for divorce on the ground of constructive abandonment, and plaintiff withdrew her claim. The outstanding financial matters were referred to a special referee to hear and determine. The parties then stipulated that the Referee would also hear and determine the issue of grounds, pursuant to the stipulation. At the hearing, over plaintiff's objection, the Referee granted the defendant's motion to withdraw the counterclaim, leaving plaintiff without a cause of action for divorce. The Referee then granted plaintiff's application to reinstate her claim for divorce, and conducted a full trial on grounds, at which defendant was permitted to interpose opposition. The Referee denied the divorce. The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Referee exceeded his authority when he permitted defendant to withdraw his counterclaim for constructive abandonment, and conducted a fully contested trial on plaintiff's previously-withdrawn claim. The reference by the court, as thereafter expanded by the parties' stipulation, did not give the Referee authority to set aside any part of the parties' stipulation. By clear and unambiguous terms, defendant waived his right to withdraw his counterclaim.

Agreements - Construction - Forum Selection Clause - New York State's Public Policy with Regard Removal of Barriers to Remarriage (DRL § 253) Cannot Override Forum Selection Clause in Prenuptial Agreement

In Ofer v Sirota, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1386552 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly found that the parties' prenuptial agreement was enforceable and that the forum selection clause in the agreement, which granted exclusive jurisdiction over any divorce litigation to a competent Israeli court, was also enforceable (Sterling Natl. Bank v. Eastern Shipping Worldwide, Inc., 35 AD3d 222, 222 [1st Dept 2006]). Accordingly, Supreme Court properly dismissed this action. The fact that plaintiff alleged that defendant refused to grant her a get (Jewish divorce decree) as required by their agreement was irrelevant to determining whether to enforce the forum selection clause. There was no merit to plaintiff's claim that she would be deprived of her day in court in Israel because Israel does not provide for no fault divorce and defendant's consent to a divorce is required there. While litigation in Israel may be more challenging, plaintiff would have her day in court. It was inappropriate for plaintiff to attempt to avoid Israel's legal system because New York's legal system may treat her more favorably by permitting her to obtain a no fault divorce. Plaintiff, an Israeli citizen, was well aware that Jewish religious laws govern Israeli divorces when she consented to the forum selection clause in the agreement. This State's strong and important public policy with regard to compelling civil litigants to remove any barriers to remarriage (DRL § 253) cannot override the forum selection clause that the parties knowingly included in their prenuptial agreement, particularly because plaintiff will not be deprived of her day in court in the chosen forum.

Agreements - Construction - Attorneys Fee Provision - Agreement's Provisions, Rather than Statutory Provisions, Control

In Roth v Roth, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1465562 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties divorce judgment entered August 18, 2010, which incorporated, but did not merge with, a stipulation of settlement dated April 26, 2010 contained a default provision that provided that if either party defaulted with respect to any obligation set forth in the stipulation, the defaulting party was required to pay the other party's attorney's fees and all other actual expenses incurred in any lawsuit or other proceeding to enforce the agreement, so long as the lawsuit or other proceeding resulted in a judgment or order in favor of the nondefaulting party, or the defaulting party agreed to cure the default after the commencement of the lawsuit or proceeding. Plaintiff moved to enforce the terms of the stipulation, alleging that the defendant had defaulted by failing to fulfill certain of his obligations under the stipulation. The plaintiff also sought an award of an attorney's fee. After a hearing, the Judicial Hearing Officer recommended that the plaintiff be awarded an attorney's fee of $18,000, and the Supreme Court confirmed the award. The Appellate Division affirmed. Where the parties have agreed to provisions in a settlement agreement that govern the award of attorney's fees, the agreement's provisions, rather than statutory provisions, control. Here, the plaintiff's motion to enforce the terms of the stipulation resulted in the Supreme Court's order in her favor. Additionally, after the plaintiff filed her motion, the defendant agreed to cure certain defaults. Consequently, the defendant was contractually obligated to pay the plaintiff's attorney's fees incurred to enforce the stipulation.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(b)(5-a) - Second Department Holds That Formula Amount Is Intended to Cover All of a Payee Spouse's Basic Living Expenses, Including Housing Costs, the Costs of Food and Clothing, and Other Usual Expenses. However, it May Be Appropriate to Direct Payment by the Monied Spouse of the Mortgage and Taxes on the Marital Residence and Other Expenses of the Nonmonied Spouse under Certain Circumstances

In Vistocco v Jardin--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1465580 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties were married in 1995 and had three unemancipated children. The Supreme Court awarded the defendant $3,000 per week for child support and $3,000 per week in temporary spousal maintenance, directed the plaintiff to pay the mortgage and taxes on the marital residence where the defendant resided with the parties' children, directed the plaintiff to pay the defendant's car insurance, and awarded the defendant interim counsel fees and expert fees in the sums of $12,500 and $3,500, respectively. The Appellate Division affirmed. The plaintiff argued, inter alia, that the Supreme Court erred in directing him to pay, in addition to spousal maintenance, the mortgage and taxes on the marital residence and the defendant's car insurance. He contends that the pendente lite maintenance award is intended to cover the defendant's basic living expenses, which include the mortgage, property taxes, and her car insurance. The Court observed that the formula to determine temporary spousal maintenance that is outlined in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a)(c) is intended to cover all of a payee spouse's basic living expenses, including housing costs, the costs of food and clothing, and other usual expenses (see Khaira v. Khaira, 93 AD3d 194). However, it may be appropriate to direct payment by the monied spouse of the mortgage and taxes on the marital residence and other expenses of the nonmonied spouse under certain circumstances (see id.). In light of the evidence that the plaintiff's income exceeded $500,000 and the gross disparity between the plaintiff's income and the defendant's income, the Supreme Court properly awarded additional support in the form of a directive to the plaintiff to pay the mortgage and taxes on the marital residence (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][c][2][a][ii]), as well as the defendant's car insurance (see e.g. Goldberg v. Goldberg, 98 AD3d 944; Macagnone v. Macagnone, 7 AD3d 680).

Income Execution For Support Enforcement - Mistake of Fact - Income Payor's alleged lack of authority to comply with the income execution is not a "mistake of fact"

In Ciccotto v Ciccotto, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1612978 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Court held that the defendant's contention that the income execution should have been vacated due to a mistake of fact was without merit. An Income Payor's alleged lack of authority to comply with the income execution is not a "mistake of fact" within the meaning of CPLR 5241(a)(8).

Family Court - Jurisdiction - Referees - Hear and Report - Authority of Referee Limited By Order of Reference - Improper Order Deemed A Report.

In Matter of Aslan v Senturk, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1613066 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the petitioner commenced a proceeding against the respondent, his ex-wife, alleging that she committed family offenses against him. By administrative order of reference dated January 24, 2013, the Family Court, on its own initiative pursuant to CPLR 4212 and 4313, referred the matter to a Court Attorney Referee to hear and report. The Court Attorney Referee, in effect, made an order which denied the petition and dismissed the proceeding. The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that a referee derives authority from an order of reference by the court. The order of reference referred the matter to the Court Attorney Referee to hear and report only, not to hear and determine. Accordingly, the Court Attorney Referee lacked jurisdiction to issue the order appealed from. The Court Attorney Referee's decision was deemed a report and the matter was remitted for further proceedings pursuant to CPLR 4403 before a Judge of the Family Court.

Sanctions - 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 - Sanctions and Counsel Fees Totaling $60,000 Awarded For Commencing Frivolous Action

In Weissman v Weissman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1465602 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) an action, inter alia, to set aside a stipulation of settlement the Appellate Division affirmed an order which directed the plaintiff to pay sanctions of $17,500 to the Commissioner of Taxation and Finance and directed the entry of a judgment in favor of the defendant in the amount of $42,707.29 for counsel fees and expenses. The Appellate Division observed that sanctions may be warranted where the party's arguments are belied by the record, and are completely without merit in law or fact. In a prior action for a divorce commenced by the plaintiff, the plaintiff repeatedly moved to vacate or set aside a stipulation of settlement dated May 25, 2004. Those motions were denied, and the denials were affirmed on appeal. Nevertheless, the plaintiff commenced a plenary action seeking the same relief, namely, to vacate the stipulation on grounds including fraud. In this action, despite being enjoined from making any additional motions without obtaining leave of court, the plaintiff made two motions without obtaining such leave. It held that Supreme Court properly directed the plaintiff to pay sanctions based on her frivolous conduct in bringing the plenary action and making two motions without obtaining leave of court. (22 NYCRR 130-1.1[c][2]). In light of evidence that the plaintiff was pressing a frivolous claim, thereby abusing the judicial process and creating unnecessary litigation, the court properly awarded counsel fees and expenses.

Counsel Fees - Award - Supreme Court Holds it Can Impose Attorney Fees Against a Party on the Grounds That They Declined a Reasonable Settlement Offer in Bad Faith to Delay the Action.

In Clements v Clements, 2014 WL 1419279 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 50581(U) Supreme Court held that in exercising its broad discretion, Supreme Court can impose attorney fees against a party on the grounds that they declined a reasonable settlement offer in bad faith to delay the action. The husband declined to settle the case in August 2013, only to concede a settlement six months later on essentially the same terms. The court found it difficult to characterize the husband's refusal to accept the proffered settlement in August 2013 as "obstreperous conduct" that would justify additional fees. Yarinsky v. Yarinsky, 25 AD3d 1042 (3rd Dept.2006). There was no evidence that the husband "abused" the process or engaged in blatant misrepresentations. There was some evidence that the husband delayed providing needed financial disclosure, a factor that can justify additional legal fees. Holbrook v. Holbrook, 226 A.D.2d 831 (3rd Dept.1996) (party who was "less than forthcoming" regarding disclosure of assets and against whom a subpoena had to be issued was a factor in awarding fees). The court was required-more than three years after commencement-to order both parties to provide financial information. To disproportionately blame the husband for the lack of disclosure was unfair and inconsistent with the facts. The focus was narrowed to just whether the husband's rejection of the August 2013 settlement proposal was motivated by "bad faith" sufficient to justify additional fees. Based on the fact that the final settlement nearly mirrored the conference recommendation and that the feeble objections raised by the husband after the conference were on issues that had either been previously settled, or were factually unsustainable, the court concluded that the husband's rejection of the August 2013 settlement was a delay tactic. The husband was motivated solely to have the wife expend additional legal fees which had the practical effect of reducing her final pay out from this divorce. Because there appeared to be no other motive, the court concluded that the rejection of the settlement was motivated by "bad faith" to prolong the litigation and boost the wife's attorney fees, which would then reduce her overall net recovery from her husband. The Court observed that the mere fact that a party declines a reasonable settlement proposal should not, in all cases, justify legal fees.

Equitable Distribution - Property Valuation - Court Properly Credited Neutral Appraiser's Valuation Based on Formula in the Shareholders' Agreement, Which Was the Only Evidence in the Record of its Actual Value

In Alexander v Alexander, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1356787 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment which awarded defendant wife a 35% interest in plaintiff husband's corporate stock shares, valued as of the commencement date of the action, and awarded maintenance of $7,500 per month until the earliest of either party's death, the wife's remarriage, or December 31, 2024. It found that the court properly accepted the neutral appraiser's valuation based on the formula in the shareholders' agreement. Among other things, the wife's expert "did not consider the stock transfer restrictions contained in the shareholders' agreement" (Amodio v. Amodio, 70 N.Y.2d 5, 8 [1987]). As the price in the shareholders' agreement was the only evidence in the record of its actual value, the court properly credited the neutral appraiser's report, which was based on that price. It held that the court properly exercised its discretion in determining that the wife was entitled to 35% of the value of those shares. The court properly considered the length of the marriage (nearly 25 years), the contribution by the wife in running the household and raising their two sons throughout the marriage, and the fact that most of the increase in corporate revenues, which resulted in the increased share price, occurred in the same year as the commencement of this action. It also found the maintenance to the wife, payable from September 1, 2012 through December 31, 2024 was adequate, notwithstanding her age at 56 years old, her lack of a work history, and her inability to support herself after being a homemaker throughout the nearly 25-year marriage. The court credited the husband's evidence that the parties lived relatively modestly, in contrast to the wife's statement of net worth, for which she failed to present sufficient evidence to substantiate her claims. The court also credited expert testimony that the husband could work for another 12 years, until age 67, with an earning capacity of $275,000 to $320,000 per year. In light of the wife's ability to keep the parties' marital home, valued at $2 million, along with the equitable distribution award, which left her with approximately $750,000 in cash as of 2015, the durational maintenance of at most 12 years at $7,500 per month was amply supported by the record. It also held that the trial court properly declined to award the wife expert fees or counsel fees in addition to the $135,000 interim counsel fees that she had already received. Given the lack of evidence substantiating the wife's medical claims, the court properly exercised its discretion in declining to require the husband to pay the wife's unreimbursed medical expenses, or her health insurance, and it properly declined to require the husband to obtain life insurance to cover his obligations under the judgment, since the wife elicited no evidence relevant to the issue.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Valuation - Business Properly Valued at Date of Trial Light of Substantial Lapse of Time Between Commencement and Trial

In Domino v Domino, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1226678 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that once property is classified as marital or separate, the trial court has broad discretion to select an appropriate date for measuring the value of the property. In light of the substantial lapse of time between the commencement of this action in 2003, and the nonjury trial in 2007, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in valuing both the husband's ambulette business and the real property as of the date of trial.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Marital Debt - General Rule Is That Financial Obligations Incurred During Marriage Which Are Not Solely Responsibility of One Party Should Be Shared Equally by the Parties.

In Diaz v Gonzalez--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1228481 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), a new trial was necessary on the issue of equitable distribution of alleged marital debt. Expenses incurred prior to the commencement of an action for a divorce are marital debt to be equally shared by the parties upon an offer of proof that the expenses represent marital expenses. Where a party has paid the other party's share of what proves to be marital debt, reimbursement is required. Supreme Court improperly refused to admit evidence offered by the defendant of alleged marital debt on the basis that the credit card statements she proffered related to credit cards in her name only, despite her testimony that the credit card accounts were opened during the marriage to pay the parties' expenses, and on the basis that the defendant did not show that the debt was not paid off prior to trial. It remitted the matter for, inter alia, a new trial on the issue of equitable distribution of alleged marital debt, and for the entry of an amended judgment thereafter.

Child Support - Award - Disparity in Income and Expenses, and Availability of Tax Deductions Rendered Presumptive Amount of Child Support Unjust or Inappropriate

In Smith v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1316325 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Supreme Court calculated the mother's presumptive weekly child support obligation to be $258.33, but concluded that it would be "just and appropriate" to reduce it to $30 per week. The court also directed that child support be paid retroactive to the date of the judgment of divorce, excluding a nine-month period when the mother was unemployed and received inpatient treatment for alcohol dependency. Finally, the court denied the father's request for recoupment of the child support payments he made to the mother pursuant to the judgment of divorce. The Appellate Division found that father's income was twice that of the mother and such a disparity, alone, can justify a deviation. The father also received significant tax deductions and credits for the children, whereas the mother received none (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f][4]). Additionally, the mother was responsible for paying a significant portion of the children's uninsured health-related and child-care expenses, as well as other costs associated with her extended and substantial parenting time, all of which impacted the mother's financial resources (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][f][1]). The mother purchased a home within the children's school district to facilitate the custodial arrangement, as a result of which she has a significant commute to work, with its attendant expenses. Giving careful consideration to the relevant factors, it found no abuse of Supreme Court's discretion in concluding that the presumptive amount of child support attributable to the mother was unjust or inappropriate. Nonetheless, Supreme Court's reduction to $30 weekly was excessive and, it found $150 per week to be "just and appropriate" under the circumstances present here (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][g]). The Court agreed with the father that the mother's child support obligation should have been made retroactive to February 9, 2009, the date the father made a specific demand therefor in his complaint. (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][7][a]).

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Maintenance - Award - Adverse inference Properly drawn from failure to submit W-2 statements, or his 1099 statements, as required by 22 NYCRR 202.16.

Property Determination - Judicial Estoppel Applied to Support Determination that Farm is Marital Property

In Winship v Winship, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1258329 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division rejected the argument that the court's award of maintenance was excessive. Plaintiff failed to submit a sworn financial statement, as required by Domestic Relations Law § 236(B). He also failed to submit copies of his recent tax returns, his W-2 statements, or his 1099 statements, as required by 22 NYCRR 202.16. Thus, plaintiff could not be heard to complain that the court erred in drawing inferences favorable to defendant with respect to the disputed financial issues, including maintenance. In any event, it did not constitute an abuse of discretion. The judgment provided for a higher award of maintenance and child support than that set forth in the court's findings of fact, which control, and it modified the judgment accordingly by reducing both. Plaintiff's primary challenge to the equitable distribution award was the court's determination that Pine Top Plantation (Pine Top), a 128-acre Christmas tree farm formerly owned and operated by plaintiff's deceased father, was marital property subject to equitable distribution. In the joint tax returns filed from 2000 through 2008 the parties depreciated Pine Top's equipment and property, and identified plaintiff as its "proprietor." Plaintiff signed those tax returns. As the Court of Appeals has made clear, "[a] party to litigation may not take a position contrary to a position taken in an income tax return" (Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 NY3d 415, 422). Here, plaintiff's tax returns were inconsistent with his position that his father owned Pine Top after 2000, inasmuch as a party cannot depreciate property that he or she does not own.

Adoption - Effect of Surrogate Parenting Contracts - Surrogacy Contract, Which Is Against New York Public Policy, Does Not Foreclose an Adoption from Proceeding.

In Matter of Adoption of JJ, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1328184 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.), the Proposed Adoptive Children were twins, who were the biological children of the Proposed Adoptive Parent's spouse, M.H.-W. ("Birth Parent"). They were conceived with the Birth Parent's sperm and an anonymous donor's egg through in-vitro fertilization and were born through gestational surrogacy in Mumbai, India. On May 12, 2013, in accordance with a surrogacy agreement, Y .M.A.K. ("Gestational Surrogate") immediately placed the Proposed Adoptive Children post-birth with the Birth Parent. On May 28, 2013, the Proposed Adoptive Children were granted United States Citizenship and were permitted to return to the United States with the Birth Parent and the Proposed Adoptive Parent. The Proposed Adoptive Children had been living with the Birth Parent and Proposed Adoptive Parent since placement and the Proposed Adoptive Parent seeks the Court's approval for finalization of his adoption petition. The Family Court held that a court may approve an adoption for finalization where New York statutorily deems the underlying surrogacy contract against public policy, and void and unenforceable. See N.Y. Dom. Rel. L. § 122. The Court observed that surrogacy was outlawed in New York. See Dom. Rel. L. 121 et seq. It well-settled that a party to a surrogacy contract may not seek a court's assistance to enforce the agreement, nor will such contract be deemed viable for any other claims arising under its arrangement. See Itskov v. N.Y. Fertility Institute, Inc., 11 Misc.3d 68 (2d Dep't 2006). Although it could find no relevant case law to support its determination the Court held that where a surrogacy contract exists and an adoption has been filed to establish legal parentage, the surrogacy contract does not foreclose an adoption from proceeding. The Court was not being asked to enforce the surrogacy contract that formed the basis for the adoption, nor did the relief sought include claims relating to the surrogacy agreement itself. In keeping with the Legislature's intent to encourage loving, happy families for children with parents who wish to accept that role, the best interests of the Proposed Adoptive Children under the totality of the circumstances, and reading § 124 broadly, the Court found that the surrogacy contract's legality was of no consequence to the matter. If all other requirements were met, the Court held it would approve the adoption.

New Child Support Standards Chart released March 12, 2014

According to the Child Support Standards Chart, [LDSS 4515 (3/14)] released March 12, 2014, prepared by New York State Office of Temporary and Disability Assistance, Division of Child Support Enforcement, the 2014 poverty income guideline amount for a single person as reported by the United States Department of Health and Human Services is $11,670 and the 2012 self-support reserve is $15,755.

The combined parental income amount is $141,000. It is adjusted every two years (effective January 31st) based on the average annual percent changes to the federal Department of Labor's Consumer Price Index for Urban Consumers. The Child Support Standards Chart is released each year on or before April 1. The income tables are used to determine the annual child support obligation amount pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 567 of the Laws of 1989. The chart may be downloaded from https://www.childsupport.ny.gov/dcse/pdfs/cssa_2014.pdf.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Disorderly Conduct - Burden of Proof - Mens Rea Must Be Established

In Matter of Shiffman v Handler,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 943172 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that the family offense of "disorderly conduct" is not limited to disorderly conduct in a public place (Family Ct Act § 812). Each of the requisite elements of that offense must be established by a preponderance of the evidence. This includes the mens rea of that offense, namely that, when engaging in certain defined conduct, the actor did so "with intent to cause public inconvenience, annoyance or alarm, or recklessly creat[ed] a risk thereof" (Penal Law § 240.20). Here, the mother did not sustain her burden. The evidence established that the daughter went to the mother's home, stood on the front porch, knocked on the front door and windows for a period of nearly an hour, and telephoned the mother's home phone number twice, but it did not establish the daughter's requisite intent or recklessness with respect to causing public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm. The mother presented no evidence in support of the mens rea element, such as the proximity of the porch to neighbors or other members of the public, or that the conduct otherwise could have caused public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm. It reversed the order of protection, denied the petition, and dismissed the proceeding.

Child Custody - Conditions on Visitation - Court May Not Order That a Parent Undergo Counseling or Treatment as a Condition of Future Visitation - Error to Condition Visitation Upon Enrollment in Drug Testing Program

In Matter of Welch v. Taylor, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 953633 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Family Court awarded the mother sole legal and physical custody, conditioned father's visitation upon his enrollment in random drug testing program at a medical facility and his compliance with maintaining a certain medical prescription, and allowed the mother to suspend his visitation if he failed to supply proof of his prescription to the mother. The Appellate Division affirmed the custody award but reversed the balance of the order. It held that a court may not order that a parent undergo counseling or treatment as a condition of future visitation or reapplication for visitation rights, but may only direct a party to submit to counseling or treatment as a component of visitation. Family Court erred in conditioning the father's visitation upon his enrollment in a random drug testing program at a medical facility, and should have instead directed the father to enroll in such a program as a component of visitation. By authorizing the mother to suspend visitation upon the father's failure to provide proof of his prescription, the Family Court improperly delegated its responsibility to determine whether and when visitation rights should be suspended. It noted that directing the father to enroll in a random drug testing program at a medical facility did not improperly make the ordered treatment a prerequisite to his access to the child and the Family Court retains the responsibility to supervise and enforce this therapeutic component of its visitation order (see Resnick v. Zoldan, 134 A.D.2d 246, 520 N.Y.S.2d 434; Zafran v. Zafran, 28 A.D.3d at 757, 814 N.Y.S.2d 669).

Agreements - Stipulations - Reformation - Mutual Mistake - for Mutual Mistake to Form Basis for Reformation Mistake must Be So Material That it Goes to the Foundation of the Agreement

In Hackett v Hackett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1041875 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), on January 12, 2006, the parties settled their divorce action and executed a written settlement agreement, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce. Under the terms of the settlement agreement, the marital residence, which then had an estimated fair market value of $465,000, was awarded to the defendant, and she assumed responsibility for repayment of a first mortgage and a home equity loan with a combined outstanding balance of $195,124. The plaintiff was awarded sole ownership of his restaurant business, which had an appraised value of between $360,000 to $385,000, but which the parties agreed to value, for purposes of the settlement, at only $325,000. The defendant also agreed, inter alia, to waive her right to seek valuation of the plaintiff's certification as a public accountant, which he acquired during the marriage. An accompanying "Schedule A" listed the dollar values of the assets being allocated to each party, and purportedly equalized the division of assets by requiring the plaintiff to pay the defendant the sum of $19,336. The parties acknowledged in open court that they had read and understood the terms of the settlement agreement, and had not been forced or coerced into signing it. In January 2008, the plaintiff commenced an action, seeking to reform the settlement agreement on the ground that an alleged mutual mistake had resulted in the unequal division of the marital assets. The plaintiff alleged that the settlement agreement contained a "computational error" on Schedule A that undervalued the defendant's share of the marital assets, resulting in a windfall to her in excess of $100,000. The plaintiff maintained that this represented a mutual mistake because certain language in the agreement expressed an intent to equally divide the parties' assets. The defendant denied that the calculation of marital assets set forth in the settlement agreement was a mistake in light of, inter alia, her assumption of all of the marital debt and the parties' stipulation to undervalue the plaintiff's business. The defendant also requested an award of counsel fees in connection with her defense of the terms of the settlement agreement and her counterclaims for enforcement of certain of its provisions. After a hearing a court attorney referee issued a report and recommendations which, inter alia, recommended that the cause of action seeking reformation of the settlement agreement be denied and that the defendant be awarded a counsel fee in the sum of $10,000. Supreme Court granted plaintiff's motion to reject the report and recommendations, and concluded that the settlement agreement should be reformed because there had been a mutual mistake in calculating the value of the assets allocated to each party that undermined their intent to divide their assets equally. The court reformed the settlement agreement to require the defendant to pay the plaintiff $100,276.50.

The Appellate Division reversed. It observed that although a mutual mistake by the parties may form the basis for reformation of a marital settlement agreement, the mistake must be 'so material that it goes to the foundation of the agreement. To overcome the heavy presumption that a deliberately prepared and executed written instrument manifested the true intention of the parties, evidence of a very high order is required. The party seeking reformation must show clearly and beyond doubt that there has been a mutual mistake, and must show "with equal clarity and certainty 'the exact and precise form and import that the instrument ought to be made to assume, in order that it may express and effectuate what was really intended by the parties. It held that plaintiff failed to meet his high burden of proof of demonstrating that, as a result of a mutual mistake, the settlement agreement did not reflect the true intent of both parties with respect to the distribution of the marital estate, and that the precise form the agreement was intended to take would require the defendant to pay the plaintiff the sum of $100,276.50. The plaintiff testified at the hearing that the parties intended to divide their assets equally, and that this intention was not fulfilled because a computational error resulted in the defendant's receipt of assets that exceeded the stipulated value of the assets he received. According to the defendant, however, the settlement agreement, which was the product of extensive negotiations, conformed to her expectation that she would be awarded title to the marital residence in exchange for her assumption of marital debt and relinquishment of her claims to the plaintiff's business, an interest in his certification as a public accountant, and spousal maintenance. The defendant testified that she would not have entered into the agreement had she been aware that she would be required to pay the plaintiff the sum of $100,276.50 to precisely equalize the stipulated value of the assets allocated to each party. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff did not show, clearly and beyond doubt, that the settlement agreement was the result of mutual rather than unilateral mistake, and that it must be reformed to require the defendant to pay him $100,276.50 in order to effectuate the true intent of both parties.

Child Custody - Award - Standing - Natural Parent Has Standing to Seek Legal Custody of His or Her Child

In Matter of Sanchez v Bonilla, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 1043094 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in dismissing the petition in which the mother sought orders of custody for her two teenaged children. A natural parent has standing to seek legal custody of his or her child (see Domestic Relations Law § 70 [a]. According to the petitioner, the children's father abandoned the children and, due to their immigration status, they could be returned to El Salvador where they had been subjected to abuse by family members and threats by gang members. The petitioner alleged that awarding her custody would be in the best interests of the children, since it would enable the children to apply for special immigrant juvenile status. Since the Family Court dismissed the petition without conducting a hearing or considering the best interests of the children, it remitted the matter to the Family Court for a hearing and a new determination of the custody petition thereafter.

Child Support - Award - Emancipation - Conduct of Child in Refusing Relationship Constitutes Emancipation

In Matter of Jurgielewicz v Johnson,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 715382 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that under the doctrine of constructive emancipation, a child of employable age who actively abandons the noncustodial parent by refusing all contact and visitation may forfeit any entitlement to support. A child's mere reluctance to see a parent is not abandonment. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the Family Court's determination, the father met his burden of establishing that the child was constructively emancipated. The father established that a substantial change had taken place in his relationship with the child. The child had attained the age of 18, rendering her of employable age and, thus, capable of becoming constructively emancipated. The evidence at the hearing established that the father consistently made a serious effort to maintain a relationship with the child during the relevant time period. The father regularly called the child at the mother's home, but his calls would either go unanswered, or, according to the mother, the child would refuse to speak with him. The father testified that he left messages indicating his willingness to participate in counseling with the child, but these offers were not accepted. On special occasions, the father left gifts and cards for the child that the child did not acknowledge. The father also contacted the child's therapist and suggested therapeutic visitation with the child. The child refused this offer. The evidence demonstrated that, during the relevant period of time, the father's behavior was not a primary cause of the deterioration in his relationship with the child. Accordingly, the Family Court should have granted the father's petition to terminate his child support obligation on the ground of constructive emancipation.

Child Support - Modification - Upward - Substantial Change in Circumstances - Change of Circumstance Established Where Visitation Ceased, and the Mother's Expenses Related to the Child Increased Significantly

In Matter of Kay v DeSantis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 715387 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which, after a hearing, granted the mother's petition for an upward modification of the child support obligation set forth in a child support order dated August 4, 2011. At the time the support order entered on consent was issued, the parties shared physical custody of the child. Visitation between the father and the child subsequently ceased, and the mother's expenses related to the child increased significantly as a result of the child living exclusively with her. This change constituted a substantial change in circumstances sufficient to warrant the modification of the father's child support obligation.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Continuing Jurisdiction - Inconvenient Forum - Domestic Relations Law §§ 76-a[3], 76-f -

In Greenfield v Greenfield,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 840455 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.)the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which held that the State of California was the more appropriate forum to determine any custody and visitation matters affecting the parties' child, and declined to continue to exercise jurisdiction over such matters. The Appellate Division observed that a court of this State which has jurisdiction under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act may decline to exercise jurisdiction if it finds that New York is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum (Domestic Relations Law § 76-f[1]). The child had lived in California since August 2011 with the permission of the defendant, who maintained a residence in Utah. Evidence regarding the child's care, well being, and personal relationships was more readily available in California. There was no evidence that the child retained substantial connections with New York or that significant evidence existed in this State. The Superior Court of Napa County, California (hereinafter the California court) was familiar with the family and the pending issues, and the court was willing to exercise jurisdiction. Additionally, an attorney for the child based in the same state as the child can far more effectively communicate with the child than an attorney across the country. Although the parties had previously agreed, in August 2011, that New York would retain jurisdiction of custody and visitation matters, the agreement was outweighed by the other relevant factors.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Presumption Rebutted - Not Improvident Exercise its Discretion in Denying Interim Counsel Fees Where Wife Had Substantial Assets

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) - Presumptive Amount Not Awarded Where Prior Family Court Order

In Jordan v Jordan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 740600 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1979, they separated in 1996 and the action was commenced in 2012. There were four children of the marriage, all but one of whom are emancipated. Plaintiff (wife) was not employed and defendant (husband) was a cardiologist with a history of earning $480,000 annually. Since the entry of an order of Family Court in 2000, the husband paid the wife $1,057 biweekly for spousal maintenance and $3,573.04 biweekly for child support, totaling just over $10,000 monthly. After commencing this action, the wife moved for temporary maintenance and child support, seeking a total of approximately $14,000 monthly. She also sought $15,000 in interim counsel fees and the full amount of her business valuation expert's retainer fee. Supreme Court acknowledged the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance that the wife was entitled to pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a)(c), but concluded that the parties' circumstances warranted an interim award to be paid in the same manner and amount as set forth in the 2000 order. The court noted that the husband had continued to pay the child support amount included in the 2000 order despite the emancipation of three of the children. The court also considered the husband's other contributions to the support of the family, the respective financial conditions of both parties and the wife's reasonable needs. Given the wife's substantial assets, the court also declined to award her interim counsel fees "at this juncture," and ordered that the husband pay one half of the retainer fee for the wife's expert. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that a cursory examination of the parties' respective financial circumstances revealed that the wife was able to meet her reasonable expenses with the amount she has been receiving pursuant to the 2000 order.

Agreements - Construction - Child Support - Emancipation - Child Emancipated Where He Lived with Father , a "Permanent Residence Away from the Residence of the Wife"

In Lacy v Lacy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 552323 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court which denied defendant wife's motion for child support arrears and granted plaintiff husband's cross motion to terminate his child support obligations due to the child's emancipation. The evidence established that pursuant to the parties' divorce settlement agreement, which required plaintiff to pay defendant child support until the children became emancipated and defined emancipation as including having a "[p]ermanent residence away from the residence of the Wife," plaintiff was properly relieved of his child support obligations. The motion court correctly determined that the parties' youngest son, the only unemancipated child, continuously resided with plaintiff, who had been paying the majority of the child's expenses, including educational and medical costs, since May 2011. Contrary to defendant's argument, the child's residence with defendant in New York was not a temporary residence akin to a college dormitory. Although he attended college in New York, he resided with plaintiff during at least one summer vacation, received mail at his father's residence, and obtained a New York City driver's license listing his father's address. In contrast, he visited defendant's home in Connecticut sporadically, during portions of his college vacations. In addition, both parties acknowledged that the child preferred to live in New York.

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Agreement Sustained Where Husband a Savvy Businessman and Financial Expert, Appeared to Have Negotiated the Very Deal He Obtained.

In A.B. v Y.B. 2014 WL 553191 (N.Y.Sup.) plaintiff A.B. moved for an order directing that the child support provisions of the parties' Settlement Agreement, dated April 6, 2012, be rescinded and declared null and void, or in the alternative, the entire Settlement Agreement be rescinded and declared null and void. Defendant Y.B. cross moved for an order declaring the parties' Settlement Agreement to be valid and enforceable. The parties were married in 1997 and there were three unemancipated children of the marriage. The parties separated in January, 2009, and then again in May, 2010. Plaintiff was a 50% equity partner in a brokerage firm. Defendant was owner and operator of a business. On April 6, 2012, after ongoing mediation sessions lasting several years, the parties entered into a Settlement Agreement. The gravamen of plaintiff's challenge to the child support provisions of the Agreement were they are "overreaching, egregiously inequitable, manifestly unfair and unconscionable" and he was not adequately advised by the mediator, or competently represented by legal counsel regarding the Agreement. He claimed he was never advised that courts may "cap" income for child support purposes when it exceeds $136,000, and that it is "standard" for courts to cap income for child support purposes at an amount less than 100% of the combined parental income when it exceeds $136,000. He argued that a court "would almost invariably" have capped his income for child support purposes at an amount far less than 100% of his income, likely between a range of $250,000 to $400,000. The parties did not exchange Statements of Net Worth and agreed to use their 2010 income information to make support calculations as no 2011 federal tax return had been prepared at the time of the negotiation and signing of the Agreement. The parties also agreed that irrespective of plaintiff's earned income for 2011, his imputed income would be $1.2 million in computing child support under the Child Support Standard Act. This figure was based upon a draw from plaintiff's business, an amount that plaintiff contended did not reflect his actual earned and investment income.

Supreme Court held that plaintiff failed to establish a sufficient basis to find the child support provisions of the Agreement were overreaching, inequitable, unfair, or unconscionable, or that plaintiff was entitled to relief from the Agreement on the basis that he was not adequately represented by legal counsel. Plaintiff, a savvy businessman and financial expert, appeared to have negotiated the very deal he obtained. His own e-mail communications supported this fact. Moreover, there is no requirement that a court or parties "cap" combined parental income at any specific amount over the initial $136,000. The court concluded that the evidence demonstrated the plaintiff, who was possessed of sophistication, expertise, and intellect in financial matters, was personally involved in all aspects of the extensive negotiations, that he personally proposed the deal that was ultimately accepted, repeatedly refined his own proposal, and signed the Agreement, and initialed each page, including the final page that stated he clearly understood and assented to the Agreement. Throughout the negotiations and preparation of the Agreement, he was represented by legal counsel. Plaintiff's claims regarding the inadequacy of his legal representation, misadvice by the mediator, and his ignorance as to the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act and the "standard" application of the cap within the context of the CSSA were completely belied by the language in the Agreement, much of it. The court found that the Agreement was negotiated over a lengthy period of time, was prepared by independent counsel, and reviewed by plaintiff's own counsel. At all times, plaintiff was assisted by his own counsel who actively participated in the negotiations, preparation, and execution of the Agreement. The court noted plaintiff produced no affirmation from prior attorney or anyone else corroborating any of his allegations regarding her failure to properly advise him, or that she operated under a conflict of interest because the mediator recommended her. The court declared the Agreement to be valid and enforceable.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Children - Immigration - 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J) -Special Immigrant Juvenile Status- No Restriction as to Who May Qualify as a Guardian.

In Matter of Marisol N.H., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 444170 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the children, Samuel D.H., Marisol N.H., and Silvia J.H., ages 19, 18, and 16, respectively, were born in El Salvador to Miriam A.G. (mother) and Leonidas H. (father). According to the allegations made in support of the petitions, the father drank often, and he verbally and physically abused the mother. When Samuel was just four years old, the mother left the father, taking the children with her to her mother's home. The father never again had meaningful contact with the children; he did not provide them with any financial support, give them any birthday or Christmas presents, or show any interest in them. It was further alleged that in El Salvador, in the small neighborhood where the mother and the children settled, now abandoned by their father, they lived under the constant threat of violence from gangs. Members of a certain gang threatened to kill Samuel, as they did with many other children, if he refused to join their ranks, and they tried to extort money from his grandmother in exchange for sparing his life. Samuel knew nine children, one a close friend, who had refused to join that gang and were later killed. One gang member told the mother he would kill her, if she did not have sexual relations with him. The perilous situation led the mother to leave El Salvador for the United States so that she could establish a safe home for the children. She found work and lived with family and friends, saving money so that she could bring the children to her. Meanwhile, though, Samuel had stopped attending school because gang members had continued to threaten to kill him if he did not join them. Fearing for Samuel's life, the mother arranged for him to travel to the United States. Marisol and Silvia stayed behind with their grandmother. Subsequently, while the children's grandmother was walking home from work, she was killed by members of that gang. Three gang members were arrested for the murder, but the threats did not abate; other gang members threatened the lives of all the members of the mother's family. Marisol and Silvia stopped attending school, and would only leave their house if an unrelated adult male accompanied them. The mother then brought Marisol and Silvia to the United States. Now, the children lived with their mother in Nassau County, along with their teenaged uncle, Javier, who was left orphaned by the death of the children's grandmother.

The mother, who was Javier's legal guardian, worked 60 hours per week in order to support him and the children.

The children petitioned the Family Court for the appointment of the mother as their guardian so that they could pursue special immigrant juvenile status (SIJS) as a means to obtaining lawful residency status in the United States, and be freed from the fear of being returned to El Salvador, where they would have no parent to support and protect them. At a conference Family Court concluded that a best interests hearing was not warranted, inter alia, because the children had the "mother to protect them." There was "no reason," even if it was just "strictly for immigration purposes," to award the mother guardianship "of her own children." The Family Court dismissed the petitions without prejudice for failure to state a cause of action.

The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Chambers, reversed. She observed that to obtain SIJS status the child, or someone acting on his or her behalf, must first petition a state juvenile court to issue an order making special findings of fact that the child is dependent upon a juvenile court or legally committed to an individual appointed by a state or juvenile court. A state juvenile court must find that reunification with one or both parents is not viable due to parental abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis, and that it is not in the child's best interests to be returned to his or her home country (see 8 USC § 1101[a][27][J][iii]; 8 CFR 204.11[c]; Matter of Marcelina M.-G. v Israel S., 112 AD3d at 107). In order to satisfy the requirement that the subject children be legally committed to an individual appointed by a state or juvenile court, they requested that their natural mother be appointed as their guardian. An infant includes a person less than 21 years of age who consents to the appointment of a guardian (see Family Ct Act § 661[a]).

The Second Department found that the Family Court has the statutory authority to appoint a natural parent to be the guardian of his or her children. Family Court Act § 661 provides that "the provisions of the surrogate's court procedure act shall apply to the extent they are applicable to guardianship of the person of a minor or infant and do not conflict with the specific provisions of this act" (Family Ct Act § 661[a]). Under the Surrogate's Court Procedure Act, "any person" (SCPA 1703) may petition to be named as guardian of an infant, and a guardian is "[a]ny person to whom letters of guardianship have been issued by a court of this state, pursuant to this act, the family court act or article 81 of the mental hygiene law" (SCPA 103[24]). Since these statutes are without limitation, they include even the appointment of a natural parent as guardian. The Court concluded that the Family Court has the statutory authority to grant a natural parent's petition for guardianship of his or her child, regardless of whether the petition is opposed.

The Court also held that Family Court erred in refusing to conduct a hearing to determine whether granting the guardianship petition would be in the best interests of the children. "When considering guardianship appointments, the infant's best interests are paramount". The fact that a child has one fit parent available to care for him or her "does not, by itself, preclude the issuance of special findings under the SIJS statute." Rather, a child may be eligible for SIJS findings "where reunification with just one parent is not viable as a result of abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar state law basis". Moreover, in determining whether it is in the best interests of a child to grant a guardianship petition, it is entirely consistent with the legislative aim of the SIJS statute to consider the plight the child would face if returned to his or her native country and placed in the care of a parent who had previously abused, neglected, or abandoned him or her. In this case there were sufficient allegations in the guardianship petitions and supporting papers to suggest that naming the mother as guardian of the subject children would be in their best interests. The father abandoned the children (see Matter of Marcelina M.-G. v Israel S., 112 AD3d at 110, 114). If the children were returned to their native country, they may be separated from their only other parent, who first left El Salvador because she was threatened with sexual assault and wanted to earn enough money to bring the children to the United States. The children will not have the protection of their grandmother who became their temporary, de facto guardian in El Salvador once the mother immigrated to the United States, as members of a gang murdered her. Alone, without either parent or their maternal grandmother, the children would face the prospect of having to protect themselves from violent gang members, which, cruelly, may be possible only by joining them. Naming the mother as guardian of the children may potentially enable the children to pursue legal status in the United States. If legal status is granted, the children may avoid being separated from their mother and instead keep their family intact and safe, away from the perils present in El Salvador.

Children - Immigration - 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J) -Special Immigrant Juvenile Status- No Restriction as to Who May Qualify as a Guardian - Fact That the Petitioner Was the Child's Mother Was Not an Automatic Bar to the Granting of Her Petition

In Matter of Maura A.R.-R.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 444196 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Santos F.R. (mother) filed a petition to be appointed guardian of her daughter, Maura A.R.-R., for the purpose of obtaining an order declaring that the child was dependent on the Family Court and making specific findings that she was unmarried and under 21 years of age, that reunification with her father was not viable due to abandonment, and that it would not be in her best interests to be returned to El Salvador, her previous country of nationality and last habitual residence, so as to enable her to petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status (SIJS) pursuant to 8 USC 1101(a)(27)(J). The mother moved an order making the requisite declaration and special findings to enable the child to petition for SIJS. Family Court, in effect, denied the motion and dismissed the proceeding on the grounds that there was "no proof or need shown for an order of guardianship," and there was no showing that the child "cannot return to El Salvador." The Appellate Division reversed. It held that there is no restriction as to who may qualify as a guardian under the Family Court Act, which permits the appointment of a guardian for "a person who is less than twenty-one years old who consents to the appointment or continuation of a guardian after the age of eighteen" (Family Ct Act § 661[a]). Thus, the fact that the petitioner was the child's mother was not an automatic bar to the granting of her petition (citing Matter of Marisol N.H., — AD3d ----; [decided herewith] Matter of Maria E.S.G. v. Jose C.G.L., --- AD3d ---- [decided herewith]; Matter of Juana A.C.S. v. Dagoberto D., --- AD3d ---- [decided herewith]; Matter of Maria

G.G.U. v. Pedro H.P., --- AD3d ---- [decided herewith].] When considering guardianship appointments, the infant's best interests are paramount". Based upon its independent factual review, it found that the child's best interests would be served by the appointment of the mother as her guardian and that the child was dependent on the Family Court. It also found that because the child's father abandoned her, reunification with her father was and that it would not be in the child's best interests to be returned to El Salvador.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Factors - Imputed Income - Unemployed Husbands Obstructionist Tactics Warrants Award of Counsel Fees to Wife

In GT v AT,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 517468 (N.Y.Sup.) the parties were married on December 19, 1987. They had two children, one of whom was 21. The defendant was an engineer. Prior to trial, the parties reached a settlement regarding custody and during the trial they reached a settlement regarding child support and equitable distribution of all of their real estate holdings. The court issued a trial decision on the remaining issues of marital debt, personal property and counsel fees. Supreme Court observed that "[p]ursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237(a) states that "[t]here shall be rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse." When awarding counsel fees, the court must not only consider the parties' financial positions but any delay incurred as a result of a party's obstructionist tactics (Johnson v. Chapin, 12 NY3d at 467). It was clear to the court from an admission by the defendant, who was unemployed, that he voluntarily left his employment where he was earning $90,000, and that the defendant was capable of working full time and earning at least $90,000. This figure was imputed to the defendant based upon the defendant's prior employment experience, as well as his future earning capacity in light of his educational background. The plaintiff was employed full time and earned less than $50,000 which was about half of what the court found that the defendant was capable of earning. Thus, the plaintiff was not the monied spouse for purposes of DRL § 237(a). In considering whether the defendant should be responsible for all or a portion of the plaintiff's counsel fees, the court weighed the financial circumstances of the parties and any actions taken by either party to prolong, obfuscate or delay the orderly process of this trial. It found that the defendant engaged in a pattern of obstructionist conduct which unnecessarily delayed and increased the legal fees incurred in the litigation. For example, the defendant's motion to recuse, filed on the eve of trial, could only be viewed as a delay tactic. In spite of the court's repeated explanation to the defendant that the plaintiff's action was based on irretrievable breakdown which cannot be overcome by the defendant's testimony at trial once the plaintiff swore to the fact that the marriage has irretrievably broken down for a period of at least six months prior to the commencement of the action, the defendant persisted in litigating and contesting grounds. As a result of the defendant's conduct, the plaintiff had to endure twelve days of trial rather than the three or four days that it should have taken. The court held that defendant was responsible for all of the plaintiff's counsel fees for trial.

Agreements - Enforcement - Waiver - Party Claiming a Waiver must Come Forward with Evidence of a Voluntary and Intentional Relinquishment of a Known and Otherwise Enforceable Right

In Matter of Hinck v Hinck, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 128376 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into their judgment of divorce obligated the father to pay the mother child support of $2,500 per month and maintenance in the sum of $400 per month. The mother commenced a separate plenary action in the Supreme Court seeking to set aside the stipulation. During the months of April 2008 through September 2009, the mother did not cash the checks that the father sent to her in accordance with his support obligations, because her counsel in the plenary action advised that to do so would ratify the terms of the stipulation she was trying to set aside. After the mother's plenary action was dismissed she requested that the father issue a new check to cover the child support and maintenance payments that she had previously declined to cash, and he refused. The mother filed a petition in Family Court alleging that the father had violated the terms of the stipulation of settlement and seeking its enforcement. The Family Court granted the mother's petition and issued orders directing the entry of money judgments in favor of her and against the father in the sums of $45,000 for child support arrears and $7,500 for maintenance arrears. The Family Court subsequently denied the father's objections with respect to his obligation to pay $45,000 for child support arrears and granted his objection with respect to his obligation to pay maintenance arrears only to the extent of reducing his payment to $7,200 for such arrears.

The Appellate Division rejected the fathers argument that the mother waived her right to receive child support and maintenance upon her voluntary and intentional decision not to cash the checks that he sent to her during the period from April 2008 through September 2009. A valid waiver " 'requires no more than the voluntary and intentional abandonment of a known right which, but for the waiver would have been enforceable. It may arise by either an express agreement or by such conduct or failure to act as to evince an intent not to claim the purported advantage. A waiver is not created by negligence, oversight, or thoughtlessness, and cannot be inferred from mere silence (Peck v. Peck, 232 A.D.2d 540, 540, 649 N.Y.S.2d 22). Rather, there must be proof that there was a voluntary and intentional relinquishment of a known and otherwise enforceable right. The party claiming a waiver must come forward with evidence of a voluntary and intentional relinquishment of a known and otherwise enforceable right to child support. It found that the father failed to prove that the mother's decision not to cash the child support and maintenance checks constituted a voluntary and intentional relinquishment of her right to those payments. The mother's decision not to cash the checks was based upon the advice of her counsel in the plenary action so as to preserve and support her claim that she was entitled to an increase in child support and maintenance payments. The father did not come forward with any evidence showing that the mother intended to abandon her rights to child support and maintenance payments. In fact, she was seeking an increase in such payments. Upon the dismissal of the mother's plenary action, the terms of the parties' stipulation of settlement remained unchanged, intact, and enforceable. Since the father failed to prove an express or implied waiver by the mother of her right to the child support and maintenance payments from April 2008 through September 2009, he remained bound by the contractual obligations in the stipulation of settlement.

Divorce - Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Judgment of Divorce Generally must Include Equitable Distribution of the Parties' Property

In Herchenroder v. Herchenroder — N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 148538 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Plaintiff (husband) and defendant (wife) were married in 1989 and the husband commenced a divorce action in 2009. The wife's answer and counterclaim included a demand for equitable distribution. On the first day of trial, the husband put in proof supporting the grounds that he had asserted for a divorce and he then rested. Before the second day of trial, the husband ostensibly contacted the wife indicating that he planned to seek permission to withdraw his complaint with leave to refile under the recently enacted no-fault cause of action (Domestic Relations Law § 170[7]). He made the application when the parties appeared in court the next morning, but Supreme Court denied the motion and directed the wife to proceed. However, she had excused her witnesses apparently upon the assumption that the husband's motion was going to be granted and she was thus not prepared to proceed. Based on the evidence from the first day of trial, Supreme Court then granted the husband a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. Further, the court noted the many delays that had already occurred and, because no proof had been presented relevant to equitable distribution, held that the parties had waived judicial intervention on the issue and made no award. The Appellate Division modified. It held that in the absence of a duly executed agreement by the parties regarding distribution of their property, a judgment of divorce generally must include equitable distribution of the parties' property Here, there was no such an agreement. Moreover, the wife was making a claim for equitable distribution in the divorce action and had planned to present proof in such regard. Under the circumstances, she should have been accorded a brief adjournment so as to be able to attempt to present her proof regarding equitable distribution. The judgment was modified, on the law, by reversing so much thereof as failed to order equitable distribution of the parties' marital property and the matter was remitted to the Supreme Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's decision.

Maintenance Pendente Lite - Award - Reduction in Presumptive Amount of Temporary Maintenance Appropriate Based upon Considerations of Pre-divorce Separate Households Maintained by the Parties, and Overall Assessment of the Combined Presumptive Support Awards in Relation to Resources Available to the Parties.

In Lawlor Davis v Davis, 2012 WL 10207966 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52504(U) (Sup Ct 2012) the plaintiff ("wife") filed a motion requesting pendente lite relief. The defendant ("husband") opposed the motion. The parties resolved some of the issues and only the issues of child support, temporary maintenance, construction loan payments and counsel fees remained.

The parties were married on August 3, 2002. They had two children, and agreed to share joint custody, with primary physical custody to the wife. The wife resided in the former marital residence, with the two children. This residence was a rented property, as the parties were in the process of constructing a new home when the parties separated. The husband left the marital residence on October 5, 2011.

The wife was employed in her father's business and earned $38,232.00 per year. The husband was an engineer, and earned $118,137.00 per year. The husband's attorney alleged that the husband provided health insurance coverage for the family through his employer, and contributed $99.51 to the cost of that coverage on a biweekly basis. The parties purchased a parcel of vacant land in 2009, with the intention of building a home on the property where the family would reside. They previously owned a house, which they sold in October 2011. In order to build the new house, the parties secured a construction loan in the amount of $417,000.00. While construction of the home had begun, it had not been completed, and all work has stopped. The parties currently paid $1,665.00 per month on the loan. The husband did not provide an affidavit in opposition to the motion, and the representations by the attorney were considered hearsay, as the attorney did not demonstrate any first-hand knowledge of the claims made in the affirmation.

The Court found that the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance was $22,516.00 per year, or $433.00 per week. The calculation of presumptive child support amount payable by the husband was $21,825.58 per year, or $419.72 per week. Taking the two presumptive amounts together, the husband would be required to pay $852.72 per week, or $44,341.44 per year, in combined support. When this amount was added to the disposable income attributable to each party under such an award, the wife nets $80,016.44 per year, and the husband nets $65,460.56 per year.

Supreme Court observed that while the statutes that govern child support and temporary maintenance provide the Court with factors to consider when the Court has determined that the amount of basic child support is unjust or inappropriate, these factors do not specifically provide direct tools for a court to evaluate a significant shift in resources created by the two presumptive support calculations. It noted that courts have dealt with this in slightly different ways depending upon the specifics of each case. In Margaret A. v. Shawn B. (31 Misc.3d 769 [Sup Court, Westchester County 2011]), the court awarded the presumptive amount for both child support and temporary maintenance. However, the payee was required to pay all of the expenses for the marital residence, as well as all expenses for herself and the children, with the exception of medical, dental, and life insurance coverage. In Scott M. v. Ilona M. (31 Misc.3d 353, 363 [Sup Ct, Kings County 2011]), the Court noted that "[g]ranted a deviation just because there is a resource shift would be inconsistent with the statutory intent. The economic intent of the statute clearly is to shift resources."The Court relied on the factors relating to the existence and expense of the pre-divorce household, as well as the substantial child care expense obligations that existed in that case, to reach a conclusion that a deviation regarding the temporary maintenance amount was appropriate. The Court reduced the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance by one-third and awarded the full presumptive amount of child support.

The Court declined to utilize any income above the income cap of $130,000.00 for purposes of calculating child support, and specifically noted that basing child support on the first $130,000.00 of income was appropriate "... given the amount of maintenance, the pre-standard (sic) of living and amount of resources each party is left with ...". In Martin v. Buckley (33 Misc.3d 1234[A], 2011 N.Y. Slip Op 52235 [U] [Sup Ct, Monroe County 2011]), the Court agreed in principle with the issues relating to legislative intent that were noted by the Court in Scott M. However, the Martin court stated that the court believed that consideration of the size of the award in relation to the total resources available to the parties' (sic) is a permissible qualitative factor under § 236(B)(5-a)(e)(1). Application of each of the statutory deviation factors is geared to either reduce or increase the presumptive formulaic award. Therefore, consideration of the sheer size of the presumptive award in relation to the parties' total available resources is within the scope of, or as ejusdem generis with, the enumerated sixteen deviation factors and thus does not run afoul of the new statute or its intent. The Martin court determined that a reduction in the temporary maintenance award was appropriate, and the full presumptive child support award was appropriate.

In this case, the parties outlined monthly expenses equaling $9,393.00 for the wife, and $9,225.00 for the husband. Both the husband and wife included the full amount of the monthly payment on the construction loan, as well as all of the family's automotive monthly costs, on their respective statements of net worth, which resulted in higher monthly expenses overall than are actually paid. A unique factor in this case related to the monthly expense for the construction loan for the home that was not completed, and was uninhabitable. The parties had an added debt relating to their previous future housing plans that was above and beyond their individual actual housing expenses. It was clear that this family has stretched their finances thin, and that there was no extra disposable income available to the parties.

Based upon the pre-divorce separate households maintained by the parties, and the overall assessment of the combined presumptive support awards in relation to the resources available to the parties, the Court determined that a reduction in the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance was appropriate. The Court determined that a reduction of 33%, or $7,430.28, was warranted, thus reducing the temporary maintenance award to $15,085.72 per year, or $290.11 per week.

The wife requested that the Court direct the husband to pay the monthly construction loan payment. In light of the shifting of resources based upon the maintenance and child support obligations imposed upon the husband, the Court determined that the parties should each be responsible for one-half of the monthly payment on the construction loan.

Based upon the courts analysis of the parties' financial resources, and the child support and temporary maintenance awards, the Court determined that the wife was no longer the "less monied" spouse, and, declined to award the wife counsel fees.

Divorce - Forum non Conveniens - Dismissal of Prior New York Action for a Divorce Warranted Where Parties No Longer Reside in New York and Have No Real Property in New York

In D.C. v J.C., 2014 WL 292444 (N.Y.Sup.), 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 50067(U) the parties were married on October 5, 1991 in Nassau County, New York. At the time of the filing of the summons and complaint, plaintiff was residing in Pleasant Valley, New York. Shortly after filing the complaint, plaintiff moved to Haddonfield, New Jersey; this residence was purchased by the parties on June 11, 2013 and it was intended to be the marital residence. Defendant indicated that he had been living in company provided housing in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The parties did not own any real property in New York. The parties' children were all over eighteen years of age, and maintained a legal residence with the plaintiff in New Jersey. Plaintiff was aware of no witnesses necessary to deciding this matter who would be unduly inconvenienced by the necessity of appearing in New Jersey. The plaintiff commenced an action for divorce in New Jersey, by filing a complaint on October 24, 2013.

Supreme Court observed that the doctrine of forum non conveniens permits a court, on the motion of any party, to stay or dismiss an action when, although it may have jurisdiction over a claim, the court determines that in the interest of substantial justice the action should be heard in another forum (CPLR 327[a]). On such a motion, the Supreme Court is to weigh the parties' residencies, the location of the witnesses and any hardship caused by the choice of forum, the availability of an alternative forum, the situs of the action, and the burden on the New York court system (Tiger Sourcing [HK] Ltd. v. GMAC Commercial Fin. Corporation-Can., 66 AD3d 1002 [2nd Dept 2009]). No one factor is dispositive. New York courts are not compelled to retain jurisdiction over any case which does not have a substantial nexus to New York (see Turay v. Beam Bros. Trucking, Inc., 61 AD3d 964 [2nd Dept 2009]). Here, although the parties were married in New York and resided in New York for a time, the parties currently had little or no connection to New York. They were not residents of New York, their appearance in the Dutchess County Supreme Court, would cause both parties hardship in the form of substantial travel and associated costs. There would be no witnesses prejudiced by the action being decided in New Jersey. The parties were in the process of moving to New Jersey prior to the turmoil in their marriage. Plaintiff's maintenance of a New York action, based upon advice of counsel, was to simply "put the automatic orders into effect which would protect [her] share of our assets." Accordingly, the court found that the courts of New Jersey were a particularly viable alternative forum, the plaintiff having shown that New York was genuinely inconvenient and the selected forum of New Jersey was significantly preferable (Boyle v. Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide, Inc., 110 AD3d 938 [2nd Dept 2013]). Plaintiff's motion for dismissal of the action was granted.

Child Support - Award - Test Generally Applied to Determine Whether to Award Support in Excess of the Statutory Cap Is Whether the Child Is Receiving Enough to Meet His or Her "Actual Needs and the Amount Required to Live an Appropriate Lifestyle.

In Matter of Keith v Lawrence, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 54299 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father appealed from an order of the Family Court which denied his objections to an order which, after a hearing, directed him to pay child support of $1,250 per month. The parties were the parents of one child. The mother had sole custody. After a hearing on child support, the Support Magistrate found that combined parental income was $215,818.43, of which 47% was attributable to the father.

The Support Magistrate awarded child support based on the parties' combined parental income, rather than the combined parental income cap of $130,000 in effect at the time. Although the father's monthly support payment based on the parties' combined parental income totaled $1,437 monthly, the Support Magistrate modified the amount downward to $1,250 monthly, in light of the fact that the child was receiving Social Security disability derivative benefits based on the father's active disability claim. The father filed objections arguing that the Support Magistrate erred in awarding child support based on combined parental income in excess of the $130,000 income cap. The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed "When the combined parental income exceeds $130,000, which was the "statutory cap" in effect when the order was entered, "the court shall determine the amount of child support for the combined parental income in excess of the cap through consideration of the factors set forth in Family Ct Act § 413(1)(f) and/or the child support percentage" (Family Ct Act § 413[1][c][3]). The Family Court must articulate an explanation of the basis for its calculation of child support based on parental income above the statutory cap. The Court held that test generally applied is whether the child is receiving enough to meet his or her "actual needs and the amount required to live an appropriate lifestyle" (Levesque v. Levesque, 73 AD3d 990, 990). The record indicated that the child enjoyed a middle-class lifestyle with extracurricular activities, and attended private school and summer camp. The Support Magistrate properly determined that the child's needs would be met, and her lifestyle maintained, with an award based upon applying the child support percentage to the total combined parental income.

Child Support - Award - Family Court Act § 424-a - Where Respondent Fails to Comply with Family Court Act § 424-a Court must Grant Relief Demanded in the Petition or Preclude Respondent from Offering Evidence as to Respondent's Financial Ability to Pay Support

In Matter of Speranza v Speranza, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 54521 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), in a consent support order dated November 30, 2007 issued by the Family Court the parties agreed that the father would pay child support based on his annual income of $61,467. The parties 2011 judgment of divorce incorporated but did not merge a stipulation of settlement dated December 22, 2010, in which, the parties agreed that the father's obligation to pay child support would be suspended for 15 months, after which his child support obligation would resume, as calculated pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act. In May 2012 the mother commenced a proceeding to enforce the child support provisions of the stipulation of settlement. The parties were directed to exchange and file financial information prior to the date set for a hearing. After the father failed to make any financial disclosure, the Support Magistrate granted the mother's petition, found that the father had an annual income of $61,467, based on the November 30, 2007, support order, and directed him to pay child support $186.99 weekly. The Family Court denied the father's objections. The Appellate Division observed that where a respondent in a support proceeding fails, without good cause, to comply with the compulsory financial disclosure mandated by Family Court Act § 424-a, "the court on its own motion or on application shall grant the relief demanded in the petition or shall order that, for purposes of the support proceeding, the respondent shall be precluded from offering evidence as to respondent's financial ability to pay support" (Family Ct Act § 424-a[b]). Since the father failed, without good cause, to comply with the compulsory financial disclosure mandated by Family Court Act s 424-a, the Family Court was required to either grant the relief demanded in the petition or preclude the father from offering evidence as to his financial ability to pay support. Family Court providently exercised its discretion by, in effect, granting the relief requested in the mother's petition and directing that the father pay child support based upon his annual income of $61,467.

Child Support - Hearing - Motion for Judgment as a Matter of Law Following Close of Opposing Party's Proof Does Not Waive Moving Party's Right to Present Further Evidence.

In Porter v D'Adamo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 67229 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) following a hearing, the Support Magistrate granted the mother's petition and ordered the father to pay increased child support. Family Court partially granted the father's objections and vacated the Support Magistrate's order. The Appellate Division held that the father was improperly deprived of an opportunity to present his direct case. After the mother rested her case, the Support Magistrate asked the father whether he wished to present witnesses or to renew his prior motion. The father's counsel responded that he renewed the prior motion and further moved to dismiss the modification petition in its entirety. Apparently understanding this response to mean that the father did not wish to present witnesses, the Support Magistrate reserved decision on the motions and, without asking the father whether he rested his case, closed the hearing. The father immediately objected that he had not yet presented his case and that he wished to present evidence, but the Support Magistrate responded that the ruling had been made. This was error. A motion for judgment as a matter of law following the close of the opposing party's proof "does not waive the [moving party's] right ... to present further evidence" (CPLR 4401; see Gavigan v. John Di Guilio, Inc., 84 A.D.2d 857, 858 [1981]; Uniform Rules for Family Court [22 NYCRR] 205.35[a]). The father fully preserved this issue during the hearing and in his subsequent objections. Family Court should have granted his objection on this ground and remitted the matter to the Support Magistrate to reopen the hearing and permit the father to present his case.

Maintenance Pendente Lite - Award - Income - Veterans Disability Benefits May Be Considered for the Purposes of Determining Income When Considering an Application to Receive Temporary Maintenance.

In Dachille v Dachille, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2014 WL 27960 (N.Y.Sup.) plaintiff moved for temporary maintenance and other relief. Defendant cross moved for pendente lite relief.

The parties were married on July 4, 1981, and had been living apart since June of 2010. There were no unemancipated children of the marriage. Defendant resided at the marital residence, and plaintiff resided with his cousin. Plaintiff contended that he paid the mortgage at the marital residence until June 2013. He asserted he stopped paying because defendant's boyfriend "barred" him from the marital residence, and because he could no longer afford pay the mortgage payments, $1,534, and the Chapter 13 plan payments of $2,020 per month. The parties entered Chapter 13 bankruptcy in 2008, and the Chapter 13 plan was confirmed on November 2, 2009. The plan called for the parties to pay $121,000 in 60 payments of $2,020. On August 29, 2012, plaintiff borrowed $53,262.72 from his cousin to payoff the balance of their bankruptcy plan. The bankruptcy estate closed August 2, 2013.

Plaintiff sought maintenance from defendant. Plaintiff received $2,004 per month ($24,048 annually) in social security disability benefits, $2,973 per month in veteran's disability benefits ($35,676 annually), and a Postal Workers pension of $436.18 monthly ($5,234 annually). That is $5,413.18 per month or $64,958.16 per year. Defendant wife earned $64,110 in 2012 from her job as supervisor with the United States Postal Service, together with a modest amount of deferred income.

The Court rejected plaintiff's argument that the court could not consider his Veteran's disability benefits as income to him. DRL 236(B)(5-a)(c) provides that disability benefits, veterans benefits and pension benefits must be included in gross income. DRL s 2401-b(5)(iii). Accordingly, plaintiff's income would be $64,958.16 per year. Defendant's income, minus FICA of $4,904 would be $59,206.

The court rejected the argument that 10 U.S.C. § 1408 and the authority cited in Alvarado v. Alvarado, 38 Misc.3d 1211(A), 2013 WL 196521, 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 50077

(Sup.Ct. Richmond Co. January 15, 2013), prevented consideration of veterans disability benefits for the purposes of determining plaintiff's income when considering his application to receive temporary maintenance from defendant. It observed that the Federal Uniformed Services Former Spouses' Protection Act, 10 U.S.C. § 1408, displaces the total preemption ruling concerning federal military retirement benefits in McCarty v. McCarty, 453 U.S. 210 (1981). Under USFSPA, Congress authorized state courts to distribute, with certain limitations not relevant here, disposable retired pay in a divorce proceeding. 10 U.S.C. § 1408(a)(2)(C); § 1408(a)(4). Thereafter, in Mansell v. Mansell, 490 U.S. 581 (1989), the Supreme Court further limited the authority of a state court by prohibiting distribution of disposable retired pay which constitutes that portion of retired pay that has been waived under 38 U.S.C. §5305 to receive veterans disability benefits. Neither Mansell nor 10 U.S.C. § 1408 have anything to say about the proper calculation of income for purposes of temporary or permanent maintenance, especially as it concerns the putative payee or recipient of maintenance. The federal scheme purports only to concern the division of future benefits upon equitable distribution, or an order directing that alimony or maintenance be paid out of veteran's disability payments. The statute addresses whether any final divorce decree orders payment of a portion of either disposable military retirement pay, which is permissible, or veterans disability payments that result from a waiver, which under Mansell is not permissible.

The state cases upon which plaintiff relied did not require a different result. However in Carl v. Carl, 58 AD3d 1036 (3d Dept.2009), cited in the Alvarado case, which relied on Carl for the maintenance observation, the court held that income from a private disability insurance policy, conceded to be separate property, must be considered in the maintenance calculus. In a footnote the court stated that veterans disability payments "would otherwise be precluded from consideration with respect to maintenance" (citing 10 U.S.C. s 1408 and Hoskins v. Skojec, supra). Supreme Court found that inasmuch as the court was not dealing with a veteran, or a veteran's retirement or disability payments, the observation was entirely unnecessary to the decision and therefore dictum. In the Alvarado case, the husband moved for an order declaring that, inter alia, his veterans disability payments were exempt from consideration for purposes of maintenance. Relying on Carl, the court agreed. Thus considered, Alvarado stands on no better authority than Carl itself for the proposition advanced. Therefore, the court viewed the Alvarado "precedent" as of limited probative value.

The Court held that even if it did not consider such income to plaintiff for purposes of the temporary guideline calculation, it would find any resulting guideline award to plaintiff unjust and inappropriate. Section 236(B)(5-a)(e)(1) provides that "[t]he court shall order the presumptive award of temporary maintenance in accordance with paragraphs c and d of this subdivision, unless the court finds that the presumptive award is unjust or inappropriate and adjusts the presumptive award based upon consideration of the" factors at DRL §236(B)(5-a)(e)(1). Plaintiff maintained a pre-divorce separate household for more than three years prior to the commencement of this action. DRL §236(B)(5-a)(e)(1)(ix). Plaintiff did not present any argument that he was in need of support or that he was now living below the marital standard of living. DRL

236(B)(5-a)(e)(1)(iii). Plaintiff's application failed to address how he could afford to pay the mortgage and make the Chapter 13 payments, but now required temporary spousal support. Plaintiff's application for temporary maintenance was denied. The court denied plaintiff's application that defendant contribute $500 per month toward a note to the cousin. It held that the debt of the parties shall be distributed at the time of judgment. The court had no power to distribute this debt prior to final judgment without agreement of the parties. The court ordered plaintiff to bring current and pay the mortgage on the marital residence as both parties intended to sell the residence. The court stated it would apportion any proceeds or debt considering all the facts and circumstances as presented here and developed at trial.

Supreme Court observed that exclusive occupancy of a marital residence by one party, pendente lite, is warranted only: (1) when needed to protect the safety of persons or property; or (2) when the nonmovant spouse has voluntarily established an alternative residence and that spouse's return to the marital residence would cause domestic strife. Kenner v. Kenner, 13 AD3d 52, 53 (1st Dept.2004). Although it appeared plaintiff vacated the marital residence voluntarily, there were insufficient allegations that his return would engender strife. It appeared that plaintiff has no intention of returning to the marital residence. An award of exclusive occupancy must be based upon incidents that exceed petty harassments such as the hostility and contempt admittedly demonstrated herein that are routinely part and parcel of an action for divorce." Estis v. Estis, 2002 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 2028 (Sup. Ct., Nassau Co., 2002). There were no allegations here that plaintiff was a danger to defendant. Exclusive use and occupancy was denied.

The court denied the request for counsel fees. There was a substantial parity here between the parties' incomes and the court did not perceive that either party had an advantage over the other "on the basis of sheer financial strength."

Adoption - Standing - Drl §110 - Intimate Partners - Close Personal Friends Can Be Intimate Partners for Purposes of Adoption

In Matter of Adoption of G, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2013 WL 6977880 (N.Y.Sur.), an uncontested second-parent adoption proceeding, the court held that two close personal friends, who together decided to adopt and have jointly participated in all aspects of the adoption process, and had been raising a child together, be her joint, legal adoptive parents, were "intimate partners for purposes of a second parent adoption.

KAL and LEL met in 2000 and quickly became friends. They worked together for a number of years and their friendship deepened with time. Because LEL was a very close friend, KAL confided in him, telling him of her plans to become a mother using artificial insemination. LEL offered to be the father, rather than having KAL use an anonymous sperm donor and then be a single parent. KAL agreed. After two years of trying to conceive a child, including a round of unsuccessful in-vitro fertilization, KAL and LEL decided to instead adopt a child together. KAL and LEL researched adoption options and together selected Ethiopia as the country of origin for their child. They spent years planning and hoping, when they finally received the call in 2011 that a child was waiting to be adopted. KAL and LEL traveled together to Ethiopia to meet G. for the first time. They then made a second trip to bring G. home to New York. Because KAL and LEL were not married to each other, they could not adopt G. together in Ethiopia, so KAL alone adopted her. Upon returning to the United States, KAL registered the foreign adoption in Family Court in Kings County, New York. LEL then petitioned this court to adopt G. and become her second legal parent. KAL executed a consent to the relief sought in the petition, so long as the adoption does not extinguish any of her parental rights and only if such adoption results in joint custody.

The Court found that from the moment they met G., KAL and LEL functioned as her parents. KAL and LEL considered themselves G.'s co-parents and G. knew them as her parents. G. called KAL "Mommy" and LEL "Daddy." G.'s legal surname was the last names of both KAL and LEL, hyphenated.

The Court found that LEL had standing to adopt and, together with KAL, was eligible to be one of G.'s legal parents. It pointed out that Domestic Relations Law § 110 sets forth the classes of people authorized to adopt another person in New York, including: "[a]n adult unmarried person, an adult married couple together, or any two unmarried adult intimate partners together...." The phrase "intimate partners" is not defined in the statute or elsewhere in the Domestic Relations Law, and thus interpretation of its meaning is necessary. The court found that the legislative history of the 2010 amendment to DRL § 110 confirmed its purpose was to further expand the categories of persons who may adopt in New York. The statute does not require that individuals live in the same household or have a sexual relationship in order for their relationship to be considered "intimate." The legislative history supported the interpretation of the phrase "intimate partners" to include a relationship such as the one here: very close, loving friends, who had an intimate connection, which included planning for and raising a child together. In the alternative, LEL would have standing to adopt G. as an "adult unmarried person." (DRL § 110.) The Court of Appeals said as much in Matter of Jacob, and explained that the word "together" in the statute only applies to "married persons" and "does not preclude an unmarried person in a relationship with another unmarried person from adopting." (Matter of Jacob, 86 N.Y.2d at 660.) Conferring standing on LEL under these circumstances would not terminate KAL's parental rights. DRL § 117 does not invariably require termination in the situation where the [custodial, legal] parent, having consented to the adoption, has agreed to retain parental rights and to raise the child together with the second parent. (Matter of Jacob, 86 N.Y.2d at 666-67.) The Court concluded that DRL § 117 would not terminate KAL's parental rights and did not prevent LEL's adoption of G. as requested in this petition. The court also found that it was in the best interests of G. to have both KAL and LEL as legal parents, even though they did not have a spousal or romantic relationship, and did not live together.

2013 Legislation

Laws of 2013, Ch 526, effective December 18, 2013.

The Domestic Relations Law, the Family Court Act and the Criminal Procedure Law, were amended to protect victims of domestic abuse by recognizing, as family offenses, some forms of economic abuse perpetrated against victims by their abusers. Economic abuse frequently accompanies other forms of domestic abuse perpetrated by abusers, in the family violence context, to exercise power and control over their victims and their finances. Among the long list of types of abuse cited included taking the victim's credit card and other documents; incurring debt in the survivor's name through false statements or coercion; perpetrating identity theft or otherwise incurring debt without the survivor's knowledge; preventing the victim from working; stealing the victim's paychecks or forcing the victim to turn them over to the abuser; forging the victim's signature; withholding household finances from the victim; controlling the victim's access to health insurance; exercising control over the victim's immigration status and documents; monitoring the victim's computer access and harassing the victim at work. Laws of 2013, Ch 526, effective December 18, 2013. See NY Legis Memo 526 (2013)

Family Court Act, §812 (1), Family Court Act § 821 (1) (a), Criminal Procedure Law § 530.11, were amended to add as family offenses, identity theft in the first degree, identity theft in the second degree and identity theft in the third degree (Penal Law §190.80, §190.79 and §190.38), grand larceny in the third degree and grand larceny in the fourth degree (Penal Law §155.35 and §155 30), and coercion in the second degree (Penal Law § 135.60, subdivisions one, two and three.)

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (3) (a), Domestic Relations Law § 252, Family Court Act § 446, Family Court Act § 551, Family Court Act § 656, Family Court Act § 842, Family Court Act § 1056, and Criminal Procedure Law § 530.12 were amended to provide that an order of protection may require the petitioner or respondent to promptly return specified identification documents to the protected party, in whose favor the order of protection or temporary order of protection is issued. "Identification document" means any of the following exclusively in the name of the protected party: birth certificate, passport, social security card, health insurance or other benefits card, a card or document used to access bank, credit or other financial accounts or records, tax returns, any driver's license, and immigration documents including but not limited to a United States permanent resident card and employment authorization document. Upon motion and after notice and an opportunity to be heard, "Identification document" means any of the following, including those that may reflect joint use or ownership, that the court determines are necessary and are appropriately transferred to the protected party: any card or document used to access bank, credit or other financial accounts or records, tax returns, and any other identifying cards and documents. The order may include any appropriate provision designed to ensure that any such document is available for use as evidence in the proceeding, and available if necessary for legitimate use by the party against whom the order is issued; and specify the manner in which such return shall be accomplished. Laws of 2013, Ch 480, effective November 13, 2013. See NY Legis Memo 480 (2013)

Laws of 2013, Ch 480, effective November 13, 2013

The Domestic Relations Law, the Family Court Act and the Criminal Procedure Law were amended in 2013 to protect victims of domestic violence from being charged with and prosecuted for violating their own order of protection. Domestic Relations Law § 240 (3) (b) was amended; Domestic Relations Law § 240 (3) (i) was added ; Domestic Relations Law §252 (2) was amended; Domestic Relations Law §252 subdivision 9-a was added; Family Court Act § 155 was amended; Family Court Act § 168 (3) was added; Family Court Act § 446 was amended; Family Court Act § 551 was amended; Family Court Act § 656 was amended; Family Court Act § 759 was amended; Family Court Act § 842 was amended; Family Court Act § 846 was amended by adding subdivision (a-1); Family Court Act § 1056 was amended by adding subdivision 7; Criminal Procedure Law § 140.10 (4) was amended and Criminal Procedure Law § 530.12, Subdivisions 6 and 8 was amended. The order of protection will now provide that the order will remain in effect even if the protected party has, or consents to have, contact or communication with the party against whom the order is issued, and that the protected party cannot be held to violate the order nor be arrested for violating the order. There must be a notice in the order of protection that "This order of protection will remain in effect even if the protected party has, or consents to have, contact or communication with the party against whom the order is issued. This order of protection can only be modified or terminated by the court. The protected party cannot be held to violate this order nor be arrested for violating this order."

The amendments were effective November 13, 2013 and applied to all orders of protection regardless of when such orders are issued, except for the amendments to Domestic Relations Law §240 (3) (b) and Domestic Relations Law §252 (2), which took effect on January 12, 2013 and applied to orders of protection issued on or after such effective date. Laws of 2013, Ch 480, effective November 13, 2013. See NY Legis Memo 480 (2013)

Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - A vehicle is a dangerous instrument. There is no requirement that the person using the instrument intend to cause serious physical injury.

In Matter of Nakia C., v. Johnny F.R., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6767527 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified an order of the Family Court which denied petitioner's request that the order of protection it granted remain in effect for five years and that respondent be required to participate in individual counseling and a batterer's program, and remanded the matter for reconsideration of the duration of the order of protection. It found that the court's finding that respondent committed the family offense of reckless endangerment in the second degree was undisputed and supported by the record. After threatening violence against petitioner over the telephone, respondent showed up near her home and, when she drove away with her boyfriend and one of the parties' children, engaged in a high-speed car chase in which he recklessly cut off her car, thereby "creat[ing] a substantial risk of serious physical injury to another person" (Penal Law 120.20).

It held that Family Court erred in concluding that there were no aggravating circumstances that would permit it to impose longer than a two-year duration in the order of protection, based on its finding that respondent did not use his car as a dangerous instrument because he did not intend to make or threaten dangerous contact using the car (Family Court Act §§ 842; 827[a][vii]). A dangerous instrument is "any instrument, article or substance, including a 'vehicle' as that term is defined in this section, which, under the circumstances in which it is used, attempted to be used or threatened to be used, is readily capable of causing death or other serious physical injury" (Penal Law § 10.00[13]). There is no requirement that the person using the instrument intend to cause serious physical injury.

Contempt - Civil - Judiciary Law § 475 - Second Department Clarifies Parties' Relative Burdens of Proof Where Alleged Contemnor Invokes Constitutional Privilege Against Self-incrimination, and Attempts To Harmonize Inconsistencies in the Case Law with Respect to the Elements of Civil Contempt.

In El Dehdan v El Dehdan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6641279 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court held the defendant in contempt of court for disobeying a court order dated January 29, 2010, which required him to deposit with the plaintiff's attorney the proceeds of a certain real estate transaction and imposed a civil sanction which allowed him to purge the contempt to avoid incarceration. In affirming the order, Justice Angiolillo, in an opinion for the Second Department Court, clarified the parties' relative burdens of proof where the alleged contemnor has invoked the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, and attempted to harmonize inconsistencies in the case law with respect to the elements of civil contempt.

Throughout their lengthy marriage, the parties acquired substantial marital property and had a dry cleaning business. Two parcels of real property were relevant to the issues in this appeal: a parcel on Ainslie Street in Brooklyn (Brooklyn property), and a parcel on 60th Road in Maspeth, Queens (Queens property). In 2008, the plaintiff commenced the action. On February 24, 2009, the defendant entered into a contract to sell the Brooklyn property for $950,000 to Zackmaxie, LLC, and the transfer was completed by deed dated March 31, 2009. On April 6, 2009, he transferred the Queens property by deed to Mustafa Othman, apparently without consideration. When the defendant failed to appear for further proceedings, the court denied his motion to dismiss and referred the matter to the referee for an inquest on the grounds for divorce and equitable distribution. On December 4, 2009, the referee issued findings of fact and a determination which awarded the plaintiff a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and provided for equitable distribution, awarding her, among other things, the Brooklyn and Queens properties. Shortly thereafter, the plaintiff learned of the March 2009 transfer and the April 2009 transfer. On January 29, 2010, on the plaintiff's motion, the Supreme Court issued an order, which directed the defendant to "deposit immediately" with the plaintiff's attorney the net proceeds of the March 2009 transfer, that is, "the sum of nine hundred fifty thousand ($950,000.00) dollars ..., minus the money paid for real estate broker, transfer taxes and payment of the underlying mortgage." The defendant failed to deposit the proceeds of the March 2009 transfer with the plaintiff's attorney.

In August 2010, the plaintiff moved to hold the defendant in civil and criminal contempt for violating the January 2010 Order. Supreme Court appointed a referee to hear and report on the issue. At the hearing defendant conceded that he had received a copy of the January 2010 Order and that he had not deposited any money with the plaintiff's attorney pursuant to that order. He stipulated to the admission into evidence of all relevant documents and evidence concerning the Brooklyn property and the March 2009 transfer, including the closing statement. The defendant invoked his constitutional privilege against self-incrimination in response to all questions relating to the proceeds of the March 2009 transfer, and whether he owned an account at Washington Mutual. The referee made findings that the defendant had dissipated marital assets and may have transferred assets without fair consideration after the plaintiff commenced this action, but recommended denial of the motion on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to meet her burden of establishing either civil or criminal contempt. In an order dated September 12, 2011, the Supreme Court granted the plaintiff's motion to set aside the referee's report and recommendation, determining that the referee's findings were not supported by the record and that the defendant was in contempt of court by failing to abide by the terms of the January 2010 Order. The court found that the requirements to hold the defendant in civil contempt had been satisfied because the defendant was aware of the lawful and unequivocal requirements of the January 2010 Order, and disobeyed that order with full knowledge of its terms. The court also noted that while the defendant was entitled to rely upon his constitutional privilege against self-incrimination in response to questions relating to the proceeds of the March 2009 transfer, the privilege did not protect him from the consequences of his failure to submit competent proof that he had no access to the proceeds. The court directed that the defendant could purge his contempt and avoid imprisonment by complying with certain conditions, including the payment of the proceeds from the March 2009 transfer. The court did not impose the criminal sanction of a definite jail term without the opportunity to purge the contempt, thus granting, in effect, only that branch of the plaintiff's motion which was to find the defendant in civil contempt (see Matter of Rubackin v. Rubackin, 62 AD3d 11, 15-16).

The defendant contended on appeal that the plaintiff failed to satisfy her burden of establishing civil contempt because the March 2009 transfer did not violate any court order and the plaintiff failed to adduce evidence that the defendant still possessed the proceeds of the March 2009 transfer when he received the January 2010 Order, such that he had the ability to comply. The plaintiff responded that she made a prima facie showing satisfying all elements of civil contempt, at which point the burden shifted to the defendant to show his inability to comply with the January 2010 Order, and that he failed to meet that burden.

The Appellate Division observed that a motion to punish a party for civil contempt is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and the movant bears the burden of proving the contempt by clear and convincing evidence. In Matter of McCormick v. Axelrod (59 N.Y.2d 574), the Court of Appeals held that the civil contempt must be proved "with reasonable certainty". The "reasonable certainty" standard requires "a quantum of proof ... greater than a preponderance of evidence but less than proof beyond a reasonable doubt ... akin to the clear and convincing evidence standard". In addressing the elements of civil contempt which must be proved by clear and convincing evidence, the court is guided by Judiciary Law § 750, et seq. The section applicable to civil contempt permits a court "to punish, by fine and imprisonment, or either, a neglect or violation of duty, or other misconduct, by which a right or remedy of a party to a civil action or special proceeding, pending in the court may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced," in various circumstances including, as relevant here, "any other disobedience to a lawful mandate of the court" (Judiciary Law § 753[A][3]). By contrast, a court may impose punishment for criminal contempt where a person is guilty of "[w]ilful disobedience to [the court's] lawful mandate" or "[r]esistance wilfully offered to [the court's] lawful mandate" (Judiciary Law § 750[A][3], [4]). Notably, for civil but not criminal contempt, there must be a finding that a "right or remedy of a party to a civil action or special proceeding, pending in the court may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced" (Judiciary Law § 753[A]). An order of civil contempt must include an express finding that this element has been satisfied, but an omission of the finding may be supplied on appeal where the record supports it. The element of prejudice to a party's rights is essential to civil contempt, which aims to vindicate the rights of a private party to litigation, but not criminal contempt, which aims to vindicate the authority of the court. Another notable distinction between the two kinds of contempt is that subdivision (3) of the civil contempt statute, at issue here, does not include the words "wilful" and "wilfully," which are included in the criminal contempt statute. The absence of the term "wilful" from paragraph (3) of the civil contempt statute, authorizing sanctions "for any other disobedience to a lawful mandate of the court" (Judiciary Law § 753[A][3]), indicated that the legislature, by inference, intentionally omitted or excluded the requirement of willfulness.

The Court concluded that for the plaintiff to prevail on her motion to hold the defendant in civil contempt, she was required to prove by clear and convincing evidence "(1) that a lawful order of the court, clearly expressing an unequivocal mandate, was in effect, (2) that the order was disobeyed and the party disobeying the order had knowledge of its terms, and (3) that the movant was prejudiced by the offending conduct". The use of the words "willful" and "willfully" in some of the Courts cases involving civil contempt, should not be construed to import the element of willfulness into a civil contempt motion made pursuant to Judiciary Law § 753(A)(3). It is not necessary that the disobedience be deliberate or willful; rather, the mere act of disobedience, regardless of its motive, is sufficient if such disobedience defeats, impairs, impedes, or prejudices the rights or remedies of a party."

The absence of willfulness from this formulation does not result in strict liability, since the proponent of a civil contempt motion must establish the contemnor's failure to comply with a court order with knowledge of its terms. Nor can civil contempt be founded upon an inadvertent or mistaken failure to comply with a court order since it is the movant's burden to establish that the court's mandate was clear and unequivocal. Moreover, the movant's preliminary evidentiary showing of the elements of civil contempt does not end the inquiry. Once the movant establishes a knowing failure to comply with a clear and unequivocal mandate, the burden shifts to the alleged contemnor to refute the movant's showing, or to offer evidence of a defense, such as an inability to comply with the order. A hearing is required only if the papers in opposition raise a factual dispute as to the elements of civil contempt, or the existence of a defense.

Here, the plaintiff met her burden of establishing, by clear and convincing evidence, that the defendant was fully aware of the January 2010 Order, which was a lawful and unequivocal mandate of the court, and that he disobeyed that mandate, while having full knowledge of its terms, resulting in prejudice to the plaintiff, who was denied the equitable distribution of marital property. Notably, at the contempt hearing, the defendant conceded that he received the January 2010 Order and failed to deposit any money with the plaintiff's attorney pursuant to the order; these concessions established his knowing disobedience of the order. Contrary to the defendant's contention, the fact that he did not disobey an express order of the court in March 2009 when he transferred the Brooklyn property was irrelevant to the issue of whether he disobeyed the clear mandate of the January 2010 Order to deposit the proceeds of that sale with the plaintiff's attorney. Nor did the plaintiff have the additional burden of establishing that the defendant still possessed or had control over the proceeds from the March 2009 transfer such that he had the ability to comply with the January 2010 order. Rather, once his failure to comply was established, the burden shifted to the defendant to offer competent, credible evidence of his inability to pay the sum of money as ordered.

The defendant failed to meet his burden of establishing his defense of an inability to pay. In opposition to the contempt motion, the defendant submitted an affidavit in which he averred that he no longer possessed those proceeds, but he provided no evidence in support of that self-serving assertion. Generally, "conclusory, baseless, and self-serving allegations [are] insufficient to raise an issue of fact necessitating a hearing" on a contempt motion (Jaffe v. Jaffe, 44 AD3d at 826), much less establish a defense to the motion. Nonetheless, here, the defendant was afforded a hearing and the opportunity to present evidence in support of this defense. He refused to answer certain questions regarding the location of the proceeds of the March 2009 transfer by invoking his constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, and otherwise failed to present any evidence in support of his contention that he was unable to deposit the necessary sum of money as required by the order. Thus, the record established all elements of civil contempt, and the defendant failed to meet his burden of rebutting that evidence.

The defendant contended on appeal that he properly invoked his constitutional Fifth Amendment privilege in response to certain questions, and that the Supreme Court improperly drew an adverse inference against him. He contended that, since he was potentially facing both civil and criminal contempt sanctions, he was placed in the untenable position of having to make a choice between defending the civil branch of the motion or asserting his Fifth Amendment privilege with respect to the criminal branch of the motion. Therefore, he asserted his invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination could not be used against him, as it was his right to invoke the privilege in defense of the criminal branch of the proceeding without adverse consequence. The Court found defendant's contentions to be without merit based on well-established principles in analogous cases. The Court observed that the Fifth Amendment does not forbid adverse inferences against parties to civil actions when they refuse to testify in response to probative evidence offered against them. "In New York, unlike the rule in a criminal case, a party's invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination in a civil case may be considered by the finder of the facts in assessing the strength of the evidence offered by the opposing party on the issue which the witness was in a position to controvert". Although a defendant in an ongoing criminal prosecution faces a dilemma whether to defend a civil proceeding involving the same subject matter or to assert the Fifth Amendment privilege, "a court need not permit a defendant to avoid this difficulty by staying a civil action until a pending criminal prosecution has been terminated," and the fact "that the witness may invoke the privilege against self-incrimination is not a basis for precluding civil discovery". A party to a civil action or proceeding is not relieved of his or her burden of proof simply by invoking the privilege against self-incrimination. While a party may not be compelled to answer questions that might adversely affect his [or her] criminal interest, the privilege does not relieve the party of the usual evidentiary burden attendant upon a civil proceeding; nor does it afford any protection against the consequences of failing to submit competent evidence.

Here, the defendant had the burden of establishing his defense of an inability to pay the sum required by the January 2010 Order); his invocation of his privilege against self-incrimination did not relieve him of the obligation of coming forward with evidence in support of that defense. Moreover, the Supreme Court was entitled to draw an adverse inference against him (see Marine Midland Bank v. Russo Produce Co ., 50 N.Y.2d at 42).

The defendant correctly contended that a party may not be held in criminal contempt solely for a justified assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege. Thus, in a criminal contempt proceeding, in which willful disobedience is an element, the court may not base a finding of willfulness solely upon the defendant's justified invocation of the privilege, absent any other evidence of willfulness. Here, however, the Supreme Court did not hold the defendant in criminal contempt, and thus, did not impose a criminal sanction. Rather, the court held the defendant in civil contempt.

Contrary to the defendant's contention, the Supreme Court did not hold him in contempt solely for having asserted his Fifth Amendment privilege. Rather, the Supreme Court held him in civil contempt for failing to comply with the January 2010 Order. There is a difference. The civil penalty imposed was not a punishment for refusing to answer questions at the hearing. Rather, the civil sanction was properly imposed, based on evidence establishing the defendant's disobedience of the January 2010 Order, and his failure to adduce evidence refuting the elements of civil contempt or establishing his defense of an inability to pay. Where evidence in the record supports the civil contempt finding, which is not based solely upon the invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination, and the defendant has failed to meet his or her burden of proof, the order will be upheld.

The Appellate Division rejected the defendants argument that plaintiff failed to satisfy the mandatory precondition of Domestic Relations Law § 245 that she first exhaust other, less drastic enforcement mechanisms, such as settling a judgment from the equitable distribution order and seeking enforcement of the judgment. The Court observed at a civil contempt motion in a divorce action should be denied where the movant fails to make a showing pursuant to Section 245 that "resort to other, less drastic enforcement mechanisms had been exhausted or would be ineffectual" (Capurso v. Capurso, 61 AD3d 913, 914). Although the exhaustion precondition is discussed most often in case law involving the nonpayment of maintenance or child support, it has also been applied in cases involving the nonpayment of other sums because the plain language of Domestic Relations Law s 245 unambiguously includes the nonpayment of "any sum of money." Nothing in this language restricts the meaning to maintenance and child support. Thus, the exhaustion precondition of Section 245 does apply here, where the defendant failed to pay a sum of money in lieu of real property awarded to the plaintiff in an order of equitable distribution.

However, the record established plaintiff's satisfaction of the exhaustion precondition with evidence demonstrating that less drastic enforcement measures would have been ineffectual. The plaintiff submitted extensive evidence in support of her motion to hold the defendant in contempt, demonstrating his pattern of divesting himself of his assets during the course of the earlier divorce litigation in 2000 through 2002, and during the present litigation; as a result, the defendant no longer held assets in his name against which execution could be obtained. Moreover, the defendant's suggestion that the plaintiff should have first settled a judgment upon the order of equitable distribution, and thereafter executed on the judgment, was without merit. It was undisputed that the defendant had transferred the Brooklyn and Queens properties that had been awarded to the plaintiff in the equitable distribution order, and that the purpose of the January 2010 Order was to preserve the funds obtained from the sale of the real property. Therefore, the plaintiff satisfied the exhaustion precondition of Domestic Relations Law § 245.

Child Custody - Visitation - Visitation Schedule For Noncustodial Parent That Deprives Custodial Parent of "Any Significant Quality Time" with the Child Is Excessive

In Matter of Rivera v Fowler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6644622 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division found that the parties demonstrated that a change of circumstances had occurred and that modification of the existing visitation arrangement was in the children's best interests where the existing visitation arrangement did not specify the exact time and date that weekly and summer vacation visitations were to begin, which led to disagreement between the parties. However, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in providing that the father have visitation every weekend, beginning Saturday at noon and ending Sunday at 8:00 p.m. The extent to which the noncustodial parent may exercise parenting time is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the hearing court, to be determined on the basis of the best interests of the child consistent with the concurrent right of the child and the noncustodial parent to meaningful time together. A visitation schedule that deprives the custodial parent of "any significant quality time" with the child is, however, excessive. Here, the schedule established by the Family Court effectively deprived the mother of any significant quality time with the children during each weekend. Moreover, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in failing to specify the period of the mother's visitation with the children during their summer vacation. In the circumstances presented, it held that a more appropriate schedule, consistent with the parental rights and responsibilities of both parties, and the best interests of the children, should provide that the noncustodial father have visitation every other weekend, beginning Saturday at noon and ending Sunday at 8:00 p.m., and one overnight visit per week, and that the parties should have equal visitation time during the children's summer vacation. It remitted to Family Court for further proceedings.

Maintenance - Award - Supreme Court's Decision Concluding That Defendant Was Obligated to Pay Pendente Lite Maintenance, Was Enforceable Against Him, Notwithstanding That it Was Never Reduced to a Written Order (22 NYCRR 202.8[g]). Expert Fees - Absent a Showing of Necessity or Inability to Pay, an Award of Experts Fees Is Generally Unjustified.

In Kim v Schiller, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6484143 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court granted plaintiff's cross motion which was for an award of an attorney's fee of $5,000, and granted a judgment which, awarded the plaintiff $247,000 as the plaintiff's portion of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity; awarded the plaintiff possession and ownership of the former marital residence and awarded the defendant a credit $60,000 as his share of the equity in the residence; awarded the plaintiff $662 as the plaintiff's share of the defendant's Charles Schwab account; awarded the plaintiff child support for the parties' two children of $3,774 per month; awarded the plaintiff, pendente lite, carrying costs on the former marital residence without modifying the child support awarded to the plaintiff; awarded the plaintiff pendente lite maintenance arrears of $30,594; directed the defendant to pay 50% of certain additional expenses incurred on behalf of the children; awarded the plaintiff $5,000 for an expert's fee; and directed the defendant to pay 50% of, inter alia, all health care expenses of the parties' children not covered by insurance.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was entitled to a share of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity. Although the plaintiff did not make direct financial contributions to the defendant's attainment of his medical degree and license, she made substantial indirect contributions, as the plaintiff was supportive of the defendant's attainment of his degree and the advancement of his career. The plaintiff worked full-time throughout the marriage, except for those periods of time when she was on maternity leave or collecting disability benefits due to her chronic lupus disease. The plaintiff contributed her earnings to the family, bore two children for whom she had primary caretaking responsibility, cooked the family's meals, and participated in the housekeeping (Holterman v. Holterman, 3 NY3d 1, 8-9; McSparron v. McSparron, 87 N.Y.2d 275). However, under the circumstances of this case, where the defendant made accommodations for the sake of the plaintiff's career and her desire to remain near her family, as well as in light of the defendant's financial contributions during his tenure at medical school, it reduced the award to the plaintiff of the marital portion of the defendant's enhanced earning capacity from 50% to 30%, thereby reducing the plaintiff's award from $247,000 to $148,200.

The Appellate Division agreed with the defendant that he was entitled to a credit of $20,000 with respect to funds from his separate property that he used during the marriage to repay the plaintiff's student loan debt.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court erred in awarding the plaintiff $662 as her share of a money market account held by the defendant with Charles Schwab, since no evidence regarding the provenance of this account was adduced at the trial. The only evidence that was before the Supreme Court with respect to this account was its inclusion in the defendant's net worth statement.

The plaintiff was entitled to an award of pendente lite relief retroactive to May 5, 2011, the date that she moved for pendente lite relief the date that the Supreme Court issued an order awarding pendente lite relief to her. The defendant, however, was entitled to a credit for the voluntary child support payments he made from May 5, 2011, through June 24, 2011, that were in addition to the court-ordered pendente lite child support payments, but only to the extent of the pendente lite award actually made to the plaintiff. Since the pendente lite award actually made to the plaintiff was less than the $5,200 that the defendant made in voluntary child support payments from May 5, 2011, to June 24, 2011, the defendant was not entitled to a credit for the entire sum of $5,200, but, he was entitled to a credit of $3,400 for those payments.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should have directed that the defendant's child support obligation be decreased by "the amount of any college room and board expenses he incurs while the parties' child[ren] attend [] college" It also agreed with the defendant that, as a wage earner contributing to the support of his children, he was entitled to claim one of the children as a dependent on his income tax returns (Lueker v. Lueker, 72 AD3d 655, 658). Thus, the parties were to equally share the dependent tax exemptions, allowances, and deductions derived from claiming their children as dependents on their respective income tax returns.

Supreme Court erred in directing defendant to contribute or to additionally contribute to certain discretionary expenses that the plaintiff incurred on behalf of the children, including a sweet sixteen party for the parties' daughter, trips to South Korea, and new furniture. Additionally, it modified the judgment to correct the Supreme Court's omission of the word "reasonable" to describe the unreimbursed health care expenses to be paid by the defendant (Domestic Relations Law s 240[1-b][c][5]).

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the defendant's assertions, the Supreme Court's decision concluding that he was obligated to pay, inter alia, pendente lite maintenance, was enforceable against him, notwithstanding that it was never reduced to a written order (22 NYCRR 202.8[g]). The defendant challenged the court's award of pendente lite maintenance arrears to the plaintiff, as set forth in the judgment, as well as its failure to award him a credit for the pendente lite maintenance payments he made during the pendency of the action. The defendant asserted that the pendente lite maintenance award improperly resulted in a double counting of the income derived from his medical license. It noted that courts recognize that pendente lite awards are temporary, and some degree of inequity with respect to such awards is accepted in the interests of judicial economy. The defendant's remedy for any perceived inequity was to seek a speedy trial. Nonetheless, exercising its discretion pursuant to CPLR 5019(a), it noted that the Supreme Court mistakenly awarded the plaintiff $30,594 as pendente lite "maintenance arrears" and it recalculated the defendant's total pendente lite arrears as the sum of $19,800.

The Appellate Division agreed with the defendant that the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff expert fees (Domestic Relations Law 237[a]). Absent a showing of necessity or inability to pay, an award of such fees is generally unjustified. Here, the Supreme Court awarded the plaintiff a pendente lite attorney's fee of $5,000. At that time, it found that the wife was financially capable of retaining her own expert. Subsequently, the court determined that the plaintiff was thereafter capable of paying her own attorney's fee. Therefore, it was inappropriate for the court to award the plaintiff expert fees under these circumstances.

Marital Residence- Sale - Third Department Holds That a Court, by or after Judgment, in its Discretion, May Appoint a Receiver of Property Which Is the Subject of an Action (Marital Residence), to Carry the Judgment into Effect or to Dispose of the Property According to its Directions. Such Relief May Be Awarded Sua Sponte.

In Bennett v Bennett, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6500272 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties, who appeared before the Court on three prior occasions (99 AD3d 1129 [2012]; 82 AD3d 1294 [2011]; 49 AD3d 949 [2008]), were married in 1980, and plaintiff (wife) commenced the action for divorce in 2006. Pursuant to the terms of the parties' March 2009 amended judgment of divorce, defendant (husband) was permitted to retain title to and possession of the marital property, which was located in St. Lawrence County, provided that he paid the wife one half of the equity contained therein by a specified date. In the event that the husband opted not to do so, the amended judgment directed that the property be listed for sale with a licensed real estate broker and that the resulting proceeds be divided equally between the parties. Supreme Court subsequently granted the wife's motion to compel the husband to sign a listing agreement with realtor Jennifer Stevenson. The property thereafter was listed with Stevenson for $192,000 from July 2009 through January 2010, at which time the listing expired. When the property failed to sell, the wife moved to modify the terms of the amended judgment to permit Stevenson to reduce the listing price. Supreme Court denied the wife's motion, without prejudice, based upon her failure to establish that the original listing price no longer reflected the market value of the property. In August 2011, the wife again sought to modify the terms of the amended judgment in order to, permit the property to be relisted with Stevenson at a price of $175,000. The husband opposed the motion contending that he was in no way impeding Stevenson's efforts to market and sell the property. By order entered January 30, 2012, Supreme Court denied the requested relief but, sua sponte, directed that a receiver be appointed to carry out the sale of the marital property in accordance with the terms of the amended judgment. The husband's motion to vacate that order was denied in April 2012 and he appealed.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that a court, by or after judgment, may appoint a receiver of property which is the subject of an action, to carry the judgment into effect or to dispose of the property according to its directions" (CPLR 5106; Wagenmann v. Wagenmann, 96 A.D.2d 534, 536 [1983]). Whether a receiver should be appointed in a particular matter is a determination committed to the trial court's sound discretion. In light of the husband's obstructionist tactics and the demonstrated deterioration of the marital property, it could not say that Supreme Court abused its discretion in appointing a receiver to effectuate the sale of the marital residence consistent with the terms of the amended judgment of divorce (Lutz v. Goldstone, 42 AD3d at 563; Trezza v. Trezza, 32 AD3d 1016, 1017 [2006]; Stern v. Stern, 282 A.D.2d 667, 668 [2001]; cf. Westfall v. Westfall, 194 A.D.2d 960, 961-962 [1993]). Such relief may be awarded sua sponte (see Tirado v. Miller, 75 AD3d 153, 159 [2010]) and, under the particular facts of this case, it rejected the husband's assertion that a hearing was warranted. In appointing a receiver, Supreme Court made no mention of whether an undertaking would be required (CPLR 5106, 6403), nor did it specify the manner in which the cost of the receiver would be allocated between the parties. It remitted the matter to Supreme Court for these purposes.

Child Support - Modification - Where Only Change in Circumstances, Which Was Unanticipated, Was Son's Receipt of Social Security Survivors Benefits as a Result of His Biological Father's Death, the Benefits Did Not in Any Way Affect the Father's Financial Situation and Did Not Warrant a Downward Modification. A Child's Resources May Be Considered Only in Determining If the Amount of the Basic Child Support Obligation Is Unjust or Inappropriate.

In Matter of McDonald v McDonald,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6500342 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were married in 2000, but the father had previously signed acknowledgments of paternity for their son (born in 1995) and daughter (born in 1998). As a consequence thereof petitioner was his legal father. The parties' 2003 separation agreement continued that child support arrangement of $150 a week from a prior order, and the separation agreement was incorporated into their 2005 divorce decree. In 2006, Family Court continued the previously-ordered child support. The father commenced a proceeding seeking to reduce his child support obligation on the grounds that he earned substantially less than he did previously, and that the son began receiving Social Security survivors benefits of $859 per month as a result of his biological father's death.

Following a hearing, the Support Magistrate determined that the father did not demonstrate a significant change in his earning ability, but the Support Magistrate reduced his child support payments to $105 per week based on the son's unanticipated receipt of Social Security benefits. Family Court denied the mother's objections.

The Appellate Division reversed on the law. It found that Family Court erred in denying the objections on the procedural ground that the mother failed to properly serve them on the father. The statute requires that an objecting party serve objections on the opposing party (Family Ct Act § 439[e]). The mother complied with that requirement by serving the father's counsel and filing proof of that service.

The Appellate Division held that the Support Magistrate did not err in denying the father's motion to dismiss the petition prior to holding a hearing. While a hearing is not required unless the application for a modification is supported by an affidavit and evidentiary material sufficient to establish a prima facie case (Family Ct Act § 451 [1]), the statutory language is permissive, rather than mandatory, providing the court with discretion to either proceed to a hearing or dismiss the petition. The Support Magistrate did not abuse that discretion by permitting the matter to proceed to a hearing.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in confirming the Support Magistrate's decision to reduce the father's child support obligation. If a separation agreement was fair and equitable when entered into, its child support provisions should not be modified "[u]nless there has been an unforeseen change in circumstances and a concomitant showing of need" (Matter of Boden v. Boden, 42 N.Y.2d 210, 213 [1977]). The father did not argue that the separation agreement was unfair or inequitable in 2003. Despite the father's assertions that his earnings had been below the poverty line for more than three years, he had no debt, more than $14,000 in the bank and had remained current on his support payments, the father was now self-employed and reported that he makes less than he did previously, but income could be imputed to him under the circumstances. It agreed with the Support Magistrate's finding that the father failed to show any significant change in his income-producing ability. The only change in circumstances, which was unanticipated, was the son's receipt of Social Security survivors benefits as a result of his biological father's death. However the father had not demonstrated any showing of need for modification as a result of that change. Those benefits did not in any way affect the father's financial situation (see Matter of Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d 605, 611 [1996]). A child's resources may be considered only in determining if the amount of the basic child support obligation is unjust or inappropriate (Family Ct Act § 413[1][f][1]; Matter of Weymouth v. Mullin, 42 AD3d 681, 682 [2007]). The father only addressed the financial resources of the parents and one child, not any of the other factors applicable to that determination (Family Ct Act §§ 413[1][f]), and that factor alone was insufficient to find the basic support amount unjust or inappropriate. The son's receipt of Social Security benefits did not provide a basis for a downward modification of the father's child support payments, as such benefits are intended to "supplement existing resources," not to displace or reduce a parent's obligation to support his or her children (Matter of Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d at 611. Thus, Family Court should have dismissed the petition. The Court pointed out in a footnote that although previous cases dealt with Social Security disability benefits received by children as dependents of a disabled parent (see e.g. Matter of Graby v. Graby, 87 N.Y.2d at 611; Matter of Weymouth v. Mullin, 42 AD3d at 682; Matter of Cohen v. Hartmann, 285 A.D.2d at 675-676), the same result is appropriate in relation to Social Security survivors benefits received after a parent's death. If a parent cannot have his or her support obligation reduced based on the child's receipt of benefits that are received as a result of that parent's disability, it saw see no reason why a parent should receive a reduction based on the child's receipt of benefits that are in no way attributable to that parent.

Supreme Court

Maintenance Pendente Lite - Award - Income - Income, as Reported in the 2012 Joint Federal Income Tax Return, Being the Last Filed Tax Return, Need Not Be Utilized for the Determination of Plaintiff's Maintenance Obligation. Nothing in the Statute Prohibits a Court's Reliance upon Partial Information from a Tax Year Not Yet Completed.

In SA v LA--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6608000 (N.Y.Sup.), defendant L.A. sought, inter alia, interim support and maintenance from plaintiff S.A. in the amount of $17,000 per month and payment of all expenses related to the maintenance of the marital residence. The parties were married in 1987 and separated in 2009. They had one child, age 26. Plaintiff was 56 years old and defendant was 64 years old. Plaintiff was residing in an apartment in New York City while defendant continued to reside in the marital residence in Westchester County, New York.

The pendente lite maintenance application required the court to determine whether it must rely on the parties' 2012 federal tax return as the last filed return, in determining plaintiff's income, notwithstanding that plaintiff's income had been sharply reduced in 2013 to less than one-third of his last year's income, after plaintiff lost his employment in October, 2012 and began new employment in April, 2013. The differential in salary was significant: plaintiff earned $819,049 in 2012 and since beginning his new employment in April, 2013, he was making $20,000 per month or $240,000 per annum. In addition to plaintiff's earnings in 2012, the parties paid income taxes on a withdrawal of $111,685 from a pre-tax account. Gross earnings for 2012 were $930,685, before deduction for F.I.C.A. and medicare taxes. Against this amount was a reduction of $1,127 relative to a capital loss. The 2012 joint federal tax return was dated September 25, 2013, presumably filed by the extension deadline of October 15, 2013. The F.I.C.A. withholding amount on plaintiff's reported income should have been $4,624.20 ($$110,100 \times 4.2\%$), while the medicare withholdings should have been $11,876.21 ($$819,049 \times 1.45\%$) for a total deduction of $16,500.41. Hence, for the calculation of the presumptive amount of temporary maintenance, as set forth in DRL § 236(B)(5-a)(b)(4) and (5), plaintiff's adjusted gross income, as reported on the parties' last filed income tax return, was $802,548.59 ($819,049 less $16,500.41). In determining the presumptive amount of spousal support, the court did not take into consideration the withdrawal of the $111,685 from the pre-tax account as reported on reported in 2012. According to the Temporary Spousal Maintenance Guidelines Calculator, on the entirety of plaintiff's adjusted gross earnings, the amount due plaintiff on the first $524,000 thereof was $157,200 per annum, or $13,100 per month.

As to the amount of adjusted gross earnings in excess of $524,000, the court had to determine any additional amount to be awarded, upon application of the nineteen statutory factors set forth in DRL § 236(B)(5-a)(c)(2)(a)(i)-(xix). The court did not make that determination. It observed that Plaintiff claimed through no fault of his own, he was terminated in October, 2012 from his position upon which his 2012 salary was based. Defendant disputed the assertion that the termination was involuntary. That issue could not be decided on the papers and the court directed it be considered at trial. As against plaintiff's earning history for 2012 and 2013, plaintiff reported his expenses on a Statement of Net Worth, sworn to on February 23, 2013. He claimed total monthly expenses of $25,559.80, part of which included defendant's expenses. Defendant alleges a portion of plaintiff's expenses were being spent on plaintiff's companion. Defendant claimed total monthly expenses of $18,402. On the parties' present combined gross income, namely the $20,000 on the gross monthly salary plaintiff now received, the parties could not possibly maintain their present lavish life styles. In addition to their significant monthly expenses, the parties respective Statements of Net Worth reveal they have accumulated over $1 million in debt.

The issue was whether the income, as reported in the 2012 joint federal income tax return, being the last filed tax return, must be utilized for the determination of plaintiff's maintenance obligation as of the date hereof. DRL § 240(1-b)(b)(5)(I), in defining income, states that it is the "gross (total) income that should have been or should be reported in the most recent federal income tax return." In this case, despite the dispute as to the circumstances of plaintiff's loss of his prior position, from which he earned the amount reported in 2012, it was not disputed that 2013 income, since April 1st, has been significantly reduced to $20,000 per month. The court observed that in the context of a child support proceeding, nothing in the statute prohibits a court's reliance upon partial information from a tax year not yet completed. Arak v. Arak, 60 AD3d 937 (2d Dept 2009); Moran v. Grill, 44 AD3d 859 (2d Dept 2007); see also Matter of Calhoun v. Holt, 28 AD3d 251 (1st Dept 2006); Matter of Taraskas v. Rizzuto, 38 AD3d 910 (2d Dept 2007), citing Matter of Kellogg v. Kellogg, 300 A.D.2d 966 (4th Dept 2002) (income earned during a tax year not completed at the commencement of trial, may, under some circumstances, be weighed by the court). Given the inclusion in the language of DRL § 236(B)(5-a)(4)(a) that "income" is as defined in the child support standards act and codified in section two hundred forty of this article and section four hundred thirteen of the family court act, as cited in Matter of Calhoun v. Holt, supra, the court concluded that it was appropriate, in the context of a spousal support proceeding, to apply the same present income rule as applicable in child support proceedings. It found that to establish plaintiff's income as reported on the parties' last filed income tax return at $802,548.59 ($819,049 less $16,500.41), after giving due consideration to the amount of income above $524,000, may result in a presumptive award of temporary maintenance that exceeds defendant's legitimate monthly expenses [Chusid v. Silvera, 110 AD3d 660 (2d Dept 2013)] and would be unjust and inappropriate.

The Court calculated plaintiff's gross income, annualized for tax year 2013, and imputed to him, at $240,000. His adjusted gross income for calculation of his spousal maintenance obligation was $229,470.60. Defendant had no income. According to the Temporary Spousal Maintenance Guidelines Calculator, annual interim spousal support was $68,841.18, or $5,736.77 monthly. Plaintiff was ordered to pay the amount of $5,737 monthly non-taxable to defendant, and non deductible by plaintiff. In addition, plaintiff was required to continue defendant's medical insurance coverages, and to pay 100% of her non-reimbursed, non-covered out of pocket medical expenses. All medical care providers, including defendant's therapy, shall, unless in an emergency, be "in-network". This award was retroactive to April 18, 2013, the date of a letter request by defendant's counsel for a pre-motion conference seeking pendente lite relief. Such procedure, in lieu of the filing of a pendente lite motion, was required by Rule E(1) of the Operational Rules of the Westchester Supreme Court Matrimonial Part.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Attorney for Child - Parents Who Are Directed to Pay Fees of Attorney Appointed to Represent Child May Raise Defense of Legal Malpractice to Attorney's Claim For Fees.

In Venecia C. v. August V., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6325172 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the divorced parents had three children, age 17, 14 and 11. In the divorce action, although the parties stipulated to joint custody, it was left to the trial court to direct that plaintiff mother would have primary residential custody in the marital apartment in Manhattan. In 2009, the mother moved for an order allowing her to relocate with the children to Demarest, New Jersey, approximately 12 miles outside Manhattan, and the father responded by moving for a change of custody. The motion court appointed the attorney for the children in this context. On November 22, 2011, the attorney for the children moved for an order directing the father to pay the outstanding fees he owed in the amount of $2,034.60, and for an additional sum covering the cost of making the enforcement application. The attorney for the children stated that the father never objected to any of her bills and had previously paid his 30% share of the fees billed. The motion court granted the motion by the attorney for the children, ordering the father to pay the sum of $2,034.60 for his share of outstanding fees, as well as $1,500 for fees she incurred in making the application. It rejected the argument that the Court's ruling in Mars v. Mars (19 AD3d at 196), gave a parent the right to challenge the fee of an attorney for the child on the ground of malpractice. In any event, it found no factual basis for the malpractice claim.

The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Saxe, held that parents who are directed to pay the fees of the attorney appointed to represent the children may raise the defense of legal malpractice to that attorney's claim for fees. He observed that in Mars v. Mars (19 AD3d at 196), the Court held that a parent may assert legal malpractice as an affirmative defense to a Law Guardian's fee application "to the extent of challenging that portion of the fees attributable to advocacy, as opposed to guardianship." He noted that the ruling was limited by the then-prevailing view that attorneys appointed as law guardians for children in divorce cases often functioned in a role similar to a guardian ad litem, advocating for what they believed to be the best interests of the child, as opposed to what the child desired. Accepting the rule of Bluntt v. O'Connor (291 A.D.2d 106 [4th Dept 2002]), which held that absent special circumstances, a parent in a visitation dispute lacks standing to bring a legal malpractice claim against a child's court-appointed law guardian, it limited its ruling to the portion of the law guardian's fee representing the work that consisted of advocacy rather than guardianship. However, in 2007, the role of the law guardian was changed by a newly-promulgated Rule of the Chief Judge (22 NYCRR §7.2) that renamed the position "attorney for the child," and required those attorneys to

"zealously advocate the child's position." The rule states that the attorney for the child must "consult with and advise the child to the extent of and in a manner consistent with the child's capacities, and have a thorough knowledge of the child's circumstances" (§7.2[d][1]). It further requires that the attorney for the child should be directed by the child's wishes after fully explaining the available options and making recommendations to the child, as long as the child is capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment (§7.2[d] [2]). Only when the attorney is convinced that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or if following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child, may the attorney advocate a position contrary to the child's wishes, and even then the attorney must inform the court of the child's articulated wishes if the child wants the attorney to do so (§ 7.2[d][3]). He concluded that after 2007, the distinction made by the ruling in Mars is no longer necessary in cases such as this; where the child is capable of decision-making, the task of the attorney for the child is generally solely advocacy, rather than guardianship, as long as the child is capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment. The portion of the Mars decision allowing a parent to raise malpractice as a defense to a fee application for that portion of the fee earned by advocacy has become applicable to the attorney's entire fee claim. Rule 7.2 does not in any way vitiate the Mars ruling; on the contrary, it renders it more generally applicable.

The Court reaffirmed the essence of the Mars v. Mars ruling, namely that a parent may assert legal malpractice as an affirmative defense to the fee claim of an attorney for a child. The attorney for the child, no less than the attorneys for the parties, is serving as a professional and must be equally accountable to professional standards. That the children cannot hire and pay for their own attorneys, leaving it to the court to make the necessary appointment, does not alter the applicable standards, or the means by which they may be raised.

Notwithstanding that the father may have standing to assert such a defense, Justice Saxe agreed with the motion court that the father's accusations here did not establish a prima facie showing of legal malpractice and disciplinary violations. He also found that the father never objected to any of the bills presented by the attorney for the children despite the fact that they were in his possession for a significant amount of time (Pedreira v. Pedreira, 34 AD3d 225 [1st Dept 2006]). The court therefore acted properly in ordering him to pay the fees under an account stated theory (Shaw v. Silver, 95 AD3d 416, 416 [1st Dept 2010]).

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Pre - Marital Debts - Parties' Choice of How to Spend Funds During the Course of the Marriage Should Ordinarily Be Respected

In Kessler v Kessler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6182969 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that under the circumstances of this case, an award of 50% of the parties' marital property to each of the parties constituted an equitable distribution of that property and that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying the defendant a credit for $20,000 of marital funds used to pay a premarital debt of the plaintiff. "The parties' choice of how to spend funds during the course of the marriage should ordinarily be respected," and the "[c]ourts should not second-guess the economic decisions made during the course of a marriage, but rather should equitably distribute the assets and obligations remaining once the relationship is at an end" (Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 NY3d 415, 421).

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court should not have awarded the plaintiff a credit of $28,330, representing 50% of the attorney's fees paid in connection with the prosecution of an unrelated action which was settled in the defendant's favor, and the tax liability incurred on the settlement funds. Since a significant portion of the settlement funds were ultimately determined to be marital property, the fees paid in connection with the prosecution of that action, and the tax liability incurred on the settlements funds, were marital debt.

Child Support - Modification - Surviving Agreement - Boden - Brescia Rule - Substantial and Unanticipated Change in Circumstances Warrants Downward Modification -

In Dimaio v Dimaio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6183006 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties' stipulation of settlement, which was incorporated but not merged into the parties' judgment of divorce, and which set forth the father's child support obligation, was executed prior to the effective date of the 2010 amendments to Family Court Act § 451. Therefore, in order to establish his entitlement to a downward modification of his child support obligation, the father had the burden of showing a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances since the time he agreed to the support amount (Family Ct Act § 451[2][a]; L 2010, ch 182, s 13). Loss of employment may at times constitute a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances. A party seeking a downward modification of his or her child support obligation based upon a loss of employment has the burden of demonstrating that he or she diligently sought to obtain employment commensurate with his or her earning capacity. The father testified that he was unable to pay child support because he lost his prior job in October 2010. He stated that he had been working at a restaurant in the dual capacity of manager and head waiter. Following his loss of that employment, he sought and obtained a position as a manager at a restaurant at a lesser salary, but could not find a position working in the dual capacity of manager and head waiter. Under these circumstances, the father demonstrated that his loss of employment and obtainment of new employment at a lesser salary constituted a substantial and unanticipated change in circumstances, and that he made a good faith effort to obtain new employment which was commensurate with his qualifications and experience. Thus, the Support Magistrate's determination that the father failed to satisfy his burden of establishing an inability to pay his monthly child support obligation of $2,500, which had been set in the parties' judgment of divorce, was not supported by the evidence. Accordingly, the father's objections to the Support Magistrate's order denying his petition for a downward modification of his child support obligation should have been granted.

Child Custody - UCCJEA - Domestic Relations Law §76-a - New York Had Exclusive, Continuing Jurisdiction to Determine Custody Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-a.

In Matter of Seminara v Seminara, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6183029 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), on April 7, 2011, the parties, who are separated but not divorced, agreed to an order of joint custody whereby the mother would have primary physical custody of the subject child in Florida, but the child would spend four months a year in New York with the father. After the mother failed to comply with the terms of that order, the father petitioned to modify the order of custody so as to award him sole legal and residential custody of the child. On October 3, 2012, upon the mother's oral application, the Family Court dismissed the father's petition on the basis that the child had resided outside of New York for more than six months and that New York no longer had jurisdiction pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act. On January 7, 2013, the father again petitioned to modify custody, and the mother moved to dismiss the petition for lack of jurisdiction. The court found that it had continuing jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-a(1) and denied the mother's motion.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court improperly granted the mother's oral application to dismiss the father's prior custody petition for lack of jurisdiction. The court failed, as required by Domestic Relations Law § 76-a(1), to determine whether the child, or the child and a parent, had a significant connection to the State of New York, or whether substantial evidence was available in this state or to determine whether New York was an inconvenient forum based upon the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 76-f(2). The Family Court correctly determined that New York had exclusive, continuing jurisdiction to determine custody pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-a. The initial child custody determination was rendered in New York, and there was ample evidence of a significant connection by the child with this state for Family Court to retain jurisdiction. The father's extensive parenting time took place in New York, the child had relationships with a half-sibling and extended family in New York, and the father had furthered the child's education and attended to her medical care in New York. Accordingly, the court correctly concluded that the child had a substantial connection to New York, that there was adequate evidence in this state regarding her present and future well-being, and that jurisdiction in the courts of this state was proper.

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Improvident Exercise of Discretion in Directing Sale of the Marital Residence Without First Offering Defendant Option of Purchasing Plaintiff's Interest

In Abely v Lally, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6246231 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) defendant wife appealed from a judgment which, inter alia, directed the sale of the marital residence, awarded the plaintiff $36,227.50 as a distributive award, and awarded the plaintiff one half of the appreciation in value of the defendant's separate property located on Sound Beach Avenue in Bayville. The Appellate Division found that at the time of the parties' marriage in 1997, the defendant owned real property on Sound Beach Avenue in Bayville, which she purchased in 1995. Based on the plaintiff's contributions to the Sound Beach property during the marriage, the Supreme Court properly determined that the plaintiff was entitled to share equally in the appreciation in the value of that property during the parties' marriage. However, it held that since, plaintiff used $7,500 of marital funds to pay a retainer fee to his first attorney in connection with this litigation, the defendant was entitled to a credit in the sum of one half of this retainer fee.

The Appellate Division held that under the particular circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing the immediate sale of the marital residence without first offering the defendant the option of retaining exclusive occupancy of the marital residence by purchasing the plaintiff's interest therein (Skinner v. Skinner, 241 A.D.2d 544, 545; Hillmann v. Hillmann, 109 A.D.2d 777, 778; Patti v. Patti, 99 A.D.2d 772). The financial circumstances of the parties did not dictate the immediate sale of the marital residence. However, in light of the acrimonious relationship between the parties, it found that the marital residence should not continue to be jointly owned by the parties for an extended period of time. The Appellate Division found it was appropriate to give the defendant the option of retaining exclusive occupancy of the marital residence, provided that, in the event she exercised the option, she must, within six months after service upon her of a copy of the decision and order with notice of entry, pay off the remaining balance of the mortgage on that property and, upon receipt of a satisfaction of the mortgage, the plaintiff must convey by deed to the defendant, his interest in the property. It also directed that in the event that the defendant exercised the option and satisfied the mortgage, and the plaintiff conveys his interest in the property to the defendant, the Supreme Court must recalculate the equitable distribution award and make appropriate adjustments, taking into account the exercise of the option and satisfaction of the mortgage and conveyance of title. It held that in the event that the option was not exercised, or the option was exercised but the mortgage was not satisfied within the time period allotted, the marital residence must be sold by the appointed receiver, following an appraisal, in accordance with the terms of the judgment. It gave the defendant 60 days after service upon her of a copy of the decision and order with notice of entry, to notify the Supreme Court and plaintiff's counsel, in writing, whether she intended to exercise the option. In the event that the defendant failed to communicate her intent to the Supreme Court and plaintiff's counsel, then she would be deemed to have waived the option. In the event that the defendant exercised the option for exclusive occupancy, she would be solely responsible for, and must pay, all carrying charges on the marital residence incurred on or after the date of the decision and order, and the plaintiff would be entitled to a credit for any such carrying charges paid by him on or after the date of the decision and order.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Marital Debt - General Rule Is That Financial Obligations Incurred During Marriage Which Are Not Solely Responsibility of One Party Should Be Shared Equally by the Parties.

In Alleva v Alleva, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6246236 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding plaintiff maintenance of $750 per week. However, as the defendant correctly contended, Supreme Court should have awarded the plaintiff maintenance only until she became eligible for full Social Security retirement benefits or remarries. However, it found that it was appropriate in this case to require the defendant to maintain life insurance on her behalf to secure his maintenance obligation. The Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in equally allocating responsibility for marital debt, including certain credit card debt incurred during the pendency of this action. In general, financial obligations incurred during the marriage which are not solely the responsibility of one party should be shared equally by the parties (see Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 NY3d 415, 421). The plaintiff argued that the defendant should be solely responsible for certain credit card debt that the plaintiff incurred during the pendency of the action for, inter alia, the support of herself and the parties' two emancipated children. However, the plaintiff did not assert that the defendant failed to comply with a pendente lite order directing him to pay maintenance and expenses of the children. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff failed to show that the debt should be borne solely by the defendant. The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff the sum of $10,000 as an attorney's fee, payable within 18 months after the date of service of the decision.

Child Support - Enforcement - Family Ct Act § 451 - Cancellation of Arrears - Where noncustodial parent's income below or equal to the poverty level, prohibition against reduction of accrued child support arrears does not apply.

In Matter of Briggs v McKinley -Mays--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6246278 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the father moved to reduce child support arrears for the period of June 2, 2011, through July 16, 2012, to $500, claiming that, on June 2, 2011, he suffered a heart attack, which rendered him disabled, and that, after that date, his income fell below the poverty level. The Support Magistrate denied the motion, and the father filed an objection to that order. The Family Court denied the father's objection.

The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for a new hearing and determination. It observed that Family Court Act § 451 provides that "the court ... may modify, set aside or vacate any order issued in the course of the proceeding, provided, however, that the modification, set aside or vacatur shall not reduce or annul child support arrears accrued prior to the making of an application pursuant to this section." However, Family Court Act § 413(1)(g) provides: "Where the non-custodial parent's income is less than or equal to the poverty income guidelines amount for a single person as reported by the federal department of health and human services, unpaid child support arrears in excess of five hundred dollars shall not accrue " Thus, it held that for any period of time that the noncustodial parent's income is below or equal to the poverty level, and he or she does not satisfy his or her child support obligation, the prohibition against reduction of accrued child support arrears contained in section 451 is not triggered because there are no accrued arrears in excess of $500 to reduce. (Matter of Mandelowitz v. Bodden, 68 AD3d 871, 875). The Court held that to the extent its decision in Matter of Martinez v. Torres (26 AD3d 496) indicated that arrears cannot be capped at $500 pursuant to Family Court Act § 413(1)(g), for periods preceding the filing of a party's petition, it should not be followed.

Here, the father's averments as to his level of income for the period of June 2, 2011, through July 16, 2012, which were supported by documentation of disability payments he received, warranted a hearing to determine whether the father's income for that period fell below, or was equal to, the income level provided in the poverty income guidelines. If the father proves that his income was at or below that level for "any period of time" child support arrears for that period of time must be capped at $500 (Family Court Act §413[1][g]).

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Presumption Rebutted - Not Improvident Exercise of Discretion in Denying Interim Counsel Fees Where No Significant Disparity in the Parties' Financial Circumstances - Attorneys Fees Denied Where Attorney's Failed to Substantially Comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3 and 22 NYCRR 202.16(k)(3)

In Vitale v Vitale, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6246465 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the wife's motion for an award of an attorney's fee and an expert fee. It noted that in determining whether to award fees, the court should review the financial circumstances of both parties, together with all of the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions. A court may consider whether either party has engaged in conduct or taken positions resulting in a delay of the proceedings or unnecessary litigation. It held that under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in denying plaintiff's motion for an award of an attorney's fee and an expert fee pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 237(a), since there was no significant disparity in the parties' financial circumstances and the plaintiff's conduct unnecessarily prolonged this litigation (Beth M. v. Joseph M., 12 Misc.3d 1188[A] [Sup.Ct. Nassau County 2006]). In addition, the failure of the plaintiff's former attorney to substantially comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.2 and 1400.3 precluded him from seeking unpaid fees from the plaintiff and, therefore, the defendant could not be compelled to pay such fees (see Rosado v. Rosado, 100 AD3d 856). The plaintiff's current attorney failed to comply with 22 NYCRR 202.16(k)(3), precluding an award of fees to him (see Mimran v. Mimran, 83 AD3d 550; Covington v. Covington, 249 A.D.2d 735).

Third Department

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act 413[1][F] - Child Support Award Which Represented Roughly One Half of Respondent's Earnings"unjust and Inappropriate"

In Matter of Broome Country Dept of Social Services v Meghan XX--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6182496 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Respondent was the mother of Tequilla XX, who was born in 2011 and placed in foster care shortly after her birth. Thereafter, petitioner commenced a proceeding seeking child support on Tequilla's behalf. Respondent was developmentally disabled; she received Supplemental Security Income benefits (SSI) and public assistance payments in a total sum of $961 per month, and earned some wages from part-time employment at a sheltered workshop. Her SSI payments were made directly to petitioner, as her representative payee. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate directed respondent to pay $25 per month in support retroactive to the date that Tequilla became eligible for public assistance, and capped respondent's arrears at $500. Respondent filed objections to the order, which Family Court denied.

The Appellate Division reversed. It found that the Support Magistrate's determination that respondent's average weekly income was "between $15[] to $20[] per week gross each and every week" was unsupported by the record, and apparently in error. Respondent's financial disclosure affidavit was the only evidence presented at the support hearing regarding her income, and it listed her biweekly gross income at $25. Thus, after subtracting respondent's public assistance and SSI benefits (see Family Ct Act §413[1][b][5][vii][E], [F]; [c]), the child support award represented roughly one half of respondent's earnings. The court found this award "unjust and inappropriate" (Family Ct Act § 413[1][f]), granted respondent's objections and set her support obligation at $0.

Termination of Parental Rights - Fact Finding Hearing - Rule Against Hearsay - Professional Reliability Exception to the Hearsay Rule - Error to Admit Psychologist's Report into Evidence Because it Contained Inadmissible Hearsay.

In Matter of Dakota F., 110 A.D.3d 1151, 974 N.Y.S.2d 594 (3d Dept, 2013) in May 2010, following a permanency hearing in a neglect proceeding, Family Court directed petitioner to arrange a parenting assessment and mental health evaluation of respondent, which was thereafter performed by psychologist Richard Liotta. In the subsequent termination proceeding, where termination of parental rights was granted, his report was received in evidence.

The Appellate Division reversed and dismissed the petition. It noted that petitioner had the right to submit "psychiatric, psychological or medical evidence" (Social Service Law § 384-b [6][e]), and Liotta testified that he examined respondent for the purpose of determining whether she had a mental condition that might impair her ability to care for her children. However, it agreed with respondent that Family Court erred in admitting Liotta's report into evidence because it contained inadmissible hearsay. Liotta testified that in the course of his examination, he conducted numerous personal interviews with caseworkers, counselors, and others. Pursuant to the professional reliability exception to the hearsay rule, an expert witness may rely on information that would otherwise constitute inadmissible hearsay "if it is of a kind accepted in the profession as reliable in forming a professional opinion or if it comes from a witness subject to full cross-examination on the trial" (People v. Goldstein, 6 N.Y.3d 119, 124-125 [2005]). While some of the individuals with whom Liotta spoke testified during the hearing and were thus subject to cross-examination, several others did not. Liotta was not asked and offered no opinion as to whether the information he gleaned from the interviews with individuals who did not testify was professionally accepted as reliable in performing mental health evaluations. Respondent objected on hearsay grounds to Liotta's testimony about these interviews and to the admission of his report-which contained detailed accounts of each interview-but the court overruled these objections. Moreover, when respondent's counsel sought to ask about the effect of the collateral source interviews on his opinions, the court precluded him from doing so. As a result, no proper foundation was laid for the admission of Liotta's testimony or his report (Matter of Anthony WW. [Michael WW.], 86 A.D.3d 654, 657; Matter of Murphy v. Woods, 63 A.D.3d 1526,1526-1527(2009)).

In addition to proof of the parent's underlying condition, termination of parental rights on the basis of mental illness requires " testimony from appropriate medical witnesses particularizing how the parent's mental illness affects his or her present and future ability to care for the child' " (Matter of Karen GG. [Marline HH.], 72 A.D.3d 1156, 1158, [2010]). Here, psychologist Donald Danser was appointed to perform the statutorily required mental evaluation, and he opined that respondent did not have a mental condition which prevented her from providing her children with adequate care. In the absence of Liotta's testimony and report, the record did not include clear and convincing evidence that respondent suffered from a mental illness rendering her unable to care for her children, and Family Court's orders had to be reversed.

Family Court

Child Support - Award - FCA § 439 (e) - Father Entitled to Credit for Excess Child Support Paid Pursuant to Order of Support Magistrate Affirmed by Family Court but Vacated by Appellate Division

In Matter of F.S. v. K.O., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6389194 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) the Support Magistrate increased the petitioner-father's child support obligation by $1,000 per month. Family Court affirmed. The Appellate Division reversed, holding the substantial change in circumstance standard, that was legislated in 2010, but had long been the standard for modifying support orders, did not apply because this was an incorporated support order that took place before 2010. They held that a Family Court support order incorporated into a judgment of divorce before 2010 could not be modified unless the Boden standard was met. (Overbaugh v. Schettini, 103 AD3d 972.)

The issue before the family court was should the father receive a credit for the excess child support (which may amount to almost $29,000) paid pursuant to the order of the Support Magistrate when that order was affirmed by the Family Court but vacated by the Appellate Division?

The Court held that the father should receive the credit allowed by FCA § 439(e) for excess child support paid from the date of filing of the mother's modification petition until the date of the Court's decision that affirmed the Magistrate's decision. The grounds for this ruling were that the reversal order of the Appellate Division created a "new order" of the Family Court within the meaning of the FCA §439 and payments made in excess of a new order were entitled to be credited against future child support obligations. The Court also held that the father should receive a credit for the excess child support paid from the date of the Court's order that affirmed the Magistrate until the date of the Appellate Division order that reversed Family Court's order regardless of whether it can be characterized as a new order. This credit was based on the rulings of the Court of Appeals in Spencer v. Spencer (10 NY3d 60 [2008]) and Johnson v. Chapin (12 NY3d 461 [2009]). In Spencer v. Spencer (10 NY3d 60 [2008]), the Court of Appeals as a result of its main holding, also held that the father could seek a credit for the support he paid pursuant to the invalid New York order and that Family Court had the authority to order that credit. In Johnson v. Chapin (12 NY3d 461 [2009]), where it was determined at trial that the husband's income was significantly less than that upon which the temporary orders for maintenance and child support were based, the Court of Appeals approved the crediting of the excess maintenance against the equitable distribution award, but upheld the denial of a credit against excess child support, noting the strong public policy against such crediting. The Court did imply that in the right case , a credit could be granted. It stated, "nothing in this record shows it was error to deny that relief"(Johnson, at 466). This obviously suggested that a proper record would support an order crediting for excess child support. Family Court held that this was one of those proper cases because not granting a credit to the father would be manifestly unfair.

This credit would be applied from the date of the filing of the petition on April 28, 2011, until the date of the Family Court's order on April 17, 2012. The Court held that with regard to $17,000 of that amount in excess that was paid while the appeal was pending Paris v. Paris (226 A.D.2d 381 [2nd Dept., 1996]) was controlling. "In construing the statute according to its plain language, it is clear that the term 'new order' refers to an order made by the Judge, or the [Support Magistrate] upon remand, based upon a review of properly filed objections and rebuttal, if any, to a previously issued final order.' Consequently, the crediting process enumerated therein applies in those situations where a final order is objected to, reviewed and subsequently superseded by a new order " (Paris, at 383-4).

Family Court held that a credit should be allowed when it would be manifestly unfair to deny it. This was such a case and it closely paralleled the circumstances that supported the granting of a credit in Spencer. Reversing and reinstating the original order without granting the father a credit would mean that justice was neither done nor seen to be done. The Court directed a hearing to determine the actual amount in controversy, the amounts to be credited and the schedule to apply those credits.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Home State - Domestic Relations Law §76 - E - Courts Lack Subject Matter Jurisdiction over Custody Proceedings Filed Prior to the Birth of a Child. Domestic Relations Law §76 -G - Removal of Fetus of While in Utero Is a Constitutional Right and Not Unjustifiable Conduct.

In Matter of Sara Ashton McK. v. Samuel Bode M. --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6016210 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court which granted respondent father's motion to dismiss the mother's custody petition, reinstated the petition and remanded for further proceedings. It held that the Family Court properly found that New York was the child's home state, based "on the literal construction of the statute," since the mother gave birth on February 23, 2013, in New York and the child lived in New York continuously until the time of the mother's filing of her custody petition, two days later. However, the court erred in declining to exercise jurisdiction pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) to determine the mother's petition for initial custody of the child. It found that the California court did not have "jurisdiction substantially in conformity" with the UCCJEA (see Domestic Relations Law § 76-e), since the father's paternity petition, filed in California on November 15, 2012, did not initiate a proper custody proceeding, because the child had not yet been born. Under the UCCJEA, courts cannot exercise subject matter jurisdiction over custody proceedings filed prior to the birth of a child (see e.g. Waltenburg v. Waltenburg, 270 S.W.3d 308, 316-317 [Tex App, 5th Dist 2008]).

The Appellate Division found that the mother had not engaged in "unjustifiable conduct" to gain the Family Court's jurisdiction (Domestic Relations Law § 76-g). While "unjustifiable conduct" is not defined by statute, courts generally apply this provision where a child has been removed contrary to an existing custody order (see Adoption House v. P.M., 2003 WL 23354141, *7, 2003 Del Fam Ct LEXIS 227, *22 [Del Fam Ct 2003]). It disagreed with the Referee's finding that the mother's "appropriation of the child while in utero was irresponsible" and "reprehensible" and warranted a declination of jurisdiction in favor of the California court. The mother's conduct amounted to nothing more than her decision to relocate to New York during her pregnancy. It rejected the Referee's apparent suggestion that, prior to her relocation, the mother needed to somehow arrange her relocation with the father with whom she had only a brief romantic relationship. Putative fathers have neither the right nor the ability to restrict a pregnant woman from her constitutionally-protected liberty (see Matter of Wilner v. Prowda, 158 Misc.2d 579, 601 N.Y.S.2d 518 [Sup Ct, N.Y. County 1993] [refusing the putative father's request to determine custody of the parties' unborn child and restrain his then-pregnant wife from leaving New York]).

The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in declining jurisdiction on the basis of an inconvenient forum (Domestic Relations Law § 76-f[1]). Although a determination as to whether a court is an inconvenient forum is left to the sound discretion of the trial court after consideration of eight enumerated factors(Domestic Relations Law § 76-f[2]), the Referee did not consider all of the relevant factors in reaching its determination that New York was an inconvenient forum. The father appears to be in a superior financial position to the mother, there was an approximate 3,000 mile distance between New York and California, the mother had now established herself as a New York resident, the child was born in New York and had never resided in California, and New York was the child's "home state." The UCCJEA "elevates the 'home state' to paramount importance in both initial custody determinations and modifications of custody orders. Although the Referee found the mother's conduct to be a relevant factor, her relocation to New York with her fetus did not constitute conduct capable of supporting the Referee's decision to decline jurisdiction based on inconvenient forum.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - Single Incident Is Legally Sufficient to Support a Finding of Harassment in the Second Degree

In Matter of Tamara A v Anthony Wayne S, 110 A.D.3d 560, 974 N.Y.S.2d 48, (1st Dept 2013) Petitioner testified that while she and respondent were sitting in the Family Court waiting room, respondent stood up, faced her, and said, "[S]omeone is going to get a bullet in their head." Petitioner, the child's maternal grandmother, testified that she believed respondent was talking about her, because she was preparing to adopt the child. She testified that she was afraid of respondent because they never got along, he had treated her with disrespect, and he had assaulted her daughter. Petitioner also testified that immediately after respondent made the statement, agency caseworkers who were in the waiting room entered the courtroom and informed the court. Petitioner's testimony was undisputed. Although the court adjourned the hearing to allow respondent to testify, he later declined to do so.

The Appellate Division found that a fair preponderance of the evidence supported the court's finding that respondent committed acts that would constitute harassment in the second degree and disorderly conduct (Family Court Act §§ 812[1]; 821[1]; 832). A person is guilty of harassment in the second degree when, "with intent to harass, annoy or alarm another person ... [h]e ... subjects such other person to physical contact, or attempts or threatens to do the same" (Penal Law § 240.26[1]; see e.g. McGuffog v. Ginsberg, 266 A.D.2d 136, 699 N.Y.S.2d 26 [1st Dept.1999]). A person is guilty of disorderly conduct when, "with intent to cause public inconvenience, annoyance or alarm, or recklessly creating a risk thereof," he engages in "violent, tumultuous or threatening" behavior (Penal Law § 240.20[1]). The Appellate Division found that contrary to respondent's contention, a single incident is legally sufficient to support a finding of harassment in the second degree, and the court properly drew a negative inference from respondent's failure to testify.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Domestic Relations Law §76-a[1][A] - New York Retained Exclusive Continuing Jurisdiction Where No Determination Was Made That the Child, the Child and One Parent, or the Child and a Person Acting as a Parent Lacked a Significant Connection to this State, That Substantial Evidence Was No Longer Available in this State, or That the Child and the Parent Lived in Another State.

In Matter of Rankin v Rankin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6063843 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied respondent mother's motion to dismiss the petition of paternal grandmother for visitation with the subject child. The child and the mother lived in New York since the child's birth, and New York was the child's home state at the time of the initial custody order. New York remained the child's home state at the time the petition was filed. Thus, the court had jurisdiction to modify its initial custody order, which limited visitation to the father (see DRL §§ 76[1][a] and 76-a[2]). New York retained exclusive continuing jurisdiction because no determination was made that the child, the child and one parent, or the child and a person acting as a parent lacked a significant connection to this state, that substantial evidence was no longer available in this state concerning the child's care, protection, training and personal relationships, or that the child and the parent lived in another state, since the mother and the child did not move to Florida until after the petition was filed (see DRL §76-a[1][a]). The court properly exercised its discretion to retain jurisdiction over the parties after they moved to other states because the mother failed to sustain her burden of demonstrating that public or private interests militated against the litigation going forward in this state (see Islamic Republic of Iran v. Pahlavi, 62 N.Y.2d 474, 479 [1984], cert denied 469 U.S. 1108 [1985]), where an alternative forum was unavailable to the petitioner grandmother.

Child Custody - Jurisdiction - Domestic Relations Law §76-[1][B] - Florida Could Not Have Jurisdiction in Substantial Conformity with the UCCJEA Where Neither the Child Nor the Parties Were Residing There - Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a] .

In Matter of Liza P. v. Kevin P., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6064763 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Family Court which granted petitioner mother custody of the child. It held that the Family Court properly determined that it had jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76(1)(b). Florida could not have jurisdiction because, although it was the child's home state at the time the proceeding commenced, neither the child nor either party resided there. Furthermore, the mother and child resided in New York and had a family network here, and substantial evidence was available in this state regarding the child's care. Although respondent father commenced a proceeding in Florida prior to the commencement of the New York proceeding, Family Court correctly found that Florida could not have jurisdiction in substantial conformity with the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act because neither the child nor the parties were residing there (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a]). In any event, having learned of the Florida proceeding, the court fulfilled its obligation pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-e by attempting to communicate with the Florida court (see Vanneck v. Vanneck, 49 N.Y.2d 602, 610-611 [1980]; cf. Cynthia Marie S. v. Allen Wayne L., 228 A.D.2d 249 [1st Dept 1996]).

Same-sex Relationships - Oral Contract - Appellate Division Upholds Cause of Action for Breach of an Alleged Oral "Joint Venture/partnership" Agreement Whereby Plaintiff Would Share in Assets, Including the Defendant's Retirement Contributions and Earnings, in Exchange for Leaving Her Full-time Job to Care for the Parties' Children.

In Dee v Rakower, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5989685 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties lived together in a committed, same-sex relationship for nearly 18 years, and were the parents of two children. After the relationship ended, the plaintiff commenced this action seeking, inter alia, damages for breach of an alleged oral "joint venture/partnership" agreement whereby she would share in assets, including the defendant's retirement contributions and earnings, in exchange for leaving her full-time job to care for the parties' children. The plaintiff also asserted several equitable causes of action predicated upon the alleged oral agreement to share in the defendant's retirement contributions and earnings. The Appellate Division held that the complaint was sufficiently pleaded to state a cause of action sounding in breach of contract. However, it concluded that Supreme Court properly granted those branches of the motion which were to dismiss the equitable causes of action predicated upon the alleged oral agreement to share the defendant's retirement contributions and earnings.

In her complaint, the plaintiff alleged, and the defendant did not dispute, that she was involved in a committed relationship with the defendant, living as a family unit, from 1990 until 2007. Two children were born of this relationship. Each party was the biological parent of one child, and each child was legally adopted by the other party. According to the allegations set forth in the complaint, before they had children, each party was employed full-time, earning a salary and retirement benefits. The parties pooled their respective salaries to meet their shared expenses pursuant to what the plaintiff described as a specific agreement to form "a partnership and/or joint venture." In 1996, in furtherance of their agreement, the parties purchased a house as "joint tenants with rights of survivorship." After the parties' first child was born, the parties agreed, given the cost of child care, that the plaintiff would eschew her full-time employment and work part-time so that she could "be home with the child (later, children) and perform other non-financial services for the benefit of the family and for the parties' partnership and/or joint venture" while the defendant would continue to work full-time. The plaintiff claimed that her decision to leave her full-time employment was based upon the defendant's promise that her non-economic contributions to their family unit would, along with their pooled salaries and assets, be in furtherance of the "partnership/joint venture." Indeed, the parties "realized and specifically discussed that [the] defendant would be earning more income for, and [the plaintiff] would be contributing more non-financial services to, the parties' partnership/joint venture." The plaintiff asserted that, as a result, the parties specifically agreed to share equally in all financial contributions made by each of them and that all such contributions were for their mutual benefit. In addition, the parties allegedly specifically discussed that the defendant would continue to accrue retirement savings while the plaintiff would no longer be able to, and agreed that the plaintiff would be entitled to one half of the defendant's retirement contributions and earnings for the period that the plaintiff did not work at a job that provided her with a retirement plan.

Upon the termination of their nearly-18-year relationship, the plaintiff commenced this action. In her complaint, the plaintiff alleged ten causes of action. At issue on the appeal were the plaintiff's eighth cause of action, which was to recover damages for breach of the parties' alleged partnership/joint venture agreement, as well as her sixth cause of action, which was for dissolution of the alleged partnership/joint venture and an accounting of its assets, seventh cause of action, which was for the imposition of a constructive trust on one-half of the defendant's assets, and ninth cause of action, which was based on unjust enrichment.

The Appellate Division found that within its four corners, the complaint sufficiently alleged the elements of a breach of contract cause of action necessary to survive a motion to dismiss pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7). The essential elements for pleading a cause of action to recover damages for breach of contract are the existence of a contract, the plaintiff's performance pursuant to the contract, the defendant's breach of his or her contractual obligations, and damages resulting from the breach. In her complaint, the plaintiff sufficiently pleaded all of the elements of a breach of contract cause of action. In pertinent part, she alleged:

"15. After the parties' first child was born in 1996, the parties agreed that, given the costs of child care, Plaintiff would leave her full time job and assume part-time work so she could be home with the child (later, children) and perform other non-financial services for the benefit of the family and for the parties' partnership and/or joint venture, while Defendant would continue to work full-time to support the family/joint venture/partnership financially.

"16. At that time, the parties realized and specifically discussed that Defendant would be earning more income for, and Plaintiff would be contributing more non-financial services to, the parties' partnership/joint venture.

"17. The parties therefore specifically agreed that they would share equally in all financial and non-financial contributions made by each of them and that all such contributions-including without limitation earnings, assets, money, funds, accounts, and labor-was for their mutual benefit ...

"18. At that time, the parties also realized and specifically discussed that Defendant would continue to accrue retirement savings from her work while Plaintiff would not, since Plaintiff would no longer work at a job which provided retirement plans.

"19. The parties therefore specifically agreed that Plaintiff would be entitled to one-half of Defendant's retirement contributions and earnings that accrued to Defendant during the period that Plaintiff did not work at a job that provided her with full retirement plans."

The Appellate Division held that these factual allegations adequately set forth the existence of a contract pursuant to which the plaintiff would quit working full-time, thereby ceasing to earn money toward her own retirement plan, and pursue part-time work enabling her to stay home to care for the parties' children, in exchange for a one-half share in the defendant's retirement accounts accrued during those years that the plaintiff refrained from working at a job which provided retirement benefits.

The court found that alleged contractual agreement between the parties was supported by consideration. "Consideration consists of either a benefit to the promisor or a detriment to the promisee. It is enough that something is promised, done, forbore, or suffered by the party to whom the promise is made as consideration for the promise made to him [or her]" (Anand v. Wilson, 32 A.D.3d 808, 809, 821 N.Y.S.2d 130). The consideration here for the alleged contract was the forbearance of the plaintiff's career, the inability to continue to save toward her retirement during that forbearance, and her maintenance of the household in return for a share in the defendant's retirement benefits and other assets earned during the period of forbearance .

Since the plaintiff also alleged that the defendant breached the alleged agreement and that she sustained damages as a result of that breach, at this pleading stage, the eighth cause of action survived dismissal. The fact that the alleged agreement was made by an unmarried couple living together did not render it unenforceable. "New York courts have long accepted the concept that an express agreement between unmarried persons living together is as enforceable as though they were not living together, provided only that illicit sexual relations were not 'part of the consideration of the contract' " (Morone v. Morone, 50 N.Y.2d 481, 486, 429 N.Y.S.2d 592, 413 N.E.2d 1154, quoting Rhodes v. Stone, 17 N.Y.S. 561, 63 Hun 624, 624).

"[W]hile cohabitation without marriage does not give rise to the property and financial rights which normally attend the marital relation, neither does cohabitation disable the parties from making an agreement within the normal rules of contract law" (Morone v. Morone, 50 N.Y.2d at 486, 429 N.Y.S.2d 592, 413 N.E.2d 1154;see Matter of Gorden, 8 N.Y.2d 71, 75, 202 N.Y.S.2d 1, 168 N.E.2d 239). The Court found the case similar to Morone v. Morone (50 N.Y.2d 481, 429 N.Y.S.2d 592, 413 N.E.2d 1154. In Morone, the parties cohabited as husband and wife although they were not married. The plaintiff claimed that the parties had entered into an oral partnership agreement whereby, among other things, they agreed that the net profits of their partnership would be used and applied for their equal benefit. The plaintiff devoted herself exclusively to their relationship and this endeavor. The Court of Appeals concluded that the plaintiff sufficiently stated a breach of contract cause of action.

The Appellate Division found that the cause of action for a constructive trust had to be dismissed because the allegations were insufficient to state a cause of action to impose a constructive trust. Unlike divorcing married couples who can rely upon the equitable distribution law to fashion a formula for the court to calculate a coverture value of a spouse's pension, it found that find that the allegation of an equitable right to share the defendant's pension on an equal basis was insufficient to support a cause of action to impose a constructive trust. In any event, it held that the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (29 USC § 1001 et seq.) precludes the imposition of a constructive trust on a pension plan. The Court also dismissed the equitable causes of action to recover damages for unjust enrichment, and for an accounting for failure to state a cause of action.

Child Support - Enforcement - Deliberate Interference by a Parent with Court-ordered Visitation Does Not Constitute a Ground to Cancel Child Support Arrears

In Matter of Vasquez v. Powell, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5992228 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the mother sought to suspend child support payments and to cancel her child support arrears based upon the father's alleged violation of a visitation order, and to hold the father in civil contempt for the alleged violation. The Appellate Division held that initially, deliberate interference by a parent with court-ordered visitation does not constitute a ground to cancel child support arrears (Ledgin v. Ledgin, 36 A.D.3d 669, 828 N.Y.S.2d 202). Interference with visitation rights can be a basis for prospectively suspending child support payments, but only "where the custodial parent's actions rise to the level of deliberate frustration or active interference with the noncustodial parent's visitation rights. The mother failed to demonstrate that the father actively interfered with or deliberately frustrated her visitation rights. Rather, the evidence showed that, while the father did not force the parties' son to visit with the mother, he did encourage visitation.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - Respondent Committed Family Offense of Harassment in the First Degree. He "Intentionally and Repeatedly" Harassed Petitioner "By Engaging in a Course of Conduct or by Repeatedly Committing Acts Which Place[d][Her] in Reasonable Fear of Physical Injury". The Requisite Intent May Be Inferred from the Surrounding Circumstances

In Matter of Shana SS. v. Jeremy TT., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6096754 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) in April 2002, respondent, who then resided in New York, was arrested after he transmitted child pornography via the Internet to an undercover police officer who was posing as a 13-year-old girl. In February 2003, respondent "jumped bail" on that charge and fled to Florida where, by his own admission, he began "living as a fugitive." While there, respondent became involved in an electronic crime enterprise and primarily supported himself by engaging in credit card fraud.

Respondent and petitioner met in Florida in April 2004 and moved in together shortly thereafter. In October 2004, respondent was arrested and extradited to New Jersey to face a federal indictment related to the credit card fraud. In 2005, the parties' child, who was the subject of these proceedings, was born. Following resolution of the federal charges, respondent was extradited to New York to answer to the child pornography and bail jumping offenses and, in 2006, pleaded guilty to one count of promoting a sexual performance by a child, one count of attempted dissemination of indecent material to a minor in the first degree and one count of bail jumping in the second degree and was sentenced to an aggregate prison term of 2 to 6 years. During the course of respondent's incarceration, petitioner initially attempted to facilitate a relationship between respondent and the child. As time went on, however, petitioner became increasingly alarmed by what she regarded as the threatening nature of certain statements made by respondent in various letters to and telephone conversations with her. Following respondent's release from prison in 2011, petitioner commenced proceedings alleging a family offense and seeking an order of protection. Shortly thereafter, respondent petitioned for custody and visitation, and petitioner cross-petitioned for sole legal and physical custody of the child. A combined hearing ensued, at the conclusion of which Family Court granted petitioner sole legal and physical custody of the child with therapeutic visitation to respondent. Family Court also found that respondent committed the family offense of harassment in the first degree and awarded petitioner a two-year order of protection.

The Appellate Division affirmed. Petitioner met her burden of establishing that Respondent committed the family offense of harassment in the first degree-specifically, that he "intentionally and repeatedly" harassed her "by engaging in a course of conduct or by repeatedly committing acts which place[d][her] in reasonable fear of physical injury" (Penal Law s 240.25). The requisite intent may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances. Petitioner testified that, while incarcerated, respondent repeatedly threatened both her well-being and to take the child away from her. For example, when petitioner advised respondent that she had met another man (now her husband), respondent replied, "[You] must have a f* * ing death wish.... [I]t's until death do us part ..., you don't just get to leave." Similarly, when petitioner approached respondent about changing the child's last name, respondent stated, "[I]f you try to take that f * *ing kid from me I will make sure he ... never knows your name, ... I [will] make him disappear like that (fingers snapping); all it takes is one phone call." Finally, when petitioner suggested that they allow Family Court to resolve their differences, respondent replied, "[E]ven if you do win in court I'm gonna make sure you lose." These specific statements, in its view, "carried ominous implications" for petitioner and the child's safety and, given the context in which they were made provided ample support for Family Court's conclusion that respondent had committed [the underlying] family offense.

In light of respondent's limited contact with the child while incarcerated and his resulting lack of parental experience, as well as his failure to successfully complete a sex offender treatment program, there was no basis upon which to set aside Family Court's award of therapeutic visitation -particularly given the nightmares and behavioral difficulties that the child experienced following visits with respondent.

Child Support - Modification - Substantial Change in Circumstances - Family Ct Act § 451 Was Amended to Provide That "[I]ncarceration Shall Not Be a Bar to Finding a Substantial Change in Circumstances Provided Such Incarceration Is Not the Result of Nonpayment of a Child Support Order, or an Offense Against the Custodial Parent or Child Who Is the Subject of the Order or Judgment" .

In Matter of Baltes v Smith, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 6096780 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) Pursuant to a May 2010 order, petitioner (father) was required to pay $72 per week to respondent (mother) for support of their child (born in 2006). In July 2011, after being arrested a month earlier and held on federal charges, the father petitioned for a downward modification of his child support obligation. Following a hearing, the Support Magistrate noted a recent amendment to Family Ct Act § 451, which provided that incarceration does not necessarily bar a finding of a substantial change in circumstances (see L 2010, ch 182, § 6, codified as Family Ct Act § 451[2][a]), and granted the petition, modifying the father's support obligation to $25 per month for the period from July 2011 to January 2012.

The mother filed objections and Family Court vacated the Support Magistrate's order and dismissed the petition. The court found that the amendment to Family Ct Act § 451 did not apply to the father's petition regarding the May 2010 order since the amendment applied prospectively to child support orders entered after October 13, 2010, the effective date of the pertinent amendments to the statute. Family Court determined that the father otherwise failed to meet his burden of establishing a substantial change in circumstances. The father's second petition, filed before Family Court's February 2012 order and seeking to extend the reduced child support beyond January 2012 because of his continued incarceration, was dismissed by the Support Magistrate in light of Family Court's order.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It noted that request for a downward modification of a child support order must be supported by a showing of a substantial change in circumstances. Before the 2010 amendment to Family Ct Act § 451, a parent's loss of income resulting from incarceration generally was not considered a sufficient change in circumstances to warrant a reduction or suspension of child support (see Matter of Knights v. Knights, 71 N.Y.2d 865, 866-867 [1988]). As part of legislation making many changes regarding child support , Family Ct Act § 451 was amended in several respects including, as relevant here, to provide that "[i]ncarceration shall not be a bar to finding a substantial change in circumstances provided such incarceration is not the result of nonpayment of a child support order, or an offense against the custodial parent or child who is the subject of the order or judgment" (Family Ct Act § 451[2][a]; see L 2010, ch 182, § 6). However, the legislation further provided that, as to the section that included this amendment, it "shall apply to any action or proceeding to modify any order of child support entered on or after the effective date of this act " (L 2010, ch 182, § 13). The language used by the Legislature controls. And, under such circumstances, Family Court correctly found that, since the order the father sought to modify had been entered before the effective date of the statute, the amended language did not apply. Moreover, under applicable pre -amendment precedent, Family Court's determination that the father failed to demonstrate a substantial change in circumstances to warrant a downward modification was supported by the record.

New York Law Restricts Parental Rights of Sexual Perpetrators When a Child Is Born as a Result of Sexual Offenses. Laws of 2013, Ch 371. Effective September 27, 2013.

Domestic Relations Law § 240 (1-c) (a) was amended to provide that no court shall make an order providing for visitation or custody to a person who has been convicted of murder in the first or second degree in this state, or convicted of an offense in another jurisdiction which, if committed in this state, would constitute either murder in the first or second degree, of a parent, legal custodian, legal guardian, sibling, half-sibling or step-sibling of any child who is the subject of the proceeding. Pending determination of a petition for visitation or custody, the child may not visit and no person may visit with the child present, such person who has been convicted of murder in the first or second degree in this state, or convicted of an offense in another jurisdiction which, if committed in this state, would constitute either murder in the first or second degree, of a parent, legal custodian, legal guardian, sibling, half-sibling or step-sibling of a child who is the subject of the proceeding without the consent of such child's custodian or legal guardian. Laws of 2013, Ch 371, §1.

Domestic Relations Law §240 (1-c) (b) was amended to provide that there shall be a rebuttable presumption that it is not in the best interests of the child to be placed in the custody of or to visit with a person who has been convicted (in this state or in another jurisdiction) of one or more of the following sexual offenses, when the child who is subject of the proceeding was conceived as a result: rape in the first or second degree; course of sexual conduct against a child in the first degree; predatory sexual assault; or predatory sexual assault against a child. Laws of 2013, Ch 371, §1.

Notwithstanding the foregoing a court may order visitation or custody where:
(i) (A) such child is of suitable age to signify assent and such child assents to such visitation or custody; and the court finds that such visitation or custody is in the best interests of the child. Laws of 2013, Ch 371, §1.

Notwithstanding the foregoing a court may order visitation or custody where:
(i) (B) if such child is not of suitable age to signify assent, the child's custodian or legal guardian assents to such order(ii) and the court finds that such visitation or custody is in the best interests of the child. Laws of 2013, Ch 371, §1.

Notwithstanding the foregoing a court may order visitation or custody where:
(i) (C) the person who has been convicted of murder in the first or second degree, or an offense in another jurisdiction which if committed in this state, would constitute either murder in the first or second degree, can prove by a preponderance of the evidence that:
(1) he or she, or a family or household member of either party, was a victim of domestic violence by the victim of such murder; and (2) the domestic violence was causally related to the commission of such murder; (ii) and the court finds that such visitation or custody is in the best interests of the child.¹² For the purpose of making a determination pursuant to this provision the court shall not be bound by the findings of fact, conclusions of law or ultimate conclusion as determined by the proceedings leading to the conviction of murder in the first or second degree in this state or of an offense in another jurisdiction which, if committed in this state, would constitute murder in either the first or second degree, of a parent, legal guardian, legal custodian, sibling, half-sibling or step-sibling of a child who is the subject of the proceeding. In all proceedings under this section, an attorney must be appointed for the child. Laws of 2013, Ch 371, §1.

Domestic Relations Law § 111-a, subdivision 1 was amended to provide that a person who has been convicted in this state or in another jurisdiction of the sexual offenses of rape in first or second degree; course of sexual conduct against a child in the first degree; predatory sexual assault; or predatory sexual assault against a child shall not be entitled to receive notice of adoption proceedings, when the child subject to these proceedings was conceived as the result of the sexual offenses committed. Stipulations - Appellate Division Sustains Stipulation Pursuant to CPLR 2104 Although Not Made in Open Court Where Executed in the Context of a Pending Divorce Proceeding, and Was Subject to Judicial Oversight

In Rio v Rio, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5814350 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 2001. They entered into a separation agreement dated March 11, 2005, which was duly acknowledged. The 2005 separation agreement provided, in part, that the appellant would pay the respondent $500 weekly as maintenance for a period of two years, commencing on March 11, 2005. In 2007, the parties attempted a reconciliation. However, in 2008, the respondent commenced an action for a divorce in Supreme Court, Suffolk County, under Index No. 35634/2008. Thereafter, the parties, through separate counsel, negotiated a "Post-Nuptial Agreement," settling the respondent's action. Pursuant to the postnuptial agreement, the appellant was to pay the respondent $300,000. The postnuptial agreement also provided that the parties "hereby revoke any and all agreements ... previously made by the parties."Both parties executed the postnuptial agreement on September 22, 2009, in the presence of two witnesses. Prior to the execution of the postnuptial agreement, the appellant discharged his attorney. The appellant had signed a stipulation discontinuing the respondent's action and his counterclaims the day before the execution of the postnuptial agreement. On the same day that the postnuptial agreement was executed, counsel for the respondent and the appellant signed a stipulation discontinuing with prejudice the respondent's action.

In 2010, the appellant commenced this action for a divorce. On December 16, 2010, the parties and their counsel signed a preliminary conference stipulation and order which indicated that, with respect to present maintenance being paid, the respondent was being paid "$1,000 per week to be credited toward $300,000 under postnup. agreement." The respondent subsequently moved for pendente lite relief. In his affidavit opposing the respondent's motion, the appellant acknowledged that he had agreed to pay the respondent $1,000 per week for maintenance. In an order dated January 21, 2011, determining the respondent's motion, the Supreme Court directed the appellant to pay the respondent $1,000 per week as temporary maintenance "as agreed upon in the Stipulation and Order dated December 16, 2010." The appellant thereafter moved, inter alia, for determinations that the postnuptial agreement was not valid and the 2005 separation agreement was valid. Supreme Court determined that the postnuptial agreement was valid and binding on the parties and incorporated, but did not merge, the postnuptial agreement into the judgment.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(3) applies only to agreements entered into outside the context of a pending judicial proceeding (Rubinfeld v. Rubinfeld, 279 A.D.2d 153, 158). Moreover, stipulations of settlement are favored by the courts and are not lightly cast aside. Thus, an agreement between parties or their attorneys relating to any matter in an action, other than one made between counsel in open court, is not binding upon a party unless it is in a writing subscribed by him or his attorney or reduced to the form of an order and entered" (CPLR 2104). The record established that the parties relied on the duly executed stipulation of settlement, which was denominated as the postnuptial agreement, as a means of resolving the respondent's prior divorce action. The postnuptial agreement was executed while the respondent's action was pending before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court referred to the appellant's obligations pursuant to the postnuptial agreement in two prior orders. Accordingly, the postnuptial agreement was valid, as it "was executed in the context of a pending divorce proceeding, and was subject to judicial oversight, even though it was not signed in open court" (Acito v. Acito, 23 Misc.3d 832, 836, [Sup Ct, Bronx County], affd 72 A.D.3d 493, 898 N.Y.S.2d 133;see CPLR 2104). Moreover, the appellant relied upon the postnuptial agreement in the preliminary conference order relating to his maintenance obligation in this action. Having done so, he ratified the postnuptial agreement. Supreme Court properly denied that branch of the appellant's motion which was for a determination that the postnuptial agreement was not valid. Inasmuch as the postnuptial agreement provided for the revocation of all prior agreements, the Supreme Court also properly denied that branch of the appellant's motion which was for a determination that the 2005 separation agreement, was valid, since the postnuptial agreement superseded the prior agreement.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Domestic Relations Law § 236(b)(5-a) - First Department Holds Formula Adopted by New Maintenance Provision Covers All the Spouse's Basic Living Expenses, Including Housing Costs

In Francis v Francis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5976098 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division reversed on the law an order which awarded plaintiff $868.66 bi-weekly in temporary maintenance, and denied plaintiff's request for counsel and appraisal fees, and remanded the matter for a reconsideration of the award in light of the directives of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a), and for a reconsideration of the request for counsel and appraisal fees. It noted that to determine temporary maintenance, the motion court had to apply Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a), which had become effective on October 12, 2010. While the motion court properly followed the calculations provided in that section to arrive at a presumptive award of temporary maintenance, it did not address the fact that defendant was paying the carrying costs on the marital residence, where both parties still reside, and that plaintiff specifically requested an order directing that defendant continue to pay those costs, as well as her unreimbursed medical expenses. It pointed out that it has viewed the "formula adopted by the new maintenance provision as covering all the spouse's basic living expenses, including housing costs" (Khaira, 93 AD3d at 200). Accordingly, it vacated the award and remanded the matter for a reconsideration. It noted that in reconsidering the award of temporary maintenance, the motion court should consider the payment of the carrying costs on the marital residence, half of which should be credited to defendant in calculating the award. The court should also articulate any other factors it may consider in deviating from the presumptive award, including plaintiff's medical condition and her inability to work. Any award of maintenance should be made effective as of the date of application. Given the rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse (DRL § 237), it also remanded for a reconsideration of plaintiff's request for counsel and appraisal fees. The motion court's denial of those requests was based on the now vacated award and a mathematical error in the calculation of the parties' respective incomes following the award of temporary maintenance.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Supreme Court Erred in Determining Plaintiff Lacked Standing to Seek Custody or Visitation with Regard to the Child born of Artificial Insemination. Because the Same Sex Parties Were Married it Should Have Recognized the Plaintiff as the Child's Parent under New York Law.

In Counihan v Bishop, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5927078 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) in May 2009, the plaintiff and the defendant traveled to Connecticut to be married, and then returned to live in their home in New York. Subsequently, they decided to have a child, the defendant was artificially inseminated, and, in September 2010, the defendant gave birth to a child. The plaintiff was listed as the second mother on the child's birth certificate, and the child's last name was the hyphenated last names of the plaintiff and the defendant. In 2012, the parties separated, and the defendant and the child lived apart from the plaintiff for several months. However, the plaintiff continued to see the child a few times per week, which included overnight visits. The parties briefly lived with each other again at the end of 2012, but their attempt to reconcile failed, and the defendant again moved with the child to another residence. In January 2013, the plaintiff commenced an action for a divorce and sought, by order to show cause, custody of the child, or in the alternative, visitation. The defendant cross-moved, for sole custody of the child. Supreme Court, determined that the plaintiff lacked standing to seek custody or visitation because she was not the child's biological or adoptive parent, and without a hearing, denied the plaintiff's motion and granted the defendant's cross motion for sole custody.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that although, at the time of the child's birth, New York had not yet enacted the Marriage Equality Act (see L. 2011, ch. 95), affording comity to the parties' Connecticut marriage, the Supreme Court should have recognized the plaintiff as the child's parent under New York law (citing Debra H. v. Janice R., 14 N.Y.3d 576, 599-601, 904 N.Y.S.2d 263, 930 N.E.2d 184; Matter of Ranftle, 81 A.D.3d 566, 567, 917 N.Y.S.2d 195; Laura WW. v. Peter WW., 51 A.D.3d 211, 217, 856 N.Y.S.2d 258; see also Domestic Relations Law § 73[1]). Thus, the Supreme Court erred in determining that the plaintiff lacked standing to seek custody or visitation with regard to the child. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a hearing and, thereafter, a new determination.

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Unconscionability - Regardless Whether Wife Committed Fraud, Wife's Failure to Disclose Her Earnings in an Agreement That Was Manifestly Unfair to the Husband. The Decision Whether to Consider Capital Gains as Income Is a Discretionary Determination.

In Marlinski v Marlinski, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5952044 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Defendant wife appealed from a judgment of divorce that, inter alia, equitably distributed marital assets, allocated marital debt and calculated the child support for the parties' minor children. The Appellate Division held that contrary to the wife's contention, Supreme Court did not abuse or improvidently exercise its discretion in determining that plaintiff husband was entitled to an equitable share of the marital funds used to discharge the mortgage on the wife's separate residence, which had been used as the marital residence for the entire duration of the marriage. As the court noted in its decision, the parties engaged in "complex financial dealings," which often consisted of acquiring new lines of credit to pay off existing lines of credit. The testimony at trial established that, although the wife purchased the marital residence prior to the marriage, the parties used marital funds to pay for improvements and to discharge the mortgage on that residence. The husband was thus "entitled to recoup [his] equitable share of the marital funds used to reduce the indebtedness and pay for improvements to the marital abode.

The Appellate Division agreed with the wife that the court abused its discretion in awarding the husband $3,000, which represented one-half of the parties' 2008 tax refund. The entire tax refund had been used to pay down debt on a Discover Card line of credit. After the divorce action was commenced, the wife took a cash advance from the Discover Card line of credit and deposited the money into her separate checking account. The evidence at trial established that the wife used that money to make payments toward marital debt. As the Discover Card debt was marital debt, the husband was not entitled to credit for his share of the marital funds that were used to reduce that debt. It also held that the court abused its discretion in awarding the husband $569, the amount withdrawn by the wife from the parties' joint checking account in September 2008 and January 2009. The evidence at trial established that the wife used the money for household bills and also to reduce the Discover Card debt.

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the wife's contention, the court did not err in vacating the child support and maintenance provisions of the parties' October 2009 stipulation. In that stipulation, the parties had agreed to impute income to the wife in the amount of $15,000, and the husband had agreed to maintenance and child support awards to the wife based on that imputed income. The Appellate Division agreed with the Supreme Court that a reasonable inference existed that the wife did not fully disclose her financial assets ..., and, as a result, the terms of the agreement were so inequitable as to be manifestly unfair to the husband]. The wife had not been employed outside the home since the birth of the parties' children, but it is likewise undisputed that she had inherited large sums of money during the course of the marriage. Moreover, the wife failed to disclose her significant stock earnings, which, by October 2009, had totaled over $48,000 for that year. By the end of 2009, the wife had an adjusted gross income of $121,901. Thus, the wife had over $100,000 more in income than was imputed to her in the stipulation, and her income was more than two times what the husband had earned in any of the years before the stipulation. The Court held that regardless whether the wife could be said to have committed fraud, the wife's failure to disclose her earnings in the stock market resulted in an agreement that was manifestly unfair to the husband.

The Appellate Division rejected the wife's argument that after partially vacating the stipulation, the court erred in imputing an annual income of $50,000 to her. The court did not abuse its discretion in considering the wife's gross income as "reported in the most recent federal income tax return" (Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b][b][5), including investment income, as well as "such other resources as may be available to the wife" , including non-income producing assets such as real property she inherited and money, goods or services provided by relatives and friends, such as the large monetary gifts provided to her by family members. While the wife contended that her capital gains in 2009 were an anomaly that was not likely to recur, it concluded that the court properly took into consideration the volatility of the stock market when it imputed less than half of the wife's actual earnings to her as annual income. The decision whether to consider capital gains as income is a discretionary determination and, under the circumstances of this case, it saw no basis upon which to disturb the court's exercise of its discretion.

Child Support - Award - Drl § 240(1-b)(C)(7) - Extraordinary Expenses - Extraordinary Visitation Expenses Are Only One Factor for the Court to Consider. Payment for Private School Tuition Continued Despite Order Quadrupling Basic Support.

In Barton v Barton,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5952434 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed an order granting petitioner mother an upward modification of child support. Pursuant to an agreement of the parties that was incorporated but not merged in their judgment of divorce, the parties agreed with respect to child support that, "in the event that either party's income increases or decreases by 25% through no fault of their own, either may petition the Court for a de novo review of their respective child[] support obligations and school cost contributions." In her petition, the mother alleged that her income had decreased by 25%. After a hearing, the Support Magistrate determined that the father had more than a 25% increase in income, and thereafter calculated the father's child support obligation in accordance with the Child Support Standards Act.

The Appellate Division rejected the argument that the Support Magistrate should have dismissed the petition after finding that the mother failed to demonstrate that she had a 25% decrease in income. While Family Court Act § 441 requires a court to dismiss a petition for modification of child support if the allegations of the petition are not established by competent proof, the pleadings are to be liberally construed and courts may sua sponte conform the pleadings to the evidence. It concluded that the support Magistrate properly conformed the petition to the proof, and rejected the father's contention that he was prejudiced thereby.

The Court rejected the father's further contention that the amount of child support awarded was unjust and inappropriate (Family Ct Act § 413[1] [f]). Although the father's visitation expenses were extraordinary inasmuch as he lived and worked in New York City he also maintained a home in Syracuse to visit the children on weekends, and that was simply one factor for the court to consider (see § 413[1][f][9]). The father also noted that his child support obligation as set forth in the agreement was less than what would be the amount under the CSSA because, inter alia, he agreed to pay for the children's private school tuition without contribution from the mother. He contended that, "[g]iven this linkage, it made no sense [for the Support Magistrate] to keep the father's tuition obligation intact (with a negligible contribution from the mother), while quadrupling his basic support." The Appellate Division rejected that contention. The Support Magistrate ordered the mother to pay her pro rata share of the private school tuition and, while the father dismissed the mother's contribution as negligible, that was a function of the vast disparity in income between the parties.

Action for a Divorce - Depositions - 22 NYCRR 221.2 - Propriety of Direction to Witness Not to Answer Questions - Rule Requiring a Deponent to Answer All Questions Does Not Extend to Questions of Law , Legal Strategy or Witness' Opinion about Legal Strategy

In White v White, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5929120 (N.Y.Sup.) Supreme Court was asked to rule on the propriety of a question asked at a deposition which required the client to disclose his legal position: "Okay. Is that right? You're not withdrawing your request for changing custody unless she withdraws her request for child support?" Opposing counsel directed the witness not to answer, claiming "it is an inappropriate question." The witness then stated he had to consult with counsel. The court held that the witness was not required to answer the question posed during the deposition by virtue of existing case law and 22 NYCRR 221.2.

Supreme Court pointed out that the scope of permissible questioning at depositions is generally governed by court rule. 22 NYCRR 221.2 provides that a deponent shall answer all questions at a deposition, except; (1) to preserve a privilege or right of confidentiality, (2) to enforce a limitation set forth in an order of a court, or (3) when the question is plainly improper and would, if answered, cause significant prejudice to a person. Unless a question is clearly violative of a witness's "constitutional rights, or of some privilege recognized in law, or is palpably irrelevant, questions (at an examination before trial) should be freely permitted and answered, since all objections other than those as to form are preserved for the trial and may be raised at that time." Roggow v. Walker, 303 A.D.2d 1003,1004 (4th Dept.2003). The scope of permitted discovery only applies to facts, or to matters that relate to a witness' bias or motive. Williams v. Roosevelt Hosp., 66 N.Y.2d 391, 397 (1985); Monica W. v. Milevoi, 252 A.D.2d 260 (1st Dept.1999) (a witness may not refuse to answer questions regarding matters of fact); Burke v. County of Erie, 2013 N.Y. Slip Op 6466 (4th Dept.2013) (questions regarding motive or bias are relevant and proper). The general rule requiring a deponent to answer all questions does not extend to questions of law or legal strategy or the witness' opinion about legal strategy. In Barber v. BPS Venture, Inc., 31 AD3d 897 (3rd Dept.2006), the questions which counsel refused to permit the witness to answer largely related to his understanding of the parties' ultimate legal contentions. The court described such inquiry as "palpably improper ." See also O'Neill v. Ho, 28 AD3d 626 (2nd Dept.2006) (acknowledging that no answers required to questions of "palpable irrelevance"); Lakeville Merrick Corp. v. Town Bd., of Islip, 23 A.D.2d 584 (2nd Dept.1965) (conclusion of fact or law and an argumentative matter as to which examination before trial is not permitted). In Mayer v. Hoang, 83 AD3d 1516 (4th Dept.2011) the court held that it was "well settled" that a plaintiff at a deposition may not "be compelled to answer questions seeking legal and factual conclusions or questions asking him [or her] to draw inferences from the facts." See also Roggow v. Walker, 303 A.D.2d 1003 (4th Dept.2003) (acknowledged that questions should not be permitted into matters that are "palpably irrelevant.").

Supreme Court observed that before the enactment of the court rule the Fourth Department directed trial courts that: A witness at an examination before trial may not be compelled to answer questions of law, particularly those which relate to his understanding of his contentions in the lawsuit. Nor may he be compelled to answer questions seeking legal and factual conclusions or questions asking him to draw inferences from the facts. Lobdell v. S. Buffalo Ry., 159 A.D.2d 958 (4th Dept.1990). The decision in Lobdell declares a broader common law ban on questions involving legal strategy and legal/factual conclusions than the restrictions of 22 NYCRR 221.2. The court rule does not supersede the crux of the Fourth Department's broad prohibition against requiring a witness to answer questions that involve legal conclusions or facts related to legal matters. Applying the holding in Lobdell requires that if the question improperly intrudes on legal matters, the court need not find any "significant prejudice" to the deponent which would otherwise be required under 22 NYCRR 221.2.

In the alternative, this court concluded that "significant prejudice" would result to the deponent if he answered the question, and therefore, the witness would be justified in not answering it under the rule as well. The Court noted that other courts suggest that if the question is "plainly improper" then "substantial prejudice" flows from it. See, e.g., Koch v. Sheresky, Aronson & Mayefsky LLP, 33 Misc.3d 1228(A) (Sup.Ct. New York Cty, 2011) (directing a party to answer a question about current legal theory or strategy would be the cause of significant prejudice to that party, and is improper). However, the text of the rule does not equate the two concepts: it requires a judicial finding on both aspects-the question must be both "plainly improper" and "cause significant prejudice."

In this case, the witness, after the exchange between counsel over the validity of the question, added that he would have to "consult with my attorney to decide anything about that." In this respect, the witness was declining to further answer the question without consultation with his attorney. Under these facts, this court concluded that the witness was seeking legal counsel on a legal question before answering the inquiry. Hence, he was seeking, after the interruption of the deposition and albeit somewhat awkwardly, to assert his right to counsel before answering the question. To deny the witness the right to seek counsel on a question that asked him to describe his legal strategy would, in the court's view, cause him "significant prejudice" under the court rules.

Child Custody - Award - Epileptic Seizures Do Not Render Mother Unfit to Be the Custodial Parent

In Desiree L v Louis N, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5644444 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which awarded permanent custody of the child to petitioner mother. It held that the court properly determined that petitioner's epileptic seizures, standing alone, did not render her unfit to be the custodial parent. Petitioner consistently received medical care for her condition and was reasonably compliant with her medication, and her physicians did not suggest that she could not adequately care for the child. The court also correctly found that petitioner has made adequate arrangements for the child in the event that she experienced a seizure.

Contempt - DRL § 245 - Hearing Required on Contempt Motion When Party Opposing Motion Asserts a Prima Facie Defense of Financial Inability to Comply (Domestic Relations Law § 246 [3]).

In Edelstein v Edelstein, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5745996 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division reversed an order which granted plaintiff's motion to hold defendant in contempt of court for failing to comply with court orders relating to pendente lite financial obligations, and directed incarceration of defendant for the lesser of 60 days or until he paid $436,527.24. It observed that as a matter of due process, a hearing is required on a contempt motion that will result in incarceration when the party opposing the motion asserts a defense of financial inability to comply (Domestic Relations Law § 246 [3]). In opposition to original contempt motion, defendant requested a hearing on his ability to pay, and submitted evidence to show that all of his income was going toward paying his monthly pendente lite obligations for spousal and child support, as well as the mortgage and virtually all expenses of maintaining the marital residence, tuition for the parties' five children, and other expenses of the household. He asserted that he could not continue to meet those obligations and also comply with the portions of the prior orders requiring him to pay additional lump sum amounts, including over $262,000 to a contractor to make repairs to the marital residence and $150,000 to the wife's attorney for interim legal fees. He submitted a statement of net worth showing assets worth about $1.5 million, which he contended had no ready market value, and asserted that, even if those assets could be sold, he then would have no income with which to satisfy his continuing support obligations. Defendant also submitted an affidavit of the family's long-time accountant concerning defendant's income and opining that defendant could not comply with the additional orders requiring the lump sum payments without liquidating all of his assets.

Plaintiff responded that defendant was being deceitful and hiding assets and income that would enable him to comply, pointing to inconsistencies in his submissions and to his comfortable lifestyle. Upon renewal, plaintiff requested a hearing in connection with her contempt motion, and argued that no means other than contempt were available to obtain satisfaction because defendant's disclosed income was insufficient and he had no remaining assets that could be sequestered or used to satisfy a money judgment. Since the issue of defendant's financial ability to comply with all of the obligations imposed by the court's orders turned on issues of credibility, which could not be resolved on the face of the submitted documents, a hearing was required before a determination can be made.

Family Court - Support - Enforcement - Family Ct Act § 454 - Wilful Violation of Order - Receipt of Public Assistance Did Not Conclusively Establish Inability to Pay

In Matter of Smith v Jeffers, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5629785 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Family Court did not err in finding that the father had willfully violated an order of child support. The fact that the father was receiving public assistance did not conclusively establish his inability to pay child support and was not sufficient to relieve him of his obligation to provide such support. The petitioner established, by clear and convincing evidence, that the father willfully and deliberately situated himself in a position to have limited income, and the father did not demonstrate that he had made reasonable efforts to obtain gainful employment to meet his child support obligation. Although the father claimed that stress and mental problems prevented him from finding and holding a job, he failed to offer any competent medical evidence to establish that he was unable to obtain employment due to mental illness.

Divorce - Disclosure - Medical Records - Except in Certain Circumstances, Medical Records Are Protected from Discovery by Cplr 4504(a).
Maintenance - Pendente Lite - Proper to Deny Award Where Parties' Income Tax Returns Demonstrated Movant Was Spouse with the Higher Income (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][b][4]).

In Mujahid v. Mujahid, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5629834 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in 1974 and had four adult children. In this action for a divorce, in November 2011, the Supreme Court denied the defendant's motion to compel the plaintiff to comply with certain discovery demands, for an award of temporary maintenance, and to direct the plaintiff to pay one half of the monthly mortgage obligation on certain investment property. The Appellate Division pointed out that although CPLR 3101(a) provides for "full disclosure of all matter material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action," discovery concerning marital fault with regard to equitable distribution is permitted "in only a limited set of circumstances involving egregious conduct" (Howard S. v. Lillian S., 14 NY3d 431, 437). Moreover, except in certain circumstances, medical records are protected from discovery by CPLR 4504(a). Here, the Supreme Court properly determined that the defendant's allegation that the plaintiff infected her with genital herpes more than 20 years prior to her motion was insufficient to warrant discovery of, inter alia, the plaintiff's confidential medical records (see Howard S. v. Lillian S., 14 NY3d at 435-436).

Supreme Court properly denied that branch of the defendant's motion which was for an award of temporary maintenance, as the parties' 2010 income tax returns demonstrated that she was the spouse with the higher income (see Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][b][4]). Supreme Court also properly denied that branch of the defendant's motion which was to direct the plaintiff to pay one half of the monthly mortgage obligation on certain investment property (Domestic Relations Law § 236 [B] [5-a]). It found no merit to the defendant's contention that the plaintiff's failure to pay a portion of the monthly mortgage obligation on that property constituted a wasteful dissipation of marital assets (cf. Maggiore v. Maggiore, 91 AD3d 1096, 1097).

Special Immigrant Juvenile Status - Juvenile May Satisfy this Statutory Reunification Requirement When the Juvenile Court Determines That Reunification Is Not Viable with Just 1, as Opposed to Both, of the Juvenile's Parents.

In Matter of Marcelina M.-G. v. Israel S., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5733616 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that in 1990, Congress enacted the special immigrant juvenile provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act (see 8 USC 1101[a][27][J]; Pub L 101-649, §153, 104 U.S. Stat 4978 [101st Cong, 2d Sess, Nov 29, 1990]), which provide a gateway for undocumented children who have been abused, neglected, or abandoned to obtain lawful permanent residency in the United States. Prior to petitioning the relevant federal agency for special immigrant juvenile status, an immigrant juvenile must obtain an order from a state juvenile court making findings that the juvenile satisfies certain criteria. Among those findings is a determination that reunification with "1 or both" of the juvenile's parents "is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis found under State law" (8 USC § 1101[a][27][J][i]). In an opinion by Justice Roman the Appellate Court held that a juvenile may satisfy this statutory reunification requirement when the juvenile court determines that reunification is not viable with just 1, as opposed to both, of the juvenile's parents. It concluded that the "1 or both" language requires only a finding that reunification is not viable with 1 parent.

On or about December 17, 2009, Suzy's Uncle Francisco, who resided in Westchester County, filed a petition seeking his appointment as his niece, Susy's guardian. On or about December 23, 2009, Susy moved for the issuance of an order making the requisite declaration and specific findings that would allow her to apply to the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status pursuant to 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J). In support of the motion, Susy alleged that she was under 21 years of age, unmarried, and dependent upon the Family Court in that the court had accepted jurisdiction over the matter of her guardianship, and her parents had effectively relinquished control over her. Additionally, Susy maintained that reunification with one or both of her parents was not viable due to neglect and abandonment. Susy alleged that her father had abandoned her and had not provided any financial support or parental guidance. Susy asserted that her mother had neglected her by failing to provide her with adequate food, clothing, shelter, and education in Honduras, and by allowing her to travel unaccompanied to the United States. She alleged that her mother had abandoned her by failing to provide her with any substantial financial assistance or provisions since she arrived in the United States. She submitted an affidavit from her mother. In her affidavit, the mother averred that Susy's father, Israel, "never was responsible-he drank, used drugs, and was violent towards [the mother], even breaking [her] nose once. The mother, who now lived in Westchester, stated that when she lived in Honduras, she had relied on her sister Estella to take care of her children while she worked. She was aware that Estella had hit Susy, and that Estella would deprive the child of meals as a punishment. The mother indicated that she "continued to have Estella take care of [Susy] because [she] had no other choice." The mother acknowledged having left her children in the care of Estella when she left Honduras and immigrated to the United States in 2004. The mother stated that after she left Honduras, "Susy related on several occasions that Estella beat her frequently and permitted her daughters to hit her as well. The mother noted that her brother-in-law, Francisco, agreed to pick up the children in Texas and bring them back to live with him and his family. The mother asserted that she currently lived with her youngest daughter in a small apartment in the same town as Francisco, and that she did not have the resources to support Susy or Jason, her brother. She indicated that the children were "very happy" living with Francisco and his family, and that she wanted them "to stay with their Aunt and Uncle," noting that "it [was] much better for them than to be with [her]."

Although the mother had initially supported Francisco's application for guardianship of Susy, in May 2011, the mother filed a petition for custody of Susy. The mother indicated that she resided in Westchester County, and that it would be in Susy's best interests to have custody awarded to her because the father was not involved in the child's life, and the child "want[ed] to live with [the] mother."

Family Court, granted the mother's petition for sole custody of Susy and, as a result, dismissed Francisco's petition for guardianship of the child. In addition, the court denied Susy's motion for a special findings order, which had been supported by the mother . Counsel for the mother argued that because Susy had been neglected by her father, she was eligible for special findings under "the new law" even though the mother obtained custody. The court rejected that argument. Family Court issued an order granting the mother's petition for custody, denying Susy's motion for a special findings order, and reciting that Francisco withdrew his guardianship petition.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in denying Susy's motion for an order of special findings on the basis that custody was awarded to the mother. It pointed out that under the SIJS provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act were enacted by Congress in 1990 (8 USC s 1101[a][27][J]; Pub L 101-649, 153, 104 U.S. Stat 4978), immigrant juveniles, or any person acting on their behalf, may petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for SIJS. To be eligible for SIJS, an immigrant juvenile must obtain an order from a state juvenile court making findings that the juvenile satisfies certain criteria. Once the state court makes an SIJS predicate order, a juvenile may apply to the USCIS for SIJS using an I-360 petition, and if the juvenile is granted SIJS, he or she may be considered for adjustment to lawful permanent resident status. Justice Roman observed that since the enactment of the statute in 1990, Congress amended the law in 1997 out of concern that juveniles entering the United States as visiting students were abusing the SIJS process, and in 2008, the requirements for SIJS were again amended. The 2008 amendments expanded eligibility to include those immigrant children who had been placed in the custody of an individual or entity appointed by a State or juvenile court. Congress also removed the requirement that the immigrant child had to be deemed eligible for long-term foster care due to abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and replaced it with a requirement that the juvenile court find that "reunification with [1] or both of the immigrant's parents is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment[,] or a similar basis found under State law" (Pub L 110-457, 122 U.S. Stat 5044, 5079). The amendments also modified the consent requirement by deleting the language requiring the Attorney General to "expressly consent[] to the dependency order," and replacing it with, "the Secretary of Homeland Security consents to the grant of special immigrant juvenile status" (Pub L 110-457, 122 U.S. Stat 5044, 5079). Thus, under the current law, a "special immigrant" is a resident alien who is under 21 years of age, unmarried, and dependent on a juvenile court located in the United States or "legally committed to, or placed under the custody of, an agency or department of a State, or an individual or entity appointed by a State or juvenile court located in the United States" (8 USC § 1101[a][27] [J][i]; see 8 CFR 204.11). Additionally, the court must find that "reunification with 1 or both of the immigrant's parents is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis found under State law," and "that it would not be in the alien's best interest to be returned to the alien's or parent's previous country of nationality or country of last habitual residence" (8 USC § 1101[a][27][J] [i], [ii]). By making these preliminary factual findings, the juvenile court is not rendering an immigration determination. Rather, "the final decision regarding [SIJS] rests with the federal government, and, as shown, the child must apply to that authority".

The Court found that Family Court erred in denying Susy's motion for the issuance of an order making a declaration and specific findings that would allow her to apply to the USCIS for SIJS. The record established that Susy was under 21 years of age and unmarried. Additionally, since the Family Court placed Susy in the custody of her mother, she had been "legally committed to, or placed under the custody of ... an individual ... appointed by a State or juvenile court located in the United States". With respect to the nonviability of reunification with one or both parents, the record revealed that Susy was abandoned by her father. Susy established that reunification with her father was not viable due to abandonment. The Family Court denied Susy's application for a special findings order on the ground that the viability of reunification with Susy's mother rendered Susy ineligible for SIJS.

The Court disagreed with the Family Court's interpretation of the reunification component of the statute. Under the plain language of the statute, to be eligible for SIJS, a court must find that "reunification with 1 or both of the immigrant's parents is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis found under State law" . It interpreted the "1 or both" language to provide SIJS eligibility where reunification with just one parent is not viable as a result of abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar State law basis. Even when reunification with one parent is viable, courts must determine the viability of reunification with the other parent. Contrary to the Family Court's determination, the fact that the mother was available as a custodial resource for Susy did not, by itself, preclude the issuance of special findings under the SIJS statute. The legislative history of the SIJS statute supported this interpretation of the reunification requirement.

Turning to the best interests component the record showed that the father, who apparently continued to live in Honduras, abandoned Susy. Susy's aunt, Estella, with whom she previously lived in Honduras, was neglectful and abusive toward her. The mother stated that she had left Susy. By contrast, the record demonstrated that in the United States, Susy was attending school, had made friends, and had family members to care for her, including her mother, as well as her uncle and aunt. Under these circumstances, the record demonstrated that it would not be in the best interests of the child to return to Honduras. Based on the foregoing, the Court found that the Family Court erred in denying Susy's motion for the issuance of an order making a declaration and specific findings that would allow her to apply to the USCIS for SIJS. The order was reversed and the motion was granted.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Although His Attorney Appeared Family Court's Finding of Default and Dismissal Was Proper in Light of Father's Willful Refusal to Appear and the Absence of a Reasonable Excuse for His Nonappearance

In Matter of Scott KK v Patricia LL, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5745869 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties, unmarried parents of a child (Febe, born in 2003), had multiple proceedings pending before Family Court. Petitioner (father), who was serving a prison term for a felony conviction, informed Family Court directly and through his attorney that he would not appear in court except for a trial. Based upon his refusal to be transported for a duly scheduled appearance in court regarding the pending petitions, Family Court dismissed the father's petitions. The court granted the pending application of respondent (mother), which alleged a family offense by the father, and, after the mother's testimony as to repeated violations by the father of temporary orders of protection, Family Court issued a five-year order of protection for the mother and her child from another relationship as well as a two-year order of protection for Febe. As to Febe, Family Court indicated that it was amenable to attempting to establish visitation for the father in the event that he petitioned for modification and acknowledged a willingness to adhere to court orders.

The father appealed. The Appellate Division rejected the father's contention that Family Court erred in finding him in default. While "[a] party who fails to appear generally will not be considered in default when the party's attorney is able to offer an explanation for the absence" (Matter of Scott v. Jenkins, 62 AD3d 1053, 1054 [2009]; see Matter of Freedman v. Horike, 107 AD3d 1332, 1333 [2013]; Matter of Hill v. Hillenbrand, 12 AD3d 980, 981 [2004], lv denied 4 NY3d 705 [2005]), the only explanation offered by the father's attorney, who did appear, was to report the father's refusal to appear at any proceeding before Family Court other than a trial on his petitions. The record reflects that the father attempted to dictate to Family Court how the proceedings should progress and when he would attend. Family Court's finding of default and dismissal was proper in light of the father's willful refusal to appear and the absence of a reasonable excuse for his nonappearance (see generally Matter of Ariane I. v. David I., 82 AD3d 1547, 1548 [2011], lv denied 17 NY3d 703 [2011]; compare Matter of Freedman v. Horike, supra).

The Appellate Division also found that the family court had subject matter jurisdiction. While the bulk of the allegations in the petition concerned the father's acts with the mother's child from a different relationship and there were no allegations indicating that such child and the father were "members of the same family or household" as that phrase is statutorily defined (Family Ct Act s 812[1][a]-[e]), the petition also included the additional-albeit somewhat conclusory-contention that the father had "threatened other people with a gun in front of [the mother's] children ", which would necessarily include Febe. While further development of the record may have clarified and perhaps even eroded this contention, it nonetheless provided Family Court a sufficient basis to exercise its jurisdiction to issue a temporary protective order, and the father's willful failure to appear in court has left the contention unchallenged.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order - Timeliness - Liberal Approach in Third Department

In Matter of Ryan v Ryan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5640803 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) both parties filed objections to the Support Magistrate's modification order. Family Court dismissed the mother's objections as untimely, and stated that her objections were also without merit. The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in dismissing the mother's objections as untimely. Either party may file specific objections to an order of a support magistrate within 30 days of personal service of the order or, if the party did not receive the order in court or by personal service, within 35 days after the order was mailed (see Family Ct Act § 439[e]). Strict adherence to this deadline is not required; Family Court has discretion to overlook a minor failure to comply with the statutory requirements regarding filing objections and address the merits. The Support Magistrate's order was apparently mailed on August 5, 2011, making Friday, September 9, 2011 the last day to timely file objections. The mother's objections were dated September 8, 2011. In reply papers, the mother explained that she intended to file the objections on September 8 or 9, 2011, but Family Court was closed on those days due to flooding conditions and a state of emergency. She was able to locate an open post office and mailed her objections on September 9. While receipt by the court, rather than the act of mailing, constitutes filing of objections, as September 9 was a Friday, the first day that the court was open following the filing deadline was Monday, September 12, 2011. Family Court's order inconsistent as to whether the objections were filed with the court on September 12 or 13, 2011. If the objections were received on September 12, they were timely filed because the official closing of the court extended the statutory filing deadline (Judiciary Law § 282-a). If the objections were received on September 13, it found that Family Court abused its discretion by dismissing the mother's objections as untimely, considering that the court was closed on the statutory deadline and the objections were filed only one day following the extended deadline, just after the court reopened from its closure due to the extraordinary weather conditions. Based on the mother's assertion that she could not obtain a sample affidavit of service or the services of a notary due to the flooding and court closure, the mother's failure to provide an affidavit of service was also excused and her objections should have been accepted and addressed on the merits.

The Appellate Division also held that on the merits, the Support Magistrate correctly determined the presumptive amount of child support by using the method provided in its previous decision (84 AD3d at 1516). However, he erred when he stated that he was relying on factor 10, the catch-all provision for "[a]ny other factors the court determines are relevant in each case" (Family Ct Act § 413[1][f][10]). His stated reason for deviating from the presumptive amount was that the father has physical custody of the older child all of the time and of the younger child every other week, so the Support Magistrate adjusted the amount such that the father would not pay support when both children were with him. The Appellate Division held that this was merely another way of applying the proportional offset method, which would reduce a parent's child support obligation based upon the amount of time that he or she actually spends with the child (see Bast v. Rossoff, 91 N.Y.2d at 730). It noted that the Court of Appeals has rejected this method as impractical, unworkable and contrary to the statute and legislative history (see id. at 730-732). It pointed out that it explained in its prior decision in this case that this method was inappropriate (84 AD3d at 1517). The costs of providing suitable housing, clothing and food for the children during custodial periods do not qualify as extraordinary expenses so as to justify a deviation from the presumptive amount (Family Ct Act §413[1][f][9]). While there may be circumstances in which a deviation is warranted in situations involving shared parenting time, the Support Magistrate's articulated reason did not provide an adequate basis for such deviation here, and its independent review of the record in the exercise of its factual review power revealed a lack of sufficient evidence to support any of the factors for deviation. Accordingly, the mother was entitled to an award of child support equal to the presumptive amount, namely $862 per month, less her $21 monthly share of health insurance, for a total of $841 per month.

Child Custody - Modification - Relocation - Denial of Petition for Relocation To Mississippi Reversed By Appellate Division

In Kevin McK. v. Elizabeth A.E.--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5431590 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the parties never married, but were intimately involved for 10 years, during which time their son, Lucas, was born, on January 6, 2003. The father, Kevin McK., moved into the mother's apartment a few months prior to the child's birth, and moved out in November 2007, when the child was about 4 ½ years old. The mother filed a custody petition in December 2007, and was awarded temporary custody on January 8, 2008; the father filed a custody petition shortly thereafter. Later that year, the mother filed a second petition, seeking to modify the temporary custody order to permit her to relocate with the child to Oxford, Mississippi. The Family Court denied the petition. The Appellate Division reversed and granted the petition.

The testimony revealed that the mother lost her job in March 2007 and that from April 2007 until November 2007, and again in 2009 and 2010, the mother collected $300 per week in unemployment benefits, but she was not eligible for those benefits since June 2010. In addition, between June 2010 and June 2011, when the mother was entitled to $732 per month in child support from the father, payments were almost always late, and several payments were missed entirely between November 2010 and February or March 2011. Support arrears in excess of $6,000 had accrued by June 2011, which the father paid off after a one year delay, only after the mother filed a violation petition. He had not made any further support payments since then. Due to the missed child support payments and increases in her rent since 2007, the mother testified that she was barely able to make ends meet, so that to cover her expenses, she had borrowed $10,000 from a friend, as well as $1,800 from the Author's League Fund, and some smaller amounts from her parents, as well as drawing down on her savings, which decreased from approximately $25,000 to $10,000. Essentially, she supported herself and the parties' child on a combination of her meager earnings, irregular child support payments, unemployment benefits, food stamps, loans from friends and family, and by depleting her savings. The mother's tax returns were admitted into evidence. According to the returns, in 2007, she earned approximately $31,486; in 2008, approximately $8,074; in 2009, approximately $16,000; and in 2010, approximately $13,000.

At trial the mother established that two stables in Oxford, Mississippi, offered her year-round employment as a horse trainer and riding instructor. She estimated that, were she to relocate to Mississippi, her expenses would be reduced by approximately 75%, and the combined income from those jobs would exceed $2,000 per month. Testimony from her own mother, the child's grandmother, who lived in Oxford, Mississippi, reflected that if the mother and child were permitted to relocate, the child would have the benefit of a close relationship with his grandparents and cousins as well as other children his age with whom he developed friendships during previous summers spent in Mississippi. The court-appointed forensic psychologist, testified that if the child were to move to Mississippi due to financial circumstances, he would be able to make the necessary adjustment and, provided that ample contact was permitted between the child and the father, such a move would not be damaging to the child. He did not believe that the mother was moving to Mississippi to interfere with the child's relationship with the father. To the contrary, she seemed to appreciate that the child had a positive relationship with the father. He further noted that he found no evidence that the mother was "badmouthing" the father or attempting to alienate him from the child.

The father's own testimony demonstrated that the mother would not be able to rely on him for steady and current payments of support. Although he claimed to have filed income tax returns, he could not recall whether he had filed tax returns in the years 2006, 2007 and 2008, and testified that he had "no idea" what income he had reported, and that he "would not be able even to begin" to put together a list of his "various sources of income" that "varie[d] week to week." He refused to estimate his average monthly expenses. He asserted that he paid his rent by bartering personal services. He did not provide a lease for the apartment in which he was living in 2010, but testified that he was responsible for rent of $3,200 per month, although on cross-examination it was revealed that he had reported to the Support Magistrate that his rent was $1,000 per month. Despite these clear indications of the father's inability or unwillingness to regularly make the required child support payments, the attorney for the child took the position that the mother's relocation petition should be denied. He disbelieved her assertion that her financial situation made the relocation necessary; in his view, she failed to establish that she could not find remunerative employment in New York, and failed to sufficiently substantiate her claims regarding available employment for her in Mississippi. Moreover, he argued that the evidence failed to establish that the mother was in dire need and distress, as she had successfully paid for her and the child's expenses up to that point, and continued to have a balance of funds in her bank account.

The Family Court denied the mother's petition for relocation on the ground that she had failed to prove by preponderance of the evidence that her financial circumstances require that she be permitted to move to Mississippi—a move that, according to the court, and the father, would disrupt the very close and steady relationship between the father and child. The court expressed doubts about the mother's credibility, both in regard to her finances and her assertions that she would attempt to work with the father regarding additional visitation if the child moved to Mississippi. Nor was the court convinced that the mother's financial situation was as dire as she claimed, citing her continued ability to pay her rent, maintain $10,000 in savings, keep a zero balance on her credit card, and provide for the child; it found that she had not been forthright in regards to her finances, and asserted the belief that the mother had other jobs or income that was not documented.

The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Saxe, found that the Family Court's determination lacked a sound and substantial basis in the record, and that the mother established by more than a preponderance of the evidence that relocation was in the best interests of the child, in that it would enhance the child's life both economically and emotionally. The primary factors on which the court focused were the mother's reasons and need for the move, whether the child's life would be enhanced by the move, the impact of the move on the child's relationship with the father and the difficulty of maintaining the father's central role in the child's life. Matter of Tropea v. Tropea, 87 N.Y.2d 727, 736, 740-741 [1996]. The mother's petition for relocation was primarily based on the claim that the child's life would be improved by the move, because she had been unable to support herself and the child beyond the subsistence level since she lost her job in 2007. The Court found that she established the truth of that claim with a showing well beyond a preponderance of the evidence. While a trial court's assessment of the evidence is entitled to deference, there was no sound or substantial basis in the record here for the Family Court's assessment of the mother's truthfulness regarding her earnings and her earning ability. The supposition that the mother could find, or actually did find, other remunerative employment, was unsupported, and contradicted by her receipt of various public assistance benefits such as Medicaid and food stamps. In sharp contrast to the father's evasive testimony and evidence with regard to his finances, the mother made a forthright showing of exactly how she had supported herself and the child.

Although the mother here was not destitute the court found that the relocation application was prompted by a legitimate, pressing need for a secure economic situation. The court observed that “ proof of economic necessity does not require the parent to wait until she has used up every last dollar of her savings before taking steps to ensure that she will be able to care for the child's future economic needs.” Where the proposed move will provide economic, emotional and educational benefits for the child, relocation may be appropriate even where it will disrupt the frequency of visits between the child and the noncustodial parent (Aziz v. Aziz, 8 AD3d 596, 597 [2d Dept 2004]. Here, the proposed move to Mississippi would give the mother and child an extensive network of family support, and the child had strong emotional bonds with his maternal grandparents, whom he had visited in previous summers. The requested relocation would provide the benefits of living near, and having the financial and emotional support of, the child's maternal extended family, enabling the child to enjoy a comfortable life free of economic distress, among a loving and supportive extended family. That powerful consideration would be less weighty if the father were providing consistent, steady, and sufficient support to ensure the child's lifestyle at a level above subsistence; however, nothing in the record provided such assurance.

Although the Family Court expressed serious concerns that the mother might interfere with the father's ability to maintain a meaningful relationship with the child, and believed the mother's affect and demeanor to support those concerns, nothing in the record established any actual interference by the mother. There was no history of the mother preventing or overtly interfering with father-child visits, or subtly interfering with the father-child relationship. While the impact of the move on the quantity and quality of the child's future contact with the father is a central concern, it is not "the" central concern. The grant of relocation was issued with the proviso that the father shall be allowed broad access to the child in Mississippi as well as a liberal visitation schedule for visits to New York, the specifics to be addressed by the Family Court on remand.

The court took judicial notice of certain court orders rendered subsequent to the preparation of the record on the appeal, since the contents of the orders were undisputed (see Matter of Khatibi v. Weill, 8 AD3d 485, 485 [2d Dept 2004]). While not dispositive, those documents tended to indicate that the father would not likely be contributing financially to the care of the child, at least in the near future, which added support to the conclusion that the relocation was in the child's best interests.

Neglect - Finding of Neglect Reversed Where No Substantial Probability that Child At Risk

In Matter of Destiny --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5477233 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), the Appellate Division reversed an order which, after a hearing, found that respondent mother neglected the child, and dismissed the Petition.

The child was born to a mother who was unaware that she was pregnant until the moment she gave birth to a healthy baby. The mother then went to the hospital to seek treatment for the newborn child, and made statements that lead to a police investigation. The police determined that same day that there was no evidence warranting any further police action. While the mother's judgment was impaired during the time immediately following the unexpected birth, she provided a reasonable explanation based on her medical history and weight for not realizing she was pregnant, and immediately sought appropriate medical treatment for the newborn following delivery. These facts, standing alone, were insufficient to support a finding that if the child were released to the mother, there would be a substantial probability of neglect' that places the child at risk.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Award - Effect of Prenuptial Agreement - Imputed Income -

In Lennox v. Weberman, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4711539 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.), Supreme Court granted defendant's motion for pendente lite relief to the extent of awarding her tax-free maintenance in the amount of $38,000 per month, directing plaintiff to pay, inter alia, defendant's unreimbursed medical expenses up to $2,000 per month, interim counsel fees of $50,000, and expert fees of $35,000, and held plaintiff's cross motion for summary judgment and for counsel fees in abeyance,

The Appellate Division modified, on the facts, to provide that one half of the aforesaid pendente lite relief shall be treated as an advance on the 50 percent of the parties' Joint Funds (as defined in the parties' prenuptial agreement) to which defendant was entitled pursuant to the prenuptial agreement, and otherwise affirmed. It found that the the court properly applied the formula set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a)(c)(2)(a) (see Khaira v. Khaira, 93 AD3d 194 [1st Dept 2012]) in calculating defendant's temporary spousal maintenance award. Specifically, the court listed all 19 of the enumerated factors, explained how 7 of them supported an upward deviation to $38,000 per month from the $12,500 a month in guideline support, and found that $38,000 per month was not "unjust or inappropriate." It also found that the court properly imputed an annual income to plaintiff of $2.29 million when it computed maintenance, since this was his income on the most recent tax return. A court need not rely upon the party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated earning potential. The court properly took into account plaintiff's income from his investments, voluntarily deferred compensation, and substantial distributions (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][b][4]; 240[1-b][b][5][i], [iv]), which was $50.5 million the previous year.

The Appellate Division rejected plaintiff's argument that defendant waived temporary maintenance in the parties' prenuptial agreement. Notwithstanding that defendant waived any claim to a final award of alimony or maintenance in the prenuptial agreement, the court was entitled, in its discretion, to award pendente lite relief in the absence of an express agreement to exclude an award of temporary maintenance (see Tregellas v. Tregellas, 169 A.D.2d 553 [1st Dept 1991]; see also Vinik v. Lee, 96 AD3d 522 [1st Dept 2012]). Under the circumstances of this case, however, the Court deemed it appropriate to charge one half of the interim awards against the one-half share of the marital property to which defendant was entitled under the prenuptial agreement. In so doing, it found it significant that the parties provided in the agreement that each waived any right to the separate property of the other, that living expenses were to be paid out of the marital property, and that the marital property would be equally divided in the event of divorce. It also found it significant that, here, the equal division of the marital property to which the parties agreed would leave each of them with substantial wealth.

The Appellate Division held that the court's award of interim counsel fees of $50,000 and expert fees of $35,000 was warranted under the circumstances where the parties' assets appear to be anywhere from $77 million to $90 million. While there were some funds in defendant's possession, plaintiff was in a far better financial position than defendant (Prichep v. Prichep, 52 AD3d 61, 66 [2d Dept 2008]), and defendant should not have to deplete her assets in order to have legal representation comparable to that of plaintiff (Wolf v. Wolf, 160 A.D.2d 555, 556 [1st Dept 1990]).

Motion Practice - Relief Not Too Unlike Relief Sought May Be Granted Pursuant to a General Prayer

In Carter v. Johnson, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5450409 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division pointed out that a court "may grant relief, pursuant to a general prayer contained in the notice of motion or order to show cause, other than that specifically asked for, to such extent as is warranted by the facts plainly appearing [in] the papers on both sides," it may do so only "if the relief granted is not too dramatically unlike the relief sought, and if the proof offered supports it and the court is satisfied that no one has been prejudiced by the formal omission to demand it specifically" (Nehmadi v. Davis, 95 A.D.3d 1181, 1184, 945 N.Y.S.2d 122 [internal quotation marks omitted]; see Carter v. Johnson, 84 A.D.3d at 1142, 923 N.Y.S.2d 668; HCE Assoc. v. 3000 Watermill Lane Realty Corp., 173 A.D.2d 774, 570 N.Y.S.2d 642).

Maintenance Pendente Lite - Award Reversed for Failure of Court to Set Forth Factors it Considered and the Reasons for its Decision. (Domestic Relations Law 236 [B][5-a][e][2][

In Davydova v. Sasonov, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5340376 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) sets forth formulas for the courts to apply to the parties' reported income in order to determine the presumptively correct amount of temporary maintenance. In any decision made pursuant to [Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a)], the court shall set forth the factors it considered and the reasons for its decision. (Domestic Relations Law s 236 [B][5-a][c][2][b]; see Khaira v. Khaira, 93 A.D.3d 194, 201, 938 N.Y.S.2d 513). A court may deviate from the presumptive award if that presumptive award is 'unjust or inappropriate (Goncalves v. Goncalves, 105 A.D.3d at 902, 963 N.Y.S.2d 686). Under such circumstances the court must "set forth, in a written order, the amount of the unadjusted presumptive award of temporary maintenance, the factors it considered, and the reasons that the court adjusted the presumptive award of temporary maintenance" (Domestic Relations Law §236[B][5-a][e][2]). When a court is unable to perform the calculation established by Domestic Relations Law §236(B)(5-a)(c) as a result of being "presented with insufficient evidence to determine gross income, the court shall order the temporary maintenance award based upon the needs of the payee or the standard of living of the parties prior to commencement of the divorce action, whichever is greater" (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][g]). Supreme Court failed to comply with the requirements of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) when it determined the amount of temporary maintenance to be awarded to the wife (Khaira v. Khaira, 93 A.D.3d at 201, 938 N.Y.S.2d 513; see also Woodford v. Woodford, 100 A.D.3d at 876-877, 955 N.Y.S.2d 355; cf. Goncalves v. Goncalves, 105 A.D.3d at 902, 963 N.Y.S.2d 686). Accordingly, the Appellate Division remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the plaintiff's pendente lite maintenance award in accordance with Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a).

Supreme Court's award of temporary child support was also vacated. The Child Support Standards Act (CSSA) provides the formulas to be applied to the parties' income and the factors to be considered in determining a final award of child support (see Domestic Relations Law s 240[1-b]). However, under some circumstances, particularly where sufficient economic data is available, an award of temporary child support that deviates from the level that would result if the provisions of the CSSA were applied may constitute an improvident exercise of discretion, absent the existence of an adequate reason for the deviation. Here, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in fixing the amount of pendente lite child support to be paid by the defendant. The court was presented with sufficient evidence concerning the parties' respective incomes and assets, yet it did not provide any reason why it declined to perform the calculations or consider the factors enumerated in the CSSA, and it ultimately failed to provide any explanation as to how it determined the amount of the award. Accordingly, it remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the plaintiff's pendente lite child support award.

Maintenance Pendente Lite - Award - Appeal - Appellate Division Reduced Award Where Presumptive Award of Temporary Maintenance Exceeded Plaintiff's Alleged Monthly Expenses

In Chusid v. Silvera, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5450413 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court directed the husband to pay the plaintiff temporary maintenance of $11,735 per month commencing March 9, 2011. The Appellate Division reduced the award to $9,157.45 per month commencing March 9, 2011.

The Court observed that Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a) sets forth the substantive and procedural requirements for an award of temporary maintenance, addressing both the amount and the duration of the temporary award (see Goncalves v. Goncalves, 105 AD3d 901, 902; Woodford v. Woodford, 100 AD3d 875, 876-877; Khaira v. Khaira, 93 AD3d 194, 197-198). A court may deviate from the presumptive award of temporary maintenance if that presumptive award is "unjust or inappropriate". In determining whether to deviate, the court must consider a broad range of factors (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][e][1][a]-[q]). Here, Supreme Court applied the statutory formulas in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5-a), determined that the "presumptive award" (Domestic Relations Law § 236[B][5-a][b][8]) of temporary maintenance to be paid to the plaintiff was $11,735 per month, and directed the defendant to pay the plaintiff that sum, per month, commencing March 9, 2011.

The Court noted that an appellate court should rarely modify a pendente lite award, and then "only under exigent circumstances, such as where a party is unable to meet his or her financial obligations, or justice otherwise requires. Here, the presumptive award of temporary maintenance, plus the plaintiff's monthly income, exceeded the plaintiff's alleged monthly expenses by $2,577.55. As the presumptive award of temporary maintenance exceeded the plaintiff's alleged monthly expenses justice required a reduction of the award, and it reduced the award of temporary maintenance to the extent indicated.

Child Care - Modification - Child Care Properly Terminated Where No Child Care Expense

In Zengling Shi v. Shenglin Lu, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5451017 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division held that as the mother did not actually incur child care expenses for the child, who was 17 years old at the time of the hearing, the father's obligation to pay child care expenses was properly terminated (Family Ct Act §413[1][c][4]; McBride v. McBride, 238 A.D.2d 320).

Counsel Fees - Award - Award Reversed Where Significant Portion of the Protracted Litigation Attributable to Plaintiff

In Tenore v Tenore, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5451978 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in May 2001, and there were no children of the marriage. In June 2005, the plaintiff commenced this action for a divorce, and asserted a tort cause of action against the defendant, alleging that he had sexually assaulted her. The parties executed a written settlement agreement dated March 30, 2010; they also entered into a stipulation discontinuing the plaintiff's tort cause of action. After the settlement, the plaintiff moved for an award of an attorney's fee. After a hearing Supreme Court awarded her an attorney's fee of $60,000, "less any and all previously satisfied awards of counsel fees paid to date or any payments made thereon." Thereafter, in an order dated December 15, 2011, the court granted plaintiff's motion for a determination that she was entitled to a qualified domestic relations order assigning $14,673.20 of the defendant's retirement account to her, and for an award of an attorney's fee incurred in prosecuting the QDRO motion to the extent of awarding the plaintiff $2,250. In an order dated March 22, 2012, the court amended the order dated October 11, 2011, by adding the following language: "The credit herein allowed to defendant against the counsel fee award to plaintiff shall not include counsel fee payments made by plaintiff to plaintiff's counsel."

Considering all of the relevant factors, including the fact that the Supreme Court expressly found that a significant portion of the protracted litigation in this case was attributable to the plaintiff, the Appellate Division found that the court improvidently exercised its discretion in granting the plaintiff's motion for an award of an attorney's fee. The court determined that the plaintiff had unnecessarily prolonged the litigation by maintaining a "tenuous" tort claim in order to effectuate a more favorable settlement in the matrimonial case. As noted by the court, counsel for the plaintiff testified at the counsel fee hearing that the tort claim was "strictly window dressing." The court also found that the defendant was prompted to make applications to modify the pendente lite award when the plaintiff's deposition testimony showed that the net worth statement she submitted in support of her application for pendente lite relief contained "nonexistent or highly exaggerated expenses." Accordingly, the court should have denied the plaintiff's application for an attorney's fee. The Appellate Division reversed the orders dated October 11, 2011, and March 22, 2012.

However, the Supreme Court properly granted plaintiff's motion for a determination that she was entitled to a QDRO assigning $14,673.20 of the defendant's retirement account to her. Where a party fails to trace sources of money claimed to be separate property, a court may treat it as marital property. The defendant failed to meet his burden of demonstrating that certain of the funds used to calculate the QDRO amount were pre-marital. Therefore, the court properly accepted the plaintiff's calculations in connection with the QDRO. Lastly, the court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the plaintiff an attorney's fee in the sum of $2,250 incurred in prosecuting the QDRO motion.

Maintenance - Award - Not Error to Fail to Direct in Judgment Maintenance Shall Cease If Plaintiff Cohabits with Another Man.

In Zufall v Zufall, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5394591 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) during the marriage, plaintiff was primarily a homemaker, raising the parties' children while defendant worked as a correction officer. Shortly before the action was commenced, defendant retired at the age of 50 after 25 years of service with the State of New York, leaving a job that paid him in excess of $90,000 annually. He now received pension benefits of $2,798 per month. Although able-bodied, defendant did not work. Plaintiff, on the other hand, had been determined by the Social Security Administration to be 50% disabled, and she received partial Social Security disability benefits of $622 per month plus workers' compensation benefits of $400 per month. She also worked 20 hours per week as a bartender, earning $5 per hour plus tips. Pursuant to the parties' prenuptial agreement the court did not award plaintiff any interest in defendant's pension or in the marital residence, which defendant obtained prior to the marriage, notwithstanding the fact that defendant paid the mortgage on that property during the marriage with marital funds.

The Appellate Division held that the court did not abuse its discretion in awarding weekly maintenance to plaintiff in the amount of $150 but agreed with defendant that the court's award was excessive insofar as the court ordered defendant to pay maintenance until plaintiff turned 62, i.e., for approximately 18 years. It concluded that a term of seven years from the date of commencement of the action "should afford the plaintiff a sufficient opportunity to become self-supporting". It rejected defendant's related contention that the court erred in failing to order that maintenance shall cease if plaintiff cohabits with another man. Pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 248, defendant may move to terminate maintenance on the ground that plaintiff is "habitually living with another man and holding herself out as his wife," and defendant cited no authority for the proposition that the court must include such a provision in the judgment of divorce. The Court observed that where, as here, there is no provision for an adjustment of child support upon the termination of maintenance, there is no basis for the court to deduct maintenance from [the] defendant's income in determining the amount of child support.

Adoption - Visitation by Biological Parent - upon Entry of Adoption Order, Mother's Parental Rights Ceased, and She Lacked Standing to Prosecute a Visitation Petition

In Matter of Benzin v. Kutyl,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5397315 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order dismissing the mother's petition to modify her visitation rights as set forth in a prior order. While this proceeding was pending, an order was entered in Surrogate's Court granting a petition filed by respondent father and his wife seeking adoption of the subject child by the father's wife. Domestic Relations Law §117(1)(a) provides that "[a]fter the making of an order of adoption the birth parents of the adoptive child shall be relieved of all parental duties toward and of all responsibilities for and shall have no rights over such adoptive child " except under certain limited circumstances, none of which applies here. Thus, upon entry of the adoption order, the mother's "parental rights ceased, and [s]he lacked standing to prosecute a ... visitation petition regarding the subject child" (Matter of Kevin W. v. Monique T., 38 AD3d 672). Although it appeared that the father and his wife failed to provide notice of the adoption proceeding to the mother as required by Domestic Relations Law §111(3)(a), Family Court lacked authority to vacate or ignore the adoption order on that or any other ground, inasmuch as that court could "not arrogate to [itself] powers of appellate review" with respect to the adoption order (Dain & Dill v. Betterton, 39 A.D.2d 939, 939). If the mother seeks relief from the adoption order, she must seek such relief in "[t]he court which rendered [that] ... order" (CPLR 5015 [a]; see generally Nina M. v Otsego County Social Servs. Dept., 201 A.D.2d 788, 790,lv denied 83 N.Y.2d 755).

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Unconscionability - Agreement Set Aside Which gave defendant almost all of the marital property, including his pension and retirement assets

In Dawes v. Dawes--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5496012 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the parties entered into a separation agreement on September 18, 2007 and, on December 19, 2011, plaintiff wife moved to rescind it. Following a hearing, Supreme Court vacated the agreement on the grounds that plaintiff signed it under duress and it was the product of defendant husband's overreaching.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It observed that a separation agreement may be vacated if it is manifestly unfair to one party because of the other's overreaching or where its terms are unconscionable. (Tchorzewski, 278 A.D.2d at 870). It agreed with defendant that plaintiff did not sign the agreement under duress. Plaintiff's allegations that defendant threatened to evict her from the marital residence if she did not sign the agreement and that he threw the agreement at her were not substantiated by proof sufficient to justify setting it aside. Even accepting plaintiff's allegation that defendant persistently urged her to sign the agreement, such conduct does not constitute duress, particularly inasmuch as plaintiff signed the agreement after defendant revised it in accordance with her suggested changes. However, the court properly determined that the agreement was " 'one such as no [person] in his [or her] senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair [person] would accept on the other' " (Colello v. Colello, 9 AD3d 855, 859, quoting Christian, 42 N.Y.2d at 71;see Skotnicki, 237 A.D.2d at 975). The agreement gave defendant almost all of the marital property, including his pension and retirement assets. The agreement further provided that plaintiff could not seek maintenance and, most troubling under the circumstances of this case, that plaintiff waived her right to seek child support. It found that plaintiff did not ratify the agreement by complying with its provisions and failing to object to it for more than four years. During those four years, plaintiff did not receive any of the limited benefits accorded to her under the agreement. The fact that defendant allowed plaintiff to live in the marital residence during that time was no benefit to plaintiff inasmuch as the marital residence constituted marital property and she had an equal right to live there.

Maintenance - Award - Denied - Maintenance Award to Husband Reversed Where Award Made in Absence of Evidence of Parties' Standard of Living During the Marriage, and in Absence of Evidence of Need.

In Lucere v Lucere, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2013 WL 4823668 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that the Supreme Court's award of maintenance to the plaintiff husband was an improvident exercise of its discretion since the award was made in the absence of any evidence of the parties' standard of living during the marriage, and in the absence of evidence that the plaintiff, who was otherwise self-supporting, needed maintenance to sustain his pre-divorce standard of living. Additionally, the defendant's reasonable needs precluded an award of maintenance to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff should not have been awarded maintenance. It also held that Supreme Court erred in failing to award the defendant a 50% share of the net rental proceeds that the plaintiff collected from condominiums owned jointly by the parties in Arizona and Florida. It agreed with the plaintiff that the Supreme Court should have directed that his obligation to provide life insurance to secure his obligations to the parties' children shall terminate upon the emancipation of the parties' youngest child (Sotnik v. Zavilyansky, 101 A.D.3d 1102, 1104; Levitt v. Levitt, 97 A.D.3d 543, 545).

Child Custody - Visitation - Grandparent Visitation - Domestic Relations Law §72 - Grandparents Established Extraordinary Circumstances but Denied Visitation

In Matter of Noonan v Noonan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4824275 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the petitioners, the maternal grandparents of the children, satisfied their burden of demonstrating the existence of "extraordinary circumstances," necessitating a determination as to the best interests of the children (Matter of Bennett v. Jeffreys, 40 N.Y.2d at 548). However, considering the totality of the circumstances it found that the Family Court's determination awarding sole custody of the child James, and joint custody of the child Vanessa with Vanessa's father, Vincent Tardo, to the maternal grandparents was not supported by a sound and substantial basis in the record. The mother's testimony indicated that, at the time of the hearing, she had abstained from drug use for more than 2 1/2 years. The mother's testimony also indicated that there were no recent incidents of domestic violence between her and Tardo. Family Court noted in its order that the mother and Tardo were now "clean and sober," three years having passed between their last instances of drug use and the date of the order, and that "there have been no reports of aggression." The Family Court placed undue emphasis on the forensic evaluation, which was completed almost two years prior to the court's determination. Additionally, while the Family Court did acknowledge the nature of James's wishes, it concluded that the court failed to adequately consider those preferences. It reversed the order, denied the maternal grandparents' petitions, granted the mother's application for sole custody of Vanessa to the extent of awarding her joint custody of Vanessa with Tardo, and award the mother sole custody of James.

Child Custody - UCCJEA - Domestic Relations Law § 76-a[1][a] - Domestic Relations Law §76-f [1] - Inconvenient Forum - Stipulation for Jurisdiction Enforced

In People ex rel. Libin v. Berkovitch--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4824422 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the father and his late wife were living in Israel when their daughter was born in February 2008. The father entered into a temporary guardianship agreement with his late wife's parents which awarded them temporary custody of the child, and provided that the child would live with the maternal grandparents in New York. The father commenced a habeas corpus proceeding in the Supreme Court seeking sole custody of the child, and requesting the court to nullify the temporary custody arrangement. On October 2, 2008, the parties entered into a stipulation, which provided that the father would immediately have full custody of the child, and the maternal grandparents would have monthly visitation over a four-day weekend, plus one full week in summer. The stipulation also included a clause that provided that no inference would be drawn to "create[] any form of radius clause" so as to limit the distance between the father's residence and that of the maternal grandparents, and recited that the Supreme Court "shall retain exclusive jurisdiction over this matter for the purpose of enforcing, modifying or interpreting the terms of this agreement."

Visitation with the maternal grandparents proceeded for more than three years, during which time the child lived with the father's parents on Long Island, where the father appeared to have intermittently resided. When the maternal grandparents contacted the paternal grandparents to arrange for their weekend visit in July 2011, they learned that the father had taken the child to Israel, where the father was getting married. In August 2011, the maternal grandparents moved to adjudge the father in contempt of the stipulation, which also required the parties to endeavor to be in "direct verbal contact" regarding the child and compliance with the stipulation. In his response the father asserted that he had full custody of the child, and that the child was living with him and his new wife in Jerusalem. The father cross-moved to vacate or modify the stipulation so as to substitute a different schedule for the maternal grandparents' visitation with the child, based on the child's residence in Israel, and have the Supreme Court relinquish exclusive, continuing jurisdiction over the modified visitation schedule in favor of the Israeli courts. The Supreme Court retained exclusive jurisdiction, and essentially adopted the visitation schedule proposed by the attorney for the child.

The Appellate Division affirmed. It pointed out that pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act a court in this state that makes an initial custody determination retains exclusive, continuing jurisdiction over such determination until a court of this state finds that jurisdiction should terminate because, inter alia, the child does not have a significant connection with New York, and substantial evidence is no longer available in this state concerning the child's care, protection, training, and personal relationships. (Domestic Relations Law § 76-a[1][a]). In entering into the stipulation, the father expressly agreed that New York courts were to exercise exclusive, continuing jurisdiction over the maternal grandparents' visitation with the child, despite the fact that the Supreme Court had full knowledge that he lived in Israel and would continue to reside in Israel. The no radius clause that was included in the stipulation also reflected that, at the time when the father agreed to the terms of the stipulation, he anticipated that he would not always reside in New York, and that he might move away from New York at some time in the future. During the more than three years in which the paternal grandparents and the maternal grandparents acted as the child's primary caregivers, the father remained in Israel without objecting to the jurisdiction of the courts of this State on the ground that they were "inconvenient." Accordingly, the Supreme Court properly concluded that it retained exclusive, continuing jurisdiction over the stipulation, as modified to reflect the child's new residence in Israel.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Award - Effect of Prenuptial Agreement - Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Counsel Fees of $15,000 Awarded Despite Limitation in Agreement to $10,000

In Abramson v. Gavares--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5225047 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court directed the husband to child support in the sum of $4,250 per month, temporary maintenance in the sum of $1,000 per month, interim counsel fees in the sum of $15,000, 100% of the cost of a forensic evaluation of the parties' child, and 100% of the fee of an attorney for the parties' child. The parties were married in 2004 and had one child, who was born in 2006. The divorce action was commenced in 2009. On appeal, the plaintiff, relying largely on a prenuptial agreement entered into by the parties, challenged certain pendente lite relief awarded to the defendant by the Supreme Court.

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the parties' prenuptial agreement did not expressly preclude an award of temporary maintenance pendente lite, nor did the defendant expressly waive such an award under the terms of the agreement. However, pendente lite awards should be an accommodation between the reasonable needs of the moving spouse and the financial ability of the paying spouse. Here, it was undisputed that, pursuant to certain provisions of the prenuptial agreement, the plaintiff made a lump sum payment of $172,215 to the defendant and continued to make payments to her in the amount of $7,175 per month. On the record presented, including evidence of the defendant's expenses, the defendant's reasonable needs were more than adequately met. Accordingly, under the circumstances of this case, the Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing the plaintiff to pay temporary maintenance in the sum of $1,000 per month. However, the Supreme Court properly awarded the defendant interim counsel fees, notwithstanding a provision in the prenuptial agreement limiting, to the sum of $10,000, the plaintiff's obligation to pay such fees incurred by the defendant in any divorce action. Because of a strong public policy favoring the resolution of matrimonial matters on a level playing field, the determination of whether to enforce an agreement waiving the right of either spouse to seek an award of an attorney's fee is to be made "on a case-by-case basis after weighing the competing public policy interests in light of all relevant facts and circumstances both at the time the agreement was entered and at the time it is to be enforced" (Kessler v. Kessler, 33 A.D.3d at 48, 818 N.Y.S.2d 571). Here, the parties were involved in extensive litigation concerning child custody, a matter not expressly addressed in their prenuptial agreement. Moreover, the plaintiff's net worth was more than $13 million and his monthly gross income exceeded $45,000, while the defendant had no income other than what she was receiving pursuant to the agreement. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in awarding the defendant $15,000 in interim counsel fees which, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, properly included, as a component thereof, counsel fees that the defendant incurred defending against a petition for a writ of habeas corpus that the plaintiff filed during the pendency of this divorce action.

In light of the parties' combined parental income, which was greatly in excess of the $136,000 statutory cap , the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in directing the plaintiff to pay interim child support in the amount of $4,250 per month. Moreover, under the circumstances of this case, the court providently exercised its discretion in directing the plaintiff to pay 100% of the costs of a court-appointed forensic evaluator and an attorney for the parties' child.

Counsel Fees - Domestic Relations Law §237 - Award - Supreme Court Improvidently Exercised its Discretion in Awarding Counsel Fees in of $10,000 in Light of Distributive Award Where Plaintiff Had an Outstanding Balance of $3,732.50

In Gilliam v. Gilliam--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5225497 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff commenced this divorce action after 19 years of marriage. She moved out of the marital residence in 2007, and was living with her mother and receiving Social Security Disability Insurance benefits and food stamps. The defendant was employed as a deputy sheriff with the New York City Sheriff's Department and, pursuant to a stipulation entered into by the parties, was awarded custody of the parties' youngest son, who was 19 years old at the time of the divorce. The defendant lived with the parties' two sons in the marital residence and received rental income from them in the amount of $7,200 annually. After a nonjury trial, the Supreme Court, inter alia, awarded the plaintiff maintenance of $1,500 per month until she reached the age of 67, $10,000 in counsel fees, $2,450 in expert fees, and 50% of the value of two of the parties' motor vehicles.

The Appellate Division held that contrary to the defendant's contention, since the parties stipulated that they would each receive one half of the proceeds from the defendant's pension and deferred compensation plan when they were distributed, the defendant's maintenance obligation should not be reduced in the future by the amount of that payment because, "[b]y reducing the [defendant]'s obligation to this extent, 'the court, in essence, [would] not award the [plaintiff] any portion of that pension.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in awarding counsel fees in the sum of $10,000. The attorney billing statements admitted into evidence showed that the plaintiff had an outstanding balance of $3,732.50 and had previously paid her attorney a $7,500 retainer and an additional $500 fee to review the file. In light of the equitable distribution award, the award of counsel fees to the plaintiff was reduced to the sum of $3,732.50, the amount of the outstanding balance.

Supreme Court further awarded the plaintiff $2,450 in connection with the fee paid to her physician, who testified in court regarding the plaintiff's need for maintenance. An award of expert fees will generally be warranted where, as here, there is a significant disparity in the financial circumstances of the parties. Nevertheless, the plaintiff testified at trial that the medical expert was paid $1,500 to testify in court and that no further sums were due and owing. The plaintiff failed to present any further evidence to establish the amount of the expert fees and, consequently, an award in the sum of $2,450 was not supported. Furthermore, in light of the equitable distribution award and the fact that the medical expert's testimony was relevant to issues raised by both parties, the defendant should have been directed to reimburse the plaintiff for one half of the expert fees.

Accordingly, the award of $2,450 in expert fees to the plaintiff was reduced to $750, equaling one half of the $1,500 fee paid to the medical expert.

Paternity - Equitable Estoppel - Abuse of Discretion in Applying the Doctrine of Equitable Estoppel Against Purported Father Where He Had No Contact or Relationship with the Child since the Child Was 18 Months Old. Equitable Estoppel May Be Asserted Defensively by a Purported Biological Father to Prevent a Child's Mother from Asserting Biological Paternity.

In Matter of Karen G v Thomas G, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 5225787 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Thomas G. appealed from an order of filiation of the Family Court which, after a hearing, adjudicated him to be the father of the subject child based on the doctrine of equitable estoppel. The order of filiation was reversed, the petition denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

The mother of the child commenced the paternity proceeding against the appellant, the alleged biological father, when the child was 15 years old. At the time of the best interests hearing, the child was 16 years old. The testimony at the hearing established, among other things, that the appellant and the mother were in a sexual relationship and living together prior to the child's birth, and both the appellant and the mother had children with other people both before and after the child's birth. The appellant did not acknowledge paternity at the birth of the child and was not named on the birth certificate. The mother gave the child the appellant's middle and last names, and told the child at various times that the appellant was his father. The appellant lived with the mother until the child was approximately 7 months old, and thereafter visited the child on occasion until the child was approximately 18 months old. On an unspecified number of occasions, the child visited with some of his alleged half-siblings (the appellant's children) at the home of their aunt, with whom the mother was friendly. The mother conceded that, after the child was 18 months old, the appellant had no further contact with subject child and had no relationship with the subject child. The mother also conceded that her current husband, with whom she had other children, had been in the child's life since the child was two years old.

Further, it was undisputed that the mother commenced a previous proceeding against the appellant when the subject child was eight months old; the appellant contested his paternity, and the court ordered a genetic marker test, which the appellant was willing to undergo and for which he was willing to pay. The appellant appeared but the mother failed to appear for the court-ordered test, and thereafter, she failed to pursue the proceeding, which was dismissed on October 26, 1999, when the child was nearly three years old. The mother commenced the proceeding 13 years later, in 2012.

The appellant defended against the instant proceeding on the ground that it was inequitable for the mother to seek paternity testing at this late date when she had failed to comply with the court-ordered genetic marker test in 1999, abandoned that proceeding, and thereafter lived with another man from the time the child was two years old. At the close of the hearing, the Family Court found that a genetic marker test was not in the best interests of the child because he was 16 years old, but further determined that the appellant was equitably estopped from denying his paternity because no other man had come forward as the biological father.

The Appellate Division held that the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion in applying the doctrine of equitable estoppel against the appellant under all of the circumstances, including the undisputed fact that the appellant had no contact or relationship with the child since the child was 18 months old. Moreover, in appropriate circumstances, the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be asserted defensively by a purported biological father to prevent a child's mother from asserting biological paternity where a genetic marker test would not be in the best interests of the child. Here, the Family Court improvidently rejected the appellant's equitable defense. An adverse inference may be taken against the mother for her failure to appear for the court-ordered genetic marker test in 1999, and her failure to pursue that proceeding. Thereafter, the mother failed to commence a new proceeding for 13 years, during which time the child had no relationship with the appellant and lived with the mother, her current husband, and his half-siblings on the mother's side. Accordingly, a genetic marker test was not in the best interests of the subject child, on the ground that the mother was equitably estopped from asserting the appellant's biological paternity.

Pendente Lite Maintenance - Award - Imputed Income - Not authority to impute income based on Not electing to take "early" retirement- appropriate to impute $11,000.00 from gifts from family - Not proper to award presumptively correct pendente lite maintenance in addition to an Order directing the wife to continue to pay daily living expenses, including housing costs and medical insurance - deviation from the presumptively correct pendente lite maintenance appropriate based on waste of assets and fact that the wife was paying all of the monthly expenses related to the marital residence where the husband continued to reside (DRL 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)).

In H.G. v. N.K. 2013 WL 5218056 (N.Y.Sup.) the defendant-husband moved for an order granting him pendente lite support. The parties were married on June 5, 1999. The husband was 64 years old and wife was 54 years old. The husband was 50 years old and the wife was 40 years old when the parties married. There were no children of the marriage.

The wife was a psychologist with a doctorate degree, in private practice. The husband had a high school degree. The husband argued that he was the less-monied spouse and that the wife should be required to pay him pendente lite maintenance in compliance with the temporary maintenance guidelines in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-1). The wife argued that the husband dissipated marital assets and fraudulently misled her to believe that he was gainfully employed during the parties marriage by actively hiding the fact that his business failed in 2005 and that he was no longer earning any income during the past seven (7) years of the parties' marriage. She further argued that a deviation from the presumptively correct sum of monthly pendente lite maintenance would be appropriate based on the husband's fraudulent actions during the marriage which, she argued, amounted to wasteful dissipation as contemplated by DRL 236[B] (5-a) (e)(1)(e). The defendant acknowledged that he purposefully concealed his unemployment from the plaintiff during the final seven (7) years of the parties' marriage and stopped filing the parties' joint tax returns in 2007. The defendant claimed that his financial failures during the marriage were a result of his mental health illness which, he alleged, the plaintiff knew about prior to the marriage. The defendant admitted that he purposefully misled the plaintiff to believe that he was employed during the last seven (7) years of the parties' marriage; however, he alleged that the plaintiff was complicit in any financial losses the parties suffered due to his investment choices and his failure to file tax returns between 2007 and 2011 because she put him in charge of the parties' finances, without supervision, despite knowing of his long history of mental illness and financial failures.

The Court observed that pursuant to the husband's affidavit of net worth his monthly expenses were $7,211.00. The husband listed his assets as $64.00 in his checking account as of January 4, 2013, a pearl and gold necklace and bracelet valued in excess of $500.00, and a mother of pearl bracelet valued in excess of $500.00.

Plaintiff argued that an award of the presumptively correct pendente lite maintenance would be unjust and inappropriate where the wife was paying all of the parties' daily living expenses and that a deviation from the presumptive amount of pendente lite maintenance was appropriate based on the husband's wasteful dissipation during the parties' marriage. Plaintiff also argued that income should be imputed to the husband because the husband received approximately $11,000.00 annually in cash gifts from his "wealthy family" during the marriage. The wife further argued that income should be imputed to the husband because he had the ability to elect early Social Security benefits which would yield approximately $12,000.00 annually.

The Court observed that according to the Social Security Administration, the full retirement age for a person born in 1948 was 66 years of age. The husband had not reached the full retirement age and would be electing "early retirement"- and would receive a monthly sum reduced twenty-five (25%) percent- if he elected to collect retirement benefits now. The court found not authority for it to impute income to the husband based on his electing not to take "early" retirement, as defined by the Social Security Administration, for the purpose of calculating pendente lite maintenance, especially since it would result in a reduction of his benefits at the normal retirement age.

The Court found that it was appropriate to impute $11,000.00 to the husband for the purposes of determining the presumptively correct pendente lite maintenance award.

Based upon the husband's age and absence from the workforce for more than eight (8) years the Court found that an additional imputation of income to him pendente lite would not be appropriate.

The court calculated that based on the wife's annual gross income, as reported on her 2011 individual tax return ($151,832.00) and the husband's imputed income ($11,000.00) from cash gifts from his family, the presumptively correct sum of pendente lite maintenance award would be $3,612.47 monthly. It observed that calculating the guideline amount and then adding the direct payment for daily living expenses on top of the guideline amount would effectively result in an award above the formula sum. It noted that "there is no indication that the formulas set forth in Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a) were intended to cover the temporary support needs of the nonmonied spouse... but not the carrying charges on a marital residence" (Woodford v. Woodford, 100 AD3d 875, 877 [2 Dept.,2012]). The Court rejected the husband's contention that he was entitled to an award of the presumptively correct pendente lite maintenance under Domestic Relations Law 236(B)(5-a) in addition to an Order directing the wife to continue to pay his daily living expenses, including housing costs and medical insurance. For the Court to do so would be inconsistent with the controlling Appellate case law and would effectively result in a pendente lite award in excess of the amount presumed correct under the formula. The court held that the sums paid by the wife for rent and utilities related to the marital residence, where both parties resided, and the sums paid by the wife for the parties' daily living expenses, including health insurance premiums and personal expenses such as cellular telephone expenses for the parties should be deducted from the presumptively correct pendente lite award in compliance with the controlling case law. The husband's application for an order directing the wife to continue to pay all of the routine and customary expenses associated with the marital apartment, health insurance, and the parties' automobile, including: rent for the martial apartment, maintenance and repairs for the martial apartment, insurance premiums, utilities for the marital apartment (including gas, electric, security, telephone, cable, and internet/DSL), and automobile insurance and repairs for the parties' automobile was granted. The monthly cost for these daily living expenses paid by the wife was $5,876.00. The Court found that fifty (50%) percent of that $5,876.00 ($2,938.00) would be considered as pendente lite maintenance. Based on the wife's annual gross income, as reported on her 2011 individual tax return ($151,832.00) and the husband's annual imputed income ($11,000.00), the presumptively correct sum of pendente lite maintenance awarded would be $3,612.47 monthly. After deducting the sum of $2,938.00 monthly (50% of the monthly living expenses paid by the wife as admitted by the husband), the wife's remaining pendente lite maintenance obligation for the presumptively correct sum under the statute would be: $674.47 monthly.

The Court rejected the husband's contention that it was premature for the Court to consider wasteful dissipation in determining a pendente lite award was unavailing as the statute specifically provides that wasteful dissipation is a factor before the Court when considering whether a deviation from the presumptive award of pendente lite maintenance is appropriate (DRL 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)(e)). The husband hid his unemployment from the wife for seven (7) years and that his financial decisions during the marriage caused the parties financial detriment. The Court found that a deviation from the presumptively correct pendente lite maintenance was appropriate based on the husband's admitted years of purposeful fraudulent misrepresentation to the wife that he was gainfully employed and the fact that the wife was paying all of the monthly expenses related to the marital residence where the husband continues to reside (DRL 236[B] (5-a)(e)(1)).

The Court concluded that an award of pendente lite spousal support to the husband of $400.00 monthly was appropriate. The husband's application for an Order directing the wife to maintain medical coverage was granted. The husband's application that the wife be solely (100%) financially responsible for his unreimbursed medical, hospital, dental, optical and pharmaceutical expenses and medical co-pays and deductibles, pendente lite, including all individual psychological counseling was granted to the extent that the wife was directed to continue to be financially responsible as she was previously for plan-participating medical treatment. The husband's unreimbursed medical, dental, orthodontic, pharmaceutical, and therapy expenses for in-plan provider were to be paid by the parties pro rata, based on the parties' gross annually income as follows: the husband, 7%; the wife, 93%. The husband was to be solely (100%) financially responsible for unreimbursed medical expenses incurred for using out-of-plan providers. The husband's application for use of the parties' automobile was denied with the right to renew upon proper papers including sworn Affidavits regarding the parties' past access. The Court found that an award of interim counsel fees to the husband was warranted and that fees of $17,500.00 were appropriate.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - "Immediate and Ongoing Danger" Requirement Does Not Pertain to Situations Enumerated in Family Court Act § 827(a)(Vii) Other than (5) "The Exposure of Any Family or Household Member to Physical Injury by the Respondent and like Incidents, Behaviors and Occurrences Which to the Court Constitute an Immediate and Ongoing Danger to the Petitioner, or Any Member of the Petitioner's Family or Household".

In Matter of Kondor v. Kondor, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4528616 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division modified and affirmed an order of protection of the Family Court, which, after a hearing, and upon a finding that he committed certain family offenses within the meaning of Family Court Act § 812, directed Respondent to stay away from the petitioner until and including July 3, 2017. The order was modified on the law, by adding a decretal paragraph finding that aggravating circumstances exist, including the use of a dangerous instrument by Zsolt Kondor against the petitioner.

The Appellate Division observed that to issue an order of protection with a duration exceeding two years on the ground of aggravating circumstances, the Family Court must set forth "on the record and upon the order of protection" a finding of such aggravating circumstances as defined in Family Court Act §827(a)(vii) (Family Ct Act §842). The statutory definition of "aggravating circumstances" includes five distinct situations, set forth in the disjunctive: (1) "physical injury or serious physical injury to the petitioner caused by the respondent," (2) "the use of a dangerous instrument against the petitioner by the respondent," (3) "a history of repeated violations of prior orders of protection by the respondent," (4) "prior convictions for crimes against the petitioner by the respondent," "or" (5) "the exposure of any family or household member to physical injury by the respondent and like incidents, behaviors and occurrences which to the court constitute an immediate and ongoing danger to the petitioner, or any member of the petitioner's family or household" (Family Ct Act § 827[a][vii]). A finding of aggravating circumstances under the fifth situation set forth in Family Ct Act § 827(a)(vii) must be supported by a finding of "an immediate and ongoing danger to the petitioner, or any member of the petitioner's family or household". The Court held that to the extent that certain language in Matter of Clarke-Golding v. Golding (101 A.D.3d at 1118, 956 N.Y.S.2d 553) might suggest that the "immediate and ongoing danger" requirement pertains to the other four situations enumerated in Family Court Act § 827(a)(vii) as well, it is not to be construed as such. Where the aggravating circumstances involve the use of a dangerous instrument, the "immediate and ongoing danger" requirement does not apply.

Family Court's finding that aggravating circumstances were present was supported by the record. Therefore, it modified the order of protection to include this finding in compliance with Family Court Act § 842.

Agreements - Stipulations - Set Aside - Fraud - Wife's Omissions Concerning Her Health Not Material to the Plaintiff's Decision to Enter Settlement Agreement and Did Not Constitute Fraud

In Petrozza v. Franzen, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4528973 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff commenced an action to rescind a settlement agreement he entered into with his now deceased wife during the course of a matrimonial action, based on alleged fraud. The plaintiff alleged that the wife failed to inform him of, and actively concealed, her terminal cancer, which illness resulted in her death after the execution of the settlement agreement but before the entry of a final judgment of divorce. The defendants, executors of the wife's estate, asserted a counterclaim to recover damages for breach of the settlement agreement.

The Appellate Division held that to demonstrate fraud, a plaintiff must show that the defendant "knowingly misrepresented or concealed a material fact for the purpose of inducing [him] to rely upon it, and that [he] justifiably relied upon such misrepresentation or concealment to his ... detriment" (Schwatka v. Super Millwork, Inc., 106 A.D.3d 897;see Channel Master Corp. v. Aluminum Ltd. Sales, 4 N.Y.2d 403, 406-407). While a party's health is material to the equitable distribution of marital assets, the plaintiff did not challenge the manner in which the parties agreed to distribute the marital assets. The plaintiff only claimed that he would not have agreed to settle with the wife at all had he known of her condition. Contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the wife's alleged misrepresentations or omissions concerning her health were not material to the plaintiff's decision as to whether to enter into any settlement agreement at all with the wife and, thus, would not warrant the equitable remedy of rescission. To hold otherwise would be to recognize, contrary to public policy favoring settlement and fair dealing, that the plaintiff was entitled to a "fair" opportunity to stall in settling the action with the goal of retaining all of the marital assets upon the wife's death. Equity is not served by permitting the plaintiff to rescind the separation agreement for lack of this opportunity.

Furthermore, because the plaintiff did not dispute the fairness of the division of the marital assets to which the parties agreed, he could not be heard to complain that his decision to fairly settle the matrimonial action, in reliance upon his incorrect notion of the wife's good health, operated to his detriment.

Supreme Court

Child Custody - Award - Split Physical Custody - Joint Custody with Equal Time and Joint Decision Making Awarded.

In Margaret M.C. v William J.C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2012 WL 8960401 (N.Y.Sup.), Supreme Court found that the best interests of the parties twin children would be served by the parties sharing legal custody (such that all significant decisions pertaining to their physical well being and education would be made jointly), and for physical custody to be shared by the parties alternating weeks with each parent having the children reside with them one week on and one week off. The plaintiff's counsel had argued that she was "unaware of any case where after a trial a parent is awarded joint legal custody, joint physical custody, or anything even approaching a 50/50 time share", citing Braiman v. Braiman, 44 N.Y.2d 584 [1978]. The Court found that such arrangement to be in these children's best interests. Unlike the facts in Braiman, where the parties were so antagonistic that the Court of Appeals held that "[entrusting the custody of young children to their parents jointly, ..., is unsupportable when parents are severely antagonistic and embattled " the parties demonstrated that they can, and had worked collaboratively when it came to the children.

Child Support - Award - in the Absence of Parties' Acknowledgment That They Have Been Apprised of the Provisions of the Child Support Standards Act ("CSSA"), the Amount That Would Have Been Awarded under the CSSA and the Reason for Deviating from the CSSA Amount, a Stipulation of Settlement That Purports to Waive Child Support Is Invalid and Unenforceable.

In Janice S. v Christopher S., 2012 WL 8960402 (N.Y.Sup.) plaintiff sought, inter alia, an order directing defendant to pay child support for the un-emancipated children of the marriage. In support of her application, plaintiff contended that defendant was not initially ordered to pay child support in the Judgment of Divorce because he was not working at the time the Stipulation of Settlement was entered into, but that he had since moved to Florida and was holding himself out as a play producer and seeking other employment in the education industry. In opposition, defendant claimed in his papers that his current medical condition includes a brain tumor, early onset dementia/Alzheimer's Disease, and severe depression. Defendant also testified at the hearing that he is not employed due to various physical, mental and emotional disabilities. Neither plaintiff's submissions nor the testimony at the hearing established that defendant had commenced working. Indeed, the testimony at the hearing by defendant was that he has not, in fact, begun work, and has not worked since the parties separated. Nevertheless, the Court determined that the denial of plaintiff's application for child support was in error and had to be vacated. The law is clear that in the absence of the parties' acknowledgment that they have been apprised of: (a) the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act ("CSSA") set forth in Family Court Act s 413, (b) the amount that would have been awarded under the CSSA and (c) the reason for deviating from the CSSA amount, a Stipulation of Settlement that purports to waive child support is invalid and unenforceable. Tartaglia v. Tartaglia 260 A.D.2d 628 [2nd Dept 1999]; Matter of Phillips v. Phillips 245 A.D.2d 457 [2nd Dept 1997]; Matter of Bill v. Bill 214 A.D.2d 84, 91 [2nd Dept 1995]. Although in the Stipulation of Settlement plaintiff waived any right to child support until such time as defendant obtained employment, and that waiver was later incorporated into the Judgment of Divorce, the Stipulation made no reference to the CSSA. Where a stipulation makes no reference to the CSSA, does not provide the amount that would be awarded presumptively under the Act, or fails to give the parties' reasons for deviating from the statutory formula, it cannot be upheld. Bright v. Freeman, 24 AD3d 586, 588, 808 N.Y.S.2d 359 [2nd Dept 2005].

Here, neither the Stipulation of Settlement placed on the record nor the subsequent Judgment of Divorce so much as mentioned the CSSA, let alone ensured that plaintiff was aware of the presumptive amount to which she was entitled or her right to even a nominal payment of child support from defendant pursuant to its provisions. Rather, the parties' attorneys indicated on the record that "[i]t is further understood that we are not currently setting an obligation for child support to the wife, however, if he commences working that will be something for which the wife may seek child support" The Stipulation was incorporated, but not merged, into the Judgment of Divorce which provided that "the defendant shall not pay child support to the plaintiff at this time due to the fact that the defendant has no income and has been in long term treatment at Rockland Psychiatric Center ..." . While, arguably, a reason was stated for plaintiff waiving her right to child support [defendant's long standing unemployment due to his hospitalization for psychiatric care], neither the Stipulation nor the Judgment made any mention, even in passing, of the CSSA. Hence, plaintiff's waiver of support from defendant was invalid. Thus, the Court concluded that plaintiff's application for child support should have been granted, not because she demonstrated that defendant had become gainfully employed, but rather, because the Stipulation of Settlement violated the CSSA. The Court held that it perpetuated plaintiff's improper waiver of child support by denying her application for same in an earlier Order which was error and which the Court now corrected.

In the exercise of its discretion, the Court imputed income to defendant in the amount of $35,000 per year based on his educational background and past work history. In addition, Defendant had income in the form of the spousal support payments of $10,400 per year which plaintiff made to him. The Court awarded child support to plaintiff based on the combination of the income from spousal support and the income imputed to defendant for a total amount of $45,400 per year.

The Supreme Court denied plaintiff's application for a downward modification of her maintenance obligation finding that she failed to establish extreme hardship. Although plaintiff contended that she had been forced to expend virtually all of her net share of the proceeds from the sale of the marital residence and has taken on a large, unmanageable debt load in her effort to meet her obligations, she fell short of demonstrating extreme hardship. Plaintiff's voluntary undertaking to pay her older children's obligations was legally irrelevant. Plaintiff possessed substantial assets that she could, albeit with potential tax penalties, if so inclined, access to ease her load. In denying plaintiff's application, the Court has considered plaintiff's current employment status, income and ability to meet her needs as required by case law. Pintus v. Pintus 104 A.D.2d 866 [2nd Dept 1984]. The court pointed out that the legal burden of "extreme hardship" is extremely difficult to achieve, particularly where one is earning in excess of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) per year.

The Court held that Defendant, too, failed to demonstrate extreme hardship. Defendant, age 57, had a bachelor's degree from the University of Notre Dame, (BA), and a graduate degree obtained, apparently via Dartmouth, Columbia, Harvard, Yale & CUNY. He stated that he had not worked since his discharge from the psychiatric hospital, contending that he was disabled as a result of various ailments. No medical proof of any disability: mental, emotional or physical, was provided at the hearing. No physician was called to testify and no medical records were entered. Defendant failed to "adequately establish the nature and extent of his medical condition, which he characterized as a permanent disability." Praeger v. Praeger, 162 A.D.2d 671, 673, 557 N.Y.S.2d 394 [2nd Dept 1990] (Cf. V.P v. C.P, 936 N.Y.S.2d 62 [NY Sup.Ct.2011], (a physician was called to testify as to the medical condition of the husband who was applying for the modification.) Defendant testified that he has applied for employment with over 7000 companies and 4,000 schools; without success. He testified that each time he applied for a job, he made certain to notify prospective employers of his psychiatric history and the fact that from 1992-2008 he was a "Stay-At-Home Dad". He had money in retirement accounts. Plaintiff produced a photograph which showed defendant's mobile home and a late model Corvette in the driveway along with another vehicle, a Chrysler PT Cruiser which plaintiff bought for defendant at some time in the past. Defendant admitted that the Corvette (model year 2001) was his, purchased for $10,000 in November 2009 with a portion of the net proceeds from the sale of the marital residence. However, he contended that he sold it in November 2011 for $50 when it broke down and he could not afford to repair it. The Court found this testimony to be incredible. Defendant testified that he had drawn approximately $35,000 from his retirement accounts to pay a portion of his counsel's fees. Defendant admitted that he had approximately $28,000-$30,000 remaining in various accounts. Defendant ignored the fact that he agreed to the $200 per week at a time when his employment situation was no different than it was now. Consequently, the Court denied defendant's application for an upward modification of spousal support.

Family Court

Child Custody - Modification - Relocation - Family Court Holds That a Relocation Case Does Not Include an Enforcement - Modification Case Brought Some 7 Months after an Actual Relocation of a Parent and Child

In Matter of Samantha J.M. v. Anthony T.C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4605792 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) in May of 2009 the parties entered into a stipulated order in Saratoga County for 50/50 shared custody of their child, Lillian (DOB 9/23/05). At that time both Anthony C. ("father") and Samantha M. ("mother") lived in Saratoga County and had resided together there. The parties reconciled in early 2010 and for approximately 20 months after reconciling, the parties lived together without modifying the 50/50 order. They lived with their child Lillian and the father's teenage son, and with frequent visits by the father's other two children. In September 2011 they split up again, after a physical incident between the father's teenage son and the mother which it is agreed included the mother threatening the son with a sharp object, which led to the father telling the mother "she no longer had rights to his children". By that he testified he meant, for example, she could not tell the kids to go to their rooms if they were "acting up" as she had before. The reason the mother moved out, as quoted by the father's attorney in her brief, was as follows: His eldest son and I had a disagreement and T. had told me I no longer had rights to his children. And if I didn't like it, I needed to pack and get out. She chose to move out, and a few weeks later she took Lilly with her to live with her parents in the Rochester area. Mother testified the father consented to her moving, without conditions, and helped her pack for the move. Even the father testified he "allowed" her to move, but said it was only temporary permission, and he claims the mother agreed to come back in six months-and had represented to him that she was going to get a job which would lead to a job back in Saratoga County in six months. The mother disputed that there was a temporary agreement, and disputed that she agreed to come back in six months. The father started this litigation more than six months after the mother had moved with the child to Monroe County to live with her mother and stepfather and argued the mother's alleged promise to come back to Saratoga County justified his failure to file his enforcement petition regarding her move for some seven months. The father's enforcement petition was filed in Saratoga County on April 24, 2012, alleging that the move violated his 50/50 parenting time provided by the May 2009 order, and that he was duped by the mother into thinking she was only moving temporarily to Monroe County to get a job which would lead to a job back in Saratoga County. The mother filed a modification petition. There was no express provision in the parties' order prohibiting relocation without a court order or written agreement.

The Court held that a relocation case does not include an enforcement - modification case brought some 7 months after an actual relocation of a parent and child. The court concluded this case was not a relocation case at the time it was belatedly filed, even if it might have been a relocation case if filed immediately upon the mother's move. When a party does what the father did here, i.e., not file for 7 months to stop a move or immediately pull it back, the facts change. The conclusion is unavoidable that at some perhaps hard-to-define point, once a party has moved with a child significantly far away from the other parent's home, a standard relocation case necessarily becomes no longer a relocation case, but simply a custody battle between two parents living in two different places, based on a change of circumstances when there is a prior order. If there is no prior order, it is just an initial custody case. What exactly is the time at which a relocation case transforms into a change of circumstances or initial custody case need not be decided here-as this particular case was so clearly past that point. While this case could have been a relocation case, due to the passage of time, it was not. At some point, a case is no longer appropriate for relocation case treatment. Permission to relocate need not be granted. Relocation had occurred.

The father sought to enforce his 50/50 time with the child under the prior order while the mother sought a modification of a prior order as 50/50 no longer worked. Since this was not a relocation case, she had to establish a change of circumstances sufficient to warrant an inquiry into whether the best interests of the child warranted a change in custody. A change of circumstances occurred since the prior order. The parties had moved back in together since their prior order, then separated, and moved far apart so that the sharing schedule would no longer work. Thus, the mother established a sufficient change of circumstances.

The Court held that the best interests of the child demanded that the mother be awarded primary physical residence and that she be allowed to live in the Rochester area. The mother had been the primary caretaker since May of 2009 while the parties were separated, while they lived together, and since they separated again. The mother made a common sense and appropriate decision to go live with her mother and stepfather, taking her child. She had to move as she recognized it was not reasonable to continue living with the father under his terms. The child was in a fine, small home with three adults to love her and take care of her on a daily basis. She had her own room. The evidence showed she was doing well in school, and had friends at school and in the neighborhood. There was no reason to upset the status quo by forcing the mother to return to Saratoga County, where she would have to live off someone less appropriate than her own mother and stepfather, or get an unusually high-paying job for someone with her skills and work history, in order to continue having Lillian live with her.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Child Support - Award - Drl § 240(1-b) - Proper Consideration of the Subparagraph (F) Factors, as Required in Determining the Amount of Child Support for Income in Excess of the Statutory Limit Did Not Support the Supreme Court's Finding That a Monthly Support Obligation of $2,076.75 "Adequately Reflects a Support Level That Meets the Needs and Continuation of the Children's Lifestyle, as Dictated by the past Spending Practices of the Parties."

In Beroza v. Hendler, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4082325 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff and the defendant were married in 1990, and the plaintiff commenced an action for a divorce in 2001, when the oldest of the parties' three children was 4 ½ years old and their twins were 18 months old. The parties were both educated professionals. The plaintiff was a veterinarian with a private practice devoted to horses, and owned a related business which boarded horses and rented the premises for polo matches, and the defendant was a partner in a group anesthesiology practice. Both parties worked throughout the marriage and lived an affluent lifestyle in Laurel Hollow.

In its decision after trial, Supreme Court imputed gross annual income to plaintiff of $259,100.00, calculated the plaintiff's annual child support obligation as 29% of $200,000.00, or $4,833.33 monthly, and concluded that the plaintiff's pro rata share of certain additional expenses for the children was to be 40%, based on the parties' respective incomes. These figures were reflected in the judgment of divorce entered August 19, 2008. On the plaintiff's appeal from the Judgment, the Appellate Division agreed with the determination imputing annual gross income to the plaintiff of $259,100.00, but remitted the matter to the Supreme Court "for a recalculation of the plaintiff's child support obligation" because the Supreme Court had failed to set forth the parties' pro rata shares of child support and to adequately explain its application of the " 'precisely articulated, three-step method for determining child support' " pursuant to the Child Support Standards Act. (Beroza v. Hendler, 71 A.D.3d 615, 617, 896 N.Y.S.2d 144, quoting Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b]). On remittitur, and after considering submissions by the parties, the Supreme Court determined their respective annual net incomes to be $248,721.00 for the plaintiff and $487,693.00 for the defendant, for a net combined parental income of $736,414.00. However, for the purpose of determining the plaintiff's child support obligation, the court capped the combined parental income at $255,000.00. The Supreme Court found that, considering the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(f) $255,000.00 "adequately reflects a support level that meets the needs and continuation of the children's lifestyle, as dictated by the past spending practices of the parties ."After correspondingly revising the plaintiff's pro rata share of the children's expenses from 40% to 33.7%, the Supreme Court applied the statutory percentage to combined parental income capped at $255,000.00, and calculated that the plaintiff's support obligation for the parties' three children was to be in the annual amount of $24,921.00, or $2,076.75, monthly.

The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in capping the parties' combined parental income at $255,000.00. Proper consideration of the subparagraph (f) factors, as required in determining the amount of child support for income in excess of the statutory limit did not support the Supreme Court's finding that a monthly support obligation of $2,076.75 "adequately reflects a support level that meets the needs and continuation of the children's lifestyle, as dictated by the past spending practices of the parties." Rather than remit, it recalculated the amount of child support. The parties' annual net combined parental income was $736,414.00. Plaintiff's pro rata share of the combined parental income was 33.77%. The plaintiff's share of the basic annual support obligation was 33.77% of $23,200.00, or the annual sum of $7,834.64." As applicable here, the subparagraph (f) factors included a consideration of the financial resources of the custodial and noncustodial parent, and the standard of living the child would have enjoyed had the marriage or household not been dissolved (Domestic Relations Law § 240 [1-b][f][1][3]). Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in applying the statutory child support percentage of 29% to the amount of the combined parental income it considered in excess of $80,000.00, but improvidently exercised its discretion in capping the amount of combined parental income at $255,000.00, an amount which was only marginally higher than the plaintiff's net annual income of $248,721.00. The capped amount, in effect, improperly excluded consideration of the mother's net annual income of $487,693, contrary to the cost-sharing scheme directed by the CSSA. In considering the relevant subparagraph (f) factors, including the affluent lifestyle which the children undisputedly enjoyed during the parties' marriage, commensurate with the parties' education and net combined annual parental income of $736,414.00, it found that $400,000.00 was an appropriate cap to the parties' combined annual parental income for purposes of calculating the plaintiff's support obligation pursuant to the statutory percentage. Thus, it applied the child support percentage of 29% to the amount of the cap in excess of $80,000.00, or $320,000.00, which yielded the annual amount for both parents of $92,800.00, the plaintiff's share of which was 33.77%, or $31,338.56. Adding this amount to the plaintiff's basic annual support obligation of $7,834.64 yielded an annual obligation of $39,173.20, or $3,264.43 per month.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Right of Attorney to Apply for Counsel Fees May Not Be Extinguished by Agreement of Client Without Consent of Attorney

In Gregory v Gregory, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4437197 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), appellant Karson, an attorney commenced a proceeding on behalf of his client, Mary Gregory against the petitioner's husband seeking child support and maintenance. The Family Court entered an order of support and advised the petitioner to file a motion as to the issue of an attorney's fee. Karson then moved for an order pursuant to Family Court Act § 438 directing the respondent to pay his attorney's fee. After Karson's motion was filed, but before it was decided, the petitioner and the respondent, without Karson's knowledge, executed a stipulation of settlement that provided that "each party shall pay his attorneys" in connection with the support proceeding and that "each party agrees to indemnify and hold the other party free and harmless against ... the claims of any other attorney or person who rendered or claims to have rendered legal services to him or her" in connection with the support proceeding. Family Court denied Karson's motion, concluding that the stipulation of settlement barred Karson's claim.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that a lawyer who represented a nonmonied spouse may seek an attorney's fee from the monied spouse even after his or her client has discharged him or her without cause (see Frankel v. Frankel, 2 N.Y.3d 601). The stipulation of settlement executed by the petitioner and the respondent was not binding on Karson, who was not a party to the stipulation. The petitioner's agreement to indemnify the respondent against claims made by Karson did not relieve the respondent of any obligation he had to pay Karson (see Raquet v. Braun, 90 N.Y.2d 177; Weissman v. Sinorm Deli, 88 N.Y.2d 437). Thus, the Family Court erred in determining that the stipulation of settlement barred Karson's claim. It remitting the matter to the Family Court to consider whether to grant Karson's motion and indicated that in "making its determination, the Family Court must consider factors such as "the parties' ability to pay, the merits of the parties' positions, the nature and extent of the services rendered, the complexity of the issues involved, and the reasonableness of counsel's performance and the fees under the circumstances" (Matter of Westergaard v. Westergaard, 106 A.D.3d 926).

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Credit for Contribution of Separate Property to Marital Property.

Child Support- Award - Imputed Income - Court May Impute Income Based upon the Parent's Past Income or Demonstrated Earning Potential.

Child Support - Award - DRL § 240(1-b)(c)(7) - College Expenses - Child Support Obligation Should Be Decreased by the Amount of College Room and Board Expenses Incurred While Child Attends College.

In Patete v Rodriguez, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4437223 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff appealed from a judgment which, inter alia, awarded the defendant counsel fees of $78,000, and failed to award him counsel fees, awarded the defendant child support of $1,303.34, a month, retroactive to October 1, 2011, until the parties' youngest daughter attains the age of 21 or is sooner emancipated, and directed him to pay 50% of the college tuition and related expenses for the parties' youngest child, computed with a "SUNY cap," retroactive to commencement of the action for a period of three years.

The Appellate Division found that parties married for the first time on December 24, 1978. On May 14, 1980, during this marriage, they jointly purchased a house located on 68th Street in Maspeth, Queens. The parties entered into a separation agreement on February 8, 1981, pursuant to which the defendant conveyed her interest in the 68th Street property to the plaintiff. The parties divorced on March 5, 1981. The divorce decree incorporated but did not merge the separation agreement. The defendant's name was never placed back on the deed to the house prior to their second marriage, in 1985. The plaintiff sold the 68th Street property on February 17, 1987, and used a total of $125,000 of the proceeds to purchase the former marital home, located on 64th Street in Maspeth, Queens. The Appellate Division held that since the defendant failed to adduce any evidence to rebut the presumption that the deed was duly executed, it validly transferred the defendant's pre-marital interest in the 68th Street property to the plaintiff. Since this property remained solely titled in the plaintiff's name until he sold it in 1987, it remained his separate property until the sale. Accordingly the documented use of two checks from the sale of the 68th Street property in the sums of $82,500 and $42,500 (totaling $125,000) to purchase the 64th Street property, which was clearly marital property, entitled him to a separate property credit for this contribution of separate funds to purchase the former marital home. Nonetheless, the plaintiff did not overcome the presumption that the funds used to make mortgage payments with respect to the 68th Street property during the course of the second marriage, until February 17, 1987 (when the house was sold), were marital. Thus, the defendant should have receive a credit for one-half of the marital funds used to the pay this mortgage on the plaintiff's separate property in the sum of $3,669.47.

Although a property located in Puerto Rico consisting of a vacant lot, known as "El Verde," was the husbands separate property, the Appellate Division held that defendant should have been awarded a credit for one-half of the marital funds used to pay for taxes and maintenance of the "El Verde" property. It also held that Supreme Court should have granted the plaintiff's request for a separate property credit of $15,000, since the defendant admitted in her response to the plaintiff's notice to admit that the plaintiff inherited funds in that amount which were used to remodel an upstairs bathroom at the 64th Street property during the marriage.

The Appellate Division declined to disturb the Supreme Court's award of $78,000 in counsel fees to the defendant. It observed that in determining whether to award fees, the court should review the financial circumstances of both parties together with all the other circumstances of the case, which may include the relative merit of the parties' positions and whether either party has engaged in conduct or taken positions resulting in a delay of the proceedings or unnecessary litigation. Although the parties were on relatively equal financial footing, the record supported the Supreme Court's conclusion that, but for the plaintiff's conduct in this case, the defendant would not have incurred significant legal fees.

The Appellate Division rejected the plaintiff's contention that the Supreme Court erred in concluding that the income that he reported earning in his 2007 tax returns, rather than the income he reported in his 2009 tax returns, was an accurate reflection of his current earning capacity for the purpose of calculating his child support obligation. "A court need not rely upon a party's own account of his or her finances, but may impute income based upon the party's past income or demonstrated future potential earnings". "The court may impute income to a party based on his or her employment history, future earning capacity, educational background, or money received from friends and relatives" In light of the plaintiff's earning power and substantial assets, the Supreme Court did not improvidently exercise its discretion in imputing his 2007 reported income to him for the purpose of determining his child support obligation . The court did not improvidently exercise its discretion by not also imputing to the defendant her 2007 income. The defendant made financial disclosure to the court, and appeared to be earning income consistent with her " 'education and opportunities' "

The Appellate Division agreed with the plaintiff that he should have been directed to pay only his pro rata share of 39%, rather than 50%, of the college tuition and related expenses for the parties' youngest child, computed with a "SUNY cap," and only retroactive to that child's first year of college and continuing until she graduates, reaches the age of 21, or is sooner emancipated . Plaintiff correctly argued that the Supreme Court should have directed that his child support obligation be decreased by the amount of any college room and board expenses he incurs while the child attends college.

Foreign Divorce - Bilateral - Recognition - Comity -

In Sergy P. v Svetlana B., 2013 WL 4080441 (N.Y.Sup.) on February 3, 1994, plaintiff and defendant were married in Odessa, Ukraine. In or about 1997, while expecting her first child, plaintiff and her parents immigrated to the United States as refugees. Shortly thereafter, in March, 1997, a daughter was born as a result of the marriage. Between 1997 and or about 2012, while defendant resided in the United States with her daughter, plaintiff resided in Russia where he worked for a time period in a well-paid position as Chief Financial Officer for a corporation in Russia. During this period, plaintiff made periodic visits to defendant and their daughter in the United States. On February 3, 2009, a divorce decree was issued by a district court in the Russian Federation dissolving plaintiff and defendant's marriage. During this divorce proceeding, both parties appeared by proxies who had power of attorney. On March 16, 2009 and October 1, 2009, defendant's proxy and plaintiff-movant himself executed two agreements entitled: "Agreement regarding the division of marital property" whereby certain real property located in Russia was transferred from plaintiff to defendant. At some point after the divorce, a second child was conceived by defendant by in vitro fertilization using plaintiff's previously frozen sperm. This child, a daughter, was born in 2010.

On August 9, 2012, plaintiff commenced an action against defendant by filing a verified complaint seeking a divorce pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §170(7), in addition to equitable distribution of the marital property and joint custody of the parties' children. Among other things, the complaint alleged that, "[u]pon information and belief there is no valid judgment in any court for a divorce and no other matrimonial action for divorce between the parties is pending in this court or in any other court of competent jurisdiction." On August 24, 2012, defendant served an answer generally denying the allegations in the complaint and asserting affirmative defenses.

Defendant moved to dismiss. Supreme Court observed that in or about October of 2012, plaintiff filed a claim in a Russian court seeking an order declaring the March 16, 2009 and October 1, 2009 division of marital property agreements invalid and void and to reinstate his rights of ownership in the property transferred by these agreements. In this regard, plaintiff's statement of claim alleged that: [Defendant] convinced me to divorce and transfer all real property in her name, since she was not considered a Resident of Russia for tax purposes and had a legal right not to pay taxes on sale of real property on the territory of Russia. She promised me, that as soon as I will move my residence permanently to the USA, we will reinstate our marital status. Moreover, she, in all ways emphasized, that regardless of who formally owns our property, it is still considered mine, and she has no claim to it. The statement of claim also alleged that "the dissolution of our marriage was of fictitious nature and factually our marital relationship did not end." In a decree dated February 27, 2013. "Having considered the evidence submitted by the parties in their entirety, the court finds that there are no grounds for the annulment of the agreements on the division of the jointly owned property of the spouses, which were entered into by the plaintiff and defendant on March 16, 2009 and October 1, 2009, and therefore there are no grounds for the application of the consequences of the invalidity of transactions." The Russian court determined that plaintiff's claims were barred by an applicable three-year statute of limitations.

Supreme Court granted the motion. It observed that it is well-settled that "comity should be extended to uphold the validity of a foreign divorce decree absent a showing of fraud in its procurement or that recognition of the judgment would do violence to some strong public policy of the state" (Farag v. Farag, 504 [2004]). Further, "a departure from settled comity principles can be justified only as a rare exception ... [and][s]ome evidentiary basis to support the proposition that the particular divorce decree of the foreign country was the product of individualized fraud or coercion or oppression or rested on proximately related public policies fundamentally offensive and inimical to those of this State must be demonstrated" (Matter of Gotlib v. Ratsutsky, 83 N.Y.2d 696, 699-700 [1994]). With respect to the issue of fraud, a foreign judgment cannot be attacked on the ground that is procured by intrinsic fraud, "which goes to the existence of a cause of action, and is held to be no defense" (Altman v. Altman, 150 A.D.2d 304, 306 [1989]). Rather, courts will only refuse to extend comity to foreign judgments which are obtained by extrinsic fraud, whereby the aggrieved party is deprived of the opportunity to make a full and fair defense in the foreign action through some deception (Greschler v. Greschler, 51 N.Y.2d 368, 376 [1980]; Altman, 150 A.D.2d at 306; Tamimi v. Tamimi, 38 A.D.2d 197, 199-200 [1972]). In particular, "[t]he rule is that there must be facts which prove it to be against conscience to execute the judgment, and which the injured party could not make available in a court of law, or which he was prevented from presenting by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fraud or negligence in himself or his agents ' "

Crediting plaintiff's version of the events surrounding the Russian divorce proceeding as being accurate, it was clear that he was not deprived of the opportunity to participate in the proceeding through some deception on defendant's part. Plaintiff was fully aware of the divorce proceeding, appeared in the proceeding by proxy and was represented by counsel throughout the pendency of the matter. The court noted that even after plaintiff commenced this action, plaintiff continued to litigate matters related to the divorce in the Russian court. In particular, plaintiff (unsuccessfully) sought to invalidate agreements dividing the marital property. However, at no point did plaintiff seek to have the Russian court itself invalidate the divorce decree. Plaintiff's claim that he was deprived of the opportunity to defend himself in the Russian divorce proceeding inasmuch as he relied upon defendant's fraudulent misrepresentation that the parties would remarry was unavailing. The elements of fraud are a material misrepresentation of an existing fact, made with knowledge of the falsity, an intent to induce reliance thereon, justifiable reliance upon the misrepresentation, and damages (Fromowitz v. W. Park Assocs., Inc., 106 AD3d 950 [2013]). Even assuming that plaintiff could demonstrate that defendant had no intention of remarrying plaintiff at the time the alleged false promise was made, plaintiff could not have reasonably relied upon a promise to remarry which is legally unenforceable (Dalessio v. Kressler, 6 AD3d 57, 62 [2004], citing Civil Rights Law §80-a). In any event, a party claiming that he or she was deprived of the opportunity to make a full and fair defense in a foreign action through some fraudulent deception must themselves be untainted by fraud. Here, by plaintiff's own admission, defendant's alleged fraudulent promise to remarry him was part of a larger fraud in which plaintiff himself was a willing and active participant. In particular, the parties obtained a divorce decree from the Russian court under false pretexts as part of a tax avoidance scheme.

Supreme Court held that under the circumstances, this was not one of those "rare" instances where a departure from the principles of comity was justified and the court had to recognize the 2009 Russian divorce decree dissolving the parties' marriage. Accordingly, defendant's motion which sought to dismiss plaintiff's divorce cause of action pursuant to CPLR 3211(a) was granted. Those branches of plaintiff's cross motion which sought to set aside the Russian judgment of divorce and to amend the complaint to assert a cause of action to set aside the Russian judgment of divorce were denied.

Child Support - Award - Emancipation - Conduct of Child in Voluntarily Placing himself out of the Care and Control of the Parent by Means of His Criminal Acts and His Subsequent Decisions Constitutes Emancipation

In Matter of H.M. v. B.M., 2013 WL 4415756 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) petitioner, the eighteen-year-old son of the respondent, requested that an order of child support be entered on his behalf. The respondent argued that the petitioner constructively emancipated himself. The matter came to trial and the Support Magistrate made the following findings: (1) the respondent adopted the petitioner when he was 10 years old, and petitioner was one of five adopted children in a single-parent home; (2) the petitioner was currently eighteen years old and residing with a non-relative family; (3) the petitioner was attending high school, working part time at a fast food restaurant, and planning to attend college; (4) the petitioner was arrested in November 2011 and pled guilty to the commission of sexual acts on multiple occasions on his younger siblings; (5) the petitioner spent seven months in jail in connection with his conviction and an order of protection was entered prohibiting him from returning to the home of the respondent; the petitioner's criminal acts were completely without justification, and the respondent was justified in having no contact with the petitioner. The Support Magistrate concluded that the respondent met her burden of proving that the petitioner has constructively abandoned the respondent and that the respondent had no obligation to pay support to the petitioner.

In denying the Petitioners objection Family Court found that the Support Magistrate did not make an error of law or abuse her discretion by dismissing the petition and denying the application for attorney fees. The evidence overwhelmingly showed that the petitioner, who was of employable age, had voluntarily placed himself out of the care and control of the respondent by means of his criminal acts and his subsequent decisions. (Matter of Roe v. Doe, 29 N.Y.2d 188; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 240 A.D.2d 908.) There was credible testimony that the petitioner had developed a pattern of insubordinate and violent behavior prior to his arrest for sexual abuse involving his brother and his sister. The evidence also showed that the respondent provided therapeutic psychological intervention to the petitioner. However, after pleading guilty to several counts of sexual abuse of his siblings in criminal court, the respondent was sentenced to a term of incarceration. A multi-year, stay-away order of protection was also entered against the petitioner directing him to stay away from the respondent and his siblings. Therefore, it was a direct result of the petitioner's own conduct that he was unable to reside with the respondent. Additionally, there was credible testimony that the petitioner rejected the respondent's wish that he enter a residential treatment program after he was released from jail. Again, it was the petitioner's choice to place himself outside of the control of the respondent.

Court Rules Amended

The Uniform Civil Rules for the Supreme Court and the County Court, were amended by adding a new section 202.10, relating to appearances at conferences, to provide that any party may request to appear at a conference by telephonic or other electronic means. It appears that "other electronic means" refers to video conference or computer video services such as "skype". The rule encourages the court to grant the request where "feasible and appropriate".

Appellate Division, Second Department

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Disorderly Conduct - Burden of Proof - Petitioner must Demonstrate Respondent's Conduct Was Intended to Cause, or Recklessly Created a Risk of Causing, Public Inconvenience, Annoyance, or Alarm.

In Casie v Casie, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3813824 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Second Department, in an opinion by Judge Skelos, held that to establish the family offense of disorderly conduct, a petitioner must demonstrate that the challenged conduct was intended to cause, or recklessly created a risk of causing, public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm.

On February 15, 2012, the petitioner, Dionne Cassie, filed a family offense petition against her husband, Richard Cassie which alleged that, on February 11, 2012, the parties engaged in a dispute or altercation because the husband had promised that he was going to leave the marital home and had "reneged on his promise." According to the wife, the husband attempted, unsuccessfully, to push her down a flight of stairs, twisted her arm, causing pain, and pushed her against a wall. Based upon this alleged conduct, the wife asserted that the husband had committed the family offenses of, among others, attempted assault, assault in the second or third degree, harassment in the first or second degree, and disorderly conduct. The wife requested an order of protection requiring the husband to stay away from her and the marital home.

At a hearing on the petition, the wife testified that the parties had been married since 1988, and lived in a two-family house. The wife asserted that, prior to the incident, the husband had promised that he was leaving the marital home. On February 11, 2012, the wife changed the locks of the home and packed a suitcase for the husband. The wife testified that, at approximately 10:00 p.m. on that day, she and the husband became engaged in an altercation in the home, during which he tried to push or pull her down the stairs, he pushed her up against a wall, and he twisted her arm. The wife denied having pushed or struck the husband, but admitted that she bit him. The husband called the police, who responded to the scene, but did not make any arrests. The wife did not file a police report or seek medical attention. The husband testified that, around the time of the incident, he was not working full time, and the wife was angry and told him that he had to leave the home because he had not paid the electric bill. On February 11, 2012, when the husband tried to open the door to the home, his key did not work. The husband rang the bell and "[s]omeone" opened the door. The husband then started to walk up the stairs while the wife was coming down the stairs. According to the husband, the wife started to push the husband down the stairs, and scratched, bit, and hit him, because she did not want him in the house. The husband showed the court some marks on his arm that he claimed were bite marks. At that point, the husband called the police. The husband ultimately left the home voluntarily, and slept in the garage of the home that night. No one else witnessed the incident. The husband asserted that he never tried to push the wife down the stairs, and was never actually above her on the staircase.

At the close of the evidence, the Family Court found that the incident on February 11, 2012, was "a really bad fight" and that both parties were "fighting with each other." However, the court observed, it only had one petition before it, and "to the extent that it's only [the wife's] petition," the court found that the husband "engaged in the offense of disorderly conduct in the home, in that he fought with [the wife]." The court thereupon issued a two-year order of protection, directing the husband to refrain from various forms of conduct, such as harassment and disorderly conduct.

The Court observed that in a family offense proceeding, the petitioner has the burden of establishing, by a "fair preponderance of the evidence," that the charged conduct was committed as alleged in the petition. (Family Ct Act § 832). Under the Penal Law, "A person is guilty of disorderly conduct when, with intent to cause public inconvenience, annoyance or alarm, or recklessly creating a risk thereof: 1. He engages in fighting or in violent, tumultuous or threatening behavior; or 2. He makes unreasonable noise; or 3. In a public place, he uses abusive or obscene language, or makes an obscene gesture;..."(Penal Law § 240.20).

Justice Skelos pointed out that critical to a charge of disorderly conduct is a finding that the disruptive statements and behavior were of a public rather than an individual dimension". In that respect, a person may be guilty of disorderly conduct only when the situation extends beyond the exchange between the individual disputants to a point where it becomes a potential or immediate public problem. In assessing whether an act carries public ramifications, relevant factors to consider are the time and place of the episode under scrutiny; the nature and character of the conduct; the number of other people in the vicinity; whether they are drawn to the disturbance and, if so, the nature and number of those attracted; and any other relevant circumstances.

The complicating factor in this case, which was a family offense proceeding rather than a criminal action, is that Family Court Act § 812 provides: "For purposes of this article, 'disorderly conduct' includes disorderly conduct not in a public place" (Family Ct Act §812[1]). The husband contends that, even though the Family Court Act specifies that the conduct need not occur in a public place, the petitioner must nonetheless prove either an intent to cause public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm, or the reckless creation of a risk thereof.

Justice Skelos pointed out that the First and Fourth Departments had held, albeit summarily, that lack of proof of an intent to cause, or reckless creation of a risk of causing, public ramifications, required dismissal of those branches of family offense petitions that charged the respondent with disorderly conduct. Matter of Janice M. v. Terrance J., 96 A.D.3d 482, 945 N.Y.S.2d 693 (1st Dept); Matter of Brazie v. Zenisek, 99 A.D.3d 1258, 951 N.Y.S.2d 458(4th Dept). Here, the Court now held that even where the conduct at issue is alleged to have occurred in a private residence, in order for a petitioner to meet his or her burden of establishing the family offense of disorderly conduct, there must be a prima facie showing that the conduct was either intended to cause, or recklessly created a risk of causing, public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm. The intent to cause, or recklessness in causing, public harm, is the mens rea of the offense of disorderly conduct. The plain language of the provision of Family Court Act § 812, in contrast, provides only that the conduct need not occur in a public place. The plain language of Family Court Act § 812 therefore pertains only to the actus reus of the offense-specifically, the place where it is committed-and does not speak to the mens rea of the offense. Indeed, since Family Court Act § 812 does not specify an alternative culpable mental state, if the mens rea provided for in the Penal Law were not applicable in family offense proceedings, it is unclear what the mens rea of this family offense would be.

The Court held that that the wife was required to prove that the husband's conduct was committed with the intent to cause, or recklessly posed a risk of causing, public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm. The wife did not sustain that burden. She did not adduce any testimony regarding the layout of the marital home, or the proximity of neighbors or other members of the public. Nor did she testify that the husband was screaming or otherwise being so loud that others might reasonably be expected to hear him. While the husband testified that his two daughters were upstairs watching television at the time of the incident, assuming arguendo that they could constitute "the public," there was no evidence that the husband intended to cause them inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm, and the evidence was insufficient to demonstrate that he recklessly created a risk thereof. In that respect, there was no evidence regarding how close the daughters were to the confrontation or whether the husband's conduct would have been noticeable to someone not in the immediate vicinity. Accordingly, the wife failed to establish the family offense of disorderly conduct. Accordingly, the order of protection was reversed, on the facts, the petition was denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

Child Custody - Right to Counsel - FCA § 262 - Denial of Right Requires Reversal Regardless of Merits of Case

In Matter of Feliciano v King, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3814261 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the mother filed a petition to modify a prior order of the Family Court so as to award her sole legal and physical custody of the parties' child and to require that visitation with the father be supervised. After the third day of a hearing on the petition, during cross-examination of the mother, the mother requested that she be allowed to substitute her court-appointed counsel with counsel that she privately retained. The privately retained counsel sought a one-week adjournment of the hearing to obtain the transcript of the prior testimony and to prepare for the continuation of the hearing. The Family Court denied the request for an adjournment and advised the mother that she could choose to continue with one or both counsel, who were present in the courtroom, or proceed without counsel that afternoon, or have the court make a decision based on the incomplete record. The mother chose the latter option. Based upon the evidence adduced by the mother until the point of the adjournment request, the Family Court denied the mother's petition and dismissed the proceeding with prejudice. The Appellate Division reversed and remitted for a new hearing. It held that while the granting of an adjournment for any purpose is a matter resting within the sound discretion of the Family Court the range of the court's discretion is narrowed where a fundamental right such as the right to counsel in a matter involving custody of a child is involved. Under the circumstances of this case, the Family Court should have exercised its discretion to grant the one-week adjournment request rather than requiring the mother to choose between proceeding with the hearing that afternoon with the court-appointed attorney, whom the mother expressed she no longer wanted to represent her and who made an application to be relieved as counsel, or the privately retained attorney or both of them, or submitting the matter for a decision even though the record was incomplete.

Child Custody - Practice and Procedure - Pre-Trial Forensic Evaluations - Although Not Required, Evaluations May Be Appropriate Where There Exist Sharp Factual Disputes That Affect the Final Determination

In Shanika M. v. Stephanie G., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3814304 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Shanika M. and Stephanie G. were in a domestic partnership. In March 2003, the parties traveled to Grenada, where Stephanie's family lived. While there, they met one-month-old Jada, the child, who was the daughter of Stephanie's sister, Allison G. With Allison's consent, the parties agreed to bring Jada to the United States with the intention of formally adopting Jada. One month later, Stephanie brought Jada to New York, and Jada lived with the parties until she was two years old, when the parties separated. The adoption was never formalized, although Jada continued to live with Stephanie. Stephanie and Shanika then entered into a voluntary visitation arrangement that they adhered to for several years and which was modified by the parties at various times. Following an altercation in August 2008, Stephanie refused to allow Shanika to have any further contact with Jada. In December 2008, Shanika filed a custody petition. During the pendency of the custody matter, Shanika and Stephanie each filed a petition to be appointed as Jada's legal guardian. The Family Court conducted a hearing on the petitions. Despite a request by the attorney for the child that forensic evaluations be performed, no such evaluations were conducted. After the hearing, the Family Court denied Shanika's custody and guardianship petitions and granted Stephanie's guardianship petition, appointing Stephanie as Jada's sole guardian.

The Appellate Division held that Family Court erred in deciding the issue of guardianship without the aid of forensic evaluations of Stephanie, Shanika, and Jada. Although forensic evaluations are not always necessary, such evaluations may be appropriate where there exist sharp factual disputes that affect the final determination (see Matter of Rovenia G.M. v. Lesley P.A., 44 A.D.3d 942, 943-944, 846 N.Y.S.2d 192; see also Ekstra v. Ekstra, 49 A.D.3d 594, 595, 854 N.Y.S.2d 439; Stern v. Stern, 225 A.D.2d 540, 541, 639 N.Y.S.2d 80). Under the circumstances of this case, the record was inadequate to determine the best interests of the child, particularly as there was no expert assessment of the psychological impact of separating Jada from Shanika. In addition, given Stephanie's allegations of alcohol abuse by Shanika, and Shanika's allegations of alienation by Stephanie and Stephanie's current partner, forensic evaluations of Stephanie, Shanika, and Jada were proper to aid in the resolution of these factual issues. It remitted the matter to the Family Court, for complete forensic evaluations of Shanika, Stephanie, and Jada, for a reopened hearing on the issue of guardianship at which any forensic evaluation report "shall be admitted and the parties shall have the opportunity to cross-examine the evaluator should they so desire," and thereafter, for a new determination of the guardianship petitions based on the forensic evaluations, any testimony regarding such evaluations, and the evidence already adduced at the hearing on this matter.

Child Support- Award - Imputed Income - Court May Impute Income Based upon the Money Received from Family

In Matter of Kiernan v Martin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3927693 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that a determination to impute income will be rejected where the amount imputed was not supported by the record, or the imputation was an improvident exercise of discretion. (Matter of Ambrose v. Felice, 45 AD3d 581, 582). It found that the Support Magistrate improvidently exercised her discretion by failing to impute additional income to the father for money he received from his family for the children's college expenses. The father's testimony established that the funds he received from his family to pay for the children's college expenses were not loans that he was obligated to repay. Thus, the mother's objections to the order which directed her to pay arrears for college expenses and to pay for 67% of the children's future college expenses should have been granted, and the matter remitted to the Family Court for a new determination of the parties' respective obligations to pay college expenses following a report from the Support Magistrate on the amount of money the father received from his family members for the children's college expenses.

Family Court - Support Enforcement - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order of Support Magistrate - Party Challenging Support Magistrate's Order of Wilful Violation Recommending Commitment Must Appeal Rather than Make Specific Objections to obtain Review

In Matter of Flanagan v Flanagan, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 4007536 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division observed that a determination by a support magistrate that a person is in willful violation of a support order and recommending commitment has no force and effect until confirmed by a Judge of the Family Court. Such a determination by a support magistrate does not constitute a final order to which a party may file written objections" (Family Ct. Act § 439[a], [e]). In an order dated January 17, 2012, the Support Magistrate determined that the father was in willful violation of a prior support order. On the same date, the Family Court confirmed the determination of willfulness and thereupon issued an order of commitment which committed the father to the custody of the Nassau County Correctional Facility for a period of 14 days. The father failed to pursue his sole remedy, which was to appeal from the order of commitment dated January 17, 2012, entered upon confirmation of the Support Magistrate's determination. Since the father improperly filed written objections to the nonfinal order of the Support Magistrate, the Family Court correctly denied the father's objections on procedural grounds.

Appearance - Appearance by an Attorney Is Not a Default -

In Matter of N, 108 A.D.3d 551, 969 N.Y.S.2d 92 (2d Dept, 2013) an adoption proceeding pursuant to Domestic Relations Law article 7, the mother appealed from an order of the Family Court which, after a hearing, determined that her consent to the adoption of the child was not required pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 111(2)(a). In affirming the order the Appellate Division held that, the order appealed from was not rendered upon the mother's default. The mother appeared at all court dates except the last one, and her attorney participated in the hearing on the final date by reviewing the evidence and objecting to the proffered testimony. Accordingly, the mother could appeal from the order.

Paternity - Acknowledgment - Family Court Act § 516-a - Petition to Vacate an Acknowledgment of Paternity -

In Matter of Angelo A.R. v Tenisha N. W. ,108 A.D.3d 560, 969 N.Y.S.2d 107 (2d Dept,2013) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied the petition pursuant to Family Court Act § 516-a to vacate an acknowledgment of paternity. It observed that a party seeking to challenge an acknowledgment of paternity more than 60 days after its execution must prove that it was signed by reason of fraud, duress, or material mistake of fact (Family Ct. Act § 516-a[b][ii]). If the petitioner meets this burden, the court is required to conduct a further inquiry to determine whether the petitioner should be estopped, in accordance with the child's best interests, from challenging paternity. If the court concludes that estoppel is not warranted, the court is required to order genetic marker tests or DNA tests for the determination of paternity, and to vacate the acknowledgment of paternity in the event that the individual who executed the document is not the child's father.

The Appellate Division found that there was no dispute that the petitioner executed the acknowledgment of paternity based upon a material mistake of fact. Contrary to the petitioner's contention, however, the Family Court providently exercised its discretion in concluding that, nonetheless, he was equitably estopped from denying his paternity of the child, Mikayla R. The purpose of equitable estoppel "is to prevent someone from enforcing rights that would work injustice on the person against whom enforcement is sought and who, while justifiably relying on the opposing party's actions, has been misled into a detrimental change of position" (Matter of Shondel J. v. Mark D., 7 N.Y.3d 320, 326). Thus, a man who has held himself out to be the father of a child, so that a parent-child relationship developed between the two, may be estopped from denying paternity, in light of the child's justifiable reliance upon such representations, and the resulting harm that his denial of paternity would engender . The doctrine in this way protects the status interests of a child in an already recognized and operative parent-child relationship" In all cases, "the doctrine of equitable estoppel will be applied only where its use furthers the best interests of the child. The hearing evidence demonstrated that the petitioner, and Mikayla R.'s mother, along with Mikayla R. and the couple's older daughter, all lived together as a family for at least four years. During that time, the mother gave birth to another daughter as well. After the petitioner and the mother separated, the petitioner maintained overnight weekend visits with Mikayla R. and her two siblings at least once a month for approximately two years. At all relevant times, the petitioner held himself out as Mikayla R.'s father, and she recognized him as such. Under these circumstances, the Family Court properly determined that the petitioner was equitably estopped from denying paternity of Mikayla R., as there had been a recognized and operative parent-child relationship in existence for approximately six years.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Effect of Disciplinary Rules - 22 NYCRR 1400.2 (60 Day Billing Rule) - 22 NYCRR 1400.3 (Substantial Compliance) - Fees For Attorney for Child

In Mary E. v Usher E, 2013 WL 3814369 (N.Y.Sup.), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 51196(U) the wife commenced this divorce proceeding against the husband on May 18, 2010. The Court issued a written decision on February 25, 2013 (see Mary E. v. Usher E., 38 Misc.3d 1229(A), Slip Copy, 2013 WL 823322).

On March 1, 2013, the attorney for the children moved for an order of the Court directing, inter alia, enforcement of the orders of appointment, and immediate payment by plaintiff and defendant of the outstanding sums. The Court pointed out that on August 11, 2010, the Court appointed Ms. Bonaldes as attorney for the parties' three (3) minor female children on consent of both parties who were represented by privately retained counsel of their own choosing. The appointment order provided that the allocation of the financial responsibility between the parties for the attorney for the children's counsel fees would be determined on the adjourn date of August 18, 2010. At the court appearance on August 18, 2010, the Court found that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant was indigent and both parties were found capable of paying the hourly rate of $200.00 an hour. After an inquiry on the record regarding the parties' finances and ability to pay, the Court found that the parties should be financially responsible for the payment of the fees associated with the attorney for the children as follows: 20% by the plaintiff and 80% by the defendant. In her Affirmation in Support of her application, the attorney for the children averred that the plaintiff paid her 20% share ($400.00) and the defendant paid his 80% share ($1,600.00) of the initial retainer of $2,000.00 shortly after the Court issued the Amended Appointment Order on August 25, 2010. She averred that as of February 28, 2013, the parties were billed a total sum of $41,309.80 for legal services rendered for the children pursuant to the Court's August 25, 2010 appointment order. Of that $41,309.80, she averred that the plaintiff paid the sum of $2,850.00 and the defendant paid the sum of $6,480.00. In her Affirmation in Support of Cross Motion, dated February 28, 2013, the attorney for the children affirmed that, as of the last invoice sent to the parties, dated January 26, 2013, the parties' respective shares of the outstanding balance were as follows: $5,411.96 by the plaintiff and $26,597.84 by the defendant.

Supreme Court observed that the joint rules adopted by the Appellate Divisions relating to attorney conduct in domestic relations matters require that attorneys provide "an itemized bill on a regular basis at least every 60 days" which the attorney for the children had not done (22 NYCRR 1400.2). The Appellate Division, Second Department has held that attorney fees need not be denied "where there is substantial compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.3 (see Wagman v. Wagman, 8 AD3d 263, 777N.Y.S.2d 678 [2 Dept.,2004]). Whether or not a violation of 22 NYCRR 1400.2 vitiates the ability of an attorney to seek fees has been the subject of numerous appellate cases. The rule that emerges from a survey of the existing Appellate Division case law is that an attorney's "utter failure to abide by these rules" precludes the attorney from collecting fees, even if the services were already rendered but where there has been "substantial compliance" with the matrimonial rules, an attorney will be allowed to recover the fees owed for services rendered, but not yet paid for. Generally, the finding of a lack of substantial compliance has been based upon a complete, nearly complete or flagrant disregard for the applicable rules. On the other hand, a technical violation which does not undermine the underlying policy of protecting the public from known abuses in the field of matrimonial law will not prevent a recovery. The defendant did not object to the accounting in the bills sent but objects to the bills on the basis that they were not sent within the sixty (60) days provided for in the court appointment order and under 22 NYCRR 1400.2. The Court found credible the attorney for the children's representation that she did not submit itemized bills more frequently than every 60 days because she interpreted that portion of the Court's amended appointment order, dated August 25, 2010, providing that bills shall be sent "no less often than every 60 days from the date of this order" to mean that she must send bills to the parties more than 60 days apart. The attorney for the children annexed bills to her cross-motion dated January 7, 2011 (4 months after the appointment order); March 7, 2011 (2 months from previous bill); April 20, 2011 (less than 2 months from previous bill); July 12, 2011 (less than 2 months from previous bill); October 3, 2011 (3 months from previous bill); February 10, 2012 (3 months from previous bill); May 1, 2012 (2 months from previous bill); August 16, 2012 (3 months from previous bill); January 26, 2013 (4 months from previous bill). The Court noted that the attorney for the children sent bills approximately every two (2) to three (3) months, and that the defendant did not contest the attorney for the children's representation that he repeatedly represented through his counsel that he was actively seeking a loan in order to pay his outstanding balance to the attorney for the children. The Court found that the attorney for the children's technical violation of the sixty (60) day billing requirement did not rise to the level of "substantial noncompliance" and it would not preclude her from collecting the sum due and owing to her for legal services rendered to the parties' children pursuant to this Court's appointment order which was on consent of the parties through counsel. The attorney for the children's application seeking summary judgment on the issue of the balance due and owing in the sum of $35,971.06 was granted. The Court directed that if either of the parties fail to make payment within ten (10) days of service upon his or her counsel of this decision and order, the attorney may enter a judgment with the Clerk of the Court with costs and interest from said date, upon ten (10) days notice to the defaulting party, and without further application to this Court, for the amount due and owing, plus statutory costs and interest.

Maintenance - Award - Factors Considered - Need of the Defendant to Maintain a Separate Household and Have Money to Live on after Support Payments Are Made must Be Taken into Account by the Awarding Court

In Jaramillo v Jaramillo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3718079 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), Supreme Court directed the defendant husband to pay maintenance to the plaintiff of $2,000 per month for a period of six years and to pay $7,500 toward the plaintiff's counsel fees. The Appellate reversed and remitted. It observed that Supreme Court found that the defendant's net income was $62,567 annually, or $5,213.92 each month. After paying his monthly expenses, which the court found to be $3,818.80, the defendant would be left with $1,395.12 per month with which to pay maintenance and his child support obligation of $235.34 per week. Recognizing the fact that the need of the defendant to maintain a separate household and have money to live on after support payments are made must be taken into account by the awarding court the Appellate Division concluded that the court improvidently exercised its discretion in directing the defendant to pay maintenance to the plaintiff $2,000 per month. It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for a recalculation of the amount of the plaintiff's maintenance award. However, the Appellate Division also found, contrary to the defendant's contention, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in determining the duration of the maintenance award. Spousal support should be awarded for a duration that would provide the recipient with enough time to become self-supporting.

Children - Immigration - 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J) -Special Immigrant Juvenile Status - a Child Support Order Does Not Satisfy the Requirement for Special Immigrant Juvenile Status That a Child Be "Dependent on a Juvenile Court" (8 Usc § 1101[a][27][J][I]).

In re Hei Ting C.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3718750 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) a brother and sister appealed from orders of the Family Court in a child support proceeding, denying their petitions for the issuance of an order declaring that each of them was dependent on the Family Court, and making specific findings so as to enable them to petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status.

In an opinion by Justice Cohen the Appellate Division held that Family Court, after issuing a support order in a related child support proceeding, properly denied the petitions of a sister and brother for the issuance of orders declaring each of them to be dependent on the Family Court, and making the specific findings required to enable them to petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status pursuant to 8 USC § 1101(a)(27)(J).

The Court observed that a form of immigration status known as special immigrant juvenile status is now offered to a class of undocumented immigrant children, providing them with a gateway to lawful permanent residency in the United States. Before a child can petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for special immigrant juvenile status, a state court must first acquire jurisdiction and make certain declarations with respect to the child. Specifically at issue in this case was whether a child becomes dependent on a juvenile court within the meaning of the federal statute when one of the child's parents files a petition for child support upon which the Family Court enters an order of support. Although several decisions of this Court and the Appellate Division, First Department, have addressed the questions of whether a guardianship petition and an adoption proceeding satisfy the dependency prong for special findings relative to special immigrant juvenile status, answering both questions in the affirmative no appellate decisions in this State have addressed the question of whether an order issued by the Family Court that does not award or affect the custody of a child satisfies the dependency prong. The Court held that a child support order does not satisfy the requirement for special immigrant juvenile status that a child be "dependent on a juvenile court" (8 USC § 1101[a][27][J][i]).

Justice Cohen pointed out that in New York, a child may request that the Family Court, recognized as a juvenile court, issue an order making special findings and a declaration so that he or she may petition the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services for SIJS. Specifically, the findings of fact must establish that: (1) the child is under 21 years of age; (2) the child is unmarried; (3) the child is dependent upon a juvenile court or legally committed to an individual appointed by a State or juvenile court; (4) reunification with one or both parents is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis; and (5) it is not in the child's best interests to be returned to his or her home country (see 8 USC § 1101[a] [27] [J][ii]; 8 CFR 204.11[c]). With the declaration and special findings, the eligible child may then seek the consent of the Department of Homeland Security for SIJS (see 8 USC § 1101[a][27][J][iii]).

Hei Ting C. and Wai C., were a sister and brother who were born in Hong Kong. Their parents were divorced in Hong Kong in 2006, and the father and Wai moved to New York in the summer of 2008. Although the father was awarded full custody of the children, Hei Ting remained in Hong Kong with her mother until she finished the school year. Her mother refused to care for her, and Hei Ting alleges that she had to support herself using a credit card provided to her by her father. After completing the school year, Hei Ting relocated to New York to join her father and brother. Hei Ting and Wai currently lived in Queens with their father, and both children remained unmarried. Both Hei Ting and Wai described their mother as physically and verbally abusive. Although their mother also subsequently relocated to New York, they lived exclusively with their father and have little or no contact with her. They received no emotional or voluntary financial support from their mother. The father filed a petition pursuant to Family Court Act article 4 in the Family Court, seeking a support order on consent. In December 2011, the Family Court entered the requested support order on consent. Hei Ting and Wai then filed a joint motion, within the support proceeding, for the issuance of special findings necessary for them to obtain SIJS, arguing that the existence of a support order made them dependent upon the Family Court. At the time the motion was filed, they were both under the age of 21 and contended that reunification with their mother was not viable, as she was physically and emotionally abusive toward them. They also argued that it would not be in their best interests to return to Hong Kong, since their father, who was their source of care and support, was in the United States, and their return would remove them from further educational opportunities. There would also be no adults to take care of them in Hong Kong. In two orders dated December 20, 2011, made after a hearing, the Family Court, in effect, converted the motion to separate petitions for the issuance of special findings, and denied the petitions.

The Appellate Division held that in determining whether a child becomes "dependent on a juvenile court" for SIJS purposes when a child support order is entered, this Court must examine the facts of each particular case. While the appellants made well-reasoned arguments for allowing orders directing child support payments to satisfy the requirement for SIJS that a child be "dependent on a juvenile court" (8 USC s 1101[a][27][J][i]), the Court declined to adopt that position. The impetus behind the enactment of the SIJS scheme was to protect a child who is abused, abandoned, or neglected and to provide him or her with an expedited immigration process. The requirement that a child be dependent upon the juvenile court or, alternatively, committed to the custody of an individual appointed by a State or juvenile court, ensures that the process is not employed inappropriately by children who have sufficient family support and stability to pursue permanent residency in the United States through other, albeit more protracted, procedures. In this case, there had been no need for intervention by the Family Court to ensure that the appellants were placed in a safe and appropriate custody, guardianship, or foster care situation, and the appellants had not been committed to the custody of any individual by any court. While the appellants met all of the other requirements for SIJS, the Family Court correctly determined that the dependency requirement had not been satisfied. A child becomes dependent upon a juvenile court when the court accepts jurisdiction over the custody of that child, irrespective of whether the child has been placed in foster care or a guardianship situation. The Family Court has only granted applications for SIJS special findings where dependency upon the court was established by way of guardianship, adoption, or custody. It rejected the argument that their case is analogous to guardianship cases. However, as the Family Court correctly noted, "[a] child support application does not address custody issues, rather it addresses a parent's failure to pay child support to the custodial parent." Proceedings for child support involve litigation between the parents regarding the required financial responsibility each parent has with respect to the child (Family Ct Act § 413[1][a]). There are no determinations in a child support proceeding commenced pursuant to Family Court Act § 413 that relate to the actual guardianship and custody of the child.

Child Custody - UCCJEA - Domestic Relations Law §76-f [1] - Inconvenient Forum - the Inquiry Is Not Completed Merely by a Determination That a Jurisdictional Predicate Exists in the Forum State, for Then the Court must Determine Whether to Exercise its Jurisdiction

In Matter of Balde v. Barry, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3455610 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division found that the Family Court erred in determining that it lacked jurisdiction under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (Domestic Relations Law art 5-A). A New York Family Court has jurisdiction to make an initial custody determination if "(a) this state is the home state of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or was the home state of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from this state but a parent ... continues to live in this state" (Domestic Relations Law § 76[1][a])." 'Home state' means the state in which a child lived with a parent ... for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding" (Domestic Relations Law § 75-a[7]). Although the mother and the children had been living in Georgia since moving there in February or March 2011, they had resided in New York for at least six consecutive months prior to that move. Thus, the Family Court had jurisdiction over the father's visitation proceeding, commenced on February 17, 2011, because New York was the children's "home state" either on the date of commencement of the proceeding or within six months prior thereto. The inquiry is not completed merely by a determination that a jurisdictional predicate exists in the forum State, for then the court must determine whether to exercise its jurisdiction" (Vanneck v. Vanneck, 49 N.Y.2d 602, 609). A court of this state which has jurisdiction under the UCCJEA may decline to exercise it if it finds, upon consideration of certain enumerated factors, that New York is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum (Domestic Relations Law § 76-f [1]). While the Family Court did not consider the enumerated factors, the record was sufficient to permit the Court to consider and evaluate those factors and based on the record it found that New York was an inconvenient forum. The record demonstrated that, since February or March 2011, the children resided in the relatively distant state of Georgia, where the children had been enrolled in school and had connected with the mother's extended family. Most significantly, the evidence regarding their care, well-being, and personal relationships was more readily available in Georgia. Under these circumstances, Georgia was the more appropriate and convenient forum. Domestic Relations Law § 76-f(3) specifies that "[i]f a court of this state determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum, it shall stay the proceedings upon condition that a child custody proceeding be promptly commenced in another designated state." It remitted the matter to the Supreme Court for further proceedings pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 76-f(3), including the entry of an order staying all proceedings in the above-entitled proceeding on condition that a child custody proceeding be promptly commenced in Georgia.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Qdro and Retirement Benefits Cases - Appellate Division Rejects Argument That Supreme Court Should Have Ordered the Retirement System to Calculate "Retirement Allowance" as Being the "Hypothetical" Benefit Husband Would Have Received Based on His Years of Service as of the Date on Which the Divorce Action Was Commenced, Rather than as Being the Actual Benefit He Later Received upon Retirement.

In Loy v Loy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3770696 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), a postjudgment matrimonial proceeding, defendant appealed from a qualified domestic relations order (QDRO) that directed the New York State and Local Retirement System (retirement system) to pay his ex-wife her marital share of defendant's pension pursuant to the Majauskas formula (see Majauskas v. Majauskas, 61 N.Y.2d 481, 489-491). The Appellate Division rejected the defendant's argument that Supreme Court should have ordered the retirement system to calculate his "retirement allowance" as being the "hypothetical" benefit he would have received based on his years of service as of the date on which the divorce action was commenced, rather than as being the actual benefit he later received upon retirement. According to defendant, the QDRO entered by the court improperly awards plaintiff a portion of his separate property, i.e., the increases in his "retirement allowance" attributable to step increases and promotional increases in his pay that occurred after the date of commencement of the divorce action. It observed that the Court of Appeals stated in Majauskas, where the pension participant made a similar argument, the fact that a participant's three highest years of earnings may occur after divorce does affect the alternate payee's marital share of the pension benefits, "for as the Delaware Supreme Court held in Jerry L.C. v. Lucille H.C. [448 A.2d 223, 226], '[s]ince each employment year is counted for pension purposes each contributes to the high salary years' " (id. at 492). The cases relied upon by defendant were distinguishable because they involved defined contribution retirement plans, whereas here defendant has a defined benefit plan.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Judiciary Law § 475 - Charging Lien - Charging Lien Can Be Asserted Against Arrears of Child Support.

In Piccarretto v Mura, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3752137 (N.Y.Sup.) a post-divorce dispute, the wife sought to dismiss a charging lien against a child support obligation. The lien was asserted by her former counsel, who rigorously prosecuted the recovery action. A default divorce occurred in 1993, the husband was ordered to pay child support, and the court in 1993 awarded a judgment for $25,226.72 in unpaid child support. In 2012, the wife moved, originally in family court, to recover all the accumulated child support, which with accumulated interest, totaled $549,403.62 as of September 2011. The husband eventually moved to modify his on-going child support obligation based on his current income and the emancipation of his oldest son. In the midst of these legal steps, the husband sold a house and the court, through an order sought by the wife's counsel, allowed the wife to escrow the husband's share of the net proceeds, in anticipation of a final judgment for unpaid child support. During the course of the wife's pursuit of her ex-husband, wife's counsel applied for interim attorney fees. Wife's counsel sought the fees from the sequestered proceeds from the husband's sale of his real property. In an order issued July 12, 2012, the court granted fees of $15,000 to the wife's counsel and allowed this sum to be paid from the house proceeds, which were held in escrow by the husband's attorney. Husband's counsel argued that the fees, on their face, were the property of the husband. As a consequence, husband's counsel requested $5,000 in fees to cover the husband's legal expenses, or he would be without resources to finance a defense to the claims of the wife. The court granted that request as well. Importantly, at the time of the application for counsel fees, the court made no finding regarding the appropriate child support to be paid by the husband. There had been no determination what amount of the house sale proceeds were necessary to pay any child support arrears owed by the husband. The court had not heard proof on any claimed offsets against the child support obligation. During the midst of serious settlement negotiations, wife's counsel moved to withdraw, citing friction with his client and her failure to communicate with him. The attorney also sought judgment for fees in the amount $30,545.91, and a charging lien under Section 475 of the Judiciary Law against the house proceeds set aside by the court under its earlier order.

The wife retained new counsel, who cross-moved to dismiss the attorney's claim for a charging lien, and sought disgorgement of the sums advanced to both the wife's former counsel, and husband's counsel. The Supreme Court held that the lien was valid and denied the request for disgorgement.

Wife's new counsel argued that those sums were erroneously paid from the "wife's child support." Wife's new counsel claimed, inter alia, that the prior counsel cannot have a charging lien against child support, and cannot, under any circumstances, be paid attorney fees from the wife's child support. He argued that the former attorney did not create any "new funds" on which the charging lien under Section 475 of the Judiciary Law could attach because the entire amount owed to the wife was child support and no liens are permitted against child support.

Supreme Court held, inter alia, that while wife's current attorney claimed the former attorney "did not create an interest in anything," in fact, his legal work, after a delay of 16 years, had actually created the only available money to pay amounts owed by the husband to his wife. Prior to the former attorney's work, the wife had a 16-year-old judgment and a child support order, which she had never enforced against her former husband. But for the former attorney's work-just as the husband was selling his Ontario County house-the wife would now have no available funds to satisfy the child support obligation. It was undisputed that the former attorney's efforts to collect the judgment created a readily-available fund of house sale proceeds from which the wife might soon collect heretofore only illusory decades-old child support obligations owed by the husband.

Supreme Court pointed out that pursuant to Section 475 of the New York Judiciary Law the charging lien automatically came into existence, without notice or filing, upon commencement of the action to recover funds on behalf of the wife, and is measured by the reasonable value of the attorney's services in the action, unless fixed by agreement. In a matrimonial action, a charging lien is available only to the extent that an equitable distribution award reflects the creation of a new fund by an attorney greater than the value of the interests already held by the client. Several New York courts have held that an charging lien does not attach to maintenance or alimony. Theroux v. Theroux, 145 A.D.2d 625, 536 N.Y.S.2d 151 (2nd Dept.1988); Turner v. Woolworth, 221 N.Y. 425, 430, 117 N.E. 814 (1917); Indell v. Tabor, 185 N.Y. 873, 874-75 (1920). On the question of the charging lien asserted against child support, there is less judicial authority from New York's appeals courts. The Appellate Division, Fourth Department suggested that no retaining lien could be asserted against child support arrears. Schelter v. Schelter, 206 A.D.2d 865, 614 N.Y.S.2d 853, 854 (1994). But the Fourth Department's omission in Schelter v. Schelter to cite any then-existing New York authority, the acknowledged difference between the common law retaining lien and the broad reach of the statutorily-mandated charging lien in New York left the question undefined.

The Court noted that while the apparent substantial weight of judicial authority condemns charging liens against child support, the same courts almost uniformly acknowledge the unintended consequence of such a ban: attorneys will seldom be willing to assist parents in their collection efforts because there will be a diminished expectation of payment for their services. The court was chary about the inherent complication created by the conclusion in Shipman that an agreement between a parent and an attorney, in which the parent hires the attorney to recover child support arrears and in which the attorney seeks to recover the cost of collection from child support arrears is void as against public policy. This conclusion was impractical and troubling to the everyday business of this court. The court routinely encountered applications from unpaid parents of children, demanding child support arrears, often after service of a divorce complaint, and before the initial preliminary conference. The parents often have no independent means to fund the attorney's efforts to collect arrears. If the court held, as Shipman did, that such an agreement which contains an agreed charging lien against any collected sums is void, then, in this court's judgment, few attorneys-apart from pro bono efforts-would assist in that collection process. The court pointed out that the law requires that it be paid by the payor for the benefit of the child, but there is no law requiring it be spent by the recipient exclusively for the child. A parent, after receiving child support, can use the funds to pay any costs or any legal fees, even legal fees unrelated to their collection of support or any pending marital claim. She can elect to use the funds to pay off a credit card for dining expenses, or depart on a vacation. The recipient spouse can choose to pay the attorney from collected child support but the attorney cannot enforce his right to payment from the discretionary use of collected child support funds after they are collected. The court could not reconcile this inequitable result, which shifts the discretion to pay accrued fees solely to the client, and ignores the sweeping language of Section 475 of the Judiciary Law, which permits the charging lien to attach to any funds in "what ever hands they may come."In addition, the voiding of an attorney charging lien against child support would lead to the inevitable consequence that: lawyers, faced with no prospect for recovery of fees from child support arrears, will simply decline to assist indigent or less wealthy parents who are owed child support. For these reasons the court declines to follow the reasoning in Shipman v. City of New York Collection Unit and it declared the retainer agreement and the agreement to permit a charging lien between the wife and her former attorney void.

To determine what portion of such proceeds may be utilized to pay the charging lien, the court adopts a comparable analysis from Balanoff v. Niosi, 16 A.D.3d 53, 791 N.Y.S.2d 553 (2nd Dept.2005) where the court laid out the protocol for determination of the wife's reasonable requirements, as a judgment debtor and the attorney's right to collect his fees pursuant to CPLR 5205(d). The court elected to abide by CPLR 5226, and the holding in Balanoff v. Niosi, and proceed to a calculation of the children's reasonable requirements via an installment payment plan. In Balanoff v. Niosi, the court, having concluded that the attorney-creditor had not pursued the proper method for determining the amount of his claim, nonetheless, held that the attorney was permitted, without prejudice, to apply for an installment payment order pursuant to CPLR 5226. The court held that the amounts held in escrow shall remain in escrow. The former attorney for the wife may file such a proceeding within 20 days of the order. He must raise the issue of the children's reasonable requirements in his motion papers and the burden then shifts to the wife or the children to establish "reasonable requirements" of the children. If there is an amount in excess of the children's reasonable requirements, the attorney may access payment of that surplus from the escrow account through his charging lien.

Appellate Division, Second Department

Grandparent Visitation - DRL §72 - Standing - No Standing Where Grandparents Failed to Demonstrate That Either or Both of the Parents, Who Divorced in 2011, Terminated or Frustrated Their Visitation with Their Grandson

In Bender v Bender,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3198404 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) on February 10, 2012, the appellants commenced a proceeding pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 72 for visitation with their then-10-year-old grandson, who was the son of their daughter, the respondent Lisa Cendali (mother), and the respondent John Cendali (parents). The Supreme Court, in effect, denied the petition and dismissed the proceeding on the ground that the appellants lacked standing to seek visitation since they failed to show that conditions exist in which equity would see fit to intervene (Domestic Relations Law § 72[1]).

The Appellate Division affirmed. In a grandparent visitation proceeding, "the burden of establishing standing lies with the grandparent and it is 'conferred by the court, in its discretion, only after it has examined all the relevant facts' " (Matter of Roberts v. Roberts, 81 AD3d 1117, 1118, quoting Matter of Emanuel S. v. Joseph E., 78 N.Y.2d 178, 182). In determining whether grandparents have standing or a right to be heard on a petition for visitation with a grandchild, the essential components to the inquiry are the "nature and extent of the grandparent-grandchild relationship" (Matter of Emanuel S. v. Joseph E., 78 N.Y.2d at 182) and "the nature and basis of the parents' objection to visitation". "The evidence necessary will vary in each case but what is required of grandparents must always be measured against what they could reasonably have done under the circumstances". A hearing to determine the issue of standing is not necessary where the submitted papers do not raise a triable issue of fact (see Matter of Lipton v. Lipton, 98 AD3d 621, 622). Here, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in, in effect, denying the petition and dismissing the proceeding. While it was undisputed that the appellants had enjoyed a relationship with their grandson since his birth, they failed to demonstrate that either or both of the parents, who divorced in 2011, terminated or frustrated their visitation with their grandson. It was undisputed that the appellants had visitation with their grandson on February 4, 2012, just six days before commencing this proceeding. Regarding that particular visit, although the appellants were upset that they received only Saturday visitation instead of the customary overnight alternate weekend visitation, the mother represented that she encouraged and supported the grandparent-grandchild relationship and had no intention of depriving the appellants of visitation with their grandson, although sometimes schedules may conflict, necessitating changes. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in, in effect, denying the petition and dismissing the proceeding on the ground of lack of standing.

Family Court - Family Offenses - Family Ct Act §812 - Order of Protection - Granted - Petitioner Established Harassment in the Second Degree (Penal Law 240.26 by Showing Respondent Shoved the Petitioner, Causing Her to Fall Backwards onto the Floor .

In Matter of Kostatine v Kostatine, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3198436 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division reversed, on the facts, an order which denied petitioner an order of protection, granted the petition and remitted to the Family Court, for the entry of an appropriate order of protection. It found that the record did not support the Family Court's determination that the petitioner failed to prove the family offense of harassment in the second degree. In order to establish that the respondent committed that offense, the petitioner was required to show that "with the intent to harass, annoy or alarm" her, the respondent struck, shoved, kicked or otherwise subjected her to "physical contact" or attempted or threatened to do so (Penal Law TM 240.26). The credible evidence demonstrated that the respondent, whose father owned the petitioner's apartment, came to the petitioner's apartment in his capacity as his father's employee, and demanded that she vacate the apartment for failure to pay rent. When the petitioner refused, and threatened to call the police, the respondent shoved the petitioner, causing her to fall backwards onto the floor. Thus, the evidence demonstrated that the respondent shoved the petitioner with the intent to alarm her, so as to encourage her to vacate the apartment as he demanded. Accordingly, the family offense petition should have been granted.

Foreign Divorce - Unilateral - Recognition - Comity - Pakistan Muslim Divorce (Obtained by Performing Talaq and Providing Written Notice of the Pronouncement of Talaq) Recognized.

In Siddiqui v Siddiqui, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3199064 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the plaintiff and the defendant were married in Pakistan in 1994 and subsequently moved to the United States. In 2005, the defendant commenced divorce proceedings in New York. The plaintiff alleged that while the divorce proceedings were pending in New York, the defendant, purportedly without her knowledge, obtained a divorce by performing talaq in Pakistan. Under Pakistan's Muslim Family Laws Ordinance, a man may obtain a divorce by performing talaq, which consists of stating or writing three times that the man is divorcing his wife, and following various other procedures. In particular, written notice of the pronouncement of talaq must be given to a certain Pakistani governmental official, and a copy of such notice must be provided to the wife. The divorce will be given effect by the Pakistani government upon the expiration of 90 days from the day on which such notice was delivered to the governmental official. A woman does not have a right to talaq without her husband's permission.

In June 2008, after obtaining the foreign divorce, the defendant withdrew the divorce pleadings in New York. He subsequently remarried in July 2009. In August 2010, more than two years after the parties were divorced under Pakistani law, the plaintiff commenced this action for a judgment declaring that the foreign divorce was void and unenforceable and that the defendant's subsequent remarriage was void, bigamous, and illegal. The plaintiff moved for summary judgment declaring that the foreign divorce was void, and the defendant cross-moved, for summary judgment dismissing the complaint. The Supreme Court denied the plaintiff's motion and granted the defendant's cross motion.

The Appellate Division affirmed but limited its holding to the particular facts and circumstances of this case. The defendant set forth evidence in the form of, inter alia, an affidavit of service of the foreign divorce decree which established that the plaintiff was, at the very least, notified of the foreign divorce several weeks before it was given effect by the Pakistani government, but did not challenge the validity of the divorce until more than two years later. In the interim, the defendant, in reliance on the divorce, remarried. Moreover, the foreign divorce obtained by the defendant simply terminated the parties' marriage, while the parties had filed petitions in the Family Court to determine issues of child custody, maintenance, and child support (cf. Aleem v. Aleem, 404 Md 404). Under these particular circumstances, the plaintiff was not entitled to the declaratory relief she seeks. The Court stated that it expressed no opinion on the issue of whether the foreign divorce was fundamentally offensive to the public policy of this State.

Child Support - Award - Family Court Act § 413(1) - Family Ct Act § 424-a [a] - Requirement of Financial Disclosure - Order of Support Affirmed in the Absence of Complete Financial Disclosure Where Reliable Evidence Otherwise Appeared on the Face of the Record

In Matter of Mata v Nebesnik, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3213688 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Petitioner (father) and respondent (mother) were the parents of one daughter (born in 2005). Pursuant to a November 2007 order of support, the father was required to pay $275 per month in child support and to provide health insurance for the child through his employment. The parties commenced competing modification proceedings-with the father seeking a downward modification of his child support obligation based upon his inability to work due to the severe injuries he suffered in a December 2011 automobile accident. Both parties subsequently filed sworn financial disclosure affidavits without the required paycheck stubs and recent income tax returns (Family Ct Act § 424-a [a]). Following an April 2012 hearing, a Support Magistrate granted the father's petition, reducing his child support obligation to $25 per month and ordering that health insurance for the child continue to be provided by the mother's husband. The mother's written objections were denied by Family Court.

The Appellate Division affirmed. Although Family Court was entitled to deny the father's requested relief based upon his failure to comply with Family Ct Act § 424-a, the Appellate Division pointed out that it has approved orders of support in the absence of complete financial disclosure where reliable evidence otherwise has appeared on the face of the record. Here, the father's sworn statement of net worth and testimony, the latter of which was subject to examination by the Support Magistrate and cross-examination by the mother, was sufficient to demonstrate the requisite change in circumstances. Accordingly, it did not find that Family Court abused its discretion in granting the requested modification.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - QDRO and Retirement Benefits Cases - Fact That Husband Elected Pension Option That Provided the Wife with One-half His Monthly Amount If He Predeceased Her, Which Results in a Current Lower Monthly Payment, Is Not a Sufficient Reason to Award the Wife less than 50% of the Current Monthly Payment.

In Bellizzi v Bellizzi--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3213711 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in June 1969, and they had three children, all of whom were adults. Plaintiff (husband) commenced a divorce action in October 2008 that was dismissed following a trial (Bellizzi v. Bellizzi, 82 AD3d 1541, 1542 [2011]) and this second divorce action was commenced in November 2011. Both parties were in their mid-60s, have had serious health issues, were retired and received Social Security (the husband $1,648 per month and the wife $1,137 per month). In the second action, they stipulated that a divorce would be granted pursuant to recently enacted Domestic Relations Law § 170(7). After trial the wife received the marital home ($270,000), a retirement account ($7,798.62) and part of the cash in bank accounts ($20,093.25), for a total value of $297,891.87; (The wife was also found to have separate property of about $74,000, reflecting the value of an inheritance from her family.. and the husband received retirement accounts ($172,485.83) and part of the cash in bank accounts ($65,969.66), for a total value of $238,455.49. Significantly, the husband also has two pensions in pay status; one for service in the Air Force of $1,689 per month and a New York State pension of $6,818 per month. Supreme Court made no distribution of his two pensions, but treated them as income streams for purposes of maintenance, which was made nondurational and set at $2,800 per month. The court further determined in its February 2012 decision that, although the wife was entitled to retroactive maintenance from January 2009 for a total of $103,600 (37 months), the husband was entitled to credits for payments already made of $131,000 and, thus, he did not owe retroactive maintenance. The wife's application for counsel fees was denied and the husband's application for an order of protection was granted.

The Appellate Division pointed out that there is no requirement that each item of marital property be distributed equally and the trial court has discretion in fashioning a division of property . However, relative parity was appropriate here in light of the 40-plus years of marriage and no factors justifying an unequal distributive award. It found persuasive the wife's argument that the husband's pay status government pensions should have been equitably distributed rather than simply treated as an income stream for purposes of maintenance. It noted that care must be taken to avoid double counting of the interdependent issues of distribution of a pension and maintenance , and there may be situations where maintenance would be more appropriate. Nonetheless, maintenance looks to factors and implicates discretion, which permitted Supreme Court in this case to arrive at a monthly amount less than the monthly value of the pensions. Under the circumstances, awarding a percentage of the pay status pensions more accurately and equitably reflected the value to the wife of these assets earned during the long-term marriage.

The Court held that the husband's state pension was earned entirely during the marriage and, accordingly, the wife should receive 50% of the monthly payment. The fact that the husband elected an option at the time of his retirement that provided the wife with one-half his monthly amount if he predeceased her, which results in a current lower monthly payment, is not a sufficient reason to award the wife less than 50% of the current monthly payment. The military pension was earned as a result of the husband's full-time active duty and also part-time service from 1966 to 1993. The husband testified that the pension was based on a point system with a larger number of points earned during an active duty year as opposed to a part-time duty year. The husband related that he was commissioned in July 1966, commenced active duty in February 1968, ended active duty and joined the reserves in September 1973, and separated from service in December 1993. Although approximately 75% of active duty and 90% of part-time service ostensibly occurred during the marriage and it appeared that the wife should receive about 40% to 45% of that pension, the record was not sufficiently complete regarding when and how points were earned toward the husband's military pension. Accordingly, it remitted to Supreme Court to determine the percentage after considering submission of relevant proof on that issue. The Court indicated that since the wife received almost $60,000 more than the husband in the distribution of the other primary marital assets and she had been receiving reasonable monthly maintenance, the pension distribution need not be retroactive under the circumstances and the amounts shall apply prospectively from the date of this decision.

The Appellate Division held that as conceded by the wife and necessary to avoid double-counting, her maintenance shall cease upon the pension distribution taking effect since those pensions were the primary source of the husband's income upon which maintenance was calculated. This rendered academic the wife's contention that the maintenance award was inadequate, except to the extent that she sought an increase for purposes of retroactive maintenance and also sought retroactivity to a date earlier than set by Supreme Court. Since the record reflected that the wife first requested maintenance two months earlier than found by Supreme Court it held that the proper amount of retroactive maintenance should have been $109,200.

Although Supreme Court credited the husband with payments of $131,000 against the retroactive maintenance, the Court found merit in the wife's assertion that this included amounts that predated the first action. The record revealed that $78,500 of those payments were made for various matters between June 2007 and September 2008, before commencement of the first matrimonial action or any request for an order regarding temporary maintenance. Thus, the husband should have been permitted a credit of $52,500, resulting in retroactive maintenance owed of $56,700. It remitted to Supreme Court to fashion the manner in which this retroactive amount should be paid (i.e., length of time and amount of payments or lump sum).

The Court pointed out that directing a party to make a former spouse the beneficiary of a life insurance policy generally rests in the trial court's discretion, and in light of, among other things, the fact that the wife would continue to receive one-half the husband's considerable state pension if he predeceases her, Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to require the husband to make the wife the beneficiary of his life insurance policies.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order of Support Magistrate- Family Court Lacks Authority to Review Order to Which No Objections Had Been Filed. Power of Family Court to Review Order and Make its "Own Findings of Fact" Does Not Extend to Matters to Which Respondent Did Not Object.

In Matter of Hubbard v Barber, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3213808 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were the divorced parents of two children, born in 1998 and 2002. A separation agreement was incorporated but not merged into their divorce judgment, and resolved all issues of custody, visitation and child support. Respondent (father) specifically agreed to pay weekly child support to petitioner (mother), as well as one half of certain expenses related to the children.

The mother filed a modification petition that the Support Magistrate dismissed, without prejudice, as failing to detail how changed circumstances warranted a support modification. She filed a second petition and, following a hearing, the Support Magistrate issued an order finding that a sufficient change in circumstances had occurred and altering the father's support obligation in various respects. The father filed objections to the order, contending that documents related to his 2011 tax return should have been considered in calculating his support obligation and seeking "clarification" as to the relationship between that obligation and his right to visitation. Despite those discrete and specific objections, Family Court embarked upon a "full review" of the two modification petitions and determined that both should have been dismissed.

The Appellate Division reversed. It pointed out that it is well established that "an order from a Support Magistrate is final and Family Court's review under Family Ct Act § 439(e) is tantamount to appellate review and requires specific objections for issues to be preserved" (Matter of Commissioner of Social Servs. v. Segarra, 78 N.Y.2d 220, 222 n1 [1991]). Family Court therefore lacked the authority to review the order dismissing the mother's first modification petition, to which no objections had been filed. The father did lodge objections to the order granting the second modification petition, which entitled Family Court to review that order and make its "own findings of fact". That power, however, did not extend to matters to which the father had not objected. The order was reversed and remitted so that Family Court could conduct an appropriately limited review and resolve the specific objections lodged by the father.

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Marital Residence - Exclusive Possession of the Marital Residence to the Wife, Where She Was Custodial Parent Child and Immediate Sale Would Not Have Resulted in Proceeds to Be Distributed.

In Cornish v Cornish, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3213848 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1991 and had three children (born in 1991, 1994 and 1997). In 2010, plaintiff (husband) commenced an action for divorce. After custody was resolved Supreme Court, among other things, granted the wife exclusive possession of the marital residence until the youngest child's 21st birthday, ordered the wife to pay $100 per week in maintenance for one year and child support of $59.09 per week, awarded the husband 30% of the wife's pension and equitably distributed the parties' marital assets and debts.

The Appellate Division affirmed the award of exclusive possession of the marital residence to the wife. The wife was the custodial parent of the parties' youngest child and was financially able to pay the mortgage and meet the other maintenance costs of the residence. At the time of trial, the father was living rent-free with his parents, and the marital residence was encumbered by tax liens and the mortgage such that an immediate sale would not have resulted in proceeds to be distributed.

It rejected the husband's argument that Supreme Court erred in allocating the parties' outstanding income tax liability, which was attributable in part to the wife's earnings and in part to distributions received by the husband from an inheritance that was his separate property. Each party presented expert testimony as to the appropriate allocation of this liability. The court agreed with the husband's expert that the allocation proposed by the wife's expert imposed a lower marginal tax rate on the wife's earnings than on the husband's inheritance income. Nonetheless, this favorable treatment was deemed appropriate as the wife's earnings were marital income that had provided the family's primary means of support throughout the marriage, while the husband's inheritance was "fortuitously" acquired as separate property and was exhausted after several years of withdrawals.

With regard to the equitable distribution of the parties' credit card debt, while the record reflected that the debt was largely incurred to meet household expenses, there was also evidence that the husband frequently used the parties' credit cards to make unnecessary purchases. Thus, given the long duration of the marriage, the sources of the debt and the parties' relative earning capacities, it found no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court's equal distribution of this debt between the parties.

The Court rejected the husband's argument that Supreme Court should have awarded him one half of the wife's pension. The record indicated that the parties' arrangement was for the husband to take on the responsibilities of homemaker and primary caretaker of the children while the wife provided financial support for the family, but it further revealed that the husband's alcoholism interfered with his ability to contribute to the household and that his parents provided a substantial amount of the children's care. The wife testified that, after the children had attained school age, she repeatedly asked the husband to find employment or return to school. Despite the family's financial difficulties and reliance upon financial assistance from the husband's mother, the husband refused. Thus, there was no abuse of discretion in Supreme Court's award of 30% of the pension to the husband in light of his limited contribution to the economic partnership of this marriage.

Given the length of the marriage and the husband's role as caretaker of the children and home, an award of maintenance was appropriate. However, there was scant evidence that the husband sacrificed educational or career opportunities in favor of his role in the family. The husband refused to seek employment or further his education after the parties' children were in school, despite the wife's requests that he do so and the family's financial distress. He refused to take advantage of several opportunities to advance his education, including utilizing tuition credits available through the wife's employment. The record reveals that the husband had stopped drinking before the divorce, had no mental or physical barriers to employment, and was operating an eBay business at the time of trial. Although he provided no accounting of this business, his statement of net worth reflected an income level that could not be attributed to his newspaper delivery job, maintenance and child support alone. It found no error in the amount of annual income that Supreme Court imputed to the husband.

The Court held that Supreme Court did not abuse its discretion in precluding the husband's testimony regarding his search for employment, as he failed to provide a meaningful response to the wife's interrogatory concerning this issue or a reasonable excuse for this failure. The record also supported the court's finding that the family's financial stability before the divorce was "illusory" and that their relatively high standard of living resulted in large part from spending beyond their means.

Similarly, the child support award was appropriate based upon the income imputed to the parties and was consistent with the provisions of the Child Support Standards Act Domestic Relations Law § 240[1-b]). However, as the parties stipulated that the wife would pay maintenance and child support through the Chemung County child support collection unit rather than directly to the husband, the order was modified to provide for such payment in the manner directed by that entity.

The husband's counsel was hired as substitute counsel in April 2010, after the statement of net worth was filed, but his counsel did not file a retainer agreement until after Supreme Court ordered him to do so in September 2010. The record thus supported the court's determination that the husband's counsel failed to substantially comply with 22

NYCRR 1400.3 and was precluded from seeking a fee (see Bentz v. Bentz, 71 AD3d 931, 931-932 [2010]).

Finally, the Court observed that it is the responsibility of the party seeking the qualified domestic relations order to submit such order to the court on notice. Accordingly, the order appealed from was modified to direct that the husband shall submit a qualified domestic relations order to Supreme Court.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Child Support - Award - Shared Custody - Where Neither Parent Has Children for a Majority of the Time, Party with Higher Income Deemed to Be Noncustodial Parent for Purposes of Child Support, Despite Fact He Is Awarded Sole Custody. Court Is Required to State Reasons for Denial of Counsel Fee Request.

In Leonard v Leonard, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3242643 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.), a matrimonial action, the Appellate Division agreed with the defendant that the court erred in awarding child support to plaintiff who had sole legal custody of the children but the residency schedule afforded the parents equal time with the children, and that the court instead should have awarded child support to her. It observed that the case law holds that in shared residency arrangements, where neither parent has the children for a majority of the time, the party with the higher income is deemed to be the noncustodial parent for purposes of child support. The residency schedule afforded the parties equal time with the children, and neither party has the children for the majority of the time. Inasmuch as plaintiff's income exceeded that of defendant-at the time of trial, plaintiff earned $134,924.48 annually, while the JHO imputed income of $25,000 to defendant, whose actual earnings were $14,109.53-plaintiff was the "noncustodial" parent and, as such, he was required to pay child support to defendant. Here, unlike the cases where there is joint legal custody, the father was awarded sole legal custody; that fact should not affect the child support determination. Although the award of sole legal custody to plaintiff allowed him to make important decisions in the children's lives, that decision-making authority does not increase his child-related costs. A parent's child-related costs are dictated by the amount of time he or she spends with the children, and, here, plaintiff spent no more time with the children than did defendant.

The Court also agreed with the defendant that the JHO failed to set forth the required reasons for the denial of her request for an award of counsel fees, and that the provision concerning counsel fees must therefore be vacated. There is a "rebuttable presumption that counsel fees shall be awarded to the less monied spouse" (Domestic Relations Law § 237[a]), and defendant was the less monied spouse. The JHO was thus required to articulate why defendant was not entitled to an award of counsel fees. It reversed that part of the judgment and remitted to Supreme Court to articulate its reasons for its denial of an award of counsel fees to defendant or, in the alternative, to reconsider its determination.

Editors Note: In Rubin v. Salla, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1681220 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the First Department rejected the rule that in an equally shared custody case the parent who has the greater income should be considered the noncustodial parent for purposes of support.

Appeal - Child Custody - Changed Circumstances During Pendency of Appeal - Order Reversed Where Changed Circumstances and Record No Longer Sufficient.

In Matter of Kennedy v Kennedy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3242675 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Petitioner father and the Attorney for the Children appealed from an order that awarded primary physical custody of the parties' two children to respondent mother. The Appellate Division decision stated that it was advised of facts and circumstances that had changed during the pendency of the appeal, and it therefore concluded that "the record before us is no longer sufficient for determining [the mother's] fitness and right" to primary physical custody of the children (Matter of Michael B., 80 N.Y.2d 299, 318). Specifically, in deciding the custody issue in the mother's favor, the court relied on evidence that the mother had become self-supporting and was living in her own apartment. It was now informed that the mother has since lost her job and her apartment and had moved in with her own mother. It therefor reversed the order and remitted the matter to Family Court for an expedited hearing on the issue whether the alleged change of circumstances affected the best interests of the children.

Equitable Distribution - Factors Considered - (12) Wasteful Dissipation of Assets by Either Spouse
- Wife Who Squandered Assets Had No Legal or Equitable Interest in What Was Now Plaintiff's Separate Property Acquired as a Result of Parties 2003 Oral Asset Division, and Was Awarded No Portion of the Plaintiff's Current Assets.

In Christoper C. v Bonnie C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3213082 (N.Y.Sup.) the divorce action was transferred to the Model Integrated Guardianship Part. The matrimonial case was commenced on January 27, 2009 by the plaintiff, Christopher C., against his wife, Bonnie C. During the course of that proceeding, after it became apparent that Mrs. C. was having difficulty processing issues and assisting her attorney, the judge suggested that an Article 81 Guardianship proceeding be initiated. Thereafter, in February 2011, the defendant's brother Ronnie Atanasio filed an Article 81 petition seeking to be appointed as the guardian for his sister. On March 30, 2011, the Court conducted a guardianship hearing at which the defendant readily acknowledged her need for a guardian. After the hearing, the Court, with Mrs. C.'s consent, appointed the defendant's brother as her guardian. The guardian was given, inter alia, the power to participate in the divorce proceeding and to decide whether to negotiate a settlement or proceed to trial.

The Supreme Court observed that the Model Integrated Guardianship Part was established in 2005 by then Chief Judge Judith Kaye to extend the "one-family one-judge" approach successfully employed in Integrated Domestic Violence Parts to guardianship cases. The Model Part hears all court cases involving the alleged incapacitated person (i.e.: foreclosure actions, summary eviction proceedings, civil forfeiture proceedings, felony and misdemeanor criminal proceedings [including elder abuse], matrimonial actions, and any matter involving an order of protection) once a guardian has been appointed. While a guardian ad litem can be appointed in a matrimonial case to assist a party suffering from a mental or emotional difficulty, a guardian ad litem can only serve as an advisor to the party. A guardian (appointed pursuant to Mental Hygiene Law Article 81), however, can be given any power that the individual himself or herself possesses. This could include the power to decide whether to negotiate a settlement or proceed to trial in the matrimonial action.

The evidence at trial established that the parties were married on October 19, 1990. The plaintiff was currently 51 years old and the defendant was currently 56 years old. In 1990, the plaintiff suffered a back injury from a fall. In 1996 he was found by the Department of Social Services to be permanently partially disabled. He remained out of work from the time of his injury until 2000 when he became employed at L'egent International (defendant's brother's company) selling women's accessories. Since the time of his back injury, the plaintiff alleges he has lived in constant pain. The plaintiff stopped working for L'egent in 2008 and has not worked since. The defendant also worked at L'egent International from 2000-2003. She eventually was promoted and ran all overseas operations including purchasing, shipments and tracking. The parties lived a lavish lifestyle from 2000 to 2003. Together they had owned financial investments worth over one million dollars, a 50% interest in a beach house on Dune Road in West Hampton Beach worth approximately $3,000,000.00, a 50% interest in a 48-foot Sea Ray boat purchased in 1999 for $635,000.00, and Rolex watches worth over $22,000.00. The plaintiff testified that his income dropped in August of 2008 when he stopped working for L'egent and became unemployed. Since that time, he paid his living expenses by drawing on two home equity loans established in 2006 and 2007, one for $145,714.00 and the other for $129,377.00, respectively.

The defendant apparently suffered from a variety of mental and emotional issues which her attorney and guardian argued had prevented her from presenting a cogent explanation for her past conduct. Although the defendant now vehemently denied any mental health issues, her conduct both on and off the witness stand established the contrary. Determining the full extent and nature of the defendant's mental and/or emotional problems was extremely difficult given the fact that she consented to the guardianship, thereby obviating the need for a determination on the issue of her incapacity. Also, there was no medical or expert testimony offered concerning the state of the defendant's mental health. Thus, the court was left to rely on its own observations of the defendant's bizarre behavior during the trial, the defendant's squandering of over one million dollars in assets from 2003 to the present, her demonstrated lack of impulse control, and her consent to have a guardian appointed for her property, to discern the level of impairment caused by her mental and emotional difficulties.

The court found that the credible evidence established that the defendant had not worked since 2003 and was currently unable to do so due to her severe emotional and mental deficiencies. There was no evidence that the defendant received any income or has filed any individual tax returns after 2006. Her only reliable source of income was social security disability which she claimed was $742.00 per month.

The plaintiff failed to present persuasive or competent proof of any present impairment that precluded employment. Although the plaintiff did not appear to have sufficient income, without working, to maintain the high standard of living he currently enjoyed and at the same time pay lifetime maintenance, he was responsible to support his wife who, the evidence established, could not support herself. This might necessitate that he become employed again. It was clear that the goal of economic independence is not a realistic one for this defendant given her mental and emotional difficulties.

The defendant had no assets of value and she squandered over $1,000,000.00 between 2003 and the present. In 2011, the defendant filed for bankruptcy protection and was subsequently discharged. The credible evidence established that the plaintiff and defendant stopped living together in January 2003. At that time, when there was no question as to the defendant's capacity, the parties went to an attorney for assistance in dividing their assets. According to Mr. C., the attorney advised them that there was no need to reduce the agreement to writing. Thus, no written agreement was made. Their broker, a financial planner for Oppenheimer, testified that he was directed in a written letter signed by both parties in 2003, to divide all of the parties' brokerage accounts equally. The witness indicated that each party received approximately $575,000.00. The parties' financial planner further testified that after the division of assets, pursuant to Mrs. C.'s direction, he began to transfer funds out of her personal brokerage account. Some monies were transferred to Mr. Koplan, the gentleman with whom the defendant resided at that time, while other sums were transferred into the defendant's personal bank account. The broker testified that Mrs. C. also had the broker transfer money directly to various family members and friends. In addition, the defendant purchased a timeshare, a deli and a mobile home. The broker testified that although he warned the defendant, she continued to deplete her assets. The defendant also purchased a home in Lindenhurst and a 50% interest in a home in Quogue. The credible evidence established that the Lindenhurst home was currently in foreclosure. No evidence regarding the Quogue home's value had been submitted. Both homes were purchased with Mrs. C.'s remaining assets after the parties' 2003 separation. The Court found that the defendant had no legal or equitable interest in what was now the plaintiff's separate property acquired as a result of the parties 2003 asset division, and that defendant would receive no portion of the plaintiff's current assets. The court noted that it was not requiring the plaintiff to divide his brokerage accounts with the defendant as she had requested, nor was the Court granting the defendant an equitable interest in the former marital residence. The Court was, however, determined that under the circumstances presented here, in particular the defendant's inability to be self-supporting, it was necessary for the defendant to receive permanent maintenance.

The Court ordered that plaintiff pay non-durational permanent maintenance to the defendant of $2,500.00 per month until the defendant was eligible to receive full social security benefits, the defendant's remarriage or the death of either party, beginning July 10, 2013, and by the 10th of each month thereafter; and directed plaintiff is directed to pay the defendant's attorney's fees of $37,506.64 in addition to the amount of $22,664.95 as previously awarded to the defendant for attorney's fees, to the defendant's attorney.

Supreme Court Holds Defense of Marriage Act Unconstitutional as a Deprivation of the Equal Liberty of Persons That Is Protected by the Fifth Amendment

In United States v. Windsor, ___ U.S. ___ (2013) the State of New York recognized the marriage of New York residents Edith Windsor and Thea Spyer, who wed in Ontario, Canada, in 2007. When Spyer died in 2009, she left her entire estate to Windsor. Windsor sought to claim the federal estate tax exemption for surviving spouses, but was barred from doing so by §3 of the federal Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), which amended the Dictionary Act—a law providing rules of construction for over 1,000 federal laws and the whole realm of federal regulations—to define “marriage” and “spouse” as excluding same-sex partners. Windsor paid $363,053 in estate taxes and sought a refund, which the Internal Revenue Service denied. Windsor brought a refund suit, contending that DOMA violates the principles of equal protection incorporated in the Fifth Amendment. While the suit was pending, the Attorney General notified the Speaker of the House of Representatives that the Department of Justice would no longer defend §3's constitutionality. In response, the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group (BLAG) of the House of Representatives voted to intervene in the litigation to defend §3's constitutionality. The District Court permitted the intervention. On the merits, the court ruled against the United States, finding §3 unconstitutional and ordering the Treasury to refund Windsor's tax with interest. The Second Circuit affirmed.

The United States Supreme Court in an opinion delivered by Justice Kennedy, in which Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, joined, held that DOMA was unconstitutional as a deprivation of the equal liberty of persons that is protected by the Fifth Amendment. By history and tradition the definition and regulation of marriage has been treated as being within the authority and realm of the separate States. Congress has enacted discrete statutes to regulate the meaning of marriage in order to further federal policy, but DOMA, with a directive applicable to over 1,000 federal statutes and the whole realm of federal regulations, has a far greater reach. Its operation is also directed to a class of persons that the laws of New York, and of 11 other States, have sought to protect. Assessing the validity of that intervention requires discussing the historical and traditional extent of state power and authority over marriage. Subject to certain constitutional guarantees, see, e.g., Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1, "regulation of domestic relations" is "an area that has long been regarded as a virtually exclusive province of the States," Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U. S. 393. The significance of state responsibilities for the definition and regulation of marriage dates to the Nation's beginning; for "when the Constitution was adopted the common understanding was that the domestic relations of husband and wife and parent and child were matters reserved to the States," Ohio ex rel. Popovici v. Agler, 280 U. S. 379–384. Marriage laws may vary from State to State, but they are consistent within each State. DOMA rejects this long-established precept. The State's decision to give this class of persons the right to marry conferred upon them a dignity and status of immense import. But the Federal Government uses the state-defined class for the opposite purpose—to impose restrictions and disabilities. The question was whether the resulting injury and indignity was a deprivation of an essential part of the liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment, since what New York treats as alike the federal law deems unlike by a law designed to injure the same class the State seeks to protect. New York's actions were a proper exercise of its sovereign authority. They reflected both the community's considered perspective on the historical roots of the institution of marriage and its evolving understanding of the meaning of equality.

The Court held that by seeking to injure the very class New York seeks to protect, DOMA violates basic due process and equal protection principles applicable to the Federal Government. The Constitution's guarantee of equality "must at the very least mean that a bare congressional desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot" justify disparate treatment of that group. DOMA cannot survive under these principles. Its unusual deviation from the tradition of recognizing and accepting state definitions of marriage operates to deprive same-sex couples of the benefits and responsibilities that come with federal recognition of their marriages. This is strong evidence of a law having the purpose and effect of disapproval of a class recognized and protected by state law. DOMA's avowed purpose and practical effect are to impose a disadvantage, a separate status, and so a stigma upon all who enter into same-sex marriages made lawful by the unquestioned authority of the States. DOMA's history of enactment and its own text demonstrated that interference with the equal dignity of same-sex marriages, conferred by the States in the exercise of their sovereign power, was more than an incidental effect of the federal statute. It was its essence. BLAG's arguments were just as candid about the congressional purpose. DOMA's operation in practice confirmed this purpose. It frustrated New York's objective of eliminating inequality by writing inequality into the entire United States Code. DOMA's principal effect was to identify and make unequal a subset of state-sanctioned marriages. It contrived to deprive some couples married under the laws of their State, but not others, of both rights and responsibilities, creating two contradictory marriage regimes within the same State. It also forced same-sex couples to live as married for the purpose of state law but unmarried for the purpose of federal law, thus diminishing the stability and predictability of basic personal relations the State has found it proper to acknowledge and protect.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit

Treaties - Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction - ICARA - Defenses - Grave Risk of Harm - Fundamental Freedoms - Evidence of Spousal Conflict Alone, Without a Clear and Convincing Showing of Grave Risk of Harm to the Child, Is Insufficient to Decline Repatriation

In Souratgar v. Fair, --- F.3d ----, 2013 WL 2631375 (C.A.2 (N.Y.)) Lee Jen Fair appealed the grant of a petition brought by her husband Abdollah Naghash Souratgar for repatriation of their son from New York to Singapore. In May 2012, Lee removed the boy to Dutchess County, New York, in direct violation of a Singapore court order. The District Court granted Souratgar's petition pursuant to the Hague Convention. (Souratgar v. Lee Jen Fair, No. 12 CV 7797(PKC), 2012 WL 6700214 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 26, 2012). The Second Circuit affirmed rejecting her "grave risk of harm" and "fundamental freedoms' defenses.

Four-year-old Shayan, was born in Singapore in January 2009 to Lee and Souratgar, who were both residents of that country. Souratgar was an Iranian national who has owned a business in Singapore since 1989. Lee was a Malaysian national. She converted to Islam, Souratgar's faith, just prior to their marriage in Singapore in 2007. Shayan was a citizen of Malaysia with Malaysian and Iranian passports. At the district court hearing, the parties traded accusations and denials of domestic abuse. Souratgar accused Lee, among other things, of biting him, repeatedly threatening him with a knife and chopper, having suicidal tendencies, and inflicting injuries on herself. Lee asserted in her testimony more serious allegations-that Souratgar repeatedly slapped, beat, shook, and kicked her, and that he forced her to perform sex acts against her will. The district court found spousal abuse by Souratgar, including "shouting and offensive name-calling," and several incidents of physical abuse in which he "kicked, slapped, grabbed, and hit" . The district court found no credible evidence of any harm directed against the child. Both parties acknowledged the other's love for Shayan, and was not disputed that the boy dearly loves both of his parents.

In April 2011, when Shayan was two, Lee filed an ex parte application in the Singapore High Court for sole custody. On May 16, the Subordinate Court of Singapore issued an ex parte order directing Souratgar to hand over Shayan's passports and personal documents to Lee and barring Souratgar from removing the child from Singapore without court approval and Lee's knowledge or consent. Souratgar complied with the order, denied Lee's charges, and cross-applied for sole custody. While the custody proceedings were pending in Singapore, Lee moved out of the marital home with Shayan and refused to disclose their whereabouts to Souratgar. He eventually found them in Malaysia, where Lee denied him access to the boy. Souratgar then filed a custody application in the Syariah Court of Malaysia, which granted joint custody to the couple in early July. Thereafter, Lee succeeded in obtaining a dismissal of that order from the Malaysian Syariah Court for lack of jurisdiction.

After Lee and Shayan returned to Singapore, the custody proceedings in Singapore's Subordinate Court resumed. Following a mediation session on July 14, 2011, the Subordinate Court barred either parent from removing Shayan from Singapore without the other's consent and ordered interim supervised visitation for Souratgar at Singapore's Centre for Family Harmony. Following another mediation session on February 16, 2012, both parties agreed to a consent order by the Subordinate Court to have custody decided by the Syariah Court of Singapore. In the meantime, Shayan remained in Lee's care, while Souratgar's visitation time was doubled. In late 2011, Lee had filed for divorce in Singapore's Syariah Court and used that proceeding to dismiss the temporary joint custody order of the Malaysian Syariah Court. On May 20, 2012, Lee removed Shayan from Singapore, in violation of the Singapore Subordinate Court's order.

Souratgar, through a private investigator, eventually located Lee and Shayan in Dutchess County, and on October 18, 2012 filed an ex parte application in the district court under the Convention for Shayan's return to Singapore. The district court heard testimony from nine witnesses over a nine-day evidentiary hearing, and on December 26, granted Souratgar's petition.

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed. The parties did not dispute either that Singapore was the country of Shayan's habitual residence or that his removal from Singapore was wrongful under the Convention. The issue on appeal was whether the two affirmative defenses that Lee raised under Articles 13(b) and 20 of the Convention precluded repatriation. Under Article 13(b), the judicial or administrative authority of the requested State is not bound to order the return of the child if [the party opposing repatriation] establishes that ... there is a grave risk that his or her return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation. Under Article 20, repatriation also "may be refused if this would not be permitted by the fundamental principles of the requested State relating to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms." The respondent parent opposing the return of the child has the burden of establishing "by clear and convincing evidence that one of the exceptions set forth in article 13b or 20 of the Convention applies." 42 U.S.C. § 11603(e)(2)(A). Subsidiary facts may be proven by a preponderance of the evidence..

The Second Circuit observed that it reviews the district court's interpretation of the Convention de novo and its factual determinations for clear error. Its "review under the 'clearly erroneous' standard is significantly deferential." Concrete Pipe & Prods. of Cal., Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. Cal., 508 U.S. 602, 623 (1993). It must accept the trial court's findings unless it has a "definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed."

The Second Circuit rejected Lee's argument that returning Shayan to Singapore would expose him to "a grave risk" of "physical or psychological harm" or "otherwise place him in an intolerable situation" and that the district court's finding to the contrary was error. The harms he could face upon return, she asserted, were (1) exposure to spousal abuse; (2) direct abuse from his father; or (3) the loss of his mother. The Court found that Lee's arguments were permeated with conjecture and speculation and that there was no error in the district court's determination that Lee had failed to meet her burden to establish the Article 13(b) defense.

The Second Circuit held that under Article 13(b), a grave risk of harm from repatriation arises in two situations: "(1) where returning the child means sending him to a zone of war, famine, or disease; or (2) in cases of serious abuse or neglect, or extraordinary emotional dependence, when the court in the country of habitual residence, for whatever reason, may be incapable or unwilling to give the child adequate protection." Blondin IV, 238 F.3d at 162. The potential harm to the child must be severe, and the level of risk and danger required to trigger this exception has consistently been held to be very high. The grave risk involves not only the magnitude of the potential harm but also the probability that the harm will materialize. This grave risk' exception is to be interpreted narrowly, lest it swallow the rule.

The Second Circuit indicated that while many cases for relief under the Convention arise from a backdrop of domestic strife spousal abuse is only relevant under Article 13(b) if it seriously endangers the child. The Article 13(b) inquiry is not whether repatriation would place the respondent parent's safety at grave risk, but whether so doing would subject the child to a grave risk of physical or psychological harm. The exception to repatriation has been found where the petitioner showed a sustained pattern of physical abuse and/or a propensity for violent abuse that presented an intolerably grave risk to the child. Evidence of prior spousal abuse, though not directed at the child, can support the grave risk of harm defense, as could a showing of the child's exposure to such abuse. Evidence of this kind, however, is not dispositive in these fact-intensive cases. Sporadic or isolated incidents of physical discipline directed at the child, or some limited incidents aimed at persons other than the child, even if witnessed by the child, have not been found to constitute a grave risk. In this case, the district court found that, while Lee was subjected to domestic abuse on certain occasions, albeit less than she claimed, at no time was Shayan harmed or targeted.

The Court noted that it has held that Article 13(b) relief could be granted if repatriation posed a grave risk of causing unavoidable psychological harm to the child. See Blondin IV, 238 F.3d at 160-61 (affirming denial of petition to repatriate after an expert psychologist opined that returning the boy and girl to France, where they had been abused by their father, would likely trigger recurrence of PTSD, and that no arrangement could mitigate this risk). The holding in Blondin IV depended on the fact, due to the nature of the potential harm at issue, recurrence of PTSD that would occur as soon as the children entered France, there was nothing the courts could do to prevent it. In this case, there was nothing in the record beyond speculation that Shayan would suffer unavoidable psychological harm if returned to Singapore. Neither party nor the guardian ad litem requested a psychological evaluation of the boy, and the guardian ad litem reported, after observing Shayan's interactions with both parents and interviewing him separately, that the boy appeared to be an active and happy child, who seemed distressed about the difficulties between his parents. Shayan expressed unqualified love for both parents and indicated that he was never physically disciplined and never saw or heard either parent hit the other or try to hurt the other parent. In contrast, the girl in Blondin IV had herself been abused and expressed fear of her father. The circuit court cases affirming denial of repatriation cited by Lee were distinguishable in that the petitioning parent had actually abused, threatened to abuse, or inspired fear in the children in question. The Court emphasized that it on held " that in this case, the evidence, which did not match the showing in those cases, did not establish that the child faced a grave risk of physical or psychological harm upon repatriation.

Lee contended that the district court erred in discounting the likelihood that Shayan would be exposed to renewed domestic strife and suffer grievous psychological harm upon his return to Singapore. She also faulted the district court for refusing to credit expert testimony characterizing Souratgar as having a coercive and controlling personality type with a tendency to hurt women and children. At the hearing, the district court heard a psychological expert describe abusive spouses of the "coercive control" type and of the "situational" type and placed Souratgar in the former category. The coercive control type is said to demand domination and control and grows more dangerous upon separation from the victim. On this basis, the expert concluded that Souratgar still posed an "extreme danger" to Lee even though they had been estranged for more than a year. The experts assessment of Souratgar was based entirely on Lee's answers to a survey, which the district court found to contain inaccuracies. The district court therefore discredited the experts conclusions. There was no basis in the record for disagreement with the district court's finding.

The Second Circuit held that for it "to hold evidence of spousal conflict alone, without a clear and convincing showing of grave risk of harm to the child, to be sufficient to decline repatriation, would unduly broaden the Article 13(b) defense and undermine the central premise of the Convention: that wrongfully removed children be repatriated so that questions over their custody can be decided by courts in the country where they habitually reside. Our holding today is not that abuse of the kind described by Lee can never entitle a respondent to an Article 13(b) defense; rather it depends on the district court's finding that Shayan would not be in danger of being exposed to a grave risk of physical or psychological harm and that the Singapore court system has demonstrated its ability to adjudicate the dispute over his custody." It found no clear error in the district court's finding that the facts did not indicate a grave risk of harm to the child in this particular instance.

Lee also contended that Shayan faced a direct risk of harm from his father, who, having been abusive to Lee, was also likely to turn on Shayan, citing the description of the "coercive control" type in the social science literature that draws certain correlations between perpetrators of spousal abuse and child abuse. However, given the problems with the experts methodology in type-casting Souratgar, the lack of any indicia of ill-will on the part of Souratgar toward Shayan, and contrary credited evidence of a loving father-son relationship, there was no clear and convincing showing that the boy faced a grave risk of harm from his father.

Lee also posited various scenarios in which the boy would be deprived of his mother post-repatriation. She claimed Souratgar may (a) resort to Syariah court proceedings in Singapore or Malaysia to win custody outright; (b) abscond with Shayan to Iran; or (c) expose her to the charge of apostasy (leaving the Muslim faith), a religious crime punishable by death in her home country of Malaysia. The district court dismissed these claims as lacking factual support. As an initial matter, the Second Circuit held that the court could not conclude that the prospect that one parent may lose custody of the child, post-repatriation, necessarily constitutes a grave risk to the child under the Convention. Since the Convention defers the determination of custody to courts in the country where the child habitually resides, it is quite conceivable that in some cases one or the other parent may lose legal custody after repatriation and be deprived of access to the child. Thus, the possible loss of access by a parent to the child does not constitute a grave risk of harm per se for Article 13(b) purposes. Even assuming that the prospect of the child losing his mother posed a grave risk to the child's well-being, there was no basis to disturb the district court's finding that Lee had not made a clear and convincing showing that any of the scenarios that she raised was likely to occur.

The Second Circuit pointed out that the Article 20 defense allows repatriation to be denied when it "would not be permitted by the fundamental principles of the requested State relating to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms." This defense is to be "restrictively interpreted and applied." Article 20 is a unique formulation that embodies a political compromise among the states that negotiated the Convention, which might never have been adopted otherwise.. The defense is to be invoked only on the rare occasion that return of a child would utterly shock the conscience of the court or offend all notions of due process. It is not to be used as a vehicle for litigating custody on the merits or for passing judgment on the political system of the country from which the child was removed. This defense has yet to be used by a federal court to deny a petition for repatriation.

Lee argued that Syariah Courts are incompatible with the principles "relating to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms" of this country. The Second Circuit declined to make this categorical ruling as a legal matter. Moreover, Lee failed to show that the issue of custody was likely to be litigated before Singapore's Syariah Court. Given that failure, it was not inclined to conclude simply that the presence of a Syariah Court in a foreign state whose accession to the Convention has been recognized by the United States is per se violative of "all notions of due process." It noted that such a holding would contradict the State Department's view expressed upon Singapore's accession as a bilateral partner under the Convention, that Singapore is a "role model" among states in the region. It was also mindful of the need for comity, as the careful and thorough fulfillment of our treaty obligations stands not only to protect children abducted to the United States, but also to protect American children abducted to other nations-whose courts, under the legal regime created by this treaty, are expected to offer reciprocal protection. In the exercise of comity, we are required to place our trust in the court of the home country to issue whatever orders may be necessary to safeguard children who come before it.

For all of the above reasons, it concluded that the district court did not err in rejecting Lee's Article 20 defense.

Appeals - Rare Remittal by Appellate Division, Second Department For Report

In McCoy v McCoy, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3024417 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), plaintiff appealed from stated portions of a judgment of the Supreme Court, which directed the defendant to pay child support in the sum of only $321.10 per week, failed to award her arrears for pendente lite child support, directed that the former marital residence be listed for immediate sale or that the plaintiff be permitted to "buy out" the defendant's interest, directed that the plaintiff is solely responsible for that part of the balance of a home equity line of credit that exceeds $34,000, and directed the equitable distribution of the parties' retirement accounts. Inasmuch as the record did reveal the Supreme Court's reasons for its choice not to include income above the statutory cap, the Appellate Division remitted the matter to Supreme Court, for the Supreme Court to set forth in a report the factors considered and the reasons for its determination as to child support, and the appeal was held in abeyance in the interim.

Equitable Distribution - Marital Residence - Valuation - Proper to Value Marital Residence Based upon Price for the Residence Set Forth in Listing Agreement That Had Been Entered into by the Plaintiff with a Realtor

In Rubackin v Rubackin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3032397 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the Appellate Division affirmed a judgment of the Supreme court which, after a nonjury trial, inter alia, awarded the defendant her entire pension as a distributive award, free of any claims by the plaintiff, determined that the defendant had validly exercised her right of first refusal to purchase the marital residence, and valued the marital home at $479,000.

The Appellate Division found that contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the Supreme Court considered each of the statutory factors of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(d) and adequately based its pension determination upon the defendant's role in recent years as the parties' primary wage earner and the primary caregiver to the parties' children. In addition, the Supreme Court properly considered the plaintiff's receipt of a $2 million inheritance in arriving at its pension determination. It also found, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the Supreme Court properly valued the marital residence at $479,000, which was the price for the residence set forth in a listing agreement that had been entered into by the plaintiff with a realtor (citing generally Taverna v. Taverna, 56 AD3d 461; Moody v. Moody, 172 A.D.2d 730; Wegman v. Wegman, 123 A.D.2d 220). Moreover, the Supreme Court did not err in determining that the defendant had validly exercised her right of first refusal to purchase the marital residence at that price.

Agreements - Construction - College Education Provision - Absent a Provision to the Contrary, in Determining Parents' Respective Obligations Towards College, Court Should Not Take into Account Any College Loans for Which the Student Is Responsible

In Bungart v. Bungart, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2495826 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) plaintiff moved to have the Supreme Court direct the defendant to contribute toward the college expenses of the parties' children, including student loans which the children were responsible to repay, up to the monetary cap set forth in the parties' stipulation of settlement that was incorporated by reference but not merged into the judgment of divorce. The Supreme Court denied the motion, reasoning that the amounts of the student loans should be deducted from the college expenses that the parties were required to pay pursuant to the stipulation.

The Appellate Division reversed. It held that contrary to the Supreme Court's determination, in the absence of a clear and unambiguous provision to the contrary in the stipulation of settlement concerning the matter, in determining the parents' respective obligations towards the cost of college, a court should not take into account any college loans for which the student is responsible. The parties' stipulation of settlement did not contain a clear and unambiguous provision expressly authorizing the deduction of the children's student loans from the college expenses toward which the parties were required to contribute. Accordingly, Supreme Court erred in denying the plaintiff's motion, and the matter was remitted for a hearing and determination as to the parties' respective obligations for college expenses.

Paternity - Family Ct Act § 516-a[b][ii] - Acknowledgment of Paternity - Acknowledgment Vacated for Mistake of Fact

In Matter of Oscar FX --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2500583 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) \the Appellate Division reversed an order of the Family Court which, after a hearing, dismissed the petition to vacate an acknowledgment of paternity. It observed that a party seeking to vacate an acknowledgment of paternity more than 60 days after it was executed must establish that it was signed by reason of fraud, duress, or material mistake of fact (Family Ct Act § 516-a[b][ii]). If the petitioner satisfies this burden, the court is required to conduct a further inquiry to determine whether the petitioner should be estopped, in accordance with the child's best interest, from challenging paternity. The respondent conceded, the petitioner demonstrated that he executed the acknowledgment of paternity based upon a material mistake of fact. The petitioner testified that he and the respondent engaged in sexual relations during the relevant time period and that at the time he executed the acknowledgment of paternity, he thought that he was the child's father. The petitioner further testified that at the time he signed the acknowledgment, he was not aware that the respondent had another sexual partner during the relevant time period. The respondent's testimony confirmed that she had another sexual partner during the relevant time period. In addition, the respondent testified that she later received DNA test results which excluded the petitioner as the child's biological father. Consequently, the record established that the petitioner executed the acknowledgment of paternity due to a material mistake of fact. The petition was reinstated and the matter remitted to the Family Court for a hearing to determine whether the petitioner should be estopped, in accordance with the child's best interest, from vacating the acknowledgment of paternity.

Appellate Division, Third Department

Equitable Distribution - Award - Factors Considered - Any Other Factor Which the Court Shall Expressly Find to Be Just and Proper.

Maintenance - Award - Factors Considered - Any Other Factor Which the Court Shall Expressly Find to Be Just and Proper.

Third Department Holds That in Appropriate Circumstances Evidence of Egregious Economic Fault in Mismanaging, Dissipating and Wasting Separate Assets Can and Should Be Considered under The "just and Proper" Factor for Equitable Distribution and Maintenance

In Owens v Owens, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2631442 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Plaintiff wife and defendant husband were married in 1985. At that time, the husband owned an apartment building in Manhattan as well as a one-half interest in real property located in Sullivan County, the marital residence, where the parties resided for the duration of their marriage. The husband inherited the other one-half interest in the marital residence in 1986, following his father's death. After the birth of the parties' first child in 1987, the husband gradually gave up his photography business, and the family lived on the income generated by the NYC rental property. A second child was born in 1993 and, in 1998, the wife earned a Bachelor's degree in nursing and obtained her license as a registered nurse. During the marriage, aside from very brief periods of employment, the wife was not employed as a nurse or otherwise. In 2007, the husband sold the NYC rental property for $6 million and, thereafter, the family was supported by the proceeds.

The parties separated in 2008 and, in 2009, the wife commenced the action for divorce. In October 2010, the wife was granted pendente lite spousal support of $3,500 per month and $7,500 in interim counsel fees. At the time of the bench trial in March 2011, the parties' oldest child was emancipated and the youngest child, who had reached the age of 18, was residing with the husband in the marital residence. Following a trial the court adjudged both the NYC rental property and the marital residence to be the separate property of the husband, awarded him a 30% share of the wife's enhanced earning capacity as a nurse and awarded her a 40% share of the appreciation of the marital residence during the marriage which, when offset by the husband's enhanced earnings share, resulted in a net equitable distribution award to the wife of $100,400. The court further awarded the wife maintenance of $18,000 to be paid over a period of nine months, as well as additional counsel fees in the amount of $25,000 and 40% of the $335,000 of appreciation in the marital residence.

The Appellate Division affirmed Supreme Court's classification of the real property as separate property not subject to equitable distribution. It was undisputed that the husband purchased the NYC rental property in 1978-seven years prior to the marriage-for $130,000 and, when he sold it for $6 million in September 2007, he ultimately received $4.6 million. The husband testified that he utilized an absentee management system wherein tenants of the rental units would communicate directly with maintenance and utility workers, and that the wife never had any involvement in managing the property. While the husband may have treated the rental income as marital income, the proceeds from the sale of the property were wired to a bank account that was in his name only. The record fully supported Supreme Court's conclusion-crediting the husband's testimony-that this property constituted separate property. The court also properly concluded that the marital residence, which remained in the husband's name alone throughout the marriage, was his separate property. The husband did not challenge the court's determination that the wife was entitled to a share of the appreciation in value of the marital residence.

The Supreme Court found that the husband had wastefully dissipated his substantial separate property, but concluded that, because it was separate property, as distinguished from marital property, such dissipation was not encompassed in the statutory factors of Domestic Relations Law § 236(B); thus, the court did not consider this dissipation in its otherwise thorough determination of the wife's equitable distribution and maintenance awards. The Appellate Division agreed with the wife, however, that in appropriate circumstances evidence of egregious economic fault in mismanaging, dissipating and wasting separate assets can and should be considered under the statutory catchall "just and proper" factor for equitable distribution and maintenance. Considering that economic fault, which includes conduct that unfairly prevents the court from making an equitable distribution of marital property, has generally been considered relevant to the distribution, and that the catchall factors provide substantial flexibility to fashion an appropriate decree based on what is fair and equitable under the circumstances it concluded that, in compelling circumstances, a spouse's wasteful dissipation of his or her separate assets, may justly and properly be considered relevant to equitable distribution and maintenance.

By the time of the 2011 trial, most of the proceeds from the 2007 sale of the NYC rental property ($4.6 million) had been spent or lost as a result of the husband's poorly made and/or mismanaged investments. His incredible losses within a relatively short period of time were not merely the product of market forces but, rather, were also attributable to his gross mismanagement and wasteful spending. The Appellate Division agreed with the court's finding that the husband wastefully dissipated millions of dollars of his separate property and was "extremely cavalier" about the condition of his investments. Supreme Court also found that there were numerous withdrawals of large sums of cash from the husband's accounts over the year leading up to the parties' separation, for which he offered no explanation. The evidence suggested that the husband's claimed poverty was contrived.

The Appellate Division modified the wife's maintenance award finding that her ability to be self-supporting must be considered within the context of the parties' predivorce standard of living. The parties' marital residence was a well-furnished, 4,500-square-foot home overlooking the Delaware River, situated on five acres of land, with superior amenities. Throughout the majority of their marriage, the parties and their children enjoyed a very comfortable lifestyle in a dwelling that was beyond the average home. It was not necessary for either party to be employed to sustain that lifestyle, and the husband conceded, at trial, that this more than comfortable lifestyle became lavish after he sold the NYC rental property. By contrast, from the time of the parties' 2008 separation to the time of the 2011 trial, the wife was virtually without assets or a steady income. Although she had a 2004 Mercedes station wagon, it was not operable and needed extensive costly repairs, which she testified compounded her difficulty in finding suitable employment. She testified that she was without health insurance, owed her mother $15,000, owed her attorney approximately $49,000 and had only about $1,000 in her checking account. Significantly, Supreme Court recognized that the maintenance award of $2,000 per month for nine months was "insufficient" to meet the wife's basic monthly expenses while she prepared to reenter the nursing field. The husband, on the other hand, was collecting Social Security and held in excess of $80,000 in documented assets in banks and in E-trade accounts at the time of trial. He owned a 2005 Mercedes that he had purchased in 2007 for $42,000 and a 1995 Jaguar convertible with no stated value. Additionally, he held title to the marital residence-which was not encumbered by any mortgage or liens and was valued by the court at $465,000-had paid over $65,000 to his matrimonial attorneys and was virtually debt free. Its review of the record supported the conclusion that, under the circumstances of this case, the fact that the wife had the ability to be self-supporting by some standard of living did not mean that she was self-supporting in the context of the marital standard of living. In modifying this award we determine "the amount of earnings necessary to enable the [wife] to become self-supporting [by] ... reference to the standard of living of the parties, as well as the earning capacity of each party; and these factors carry more weight in [this] marriage of long duration" (Garvey v. Garvey, 223 A.D.2d 968, 970 [1996]). Imputing to the husband the substantial income that he would have earned had he not been so cavalier and wasteful in the manner in which he blatantly risked virtually all of his capital, and affording the wife more time to prepare for and find suitable employment, it extended the wife's maintenance award of $2,000 per month for nine months to a period of 24 months, for a total of $48,000. It also modified the award of equitable distribution-taking into account the parties' assets at the commencement of the action and the husband's economic fault-to award the wife 50%, rather than 40%, of the appreciation in the value of the marital residence. It decline to modify Supreme Court's award to the husband of 30% of the enhanced earnings attributable to the wife's nursing degree, as he encouraged her to pursue her dream, financed her education and was the primary caregiver for the children while she pursued her degree full time.

Supreme Court's finding that the husband was able to maintain his previous lifestyle with thousands of dollars in liquid assets, which conflicted with its rationale that he was unable to pay a more substantial portion of the wife's counsel fees, justified an increase in the award of counsel fees to the wife. Supreme Court found that the approximately $64,000 in counsel fees incurred by the wife were "necessary based on the complexity of the issues" and warranted by her attorney's experience, ability and reputation. It awarded her an additional $10,000 in counsel fees for a total of $35,000 in counsel fees.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Fourth Department Holds Charging Lien of Attorney Has Priority over Wives Judgment for Counsel Fees, from Date of Commencement, in Clients Interest in Proceeds from Sale of the Marital Residence.

In Schmitt v Schmitt, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2670888 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) The Appellate Division rejected plaintiff's contention that Supreme Court erred in awarding defendant durational maintenance of $16,833.75 per year for 10 years. The court providently exercised its discretion in making that award to allow defendant the opportunity to become self-supporting after 25 years of marriage during which she was the stay-at-home parent . It also rejected plaintiff's further contention that the court erred in failing to subtract maintenance payments from his income for the purpose of calculating his child support obligation. The relevant statute provides that maintenance paid or to be paid should be subtracted from the payor's income only where "the order or agreement provides for a specific adjustment ... in the amount of child support payable upon the termination of alimony or maintenance" (Domestic Relations Law 240[1-b][b][5][vii][C]). Here, the judgment did not provide for an automatic adjustment of child support upon the termination of maintenance, and such an adjustment was not warranted because plaintiff's maintenance obligation would outlast his child support obligation.

The Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff, however, that the court erred in concluding that defendant met her burden of establishing that the parties' third eldest child was emancipated during the time she resided with plaintiff in 2011. Although the child in question worked two jobs in 2010, defendant did not submit any evidence regarding the child's income in 2011. The fact that plaintiff paid for the subject child's rent and utility costs demonstrated that the child was not economically independent and self-supporting. Inasmuch as the record was insufficient for us to determine defendant's child support obligation it modified the judgment in appeal by vacating the paragraphs relating to plaintiff's child support obligation, and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for consideration of defendant's child support obligation and for a recomputation of the parties' respective child support obligations, following a hearing if necessary.

The Appellate Division agreed with plaintiff that the court failed to set forth the statutory factors it relied upon in allocating all of the marital debt to him. In distributing debt, a court is required to consider the factors set forth in Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(5)(d) and to state the factors that influenced its decision in accordance with section 236(B)(5)(g). It remitted the matter to Supreme Court for further consideration of that issue, including a hearing if necessary.

Finally, it agreed with plaintiff that the court erred in failing to afford the charging lien of his attorney priority in plaintiff's interest in the proceeds from the sale of the marital residence over the judgment awarding defendant attorney's fees. Although plaintiff's attorney did not timely file the retainer agreement as required by 22 NYCRR 1400.3, it is the right of the client, not the adversary spouse, to assert noncompliance with those rules as a basis for refusing to pay attorney's fees. The record established that plaintiff submitted an affidavit waiving his attorney's compliance with that filing requirement. It therefore concluded that the court erred in determining in the context of plaintiff's posttrial motion that plaintiff's attorney did not have a charging lien with priority from the date of commencement of the action (see Judiciary Law §475). Thus, the court erred in directing plaintiff's attorney to satisfy the judgment filed on January 17, 2012 with respect to the attorney's fees of defendant from plaintiff's share of the proceeds of the sale of the marital residence, which was held in the attorney trust account of plaintiff's attorney.

Supreme Court

Child Support - Award - Income - Deductions - Drl § 240(1-b)(B)(5)(Vii)a - Union Dues Qualify as a Deduction under Subsection (A), "Unreimbursed Employee Business Expenses Except to the Extent Said Expenses Reduce Personal Expenditures but Court must Also Determine If "Said Expenses Reduce Personal Expenditures."

In Hatlee v Hatlee, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2996127 (N.Y.Sup.) on June 25, 2012, the plaintiff Shane Hatlee commenced an action for divorce. The Supreme Court, in a decision after trial held that union dues paid by Mr. Hatlee should not be deducted from Mr. Hatlee's gross income prior to calculating Mr. Hatlee's income for child support purposes.

Mr. Hatlee was employed at Mohawk Fine Papers and paid monthly union dues to the United Steel Workers of between $60.00 and $80.00 per month depending on the number of hours Mr. Hatlee worked. The Court observed that Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b) sets forth the methodology the Court must follow to determine the non-custodial parent's child support obligation. Pursuant to DRL § 240(1-b)(b)(5) income for support purposes "shall mean, but shall not be limited to, the sum of the amounts determined by the application of clauses (i), (ii), (iii), (iv), (v) and (vi) of this subparagraph reduced by the amount determined by the application of clause (vii) of this subparagraph." The delineated clause (vii) deductions do not specify union dues, and union dues do not fall under DRL §§ 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(B), (C), (D), (E), (F), (G), or (H). DRL § 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii) does not provide for any additional deductions nor does it contain a catch all "other" category left to the Court's discretion. The Court concluded that union dues qualify as a deduction under subsection (A), "unreimbursed employee business expenses except to the extent said expenses reduce personal expenditures." The Court found it appropriate to look to IRS regulations and publications for guidance as to how union dues are treated for tax purposes. It noted that the IRS defines unreimbursed employee expenses (subject to limitations) as those expenses (1) that are paid or incurred during the individual's tax year; (2) that are for carrying on the individual's trade or business of being an employee; and, (3) that are ordinary and necessary. See, IRS Publication 529, Miscellaneous Deductions [2012 Returns]. The IRS defines an expense as ordinary if "it is common and accepted in your trade, business, or profession" and defines an expense as necessary "if it is appropriate and helpful to your business." An expense "does not have to be required to be considered necessary." Thus, union dues may be considered (subject to restrictions not relevant herein) by the IRS as unreimbursed employee expenses. For purposes of determining whether union dues are deductible under DRL §240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(A), however, the Court must do more than apply the IRS criteria. To conclude that the expenses are deductible, the Court must also determine if "said expenses reduce personal expenditures." DRL § 240(1-b)(b)(5)(vii)(A).

The Court found that the ability to deduct union dues for purposes of calculating an individual's income for child support purposes must be determined on a case by case basis. As Mr. Hatlee was the party who benefitted if union dues were deducted from his earnings for purposes of calculating his child support obligation, he had the burden of proof on this issue. Mr. Hatlee offered insufficient evidence to substantiate a claim for a deduction for union dues. Accordingly, the Court would not reduce Mr. Hatlee's income for child support purposes by the amount Mr. Hatlee paid for union dues.

Family Court Directs E-mail Service of the Proceeding upon Respondent in Custody Case as Reasonably Calculated to Inform Him of the Proceeding Where He Had Recently Communicated with His Children Using His E-mail Address

In Matter of N.Z. v. A.G., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 3013674 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) the petitioner-mother filed a petition on May 3, 2013, pursuant to Article 6 of the Family Court Act and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), seeking to modify the parties' October 21, 2002 divorce decree from the Court of Common Pleas, Division of Domestic Relations, in Ohio. The mother seeks an award of sole legal custody for the minor children L. G., J. G.; and L.G. The mother made an application for an alternative means of service on the respondent-father who had been been deported from the United States and Canada and forbidden to enter the United States. His exact whereabouts were unknown. Prior attempts at personal service were made during a 2011 custody proceeding which was dismissed without prejudice for lack of personal jurisdiction on the respondent. The respondent had allegedly made contact with the minor children via e-mail in the past three months.

Family Court observed that CPLR 308 (5) allows alternative means of service if traditional service is deemed impracticable by the Court. In a recent decision, the Appellate Division, Fourth Department held that service by e-mail was permissible in a matrimonial case where the defendant was living in Iran and ordinary attempts at personal service were ineffectual. (Safadjou v. Mohammadi, 105 AD3d 1423) The Fourth Department held that e-mail service was reasonably calculated to apprise the defendant of the pending proceeding and noted that there was no express prohibition against this form of service in state or federal law. Here, the Court found that personal service by personal delivery or mail was impracticable due to unknown whereabouts of the respondent. The Court further found that e-mail service of the proceeding upon the respondent was reasonably calculated to inform him of the proceeding inasmuch as he had recently communicated with his children using his e-mail address. The court ordered that that service of process via electronic mail at the respondent's most recent e-mail address on or before May 18, 2013 was deemed acceptable.

Court of Appeals

Agreements - Prenuptial - Validity - Domestic Relations Law § 236 (B) (3) - Court of Appeals Holds That Because Affidavit of Notary Was Insufficient to Raise a Question of Fact Precluding Summary Judgment the Court Did Not Need to “Definitively Resolve the Question of Whether a Cure Is Possible” Where There Is Omission in the Requisite Language of the Certificate of Acknowledgment, Signatures on the Prenuptial Agreement Are Authentic, and No Claims of Fraud or Duress.

In Galetta v Galletta, __NY3d__, 2013 WL 2338421 (2013) a matrimonial action, plaintiff Michelle Galetta sought a determination that a prenuptial agreement she and defendant Gary Galetta signed was invalid due to a defective acknowledgment. The Court of Appeals concluded that plaintiff was entitled to summary judgment declaring the agreement to be unenforceable under Domestic Relations Law § 236B(3), and reversed the order of the Appellate Division, which held there was a triable question of fact on that issue.

Michelle Galetta and Gary Galetta were married in July 1997. About a week before the wedding, they each separately signed a prenuptial agreement. Neither party was present when the other executed the document and the signatures were witnessed by different notaries public. The parties' signatures and the accompanying certificates of acknowledgment were set forth on a single page of the document. The certificates appeared to have been typed at the same time, with spaces left blank for dates and signatures that were to be filled in by hand. The certificate of acknowledgment relating to Michelle's signature contained the boilerplate language typical of the time. However, in the acknowledgment relating to Gary's signature, a key phrase was omitted and, as a result, the certificate failed to indicate that the notary public confirmed the identity of the person executing the document or that the person was the individual described in the document.

The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Graffeo, observed that Prenuptial agreements are addressed in Domestic Relations Law § 236B(3), which provides: "An agreement by the parties, made before or during the marriage, shall be valid and enforceable in a matrimonial action if such agreement is in writing, subscribed by the parties, and acknowledged or proven in the manner required to entitle a deed to be recorded." In Matisoff v. Dobi (90 N.Y.2d 127 [1997]), where it held that an unacknowledged postnuptial agreement was invalid, the Court observed that the statute recognizes no exception to the requirement that a nuptial agreement be executed in the same manner as a recorded deed and "that the requisite formality explicitly specified in DRL 236B(3) is essential" (id. at 132, 659 N.Y.S.2d 209, 681 N.E.2d 376). Judge Graffeo noted that Real Property Law § 291, governing the recording of deeds, states that "[a] conveyance of real property ... on being duly acknowledged by the person executing the same, or proved as required by this chapter, ... may be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county where such real property is situated." Thus, a deed may be recorded if it is either "duly acknowledged" or "proved" by use of a subscribing witness. The Court pointed out that an acknowledgment serves to prove the identity of the person whose name appears on an instrument and to authenticate the signature of such person and it imposes on the signer a measure of deliberation in the act of executing the document. The Court noted in Matisoff that the acknowledgment requirement imposed by Domestic Relations Law § 236B(3) is onerous and, in some respects, more exacting than the burden imposed when a deed is signed. Although an unacknowledged deed cannot be recorded (rendering it invalid against a subsequent good faith purchaser for value) it may still be enforceable between the parties to the document (i.e., the grantor and the purchaser). The same is not true for a nuptial agreement which is unenforceable in a matrimonial action, even when the parties acknowledge that the signatures are authentic and the agreement was not tainted by fraud or duress.

In the certificate of acknowledgment relating to the husband's signature, the "to me known and known to me" phrase was omitted, leaving only the following statement: "On the 8[sic] day of July, 1997, before me came Gary Galetta described in and who executed the foregoing instrument and duly acknowledged to me that he executed the same." Absent the omitted language, the certificate does not indicate either that the notary public knew the husband or had ascertained through some form of proof that he was the person described in the prenuptial agreement. As New York courts have long held that an acknowledgment that fails to include a certification to this effect is defective, the Court agreed the Appellate Division, which unanimously concluded that the certificate of acknowledgment did not conform with statutory requirements.

Because the certificate of acknowledgment was defective, the Court of Appeals addressed the questions of (1) whether such a deficiency can be cured and, if so, (2) whether the affidavit of the notary public prepared in the course of litigation was sufficient to raise a question of fact precluding summary judgment in the wife's favor. Because the affidavit of the notary was insufficient to raise a question of fact precluding summary judgment the Court did not need to "definitively resolve the question of whether a cure is possible".

Judge Graffeo observed that in Matisoff, the Court found it was unnecessary to decide whether the absence of an acknowledgment could be cured. Since Matisoff, the Appellate Divisions have grappled with the "cure" issue, which has largely arisen in cases where a signature was not accompanied by any certificate of acknowledgment and the weight of Appellate Division authority is against permitting the absence of an acknowledgment to be cured after the fact, unless both parties engaged in a mutual "reaffirmation" of the agreement. When there is no acknowledgment at all, it is evident that one of the purposes of the acknowledgment requirement—to impose a measure of deliberation and impress upon the signer the significance of the document—has not been fulfilled. Thus, a rule precluding a party from attempting to cure the absence of an acknowledgment through subsequent submissions appeared to be sound. However, because this case did not involve the complete absence of an acknowledgment - there was an attempt to secure an acknowledged document but there was an omission in the requisite language of the certificate of acknowledgment - the Court noted that a compelling argument could be made that the door should be left open to curing a deficiency like the one that occurred here where the signatures on the prenuptial agreement are authentic, there are no claims of fraud or duress, and the parties believed their signatures were being duly acknowledged but, due to no fault of their own, the certificate of acknowledgment was defective or incomplete. The Court observed that the husband made a strong case for a rule permitting evidence to be submitted after the fact to cure a defect in a certificate of acknowledgment when that evidence consists of proof that the acknowledgment was properly made in the first instance—that at the time the document was signed the notary or other official did everything he or she was supposed to do, other than include the proper language in the certificate. By considering this type of evidence, courts would not be allowing a new acknowledgment to occur for a signature that was not properly acknowledged in the first instance; instead, parties who properly signed and acknowledged the document years before would merely be permitted to conform the certificate to reflect that fact. In this case, however, the proof submitted was insufficient. In his affidavit, the notary public did not state that he actually recalled having acknowledged the husband's signature, nor did he indicate that he knew the husband prior to acknowledging his signature. The notary averred only that he recognized his own signature on the certificate and that he had been employed at a particular bank at that time (corroborating the husband's statement concerning the circumstances under which he executed the document). As for the procedures followed, the notary had no independent recollection but maintained that it was his custom and practice "to ask and confirm that the person signing the document was the same person named in the document" and he was "confident" he had done so when witnessing the husband's signature. The affidavit by the notary public in this case merely paraphrased the requirement of the statute—he stated it was his practice to "ask and confirm" the identity of the signer—without detailing any specific procedure that he routinely followed to fulfill that requirement. Even assuming a defect in a certificate of acknowledgment could be cured under Domestic Relations Law § 236B(3), defendant's submission was insufficient to raise a triable question of fact as to the propriety of the original acknowledgment procedure. Plaintiff was therefore entitled to summary judgment declaring that the prenuptial agreement was unenforceable.

Neglect- Fact Finding Hearing - Evidence - Family Court Permitted Child to Testify Outside of Respondent's Presence Subject Contemporaneous Cross-examination by Respondent's Attorney

In Matter of Moona C., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2476795 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order of the family court which found that respondent mother neglected the subject children. It held that Family Court properly permitted one of the children to testify at the fact-finding hearing in camera. The court properly balanced respondent's due process rights with the emotional well-being of the child by permitting the child to testify outside of respondent's presence but subject to contemporaneous cross-examination by respondent's attorney following consultation with respondent (see Matter of Giannis F. [Vilma C.-Manny M.], 95 AD3d 618, 618 [1st Dept 2012]; Matter of Hadja B., 302 A.D.2d 226 [1st Dept 2003]). The affidavit of the social worker submitted in support of the application sufficiently established the potential trauma to the child, which would likely interfere with her ability to testify accurately and without inhibition concerning the allegations of excessive corporal punishment.

Custody - Award - Fact Hearing - Evidence - Medical Records Subpoena - Custody Award Reversed Where Court Refused to Sign Subpoena for Medical Treatment Records Necessary to Rebut Allegations Against Mother.

In Matter of Murphy v. Lewis, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2321682 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Family Court, after a hearing, granted the father's petition for physical custody of the subject child and denied her cross petition for physical custody of the subject child. The Appellate Division held that under the particular facts of this case, the Family Court improvidently exercised its discretion when it did not sign a subpoena proffered by the mother so as to permit her the opportunity to present certain medical treatment records to rebut the allegations asserted against her. The medical treatment records were relevant to the issue of whether an award of physical custody to the father was in the best interests of the child, and should have been considered by the Family Court (cf. Matter of Roldan v. Nieves, 51 AD3d 803, 805). Under the circumstances of this case, it remitted the matter to the Family Court for a new hearing and a new determination of the petition and the cross petition.

Child Custody - Award - Custody to Mother Reversed Where Family Court Failed to Give Sufficient Weight to the Forensic Mental Health Evaluation, Which Indicated That the Mother Was Not Suitable for Physical Custody of the Children and to its Own Finding That it Was in the Children's Best Interests for Them to Remain Away from Her Paramour.

In A.-S. v. A.-S.,--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2420776 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the parties were married in October 2005 and had two young daughters. After the parties separated, the mother left the parties' children in the father's care, and began residing with a man named Thomas Sherlock. The father subsequently petitioned for sole legal custody of the children and separately filed family offense petitions against the mother. The father contended that the mother was in a relationship with Sherlock and that he posed a threat to the safety and well-being of the subject children. He asserted that Sherlock, who was 19 years older than the mother, had engaged in an inappropriate relationship with the mother beginning after Sherlock first contacted her in an internet chatroom when the mother was only 12 years old. The father further asserted that Sherlock was the subject of a founded report in connection with allegations that he engaged in sexually abusive acts with his former stepdaughter when she was 14 years old. The father testified that, given the mother's relationship with Sherlock (they were engaged to be married at the time of the hearing), the children were consistently exposed to him and routinely left alone in his care. The mother cross-petitioned for sole physical custody of the subject children.

At the hearing the mother acknowledged that she first came into contact with Sherlock in an internet chatroom when she was 12 years old in the 1990s, and that the two met in person at a doughnut shop when she was approximately 16 years old. The mother testified that she and Sherlock stayed in contact and continued to maintain a relationship until the present day. Sherlock also testified at the hearing, and although he acknowledged forming a relationship with the mother when she was 12 years old, he asserted that it did not become sexual until after she turned 18 years old. Sherlock denied sexually abusing his former stepdaughter. Sherlock additionally claimed that he was never left alone with the children and that he only occasionally would help to feed them. A forensic mental health evaluation prepared by a psychologist affiliated with Westchester Jewish Community Services substantiated the father's claim that a founded report had been filed against Sherlock, in which Sherlock was alleged to have engaged in inappropriate sexual acts with his then 14-year-old stepdaughter. The evaluation revealed that both the mother and Sherlock exhibited a "dismissive attitude" with regard to Sherlock's inappropriate relationship with the mother when she was 12 years old and to the founded report. The evaluation concluded that "the presence of Mr. Sherlock in [the mother's] home ... renders [the mother] not suitable for physical residence."

After the hearing, the Family Court granted the mother's cross petition for sole physical custody, but directed that the mother "shall not permit the Subject Children to be in the presence of Mr. Thomas Sherlock unless the subject children are supervised at all times by the Respondent or any other adult approved by the Respondent/Mother."

The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, the Family Court should have granted the father's petition for custody and denied the mother's cross petition. In awarding the mother custody, the Family Court gave undue weight to its finding that the mother would be more likely than the father to foster a meaningful relationship between the children and the noncustodial parent. Furthermore, the Family Court failed to give sufficient weight to the forensic mental health evaluation, which indicated that the mother was not suitable for physical custody of the children and to its own finding that it was in the children's best interests for them to remain away from Sherlock at all times. It held that under the totality of the circumstances, including the founded concerns with respect to Sherlock and the attendant risk his relationship with the mother posed to the safety and well-being of the subject children, the best interests of the children would be served by awarding the father sole physical custody.

Maintenance - Award - Denied - Supreme Court Properly Denied Wife Maintenance Where She Was Employed and Self-supporting Before Marriage, Continued to Work During and after the Marriage, Marriage Short Duration, and Parties Generally Kept Finances Separate.

In Szewczuk v Szewczuk, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2421012 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) Supreme Court granted the defendant's application for a distributive award based on the appreciation in value of the marital residence, and denied the plaintiff's applications for maintenance and an award of an attorney's fee. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying her request for maintenance. The plaintiff was employed and self-supporting before the marriage and continued to work during and after the marriage. Moreover, the marriage was of short duration, and the parties generally kept their finances separate. However, Supreme Court improvidently exercised its discretion in denying the plaintiff's application for an award of an attorney's fee. An award of an attorney's fee pursuant to Domestic Relations Law § 237(a), a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, is controlled by the equities and circumstances of each particular case. Here, in light of, inter alia, the disparity in the parties' incomes, an award of an attorney's fee in the sum of $15,818, one quarter of the attorney's fee incurred by the plaintiff, was appropriate.

While the marital residence was the plaintiff's separate property, the Supreme Court directed the plaintiff to pay the defendant the sum of $102,500 as a distributive award based on the appreciation in value of the marital residence that was attributable to the efforts of both parties in physically improving the property during the marriage. Although the defendant's counsel noted at trial that the defendant's distributive award based on the appreciation of the marital residence should be reduced by the defendant's equitable share of the marital debt incurred in financing the improvements to the residence, the Supreme Court improperly failed to do so . It modified judgment by deleting the provision thereof directing the plaintiff to pay the defendant $102,500 as a distributive award based on the appreciation in value of the marital residence, and substituted a provision directing the plaintiff to pay the defendant $60,000 as a distributive award based on the appreciation in value of the marital residence.

Maintenance - Award - Denied - Supreme Court Abused its Discretion by Awarding the Wife Maintenance -

Equitable Distribution - American Express Reward Points Accumulated During Marriage Should Have Been Distributed

Equitable Distribution - Factors Considered - (12) the Wasteful Dissipation of Assets by Either Spouse

- Husband's Minor Legal Expenses, and Expenditures on Paramour and Their Child Incurred after the Date of Commencement, Did Not Constitute Wasteful Dissipation of Marital Assets.

In Mc Caffrey v Mc Caffrey, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2435296 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) the parties were married in 1999. In late 2010, plaintiff (husband) commenced the action and the parties subsequently consented to a no-fault divorce. The parties stipulated to the value of the marital home and the division of certain marital property and the action proceeded to a nonjury trial for resolution of the remaining maintenance and equitable distribution issues.

The Appellate Division agreed with the husband that Supreme Court abused its discretion by awarding the wife maintenance. It observed that the primary purpose of maintenance is to encourage self-sufficiency by the recipient and maintenance is appropriate where ... the marriage is of long duration, the recipient spouse has been out of the work force for a number of years, has sacrificed her or his own career development or has made substantial noneconomic contributions to the household or to the career of the payor. Here, the parties' marriage was not of particularly long duration (12 years), and they had no children together. When the action was commenced, the husband was 52 years old and the wife was 42 years old. Both parties were in good health and were gainfully employed, with the husband earning an annual salary of approximately $113,000 and the wife earning an annual salary of $65,000. In addition, the wife had separate property consisting of $66,000 in a trust account and $27,000 in savings bonds, both of which she testified were in her name but had been set aside by her parents for their elder care. Supreme Court found that both parties were self-supporting, and they stipulated to an equal division of their retirement and deferred compensation plans and neither party lost health insurance as a result of the divorce. The wife correctly noted that "[t]he fact that [she] has the ability to be self-supporting by some standard of living does not mean that she is self-supporting in the context of the marital standard of living". However, the determination of an appropriate maintenance award requires a delicate balance of each party's needs and means or ability to pay. The record demonstrated that the parties' relatively high predivorce standard of living would not have been sustainable without the significant credit card debt. The parties refinanced the marital residence, relying on much of its equity to reduce their debt. Supreme Court gave inadequate consideration to the balancing of the wife's needs-for which her own salary should provide adequate support-with the husband's ability to pay.

Moreover, the husband's alleged wasteful dissipation of marital assets as a ground for awarding maintenance was not supported by the record. The husband's minor legal expenses (around $1,100) associated with his defense of a criminal charge did not constitute wasteful dissipation of marital assets (see Kohl v. Kohl, 24 AD3d 219, 219 [2005]). The record also demonstrated that the husband's expenditures on his paramour and their child-who was conceived during the husband's marriage to the wife and born while the action was pending-were incurred after the date of commencement. The record reflected that the husband gambled only a few times during the parties' marriage, spent no more than $2,000 and broke even on all accounts, which did not rise to the level of wasteful dissipation. Although the wife accused the husband of incurring significant credit card debt without her knowledge, he testified that all of the charges-including those on his personal credit cards-were made for marital, household and work-related expenses. The wife did not rebut this testimony and, thus, the parties' credit card debt, including that charged on the husband's credit cards, was marital debt rather than wasteful dissipation of marital assets.

The Appellate Division held that under the circumstances of this case, where the marriage was not of particularly long duration, the parties had no children, the wife had stable employment that provided her a significant salary, the wife was not losing retirement or health benefits and the parties' predivorce standard of living was falsely inflated by overextended lines of credit, the statutory factors did not support an award of maintenance.

The Appellate Division agreed with the husband that Supreme Court erred by ordering him to pay the wife $37,110, half of the money that the parties borrowed against their equity in their marital residence. In 2010, the parties refinanced the marital residence and borrowed approximately $74,000 against that equity to pay their outstanding credit card balances.. Supreme Court found that the husband took the proceeds of this refinance and spent it entirely on personal expenses, gambling and his paramour and, as a result, it ordered him to pay the wife half of the refinance proceeds. However, the parties' credit card statements established that the refinancing proceeds were actually used by the husband to pay off the outstanding marital credit card balances.

During the marriage, the husband earned an Associate's degree in telecommunications and a Bachelor's degree in business administration with a minor in accounting. He received numerous promotions throughout the marriage, eventually holding the title of director of a department relevant to his degrees. The Appellate Division found no error in Supreme Court's distribution of the enhanced earning capacity created by the husband's two college degrees, and rejected the husband's arguments that the wife failed to prove that the degrees resulted in enhanced earnings or that she substantially contributed to their attainment. To be entitled to a share of the value of the husband's degrees, the wife must demonstrate that the degrees enhanced the husband's earning capacity and that she, in a meaningful and substantial way, contributed to his efforts in obtaining them. Richard Jones, a jointly retained consultant, opined that the value of the enhanced earnings attributable to the husband's degrees at the date of commencement was $204,000. Supreme Court found that 25% ($51,000) of that value constituted separate property and, further, that only 50% ($76,500) of the husband's enhanced earning potential was traceable to his degrees. The court awarded the wife 15% of that amount, totaling $11,475. In addition to Jones' expert opinion, evidence of the enhanced earnings included an evaluation in his personnel file that remarked on the beneficial effect that his degrees had on his employment and the fact that he included his degrees on every promotion application. Although two witnesses from the husband's employment testified that his degrees were not required for his promotions and that his promotions were mostly attributable to his superior job performance, neither witness testified that his degrees were not a factor in his promotions. Accordingly, Supreme Court arrived at a determination that was supported by the credible evidence introduced at trial. The Appellate Division rejected the argument of the husband that the wife failed to prove that she contributed in a substantial way to his attainment of the degrees, which depends on whether she "altered ... her schedule and/or took on additional household duties that ... she would not have otherwise performed, in order to enable [the husband] to obtain the ... degree[s]" (Quarty v. Quarty, 96 AD3d at 1277). The wife testified that while the husband was in school, she rearranged her schedule, transported him to and from classes, and assumed a greater share of the household responsibilities, and she averred that part of the husband's tuition was paid for by marital funds. Accordingly, it could not not say that Supreme Court abused its discretion in finding that the wife contributed to the husband's degrees. The wife's assertion that Supreme Court erroneously distributed to her only a limited percentage of the husband's enhanced earning value is was without merit. Where only modest contributions are made by the nontitled spouse toward the other spouse's attainment of a degree and the attainment is more directly the result of the titled spouse's own ability, tenacity, perseverance and hard work, it is appropriate for courts to limit the distributed amount of that enhanced earning capacity. The husband expended significant effort in obtaining his degrees; he attended night classes while working full time, and occasionally at a part-time second job. Moreover, much of his professional success was attributable to his superior job performance. Thus, Supreme Court's limited distribution to the wife of only 15% of the enhanced earnings was well within its discretion.

The Appellate Division held that it was error to order the wife to reimburse the husband for the full amount of the monthly mortgage payments through the pendency of this action. The wife moved out of the residence in late November 2010, prior to the commencement of this action; from that point on, the husband, his paramour and their child together had exclusive use and occupancy of the home. Accordingly, the husband should only have been reimbursed for one half of the amount by which the mortgage principal has been reduced..

Additionally, the parties' 180,000 American Express reward points that were accumulated during the marriage should have been distributed equally between them (Hale v. Hale, 16 AD3d 231, 235 [2005]).

Child Support - Enforcement - Family Court Has Continuing Jurisdiction to Determine Enforcement Applications by the Support Collection Unit on Behalf of Persons" Who Receive Child Support Pursuant to a Court Order. The SCU Is Tasked with Collecting Those Funds from the Obligor and Ensuring That They Are Properly Accounted For.

In Chemung County Support Collection Unit ex rel. Perry v. Greenfield, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2338736 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) a 2006 order of Family Court required respondent to pay $114 a week child support for her three children (born in 1985, 1987 and 1990). After respondent accrued over $30,000 in arrearages on her support obligation, petitioner obtained over $5,000 in income tax refunds due to her and disbursed them to the children's father (42 USC § 664; Social Services Law §§ 111-b [15]; 111-h; Tax Law § 171-i). Respondent's current husband then claimed that the refunds stemmed from joint tax returns and that some or all of the monies were his, obliging petitioner to repay them to the taxing authorities out of its own funds (42 USC § 664[a][3]; Tax Law §§ 171-c [3][e]; 651[b][6]). Petitioner commenced a proceeding on behalf of the father and, alleging that respondent had willfully violated the support order, sought the entry of a money judgment against her for the amount of the tax refunds. Family Court determined that it lacked jurisdiction to issue such a judgment.

The Appellate Division modified. It held that Family Court is empowered "to determine applications to modify or enforce judgments and orders of support" (N.Y. Const, art VI, § 13; Family Ct Act §§ 115 [a][ii]; 454[1]). In that regard, petitioner was authorized to commence violation proceedings "on behalf of persons" who receive child support pursuant to a court order (Family Ct Act § 453[a]). Family Court retained continuing jurisdiction to enforce the support order until it was completely satisfied. Petitioner's role in enforcing child support orders is not limited to disbursing monies to the support recipient; it is also tasked with collecting those funds from the obligor and ensuring that they are properly accounted for. Historically, a support collection unit was authorized to file a violation petition without reference to the support recipient. The "on behalf of" language was only added to Family Ct Act § 453 in order to clarify that the unit could prosecute as well as originate a violation proceeding on behalf of non-public assistance individuals in receipt of child support services. Petitioner thus acted well within its statutory authority in commencing the proceeding to enforce a child support order that respondent had "fail[ed] to obey," and Family Court likewise had subject matter jurisdiction to consider it.

Sanctions - 22 NYCRR 130-1.1 - Husband Sanctioned Where He Misrepresented His Knowledge of and past Interactions and Presented Half-truths to Obtain an ex Parte Stay Enjoining the Wife from Leaving the Children with Unrelated Persons in Order Specifically to Interfere with Her Planned Vacation.

In Karen E. v Yoram E., 2013 WL 2402686 (N.Y.Sup.), the husband made an ex parte application after the Court had already awarded the wife temporary pendente lite sole custody of the children after conducting a full hearing. He obtained an ex parte stay enjoining the wife from leaving the children with any unrelated persons over the Veterans Day holiday weekend based on misrepresentations about his prior contact with the individuals-D.R. and S.H.-whom the wife selected to provide child care for the children. The husband represented to the Court that D.R. and S.H. were "complete strangers" to him in a sworn Affidavit. Despite detailed inquiry by the Court on the record at the ex parte hearing on November 10, 2011 the husband, who was present in court, never informed the Court through his attorney that he had met D.R. and S.H. on several occasions, participated in conducting criminal and financial background checks on them and finally approved them to move into the apartment in the marital residence after discussing their personal references with the plaintiff-wife.

The Court found that, under the facts and circumstances here, the husband's counsel did not provide sufficient 22 NYCRR 202.7 notice to the wife's counsel by e-mailing her at 1:40 p.m. of his intent to file an ex parte application that very afternoon. The explanation provided by the husband for seeking the ex parte stay in the afternoon the day before a Court holiday without even attempting to contact the wife directly to discuss his alleged concerns was not reasonable. Furthermore, the husband repeatedly provided less than forthright representations in his filings and on the record through counsel which placed the Court in the untenable position of having to act to protect the children without the wife or the children being afforded due process. The Court found that the husband abused the ex parte application process when he used it as a litigation tactic to purposefully interfere with the wife's vacation plans.

The Court found that an award of counsel fees to the wife of the cost and disbursements associated with the husband's ex parte application dated November 10, 2011 was appropriate based on the husband's abuse of the ex parte application process and his blatant misrepresentations and half-truths to the Court which resulted in an ex parte stay that unnecessarily prolonged the litigation and forced the wife to incur over $13,000.00 of unnecessary legal fees and disbursements. As such, the wife was awarded the sum of $7,500.00 in counsel fees relating to the husband's ex parte application dated November 10, 2011, plus costs. The Court found that sanctions against the husband were appropriate based on frivolous conduct related to the ex parte application as defined under 22 NYCRR 130. The husband repeatedly represented to the Court in a sworn Affidavit and through counsel on the record on November 10, 2011, when the husband was present in Court, that the persons the wife selected to provide child care-D.R. and S.H.-were "complete strangers" to him. The husband steadfastly maintained his representation even after the Court made inquiry on the record as to whether the husband had honest and sincere concerns regarding the safety of the children if left with D .R. and S.H.. Based on the record before the Court, including the papers and the testimony on the record, it was evident to the Court that the husband misrepresented his knowledge of and past interactions with D.R. and S.H. and presented, at best, only half-truths in order to obtain an ex parte stay enjoining the wife from leaving the children with unrelated persons in order specifically to interfere with her planned vacation departure the next day. The Court found that the husband's testimony at the hearing on January 11, 2013 attempting to amend his prior sworn statement by offering his own unique definition of "complete strangers" disingenuous since the husband never clarified to the Court that his definition included people whom he had interviewed, met on multiple occasions and on whom he had conducted background and reference checks. For the husband to misrepresent that the children were being left with "complete strangers" raising the specter that the wife was placing the children in danger falsely was inappropriate. The record was clear that the persons selected by the wife to provide child care for the holiday weekend, after her parents could not assist her with child care, which was the subject to the husband's November 10, 2011 ex parte application, were not "complete strangers" to the husband.

The Court found that the husband's ex parte application was frivolous, as defined under by 22 NYCRR 130-1.1(c), because the husband's sworn Affidavit in Support of the ex parte application asserted material factual statements that were false and the application was designed primarily to prolong the resolution of the litigation and to attempt to "get even" with the wife by interfering with her planned vacation weekend. The Court noted that the husband's testimony at the November 10, 2011 hearing and during the January 11, 2013 sanctions hearing and his sworn representations in his Affidavits relating to his ex parte application were replete with reference to how he believed the wife had wronged him. The Court found that sanctions fixed in the sum of $1,000.00 was appropriate here because the husband's frivolous ex parte application forced the wife to incur unnecessary costs and it unnecessarily prolonged the litigation. The plaintiff's application for sanctions against the defendant was granted to the extent that the defendant was sanctioned $750.00.

Neglect - Fact Finding Hearing - Family Court Holds Mother Did Not Neglect Child by Using Marijuana While She Was Pregnant Where No Evidence That Child Harmed or Placed in Imminent Danger of Harm by That Conduct. Misuse of an Unlawful Substance, Standing Alone, Is Insufficient to Establish Neglect. Mother's Consent to a Finding of Neglect Prior Neglect Proceeding Inadmissible as Evidence of Derivative Neglect.

In Matter of William N., Jr., --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2443190 (N.Y.Sup.) Family held that the mother did not neglect the child by using marijuana while she was pregnant with him; that the father did not neglect the child by misusing marijuana or by failing to stop the mother from smoking marijuana; that the mother did not neglect child by failing to comply with a dispositional order entered in prior neglect proceeding involving the child's sibling; and that as a matter of first impression, the mother's consent to a finding of neglect in the prior neglect proceeding was inadmissible as evidence of derivative neglect.

The Commissioner of the Administration for Children's Services ("ACS") commenced this proceeding alleging that subject child, William N., Jr., was neglected by his mother, Kimberly H. and his father, William N., Sr. ACS alleged that the Child's "physical, mental, or emotional condition has been impaired or is in imminent danger of becoming impaired" as a result of the Mother's and Father's use of marijuana while the Mother was pregnant; the Father's "failure to take any action" to stop the Mother from smoking marijuana; and the Mother's failure to comply with a dispositional order entered, less than three months before William was born, in a case involving William's then 4 1/2 year-old sibling Akasha. William was removed from the Respondents' care two days after his birth, remanded to the custody of the Commissioner, and temporarily placed with his maternal aunt pending further proceedings.

Petitioner's evidence consisted of records from Beth Israel Hospital ("the Hospital") where William was born and the testimony of Child Protective Specialist Leah Brown. In addition, the Court took judicial notice of the fact-finding and dispositional orders in Akasha's case. The Hospital records established that the Mother tested positive for marijuana when William was born, but William tested negative. Ms. Brown testified that the Mother admitted smoking marijuana during her pregnancy. The Mother admitted in the hearing that she smoked marijuana when she was seven months pregnant with William-around the same time that she consented to entry of a finding that she neglected Akasha by misusing marijuana. Ms. Hernandez explained that she smoked marijuana while she was pregnant with William because it was a difficult pregnancy, she was unable to eat, and the marijuana helped increase her appetite and her tolerance of food. Regardless, she did smoke marijuana while she was pregnant with William. The Hospital records also established that, although the Mother tested positive for marijuana when William was born, William tested negative for alcohol, marijuana, or any other controlled substance. Except for a slightly elevated bilirubin count, which had no connection to the Mother's marijuana use, William was a healthy, normal newborn in all respects.

The Court observed that Family Court Act § 1012(f) defines a "neglected child" in pertinent part as a child under the age of 18 "(i) whose physical, mental or emotional condition has been impaired or is in imminent danger of becoming impaired as a result of the failure of his parent ... to exercise a minimum degree of care ... (B) in providing the child with proper supervision or guardianship by ... misusing a drug or drugs...." To establish that William was a neglected child, Petitioner had to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence (Nicholson v. Scopetta, 3 N.Y.3d 357, 368 [2004]), not only that the Mother misused a drug or drugs, which was not in dispute, but also that William's physical, mental or emotional condition was impaired or placed in imminent danger of becoming impaired as a result of the Mother's drug use. The Court of Appeals instructed in Nicholson that, in determining whether a child should be removed from her home, a court must "focus on serious or potential harm to a child, not just what might be deemed undesirable parental behavior" . Moreover, the Court emphasized that "imminent danger" means "near or impending, not merely possible". The Court of Appeals reiterated Nicholson's teaching in Matter of Afton C., 17 N.Y.3d 1, 9 [2011]). In that case, the Court held that the Respondent-Father's conviction of second degree rape and having sex with a minor was insufficient to establish that he posed an imminent risk to his teenage daughters and should thus be removed from the home. The Court admonished that the test is whether the respondent failed to exercise a "minimum degree of care-not maximum, not best, not ideal-and the failure must be actual, not threatened" . Quoting its earlier decision in Matter of Marie B., 62 N.Y.2d 352, 358, the Afton Court noted that "these statutory requirements have constitutional underpinnings: Fundamental constitutional principles of due process and protected privacy prohibit governmental interference with the liberty of a parent to supervise and rear a child except upon a showing of overriding necessity.... [Thus,] the State may not deprive a natural parent of the right to the care and custody of a child absent a demonstration of ... behavior evincing utter indifference and irresponsibility to the child's well-being" Matter of Marie B., 62 N.Y.2d 352, 358 [1984]." ' Afton, 17 N.Y.3d at 9, 926 N.Y.S.2d 365, 950 N.E.2d 101. The Court of Appeals held in In the Matter of Dante M. (87 N.Y.2d 73 [1995]), that a newborn's positive toxicology for cocaine "without proof that the child has been physically, mentally or emotionally impaired, or is in imminent danger of being impaired" is insufficient to establish neglect under FCA § 1012(f)(i)(B). Unlike the baby in Dante M, who had a positive toxicology for cocaine, William tested negative for all unlawful substances and alcohol. And there was no evidence that the Mother's positive toxicology for marijuana-or her use of marijuana while she was pregnant with William-caused any physical, mental, or emotional harm to William or put him at risk of such harm. There was no evidence presented that marijuana itself causes any harm to a developing fetus (see, e.g., Matter of Smith-Jones Children, 34 Misc. 1226(A) [Fam. Ct., Kings Co.2012]. Nor was there any evidence that other conduct of the mother in addition to or in combination with her use of marijuana placed William at risk of harm. In the absence of any evidence that William was actually or potentially injured as a result of the Mother's drug abuse, the allegations that she neglected William as a result of misuse of marijuana failed.

There was no evidence that the father ever used marijuana in the presence of William. Furthermore, since Petitioner failed to prove that the Mother's use of marijuana impaired William or placed him in imminent risk of impairment, its allegations that the Father neglected William by misusing marijuana or by failing to stop the Mother from smoking marijuana had to fail.

The petition in Akasha's case alleged that the Mother neglected Akasha as a result of her misuse of marijuana; her failure to comply with an order of protection issued against her former paramour; and her failure to provide Akasha with adequate supervision and guardianship. The Court notations on the F-99 indicate that the Mother consented under FCA §1051(a) only to entry of a finding that she had neglected Akasha as a result of her misuse of marijuana, and the other allegations were, therefore, implicitly dismissed. In the present case, while the evidence demonstrated that the Mother's misuse of marijuana, which was the basis of the finding that the Mother neglected Akasha, involved a course of conduct that continued up to approximately three months before William was born, there was no evidence that either Akasha or William was harmed or placed in imminent danger of harm by that conduct. Moreover misuse of an unlawful substance, standing alone, is insufficient to establish neglect. Nor does misuse of marijuana constitute the type of neglectful or abusive conduct that has generally served as the basis for a finding of derivative neglect.

The Family Court held that question whether a finding of neglect entered on consent under FCA § 1051(a) in one case did not constitute the "proof" of abuse or neglect necessary under FCA § 1046(a)(i) to be used as evidence to support a finding of neglect of a different child in a subsequent case appeared to be one of first impression. The Court observed that section 1051 permits entry of a finding of abuse or neglect without a hearing in two different circumstances: Section 1051(a) explicitly permits entry of a finding on the consent of all parties-including the respondent-and the attorney for the child. Section 1051(f) implicitly permits entry of a finding on respondent's admission and distinguishes between an admission and a consent by providing that, "[p]rior to accepting an admission to an allegation or permitting a respondent to consent to a finding of neglect or abuse," the court must advise the respondent of the consequences of such admission or consent. In the first circumstance, the court accepts "an admission to an allegation"; in the second, the court permits the "respondent to consent to a finding. "The form order used by Family Court specifically states that the respondent consents to a finding "without admission." There is a clear distinction between a "consent" to a finding of abuse or neglect and an "admission" of conduct constituting abuse or neglect under Article 10 of the Family Court Act. In contrast to an admission, a respondent who consents to entry of a finding of abuse or neglect under FCA s 1051(a) neither admits nor denies the allegations in the petition, but merely consents to entry of a finding and to an order of disposition based on that finding. A consent to a finding under FCA s 1051(a) is analogous to a plea of nolo contendere in the criminal context. For the foregoing reasons, Family Court found that Petitioner failed to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that neither the Mother nor the Father neglected William, and the petition was dismissed.

Pendente Lite Determination - Marital Residence - Sale - Court May Not Direct Sale of Marital Property Held by Spouses as Tenants by the Entirety

In Schorr v Schorr, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2096417 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division affirmed an order which denied defendant's motion to compel plaintiff to sell her interest in the marital residence to his parents. It observed that prior to entry of a judgment altering the legal relationship between spouses by granting divorce, separation or annulment, courts may not direct the sale of marital property held by spouses as tenants by the entirety, unless the parties have consented to sell. Plaintiff's statement in her affidavit, filed in connection with a prior motion in this action, did not constitute a stipulation or agreement between the parties to immediately sell the marital residence, as it did not reflect a meeting of the minds and did not contain specific terms.

Attorneys - Legal Fees - Effect of Disciplinary Rules - Law Office Denied Legal Fees Arising from Representation of Client after Trial Commenced Where Retainer Stated That the Law Office's Representation of Blisko Included Work Leading "Up To" a Trial.

In Law Office of Sheldon Eisenberger v. Blisko--- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2301816 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) Blisko and Eisenberger signed a retainer agreement and a statement of client's rights and responsibilities. The retainer stated that the law office will represent Blisko "in a matrimonial action, including motions and Court appearances up to but not including an actual trial on the matter." Although the retainer lists the law office's hourly fee, it did not indicate the hourly fees of any other attorney who would be working on the case, as required. The law office filed an action against Blisko's husband in January 2009 which was discontinued and a second action in March 2009 which went to trial but was adjourned during the trial. In October 2009, Blisko retained new counsel to represent her in the divorce proceedings. Following arbitration, the law office commenced this action seeking unpaid legal fees of $83,775.69 and a trial was held on the claim. Blisko asserted that the retainer did not comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.3 because it did not state the "hourly rate of each person whose time" was charged to her, but rather only stated the hourly rate of Eisenberger and made no mention of any other attorney working on the case. Blisko also contended that the retainer expressly stated that the law office's representation did not include being trial counsel. The trial court rejected Blisko's arguments and ordered her to pay $83,775.69 to the law office, in addition to the substantial amount she already had paid.

The Appellate Division held that the law office should be denied any legal fees arising from representation of Blisko after the grounds trial commenced. The plain language of the retainer stated that the law office's representation of Blisko included work leading "up to" a trial, "but not including an actual trial." Following the commencement of the trial on August 18, 2009, the retainer between the law office and Blisko terminated and plaintiff was representing Blisko without a written retainer. It rejected the argument of the law office that even if the retainer terminated when the trial began, it could still collect unpaid fees from Blisko because it substantially complied with the requirements of 22 NYCRR 1400.3, holding that the substantial compliance argument has no relevance to this issue because there was no trial retainer at all. If the law office wanted to be paid for representing Blisko at trial, it needed to have the client sign a new retainer. Although the law office could not receive legal fees for any services completed after trial commenced, it could receive any outstanding unpaid fees for work completed prior to commencement of the actual trial. The law office substantially complied with the requirements of 22 NYCRR 1400.3 by giving the client the required statement of client rights and responsibilities and by listing the fee of the primary attorney. It observed that as a general principle, the law office "need not return fees [it] properly earned" (Markard v. Markard, 263 A.D.2d 470, 471 [2d Dept 1999]). Although the retainer did not fully comply with 22 NYCRR 1400.3, the law office did complete work that was within the scope of the pretrial retainer, and therefore it was not required to return fees already paid to it for work completed before the trial. When a client is seeking the return of funds already paid to the attorney, the attorney does not need to show substantial compliance with 22 NYCRR 1400.3, but only that the fees paid were properly earned (Markard, 263 A.D.2d at 471; Mulcahy, 285 A.D.2d at 588).

Appellate Division, Second Department

Contempt - Civil - Where the Plaintiff Failed to Prove Actual Loss, Any Penalty That Punished Defendant for past Acts of Disobedience Would Have Been Within Rubric of a Criminal Contempt and Improper - Supreme Court Did Not Err in Suspending Maintenance Payments and Imposing a Fine Only Prospectively.

In Ruesch v Ruesch, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2233961 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) during the pendency of this action for a divorce the defendant was awarded exclusive possession of the marital home, temporary custody of the parties' children, and pendente lite maintenance and child support. At some point, the defendant permitted her alleged paramour to move into the marital home. In a so-ordered stipulation dated February 15, 2012, the defendant agreed that her paramour was barred from entering the marital home absent further order of the court. In March 2012, the plaintiff moved to hold the defendant in contempt of the so-ordered stipulation because the paramour continued to reside in the marital residence. Upon the defendant's admission that she permitted her paramour to continue to reside in the marital residence in violation of the so-ordered stipulation, the Supreme Court granted that branch of the plaintiff's motion which was to hold her in contempt, pursuant to Judiciary Law § 753. The Supreme Court temporarily suspended maintenance payments and imposed a fine of $250 for each day the defendant remained in continuing violation of the so-ordered stipulation, prospectively, commencing June 26, 2012, until she purged her contempt by demonstrating compliance with the so-ordered stipulation. See Reusch v Reusch, 2012 WL 8144812 (N.Y.Sup.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 52485(U).

The Appellate Division affirmed. It rejected the plaintiff's argument that the court should have suspended maintenance payments and imposed a fine retrospectively from the first day the defendant violated the so-ordered stipulation and thereafter prospectively until she demonstrated compliance.

The Appellate Division observed that unlike fines for criminal contempt where deterrence is the aim and the State is the aggrieved party entitled to the award, civil contempt fines must be remedial in nature and effect. The award should be formulated not to punish an offender, but solely to compensate or indemnify private complainants. The Supreme Court held the defendant in civil contempt. Coercive penalties designed to modify the contemnor's behavior, generally speaking, are civil in nature, while penalties meant to punish the contemnor for past acts of disobedience are criminal. Thus, a fine is considered civil and remedial if it either coerces the recalcitrant party into compliance with a court order, or compensates the claimant for some loss. If a fine is not compensatory, it is civil only if the contemnor is given an opportunity to purge. Here, where the plaintiff failed to prove an actual loss, any penalty that punished the defendant for her past acts of disobedience would have been within the rubric of a criminal contempt and thus improper within this civil contempt adjudication. Accordingly, the Supreme Court did not err in suspending maintenance payments and imposing a fine only prospectively.

Retirement Benefits- Pensions - Waiver - Lack of Definitive Guidance on Whether VSF Benefits Subject to Equitable Distribution Not a Sufficient Basis to Avoid Waiver.
Child Support - Modification - Termination - Child Support Ordered for More than One Child Not Automatically Reduced by Emancipation of Oldest Child - Party Seeking Downward Modification of Unallocated Order Based on Emancipation of One Child Has Burden of Proving Amount of Unallocated Child Support Is Excessive Based on the Needs of the Remaining Children -

In Lamassa v Lamassa, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2230540 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), the parties entered into a stipulation of settlement, read into a court record, whereby the defendant specifically waived any interest in a variable supplement fund (VSF). During those proceedings, the defendant's counsel stated that, under the law in effect at the time, VSF benefits were not marital property subject to equitable distribution. The defendant was asked and confirmed that she understood the effect of the stipulation and voluntarily agreed to waive any interest in the VSF.

In February 2010 the defendant cross-moved, inter alia, to modify the parties' qualified domestic relations order by adding a provision thereto equitably distributing the marital portion of the VSF on the basis that the law concerning equitable distribution of VSFs had changed. The defendant also claimed that the plaintiff unilaterally, and without a court order, modified the child support payments when the parties' eldest child reached 18 years of age and then reduced the amount of the support payments each time one of the parties' remaining three children reached the age of 21 years. The plaintiff then moved, in effect, to modify the stipulation of settlement by reducing the amount of child support payments and cancelling child support arrears on the basis that all of the children were emancipated and the parties had agreed to modify the support obligation when the children became emancipated.

At the hearing the plaintiff testified that, when each of the children reached 21 years of age, he reduced the amount of support payments and gave checks to the defendant, who accepted the checks and did not object orally or in writing. The defendant testified and denied that she agreed to a reduction of the support payments, claimed that she did not receive any checks directly from the plaintiff, and stated that, upon receiving the reduced support checks from the children, she asked the children to tell the plaintiff that the amount was wrong. The defendant also testified about her attempt to enforce the child support obligation. In addition, three of the parties' children also testified and stated that the support checks were given to them to pass on to the defendant and that they never saw the plaintiff give checks directly to the defendant.

The Appellate Division held that the Referee was correct in noting that, at the time of the parties' stipulation of settlement, the law on the issue of whether VSF benefits were subject to equitable distribution was unclear. The law was later clarified when the Court of Appeals held that VSF benefits were marital property subject to equitable distribution. However, the fact that the plaintiff did not have definitive guidance on the issue of whether VSF benefits were subject to equitable distribution is not a sufficient basis upon which she may avoid the effects of her otherwise knowing and voluntary waiver. Thus, it was error to permit the defendant to avoid the consequences of her waiver of any interest in the VSF.

As to the application to reduce the amount of child support payments and cancel child support arrears, the plaintiff provided no evidence, other than his own testimony, that he and the plaintiff had agreed to reduce the amount of the support payments. The plaintiff failed to seek appropriate relief by application to the court for a modification of child support payments, and instead reduced the amount of support payments unilaterally. "When child support has been ordered for more than one child, the emancipation of the oldest child does not automatically reduce the amount of support owed under an order of support for multiple children" (Matter of Wrighton v. Wrighton, 61 AD3d 988, 989). In addition, a party seeking a downward modification of an unallocated order of child support based on the emancipation of one of the children has the burden of proving that the amount of unallocated child support is excessive based on the needs of the remaining children (Matter of Rosenthal v. Buck, 281 A.D.2d 909). The plaintiff did not provide evidence showing that the emancipation of the parties' children made the support obligation excessive. Thus, the plaintiff was not entitled to a reduction of the amount of child support payments or a cancellation of child support arrears.

Child Support - Modification - Upward - Substantial Change in Circumstances - Party Seeking Upward Modification must Establish Specific Increases in Costs Relating to Children's Needs

In Radday v McLoughlin, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 2233214 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that a party may seek modification of a child support order by demonstrating a substantial change in circumstances, as determined by the best interests of the children. The party seeking upward modification must establish specific increases in the costs relating to the children's needs, and may not rely on generalized claims of increases due to their maturity or due to inflation.

Supreme Court

Pendente Lite Determination - Marital Residence - Sale - Court May Direct Sale of Marital Residence by Spouses as Tenants by the Entirety Where it Is in Actual Danger of Being Dissipated.

In Stratton v Stratton, 2013 WL 2249155 (N.Y.Sup.), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 50808(U) Plaintiff and Defendant were married on April 1, 2004, following a domestic partnership that began in 1982. There were no children of the marriage. Plaintiff commenced the action for divorce on December 8, 2009. Defendant was timely and properly served with the Summons and Complaint on December 23, 2009. On May 18, 2010, the Court awarded plaintiff pendente lite exclusive possession of the marital home in Livingston Manor, New York so long as she continued to reside there; directed Defendant to pay the household expenses of the marital home in a timely manner as they became due including: the monthly mortgage/and property tax payment of $2,796.00, all fuel oil and electric service invoices, all cable TV invoices, all homeowner's and vehicle insurance premiums, all medical dental and optical insurance premiums. In addition, the Court ordered Defendant to pay to Plaintiff spousal maintenance of $1,000.00 per month and awarded $5,000.00 as interim counsel fees to the Plaintiff.

Defendant failed in almost all respects to comply with the Court's pendente lite and other orders. Plaintiff filed a contempt motion pursuant to Judiciary Law § 753 on August 12, 2010, for Defendant's failure to pay all of the pendente lite support set forth in the May 18, 2010, order. In a March 5, 2012, order, the Court held the defendant in contempt and determined that Plaintiff accrued further damage to her credit, because the mortgage on the marital residence/farm repeatedly went into foreclosure. In addition Defendant interfered with the sale of the marital residence in 2011. A prospective purchaser submitted an offer of $275,000.00, but the sale could not move forward due to Defendant's refusal to sign the Contract of Sale). The Court found Defendant in civil contempt for failing to comply with the pendente lite order and for failure to pay the mortgage, insurance, taxes, maintenance, maintenance arrears, legal fees, and utilities as directed. The parties appeared, again, in court on August 20, 2012 at which time the Court gave Defendant one last opportunity to comply with the outstanding orders and to sign a quitclaim deed transferring ownership of the marital residence to the Plaintiff so she could effectuate the sale of the farm and place the proceeds in her attorney's trust account. The Defendant remained defiant, refusing to comply with all of the Court's orders. The Court remanded Defendant to the Sullivan County Jail for 30 days. At no time since serving the 30 days in jail had Defendant complied with the Court's orders. The marital residence, which Plaintiff continued to operate as a small farm on which she housed many animals, was once again in danger of foreclosure due to Defendant's ongoing, willful contemptuous conduct. The animals, including many horses, were in danger of going without food, once again due to Defendant's ongoing, willful contemptuous conduct.

The Supreme Court observed that New York law generally limits a court's power to alter title or direct the disposition of the marital residence held as tenants by the entirety during the pendency of a divorce proceeding until the legal relationship between the parties is altered. Kahn v. Kahn, 43 N.Y.2d 203 [1977]. Since the Kahn decision in 1977, however, the New York legislature has enacted the equitable distribution law, found in DRL § 236B, and courts have recognized the judicial flexibility and discretion needed to issue orders necessary to preserve marital assets in danger of being dissipated during the pendency of the divorce proceeding. The law favors preservation of marital assets. When a party's refusal to act causes the dissipation of assets or places those assets in danger of imminent dissipation, it is no less necessary to the enforcement of the equitable distribution statute that the court have the power to direct an affirmative act as it is that the court have the power to restrain. It is unquestioned that courts have the power to direct one party to deliver possession to the other; that power, however, "necessarily includes the power to prevent a party from frustrating such delivery by improper disposition or wasteful dissipation of assets ... [and] is vital to meaningful enforcement and implementation of the equitable distribution statute." " St. Angelo v. St. Angelo, 130 Misc.2d 583 [Sup.Ct. Suffolk Co.1985]. A temporary receiver may be appointed on motion, when property subject to the action is in danger of being lost, damaged or destroyed. CPLR 6401(a).

The Court found that Defendant's ongoing, willful contempt, disregard, and disrespect for the Court's orders, resulted in placing the most significant marital asset in imminent danger of dissipation through foreclosure and had placed farm animals in danger of starvation and neglect; he had done this not only by failing to make any payments as previously directed by this Court in the pendente lite order, but also by willfully and intentionally refusing to sign a contract of sale when Plaintiff presented a ready, willing and able buyer for the property. St. Angelo v. St. Angelo, 130 Misc.2d at 585 .As was the case in St. Angelo, Defendant, who had a significant income, "has offered no justification for not contributing to the payments on the mortgage" and for refusing to sign the contract of sale previously offered. After hearing from both parties in open court and conducting numerous settlement conference in Chambers, the Court determined that Defendant's ongoing behavior was willful and spiteful, and would continue without court intervention. Under the circumstances, this Court, like the court in St. Angelo, appointed a receiver to sell the marital residence on the open market, and to retain the proceeds from such sale in an attorney escrow account pending ultimate resolution of the equitable distribution of the marital assets. It granted the Plaintiff's motion for a receiver to sell the marital residence, and directed that out of the net proceeds from the sale of the marital residence, the receiver shall pay to Plaintiff all of the monies due and owing to her pursuant to the outstanding pendente lite order, and hold the balance in escrow pending final disposition of the case.

Child Support - Agreement - Retroactive Support Not Waived Where pendente lite stipulation silent as to retroactive support. "

In Freilich v Freilich, 2013 WL 2090191 (N.Y.Sup.) the wife moved for an order directing he husband to pay the wife $9,039.00 in pendente lite maintenance and child support arrears for the period of May 11, 2012 to June 27, 2012. On May 11, 2012, the wife moved for pendente lite child support and pendente lite maintenance. On June 19, 2012, the parties' entered into an agreement resolving the pendente lite application. Counsel, on the record in open court in the presence of the parties, spread their agreement on the record and thereafter, settled an order on notice which was signed on October 23, 2012. The wife's counsel stated on the record on June 19, 2012 that" [t]he parties agree that during the pendency of the above action or until further order of the Court, plaintiff shall pay to the defendant Mrs. Freilich, $8,500 per month as taxable maintenance to defendant [wife] and deductible to plaintiff [husband] and $4,100 per month beginning June 27, 2012 in pendente lite child support. The order which was settled on notice stated, in part, that it is ORDERED that Plaintiff is directed to pay the Defendant pendente lite child support for the two children, David and Isaac, FOUR THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS ($4,100) per month beginning June 27, 2012; and it is further ...

Supreme Court held that where a pendente lite stipulation resolving the issues of child support and maintenance is silent as to the retroactive support, retroactive support is not waived. It held that "during the pendency of this action", does not mean commencing with this order. Rather, the application for support commences upon service of the first application and is pending from that day forward.

Supreme Court observed that for that to be a waiver, the party claiming a waiver must come forward with proof that there was a voluntary and intentional relinquishment of a known and otherwise enforceable right. "Child support payments may be waived prospectively, before the obligation to make such payments has accrued (see Matter of O'Connor v. Curcio, 281 A.D.2d 100 [2001]). Both the oral agreement and the written order based upon that agreement were silent to the issue of retroactive child support and maintenance. Supreme Court held that the wife did not waive her right to readdress these issues at a later date because she did not intentionally relinquish this known right by not addressing it on the record.

Actions - Stay of Proceedings - Federal Service Members Civil Relief Act and New York's Military Law - Affidavit Which Failed to Demonstrate Defendant in Active Military Service Insufficient to Vacate Default

In Matter of Lavern B. v Byron W. 2013 WL 2233924 (N.Y.Fam.Ct.) Family Court denied respondents motion for an order pursuant to CPLR 5015 vacating an order of protection issued by the Court on his default on June 19, 2012. Respondent subsequently appeared voluntarily before the Court on December 19, 2012 and the Court assigned counsel to represent him in post-dispositional proceedings, including the filing of this motion.

In his affidavit in support of the motion Respondent stated that he served in the United States Army for 15 years, most recently as a Sergeant with the 299th Quartermaster Unit, where he was assigned to Iraq. Respondent conceded that he and the petitioner "began dating" in 2011 and that "on March 7, 2012, the petitioner came to visit me in Philadelphia, PA, and that we spent the night at my mother's house."Moreover, respondent stated that "some time later I became aware from my mother in Philadelphia, PA, that the petitioner had obtained a restraining order against me alleging that during the visit on March 7, 2012, I had sexually assaulted her" and respondent denies the allegations made by the petitioner. Respondent further stated that "I wrote a letter to the court stating that as a result of being on active duty I was unable to come to the court appearance" , and "[t]hat I have a reasonable excuse" for not appearing "in that I was on active duty during a time of war and was unable to come to court and that the allegations made by the petitioner are false."

Family Court held that in order to obtain relief from the final order entered upon default, respondent must demonstrate both a reasonable excuse for his failure to appear in court as well as a meritorious defense to the allegations in the family offense petition. While respondent alleged in the motion that he "was on active duty" with the United States Army "during a time of war and was unable to come to court" to defend against the petition, there was nothing to substantiate that respondent was on active military duty on June 19, 2012. Respondent did not present the Court with a copy of his orders issued by the Army or any document which would confirm what he suggested was his deployment to Iraq as a Sergeant with the 299th Quartermaster Unit or his confinement to a military installation on June 19, 2012. The letter which he sent to the Court, made no mention of any military duty or any inability to appear due to military service. The Court noted that the New York State Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act expressly provides for a person on active duty with the armed forces to request a stay of judicial proceedings "during the period of such service or within sixty days thereafter" (Military Law § 304)).

Court of Appeals

Child Custody - Visitation - Court of Appeals Holds That There Is a Rebuttable Presumption in New York That Visitation with Non-custodial Parent Is in Child's Best Interest. Parent's Incarceration Not an Automatic Reason for Blocking Visitation

In Matter of Granger v Miscercola, --- N.E.2d ----, 2013 WL 1798581 (N.Y.)
Petitioner, an inmate in New York's correctional system, who had acknowledged paternity of a child prior to his imprisonment, commenced a Family Court proceeding seeking visitation with the child after respondent mother refused to bring the child to the prison. Family Court granted the petition, awarding petitioner periodic four-hour visits at the prison with the child, who was then three years old. It noted that "the law in New York presumes visitation with a non-custodial parent to be in the child's best interest and the fact that such parent is incarcerated is not an automatic reason for blocking visitation." The court found that petitioner had "demonstrated that he was involved in a meaningful way in the child's life prior to his incarceration and seeks to maintain a relationship." It further found that the child was old enough to travel to and from the prison by car without harm, and would "benefit from the visitation with his father." The court considered the length of petitioner's sentence and reasoned that "[l]osing contact for such a long period is felt to be detrimental to an established relationship." The court concluded that visitation with petitioner would be in the child's best interests.

The Appellate Division affirmed Family Court's order, finding "a sound and substantial basis in the record to support the court's determination to grant the father visitation with the child in accordance with the schedule set forth in the order" (96 AD3d 1694, 1695 [4th Dept 2012]). While his appeal was pending, petitioner had been moved to a different correctional facility, further from respondent's home. The Appellate Division made no finding of fact in this regard, ruling that any such change in circumstance was more appropriately the subject of a modification petition. The Court of Appeals affirmed rejecting Respondent's primary contention that the lower courts employed an incorrect legal standard in reviewing the petition for visitation.

The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge Pigott, rejected Respondents contention that this presumption was contrary to this Court's holding in Tropea v. Tropea (87 N.Y.2d 727 [1996]) pointing out that its holding was not that presumptions can never be relied upon, but that "each relocation request must be considered on its own merits ... and with predominant emphasis being placed on what outcome is most likely to serve the best interests of the child". It observed that in Weiss v. Weiss (52 N.Y.2d 170 [1981]), it held that "in initially prescribing or approving custodial arrangements, absent exceptional circumstances, such as those in which it would be inimical to the welfare of the child or where a parent in some manner has forfeited his or her right to such access, appropriate provision for visitation or other access by the noncustodial parent follows almost as a matter of course". Subsequent Appellate Division decisions have frequently referred to a rebuttable presumption that, in initial custodial arrangements, a noncustodial parent will be granted visitation. "[I]t is presumed that parental visitation is in the best interest of the child in the absence of proof that it will be harmful" or proof that the noncustodial parent has forfeited the right to visitation. Family Court noted that New York law "presumes visitation with a non-custodial parent to be in the child's best interest."

The Court reiterated its holding in Weiss, that a rebuttable presumption that a noncustodial parent will be granted visitation is an appropriate starting point in any initial determination regarding custody and/or visitation. Moreover, the rebuttable presumption in favor of visitation applies when the parent seeking visitation is incarcerated. A parent who is in prison does not forfeit his or her visitation rights by being incarcerated. Petitioner's incarceration, standing alone, does not make a visitation order inappropriate," but a demonstration "that such visitation would be harmful to the child will justify denying such a request". In deciding whether the presumption is rebutted, the possibility that a visit to an incarcerated parent would be harmful to the child must be considered, together with other relevant facts. Visitation should be denied where it is demonstrated that under all the circumstances visitation would be harmful to the child's welfare, or that the right to visitation has been forfeited.

The Court noted that In speaking of the manner in which the presumption of visitation may be rebutted, the Appellate Division has frequently used the terms "substantial proof" and "substantial evidence." "[T]he sweeping denial of the right of the father to visit or see the child is a drastic decision that should be based upon substantial evidence". This language is intended to convey to lower courts and practitioners that visitation will be denied only upon a demonstration-that visitation would be harmful to the child-that proceeds by means of sworn testimony or documentary evidence. It held that the "substantial proof" language should not be interpreted in such a way as to heighten the burden, of the party who opposes visitation, to rebut the presumption of visitation. The presumption in favor of visitation may be rebutted through demonstration by a preponderance of the evidence.

The Court of Appeals concluded that the lower courts used the appropriate legal standard, applying the presumption in favor of visitation and considering whether respondent rebutted the presumption through showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that visitation would be harmful to the child.

Termination of Parental Rights - Social Services Law § 384-b - Court of Appeals Holds that phrase "circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life" does not mean the same thing for purposes of Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (I) as it does under the Penal Law.

In re Dashawn W., --- N.E.2d ----, 2013 WL 1759867 (N.Y.) the Court of Appeals in an opinion by Judge Read, held that the phrase "circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life" does not mean the same thing for purposes of Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (I) as it does under the Penal Law. The Court also held that a showing of diligent efforts to encourage and strengthen the parental relationship is not prerequisite to a finding of severe abuse under Family Court Act § 1051 (e) where the fact-finder determines that such efforts would be detrimental to the best interests of the child.

The Court of Appeals observed that at the conclusion of the fact-finding phase in an article 10 proceeding, Family Court may, "[i]n addition to a finding of abuse, . . . enter a finding of severe abuse as defined in [Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a)], which shall be admissible in a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to [Social Services Law § 384-b]. If the court makes such additional finding of severe abuse . . . , the court shall state the grounds for its determination, which shall be based upon clear and convincing evidence" (Family Court Act § 1051 [e]. Section 384-b (8) (a) of the Social Services Law, in turn, specifies that "[f]or purposes of this section [384-b]," which governs termination of parental rights, a child is "severely abused" if "(i) the child has been found to be an abused child as a result of reckless or intentional acts of the parent committed under circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life, which result in serious physical injury to the child as defined in [Penal Law § 10.00 (10)]¹³; or "(ii) the child has been found to be [a sexually abused child]; provided, however, the [parent] must have committed or knowingly allowed to be committed [one of 11 enumerated felony sex offenses] . . . ; or "(iii) [the child's parent has been convicted of certain felony offenses under the Penal Law,¹⁴ and] the victim or intended victim¹⁴ was the child or another child of the parent or another child for whose care such parent is or has been legally responsible; or . . . the parent of such child has been convicted under the law in any other jurisdiction of an offense which includes all of the essential elements [of these crimes]; and "(iv) the agency has made diligent efforts to encourage and strengthen the parental relationship, including efforts to rehabilitate the respondent, when such efforts will not be detrimental to the best interests of the child, and such efforts have been unsuccessful and are unlikely to be successful in the foreseeable future. Where a court has previously determined in accordance with this chapter or the family court act that reasonable efforts to make it possible for the child to return safely to his or her home are not required, the agency shall not be required to demonstrate diligent efforts as set forth in this section" (Social Services Law § 384-b [8] [a] [i]-[iv] [emphases added]).

In this appeal, the parties differed as to what is required to establish "circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life" within the meaning of Social Services Law 384-b (8) (a) (i); and whether the diligent efforts specified by subparagraph (iv) of this provision are prerequisite to a finding of severe abuse under Family Court Act § 1051 (e), or may be excused under Family Court Act §§ 1039-b and 1012 (j) or, alternatively, Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (iv) itself.

ACS, joined by the attorney for the children, argued that the cases discussing "circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life" within the meaning of the Penal Law do not control the interpretation of the same phrase in Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (i). Judge Read pointed out that under the Penal Law, a person acts

¹³ 10.00 (10) of the Penal Law defines "serious physical injury" as "physical injury which creates a substantial risk of death or which causes death or serious and protracted disfigurement, protracted impairment of health or protracted loss or impairment of the function of any bodily organ."

¹⁴ The felony offenses include first- or second-degree murder, first- or second-degree manslaughter, or an attempt to commit murder or manslaughter; criminal solicitation, conspiracy or criminal facilitation for conspiring, soliciting or facilitating these crimes; or first- or second-degree assault or aggravated assault upon a person less than 11 years old or any attempt to commit these crimes.

"intentionally" when "his conscious objective" is to cause a proscribed result (for example, death) or engage in conduct described by a statute (Penal Law § 15.05 [1]); and a person acts "recklessly" with respect to a proscribed result or a circumstance described by a statute "when he is aware of and consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that such result will occur or that such circumstance exists" (Penal Law § 15.05 [3]). And "depraved indifference" bespeaks a state of mind reflecting "a depraved kind of wantonness: for example, shooting into a crowd, placing a time bomb in a public place, or opening the door of the lions' cage in the zoo" (Feingold, 7 NY3d at 293). It is "best understood as an utter disregard for the value of human life — a willingness to act not because one intends harm, but because one simply doesn't care whether grievous harm results or not[, and which reflects] wickedness, evil or inhumanity, as manifested by brutal, heinous and despicable acts" (Suarez, 6 NY3d at 214). The Penal Law establishes crimes that are mutually exclusive, depending on these distinctions of culpable state of mind; specifically, second-degree intentional murder (Penal Law § 125.25 [1] [mens rea of intent to kill]), as contrasted with second-degree depraved indifference murder (Penal Law § 125.25 [2] [mens rea of recklessness plus mens rea of depraved indifference]), as contrasted with second-degree manslaughter (Penal Law § 125.15 [mens rea of recklessness]).

Judge Read indicated that the same cannot be said of the child protective statutes. Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (i) provides that a child can be found to be severely abused "as a result of reckless or intentional acts of the parent committed under circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life" (emphases added). Under the Penal Law, however, a crime requiring proof of an intent to kill can never be committed with depraved indifference (see Policano, 7 NY3d at 600 ["[I]t has never been permissible in New York for a jury to convict a defendant of depraved indifference murder where the evidence produced at trial indicated that if the defendant committed homicide at all, he committed it with the conscious objective of killing the victim" [internal quotation marks omitted]). Additionally, "[a] defendant may be convicted of depraved indifference murder when but a single person is endangered in only a few rare circumstances" (Suarez, 6 NY3d at 212), whereas acts of child abuse necessarily involve one-on-one violence. In short, our depraved indifference jurisprudence under the Penal Law has no bearing on whether a child is severely abused within the meaning of Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (i). For purposes of that statute "circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life" refers to the risk intentionally or recklessly posed to the child by the parent's abusive conduct.

Here, Antoine beat or struck a baby — an especially vulnerable victim because so tiny, defenseless and unformed. And the medical experts testimony about the age of Jayquan's injuries established that Antoine must have attacked him on at least two different occasions, separated by at least two weeks. Further, Antoine had to have been aware of the life-threatening risks he created when he applied brute force to Jayquan's chest and shoulder. After all, he knew that devastating injuries ensued when he brutalized his then four-month old namesake, Antoine, Jr. While this prior instance of abuse was too remote in time to support a finding of repeated abuse, it reflects Antoine's utter disregard for Jayquan's life, health and well-being. Additionally, Antoine neglected to summon medical aid for Jayquan's fractured ribs, even though the baby would have to have experienced and displayed continuous pain and distress; and he delayed seeking medical care for Jayquan on February 21, 2007 from 11:00 a.m., when he claimed to have first noticed the baby's suffering, until the early evening hours . Finally, Antoine offered unbelievable explanations for Jayquan's injuries to medical personnel and social workers, and he did not testify at the fact-finding hearing (see Matter of Nassau County Dept. of Social Servs. v Denise J., 87 NY2d 73, 79 [1995] [where the mother did not testify in a child protective proceeding, we noted that "[a] trier of fact may draw the strongest inference that the opposing evidence permits"]). Thus, there was record support for the Appellate Division's finding, based on clear and convincing evidence, that Antoine, acting under circumstances evincing a depraved indifference to human life, severely abused Jayquan.

It was undisputed that at no time did ACS make "diligent efforts to encourage and strengthen the parental relationship, including efforts to rehabilitate" Antoine (see Social Services Law § 384-b [8] [a] [iv]). The parties contested whether this omission was permissible in light of Family Court Act §§ 1051 (e), 1039-b and 1012 (j). The attorney for the children, joined by ACS, urged that a showing of diligent efforts is not required for a finding of severe abuse under Family Court Act § 1051 (e). Section 1039-b (a) of the Family Court Act states that "[i]n conjunction with, or at any time subsequent to, the filing of a [n abuse or neglect] petition . . . , the [presentment agency] may file a motion upon notice requesting a finding that reasonable efforts to return the child to his or her home are no longer required." The statute further provides that reasonable efforts "shall not be required" when "the parent of such child has subjected the child to aggravated circumstances, as defined in" Family Court Act § 1012 (j) (Family Court Act § 1039-b [b] [1]).¹⁵ Family Court Act § 1012 (j) defines "aggravated circumstances" to include "where a child has been either severely or repeatedly abused, as defined in" Social Services Law § 384-b (8).¹⁶

¹⁵ Judge Read noted in footnote 10 that additionally, reasonable efforts are not required where the parent has been convicted of the murder or manslaughter of another child of that parent (Family Court Act § 1039-b [b] [2]); the parent has been convicted of an attempt to commit murder or manslaughter, or of criminal solicitation, conspiracy or criminal facilitation for conspiring, soliciting or facilitating those crimes, and the victim or intended victim was the child or another child of that parent (id. § 1039-b [b] [3]); the parent has been convicted of first- or second-degree assault or aggravated assault upon a person less than 11 years old, and this criminal conduct caused serious physical injury to the child or another child of the parent (id. § 1039-b [b] [4]); the parent has been convicted "in any other jurisdiction of an offense which includes all of the essential elements of" any of the foregoing crimes, and the victim was the child or another child of the parent (id. § 1039-b [b] [5]); or "the parental rights of the parent to a sibling of [the] child have been involuntarily terminated" (id. § 1039-b [b] [6]).

¹⁶ Judge Read pointed out in footnote 11 that "aggravated circumstances" also include instances where the child has been found to be repeatedly abused within the meaning of Social Services Law § 384-b (8)(b); the child "has subsequently been found to be an abused child [within the meaning of Family Court Act § 1012 (e) (i) or (iii)] within five years after [the] return home following placement in foster care as a result of being found to be a neglected child"; the parent "has refused and . . . failed completely, over a period of at least six months from the date of removal" to engage in or secure reunification services; or "a court has determined a child five days old or younger was abandoned by a parent with an intent to wholly abandon such child and with the intent that the child be safe from physical injury and cared for in an appropriate manner" (see Family Court Act § 1012 [j]).

The Court of Appeals concluded that Family Court Act §§ 1051 (e) and 1012 (j) necessarily import Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) in its entirety. It could not read subparagraph (iv) out of the definition of severe abuse incorporated in these provisions when the Legislature did not choose to create such an exclusion, as it easily might have. The Court also concluded that Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (iv) clearly states that Family Court may excuse diligent efforts when they are found to be detrimental to the best interests of the child. Judge Read recapitulated that Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) defines a child as "severely abused" if the victim of depraved indifference abuse (id. § 384-b [8] [a] [i]), or felony sex offense abuse (id. § 384-b [8] [a] [ii]), or other felony offense abuse (id. § 384-b [8] [a] [iii]), and "the agency has made diligent efforts to encourage and strengthen the parental relationship, including efforts to rehabilitate the respondent, when such efforts will not be detrimental to the best interests of the child, and such efforts have been unsuccessful and are unlikely to be successful in the foreseeable future. Where a court has previously determined in accordance with this chapter or the family court act that reasonable efforts to make it possible for the child to return safely to his or her home are not required, the agency shall not be required to demonstrate diligent efforts as set forth in this section" (id. § 384-b [8] [a] [iv] [emphases added]). Thus, for a court to find severe abuse under Family Court Act § 1051 (e), the presentment agency must demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that the parent committed an abusive act specified in subparagraphs (i), (ii) or (iii) of section 384-b (8) (a); and diligent efforts to reunite the family were not made because detrimental to the child's best interests; or such efforts were made but were unsuccessful and unlikely to succeed in the near term; or such efforts were not required because a court had previously determined that reasonable efforts to reunite the family were unnecessary.

Judge Read concluded that Family Court in this case properly found that diligent efforts to encourage and strengthen the parental relationship would be detrimental to Jayquan's best interests, in accordance with Social Services Law § 384-b (8) (a) (iv). The judge determined that, in light of Antoine's abuse of Antoine, Jr., followed by his severe abuse of Jayquan some 14 years later, there was little prospect that Antoine's "chronic, long-standing" violent behavior would improve anytime soon, if ever, and it was not in Jayquan's best interests to languish in foster care in the meantime.

Agreements - Prenuptial - Construction - Provision For Waiver of Right to Share in Estate or Property Now Owned or Hereafter Acquired Bars Equitable Distribution - Express Waiver Not Required

In Weiss v Weiss, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1954155 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division held that Plaintiff's claim for equitable distribution of the marital assets was barred by the parties' prenuptial agreement, which was made before the effective date of the equitable distribution statute and was valid and enforceable. The October 1972 agreement provided that each party "waives, releases, renounces and surrenders" any "rights, claims and elections" he or she may ever have "to take any interest or share of the other's estate or property, whether now owned or hereafter acquired ... under any circumstances whatsoever, with the same force or effect as though there had never been a marriage between the parties hereto." It held that contrary to plaintiff's contention, it was of no moment that the parties' prenuptial agreement did not contain an express waiver of equitable distribution (Van Kipnis v. Van Kipnis, 11 NY3d 573, 579 [2008]).

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Marital Residence - Court Has No Authority to Award Defendants Interest in Marital Residence to the Children - Premature to Direct Payment of College Expenses for Children Ages 14, 10 and 6 - Judgment Must Include Notice Required By Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(7)(d).

In Mejia v Mejia, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1896282 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) plaintiff husband and the defendant wife were married in 1998, and had three children, now ages 14, 10, and 6. By order of the Family Court entered upon consent, they were awarded joint legal custody, and the plaintiff was awarded primary physical custody. After a nonjury trial Supreme Court considered the first $200,000 of combined parental income in determining child support, based upon, inter alia, "the economic reality of life in Rockland County, the financial resources of the custodial and noncustodial parent, and those of the children, [and] a determination that the gross income of one parent is substantially less than the other parents's gross income," and set the defendant's child support obligation at $1,789 per month. The marital residence, titled in the parties' joint names, was awarded to the plaintiff and the children, based upon the plaintiff's claim that there was no equity in the house. The court held that the plaintiff should maintain health insurance for the children, and the defendant should pay 37% of the college expenses of the children.

The Appellate Division modified the child support award considering the substantial difference between the parties' income, the fact that the defendant had less income than the plaintiff, and the amount of parenting time awarded to the defendant. It found it was just and appropriate to apply the statutory percentage of 29% for the three minor children to the first $150,000 of combined parental income (Domestic Relations Law s 240[1-b][f]). Calculated on that basis, the defendant's pro rata share of the child support obligation was $1,341 per month, subject to reduction as each child reaches the age of 21 years or is otherwise emancipated.

The parties both acknowledged that the Court had no authority to direct the conveyance of the defendant's interest in the marital residence to the children. It noted that the plaintiff, who was seeking the defendant's interest in that property, had the burden of establishing its value, which he failed to do. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff was not entitled to an award of the defendant's interest in the marital residence. It held that since the plaintiff had physical custody of the children, he should be awarded exclusive possession of the marital residence until the youngest child reaches the age of 18 or graduates from high school, whichever occurs first, whereupon the marital residence should be sold and any proceeds, after application of any appropriate credits, should be divided equally between the parties.

The court held that considering the ages of the children, it was premature for the Supreme Court to direct the defendant to contribute toward the college expenses of the children. In its decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the plaintiff shall maintain medical, dental, prescription, and optical insurance for the benefit of the parties' unemancipated children. However, the judgment failed to include a provision effectuating that determination. When there is an inconsistency between a judgment and the decision or order upon which it is based, the decision or order controls. It directed that the judgment be modified to include such a provision. Similarly, Domestic Relations Law § 236(B)(7)(d) requires that any order of support include a notice informing the parties of their right to seek a modification of the child support order upon a showing of "(i) a substantial change in circumstances; or (ii) that three years have passed since the order was entered, last modified or adjusted; or (iii) there has been a change in either party's gross income by fifteen percent or more since the order was entered, last modified, or adjusted." Because the judgment failed to include such a notice, it modified the judgment to include that notice.

Child Support - Award - Family Ct Act § 413[1][K] - Appellate Division Holds That Sm Improperly Awarded Child Support Based on the Needs of Child Rather than Mother's Income, upon Concluding That Mother Failed to Substantiate Her Income Where Sm Failed to Advise Mother That Failure to Fill out the Financial Disclosure Affidavit Would Result in an Award of Support Based on Child's Needs.

In Matter of Anderson v Pappalardo, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1749076 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the mother appealed from an order of the Family Court awarding child support to the guardian of the child of $500 per month, based on the needs of the subject child, pursuant to Family Court Act § 413(1)(k). The Appellate Division reversed. It held that the Support Magistrate improperly awarded child support based on the needs of the child rather than the mother's income, upon concluding that the mother failed to substantiate her income (see Family Ct Act § 413[1][k]). Prior to the hearing at which the Support

Magistrate issued the order, the mother had appeared before the Support Magistrate only twice and, on both occasions, the appearances were very brief. The record did not reflect what directives the mother, who was appearing pro se, received regarding the financial disclosure affidavit which she had failed to complete, or what additional documents she was specifically directed to submit to prove her inability to work full-time. The Support Magistrate failed to advise the mother that her failure to fill out the financial disclosure affidavit would result in an award of support based on the child's needs, instead of the mother's income. The matter was remitted to the Family Court for a new hearing on the petition and a new determination thereafter as to the mother's support obligation.

Family Court - Support - Family Ct Act § 439(e) - Objections to Order - Despite Failure to File Proof of Service Objections Properly Considered Where Receipt Admitted and No Prejudice Resulted

In Matter of Nash v Nash, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1811275 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.) the Appellate Division observed that Family Court Act § 439(e) provides that a party filing objections must serve those objections upon the opposing party, and that proof of service must be filed with the court at the time that the party's objection is filed. Here, the record did not contain any proof of service. However, the mother admitted to receiving the objections 13 days after the father filed them with the Family Court; the mother was able to file her own rebuttal to the father's objections, and no prejudice resulted. The Appellate Division held that despite the irregularity, the Family Court properly addressed the merits of the father's objections.

Marriage - Validity - Action for Declaration of Nullity of Void Marriage - Third Department Declines to Follow Second Department Decision in Ranieri v. Ranieri and Holds Marriage Performed by a Minister of the Universal Life Church Not (ULC) Not Void as a Matter of Law.

In Oswald v Oswald, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1759902 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.) plaintiff and defendant were married in a ceremony performed by a minister of the Universal Life Church (ULC) in Washington County. Three days earlier, the parties had executed an antenuptial agreement which, by its terms, was to take effect "only upon the solemnization of [the] marriage." Five years after the marriage, plaintiff commenced this action seeking a declaration that the marriage was void from its inception, and that the antenuptial agreement was thus unenforceable, because the officiant lacked authority under the Domestic Relations Law to solemnize the marriage. Alternatively, plaintiff sought a divorce as well as enforcement of the antenuptial agreement and equitable distribution of the parties' assets. Defendant answered, denying that the marriage was invalid and asserting a counterclaim for divorce. Plaintiff then moved for summary judgment on his declaratory judgment claim and defendant cross-moved for summary judgment, arguing that plaintiff had not carried his burden of proving the invalidity of the marriage and seeking a declaration that the antenuptial agreement was void on different grounds. Supreme Court granted plaintiff's motion, and denied defendant's motion, concluding that it was constrained by the holdings in Ranieri v. Ranieri (146 A.D.2d 34 [1989], lv dismissed 74 N.Y.2d 792 [1989]) and Ravenal v. Ravenal (72 Misc.2d 100 [1972]) to find the marriage void as a matter of law.

The Appellate Division reversed, finding that the plaintiff did not meet his burden of proof on the motion for summary judgment. It observed that a party to litigation may be estopped from asserting a position contrary to that taken on his or her tax returns (see Mahoney-Buntzman v. Buntzman, 12 N.Y.3d 415, 422 [2009]; Naghavi v. New York Life Ins. Co., 260 A.D.2d 252, 252 [1999]). However, a marriage that is void "cannot be retroactively validated by estoppel, by mutual agreement, or by the parties' conduct in holding themselves out as husband and wife" (Lipschutz v. Kiderman, 76 A.D.3d 178, 183 [2010]; see Landsman v. Landsman, 302 N.Y. 45, 48 [1950]; see also People v. Kay, 141 Misc. 574, 578 [1931]). Thus, Supreme Court correctly found that plaintiff was not estopped from challenging the validity of the marriage.

The Court noted that because Ranieri v. Ranieri was the only appellate decision in this state addressing the question of whether a minister of the ULC has authority under New York law to solemnize a marriage, Supreme Court was bound to follow it (Mountain View Coach Lines v. Storms, 102 A.D.2d 663, 664 [1984]). However, it was not so constrained and it declined to follow the Second Department's determination.

The Appellate Division pointed out that Ranieri was decided a quarter century ago, and it could not presume that the belief system, structure and inner workings of the ULC had remained static since that time. It pointed out that Domestic Relations Law § 11 provides that "[n]o marriage shall be valid" unless it is solemnized by, among others, "a clergy[] [member] or minister of any religion" Pursuant to the Religious Corporations Law, the terms clergy member and minister include "a person having authority ... from the church or synagogue to preside over and direct the spiritual affairs of the church or synagogue" (Religious Corporations Law § 2). The statute defines an "unincorporated church" as a "congregation, society, or other assemblage of persons who are accustomed to statedly meet for divine worship or other religious observances, without having been incorporated for that purpose". Thus, the inquiry here distilled to (1) whether the officiant of the parties' marriage was authorized by the ULC to preside over and direct its spiritual affairs, and (2) whether the ULC is a "church" within the meaning of the statute.

With respect to whether the officiant of the parties' marriage was authorized by the ULC to preside over and direct its spiritual affairs, plaintiff's own submissions, which included the officiant's "Credentials of Ministry," established that the officiant was ordained a minister of the ULC in August 2000 and remains in good standing. Furthermore, documents submitted from the ULC's website state that those ordained as a minister by the ULC are authorized to perform weddings, baptisms and funerals and to otherwise conduct religious services through the ULC. Plaintiff stressed the unconventional nature of the method employed by the ULC in selecting its ministers in an ostensible attempt to undermine the legitimacy of authority bestowed upon its ministers. However, the Court observed that judicial involvement is permitted only when the issue can be resolved by application of neutral principles of law and, other than determining whether the ULC adhered to its own rules and regulations in selecting and ordaining the officiant as a minister, it is not the role of the courts to question the ULC's membership requirements or the method by which it selects its ministers.

With respect to the question of whether the ULC constitutes a "church" within the meaning of the Religious Corporations Law, the affidavits from plaintiff and his attorney merely aver, "upon information and belief," that the ULC does not have an actual church or stated place of worship. The Court held that such allegations were without probative value. The statement from the ULC's website that "the communication and fellowship of our ministers is equal to the once a week sacramonious [sic] fellowship in some of our most segregated and elitist churches" was, at best, ambiguous as to whether members of the ULC were accustomed to meet for divine worship or other religious observances (Religious Corporations Law § 2). The Court stated that in any event, even had plaintiff sustained his initial burden on this point, it would find that defendant's submissions in opposition to the motion, which included an affidavit from the president of the ULC attesting that the ULC had numerous places of worship throughout New York State as well as a list of such congregations, raised genuine factual issues precluding an award of summary judgment.

Plaintiff's assertion that the ULC professes no belief to distinguish its church as a religion provided the Court with no basis to conclude, as a matter of law, that the ULC was not a church within the meaning of the Religious Corporations Law. The courts may not inquire into or classify the content of the doctrine, dogmas, and teachings held by a body to be integral to its religion but must accept that body's characterization of its own beliefs and activities and those of its adherents, so long as that characterization is made in good faith and is not sham". It noted that in some respects, the ULC conducts itself like more conventional churches and encompasses many of the same ideas and values that are present in traditional religions. The ULC ordains ministers and, although ministers are not required to preside over a specific congregation or work within a physical church, the ULC encourages that practice. Additionally, since the ULC's formation in 1959, it has consistently advanced and advocated for its beliefs.

The Appellate Division found that plaintiff failed to establish as a matter of law that the officiant did not have authority to solemnize the parties' marriage, thus warranting denial of his motion.

Grandparent Visitation - DRL §72 - Standing - Third Department Holds "Essential" Components of the Standing Inquiry Are "The Nature and Extent of the Grandparent-Grandchild Relationship" and "The Nature and Basis of the Parents Objection to Visitation".

In Matter of Hill v. Juhase, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1760201 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept.), Petitioner was the paternal grandmother of two minor children, Aiyanna (born in 2006) and Sierra (born in 2008). Petitioner's son, respondent Kasheem C. Hill (father), was the biological father of Sierra but not of Aiyanna, although he acknowledged paternity of Aiyanna and consented to be her father. Respondent Nicole M. Juhase (mother) and the father never married, but cohabitated for a period of time and eventually separated. In March 2010, Family Court issued an order granting custody of the children to the mother and parenting time to the father as agreed to by the parties. Believing that she was not getting sufficient visitation with the children when she traveled from her home in Maryland to New York every other month, petitioner filed a Family Court petition in May 2011 seeking visitation. At the hearing, the parties appeared pro se and the children were represented by an attorney. Prior to the hearing, the mother agreed to allow petitioner to visit the children for the day (four to six hours) every other month in Broome County where they lived, initially with the father present as a transition, but opposed her request to allow her to take them to the City of Oneonta, Otsego County where petitioner has relatives, approximately one hour away. Following the hearing, at which only petitioner and the mother testified, Family Court granted the petition and directed that petitioner would have visitation the first Saturday of every month for four consecutive months beginning January 7, 2012 from 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m., with the visits restricted to Broome County and the first two visits to be conducted in the presence of the father. Upon satisfactory compliance with such provisions, the court directed that subsequent visits would be the first Saturday of every other month commencing June 2, 2012 from 10:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. with no restriction to Broome County nor any requirement that the father be present. The court further directed that no one was to consume alcoholic beverages in the presence of the children.

The Appellate Division reversed, finding that Family Court erred in finding that petitioner had standing and awarding her visitation. Where, as here, the parents of children are alive, Domestic Relations Law § 72 gives grandparents the right to seek visitation with their grandchildren where, as a threshold matter, they can establish circumstances in which "equity would see fit to intervene," i.e., that equitable circumstances exist. Grandparents "must establish a sufficient existing relationship with their grandchild, or in cases where that has been frustrated by the parents, a sufficient effort to establish one, so that the court perceives it as one deserving the court's intervention" (Matter of Emanuel S. v. Joseph E., 78 N.Y.2d at 182). Grandparents must allege and establish more than "love and affection" for their grandchildren. Only when a showing of equitable circumstances has been made will the court then determine whether visitation would be in the grandchildren's best interests. "Essential" components of the standing inquiry are "the nature and extent of the grandparent-grandchild relationship" and "the nature and basis of the parent[']s objection to visitation".

The Appellate Division found that Family Court made no such findings here, simply stating in its oral ruling that petitioner "does appear to have a relationship with the children," without describing its "nature" or "extent" and did not address the basis of the mother's objections. Upon its review of the testimony, it concluded that petitioner did not establish equitable circumstances that justified according her standing to force the mother to accept visitation outside parameters within which she was comfortable as a fit and responsible parent . In so holding, it reminded that "courts should not lightly intrude on the family relationship against a fit parent's wishes. The presumption that a fit parent's decisions are in the child's best interests is a strong one" (Matter of E.S. v. P.D., 8 N.Y.3d 150, 157 [2007]; Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 [2000]).

The record reflected that the parents were fit and employed and continued to cooperatively share responsibilities for caring for the children in the mother's home, assisted by the maternal grandmother. Petitioner, a day-care provider, testified that she lives in Maryland, has relatives including a sister in Oneonta, and travels to New York approximately every other month. Although her testimony was vague, it appears that she sporadically saw the children, born in 2008 and 2006, a few times per year for short visits in 2009, 2010 and 2011 on trips to New York, and one or two times when the mother or father drove to Maryland with the children and stayed overnight at petitioner's house on their way to Virginia. She has never baby-sat for them or visited alone with them, but sent or brought cards and gifts. She claimed that on her New York trips, she often did not see them or saw them for only an hour or so because they usually already had other plans, which the mother was unwilling or unable to alter at the last minute, or the mother picked them up after a short visit with petitioner and the father. Petitioner did not get along with or communicate with the mother, and the reasons for this were not clear. Although requested by the mother, it appeared that petitioner often gave little notice of visits, a few days or hours, and the record suggested that petitioner's visits to New York were focused on visits to Oneonta and were not primarily to see the children, although she did request to see them when here. Her testimony did not clarify why she did not pursue visitation with the children at her son's residence or during his parenting time.

Petitioner also claimed that she had nowhere to visit with the children in Broome County since her niece-at whose home she had occasionally visited with the children-had moved away, but conceded she had always stayed in hotels on her visits and could visit with them there; she did not testify that the cost of hotels was a hardship for her. Petitioner wished to take the children-without either parent-to Oneonta for day-long visits with her extended family, although it was not established that the children knew those relatives or that those relatives had made more than isolated efforts to come to Broome County to visit with and get to know the children.

The mother testified, confirming that petitioner had only periodic visits with the children each year and was often not able to see them because she failed to provide adequate advance notice. The mother opposed out-of-town visitation because the children were young, ages three and five at the hearing, did not know petitioner well and were not bonded to her, and petitioner did not know their routines or needs. She also was concerned that the Oneonta family gatherings involved adult parties with alcohol consumption and the children would not be cared for and supervised by people whom they know. As petitioner admitted, her primary reason for seeking judicial intervention was to take the children to Oneonta. The Appellate Division found valid "the nature and basis" of the mother's objections to compelled overnight or out-of-town visitation. Family Court made no finding regarding petitioner's nurturing skills, the children's attorney advocated against out-of-county visits and there was no evidence suggestive of the children's wishes. The Court found that the nature and extent of the existing grandparent-grandchild relationship did not support the conferral of standing here. The court did not find, nor did the record establish, that the mother frustrated that relationship, and petitioner did not demonstrate sufficient efforts to establish one by doing everything she could have reasonably done to cultivate a close relationship with the children.

Appellate Division, Fourth Department

Equitable Distribution - Property Distribution - Jointly Owned Property - Presumptions - Fourth Department Holds Where Property at Issue Is Held Jointly, an Equal Disposition of That Property Should Be Presumptively in Order, with the Burden on the Party Seeking a Greater Share to Establish Entitlement.

In Lauzonis v. Lauzonis, --- N.Y.S.2d ---, 2013 WL 1777454 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) Defendant wife appealed from a judgment that, inter alia, dissolved the parties' marriage on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, awarded the wife maintenance and child support, and distributed the marital property. The Appellate Division held that Supreme Court did not err in imputing annual income in the amount of $20,000 to the wife for purposes of calculating child support and maintenance based upon her education, qualifications, employment history, past income, and demonstrated earning potential. It agreed with the wife, however, that the court erred in failing to distribute certain marital assets, i.e., an investment account, a 403-b deferred compensation account, and plaintiff husband's preretirement death benefits.

With respect to the investment account, which the parties referred to as the "Investacorp account," there was no question that those funds constituted marital property. The husband acknowledged at trial that the Investacorp account should be divided equally between the parties after he is reimbursed from that account for the amount he paid for the parties' custodial evaluator. The court, however, awarded the entire account balance to the husband on the ground that "the testimony and evidence is not enough to award the balance of said account to the [wife]." The Appellate Division held that where, as here, the property at issue is held jointly, an equal disposition of that property should be presumptively in order, with the burden on the party seeking a greater share to establish entitlement. Here, the husband did not overcome the presumption that the jointly titled property, i.e., the Investacorp account, should be divided equally between the parties. Thus, it agreed with the wife that the court should have equitably distributed that marital asset and modified the judgment accordingly.

It also agreed that at least a portion of the husband's 403-b account was marital property subject to equitable distribution and that the court therefore erred in failing to distribute that asset. The husband made contributions to that account from his wages during the course of the marriage and thus, as the husband acknowledged at trial, the account should be divided equitably "pursuant to the formulas outlined by the courts" It remitted this matter to Supreme Court for equitable distribution of the husband's 403-b account.

It further agreed with the wife that the court erred in failing to equitably distribute the husband's in-service death benefit, which was provided through the teacher retirement system and remitted this matter to Supreme Court for a determination of the value of the death benefit at the time of the commencement of this action and for the equitable distribution thereof.

The wife contended that the court abused its discretion in failing to award her any portion of the husband's enhanced earnings from his master's degree, which he earned in part during the marriage. It agreed, and remitted this matter to Supreme Court for a determination of the appropriate percentage of those enhanced earnings that should be awarded to the wife. The record established that, at the very least, the wife made a "modest" contribution toward the husband's attainment of a master's degree and thus that she is entitled to some portion of his enhanced earnings.

The Appellate Division was unable to ascertain from the record how the court calculated the child support award in the amount of $275 per week and whether, as the wife contended, the court deducted maintenance from the husband's income before calculating his child support obligation. It modified the judgment by remitting this matter to Supreme Court to determine the amount of the husband's child support obligation in compliance with the Child Support Standards Act.

Finally, it concluded that the court failed to determine what amounts, if any, the husband owed to the wife for arrears with respect to an interim order (grocery arrears), and remitted this matter to Supreme Court to determine the amount of the grocery arrears, if any, owed to the wife and to award an appropriate money judgment for any such arrears. It noted that upon remittal, the court should hold a hearing with respect to the various issues to be decided, if necessary.

Action for Divorce - Process - CPLR 308(5) - Appellate Division Holds Where Plaintiff Made Sufficient Showing That Service Pursuant to CPLR 308(1), (2), or (4) Was Impracticable Court Providently Exercised its Discretion in Directing Service by Email.

In Safadjou v. Mohammadi, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1777765 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) consolidated appeals arising from a matrimonial action, in which a divorce was granted and custody awarded to the plaintiff, the defendant contended on appeal that Supreme Court erred in ordering service of the summons with notice by email. The Appellate Division affirmed. It concluded that plaintiff made a sufficient showing that service upon defendant pursuant to CPLR 308(1), (2), or (4) was impracticable, and thus that the court providently exercised its discretion in directing an alternative method of service.

The Appellate Division observed that CPLR 308(5) vests a court with the discretion to direct an alternative method for service of process when it has determined that the methods set forth in CPLR 308(1), (2), and (4) are "impracticable." Although the impracticability standard is not capable of easy definition a showing of impracticability under CPLR 308(5) does not require proof of actual prior attempts to serve a party under the methods outlined pursuant to subdivisions (1), (2) or (4) of CPLR 308. The meaning of 'impracticable' will depend upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Plaintiff submitted evidence that defendant left the United States with the parties' child and declared her intention to remain in Iran with her family (Astrologo, 240 A.D.2d at 606-607). Plaintiff established that Iran and the United States do not have diplomatic relations and that Iran is not a signatory to the Hague Convention on Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents in Civil and Commercial Matters (20 UST 361, TIAS No. 6638). Plaintiff thus requested alternative service upon defendant's parents in Iran, with whom defendant was residing. In light of those unique circumstances, the court properly determined that service upon defendant was "impracticable by any method of service specified in CPLR 308(1), (2), and (4)."

The Court pointed out that once the impracticability standard is satisfied, due process requires that the method of service be reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise' the defendant of the action. In order to be constitutionally adequate, the method of service need not guarantee that the defendant will receive actual notice. Here, the court initially ordered service of the summons by (1) personal service upon defendant's parents; (2) mail service upon defendant at her parents' address in Iran; and (3) service upon defendant by plaintiff's Iranian attorneys in accordance with Iranian law. Pursuant to that order, plaintiff mailed the summons and notice to defendant at her parents' last known address in Tehran and submitted a declaration by his Iranian attorney that at least two attempts were made to effect personal service upon defendant at that address. Although defendant contended that the address used for service was "bogus," the record reflected that the address was in fact used by defendant and/or her parents in some capacity. Defendant supplied that address to the child's pediatrician in requesting the child's medical records, and she averred that her father ultimately received the documents from a "tenant" who lived at that address. When plaintiff was unable to effect personal service upon defendant's parents pursuant to the court's order, the court relieved him of that obligation and instead permitted service "via email at each email address that [p]laintiff knows [d]efendant to have."

The Appellate Division held that although service of process by email "is not directly authorized by either the CPLR or the Hague Convention, it is not prohibited under either state or federal law, or the Hague Convention" (Alfred E. Mann Living Trust v. ETIRC Aviation S.A.R.L., 78 AD3d 137, 141) and, both New York courts and federal courts have, upon application by plaintiffs, authorized email service of process as an appropriate alternative method when the statutory methods have proven ineffective. Contrary to the contention of defendant, it concluded that plaintiff made the requisite showing that service by email was reasonably calculated to apprise defendant of the pending lawsuit and thus satisfied due process. The record reflected that, for several months prior to the application for alternative service, the parties had been communicating via email at the two email addresses subsequently used for service. Although defendant claimed that she did not receive either of the emails, she acknowledged receipt of a subsequent email from plaintiff's attorney sent to the same two email addresses. It concluded that, under the circumstances of this case, the court properly determined that service of the summons with notice upon defendant by email was an appropriate form of service (see Snyder v. Alternate Energy Inc., 19 Misc.3d 954, 962).

Claim to Share of Pension Payments Subject to the Six-year Statute of Limitations Set Forth in CPLR 213(1) Which Begins to Run When Pension Payments Received. Mere Silence or Failure to Disclose Receipt of Benefits Insufficient to Invoke Equitable Estoppel

In Bielecki v. Bielecki, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1848767 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept.) the judgment of divorce, entered in 1985, provided that plaintiff was entitled to her Majauskas share of defendant's pension "when said defendant starts to obtain his pension." Defendant began receiving pension benefits in March 1991. Plaintiff was unaware that defendant was receiving such benefits and she did not begin to receive her share until October 2005, when she obtained a qualified domestic relations order (QDRO). By notice of motion filed October 21, 2010, plaintiff sought her share of pension benefits received by defendant from the date of his retirement in March 1991 until October 2005, when plaintiff began prospectively receiving her share of such benefits pursuant to the QDRO. The Appellate Division modified. It held that Supreme Court erred in granting plaintiff's motion in its entirety. Plaintiff's claim with respect to defendant's pension benefits was subject to the six-year statute of limitations set forth in CPLR 213(1) (Tauber v. Lebow, 65 N.Y.2d 596, 598). The statute began to run when defendant began receiving his pension in March 1991. Because defendant's obligation to pay plaintiff her share of the pension was ongoing, the statute began to run anew with each missed payment. Thus, plaintiff's claim was untimely to the extent that it sought payments missed within six years prior to her motion filed on October 21, 2010. It rejected plaintiff's contention that defendant was equitably estopped from raising the statute of limitations as a defense inasmuch as defendant made no affirmative misrepresentation to her, and his silence or failure to disclose the date on which he began receiving his pension benefits was insufficient to invoke the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

Supreme Court

Agreements - Prenuptial - Construction - Provision for Waiver of Right to Share in Estate or Property Now Owned or Hereafter Acquired Construed by Supreme Court to Provide That Assets Not Defined as "Separate Property" by the Agreement, Are "Marital Property" Subject to Equitable Distribution

In Wolanin v. Wolanin, , 2013 WL 1858768 (N.Y.Sup.), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 50691(U) plaintiff sought an order interpreting the parties prenuptial agreement as not "waiv[ing] ... the creation of a marital estate". The Prenuptial Agreement provided, in relevant part: Each of the parties, except as herein provided, shall separately retain all rights in his or her own property, whether now owned or hereafter acquired, and except as otherwise provided herein, each of them shall have the absolute and unrestricted right to dispose of such separate property free from any claims that may be made by the other by reason of their marriage, and with the same effect as if no marriage had been consummated between them. Plaintiff contended that the Agreement did not define the word "separate property", and did not waive the creation of a marital estate or acquisition of marital property. Accordingly, she argued, "[a]ny property acquired during the marriage that cannot specifically be traced back to property owned by a party at the time of the execution of the Agreement (i.e. separate property), and which was acquired during the marriage through the parties' wages, is in fact marital property subject to distribution pursuant to equitable distribution and the Domestic Relations Law".

Supreme Court observed that a prenuptial agreement that provides for the division of property must be interpreted with Domestic Relations Law § 236(B), which defines both "marital property" and "separate property" and provides that, unless there is a duly executed prenuptial agreement, "marital property" must be equitably distributed and "separate property" must remain separate).The statute permits parties to either "expressly waive or opt out of the statutory scheme governing equitable distribution" or to, "specifically designate as separate property assets that would ordinarily be defined as marital property subject to equitable distribution under Domestic Relations Law s 236(B)(5). Although the parties' intent must be clearly evidenced by the writing there is no categorical requirement that a prenuptial agreement must set forth an express waiver of equitable distribution. It noted that the Domestic Relations Law defines "marital property" as "... all property acquired by either or both spouses during the marriage and before the execution of a separation agreement or the commencement of a matrimonial action, regardless of the form in which title is held ..." (Domestic Relations Law § 236 B(1)[c]). The statute defines "separate property" as "property described as separate property by written agreement of the parties pursuant to [Domestic Relations Law § 236 B(3)] (Domestic Relations Law § 236 B(1)d).

Reading the prenuptial agreement with the statute, the Court found that the prenuptial agreement was not ambiguous. The parties specifically agreed to designate as "separate property" assets that would ordinarily be defined as marital property. The prenuptial agreement clearly defined "such separate property" to be "his or her own property, whether now owned or hereafter acquired". It held that the prenuptial agreement permitted separate ownership of each asset held in each party's name, even if it was acquired during the marriage. Notwithstanding the foregoing, it appeared that the parties agreed that any assets that are not "separate property" as that term is defined by the agreement, are "marital property" and thus subject to equitable distribution. Thus, the factual issue with regard to whether any specific asset falls within the definition of "separate property" or "marital property" remained.

Court of Appeals

Paternity - Defense of Equitable Estoppel - Applied to Deny Non-Biological Father Right to Deny Paternity

In Commissioner of Social Services on Behalf of Elizabeth S. v. Julio J., 20 N.Y.3d 995, 985 N.E.2d 127, 961 N.Y.S.2d 363 (2013) the Court of Appeals observed that before a party can be estopped from denying paternity or from obtaining a DNA test that may establish that he is not the child's biological parent, the court must be convinced that applying equitable estoppel is in the child's best interest (Matter of Shondel J. v Mark D., 7 NY3d 320 [2006]). The party seeking to prove paternity, whether by estoppel or otherwise, must do so by clear and convincing evidence. Although the Appellate Division stated that its reversal was on the law, that court, considering the same evidence as Family Court, made different factual findings to support its conclusion that the Commissioner of Social Services had not proven by clear and convincing evidence that respondent Julio J. should be estopped from denying paternity. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reviewed the record to determine which set of findings more nearly comported with the weight of the evidence (see Matter of Jamie M., 63 NY2d 388, 393 [1984]), and concluded that the evidence more nearly comported with Family Court's findings that the child, who was eight years old at the time of the hearing, knows respondent, with his encouragement, as her father; that a relationship existed insofar as the child was concerned; and that the child relied on respondent to be her father sufficiently such that it would be to her detriment for the court to direct "DNA testing. Upon those findings, Family Court properly decided that respondent should be equitably estopped from asserting nonpaternity.

Appellate Division, First Department

Child Support - Award - CSSA - Shared Custody - First Department Rejects Rule Established in Baraby

That in an Equally Shared Custody Case the Parent Who Has the Greater Income Should Be Considered the Noncustodial Parent for Purposes of Support

In Rubin v. Salla, --- N.Y.S.2d ----, 2013 WL 1681220 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept.) the Appellate Division, First Department rejected the rule established in Baraby v Baraby, 250 A.D.2d 201, 681 N.Y.S.2d 826 (3d Dept, 1998), that in an equally shared custody case the parent who has the greater income should be considered the noncustodial parent for purposes of support. It held, based on the plain language of the Child Support Standards Act, that a custodial parent cannot be directed to pay child support to a noncustodial parent, and that the "custodial parent", in an equally shared custody case, is "the parent who has the child the majority of the time, which is measured by the number of overnight time that parent has with the child." Inexplicably, the Court distinguished the decision in Baraby, although it appears to have rejected its holding entirely.

Plaintiff (mother) and defendant (father) were the unmarried parents of a 9-year-old son. The mother and father always lived separately. In April 2009, the mother commenced an action seeking sole legal and residential custody of the child, and an order compelling the father to pay child support. The father also sought primary custody of the child. After trial, the court awarded primary physical custody to the father during the school year, with the mother having parenting time on alternate weekends (from Friday after school to Monday morning) and every Thursday overnight. During the summer, the schedule was reversed and the child would live primarily with the mother, but would spend Thursday overnights and alternate weekends with the father. The mother would also have the child each midwinter school break, and the other school breaks were evenly divided. In addition, each parent was given two weeks with the child during the summer. With respect to legal custody, the court awarded the father decision-making authority, after consultation with the mother, over educational and medical issues. The mother was given authority, after consultation with the father, over decisions on summer and extracurricular activities, and religion.

Following the custody decision, the father moved for summary judgment dismissing the mother's cause of action for child support. He argued that, by the terms of the custody order, he was the custodial parent because the child would spend the majority of the year with him. He argued that, as a matter of law, the court could not order him to pay child support to the mother, the noncustodial parent. The father's motion included a calendar showing that during the period from July 2012 to June 2013 there were 206 overnights with the father and 159 with the mother. These custodial periods equated to the child being with the father 56% of the time and with the mother 44% of the time. The mother conceded that the child would reside with the father "most of the time," that the father was the "de-facto custodial parent," and that she may not be the "custodial parent" for purposes of the Child Support Standards Act (CSSA). She also agreed that under a "strict application" of the CSSA, the father could not be ordered to pay child support. Nevertheless, the mother argued that she was entitled to an award of child support because any other result would be unjust and inappropriate.

C

Supreme Court denied the father's summary judgment motion, finding that an award of child support to the mother was not precluded because the parties had "parallel legal custody" of their son and both spent some time with the child, it was impossible to say, as a matter of law, that the father was the custodial parent for child support purposes. The court also focused on the disparity between the parents' financial circumstances and concluded that, regardless of whether the father was the custodial parent, it had the discretion to award the mother child support because she needed funds to pay her monthly rent and to maintain the type of home she could not otherwise afford without the father's assistance.

In reversing the order of the Supreme Court, Justice Richter, writing the opinion for the First Department, held that under the current child support structure enacted by the Legislature, the father, as the custodial parent, cannot be directed to pay child support to the mother, the noncustodial parent. The CSSA provides for “a precisely articulated, three-step method for determining child support” awards in both Family Court and Supreme Court. Unlike the discretionary system of the past, a court is required to make its child support award pursuant to the CSSA’s provisions. Under the CSSA’s plain language, only the noncustodial parent can be directed to pay child support. Domestic Relations Law § 240(1-b)(f)(10) and FCA § 413(1)(f)(10) state that, after performing the requisite calculations, “the court shall order the non-custodial parent to pay his or her pro rata share of the basic child support obligation.” The mandatory nature of the statutory language undeniably shows that the Legislature intended for the noncustodial parent to be the payer of child support and the custodial parent to be the recipient. The CSSA provides for no other option and vests the court with no discretion to order payment in the other direction.
